PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER CONSTRUCTION OF NORTHERN PIPELINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 and concerning the right of the Parliament of Canada to participate in decisions relating to a northern pipeline. If there is unanimous consent I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That a special committee of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon proposals for the construction of a northern pipeline; that 15 members, to be named at a later date, be selected to serve on the committee; that the committee be authorized to conduct its discussions in such a way as to maximize public participation and understanding of the issues at stake; that the Berger commission report be referred immediately to the committee and that all subsequent reports on pipeline construction shall stand referred immediately to the committee upon tabling in the House; and that the said committee have the power to send for persons, papers and records and to examine witnesses; to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House; to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation for debate of any motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCOME TAX

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE OPTION AS TO METHOD OF DEDUCTIONS AT SOURCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to request the unanimous consent of the House to my motion. Given the view expressed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) in a letter dated as long ago as November, 1976 that the problem of tax deductions at source for public servants based on their place of work, rather than on their place of residence, rested on the income tax regulations, and given the increasingly heavy burden that the levying of this tax is placing on public servants living in Ontario but finding Quebec to be their place of work, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this government be instructed by this House to amend the income tax regulations in such a way as to permit public servants to express an option with respect to the way income tax deductions may be made at source.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 must be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR INDEPENDENT STUDY OF MERCURY POLLUTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I move under the provisions of Standing Order 43 a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the recent book by Warner Troyer entitled "No Safe Place" confirms the seriousness of mercury poisoning in Canada, in view of the fact the House has been repeatedly misled about the number of cases of Minamata disease, and in view of the fact there are allegations that the federal health department has suppressed information regarding the seriousness of mercury health hazards, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

● (1410)

That the federal government immediately commission an independent comprehensive epidemiological study on mercury pollution, and the entire matter be referred to the appropriate standing committee of the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NORTHERN PIPELINE—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY OF BERGER COMMISSION REPORT OR DEBATE IN HOUSE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Prime Minister. Last week I asked the Prime Minister whether he was prepared to refer the report of Mr. Justice Berger to the appropriate standing committee of the House. I did not receive a reply to that question. Today, the government will be tabling that report, and there is still no indication as to whether the government of Canada is prepared to let this parliament consider that report or wants to make that and other decisions in secret by executive fiat. May we have, from the Acting Prime Minister now, a clear undertaking that when the Berger commission report is tabled this afternoon it will be immediately referred to the appropriate standing committee of parliament?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to give that undertaking at the present time. I have already expressed my doubt as to whether it will be useful to conduct another inquiry in light of the inquiry that has been conducted by Mr. Justice Berger. However, I am ready to tell the Leader of the Opposition that it will be possible for parliament to deal with this report, at least to debate it. I have commenced, in a tentative way, discussions with my counterparts in the other parties seeking a way by which we may be able to debate, under a general motion, the Berger report and other developments that may affect a pipeline decision. It seems to me that putting the question before parliament or giving parliament, as a whole, an opportunity to comment on the report might be more meaningful than at this stage to establish another inquiry. It would be better for us, as early as possible, to have a debate on the subject and then take it from there.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister and his colleagues have had three weeks to consider what they were going to do about this matter, at least three weeks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: The Acting Prime Minister now tells us that he does not think it would be useful, to use his words, for the parliament of Canada to play a role in looking into the recommendations which have been made by the Berger inquiry. He has suggested that instead there might be a debate of some duration, at this point unknown. May I ask the Acting Prime Minister if he intends to delay that debate in the House of Commons until after the National Energy Board has made a recommendation on matters relating to a northern pipeline?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I believe it would be very important, as early as possible, to have parliamentary spokesmen from various parties comment in the way they wish on the very important conclusions that will be contained in the Berger report. It is not my intention to delay any such debate until after the National Energy Board reports. It may be that it will be useful to have a further debate after additional reports are received; but my intention would be to provide an opportunity for debate in the House of Commons which would give the parties and the individuals an opportunity to comment upon the conclusions that have been made by Mr. Justice Berger.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the parliament of Canada is not interested in a role that reduces it simply to a commentator. The parliament of Canada wants the opportunity which lies at the root of the parliamentary process whereby members of this assembly representing the whole of the country might have an opportunity to discuss, in the detail necessary, the very important report that is going to be tabled this afternoon by Mr. Justice Berger. It is not adequate to have one day of debate as a replacement for committee study.

I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister two things now. First, will he give us a commitment that there will be an opportunity for a committee of this parliament to consider the Berger report in the way it would consider other important reports? Second, will he give us a guarantee now that there will be an opportunity for the parliament of Canada, either in committee or preferably in a long debate in the whole House, to discuss this whole question after the National Energy Board has made its recommendation?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, briefly the answer to the first part of the question is no. I am not prepared to give a firm undertaking. The answer to the second part of the question is a qualified yes.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, we are now moving from the government saying nothing at all to giving us a qualified yes, which leaves the Parliament of Canada nowhere at all. We do not know what that means. Can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House of Commons how long a debate he is anticipating on the Berger commission report.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, I hope to work out some arrangements with my counterparts on the other side of the House. It may be that we may all want to contribute some of the time available to us to deal with this important matter. On the part of the government, I am quite prepared to undertake that there will be a debate. I have not decided the length of the debate. I invite other parties perhaps to contribute some of their allotted days so that the debate can be useful and broad enough to provide input from all hon. members in the House.

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Apparently the minister prepared a memorandum and sent it to Canadian Press with regard to certain energy matters. In that memorandum, the minister stated that he had informed the United States energy chief, James Schlesinger, in March 1977 and I quote:

Under certain circumstances we might be prepared to continue our exports at a rate of 250,000 barrels a day—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understood the hon. member was asking a supplementary to his leader's question. We will get to that later.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—ACTION TO ENSURE CANADA RECEIVES FAIR SHARE OF GROWTH IN INDUSTRY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Clause 1 of the Canada-United States automotive agreement asserts that both countries must share equitably in future growth of the industry. The minister in a recent statement at long last indicated that Canada has not been getting its fair share of new jobs in this industry in light of the fact that the Canadian market has grown more rapidly than that of the United States. What precisely is the minister or the government, through some other department, doing to ensure that we get our fair share of growth in this industry?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think this problem is extremely complex. The hon. member has used our normal employment ratio. However, I would like to remind him that while the North American automobile market represents 9 per cent in Canada, we have in this field 11 per cent of the jobs. The problem is the balance of payments level where we had a deficit of about $1.1 billion last year. I believe we have greatly improved the situation, but negotiations will be needed in some areas to come to agreement on adjustment matters. But I must say that, generally speaking, the automobile pact has been extremely favourable for Canada.

[English]

ALLEGATION CANADA NOT RECEIVING FAIR SHARE OF AUTOMOTIVE PARTS INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the minister should know, as his two predecessors indeed knew, that in terms of our share of jobs in the crucially important automotive parts sector, we have not been doing very well. As the minister knows, Canada currently consumes some 12 per cent of the automotive parts but only has 6 per cent of the jobs with a net loss of employment to Canadians in this high technology, highly paid sector, of some 20,000 jobs according to the president of the Canadian Automotive Parts Association. Is the minister concerned that the very guts of the automotive industry is being transferred from Canada to the United States? If so, what specifically does he plan to do about it?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is very good at choosing only certain parts. He is now talking about the parts sector. I am aware of that. However, he did not refer to the fact that we have been doing very well on the assembly line and have a huge surplus with the United States on that. When we signed the agreement in 1964 or 1965, we were only producing 3 per cent of the North American production. We now produce 7.5 per cent. Therefore, the agreement has been very good. In terms of net jobs, we have 11 per cent of the jobs. Some adjustment has to be made, but up until now the auto pact has been extremely useful for the Canadian economy.

● (1420)

Mr. Broadbent: As a preface to my final question I wish to remind the minister that his two predecessors sat idly by during the past six years while our parts industry was transferred to the United States. That process is still continuing. If it continues for a few more years and the U. S. pulls out, we will have nothing to maintain the industry in this country. Therefore, I would like to ask the minister whether the government has any specific proposals to make to ensure that the essence of the whole industry, which is the parts industry, the skilled trade sector, will remain in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: I am aware of the problems, Mr. Speaker, and I raised this issue with the American officials I met when I went to Washington a few weeks ago. We had our officials prepare a report on the over-all situation, following the conversations between President Ford and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), a report which I hope to table shortly. There are problems today, and there will be problems tomorrow. What I mean to say is that our position is quite favourable with respect to assembly lines, but unfavourable when it comes to auto parts. All in all, however, I feel that we have made considerable progress. I am keeping a very close eye on the situation. I hope it will improve in the future, but I resent the hon. member's suggestion that no progress has been made and that we shall have to return to the pre-auto-pact era.

POSSIBILITY OF INQUIRY INTO DEPARTURE OF HEAD OFFICES FROM QUEBEC

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Considering the alarming statements by the minister concerning the supposed exodus of company head offices from Quebec to other provinces and since he has refused to comment publicly on those statements, could he tell the House whether his department has undertaken any serious inquiry on that matter and can he report to the House to what extent company head offices are now leaving Quebec for other provinces?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the department is not making any extensive study on the phenomenon, but you will understand perfectly well that we are not indifferent to what is going on not only in Quebec but also in other provinces. During the last six months, and particularly lately, we have noted an increasing movement of transfer, and I thought it was my duty to mention it so that the authorities responsible, at both federal and provincial levels, might be aware of it and make the necessary corrections. It is not only important, Mr. Speaker, to note the transfer of head offices from one province to another, but also to note that within the head offices that are not moving, other transfers occur which are equally important and bad for the economy of a province, although in many instances the head offices themselves remain.

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER KNOWS OF STUDIES CONDUCTED IN QUEBEC

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

Is the minister acquainted with the studies made in this connection by the Quebec government and is he aware that by far the majority of those so-called head offices were merely of fictitious companies which in fact had no facilities whatsoever in Quebec?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I merely want to point out one thing to the hon. member who seems to take lightly the fact that head offices are being moved out of Quebec. Why, if my allegation had not been serious, had been without any basis, would six Quebec ministers have seen fit to deny it so vehemently?

MEASURES TAKEN BY MINISTER TO STOP DEPARTURE OF HEAD OFFICES FROM QUEBEC

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I have another supplementary.

In view of the minister's interest in this matter which he seems to regret, can he tell us what steps he intends to take to counter those famous transfers?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, may I say to the hon. member that if he had, as I hope he did, studied some of the statements I made publicly at seven or eight conferences where I was invited to speak, he would know that I insisted strongly on the situation. In particular, I urged English Canadian firms now in Quebec not to abandon it, and not only that, but to continue investing there if they feel that Quebec should remain within Confederation.

[Mr. Lessard.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE TO PRIME MINISTER'S CONDUCT AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Knowing him to be a loyal and devoted subject of the Queen of Canada I wonder if he has any observations to make in connection with an exhibition put on by the Prime Minister, shown on CBC television, at Buckingham Palace when the Prime Minister did a caricature pirouette behind the Queen accompanied by, to say the least, unseemly gestures. Has he any observation to make on the propriety of that?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

ENERGY

OIL—GOVERNMENT POLICY ON EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As far as we know, it has been the government's policy up until now to cut off oil exports to the United States in 1981 and to reduce them up until that year. The minister has apparently proposed to Dr. Schlesinger that Canada might guarantee exports of oil to the United States for five years subject to certain conditions. Has the Canadian policy now changed, and what are the circumstances or conditions to which the minister was referring in his offer to Dr. Schlesinger?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is quite true that Dr. Schlesinger and I talked about the question of supplying the northern tier refineries through a continuation of Canadian oil or possibly through other methods, including "yo-yoing" the Trans-Mountain Pipeline, the Kitimat application and another application, which may appear before the United States regulatory authorities, for a pipeline from Cherry Point paralleling the Canadian border. We explored Canadian policy on the basis of being able to make Canadian supplies available to the Americans on a secure oil basis; let us say swapping secure oil for secure oil. We also examined the possibility of using the potential of the Wabana iron ore mines and the franchise arrangement granted by the Newfoundland government to Wabanex for an oil storage facility which would be used perhaps to provide that kind of security for Canadian users.

MINISTER'S ASSESSMENT OF FOOTHILLS' PIPELINE PROPOSAL

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, in the minister's same memorandum he refers to the Foothills Pipeline Limited proposal for a pipeline to bring gas from the Mackenzie Delta, and before receiving the Berger Report or any other report the minister has apparently concluded that that is not a serious option at the present time because of low volume gas discoveries. Would the minister confirm that that is his opinion, and if it is, is the minister not pre-judging both the Berger Report and the NEB report, which he has criticized other hon. members for doing?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think many Canadians have observed that the threshold volumes in the Mackenzie Delta are not sufficient to justify an all-Canadian pipeline at the present time. Indeed, I have had discussions with various members of the industry, including proponents of the Maple Leaf of the Foothill line from the Mackenzie south, and they have indicated to me that they have not seen those threshold volumes either. I do not want to speculate further as to whether they have completely abandoned that particular proposal; that is for them to say before the NEB. I have noted, however, that they have been placing increasing stress on the other proposal they put before the NEB, the Alcan proposal.

ALLEGED LACK OF GOVERNMENT COMMITMENT TO SOLAR ENERGY

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and it concerns the government's failure to bring forward a comprehensive energy policy. I refer specifically to a report released last week which was financed by the Department of Supply and Services and which stated that there has been no clear, unequivocal commitment by the government to solar energy. I wonder if the minister will tell the House whether he agrees with the recommendation in the report for a vastly increased solar energy effort, and if so, what concrete steps is the minister planning in the near future?

● (1430)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the particular report to which the hon. member is referring but I take issue with him when he says we have no comprehensive energy policy. I will send him a copy and perhaps he will read it and give us the benefit of his conclusions. As to the question of solar energy and its place in Canada, I agree that it is a very important source of energy. We are significantly funding demonstration projects all across the country. We have increased very materially our support for energy research and development and the demonstration of solar energy in Canada.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. If there is a comprehensive policy on energy I am sure hon. members on this side of the House would like to see it. Last week the minister told the House that the United States energy policy was merely a copy of his own. I might say it is a measure of the achievement of the Carter administration to adopt a policy which does not really exist. With regard to the U.S. federal public building program that includes a clear commitment to make use of solar energy in the heating of public buildings, I wonder if the minister will advise whether we have a similar policy for our government buildings and if not, why not?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, at the present time we are looking at two specific proposals which would involve federal government buildings.

POSSIBILITY OF DELAYING NEGOTIATIONS ON SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTORS IN VIEW OF DECISION AT SUMMIT CONFERENCE

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister and relates to the actions of the government in relation to the decisions and conclusions which came from the Economic Summit Conference in London at the weekend. One of the decisions in which Canada took part and obviously wholeheartedly agreed with was for a two-month "urgent study" to determine how best to prevent the proliferation of weapons and materials for nuclear weapons and indeed the whole question of nuclear power reactors throughout the world. As a result of that, has the government issued a directive to all government departments and agencies to immediately cease and desist any further negotiations or dealings in regard to fissionable materials, nuclear reactors or similar equipment and if not, why not?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will realize that the Downing Street summit not only referred to the risks of nuclear proliferation and undertook a commitment to study on an urgent basis the question of safeguards but it also underlined the need to use nuclear energy to meet the world's energy requirements. There are those two aspects to the London conclusion. The direct answer to the hon. gentleman's question is no.

POSSIBILITY OF BANNING PAYMENT OF SECRET COMMISSIONS OR AGENCY FEES AS RESULT OF DECISION AT SUMMIT CONFERENCE

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I must say it seems strange if our policy would contravene any result of that study, especially when it is coming out within two months. My second question concerns the summit conference press release which indicated that a compromise decision of the conference called for a ban against irregular business practices and improper conduct in international trade. I wonder if the government has done anything about this. In particular, has it banned any departmental agency or department of government from paying commissions or secret commissions or agency fees to any numbered Swiss bank account as an example of this type of ban or prohibition they are seeking?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen any reference in the declaration which emerged from the summit dealing with this particular point raised by the hon. member. In any event, it was dealt with last December by the President of the Treasury Board in the guidelines.

PROPOSED ADOPTION OF ECONOMIC AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC—PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

To prevent residents of the Lower St. Lawrence, Gaspé and Magdalen Islands regions from moving to Ontario or other parts of Canada, could the minister tell the House whether he has recently boxed his Quebec counterpart's ears with a view to speeding up the conclusion of the agreement on economic development in that region, which was about to be concluded on November 15, 1976, that tragic date for the province?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that we had a meeting a few days ago, as he himself is aware, and during this meeting we discussed how important it was to conclude those negotiations. But unfortunately I must tell the hon. member that the Quebec government is persisting in its position that it is better to agree on changes to the existing agreements rather than to enter into a new auxiliary agreement which we had referred to as resource-region and which I continue to prefer by far to what is now being proposed. Of course the final decision will rest with the provincial government, at least with regard to the content of those agreements. I hope we will be able to find a reasonable common ground to satisfy the largest number possible of people concerned.

ENERGY

SALE OF CANDU REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA—CONFLICTING STATEMENTS ON USE OF AGENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. An article in yesterday's Toronto Sun substantiates an earlier report in the Toronto Star that no agent was involved in the sale of a CANDU reactor to South Korea. In view of the fact that four top-ranking officials of Korean Electric Company have stated publicly that Shaul Eisenberg was not involved in the sale of the reactor and that AECL was notified by the Korean Electric Company that the sale would be negotiated only if no intermediary agent was appointed while at the same time the Canadian Crown corporation was paying $15 million in fees and expenses to Mr. Eisenberg, will the minister explain to the House the discrepancy between these two positions, recognizing that the payment of some $15 million in public moneys is involved?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the report the hon. member has alluded to is largely false. I would suggest to her that she might like to confer with her colleague the chairman of the public accounts committee. I believe that within the last few days the Secretary of State for External Affairs has conveyed to him a full report on the discussions that took place with respect to the Korean Electric Company officials and their knowledge of Mr. Eisenberg's part in the agency arrangements. If she would confer with him I think she would find it all laid out in the record.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. minister that I have been sitting on the public accounts committee for some four months now awaiting vouchers and documentation in support of the $15 million expenditure but we are not getting it. Is the minister in his response dismissing out of hand the statements attributed to officials of the Korean Electric Company? Will the minister also inform the House of the progress made with regard to the statement by the Prime Minister on March 3 when he said:

> Mr. Speaker, we—
> Meaning, I presume, the government.
> —will try to ascertain whether the quotes were accurate and what exactly was said by the gentlemen, and if there is indeed a contradiction between the two positions, I will see what further action can be taken in order to comply with the lady's concern.

Has the minister found out if the statements were accurate and what action has he taken to try to clear up what is becoming an increasingly suspicious matter?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated what action has been taken. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has conveyed a letter to the chairman of the public accounts committee. Perhaps it has not reached his desk yet but I saw it at the end of last week.

Mr. Lawrence: You saw it before I did.

Mr. Gillespie: It goes into considerable detail.

Miss MacDonald: You saw it before Mr. Eisenberg, I bet.

Mr. Gillespie: It deals with the questions the hon. member has raised of statements from the officials of the Korean Electric Company. If the report in the Toronto Sun indicates that a senior operating officer of the Korean Electric Company was unaware of Mr. Eisenberg's position as agent, it is false.

SUGGESTION PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE INVESTIGATE USE OF AGENTS IN SALE OF CANDU REACTORS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister. I will not pursue the question of asking for a Royal commission inquiry because this government has shown its sensitivity about Royal commission inquiries into its alleged misdeeds. Is the government prepared to ask this House to give the public accounts committee full authority to pursue an investigation with unrestricted powers to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of documents if necessary by warrant, without any interference by use of the Crown executive privilege and to engage investigators and to have this investigation carried on outside Canada if necessary so that the unfortunate taxpayers of this country may get some protection?

● (1440)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot comment in detail on each of the apparently unprecedented powers sought by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The situation is without precedent.

Mr. MacEachen: However, when the public accounts committee was established, the government undertook to facilitate its work in every possible way. If the public accounts committee itself decides it needs further powers, identifies what they are and how they are to be exercised, of course the government would consider the matter, but the public accounts committee itself knows what action to take if it has reached that conclusion.

RESPONSIBILITY OF GOVERNMENT TO SEEK INFORMATION ON PAYMENT OF AGENTS' FEES IN SALE OF CANDU REACTORS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister if he does not believe that the government has some responsibility to satisfy itself where all this money went and what practices were involved? Does it feel it can slough off this responsibility simply by making a reference to the public accounts committee, or does the Acting Prime Minister believe that we think he and his colleagues are so stupid that they could not get this information if they wanted to get it?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the reference to the public accounts committee arose from a demand in the House of Commons, since it was suggested that this would be the appropriate way to establish the facts. In response to an opposition demand, and not in an effort to slough off its own responsibilities, the government agreed to make this particular reference. That is the history of the matter.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the government is ultimately responsible not to parliament but to the people of Canada, does the Acting Prime Minister believe the government has no responsibility to find out and satisfy itself where this money went? Does the government believe it has discharged its responsibility and expect anybody to believe it has so discharged its responsibility to date?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the government, obviously, has attempted to discharge its responsibilities. Ministers have appeared before the committee in order to give full information. We are still ready to consider how to facilitate the work of the committee. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have both been extremely forthcoming in providing information on these matters.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

MERCURY POLLUTION OF ENGLISH-WABIGOON RIVER SYSTEM—INQUIRY WHETHER ONTARIO REQUESTED CLOSURE

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and concerns mercury pollution in the English-Wabigoon river system which is threatening the health of the native people in the area. In view of an Ontario government task force report in 1973 which recommended that the river system should be closed to all fishing, and in view of the federal government's power to close the river system at the request of the province, has the Ontario government at any time asked the federal government to close this river system to all fishing?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

MERCURY POLLUTION OF ENGLISH-WABIGOON RIVER SYSTEM—FEDERAL REQUEST THAT ONTARIO CLOSE TO FISHING

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the federal government, in its consultations with the Ontario government, urged Ontario to take the necessary steps to ban sports fishing in the English-Wabigoon river systems so that the people in the area will be protected from mercury poisoning? Also, what reasons has the Ontario government given for not complying with the federal government's request?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I personally met with three Ontario ministers and urged on them the closing of the river. I also proposed a meeting with them in order to develop an economic development package for the people of the area. So far, Ontario has not made a positive response.

Mr. Broadbent: When was the meeting?

Mr. Allmand: The meeting was prior to the new year, either in November or December.

Oral Questions

URBAN AFFAIRS

GRANVILLE ISLAND, VANCOUVER—FUTURE OF PROPERTY AND PURPOSE OF EXPENDITURE

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of activities and reports concerning Granville Island in the city of Vancouver, and the expenditure there of some $25 million by the trustees of CMHC which, even though no housing or mortgages are involved, owns the property, what is the federal government's policy concerning the future of this property and what is the purpose of the proposed expenditure?

An hon. Member: They are going to call it Basford Bay.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is a demonstration project which has already given excellent results and which involves an important part of Vancouver. This project has been under way for a certain number of years and it is now about to be completed.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

SPRUCE BUDWORM—USE OF PESTICIDE SPRAYS IN FRASER CANYON AREA—APPROVAL FOR USE OF ORTHENE

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment, may I direct my question to the acting minister or the parliamentary secretary? In view of the urgency of the matter and since federal officials have been engaged in discussing this question, could the acting minister advise whether a final decision has been made regarding the use of pesticide sprays in the control of the serious budworm infestation in the forests of the Fraser Canyon area of British Columbia?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): No, Mr. Speaker, I understand that a final decision has not been made, although the government of British Columbia is expected to make such a decision this week. The view of the federal Department of Fisheries and the Environment is that, if it is properly handled, there are no serious dangers connected with the use of the pesticide needed to fight the spruce budworm.

Mr. Patterson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the wide divergence of opinion on that particular question, can the parliamentary secretary advise whether, as has been alleged by some, the pesticide Orthene is still in the experimental stage, or has it been fully tested and approved for use in such circumstances?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, Orthene has undergone extensive tests, as is necessary before its approval for use.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ALLEGATION RUSSIAN SUBMARINES OPERATING OFF WEST COAST—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of National Defence.

[English]

Could the minister confirm—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Continue in French.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You are a phony, Anderson.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, could the minister confirm that two Yankee class Union of Soviet Socialist Republic nuclear submarines are on station off the west coast of Canada and the northwest coast of the United States on a 365-day a year basis, and say whether the submarines carry tactical nuclear weapons and, if so their numbers?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): How can the minister know that?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I prefer not to comment in any detail but confirm that there are such submarines operating off the Pacific coast of Canada and the United States.

Mr. Nowlan: What about the Atlantic coast?

ENERGY

AVAILABILITY OF MIDDLETON REPORT ON RENEWABLE ENERGY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the report on the potential and costing of renewable energy in Canada, by Middleton Associates, reached the minister's attention yet?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to the report prepared and submitted some time last fall.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, actually, the report was submitted last April. If the minister has read it, would he make the report available to the public, particularly to municipalities and provincial governments?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to consider that suggestion.

INCOME TAX

REGULATIONS GOVERNING DEDUCTIONS FOR EMPLOYEES WORKING IN ONE PROVINCE AND RESIDING IN ANOTHER

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

In view of the problems caused by the current system of deducting federal and provincial tax before issuing pay checks to civil servants residing in one province but working in another, is the minister prepared to tell us whether the regulations in this regard will be amended so that each civil servant can express his own preference.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, I understood quite well the sense of this question. I would like the hon. member to give me details.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): It is about regulations governing income tax deductions. Could the minister tell us if they are going to be amended so that civil servants might express their own preference?

Miss Bégin: Unless I am mistaken, it is about the problem of federal civil servants working in Hull. To my knowledge, this problem does not exist. Pensions are not a real problem since benefits are the same for people living in Quebec or in Ontario.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ESTIMATED DATE OF UPTURN IN ECONOMY AND END OF CONTROLS

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): A question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Mr. Speaker. In view of the diverging courses of the United States and the Canadian economy—in the United States unemployment is dropping while in Canada it is rising—and since business indicators in the two countries also show considerable divergence—indicators in the United States are rising while in Canada they are falling—and since historically Canada follows the U.S. pattern, when does the minister consider we can expect an upturn in our own economy compared with that of the United States?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, so much the better if the American economy is improving. I do not agree with the hon. member that we are necessarily lagging behind the United States. On the contrary, during the past three years, our economic performance was better than the Americans' and if the situation is improving there at the present time, it is certainly going to stabilize our situation in Canada and we can only benefit from any improvement occurring there. In my opinion, the hon. member knows full well that for the first time in the past three winters Canada had less unemployment than the United States.

[English]

Mr. Ritchie: In view of the depressing effect of controls, when will the government announce clearly that controls are to end?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, as far as controls are concerned, we have passed a law and it is clear that the law stipulates that we cannot continue to have them after December 1978.

ENERGY

DRILLING IN BEAUFORT SEA—CONSULTATIONS WITH NORWAY ON BLOW-OUT IN NORTH SEA

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It relates to a recent decision by the government of Norway to postpone indefinitely test drilling of oil and gas deposits off its northern coast bearing in mind last month's blow-out in the North Sea. In view of proposals to drill in the Beaufort Sea this summer, could the minister tell us what steps have been taken to consult with the government of Norway with respect to this decision and is it being taken into account when considering possible locations for future drilling in the north?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I shall be pleased to give the hon. member a more complete report but I can tell him that a member of my department was in Norway recently during those sad events and has come back to make a report. I have not received his full report yet.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the fact that the government of Norway has invited the countries bordering the North Sea to attend a conference next month to consider the implications of the accident and the experience gained from it, together with proposals for co-operation in the future, may I ask whether Canada has been invited to take part, perhaps as an observer? Will the minister take steps, if this is not the case, to gain the information which will be disseminated at that meeting?

Mr. Gillespie: We shall certainly expect to gain access to the information. Whether we have been invited to the conference or not I do not know, but I shall be pleased to find out.

Oral Questions

DATE OF OPENING OF SUFFIELD PASTURE IN VIEW OF DROUGHT CONDITIONS

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the continuing serious drought in southern Alberta and southwest Saskatchewan, areas which saw no relief from last week's rain, will the minister tell us when he will announce the opening of the Suffield PFRA pasture as he clearly indicated he would at a recent meeting of the standing committee?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): We have been working on two plans; first, to set up the permanent pasture on that Suffield land and then to try to use it on a temporary basis. As for the permanent pasture, arrangements will likely be concluded early in June. I hope that by mid-June we shall be in a position to end our discussions with the Department of the Environment and the Department of National Defence. Things are going very well, now. As for the emergency pasture, we hope arrangements will be completed soon. We are still working to find appropriate water locations which will service the cattle to be moved there. I would say that these arrangements will be completed in a matter of days, or weeks at the most.

MULTICULTURALISM

PROPOSED PROGRAM FOR THIRD LANGUAGE TRAINING—DATE OF COMMENCEMENT—SUPPORT FOR SUPPLEMENTARY SCHOOLS

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the minister responsible for multiculturalism. It is related to a statement made by the former minister in a speech at Edmonton on January 29 of this year. At that time, the hon. member for Hamilton East stated that by April the government would be prepared to provide assistance in connection with projects to improve teaching skills of teachers involved in third language training in Canada's supplementary schools. As we are now into the month of May, I should like to know whether the hon. gentleman is now prepared to introduce such a program and, if not, when he will be prepared to do so.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister without Portfolio): I am not aware of the details of what was said by the minister previously responsible for multicultural affairs. I have not given the matter any consideration, nor do I anticipate doing so at the moment.

Mr. Mitges: In the same speech, the hon. member for Hamilton East announced the government's intention to provide support for the operation of supplementary schools in recognition of the important role played by those schools in language retention. Could the minister inform us whether he is developing guidelines for such a program and, if so, when we can expect this program to be introduced?

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I have not considered any of the speeches made by the previous minister, neither can I speak on that particular subject at the moment.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CONTINUATION OF PAYMENT OF DISABILITY PENSION IF ONE SPOUSE DIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs? It relates to a resolution submitted by the War Amputations of Canada urging that where a war disability pension is paid to a married couple and one spouse dies, the pension be continued in full for one year. In view of the fact that this resolution has been presented on other occasions, and repeated recently, can the minister tell us whether his department is considering the proposal?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): This resolution, like others, is under consideration in the department.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

BROADCASTING OF WORLD HOCKEY ASSOCIATION GAMES TO PROMOTE NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State.

Since the finals of the World Hockey Association will get under way this Wednesday between two Canadian teams, the Winnipeg Jets and the Quebec Nordiques, would the minister tell the House if he has made or will make representations to CBC to have this sport event aired over both networks so as to continue to promote national unity?

[English]

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am well aware that the hon. member is interested in this event since we often watch the hockey series on television in the lobby together.

An hon. Member: Is that why you are never in the House?

Mr. Roberts: After the House is over; the games go on after ten o'clock. I shall be happy to refer the hon. member's representation to the appropriate bodies to ascertain what answer they can give.

TRADE

REASON FOR IMPORTS OF BROILERS FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Last week, more precisely May 4, I was asking the minister whether he could tell the House if massive imports of broilers were authorized after consultation with the Minister of Agriculture responsible for the nutrition of Canadians. At that time, he said he would answer the day after. Is the minister prepared today to give us an answer on that subject?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I looked into that question and there has been indeed an increase of about 5 to 7 per cent in broiler imports in Canada since the beginning of the year, which is about normal according to the expansion of the market. Of course we are concerned about that situation. The Minister of Agriculture and my department are reviewing that problem and I do not know whether we will be able to provide an answer to the House in the near future. So far no action has been nor can be taken in the current circumstances, but maybe we will take some in the weeks to come.

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTRY ISSUES PERMITS FOR IMPORTATION OF BROILERS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious question and the producers have been insistently asking us whether the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has been issuing import permits or whether there is any control by the department. I would like to get an answer.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I will be able to give a technical answer to the question of the hon. member, but as far as I know import permits are not required. We make a continual survey of import levels. This week the Minister of Agriculture is going to have discussions on this matter with his provincial counterparts and afterwards we will of course take the advice of his department to see whether the situation calls for any urgent action.

DEDUCTIONS FROM EMPLOYEES RESIDING IN ONTARIO AND WORKING IN QUEBEC—POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE IN REGULATIONS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue supplementary to that posed by my colleague for Esquimalt-Saanich having to do with the deduction of income tax from the salaries of public servants living in Ontario and employed in the Public Service of Canada in the province of Quebec. Given the fact that the Minister of Finance, in November 1976, indicated that it was, in his judgment, a matter of regulation—and therefore a change of regulations could cure the situation—is the government of Canada contemplating a change in the regulations? If so, when? If not, why not; and when will the minister be prepared to make a statement with respect to this matter, which has been the subject of public discussion for almost a month now in this House?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, for the last two weeks in particular I have been answering questions in the House on the matter from members on this side and the other side. Representations have been made to me by my own colleagues for more than a month. I have explained to the House in detail the various steps that we are taking and the two solutions I am contemplating with the Minister of Finance. Unless I recommend final approval of the second solution which I said was not an ideal one, I should like the House to give me a few more days to see whether we will receive the positive answer expected from the government of Quebec.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. On Friday I gave Your Honour notice of a question of privilege which I wanted to pursue in a very serious way with the Minister of Labour concerning the Finn commission established two years ago following the death of five people in a fire at Burrard terminal, Vancouver. However, since the Minister of Labour is not here today, I think out of courtesy I should wait until he returns and pursue it tomorrow.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order which arises from my understanding of today's business. I understood that the government would be calling Bill C-51.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member would raise his point of order on orders of the day.

Soil Science	114,700
Entomology	134,600
Agricultural Engineering	80,350
Agricultural Economics	94,100
Veterinary Medicine	145,900
Environmental Quality	24,200
Total All Areas	$1,326,250

In so far as the National Research Council of Canada is concerned: 1. $2,220,000.

2. These grants were to university researchers doing agricultural research including animal, plant, soil, crop, horticulture and veterinary research and does not include research grants in biology indirectly related to agriculture.

ADVERTISING OF ALCOHOLIC PRODUCTS

Question No. 2,078—Mr. Howie:

Does (a) CBC follow (b) CRTC have guidelines with regard to the advertising of alcoholic products and, if so, what are they?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission as follows: (a) Yes. (b) Yes. CRTC guidelines concerning the advertising of alcoholic products may be found in the following documents. Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission: To all radio and television stations, breweries, wineries and cider-houses and their advertising agencies: The following Wednesdays have been set for the meetings of the Beer, Wine and Cider Clearance Committee for 1977: January 5, 19; February 2, 16; March 2, 16; April 6, 20; May 11, 25; June 8, 22; July 6, 20; August 10, 24; September 7, 21; October 5, 19; November 2, 16, 30; December 14. Advertisers are asked to abide by the following rules: (1) copy of the commercial messages must be received in quadruplicate at the countinuity clearance office at least 24 hours before each committee meeting, (2) the name of the province where the commercial is to be broadcast shall be mentioned, (3) any modification to a script previously approved shall be indicated, (4) complete storyboards must be included with all television commercials. Guy Lefebvre, Secretary General to the Commission, Ottawa, December 1, 1976. 100 Metcalfe Street, Ottawa, Ontario K1A 0N2.

CRTC Announcement, July 19, 1971, Beer, Wine and Cider Advertising. The following supersedes all previous outlines on advertising copy submitted in accordance with section 10 of the Radio and Television Broadcasting Regulations. 1. The main criterion in the approval of scripts is adherance to standards of good taste. 2. Advertising shall not (a) encourage the general consumption of the product, nor should it attempt to influence non-drinkers to drink; (b) be associated with youth or youth symbols; (c) attempt to establish a certain product as a status symbol, a necessity for the enjoyment of life, or an escape from life's problems; (d) show persons engaged in any activity in which the consumption of alcohol is prohibited. 3. Copy, submitted in quadruplicate, must be received in the Commission twenty-four hours prior to the meeting. Television scripts should be submitted in storyboard form. 4. Scripts will be examined at scheduled dates, published from time to time. 5. The advertisers or their agents who so desire, may make personal representations concerning their copy when their commercials are examined.

Section 10 of the AM, FM and TV Regulations, Spirituous Liquors, Beer, Wine and Cider. 10. (1) Subject to subsection (2), no station or network operator shall broadcast any commercial message (a) advertising, directly or indirectly, any spirituous liquor or any beer, wine or cider; or (b) sponsored by or on behalf of any person whose principal business is the manufacture or sale of spirituous liquor, beer, wine or cider. (2) Where in any province the advertising of beer, wine or cider is permitted, a commercial message sponsored by a brewery, winery or cider-house may be broadcast in that province subject to the following conditions: (a) the advertising shall not be designed to promote the general use of beer, wine or cider, but this prohibition shall not be construed so as to prevent industry institutional public service or brand preference advertising; (b) no commercial message shall exceed sixty seconds in duration; (c) no device and no commercial message, other than a commercial message allowed under this subsection, shall be used to advertise, directly or indirectly, the sponsor or his product; and (d) no commercial message shall be broadcast unless it is approved by a representative of the Commission prior to broadcast. (3) For the purpose of determining whether a commercial message may be broadcast in a province pursuant to subsection (2), "cider" means cider that is considered to be an alcoholic beverage by the law of the province relating to the advertising of cider.

*CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 2,206—Mr. Jones:

1. Are any Canadian Armed Forces units located in the Province of Newfoundland and, if so, how many?

2. Has the government and/or the military given any consideration to Newfoundland's strategic location for defence purposes and for enforcement and surveillance of Canadian sovereignty and, if so (a) in what manner (b) what consideration has been given to establishing substantial military (air, army and navy) establishments in the Province?

3. Is the government and/or the military aware of announcements by the Government of France that it intends to increase air and harbour facilities on the Islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon and, if so (a) what view does the government take (b) what effect will this have on Canadian defence and fishing industry?

4. Has the government recently considered the acquisition of the Islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon from France and (a) if so, on what date was such acquisition considered (b) if not, what plans does the government have in this regard?

[Mr. Goodale.]

[English]

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of National Defence and External Affairs as follows: 1. Yes, 25.

2. (a) The strategic importance of the whole of Canada's Atlantic coast including, of course, the coast of Newfoundland for defence operations in the North Atlantic and for the protection of Canada's national maritime interests is fully recognized in Canadian and allied defence planning. The strategic value of Newfoundland, in particular, for air defence and maritime surveillance activities finds tangible expression in the regular operational use of facilities in that province for these purposes. (b) No consideration is being given at present to creating substantial new military establishments in Newfoundland since our present base facilities in the Maritimes amply meet current military requirements.

3. Yes. (a) The improvements to airport and harbour facilities in St-Pierre are matters entirely within the hands of the French authorities. In so far as access to the islands by small Canadian passenger jets would be made possible, the government welcomes the development of the airport. (b) This will have no effect on Canadian defence. In view of the interim fisheries arrangements between Canada and France which are now in place, there will be no effect on the Canadian fishing industry.

4. No. These islands are an overseas department of the Republic of France and are not for sale.

WAYS AND MEANS

EXCISE TAX ACT

On the order: ways and means proceedings:

May 6, 1977—Consideration of a motion to concur in a ways and means motion to amend the Excise Tax Act—The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) on a point of order.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I had understood that Bill C-51 would be called today, but I understand there has been a change of plan on the part of the government House leader. I wanted to advise your Honour that I intend to argue the substance of Bill C-51 in regard to different subject matters in the same bill and I shall be seeking a ruling from Your Honour in regard to severing portions of the bill. It may not be appropriate to commence the argument today, but if Your Honour wishes, I would be happy to do so. I just want to give Your Honour some warning that we intend to argue that the bill is not in appropriate form as introduced for first reading.

Before commencing second reading debate of the bill we wish to present an argument which favours dividing portions of the bill into separate pieces of legislation which will be dealt with by the House. I am particularly concerned about the firearms and wiretapping sections. I am in Your Honour's hands. If you feel it appropriate that we commence the argument today, we will; or we will be happy to do so when the bill is called.

Mr. Speaker: The difficulty about waiting until the bill is called although—had the bill been called today, naturally the matter would have had to be raised today—is that the Chair really does not have much time after the presentation of such a point of order. Or, to put it another way, if the Chair were to take the time necessary properly to study arguments raised on such a point of order on the day that the bill is presented to the House for discussion, it would certainly cause difficulties in scheduling. On the other hand, if it was not the government's intention to proceed with this matter today, perhaps it is not prepared to meet and to answer arguments in respect of such a point of order. If it is, in fact, the case that the government is prepared to meet those arguments today, or at some time before the matter is called, I certainly would prefer to hear those arguments at some time prior to the calling of the bill, in order to give the Chair some time to decide without causing the House undue inconvenience in the scheduling of business.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your remarks. I am taken a little by surprise that the government is not ready to argue that point today. We could, of course, hear from the hon. member, but we would not be ready to respond.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, because of the business of the house that could be called, it is clear we are not going to be dealing with this matter now, in any event. I quite understand that your honour would want to deal with it in advance of calling the bill, which is contemplated to be called on Wednesday, tomorrow being an allotted day. I would not want the argument to be called on our allotted day. If it would be agreeable to my colleagues and the minister, it might be appropriate if the Chair called the matter at eight o'clock tonight and we had the argument this evening. Then we could deal with it one way or another well in advance of the calling of the bill.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, the House leader of the official opposition makes a suggestion with which I have no disagreement. I would be happy to commence argument on the matter at eight o'clock, if that meets the needs of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, that creates some problem for me in that I expect to be on an aeroplane at eight o'clock tonight.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We can all argue on the aeroplane.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Leave it up in the air.

Mr. Basford: Possibly someone could state my position for me, and it could be proceeded with at eight o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: I will not call the point now. The hon. member for New Westminster has given notice of his intention to raise the point. Perhaps it should be agreed that the matter will stand over for consideration to see whether some convenient time could be worked out for calling it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a separate point of order, and I do so before we proceed with the items that have been indicated for today. I refer to Bill C-52, a bill having to do with correcting a situation with respect to unemployment insurance benefits for certain senior citizens. There has been a clear understanding, if the bill was in the terms indicated to us, that we would be prepared to put it through all stages without debate.

The bill was given first reading on Friday. It is now on the order paper for second reading. I would like to suggest that either now, or if you want to leave it until five o'clock or eight o'clock, we carry out our previous agreement of giving second reading to that bill, giving it committee of the whole stage procedure, and third reading. We stand by our undertaking that this bill can be passed through all these stages without debate.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that is perfectly acceptable to us, if the government would like to call it now as the first order of government business to be proceeded with and dealt with immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ENTITLEMENTS ADJUSTMENT ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING ENTITLEMENT TO BENEFIT

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved that Bill C-52, to provide for the consideration of certain unemployment insurance entitlements, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No; that it be referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. Speaker: I understand there is disposition to eliminate entirely that stage of the bill. If it were to be done at once, the more expeditious method would be to send it to committee of the whole and deal with the committee stage here and now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the motion in the name of the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), seconded by Mr. MacEachen, that Bill C-52, an act to provide for the consideration of certain unemployment insurance entitlements, be now read the second time and be referred to committee of the whole?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Carried.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried. Accordingly, Bill C-52 stands referred to committee of the whole House, and I do now leave the chair.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Turner in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Clauses 1 to 3, inclusive, agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Title agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the bill carry?

Bill carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill reported.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: The House, I take it, agrees, by consent, to taking third reading stage of the bill now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Having called, as the first order of the day the ways and means motion which is item No. 6, consideration of which was set aside in order to proceed with Bill C-52, the House will now proceed to ways and means motions.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

WAYS AND MEANS

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Finance) moved that a ways and means motion to amend the Excise Tax Act, laid upon the table Monday, April 18, 1977, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Finance) moved that a ways and means motion to amend the Excise Tax Act, laid upon the table Thursday, March 31, 1977, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-54, to amend the Excise Tax Act (No. 2), be read the first time and printed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time? At the next sitting of the House?

CUSTOMS TARIFF (No. 2)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Finance) moved that a ways and means motion to amend the Customs Tariff, laid upon the table Thursday, March 31, 1977, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MacEachen (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-55, to amend the Customs Tariff (No. 2), be read the first time and printed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time? At the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND DEFINITIONS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C-49, to amend the Canada Pension Plan, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, before I initiate discussion on Bill C-49 I wish to express the minister's displeasure at not being able to be here. He has been unavoidably detained, but will be here for the debate later this evening. Therefore, I will initiate the debate.

For some time now various groups and governmental bodies have been putting forward proposals to provide Canada Pension Plan benefits for spouses who work in the home. During the course of the federal-provincial social security review a number of these proposals were examined in some depth. Our aim, and that of most of the groups to which I have just referred, was to provide, under the CPP, both recognition and financial security for spouses who work in the home while at the same time retaining the basic, compulsory earnings-related and contributory characteristics of the plan. Of course, there was a difficulty inherent in achieving these two aims. That difficulty arises because work in the home by one spouse is unpaid employment, and there are thus no earnings on which to base pension plan contributions and benefits. However, after analysing the many proposals put forward, two specific ones were identified which, I believe, will allow us to achieve in part the intended objectives while still retaining the basic nature of the plan. These are the two major amendments to the CPP which are proposed in the legislation before us today.

The first amendment will allow the splitting, upon divorce or annulment, of the CPP pension credits which were earned by both spouses during their marriage. In part, of course, the Canada Pension Plan already recognizes the economic partnership aspect of marriage by providing benefits to a surviving spouse where the death of the other spouse terminates the family's income from either employment or pension benefits. However, the protection offered by survivor benefits ceases to exist when the marriage is terminated by divorce or annulment. Thus, there is at present no further recognition of the fact that both spouses contributed to the accumulation of CPP pension credits during their marriage, either directly by virtue of their both earning credits in their own right or indirectly by one contributing through work in the home.

Of course, work in the home really does contribute to family income and, therefore, to the CPP credits accumulated by the spouse who is in the labour force. Thus, by permitting the splitting of these credits, this amendment will assure to each spouse a fair share of an asset to which they have both, in reality, contributed. Further, it will provide this recognition and some measure of financial security to the spouses and to their dependent children at no significant additional cost to the Plan.

In order for the spouses to be eligible, the marriage would have to have lasted at least three years and the spouses would have to have lived together for at least three consecutive years. This is to ensure that the financial effects of credit splitting will actually be significant. As well, the application for the split will have to be made within three years of the effective date of the divorce or annulment, otherwise the administration of the provision would be virtually impossible. Finally, the marriage will have to have been dissolved after the legislation comes into effect. The split would apply to all eligible years of the marriage as far back as 1966, but would, of course, not include any years during which one spouse was ineligible to contribute. You will recall that people are ineligible to contribute if they are under 18 or over 70 years of age or are in receipt of a retirement or disability benefit. If I may illustrate, Mr. Speaker, a typical case might involve a wife who has not worked for wages and has custody of the children when the divorce occurs. To such a person, the importance of this amendment is clear. As long as there are at least five years of credits to split, she and the children have immediate income protection against the possibility of her disability or death. Furthermore, she has at least a start on building a future retirement income.

The second major amendment we are proposing relates to contributors who stay at home or alter their regular work patterns in order to care for young children. Under current arrangements, any periods of low or zero earnings which result from their temporarily dropping out of the labour force will likely affect both eligibility for all types of benefits and the actual amount of those benefits. At present, the amount of CPP earnings-related benefits depends upon the career earnings of the contributor averaged over all the years that he or she could have contributed to the plan, while payment of survivor or disability benefits depends upon payment of contributions for a minimum length of time and also on the recency with which contributions were paid.

Currently, all contributors are able to drop out of the calculation of their average career earnings periods of low or zero earnings adding up to 15 percent of their total contributory period. This provision is designed to protect potential CPP benefits against the effects of periods of unemployment, illness, extended education or voluntary early retirement. At most, seven years of low earnings may currently be dropped out of the maximum contributory period of 47 years.

This generalized drop-out does not recognize the difficulties faced by those who take responsibility for the care and upbringing of the next generation of Canadians. When they are active in the labour force, these contributors face all the problems for which the 15 per cent drop-out provision was created, but in addition they must face the possibility of a reduction, or perhaps even the total loss of their CPP benefits as a result of their remaining at home to care for young children. The special drop-out provision proposed in the legislation currently before us would ensure that a contributor who remains at home to care for young children will not be penalized for that period during which he or she has low or zero earnings. The provision would protect eligibility for CPP benefits which the contributor had earned through contributions before, during and after the period devoted to raising young children. Again, this provision will provide a measure of real economic recognition and financial security to work in the home, and it will do so without compromising the basic contributory earnings-related structure of the plan.

The child-rearing drop-out would be applied to all periods back to 1966 in which a person had a child under age seven in his or her care and was receiving family allowance benefits in respect of that child. Any earnings during the period which will help to fulfil basic contributory requirements for benefits, or which serve to raise career average earnings, would be retained in the calculation of CPP benefits, but periods of zero earnings or of earnings below the person's career average would be dropped from the calculation of benefit amount. As the family allowance benefit is generally paid to the mother, there will have to be a special provision permitting an exception to this rule, and regulations will be made prescribing the circumstances under which the special drop-out could be assigned to the father if he is, in fact, looking after the child or children.

I should emphasize that the minimum contributory requirements of the current legislation will be retained, even with the special drop-out provisions. For example, at least 120 months of contributions will still be required in order to receive a full CPP retirement pension, regardless of how many years may have been spent at home caring for young children.

I should also point out to hon. members that the proposed drop-out provision is expected to lead to only a small cost increase to the CPP. It is estimated that as a result of the special drop-out provision, the future long-run contribution rate would rise by about one-third of 1 percentage point. Finally, I should make clear that the special drop-out provision will be available to those currently receiving CPP benefits as well as for new beneficiaries. Thus, where the provision would serve to increase the amount of a benefit currently being received, that benefit will be recalculated and the revised amount paid.

As most members are probably aware, amendments of this nature cannot be implemented without the consent of two-thirds of the provinces containing two-thirds of the Canadian population. Members may also be aware that the province of Ontario has expressed its intention to withhold consent on the drop-out amendment. Thus, if Ontario holds fast to its position, then this amendment, even though passed through this parliament, cannot be proclaimed in force.

Needless to say, I consider this stance by the government of our largest province most unfortunate. The eight other provinces have signified their firm agreement, and I am informed that the province of Quebec plans to move ahead with a parallel provision in the Quebec Pension Plan. I can assure the House that I will do all I can to convince the Ontario government of the wisdom of agreeing to these provisions.

Many hon. members will be aware that the two major amendments I have proposed were not the only courses of action which were considered. Two others which were considered at some length were voluntary CPP contributions by spouses who work at home, and the splitting of CPP credits between spouses during marriage. There was much discussion of both these proposals and much interest in them, but both were rejected by most of the people who eventually expressed firm points of view.

With regard to the first—voluntary contributions—both the CPP Advisory Committee and the Advisory Council on the Status of Women felt that the proposal should be rejected. It was felt that voluntary contributions would benefit most the relatively well-to-do who could afford the additional contributions. Also, those who are older would likely opt to contribute as the early maturity of the plan tends to heavily subsidize older contributors. Such a provision would be unfair to wage-earners whose earnings are less than the maximum; they would be unable to contribute at the maximum rate, while house spouses contributing voluntarily could cover themselves at the maximum rate. Finally, there would be a number of difficult administrative questions to resolve. Who would be eligible—legally married people or common-law spouses? Could they opt in and out of the plan at will? How would we treat house spouses with part-time earnings?

The second of these proposals, the splitting of pension credits during marriage, suffers from the adverse effects it would have on benefit levels for a family unit which is not dissolved. For a family which remains intact, should the major wage-earner die, become disabled or retire some years ahead of the spouse, the family unit would not only lose the employment earnings but would also suffer a further hardship in that the CPP benefits would be based upon only half the CPP pension credits. Splitting credits on marriage breakdown, on the other hand, would provide financial security and protection at a time when two family units have been created from one, and the potential or actual reduction in benefits for one unit enables the creation of potential or actual benefits for the other where no benefits might otherwise be available. Splitting pension credits during marriage is also administratively very complex since the monitoring and verification of all contributors with respect to their marital status would have to be conducted on a yearly basis. Finally, the concept of splitting pension credits on marriage dissolution was preferred because it does not alter the basic contributory, wage-related characteristics of the plan.

Mr. Speaker, thus far I have concentrated my remarks on those amendments to the CPP which serve to benefit spouses who work in the home. But I would also like to draw your attention to a number of other amendments included in this bill, some of which will be of importance to a significant number of people. The first of these amendments relates to the retroactive payment of retirement benefits to those contributors between 65 and 70 years of age who, for one reason or another, delay application for their benefit. To understand the reasons for this change it is necessary to look in some detail at a couple of the provisions of the CPP. First, contributors, upon reaching age 65, are entitled to defer their application for a CPP retirement pension in order to continue to contribute and possibly enlarge their CPP pension. In the first ten years of the plan it was sometimes very difficult to decide whether to use this provision or not. On the one hand the person would not be receiving benefits, but on the other he or she might greatly improve the benefits finally received since both the average earnings and the percentage of the possible full pension could increase greatly over a fairly short period. But over-all, a large number of Canadians did elect to defer their benefits. Secondly, up to 1975 pensioners aged 65 to 70 had to be retired before they could apply for a CPP retirement pension. Even after the pension was in pay these pensioners were subject to an earnings test; that is, the pension was reduced or abated altogether if they were in receipt of employment earnings greater than certain specified amounts. Therefore, the amount of the pension payable could, and sometimes did, vary.

In the decade since the CPP came into being, however, a number of changes have taken place to alter the circumstances cited above. Effective January 1, 1975, the CPP earnings tests applicable to retirement pensioners aged 65 to 70 were repealed. Also, the plan had been in existence for a full decade as of 1976, and henceforth the increase in benefits which could be realized by a pensioner by delaying application for benefits after age 65 was not often as dramatic as before. Increases in the amount of benefits can still, in some cases, be realized by a deferment, especially if a contributor has been subject to periods of very low, or zero earnings earlier in the contributory period; but the number of Canadians who can profit by this arrangement is decreasing.

It is, thus, a natural result of the maturing of the plan that most late applications now result from simple oversight or circumstances beyond the individual's control. The resultant loss of one or more months' benefits has been the cause of concern and sometimes financial hardship to persons who might otherwise have been eligible for those benefits. We would like to correct any hardships this situation brings. Thus, the amendment would allow for the payment of up to 12 months' retroactive retirement pension including periods when the contributor was under age 70. This retroactivity would extend only as far back as the date on which this new legislation takes effect. Moreover, the retroactivity would not extend into periods during which a person was contributing to the plan and so possibly enhancing his or her eventual benefit entitlement. The net result should be to ameliorate the very considerable hardship which some pensioners who had fully earned their pensions faced as a result of quite innocent errors on their part.

A second minor amendment indirectly related to the one just mentioned refers to applications for CPP benefits made in respect of potential CPP beneficiaries who died without applying for their benefits. Up to now the CPP legislation has only permitted benefit applications to be made by or on behalf of living persons. In some cases, however, through lack of knowledge or other circumstances beyond a person's control, potential eligibility for CPP benefits is only discovered after the person has died. In these circumstances, any survivor or the estate is denied the entitlement to normal retroactive benefits which would have been received had the application been submitted earlier. This technical amendment will permit any normal retroactive benefits to be applied for and paid in respect of a deceased person, provided the other conditions of eligibility are met.

The next of these amendments would have the effect of making more benefits available to some dependents of deceased or disabled contributors. Under the current legislation, the amount of orphans' and disabled contributors' children's benefits payable per child is reduced to half the full rate for the fifth and subsequent child. Under current provisions, benefits payable to all the children of a contributor are totalled and then divided equally among all of them. The result is that children in large families receive less support per child from the CPP than those in smaller families. The proposed amendment would rectify this problem. Full benefits would be paid to, or on behalf of, each dependent child of a deceased or disabled CPP contributor regardless of the number of dependent children which are eligible for benefits.

Another amendment is of a more administrative nature. It does, however, relate to a topic which is of great concern and has tremendous potential impact for a large number of CPP contributors; that is, international social security agreements. This amendment would enhance the flexibility of the authority which currently is contained in the CPP and would enable agreements to be signed with other nations with respect to the plan. As hon. members will no doubt realize, international social security agreements would directly benefit a very large number of people who have chosen to immigrate to Canada and make their homes here. Often, these immigrants have spent a considerable portion of their working careers in other countries and have, therefore, built up an entitlement to social security benefits from foreign programs. However, these foreign programs may place restrictions or limitations on the nature or level of benefits which they pay to persons living abroad.

Through the negotiation of international social security agreements, the social security protection earned by persons under programs in their countries of origin can be made available to them in Canada. In recent years we have had preliminary discussions with countries such as France, Italy, the United Kingdom and the United States, seeking agreements in order to provide coverage for the large number of immigrants to Canada from those nations. A major roadblock to the fruition of these negotiations was our inability to include old age security, the foundation of our retirement income system, in such discussions. With the passage of the recent amendments to the Old Age Security Act we may now proceed with the development of such agreements.

I should mention here that the minister has just come back from a series of discussions with his colleagues in France, the United Kingdom, the United States and Poland. France, the United Kingdom and the U.S. expressed a great deal of interest in moving ahead to finalize social security agreements with Canada on an urgent basis. Our officials will meet with representatives from the U.S. next week, with officials of the U.K. in early July, and with French officials early this fall. Also, Poland has agreed to study the possibility of a social security agreement with Canada. Our officials will also be meeting with Italian representatives in July for technical discussions on the possible features of an agreement.

In order to further enhance our ability to bargain effectively with these other countries, we are seeking a minor adjustment to the enabling provisions for CPP agreements. This amendment, which runs parallel to the recent OAS legislation which I just mentioned, would permit the conclusion of agreements in which the total amount of the combined benefit payable under an international social security agreement is limited to a specified maximum amount. However, full protection is included to guarantee that this limitation will always provide total benefits which are at least as large as the CPP benefit which would have been payable in the absence of an agreement.

Two final amendments of a minor nature are also included in this bill. One would provide regulation-making powers to permit the withholding, if necessary, of CPP benefits to help in obtaining required information from the beneficiary. It is hoped that these powers will make it possible to establish, in case of doubt, whether beneficiaries are entitled to the benefits they are receiving. Where the documentation received confirms eligiblity for benefits, the benefit payments would be reinstated with full retroactivity.

The second involves compensation for members of the Canada Pension Plan advisory committee. This committee has, in the ten years it has been in existence, proved to be an invaluable source of advice, information and liaison for the minister and his predecessors as ministers responsible for the CPP. The CPP advisory committee is a group of up to 16 dedicated citizens representing employees, employers, the self-employed and the general public, who examine a wide range of topics relating to the role and operation of the Canada Pension Plan. I feel certain that this group of men and women rank amongst the most active federal advisory committees. Their thoughtful advice and timely reports have served to represent the interests of the Canadian people in the development of the CPP. Indeed, the minister has been so impressed with the quality of their advice and the importance of the issues they have addressed that over the last few years he has thought it useful to publish most of their reports in order that others might benefit from their work. The proposed amendment would permit the payment of the regular per diem allowance to members for those days which they spend on advisory committee work, in addition to time spent at the formal meetings for which they already receive some compensation. By virtue of this provision, I hope that some of the financial burden will be defrayed for members who spend so much of their valuable time and energy on the work of the committee.

In conclusion, these amendments will serve to improve the effectiveness of the CPP in its role as a provider of income security for the retired, the disabled and the families of deceased contributors. They represent a major step forward in recognizing the value and importance of work in the home.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I am extremely disturbed and surprised that the minister is not in attendance at the time of second reading of this extremely important bill dealing with amendments to the Canada Pension Plan. He should be here, no matter how impressed we are with the amendments and no matter how much commendation the bill deserves.

This bill attempts to give some recognition to the role of housewives, but there is another important factor. I notice that the parliamentary secretary did not take any time to indicate to this House, to the people of Canada and particularly to the people of the province of Ontario, the stand of that province with respect to this bill. The parliamentary secretary gave no indication whatsoever of the reasons behind the hesitation of the province of Ontario in giving blanket approval at this time. The parliamentary secretary neglected to say that there would be certain hardships and inequities as a result of the drop-out provisions as they affect women and that there would be subsidization by the poor in favour of the rich. He did not mention that matter, and I will get into it a little later.

Notwithstanding that, Ontario's approach is commendable. The parliamentary secretary should have at least mentioned that, and he should have mentioned the concern of the province of Ontario with respect to the whole question of the funding of pension plans. It seems to me that the parliamentary secretary was playing politics—

An hon. Member: Never.

Mr. Alexander: —with a very important piece of legislation.

An hon. Member: Oh!

Mr. Alexander: I hear an hon. member opposite who does not know what the bill is about because he has not read it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Would the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) please address the Chair?

Mr. Alexander: I was speaking through you, sir, in order to chastise that hon. member.

Mr. Blais: Sit down when Mr. Speaker stands up.

Mr. Alexander: The parliamentary secretary said nothing about the concern which is being registered by many Canadians regarding pension plans, and that concern was also registered by the province of Ontario. Another concern of the province of Ontario which the parliamentary secretary neglected to mention is the use of pension plan funds. They are directed to provinces which use them for their own capital works. Meanwhile, the private sector is crying for money. Those are matters we will have to consider extremely carefully. I think the parliamentary secretary was ill-advised to mention the province of Ontario without spelling out why that province wants to think about this matter. I thought I should put that on the record so the parliamentary secretary would know that he cannot get away with murder in this House. I see him smiling over there, so I know I am right.

The Postmaster General (Mr. Blais) intervened a moment ago. All I can tell him is that mail between Toronto and Hamilton takes seven days. We expect him to do a much better job than he is doing now. Mail takes five or six days between Toronto and Ottawa. No matter how much the minister praises the efficiency of the Post Office, constituents—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest that the hon. member should get back to the bill under discussion, Bill C-49.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Well, I think my point is well taken. The Postmaster General will think twice before he moves in again.

The question of including housewives—and that is what this bill is all about, notwithstanding that it uses the word "spouse"—in the Canada Pension Plan was considered last year during meetings of the federal minister and provincial welfare ministers. The intent was to give recognition to work in the home and to provide a measure of financial security and independence to a spouse who works at home. Two approaches were discussed. It was proposed that pension credits earned by spouses during marriage be divided equally between spouses, upon marriage dissolution, which is to be limited to legal marriages terminated by divorce or annulment. In future they would be given some entitlement in terms of equity as a result of their playing a meaningful role in the home. This is in keeping with the belief that both spouses have an equal right to the security being built up by either of them for the future, since each contributes equally but differently.

Another proposal considered by the ministers would permit those contributors who leave the labour force to raise children to drop months of low or zero earnings from the calculation of their average lifetime earnings for benefit purposes. This hopes to ensure that the parent who remains at home to raise children is not penalized for the period of low or no earnings in the calculation of pension benefits, and protects the pension credit earned before or after the period devoted to children.

The drop-out provision would apply to periods of time spent at home with children under seven years of age. The parent would have greater labour market flexibility after the children entered school. This proposal attempts to give economic recognition to work at home and partial recognition to the disadvantages women traditionally experience in the labour market. There are problems, however, with respect to the drop-out provision, which I will dwell on at some length shortly.

Bill C-49 brings these two proposals which were discussed by the federal and provincial ministers of health into focus through major amendments to the Canada Pension Plan. In addition, the bill includes a number of housekeeping amendments. The most important of these would allow up to one year's retroactive payment of retirement benefits to contributors between 65 and 70 years of age and who file late applications for benefits. At the present time, retirement benefits can only be paid after age 70.

There are other important amendments which the parliamentary secretary has mentioned that are more or less in the housekeeping area. One is the provision for benefit application to be made on the behalf of a deceased person or persons. This is certainly a step in the right direction. We have no quarrel, either, with equalization of children's benefits in respect of all children, regardless of family size. We want to look very carefully at the payment of a per diem allowance to members of the Canada Pension Plan advisory committee. We want to know why, and how much. When you start playing around with the public purse with respect to advisory committees, it is important to know why, and how much is involved.

There is an extension of the authority to enter into international social security agreements. As you know, Mr. Speaker, this amendment is necessary because we have just brought in amendments to the Old Age Security Act which determine new residency requirements. Just as important, the bill gave authority to enter into reciprocal agreements regarding portability of pensions between Great Britain and Canada, the United States and Canada, France and Canada, portions of the Third World, and so forth. Of course, the minister has been on a trip to explore the possibility of these agreements coming into full force. I understand hundreds of thousands of people are waiting for these agreements and for proclamation of the bill dealing with new residency requirements and reciprocal agreements. I understand the minister wants this amendment to come into force by July 1, and hopes by that time he will have reciprocal agreements ready to be executed by Canada and the countries involved.

Notwithstanding the good intentions there may be regarding the splitting of Canada Pension Plan credits upon marriage breakdown, there are, of course, other implications and problems which will have to be worked out. We intend to pursue this question to make sure we are moving in the right direction. In a case where one partner has been receiving a CPP, disability or retirement pension, the retroactive splitting upon breakdown will alter the calculation of the recipient's benefit—to their disadvantage. Splitting upon breakdown may come into conflict with the provision that a person cannot be both a recipient and a contributor to a retirement or disability fund at the same time. This matter will require review in so far as it affects disability pensions and the definition of "disability" under the plan.

For low income families, retroactive splitting upon breakdown may result in loss of coverage that has been paid for, because the level of each partner after splitting may be below the plan's basic exemption for a year. Retroactivity may involve administratively complex calculations since potentially very long periods may have to be recalculated.

What would be the implications for private pension plans which are complementary to the CPP? The definition of "marriage dissolution" is restricted to legally terminated marriages, which excludes people who have been deserted, are separated or are living common-law. Mr. Speaker, under the spouse's allowance provisions we ran into a similar difficulty where no recognition was given to widows, widowers, spinsters and bachelors. All hell broke loose as a result of that. We have the same sort of problem here, where although some recognition is going to be given to the work done in the home, the government has again neglected the total question. In my view, it demonstrates a callous disregard of those people who for one reason or another find themselves deserted or separated or, if they are living common-law, there is no recognition of splitting. I think we must look very closely at that question. Divorce is the remedy of the well-to-do, not the poor. Family courts remain the principal source of legal assistance for the poor. Splitting upon legal breakdown will further burden these facilities.

Administratively some procedure for informing the authorities of the breakdown will have to be developed. As well, it will have to be determined whether the courts will have the responsibility of splitting the benefits in cases where divorce occurs after benefits are already being collected by one of the partners, or if the department will handle this automatically. There is the whole question of who gets what, how much, why, and when. On the minister being advised of the need for splitting, this will all be decided by way of regulation. But this is a pretty hard pill to swallow, because it can be extremely complicated. Also, the parliamentary secretary has already expressed concern about how it would work. Another problem is the whole concept of automatic splitting upon breakdown and intrusion by the government on a person's freedom to deal with his assets as he pleases.

Let me now deal with the effects of splitting CPP pension credits on CPP benefit levels. With one-wage earner families, the future retirement pension of the wage earner would decrease, while a retirement pension would become payable to the spouse who worked at home when she or he reached the age of 65 years. However, the length of the marriage would also affect the two retirement pensions. Generally, the longer the marriage lasted, the greater would be the effects on the two retirement pensions. Those in receipt of a CPP pension at the time of breakdown would receive a lower pension after the calculation and might also have to repay past overpayments. In two-wage earner families, the effects would be similar to the one-wage earner family, but smaller in magnitude since both partners would be earning their own pension credits. The result would be an averaging.

What about CPP survivors under age 65 years? For survivors' benefits, the splitting of pension credits would provide CPP protection for the new family unit of the previously non-working partner. At the same time, the protection of the new family unit of the working partner would be decreased. Where both spouses work outside of the home there will be little effect; the magnitude of the effect would depend upon the differences in the earnings levels and work histories of the two spouses.

I now touch on disability benefits. The effects are similar to those pertaining to survivor benefits, except that the magnitude might be larger since disabled contributors' pensions have a larger earnings-related component. In the case of one spouse receiving disability payments at the time of marriage breakdown, a recalculation of the amount of disability pension would be necessary in order to reflect the change in the pension credit record. This could lead to a reduction in benefits, and hence a situation of overpayment in the past. If a disability pension is potentially receivable by a spouse at home, then upon marriage breakdown the spouse at home will receive half the credits and could become eligible for the disability pension. This is possible because one need only contribute to CPP for five years in order to become eligible. This represents an inequity vis-à-vis single contributors who must work for the necessary length of time to become eligible for benefits.

I said that we must consider the implications of the drop-out provisions. First, if we impute contributions to the CPP fund during years when no contributions are made, the welfare aspects of the plan are strengthened. This, I suggest, represents a departure from the basic insurance-related philosophy of the Canada Pension Plan and is not in keeping with the original principle of the plan which was established as a contributory plan based on the number of years actually worked. According to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) in a brief submitted to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs on April 4, 1974, the basic orientation has been to the wage earner. Consequently, the determining of the key factors of the plan, namely, coverage, contributions and benefits, had been tied to the earnings of the participant. This was considered a fair and equitable basis for allocating costs between employees and employers. This aspect ought to be investigated, I suggest. We must determine if there has been a departure from the principles set out in 1974.

Second, I point out that the drop-out provisions do not extend coverage or protection to a woman at home if she has never worked, if she has worked only a few years, or if she has had to leave the labour force in order to care for a disabled child or parent. I shall elaborate on this point in due course. The drop-out provisions apparently do not apply to women unless they leave the labour force to take care of a disabled child or parent.

I suggest that the provisions of this part of the bill also apply to men. One could substitute "man" for "woman" wherever applicable. The drop-out clause provides a subsidy without contribution and as such is a move toward social assistance and away from the insurance intent of the Canada Pension Plan. In this light, why do mothers who remain at home to care for handicapped children or disabled parents deserve any less subsidy? If the precedent or principle of social assistance is established in this area, how is it justifiable, philosophically, to limit the subsidy to housewives who remain at home to care for children and then return to the work force? In other words, the approach whereby the bill recognizes the needs of some, but ignores those of others, is questionable.

I suggest that inequity is created between those who can afford to drop out and those who cannot, that is, between those with different incomes, those who have never worked, and those who do work. The bill creates inequities among women. It does not prevent more favourable treatment being afforded a contributor whose earnings are coincidentally low when children are young. I am thinking, for example, of students or inexperienced workers whose incomes are low. This provision is unrelated to the fact that they have young children at home.

There exists a deeper, basic issue, that of CPP funding and its role in provincial financing. Mr. Speaker, I notice that the parliamentary secretary said nothing about funding. We are concerned about the actuarial soundness of the Canada Pension Plan and any other pension plan in force in this country. At present, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) is involved in the indexation of civil service pensions. I understand a pension board is looking into the efficacy and actuarial soundness of the Canada Pension Plan. But the parliamentary secretary mentioned not one word about this.

Mr. Ellis: The reason is simple: he does not know.

Mr. Alexander: Quebec government actuaries claim the drop-out provision will increase total pension pay-out by less than 4 per cent over the next 50 years, but this estimate may be based on the erroneous assumption that the behaviour pattern of women will not change with the institution of the provision. The same argument may apply to certain men. It is difficult to believe that the benefit available through the drop-out provision pay-outs of the CPP will not be taken advantage of by many men and women.

Before I deal with the funding aspect of the plan, let me review some further problems concerning the drop-out provision. It is alleged that this bill will be of benefit to women. Perhaps that is correct. The spouse's drop-out provisions may appear attractive to some contributors. Those with labour force attachments who remain in the home while the children are young would receive higher pensions than is now the case. In addition, women who have sufficient time in the work force before the child-rearing period would have their CPP coverage continue against the contingencies of disability and death. For example, three years are required for survivor's benefit coverage, and five years for disability. However, a number of concerns exist with regard to the special drop-out provisions which suggest that these provisions should be studied further. There are three broad sets of concerns regarding the proposal in its modified form.

First, it appears to create inequities among contributors. Second, it appears to create anomalies among contributors and certain other groups. These could be used to lever the CPP into increasingly broader subsidies. Third, it appears to weaken the insurance-related basis of the CPP and increase inherent subsidies—that being the welfare aspect of the program—at a time when its underfunding is of increasing concern and general problems of pension and pension funding are the subject of mounting public concern.

The net effect of the proposal would be to provide a subsidy to those women who meet the eligibility criteria and who have little or no earnings while children are young. The interesting point about this subsidy is that it is not constant; that is to say, the value of the subsidy depends upon two variables. They are, first, the number of years out of the labour force a woman could be entitled to by reason of young children, and either chooses to and/or is able to take by reason of her family's financial circumstances, and, second, the women's average lifetime earnings, that is to say, in those years since 1966 which are not affected by either drop-out provision.

The committee will need to examine the question of the number of years out of the labour force. It appears that the aggregate value of the subsidy depends, first, on the amount of time to which a woman would be entitled to drop out relative to the amount of time she chooses to and/or is able to take. A mother of three children spaced four years apart and who is a member of a family which can afford to forgo her earnings while the children are young could be entitled to 15 years to care for her children. She could choose to exercise her full entitlement, or subsidy, and remain in the home throughout.

In contrast, a similar woman from a low income family might have no real choice in this matter; that is, she may be required to return to work as quickly as possible owing to economic necessity. Consequently, she might take only three years in the home, even though she would also be legally entitled to the full 15 years. I say that we must be concerned about the effects of this bill on women since it is intended to give recognition to the work of women in the home.

Going back to my original premise, I would say this: the first woman will receive the full value of the 15-year drop-out provision without any contribution being required. The second woman would only be able to take advantage of the benefits from 3 of her potential 15 years of eligible child-rearing. In addition, she would be required to make compulsory contributions during 12 of her 15 eligible years. The value of any subsidy when the same number of years may be dropped out varies with the average lifetime earnings of the mothers involved. The subsidy to a woman who earns consistently at or above the maximum insurable earnings would therefore be twice that received by a woman earning at half that level.

Neither woman is required to make any contribution for the years dropped out. However, the value of their subsidies varies with their average lifetime earnings levels, although both may make no contribution during their child-rearing years. This occurs because the imputed value of the drop-out provision is based upon her actual contributions in years which are not affected by the drop-out provision. Thus, it parallels the basic design of the CPP. This technical parallelism results in the assignment of differential CPP values and benefits to the child-raising function. Thus, the value of the CPP subsidy associated with raising a "low income" child is less than that attributed to the raising of a "high income" child. This point is interesting in relation to the concept, if not the technical design, of the CPP, a "contributory" social insurance program. No contributions are required for spouses' drop-out years regardless of the woman's income level. However, the value of the subsidy associated with those years varies with the woman's average lifetime earnings.

Given the preceding points, it is apparent that the implicit subsidy in the spouses' drop-out provision is of greatest potential value to women with higher earnings levels and women who, because of family circumstances, are able to exercise their full entitlement. Conversely, the proposal offers the lowest potential level of subsidy to women with low earnings levels and women who are restricted in their ability to use their entitlement. This raises a broad social policy issue. Is it equitable or appropriate to provide a special provision for some mothers which is not equally accessible to all of those who are eligible and assigns different values to the child-rearing function? I ask this question because I believe people should know what they are getting into if this bill is passed.

There is also the problem of compulsory contributions. The woman who stays in the home would receive pension credits, although no contribution would be required. On the other hand, the woman who must work is not only required to carry the dual role of homemaker and wage earner, but must also pay a compulsory tax by way of CPP contributions in order to obtain her pension credits. The woman who can afford to stay home receives the subsidies, without any requirement to contribute, regardless of her economic status. The mother who cannot stay at home is required to make compulsory contributions for the years which could otherwise be dropped out without regard to her ability to pay.

The preceding discussion has outlined apparent inequities created among contributors. By granting pension credits, for the first time, to one specific group of non-contributors, inequities are created between them and other groups of non-contributors who perform other socially valuable but unpaid services. Mothers who are never able to enter the labour market receive no credits for their child-rearing years. Examples of other persons would be mothers who remain in the home to care for older disabled or retarded children, and women who leave the work force to care for an ailing parent or spouse. I mentioned this before, and I shall do so again. Mothers who remain in the home to care for older disabled or retarded children get nothing, and women who leave the work force to care for an ailing parent or spouse get nothing. So what looks fine on the surface does, nevertheless, raise a number of questions. We shall have to ask those questions and get them answered, because the more I read about this matter, the more it appears to be unfair and discriminatory. I hope answers will be given when the bill reaches committee stage. As this differential treatment is extremely difficult to justify in terms of social policy, leverage is created by which extension of CPP coverage to the various other groups of non-contributors would be created.

I must pay some attention to the funding problem which will arise as a result of any amendment to the Canada Pension Plan. We do not know what this is going to cost. The minister's draft papers spoke of a minimal cost. Surely that is not good enough at a time when all segments of society are registering concern about the funding of pensions. Current federal estimates indicate that in the medium run the cost of the spouses' drop-out provision will increase CPP expenditures by approximately 4 per cent, assuming no behavioural changes occur. However, if the anomalies which are created by the proposal lead to further extension of subsidized coverage, this figure could increase substantially.

There is increasing concern regarding the basic issue of pension funding in general and that of the CPP in particular. The CPP is not actuarially sound at present, but is currently operating on a modified "pay as you go" basis. The plan is predicated on intergenerational transfers. Current contributions are, in effect, paying for the pensions of those who are now retired. The degree of individual subsidization to all pensioners will decrease over time as the plan matures, other things being equal. That is, although current retirees receive extremely high rates of retirement subsidies, future retirees will receive lower subsidies. However, the plan will always be based on intergenerational transfers, and therefore the costs of any modifications are passed on to future generations. CPP is underfunded at present. Unless the current combined contribution rate of 3.6 per cent is increased, the CPP fund will be exhausted between 1995 and 2000. Further increases will also be necessary. It is estimated that with no changes to the present CPP, a combined contribution rate of approximately 8 per cent will be required by 2025 on a "pay as you go" basis.

The question of the future orientation of CPP and its funding must ultimately be faced. There is a limit to the financial burden which can be placed on future generations. It has long been obvious that the present rate of contribution to CPP will not cover the cost of maintaining the increasing number of retired people who will require pensions. The way the present plan is set up, we are leaving a crushing load as a legacy to our grandchildren in terms of vastly increased taxes. As Ontario treasurer Darcy McKeough pointed out:

> In the first decades of the next century there will be more retired people relative to people employed in the labour pool than at any time in Canada's history. By guaranteeing the real value of retirement incomes for these people without appropriate funding, governments in Canada have subjected themselves to future liabilities which are staggering.

Geoffrey Calvert, author of the book "Pensions and Survival: the coming crisis of money and retirement", states: "We are passing the buck to future generations."

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): That is why seven of us did not vote for it.

Mr. Alexander: As the Canada Pension Plan is now set up, it is estimated that by 1989-90, $6,750 million will be needed to cover pensions. Within a very few years this rising tide of benefit outflows will have overtaken the inflow of revenue from the 3.6 per cent tax, and then the moment of truth will arrive. Calvert further states:

With the radical increase in the ratio of pensioners to workers clearly before us, it would seem questionable for Canada to commit itself to vast and liberal programs of support for its older people if these would result only in an overbalancing and collapse of the economy of the future.

Those are strong words, Mr. Speaker. In other words, what he is saying is that if we do not watch out we can be pricing ourselves out of the market and could, in short, go bankrupt. As Calvert says, it is to the early part of the next century that we must look, when today's young people will be approaching and entering their retirement years. It is in that period, a good deal less than 50 years from now, that the real consequences of decisions made today will begin to become all too apparent, and most of us here today will not be present to see them. It can be stated that by the 1990s the income from the Canada Pension Plan will drop sharply, and it will continue to fall if it continues on its present partially funded course. Calvert also warns that the CPP reserves outlook is, in short, quite ghastly; after rising for a few more years, if no changes are made these temporary reserve funds will top out, then plunge into liquidation. As Dr. John Grant says:

Legislative initiatives which would sharply increase the benefits payable under the Canada Pension Plan could, for instance, have an effect of this kind which could wreak havoc in Canada's financial markets.

I should like to bring to the attention of the House another questionable feature about the Canada Pension Plan, namely, its weak performance as a source of investment capital which this country badly needs. By 1981-85 we will have to raise some $26 billion. Private pensions are an important source of this necessary capital. It is estimated that from 70 per cent to 80 per cent of all new capital needed by Canada and raised by bond and stock issues is expected to be furnished by private pension plans. Unfortunately, that is not the case with the Canada Pension Plan, which serves mainly as a source of low-cost funding for provincial governments. This is why I want to express to the parliamentary secretary the concern registered by provincial governments, particularly by the province of Ontario, in regard to where pension plan funds are being invested.

Let me read a portion of an article published in the Globe and Mail of January 21, 1977. I hear a voice in the wilderness over there saying something, Mr. Speaker. If the parliamentary secretary wants to stand up and make a contribution, I will sit down. In the meantime, we are debating a very important bill and I am expressing our concern at the funding of this plan. Let me direct my hon. friend's attention to the article in the Globe and Mail which is headed "Thoughts for a rainy day":

The Canada Pension Plan is supposed to provide retired workers with security. Instead, in its present form, it could dupe them into insecurity, rob their children and reduce the ability of Canada to produce the goods and services that are needed by all Canadians.

I hope that the Canada pension conference, which is supposed to be directing its attention to these problems and coming up with the answers, is apprised of the situation. But how do we know? I have not heard the parliamentary secretary say anything at all about the Canada pension conference. They are the experts on pensions, yet he completely ignored them. Notwithstanding what my hon. friend across the way has said, let me continue with this article:

—the fund that has been collected under the Canada Pension Plan's half-funding system "is completely invested in the public sector". The federal government collects it. What isn't immediately needed for pensions is loaned to the provinces at rates related to long-term federal bond rates.

In this regard Ontario has averaged $324 million a year for the past ten years. This is what Darcy McKeough was pointing out.

This money is then spent by the government, often in building hospitals, schools and universities. It is not invested to earn a return.

All provinces are included in this regard, Mr. Speaker.

Your CPP money, in other words, is not working for you.

That means you and me, Mr. Speaker; it is not working for us. The provinces take it and invest it in the public sector, yet the private sector is screaming for investment dollars.

It is not being loaned at the going rate to earn more money to keep your premiums down. And, just as important, it is not being invested in resource industries or factories to provide more jobs, increase Canada's production and give all Canadians a better standard of living. Yet Canada desperately needs investment capital—

Do you get the point, Mr. Speaker? I am sure you do. We are not getting value for our money, and it is time there was a complete review. But what does the parliamentary secretary say? He conveniently ignores the whole question of funding. I have a great deal of respect for the parliamentary secretary, and I know he has to do what he is told. I hope that when I become a parliamentary secretary, when we take over as a result of the ineptitude and mismanagement exhibited during this government's stewardship, I will be able to do a little better than the parliamentary secretary. However, I am getting off the track, Mr. Speaker, and I know you want to hear our concerns regarding the Canada Pension Plan.

There also exist other areas of concern. All income security programs should be carefully scrutinized in regard to who receives benefits and who pays. However, even if these concerns did not exist, there would still be two fundamental questions in respect to this proposal, namely, the drop-out proposal. The first concern is the role of the CPP. Is the CPP, a contributory, earnings related social insurance program, an appropriate mechanism for providing some financial independence for the spouse in the home? We will have to answer that question, and whether the drop-out provision as related to the Canada Pension Plan is the proper mechanism to recognize the financial independence of spouses in the home.

The second question relates to the orientation of the CPP and the balance between its social aspects and its insurance principles. Is it appropriate to introduce a proposal which represents a further departure from the insurance aspects of the program and sets a precedent by which the CPP can be levered into further subsidies, before resolving the future orientation of the plan? That is a very important question which all members of parliament, accepting their responsibilities in this regard, will have to ask themselves. Is it appropriate to introduce a proposal, or proposals—and I would say proposals—before resolving the future orientation of the CPP? It should be noted, as well, that with the exception of certain unique cases and some foster mothers the women who would benefit from this provision under the drop-out proposal will not be retiring for at least 15 years. As the proposal does not require contributions, timing does not seem to be imperative at this point.

So I ask you, Mr. Speaker, in order to bring it to the attention of the parliamentary secretary and the minister, this question: Given the implications of the proposal as related to the drop-out provisions, is it essential to proceed with it at this time, in view of the fact that we do not know what will be the future orientation of the plan, and since many people are raising concerns in regard to the whole funding of the Canada Pension Plan?

I have indicated to the House that at long last there is some attempt to recognize the need for splitting pensions in order that spouses will have an equal share as a result of having made a contribution to the home. I have also pointed out there are some problems in that regard. I have also said that we must consider the role women have played and will be playing in terms of raising their children—men as well. Therefore, we are considering drop-out proposals in order to give them the opportunity to raise their children. At the same time, I let it be known in no uncertain terms that there are a lot of problems with respect to the drop-out proposals. I registered my concern about the whole question of funding of the Canada Pension Plan and do not think I have to add any further words in that regard.

Last, but not least, I dwelt upon the question of investment and what has happened with Canada Pension Plan funds. We are not getting value for our money. It is dangerous to proceed, given the fact that all these matters raise several very important questions. We are waiting now to see that this bill is passed on to committee. I can say, on behalf of my party, that we welcome this step; but at the same time we will have to ask a lot of questions regarding the inequities we see. These are inequities regarding the splitting, the drop-out, the funding, and the investment.

It is most important to point out that we do not have any information as to where this plan is going, yet I know there are expert studies. We are expected to deal with this bill now—the amendments to the Canada Pension Plan. We have no idea as to what future funding means, and we have no idea what we are doing in terms of our grandchildren and payments under this plan. We will allow the bill to go to committee. At that time we will be able to talk to the minister in a reasonable fashion in order to determine where we are going with the Canada Pension Plan.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), I regard this as a very important piece of legislation. Like him, I am sorry the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) is not able to be here with us throughout this debate. It was explained to me why he is not able to be here this afternoon. I accept that explanation, although I notice that now we do not even have the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Alexander: Shame.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): However, if it is not against the rules for me to say it, I do note—.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think there should be a note in Hansard to indicate that the reason for that applause is that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has just walked in. Seldom have I had a wish fulfilled so instantaneously. I am aware of the fact that the minister's officials are within the sound of our voices and are taking note of what is being said, so that before the day is out he will have the full debate reported to him.

At the outset I have to say that I shall differ in many respects with my friend from Hamilton West with regard to things he said. I was surprised that his voice was so much the voice of Geoffrey Calvert and Colin Brown of the Globe and Mail, rather than the voice of the people of Canada. I believe that they really welcome and applaud the Canada Pension Plan.

I shall leave until later in my remarks any reference to the position that Ontario is taking in refusing to go along with one of the proposed amendments. That means I shall also leave until later my response to the things that the hon. member for Hamilton West has said about the funding of the Canada Pension Plan and the whole question of its orientation and the direction in which it is going.

First, I want to indicate my views with respect to the things that Bill C-49 actually does. I find myself in a position that I have been in a good many times during my years in this House, namely, having to say that this bill goes in the right direction. Therefore, I shall support it. But it does not begin to go far enough. Indeed, I was annoyed when I read in the minister's press release the day the bill was introduced and given first reading words which said that these amendments will recognize the role of spouses working in the home, and then again that these amendments are intended to provide some measure of recognition and financial security for spouses who work in the home.

Sir, if I was annoyed at those mild statements in the press release issued by the minister the day he introduced the bill, my annoyance went up a few notches when I heard his parliamentary secretary say at the conclusion of his speech this afternoon that these amendments represent a major step forward in the recognition of the place of those who work in the home. As if it is not enough to have heard the parliamentary secretary read those words from a speech that had been prepared for the minister, the minister now has the gall to applaud, when I quote those words. It does no such thing. This bill slightly recognizes that there are women who work in the home, and that because of that they should be given some very slight recognition. To call it a major step forward is really a misuse of language.

The bill, in that respect, proposes to do two things. The supporting material the department has put out makes it very clear that neither of these steps is going to cost very much, which means, in effect, that there is not much to it. The bill does two things.

Mr. Lalonde: It is divided between the two.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It does two things with respect to spouses. It does a number of other things which are housekeeping details. It is interesting that the word "housekeeping" got into this bill when we are talking about spouses. That is an aside. It does two things in so far as spouses are concerned. First, it provides, in the event of marriage breakdown, provided the marriage lasted for three years, that the combined assets can be split between the two parties. The bill goes into a lot of detail as to how that can be done, depending upon when the marriage breakdown took place, when the divorce was completed, the age of children, and so on.

At any rate, that is one thing the bill does. It combines the total value of the assets of husband and wife and splits those assets 50-50, if there is dissolution of the marriage, after that marriage has lasted three years. We accept that and we will support it. We think it is a good idea. We think it is some recognition, but only an infinitesimal recognition, of the fact that the spouse who stayed at home has made some contribution to the economic well-being of that family unit.

The other thing it does is to make a slight change with respect to women who are contributors. I say women, knowing that the bill works both ways, and I should talk about spouses. It could be a woman or a man. But in 90 per cent or more of the cases the bill is dealing with the mother—the woman. In that sense, the bill provides that if a woman has been a contributor already, and then stays home for a few years to raise children, provided those children are not over the age of seven the years spent doing that can be dropped out of the years that are involved in the calculation of her retirement benefit when she reaches age 65.

The hon. member for Hamilton West seemed to be worried about some element of subsidy. I find it awfully hard to see any element of subsidy. It is not giving anybody anything new. It just says to certain women who stay home to raise children that under the law as it stood we took away some of the rights they had earned, but we will give back those rights because the reason for staying home was to rear children. There is nothing whatsoever in this provision in this legislation for the woman, the spouse, the wife, the mother who stays home the whole of her married life or was a contributor for a while and never goes back to the labour force. We are asked to believe that this is a major step forward in recognizing the work in the home, but it applies only to a limited number of cases.

As far as that great number of Canadian women—even in this modern day I suggest there are many of them—who play the role of wife, mother and homemaker and do not go out to work, there is nothing whatsoever for them. For the government to try and tell us that this is a move in the direction of recognizing the role of work in the home in sheer nonsense.

I am going to support this bill even though I have called it nonsense. It is a very halting step in the direction of admitting that there are times when women, by their work in the home, earn some economic recognition, some economic rights. However, I want that to go all the way. Let us not wait until the year 2000 or 2100 before we carry the principle of equal rights for men and women all the way.

We have in this legislation, in veterans' legislation, in the pensions that widows get from the Canada Pension Plan, or from working for the CNR or the federal government, the concept that a woman gets only what she is entitled to because she had a husband, because of her attachment to a male person. What about granting to women rights in their own stead? I suggest that the time has come, not just to do the simple little thing that is proposed in this amendment to the Canada Pension Plan, but to recognize in full the role that is performed by women who stay home, raise children, look after the household and the family that in that way help to keep the nation going. This bill does not do that. It does not even recognize it.

Excuses are offered. The main excuse offered for not putting it into this legislation is that the Canada Pension Plan is an employment-related pension scheme. I fully recognize that. I was around when we were putting together the Canada Pension Plan. I feel a certain responsibility for it and a certain pride in it. It is one of the best pension plans to be found anywhere as far as the citizens of a whole country are concerned. Therefore, I accept that it is an employment-related pension plan.

If we were to break that by giving pensions where no employment or no employment earnings are involved, we would then be producing a totally different scheme. The minister is no doubt aware that a good many times I have asked him questions in this area and a good many times I have moved motions under Standing Order 43. I think he will admit that my questions and motions have always been carefully worded. I have not proposed that women who stay at home should get benefits under the Canada Pension Plan as though they were employed and had earnings. I have proposed that they should be given pension rights equivalent to those that are given to those who work and contribute to the Canada Pension Plan.

The various committees that have studied this have come up with the answer that it cannot be done under an employment-related pension plan, a plan which is related to earnings from employment. I suggest there is a way this can be done and that it would meet the problem we are dealing with today much better than this bill does. It would deal with those cases the hon. member for Hamilton West talked about, persons who stay at home to look after an ailing parent or an ailing spouse.

What business is it of the state to pick and choose among the reasons why a person stays home? What business is it of the state to say this is an idealistic thing that you do, and this is not? I suggest that we should go for a form of universality. We should provide that every person between the ages that apply in the Canada Pension Plan, the 47-year period between 18 and 65, who is not employed and is not contributing to the Canada Pension Plan should get a certain percentage of credit toward a supplement to his old age security, a certain percentage for each year he is not a CPP contributor. Although the specific percentage I am suggesting is not the point to hang on, it is the idea, and I am suggesting that the figure should be 2 per cent per year.

Mr. Lalonde: To be contributed?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Without contribution. I am suggesting there are 47 years between ages 18 and 65. That is the compulsory period for contributing to the Canada Pension Plan. Every person is allowed to drop out 15 per cent. Fifteen per cent of 47 years is just a fraction over seven years, which means that the remaining portion is almost 40 years.

A housewife and mother who stayed home all that time, or a male person, for any reason whatsoever, should get a credit of 2 per cent for each of those years up to the 40 as an addition to his or her old age security. In other words, the nice, good, old-fashioned wife who stays home the whole time, raises the children, looks after the old man, and generally behaves as good Canadian wives and mothers used to behave, would have an 80 per cent, 40 years times two, supplement, without a means test, added to her old age security.

Therefore, at the point of retirement, the husband would have his old age security and the Canada Pension Plan to which he contributed. The wife would have her old age security and an 80 per cent addition because of the contribution she had made to Canadian society, the Canadian economy, the Canadian life, by being a Canadian wife and mother at home. For shorter periods without making contributions, the supplement would be lower. Do not smile about this. Do not laugh about it. I suggest it is the kind of sensible proposal the government ought to consider.

I do not agree with at least half the criticisms advanced today by the hon. member for Hamilton West, but he did have a point. He said it is unfair to grant this consideration to the woman who stays home to look after the children, but not to the woman who stays home to look after an ailing husband or ailing parent. If you try to bring in various categories, you will do nothing but get into trouble. However, I suggest there is a way along the lines I have proposed to see that everyone's contribution to our economy gets recognized.

I am back to the basic point that underlines all that I want to say this afternoon. I am not going to go into the kind of details that the previous speaker did. I think for the most part the details that are in the bill implement correctly what the bill is trying to do. However, I quarrel with the fundamental assertion by the Minister of National Health and Welfare made by his parliamentary secretary that this measure is a major step forward in the recognition of the role that women who stay in the home play in our economy.

As I have said, look at the pensions of veterans' wives and widows, the pensions of widows of Canadian National employees, or of members of parliament or of public servants. In all cases they are not pensions that are given to them in their own right as persons. They are given to them because they can say, "he was my man". If this is a day of equal rights, if we proclaim it in legislation and in fine oratory, I suggest it is time to move in that direction. Yes, this bill moves in that direction but it does so hesitatingly. It does only two things: it says that if there is a marriage breakdown, the assets can be split 50-50, and it says that in the case of a woman who has an attachment to the outside labour force and has an attachment again later, we will give back to her certain credits that were taken away from her under the legislation as it stood.

I am quite prepared to vote for this bill. As I say, I have been voting for decades for pieces of legislation that did not go far enough but moved in the right direction. This one does that, and I hope that in committee we can have some useful discussion about it.

If I may indulge in something that might seem a bit light, let me say that this bill raises another problem. In addition to being a stickler for the rules of this place, I am a stickler for the rules of grammar. I shudder sometimes at some of the errors that I hear in the House, but they are usually corrected in Hansard. One rule that really bothers me is the rule that he or his includes she or her, but the reverse does not apply. I wrote a letter to the president of CBC a while ago—I do not do it very often; I do not complain about the so-called bias of CBC—about a professor whom I had heard, who turned out to be a professor of English, making a speech in which he used the phrase "everybody and their dog". That is a pretty common error. It should be "everybody and his dog", even if the "everybody" happened to be a woman. The rule I mentioned is in the Interpretation Act. It states that his includes her and he includes she.

In this bill we are talking about the person who stays at home, the family allowance recipient. In 95 per cent of the cases we talk about the woman, the mother, but all through the piece it refers to he and his. It is clumsy to use the his or her expression—I do not go for it at all—and I would certainly not consent to using the word "their" because we are talking in the singular.

Maybe the time has come for us to amend the Interpretation Act and where in that act we say that his includes her and he includes she, we should write the reverse and say that she includes he and that her includes his. However, as it stands we are talking about these persons who stay home, and time after time we read that he stays home to look after his children although, as I said, in 90 per cent to 95 per cent of the time it is the woman we are talking about. I hope that that piece of grammar can somehow be straightened out. It is probably cause for an amendment to the Interpretation Act rather than an amendment to this act.

This bill does two main things, as I said. It splits the benefits or credits in the case of a marriage breakdown and it makes a slight concession to women who stay at home to raise their children. It also does a few other things that are quite acceptable to me. I refer to the retroactivity that is established for persons who apply for their Canada Pension Plan retirement benefit between the ages of 65 and 70. I refer also to the international agreements and various other details that are in the bill. So far as we are concerned, those things are acceptable and we go along with them.

Although the bill did not raise the matter, my friend the hon. member for Hamilton West did raise the whole question of the funding of pensions. He used some pretty broad language. He spoke about the whole nation being concerned, and about all segments of society worrying about the future of pensions. This, of course, was his answer to the reference that the parliamentary secretary made to the fact that the Ontario government has not yet agreed to one of these amendments. I regret that as well. I say, quite frankly, that I hope that when this House and the other place have passed this bill, Ontario will reconsider its position. I may say, in passing, that I was one of those back in 1965 who voted against the clause in the Canada Pension Plan that gave this power of veto to a province. We did not like the formula at all, and we said so at the time. We said, in effect, that this was writing some of the constitution into the Canada Pension Plan. I am sorry to see it being used at this time.

I see that it is almost five o'clock, Mr. Speaker. When I rose to my feet I wondered whether I might finish before five o'clock, but since I cannot do that, and since I want to deal with the points raised by the hon. member for Hamilton West about funding—he is worried about future generations being burdened with the cost of higher pensions—perhaps I might be permitted to do that when the House meets again this evening. So at this point may I ask that you call it five o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of the adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald)—Transport—Date of decision on use of refrigerator cars to transport potatoes—Possibility of rate increase; the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke)—Canadian Mint—Reason for accepting orders for coins from foreign countries; the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche)—Administration of Justice—Reported ineffective surveillance of therapeutic abortions—Government action to correct.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Notice of motion No. 16 in the name of the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Martin).

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The motion stands at the request of the government.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I think we can expedite the work in private members' hour this afternoon by pointing out that there is general agreement to deal with notice of motion No. 22 standing in the name of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche).

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE ON CANADA'S GOALS FOR THE 1980s

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government ought to establish a special parliamentary committee on Canada's goals for the eighties, to enable the formulation of national objectives for the decade ahead, such committee to (a) receive briefs and representations from organizations and individuals suggesting priorities for economic and social development of Canada, and for Canada's role in international development (b) conduct hearings in every province to enable interested persons to communicate their views personally (c) publish a report on findings and recommendations to be debated in the House of Commons as a guide to the government in presenting its programme of economic and social legislation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to place my motion before the House this afternoon for general consideration, bearing in mind that it is fortuituous that we are debating this motion today when Mr. Justice Berger's report has just been tabled. The Berger report dramatically shows how deep are the feelings within the Canadian public about energy and environmental questions, and how much we politicians can be helped by a thorough examination of alternative routes into the future.

Put as concisely as possible, the future of Canada revolves around the nature of the growth of our society. Who will determine the nature of this growth? At this very moment the Canadian Association of the Club of Rome is meeting in Ottawa to wrestle with that question. This is not just a theoretical exercise. Great changes and perplexing questions are all around us in Canada and throughout the world. Will we give human development precedence over material growth? Will we forgo the satisfaction of immediate desires in favour of future stability? Will we use our enormous techno-scientific power for the benefit of humanity as a whole? An important new publication by the Club of Rome entitled "Goals for Mankind" stresses the urgency of establishing these goals. I quote from it as follows:

The inquiry into what we are up to, what we can or should do with ourselves and future generations, should undoubtedly come first, if for no other reason than because without an over-all design our frenzied activities can but give rise to colossal disorder—which is precisely what is beginning to occur today.

I am asking parliament to establish a mechanism for focusing on a wide range of interlocking economic, social, scientific, constitutional and cultural problems that will be facing Canada in the 1980s. I am asking that we look ahead to establish priorities in government planning so that Canadians get a sense of direction of where we are going, so that Canadians be given a chance to state what kind of country they want and so that the input into the decision-making process is greatly expanded beyond governmental bureaucracy.

The committee I propose is far more than just an exercise to keep parliamentarians busy. It is urgent because of the economic and social disorder of our time. To put it simply, we are backing into the future. Technology has given us the ability to plan our future, yet the political process does nothing more than put band-aids on problems that break out. Analysts by the dozen, from Alvin Toffler to the Economic Council of Canada, have told us that. We are preoccupied with inflation, unemployment, regional disparities and discontent and, now, the overriding question of national unity. Nor can Canada escape increasing involvement in the two paramount international issues of disarmament and Third World development. All of these problems call for co-operative, long-range solutions. Why, then, do we not provide Canadians with an opportunity to tell government what kind of Canada they want?

In this moment of crisis in which we seem stunned by the threat of Quebec's separation, let us take some positive action which will establish not only why the country should stay together, but also how we can build a more just and equitable society, responding to economic and social needs in every region of Canada.

Government and parliament make a big mistake by consistently examining society using only factors easily convertible to quantitative data such as income levels, production and trade balances. The determination of public policy should also take into account the psychological and, in the broadest sense, the spiritual reaction of society to the rapid social changes of the past three decades. Of course, it is difficult to find consensus on national goals in modern society. But we ought to try, for it has become clear to me on my travels across the country—and I have spoken in 24 Canadian cities and towns since January—that there are men and women in increasing numbers who long for a more human social order.

A successful society requires more than growing statistics. It requires the revival of what journalist-philosopher Walter Lippman called a public philosophy. In a public philosophy the highest laws are those upon which all rational men of good will, when fully informed, will tend to agree. All men, both those who govern and those who are governed, are always under those laws which can be developed and refined by rational discussion. The question before us is whether we will implement a public philosophy in the 1980s or continue to tolerate a disjointed society where the loss of human dignity has reached scandalous proportions.

People are paying higher taxes to support ever-growing government at all levels, while the problems of housing, resource distribution, safety and transportation are getting worse. Distrust of a powerful and faceless bureaucracy in Ottawa is increasing. Many people have vague feelings about something being wrong and blame their politicians for not solving it. The criticisms we receive, however, go beyond specific objections and reveal a fear and frustration over the discontinuities of modern life. It is normal for politicians to receive complaints. What is abnormal is that the source of alienation now goes beyond the political process and is found in the depths of society itself. This is by no means a Canadian phenomenon. It is part of the general decline in the confidence in democratic governments everywhere. A lack of faith in democracy is spreading.

Analysing this crisis, the trilateral commission, which is composed of scholars from western Europe, Japan and North America, declared that the central dilemma of democracy is that "the demands on democratic government grow, while the capacity of democratic government stagnates." We have for so long elected politicians on their supposed ability to ensure the fulfilment of consumer demands that the political process is unable to respond to the unprecedented challenges posed by the reality of an interdependent global community. Our political system was made for another age. I do not have much confidence that it will be reformed as long as we encourage members of parliament to measure their usefulness by the number of short-range benefits conferred on their electors.

Unquestionably, the parliamentary process itself needs to be updated to make it more effective: television coverage, shorter speeches, examining departmental estimates in the House rather than in committee, more support staff for members of parliament. However, merely improving the myriad internal systems and mechanism will not be enough. Modernization of the institution will not, by itself, restore public confidence in the ability of members of parliament to lead Canada today.

Members of parliament cannot just snap their fingers and restore stability and tranquility. Members of parliament are not even agreed on how much or what kind of moral leadership we are capable of giving. Politicians alone cannot successfully cope with the explosion of change around us. People from every walk of life must become more finely attuned to what is really happening in the world. Then, perhaps, the political process will more accurately reflect viewpoints and there will be a greater section of society more responsive to this kind of leadership.

The technocrats have had their way in the parliamentary process for too long. It is time for a new kind of political leadership based on a declaration of value openly arrived at, and that entails bringing some philosophical beliefs concerning key moral issues on to the floor of the House of Commons. It is not just a matter of finding immediate answers to problems, but of examining the horizon of where we are headed. As we turn to the horizon today we see the dignity of man and his most basic rights threatened increasingly. Prophetic voices are needed, and parliament should be a great amplifier.

I believe that it would be a constructive act for us to establish a special committee of this House assigned to the task of listening to the needs of Canada in the way I have outlined. I must point out that I am not alone in my thinking. On February 11 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) proposed the appointment of a special committee to consider and report upon the government document entitled "The Way Ahead". However, the committee I envisage would do more than study our economic future. We ought to be concerned, as I have said, about other facets of society that all intermesh and that are woven into the fabric of Canada. It is the full range of economic, social, scientific and constitutional factors that should be examined.

The Science Council also believes that some mechanism must be created to assure public input into public policies, to assure that the public good is represented in government decision-making, and to assure that this fragmented society becomes one of consensus. Senator Maurice Lamontagne advocates forming a separate government agency called Horizons Canada to stimulate discussion of Canada's future. But why set up a new body? Why cannot parliament fill this role through the creation of a special committee?

The hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) has asserted his belief that the definition of choices and goals for Canada to adopt in the post-control period certainly should not be done only by some planning group working confidentially within the government. His proposal is to set up a special parliamentary committee on national goals. It is worth noting that this committee as envisaged by the hon. member would not be restricted to economic issues. He points out that there should be attention given in the committee's work to the question of whether the country's policy emphasis should be on economic growth or on improving the quality of life.

A similar view is held by the Gamma group of Montreal, organized with federal funding to study the concept of a conserver society. In its final report the group proposed as its first of four major recommendations that a public debate should be initiated in order to elicit reactions from different pressure groups concerning the desirability of a conserver society. Such an inquiry should not be open only to those who have been organized into pressure groups; it should be carried out by a parliamentary committee.

In "The Way Ahead for Canada", subtitled "A Paperback Referendum", the editor, Robert Logan, has devised a novel means of allowing public input in government policy. Readers are invited to fill out a questionnaire at the back and mail it to the Prime Minister's office. Professor Logan believes it important that all people have some input into future policies, and sees this unique poll as a first step. It is significant that the scope of the questionnaire is wider than that of the government working paper and that Professor Logan wants parliament to have a major role in determining what Canadians want as their future.

In asking members to support my motion, I suggest that Professor Logan's book contains many reasons for their doing so. Here are a few quotations, the first from the futurologist Alvin Toffler who says:

> Unless we are able to reconnect citizens with the political decision system, unless we can create many new and sensitive channels for feedback between people and their governments, we will not be able to solve our economic and social problems. For even more fundamental than specific government programmes, are the processes by which we arrive at them.

This next is from the distinguished hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) who says:

> Economic policy-making in Canada has been poor in recent years because it has been so totally closed. The senior officials in the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada set the policy directions of the nation. The results have demonstrated that this is not an adequate system. Economic policy is so important that instead of being made in secret, it should be a matter of public debate.

The third is from Bruce McLeod, former moderator of the United Church of Canada, who says:

> If it is important that Québécois determine their own destiny and not be made into Albertans, or vice versa, it is possible to argue that without the struggles and disagreements within a fellowship that includes both, neither would easily achieve an undistorted self-understanding appropriate to this end of the twentieth century. Structures that divide us and keep us separate and unexposed to those who think and act differently, do not necessarily ensure our own growth, let alone our responsible participation in the building of the earth of which we are a part. What is needed is a model of federalism in which diversity is expected and protected, but in which doors are opened between narrow circles and unity is forthrightly declared.

I agree with Professor Logan when he says that although decisions are best made by elected representatives, our present system of government could be vastly improved if more meaningful input could come from the people.

Mr. Speaker, I turn briefly now to some of the chief areas of my concern about the next decade and why I am reluctant to see policy formed only on the basis of narrow opinions, no matter how expertly couched. I take, as my first example, immigration. Surely the immigration debate which is still going on reflects the diversity of views among Canadians brought out by the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. What worries me is that in the formation of policy undue weight may be given to special bodies such as, for example, the Science Council of Canada which has come out strongly for a low-population, high-technology future for Canada without, at the same time, redressing present disparities among either the nations of the world or the parts of Canada.

Science alone is not the answer to human development, as the Canadian Council on Social Development makes clear. Neither is economics. The incessant economic tendency of the strong to take from the weak must always be fought against. The danger of this is heightened by the fact that many Canadians now place the blame for our current troubles on excessive social welfare expenditures and are inclined to demand cutbacks in those programs first. For these reasons, Reuben Baetz, in the 1976 annual report of the council, calls for an over-all strategy for social development in a time of economic constraint.

If the over-all resources available for social development are to be more limited in the future, then they must be more concentrated on helping those most in need. Mr. Baetz identifies the most vulnerable groups as one-parent families, the retired living on diminishing savings, the physically handicapped and underemployed and unemployed youth. He calls for a much better understanding of the size and nature of our social welfare programs, arguing that their size is often exaggerated, their effect on inflation frequently misrepresented, and the "hidden welfare" of tax exemptions and corporate subsidies typcially ignored. These are some of the questions we are beginning to examine as we look into the next decade.

Finally, I see the network of Canadian problems revolving around our perception of the conserver society. I suppose if you had to boil it all down you would say we hope for the kind of society in which conservation is going to be a good word. The source of our current problems, however, is much deeper and more complex than resource limitations alone. The conserver society, based as it is on a concept of growth with a purpose, will not be achieved merely by conserving resources. It calls for changes in our values and outlook. The conserver society recognizes that there are social limits to growth. The traditional values of thrift, efficiency and the avoidance of waste need to be re-found. This is also the theme of the Vanier Institute of the Family, trying to protect family values and to establish a better relationship between family and society that promotes social co-operation and the well-being of all. The key word to the conserver society is "rethink". We are being asked to question our need for things and the way in which Schumacher, in his book "Small is Beautiful", has raised these questions.

Clearly, the concept of the conserver society has greater implications than asking people to save 10 per cent or some other percentage. How can we ever expect people to accept the principles of the conserver society, which suggests serious changes in our lifestyles, without allowing them some input?

In conclusion, I urge parliament to reflect on the fact that many of our problems today are due to decision-makers of the past who ignored the future. Today we have new tools to build a future Canada, and our responsibility for doing so is all the greater. Building for the future is the most realistic kind of politics there is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Roche.]

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) has put before us a motion that really engages our imagination and thoughts. For that we are most grateful. It demands that we should project our thoughts forward to what we shall do in the eighties.

● (1720)

In his motion, the hon. member suggests how we should go about establishing priorities for the Canadian people. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's proposal is to be commended. It deserves support. I say this because all who enter politics, whether they sit on the government side or in opposition, want very much to participate in the shaping of laws which govern not only what we shall do in the present, but anticipate—if that is the right word—that which is to come in future. However, I do not agree with one part of the position put forward this afternoon by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona. In saying this, I do not wish to detract from the importance of his motion and the ideas he put forward this afternoon.

The concern he expressed about growth and about a conserver society strikes me as the sort of concern expressed by those who have "made it" in society, to use a popular expression, who have attained a certain degree of success in life and can therefore view with equanimity the prospect of diminishing growth or no growth. That concern is not shared by Canadians who have not "made it." Such Canadians look on growth as of the utmost importance. They do not look on it with fear or think it a bad thing. I cannot be convinced from my political experience, therefore, that growth is bad non-growth is good.

The tests of growth are these: What kind of growth is it? In what sectors of society does it take place? What kind of waste does it create? How does it contribute to the quality of life, if I may use an expression, the meaning of which is not well defined? Also, what are the advantages of growth? What benefits will it bring us? Conversely, what are the benefits of giving up certain goals which we in our lives pursue? Really, those who would try to persuade Canadian society and parliamentarians that we should look forward to no growth in the 1980's, or look on growth with suspicion as something bad, are engaged in a fruitless exercise. I do not think the pursuit of growth is terrible and I do not support the suggestion that we should not pursue it.

Having said that, I see, nevertheless, the merits of parliamentarians consulting with the Canadian people on the broader questions of our goals for the 1980s. I prefer this course. In the past parliamentarians have consulted with Canadians across this country on a variety of topics. The hon. member has already mentioned one. I think of the committee which travelled across the country at the time of our taxation reform. Before that a committee travelled across the country to consult citizens on the question of constitutional reform. That was a most successful process of consultation. In parentheses, let me add that consultation as a process of arriving at a decision, no matter what it may be, is, as the hon. member suggested, as important as arriving at the goal which the government, various parties or groups of individuals may pursue.

A special group of parliamentarians, such as that to which the motion refers, perhaps can consider matters relating to present day reality and questions which we must face. Perhaps it need not look as far ahead as the 1980s. In this country a number of consultative bodies function. I am thinking of bodies such as the Economic Council of Canada, the Science Council, and the Council for Social Development. I think the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona referred to such consultative bodies. Evidently, since the hon. member has suggested the establishement of a special group of parliamentarians for the purposes set out in the motion, he feels that the consultative bodies previously referred to are not totally in touch with present-day reality; that their reports are not sufficiently comprehensive and do not indicate clearly what we should do in the years to come.

If that is the hon. member's position, I agree with him. A special parliamentary group of the kind suggested could consult with the Canadian people about a number of areas of concern and return to Ottawa with interesting ideas. For example, take the field of education. All of us, young Canadians included, ask if our educational system is preparing people adequately for their entry into the labour force. Is it preparing Canadians for those tasks in the labour force which must be carried out in our complex society? Or, because our young are trained in the ideas of the past which considered higher education as a desirable goal in itself, and the alternatives to it as perhaps not worth pursuing, or attractive, are certain types of jobs in the labour force begging for takers left chronically unfilled?

I am referring to the large numbers of graduates our universities produce every year who are considered as overqualified or too highly educated for the jobs available. For these reasons I suggest it is time the federal government looked carefully at our educational system. I know education is not a federal responsibility in the main. Nevertheless, employment and the labour market fall under federal jurisdiction. Therefore, it is of the greatest importance to the Canadian public and educational institutions, to determine if our educational institutions are in tune with the demands, needs, aspirations and realities of our labour market. Are we educating people to meet that demand?

Another area which comes to mind is that of renewable energy. The subject has already been mentioned by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, but I should like to add that consultation among Canadians as to what interest they have, what steps they are prepared to take, and what they would like the government to do in the field of solar energy, for instance, or the utilization of wind and tidal power, or of the utilization of the products of biomass, would be most valuable. The shortage of conventional energy sources will become more acute as the years go by, and certain decisions will have to be implemented probably much sooner and with a greater degree of priority than might presently appear likely.

Another area this committee could cover is that of automation and its effect in wiping out, virtually, large numbers of unskilled or semi-skilled jobs, resulting in unemployment unaccompanied by parallel work opportunities. Inevitably we see technology producing ways of eliminating jobs through the introduction of automation. Evidently this gives rise to difficulties with which the average Canadian is familiar either on a personal basis or through observation. As a phenomenon of our time it certainly has implications for the years ahead.

This displacement of the work force has yet another aspect. In Canada today we find an increasing number of people who, having spent 20 or 30 years at work in a highly demanding occupation, find themselves physically incapable of continuing in their jobs, simply because, having arrived in their fifties they have given the best of their energies. At this point they find there is no suitable alternative employment available to them, though this used to be the case before the trend to automation began. The alternatives are disappearing. Here we have individuals with five, ten or 15 years of useful working life ahead of them, who can find no place to go as a result of the trend in automation. I regard this as an important point, and it is one I should like to raise in relation to the motion before us.

Yet another field is that of the relationship of Canadians to their environment. This is a subject which concerns Canadians of all ages and at all income levels. National priorities would be well worth establishing. We would, I am sure, be able to find out what Canadians in all the various communities are thinking—those who live by the sea, in the mountains, in the cities or on the prairies. We could ascertain what Canadians believe governments at all levels should do to protect the environment. I am not thinking only of pollution. We all know what is taking place there. I have in mind the spread of new diseases such as the budworm disease in Nova Scotia which does not seem to respect provincial boundaries and which therefore calls for techniques based on a new approach.

Another thought which comes to mind is related to an issue which the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona raised last week—it was dealt with subsequently in the media—consequent upon the resignation of the Chairman of the Royal Commission on the Concentration of Corporate Power. There is definitely a need for a continuation of this kind of dialogue. The terms of reference of the Commission were criticized at an early stage as being too narrow. It was said that certain groups in Canadian society could not be heard. In view of the latest developments, it occurs to me that this question of the concentration of power in our system might well be one into which a parliamentary committee could inquire. The committee might spend some time establishing the consequences of this concentration of power, and determining what should be the policies of the eighties with regard to its redistribution.

When we talk of concentration of power we must also talk about taxation. The present system of taxation is designed to retain the incentive to create jobs with the public goal of redistributing wealth. Of course it is no easy task to strike a balance between the two. We remember what we went through in 1971 at the time we travelled throughout the country to hear the views of Canadians on this subject. Six years have already gone by, and it would not seem unreasonable to me if we were to decide that the tool of taxation, being one of the highest importance, requires regular analysis in order to determine whether it is still in tune with current values and the general objective of the nation.

The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona made one or two remarks which disturbed me. He may be right; I do not know. He indicated that the political process seems to be increasingly unable to respond and that we are working within a political system which is made for another age. With those two comments he raised an area of investigation and study, because if it were so—

● (1740)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I rarely speak on these private members' motions but I want to congratulate the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), who has just sat down, on doing something which should be the aim, I think, of every member who comes to this place, namely, to hear an argument presented logically and coherently, as did the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche), and then as an opposing member to stand up and debate the subject matter raised by the original speaker, which is to have a confrontation type of debate. Sometimes there is contradiction, sometimes there is support. I congratulate the hon. member for Davenport for doing what every member of the House of Commons should do.

Sitting on this side of the House, and having sat on the other side too, nothing depresses me as much as to hear members on the government side reading written material obviously prepared by someone in the department for which they are the mouthpieces. It appalls me that in the House of Commons, where we are supposed to represent the people, not our civil service masters, this sort of thing could happen.

I think the remarks of the hon. member for Davenport lead me into what I want to say in support of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona. What the hon. member is trying to say in this motion, as I understand it, is that the procedures that we are using to put information before the decision makers, theoretically this parliament, are obsolete. I would question the use of the word obsolete as being accurate.

I should like to remind the House that the subject we are debating briefly today is not new. During the days of the depression and during the days of war many, many people in all parts of Canada put their minds to this problem of where we are going, and what can we do. Without going through a whole recital there was a vast movement of people who said that the answer to our economic problems was to let the government take over the ownership and control of, for example, resources. That was an alternative course to what we were doing.

There was another train of thought which developed during the war, primarily among our civil servants, and at universities to some degree, namely, that our universities, our business people and our civil servants had done a good job of running the country during the war. They had accepted the doctrine of Lord Keynes, for example, in the monetary field. They had accepted the doctrine of Beveridge—the hand-over proposals which we are debating today, universal pensions for everybody regardless of contribution or need. They also accepted a third principle, namely, the principle that there is only a small elite in each country which can rule. Burnham put it into words.

Rightly or wrongly, this country did not take the course of socialism. It did not continue the course of drifting of the pre-war period. Instead we adopted the course of a directional type of control run by a select few, mostly civil servants, with a few allies at universities and in business, and the name that we began to apply to this peculiar function was "The Establishment". As I understand it, that is what the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is saying.

Let us assume that there are in all parts of this House of Commons enough people with a mentality sufficient to labour long and hard, and to look at several ideas put forward by the people. Do we have forever to bow our heads and bend our knees in worship of a small group, which is so small in our federal establishment that they can be numbered almost on the fingers of one's two hands? Should this small little group of mandarins decide reaction to events and the future course of our country?

Let me go back a bit, Mr. Speaker. In 1946 these same civil servants, the group I am referring to, when this concept was first introduced, produced a paper known as the white paper of 1946. If a person were to look at that paper—and I looked at it under Mr. Howe's leadership—he would come to the conclusion that it was a brilliant conception of what Canada was going to be for the next 30 or 40 years. This was the real birth of the concept of directional planning on the part of a small, elite group, not the democratic socialists that the NDP, or the CCF in the old days, talked about, but a small, elite group, the managerial elite, who would run this country. I ran into this group as a minister. Certainly I had a few victories, but very few, and I remember the thousands of defeats by these people more able than I, more persuasive, using bigger words, and overwhelming in their logic and their argument.

I suggest that in the last 15 years one of the basic problems facing our people has been the complete surrender of parliament and of the cabinet to the views of this group. That, I think, is what the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is saying. Maybe there is some truth out there among all these people. Maybe that truth could be funnelled in, as the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona said, by getting out of here and getting in contact with people on specific issues like taxation.

I know that the white paper of 1946 caught my imagination. I was very struck by it, as I had been struck by the concept of democratic socialism in the thirties. But you have to apply the test of experience to these things, Mr. Speaker. When we formed the government in 1957 there was a group of us in the government who during the days of depression and war had planned certain programs to implement if ever, by God's grace, we were to sit on the other side of the House.

We took advantage of the fact that the American republic to the south of us was very worried about the tremendous utilization of their resources during the war. They had produced a six year study in 1950 called the Paley report. Unfortunately for the American people their Congress paid no attention to the Paley report and its five volumes, which warned the United States that by 1980 it would be in a serious position in regard to several strategic resources, including oil and gas. The only thing that has happened which is different from what was projected in this period of 1949-1950 is that the crisis has arisen sooner, and fear has hit the American people.

This brings me to a small but important matter. I think the hon. member for Davenport misunderstood what the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona was saying about growth. I know the views of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona; he is for growth. But he is against unlimited growth without a social purpose. That is the difference. He knows about Dennis Meadows and the "Limits of Growth", and how it is completely erroneous in its basic concepts. He knows what the scientists have said about that. He knows what was done by all governments in the world in the International Geophysical Year, 1960-61. Many reserves of the world are supposed to be non-renewable, yet we find they are still growing as the earth changes its forms and its pressures and produces the so-called non-renewable resources. I am not going into details in this regard. I am simply saying that, speaking for this party and, I hope, the great majority of the people of the world, growth is still with us. I am sure that for the next 30 or 40 years growth is going to be more in the form of growing into the utilization of resources with a renewable basis.

I am sure hon. members have heard me say in the House, "Don't worry about energy. There is no shortage of energy. Whenever you get tired of using oil and gas, the farmers will grow it. The farmers of the United States and Canada will grow that energy cheaper and purer than you can get it otherwise out of the earth—no sulphur content." We are not going to do it now. Under the terms of educational practices and policies in Canada, we are not allowed to explore these other ways.

Today in the House of Commons I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) if he had in his hands yet the report put out by Middleton Associates of Toronto. He stood up and said, "Yes, I got that last fall." I got it a year ago last April. There was nothing about the security of the nation in it. It was a good report. It lists all the various types of renewable energies in Canada in which we lead the world. It lists 18 different types of renewable energy with technology in various parts of Canada. In six of those techniques it lays down where it is cheaper, cleaner, and better to use renewable resources rather than the present oil, gas or electricity. That report should not remain a secret from the people.

My second question to the minister today asked if he would make that report available to the public, and would he make it available particularly to provinces and municipalities that only get the stuff that is coming out of our establishment. According to the mandarins in control of Canada, the way to get over this energy difficulty is to put all the emphasis on nuclear power plants. Nuclear power plants are good, but there is a better way that is cheaper and cleaner, such as solar power, wind power, tidal power, and all the heat reserves in the earth stored for our use. Why should all of this knowledge be hidden from the people? It is because our masters have said we have developed the great CANDU nuclear plant. I played a big part in that during the early days of its formation. It is good, but there is no reason to say that is the only alternative.

In conclusion, I would like to say that the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona has served this country well by putting forward the idea that we can have a select committee, as we had before according to the British House of Commons system, through which we make direct contact with the people. It is an idea that should be followed. I am not saying there are no other ways, and here I mention the Resources for Tomorrow Conference which we held in 1961. This is a good idea and would put parliament back into a position where it can give advice.

There was a Senate committee in 1957-58. On the basis of the evidence they produced I, as the minister, developed the ARDA legislation, which is ranked by people who study the social sciences as one of the most radical, progressive types of legislation in any part of the world. It has not been used very much, but the principles are there. That came from a group of Senators calling in people to give advice on land use and water use. A select committee could do the same thing.

I have a long list of things I want to talk about, but the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is saying, "Get a select committee; go out and get these ideas; and try to give this country a national purpose so that we do not spend all our time reacting to events." We need a purpose in looking ahead over the next ten or 15 years. You cannot make it too precise, but you can find out from the people of this country the direction in which they want to go. He believes that in this direction there will be growth, but there will be a national purpose and a social purpose for all of us here because no country can grow unless it realizes its resources of manpower and natural resources. It is a part of the whole world. It is not for handouts but for the self-help approach.

I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona for putting forward a positive, constructive idea. I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Davenport for having responded with a truly critical analysis that is both positive and negative. This makes very clear the fact that on occasion there can be genuine debate in this House.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in my view what we need in Canada today is to do some thinking about where we are going, and about the kind of society we want. I am not concerned about our parliamentary institutions. I am concerned as to whether we really know what goals we want to achieve. I think we should do some hard thinking here in parliament. I think the people of the country should be encouraged to do their thinking and to add their input to ours. For these reasons I am glad this motion is before us and I am happy to indicate our support.

Mr. Frank Maine (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), I would like to congratulate the initiator of this motion because it is a very worth-while motion. As a scientist I am concerned about the problems of the future. I have been fighting a battle against those problems since I arrived here in 1974.

It has been mentioned that scientists caused all the problems of the past. They may have caused some of the problems, but they discovered some of the solutions of the past as well. They will also do so in the future. These solutions to problems should be planned as much as possible. To do this, you have to have debate from as wide a base as possible. I am in complete agreement with the context of what the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) is trying to accomplish. The question, therefore, is just the method by which it can be done.

The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona made reference to Motion No. 13 under the heading "Government Business" which tackles this problem by asking that a special joint committee be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "The Way Ahead". The only difference between the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and the motion presented by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is that, in his interpretation, his motion is more widespread and all-encompassing. This is where I take a different interpretation. In the economic and social reference contained in the motion by the Minister of Finance these other areas he has mentioned are encompassed. It may not be spelled out in detail, but you really cannot talk about scientific development without keeping a very close eye on both the social consequences and the economic parameters. The economic restraints we live with today are very real, and will be in the future.

I was very impressed by the last budget which the Minister of Finance tabled which indicated that several things were done in the scientific area. Every one of them was done with very close regard to the economic aspects of it. In all the measures that were brought down in the budget, we saw there was reference to how much money these entailed and how these compared to what happened in that past. In the words of the motion by the Minister of Finance, the narrow context of social and economic parameters really encompasses all the wider ones. Therefore I see no difference between—

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1977

AMENDMENTS TO CRIMINAL CODE

On the Order:

Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of Bill C-51, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Customs Tariff, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act and the Prisons and Reformatories Act—The Minister of Justice.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Further to agreement made earlier this day with regard to the point of order with reference to the gun control bill, Bill C-51, I recognize the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt).

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I will not take too much of the time of the House. Before commencing my argument with respect to the matter, I wish to refer to some of the other efforts that have been made in the House with regard to this and similar legislation to achieve some kind of severence in subject matter. What I want to deal with initially is efforts that have been made in the past concerning similar legislation and attempts in the past to sever omnibus legislation into separate pieces of legislation. Those previous efforts failed.

I refer specifically to the efforts of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) in this House, and I think Your Honour was in the chair at that time, when he attempted to apply Standing Order 46 to introduce an amendment to the bill to have it referred back to committee to consider the procedure under which it was initially introduced.

There have been other efforts. The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) made a similar attempt to have a bill directed to different committees to deal with different aspects. Again in that instance, it failed.

My initial submission is that on the precedents, which no doubt the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) will raise in opposition to this motion, the relevant rule is Standing Order 47 which reads as follows:

A motion to refer a bill, resolution or any question to a Committee of the Whole, or any Standing or Special Committee, shall preclude all amendment of the main question.

In each case there was an attempt to amend the main question. Those applications failed on that ground. I want to impress upon Your Honour that the thrust of my argument does not deal with the amendment to the legislation. It is not founded on the arguments that were presented previously. It is founded on a different principle. That principle is provided under Standing Order 51 which reads as follows:

Whenever Mr. Speaker is of the opinion that a motion offered to the House is contrary to the rules and privileges of Parliament, he shall apprise the House thereof immediately, before putting the question thereon, and quote the Standing Order or authority applicable to the case.

The word I want to emphasize in this Standing Order is the word "privileges". I am not arguing that Bill C-51 was introduced contrary to the rules. It is clearly within the Standing Orders. What I argue is that it violates the essential and ancient privileges of this House and the ancient privileges of British parliamentary tradition.

Those privileges are set forth succinctly over and over again in rulings that have been made in other parliaments and in this parliament saying members should not be placed in the position of having to vote aye on a motion when they would wish to vote nay. That may sound like an inconsistency, but in a sense a motion can betray the wishes of an hon. member to his constituents. In other words, if an hon. member's vote can be misrepresented to his constituency, it is an ancient tradition of the House that the member of parliament should be given an opportunity to register his vote clearly in terms of the issue in question.

As authority for that proposition I would like to refer Your Honour to the decision rendered in the British House of Commons on November 13, 1912. I will refer to it again in the course of my argument in terms of a ruling made by a previous Speaker of this House during the flag debate. This is what Mr. Speaker of the British House said on November 13, 1912, with regard to a similar point of order:

—the rule of course is if any hon. member feels embarrassed on voting on a resolution that the Chair shall revise the resolution in order that the member may, if he wishes to vote "Aye" on the one part and "No" on the other not be embarrassed by having to vote "Aye" or "No" on the whole of it—

In essence, that is the problem that all members of the House face with regard to Bill C-51.

Now I would like to go back to Bill C-51 because there has to be some history given to understand why so many members of the House feel so strongly about being placed in the invidious position of having their vote on that bill misinterpreted.

The history of this bill is that on the wiretapping section, a minority parliament, in a very abrasive debate, finally resolved itself, came to a position and passed the wiretap legislation, which was at that time a very high profile matter in the minds of the public. Subsequent to that we had the question of gun control. I do not think there is any member of the House who cannot say he has had literally hundreds and hundreds of letters on the subject of gun control. It is one of the major issues in the country, and it is something that we cannot ignore in this place in terms of the votes of members on such a piece of legislation.

The problem is that when this bill comes to second reading and members of parliament are asked how they voted on the gun control bill, they are in the incredible position of having to say, "Well, there was wiretapping; there were penitentiary provisions; there was gun control, and the provisions on dangerous offenders". How do you explain that, by virtue of that long standing British tradition that a member should not be required to vote aye when he wishes to vote nay, and be in the invidious position of not being able to take a clear stand on a public issue that is so distinct? I am not suggesting that we sever every piece of legislation. What I am saying is that Bill C-51 is like putting old age pensions and the Mackenzie Valley pipeline into the same bill and asking members of parliament to vote on it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: That is clearly wrong in terms of British parliamentary tradition. It is even wrong in terms of the American parliamentary tradition to which we are not as bound. But let us look at the American experience.

If we were to discuss this with an American senator, I suggest it would be inconceivable for him to have before him two such provisions such as wiretapping and gun control and to be told that he cannot vote separately on those items on second reading of the bill or on the principle of the bill, because the essential principles behind wiretapping and gun control are completely different and completely unrelated, yet members of parliament are placed in the invidious position of having to make one decision on both these matters. We are now faced with having to make a Hobson's choice. Some of us may agree with both provisions, some with one or the other, but we are placed in the position of having Hobson's choice in terms of the public perception of where their members of parliament stand.

The public is entitled, according to the British parliamentary tradition, to know where their member stands by virtue of the way he votes in the House, and he cannot do that on Bill C-51 because the government has, very shrewdly, joined these very inconsistent provisions, particularly because of the high profile these two subjects have in the minds of the public.

Now I would like to refer Your Honour to Hansard of June 15, 1964. That was the time of the flag debate in the House. A motion was presented by the government under government orders. I will not read the whole motion, but in essence it said that there shall be a new flag for Canada. That flag is the one we now have. It also said there shall be a second flag for Canada, a red ensign, which will be used on certain other occasions. There was a great dispute in the House because there was a variety of opinions about the flag.

It was a very emotional issue. Some members wanted only the red ensign, some wanted only the flag we have now, and there were some members who thought the motion was all right. It left members in the invidious position of having to say either yea and nay to this motion and finding it impossible to explain the position they had taken in the House to their constituents.

At that time the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) raised a point of order, and I will paraphrase some of the argument he put forward. He also drew attention to Standing Order 51. I will not repeat it, but it does provide that when the Speaker is of the opinion that a motion offered is contrary to the privileges of parliament, he can take the appropriate action.

Again I say that the form of this bill leaves us in an impossible position and violates the ancient rights of parliament.

Perhaps I could deal briefly with two authorities. One is May's Parliamentary Practice, thirteenth edition, and I will quote from page 270. The reason I quote this particular authority is in case Your Honour may believe that a bill is something entirely different from a motion. The argument made in May covers when we are dealing with a separate subject. May makes it very clear. He states:

Every matter is determined in both Houses upon questions put by the Speaker upon a motion made by a member, and resolved in the affirmative or negative, as the case may be.

We are dealing with a motion in exactly the same way as we were dealing with a motion during the Canadian flag debate.

I would like to refer also to page 297 of Bourinot's fourth edition where the following is stated:

"Whenever the speaker is of opinion that a motion offered to the House is contrary to the rules and privileges of parliament—

Again I emphasize the phrase "privileges of parliament"

—he shall apprise the House thereof immediately, before putting the question thereon, and quote the rule or authority applicable to the case".

What I am asking Your Honour to consider seriously is that, before the House deals with this bill in second reading debate, you should make a ruling on whether the bill in its present form offends the ancient privileges of parliament, so that members can have an opportunity not to confuse their aye or nay on such a fundamentally important question as either gun control or wiretapping.

In the precedent on which I rely quite heavily, the precedent of the flag debate, a great deal of argument went back and forth concerning the complication of the motion, but when it was all over, Mr. Speaker Macnaughton, having considered the arguments pro and con, came to a conclusion which, I submit to Your Honour, is the fair and appropriate conclusion to reach in these circumstances. He said this, and I quote from page 4306:

Taking into consideration the references and quotations just cited, and more especially the view expressed by the Speaker of the British house on November 13, 1912, where he said:

—the rule of course is if any honourable member feels embarrassed on voting on a resolution that the Chair shall revise the resolution in order that the member may, if he wishes to vote 'Aye' on the one part and 'No' on the other not be embassassed by having to vote 'Aye' or 'No' on the whole of it,—

[Mr. Leggatt.]

—I must come to the conclusion that the motion before the house contains two propositions, and since strong objections have been made to the effect that these two propositions should not be considered together, it is my duty to divide them as follows:

● (2020)

And he did, and he called for separate votes on the question of the new flag or the Red Ensign.

I submit that we are again dealing with exactly the same situation in this House. Part of the reason for the ruling in 1964 on the flag debate dealt with the history of the debate, how it became emotionally charged and how people out in the country took stands pro and con. Therefore members of parliament were left trying to reflect in their own minds, represent their constituents and have a clear vote on the subject so that their constituents would not be confused as to where they stood in this place.

I submit that combining gun control and wiretapping in the same bill leaves us in exactly the same position as where we were in 1964. I ask hon. members to look at their mail. I ask them to consider how their constituents stand on these two very important and sometimes emotional issues. I question whether it is fair under British parliamentary practice that hon. members in this House should be asked to vote on such a combined question, leaving them in the ambiguous position of trying desperately to explain whether they were for or against. It is inconsistent to place these two things in the same bill, particularly in light of the history of the bill.

Mr. Speaker Macnaughton went on to say the following:

Therefore, unless there should be an appeal to the house from my decision, and my decision is not sustained, it is my intention to put the question on the first part of the motion as divided.

I suggest that the question of gun control should be severed from the bill and that Your Honour has full power under the rules to rule that on second reading of Bill C-51 the Chair can call the question on part one of the motion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), gun control, and then call a separate question on the remainder of the bill.

There is authority in the rules. Precedents have been set in English parliamentary practice, but I think it most important that common sense should prevail in these circumstances. The plain history of this legislation and the issues which have been debated across the country are such that common sense should also prevail in this House, and members of parliament should be given an opportunity to vote separately on these vital and important questions.

Mr. Speaker: Before going further, I should indicate to the hon. member and to others who want to participate in the discussion that the Chair would not have great difficulty, assuming that the cases were identical or very close to it, or if we were dealing with a resolution like the flag resolution which contained within its terms mutually contradictory or, if not contradictory, at least duplicate statements, so that the Chair could be persuaded that a member was put into the invidious position of having to vote for a resolution which contained two parts, wanting to vote in favour of one and against the other.

That reasoning is sound as far as it goes, but to my knowledge it has not been carried over to a resolution which simply gives second reading and reference to a committee of a bill which contains several parts, the theory being, first of all, that the motion is not in its own terms duplicate because the motion does one thing, although the bill may do several.

The second part of the reasoning against it is that the member has the opportunity in committee, presumably, to vote against or amend those parts which are distasteful to him, and similarly at the report stage to take some steps to bring the House to a vote with respect to those distasteful or disagreeable portions of the bill.

Therefore, the situations are quite different. However, it would be helpful if there were some extension of the flag resolution reasoning across to the second reading motion reasoning that we have traditionally followed, and if the hon. member has anything to add to what he has already said, I would be glad to hear him.

Mr. Leggatt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for inviting me to respond to your remarks. The point about the distinction between a resolution and a motion is, I submit, met by the principle contained within the original British parliamentary practice. The argument about this being a bill rather than a resolution is, I admit, a difficult one to face, but it still does not deal with the principle which has been enshrined in British parliamentary practice. I still say that the mere fact that it is a bill should not violate that fundamental principle, and if we need to set a precedent here and now, which Your Honour has full authority to do, and if we need to present for the first time this principle in this House dealing with a bill, it seems to me that we will go a long way toward improving the quality of this place. That is the first thing. I admit I could not find a precedent dealing with a bill specifically, but it seems to me that the principle is so well enshrined in parliamentary practice that Your Honour should apply it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on the last point Your Honour raised I have the same difficulty. I did the same search as the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt). I dropped my line over the same boat and came up with the same empty hook, as the hon. member described it. I confess that at the outset of my argument.

However, I think it is important to note that Bill C-51 does not deal merely with firearms control and electronic surveillance; it deals with dangerous offenders, custody, release of inmates and revisions to the Prisons and Reformatories Act. It deals not just with amendments to the Criminal Code of Canada but to other statutes as well.

With regard to the position of members of parliament and how they must deal with constituents and matters about which there might be conflicting opinions, I think the House should consider carefully what the hon. member for New Westminster has said. When a member has to vote aye on a bill when he really means nay, that has an effect on the business of the House. The practice of lumping bills together, which has developed in the Canadian House of Commons, has been a long one. It provokes hon. members to speak and to explain their positions to their constituents, which they might not otherwise have to do.

Whether the practice is legal is one thing, but I think the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) and his colleagues in the ministry ought to realize the effect this has upon private members in terms of the business of the House.

I have looked at some precedents regarding this practice. I would like to read into the record something which was not read into the record by the hon. member for New Westminster. Perhaps it was not read into the record because of the modesty and the shy and retiring nature of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Benjamin: Shy, but not retiring.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): In the Journals of the House of Commons for Tuesday, January 26, 1971, there is a reference to this argument being raised in connection with a bill dealing with the organization of the government. It reorganized about seven departments of government and seven statutes, some of which might appeal to some members of parliament and others which might not appeal to the same group and so on. We had this horrible mixture of conflicting approaches to a particular bill, at least in the mind of any one member who might be in favour of one thing and against another.

At page 284 of the Journals of January 26, 1971, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is quoted as saying:

"This procedure places the Members of the House in the situation of being faced with a resolution which deals with eight different matters. Naturally there are eight different principles involved under ordinary circumstances. As far as I can see from casual examination, most of these things are matters which perhaps everyone in the committee would agree with. When we hear more about them, that may not be so. In any event, it might very well be that amongst those eight amendments is one with which we would disagree violently and therefore feel called upon to vote against the resolution or particularly, after we have the bill and have the information, to vote against the bill because of that one matter."

It really puts this parliament in an invidious position.

I have examined the precedents referred to in this particular extract from the Journals—they go back a long way—and I regret to say that the precedent of this House seems to be that this practice is "acceptable" in the parliamentary sense. I think the best you can say about the practice is that it is legal. In terms of the operation of this House it is not reprehensible, it is not immoral, but it is certainly bad.

Mr. Ellis: It is cunning.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If I had a suspicious mind I would be tempted to adopt the words of the deputy opposition whip, that it smacks of some form of cunning in the approach to the legislative process.

I hope that representations will be made by those in charge of drafting legislation to the lions in the Department of Justice that they ought to carefully consider what they are doing, (a) to the legislative process in the House of Commons, and (b) to the understanding of the legislative process by the general public.

In respect of this bill the general public deluged us with representations pertaining to firearms—and they may do so again—but generally ignored the equally important provisions on electronic surveillance, dangerous offenders, and custody and release of inmates. I dare say members would not be stoop shouldered from the weight of correspondence received in regard to the rest of the legislation. I think this practice is so bad that it misrepresents to the public the intent and purpose of parliament. If parliament is to remain relevant, if the actions of members of parliament are to be understood, and if members are to be held accountable, then I think this practice ought not to be followed.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that omnibus bills do nothing but prolong debate in the House. In this day and age of communications being almost instant between constituents and members of parliament, the member has somehow to explain himself and the position he takes. The only way he can do that logically is to answer the mail he receives which comes from a few people who question his actions, or else the only place he can do it is in this House where it is put on the record.

We are dealing with the whole attitude of the public toward parliament. A line has to be drawn somewhere and a study made of what is happening. It may be that in your summation of the position, and in your findings with respect to the arguments put to you, that you can commence the drawing of the line between what is appropriate for an omnibus bill and what is not appropriate. It may be that you do not feel you can do it here, but I hope you can. It is important that the House of Commons start—and the public will follow in terms of knowledge—to understand that there is a limit to the use of the omnibus bill, the lumping together of all kinds of things that may be related but often may not be related at all. That leads to such confusion that only a Philadelphia lawyer could understand the bill to begin with, and members of parliament have difficulty in establishing clearly and succinctly for the public what their position is, and ensuring that the positions taken in the House are not misconstrued.

I am not going to repeat the precedents. I think the hon. member for New Westminster has done that. I must say in conclusion, however, that if the practice is to be found legal in the sense that governments can have all they want with respect to omnibus bills, then this practice, which is continuing and growing, borders on the irresponsible. It could very well bring this House into disrepute and make the life of members, in terms of how they vote, untenable and, worst of all, unexplainable.

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at length on this matter. I listened with a lot of interest to the hon. member for New Westminister (Mr. Leggatt) and the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). If I did understand the argument of the hon. member for New Westminster, he suggested that the procedure adopted in this case by the government in relation to Bill C-51 was clearly within the rules of the House but he was objecting on the grounds of the privileges of the House. As to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, in his inimitable and usual style he said he was confused—which did not surprise government members—and did not understand the legislation put forward by the government. In brief, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton nevertheless clearly stated, at least it would seem, that this practice was legal and sanctioned by the customs of this House, and in fact we all know that the practice of introducing omnibus bills in the House is not a recent one, particularly in relation to the Criminal Code to which the hon. member for New Westminster referred, who did try to limit his remarks to the amendments in Bill C-51 dealing with the control of firearms and the amendments dealing with wire-tapping.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

So, Mr. Speaker, it is not a new area in which the practice is to have omnibus bills, and the reason for that is quite simple: the Criminal Code, as we all know, includes a great variety of provisions on a great variety of subjects. If one wanted to push the argument of my hon. colleague to the extreme a separate bill would have to be introduced every time we want to touch any section of the Criminal Code if the amendments did not all deal with the same subjects.

I will give a few examples, Mr. Speaker, with respect to omnibus bills. First, in 1969, the government introduced Bill C-150 amending the Criminal Code with respect to firearms, lotteries, abortions and alcohol abuse. In 1975, we had Bill C-71 which also included a whole series of provisions about summary conviction, rape, appeal procedures and release on bail. Moreover it is our usual practice not only in criminal matters but also quite frequent in non criminal matters to use the same procedure, as was done during this session for Bills C-19, C-27, C-48 and C-52.

However, I would like to say a few words in answer to the point raised by the hon. member for New Westminster who said that hon. members would not have the opportunity to vote on each provision itself, but would have to vote on the provisions taken as a whole. On this point, I would only refer hon. members to two paragraphs of the debate of January, 26, 1971 when your predecessor had to make a decision on an issue which was not identical but similar matter. I quote from page 2768 of Hansard for January 26, 1971:

● (2040)

[English]

Perhaps hon. members might have wanted to say the same thing about the bill now before the House. There is no question, without going further into the details, that this is a long established practice. We have had this type of omnibus bill before the House on many occasions.

[Translation]

Of course the Chair goes on and says a little further:

[English]

The House must note that there is a third reading stage of a bill. When a bill comes to the House for third reading—

[Translation]

And I realize the procedure has changed somewhat since then.

[English]

—there is not one clause or one part of the bill that cannot be brought into question by way of an amendment proposing that the particular clause or section be referred back to committee. I think this gives every hon. member an opportunity to vote either for or against, or to express his views in the House either for or against, a particular clause of the bill, and to do so by way of a recorded vote. Accordingly there still is a measure of protection afforded hon. members.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, I would say there must be a number of precedents particularly in matters concerning criminal law. Moreover, we do find a single theme throughout this bill since its real purpose is to offer Canadian society better protection against violent offenders and other criminals.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, as we can see in the quotation I just made from the official report, hon. members will have the opportunity in committee and at the third reading stage to move an amendments and to vote for or against the proposals of the bill. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the bill has been proposed according to the Standing Orders of the House. There is no abuse of the privileges of hon. members of the House.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I recognize that the question you must decide is not an easy one, and I also recognize the validity of the points already raised by the Chair in response to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt). However, one or two other things can be said, to which I hope Your Honour will give consideration.

First, I suggest that the argument just now advanced by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox), which was similar to the point Your Honour made about second reading, does meet the point. The right, after second reading, either in committee of the whole or in a standing committee to vote against some clause of the bill, does not alter the fact that such a vote is separate and distinct from a vote on second reading. On the second reading vote, the hon. member has only one vote to cast on the whole bill and all that is in it. The same applies at third reading.

The Solicitor General suggested that at third reading a member could move an amendment to refer the bill back to committee for the consideration of any clause thereof, and thus put his position on record with respect to any such clause. But on the assumption that all such amendments are defeated, we are left with the third reading vote on the bill. The member casts one vote for or against all the propositions contained in the bill, for the individual member has only one vote. So I think that side of the argument is not cut and dried.

However, since Your Honour is responsible for procedure you must decide whether this argument applies to the bill in the same way as it applied to a resolution. I should like to read a few sentences from May's 19th edition, at page 380. I have read the same things in earlier editions, and they are also to be found somewhere in Beauchesne. May says:

The ancient rule that when a complicated question is proposed to the House, the House may order such question to be divided, has been variously interpreted at different periods. Originally the division of such a question appears to have required an order of the House, and in 1770 a motion 'That it is the rule of this House, that a complicated question which prevents any member from giving his free assent or dissent to any part thereof ought, if required, to be divided,' was negatived on a division . . . As late as 1883—

We are coming to modern times:

—it was generally held that an individual member had no right to insist upon the division of a complicated question. In 1888, however, the Speaker ruled that two propositions which were then before the House in one motion could be taken separately if any member—

In other words, any one member:

—objected to their being taken together . . .

That was the ruling of 1888. I am reading from May's 19th edition, the latest edition.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It still has the dust covers on it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes. I continue:

. . . Although this ruling does not appear to have been based on any previous decision, it has since remained unchallenged. A complicated question can, however, only be divided if each part is capable of standing on its own.

The practice at present seems to be clear. At one time it was done by a vote. Then, at one point the Speaker seemed to make the decision. Then he said that a member cannot require the splitting of a proposition. Finally he said that if one member wants a division because of a complicated question, division of the proposal into its separate parts has to take place.

Having said all this and having mentioned ancient dates, may I point out that there is a footnote (a) which applies to the sentence ending "it has since remained unchallenged." That footnote (a) at the bottom of the page, in print so tiny I can hardly read it, seems to refer to things which have happened as late as 1968 and 1969. There is a reference to page 1313 concerning amendments to bills.

At Westminster the practice has become established. May contains such a reference with respect to bills. I know that in our records there is no case of the Speaker ordering a bill to be split because of two different propositions contained in that bill, but there is Mr. Speaker Macnaughton's ruling of 1964, when, as my hon. friend said, I raised a point of order, that the flag motion ought to be split.

There are also precedents that are relevant or parallel. They have arisen since Your Honour took the Chair. I say this since on two or three or occasions Your Honour has ordered changes in bills. There was that famous bill I always like to mention about the pay of members of parliament which was amended a certain way in committee, with the approval of the government. Your Honour ordered that bill to be sent back. Then we had one or two supply bills where, because the rules had not been adhered to, Your Honour ordered changes. Your Honour has ordered things like that to be done. I therefore suggest that the question of whether Your Honour has the right to look at a bill and order that something ought to be done to it has been established by no less distinguished a person than the present occupant of the chair.

If you couple that with the decision of Mr. Speaker Macnaughton, a decision the government did not like because it seemed to challenge its right to put down any motion it wanted, the result, I suggest, is that there seems to be support for the proposition, which is still in vogue at Westminster and which May's 19th edition refers to, that no member, not even one, should be asked to vote on a question which is so complicated that, in order to say yes to something he likes in the bill, he must also say yes to something he does not like in it, and vice-versa. I think, therefore, that Your Honour having made these other decisions about bills being contrary to the rules and privileges of the House, you should consider very carefully whether this bill with these two completely disparate subjects in it does not contravene our rights and privileges, in which case Your Honour ought to order, or at least suggest, that it be split so that there can be two separate bills enabling hon. members to vote on the different subjects.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, as an amateur in this field I hesitate to rise, but having long established my amateur standing I should like to say one or two words on this point of order as an amateur backbencher or as a backbencher who is an amateur.

My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre said this was a mixture of complicated questions. The hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) noted that the bill seeks to combine measures dealing with wire tapping, gun control, the customs tariff, the Parole Act, the Penitentiaries Act, and the Prisons and Reformatories Act. I do not know how the customs tariff got in the middle there, but it is a mixture of complicated questions, as my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre said.

As I understand it, the House considers, on second reading, the principle of the measure before it. The vote on second reading is directed to the principle involved. I gather, however, that members are now being asked to vote for or against two measures in particular which, in principle, are entirely different.

In relation to gun control it seems to me we are dealing with the question of whether citizens may own and bear arms and, if so, under what conditions, whereas the provisions related to wire tapping concern civil rights and civil liberties in terms of the invasion of privacy, watching and besetting, and so on. Some members may agree with the proposals concerning gun control while disagreeing with the way in which citizens rights are dealt with in the area of wire tapping and the ensurance of privacy. On the other hand, certain members may disagree with the principle advanced with respect to gun control measures while agreeing with that part of the bill which involves the rights of citizens with respect to privacy.

It seems to me we are being asked to vote on two quite opposite principles. One has to do with the privileges of citizens, and the other concerns the fundamental rights of citizens. I suspect that opinions in the House on these two measures vary a great deal, to say nothing of what they might be about the other five portions of the bill. I hope Your Honour will allow members to vote separately at least on the principles of the two major items to which I have referred, namely, gun control and wire tapping. It seems to me there is such a wide difference between the principles involved in these two measures that it is unfair to ask us to vote "all or nothing" on second reading.

If I may add to what my hon. friend said, I should like to touch on another aspect—it occurred to me when the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) mentioned third reading. No matter what happens to amendments in committee we can still be faced with voting "all or nothing" on third reading. Surely that is not good enough. I myself would be agreeable to the bill being divided into seven parts, although I admit there may be grounds for combining three or four into one, since they affect only the privileges of our citizens. If people are dangerous offenders, then they obviously lost some of the rights the rest of us enjoy when they became dangerous offenders. Others lost some of their rights under the provisions of the Parole Act or under the other acts to which the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton referred. This reinforces my main argument. To ask hon. members to vote "all or nothing" on a matter which affects the privileges of citizens in conjunction with a principle which affects the rights of citizens is unacceptable, because the two principles are incompatible. I hope Your Honour will rule that the bill should be separated, at least in the areas of gun control and wire tapping, so that we may vote on these issues separately.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to belabour the points which have been made in the course of this discussion. I think it has been an interesting and worth-while discussion about an important point. I simply wish to underline two considerations which have been advanced. One, of course, is the distinction which Your Honour has drawn between the rules relating to resolutions and the rules relating to legislation. This is a valid distinction and one which serves to support our proceeding with Bill C-51 as it presently stands. Moreover, it tends to minimize the value of the precedents which have been cited to support the argument put forward by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) and others.

Further, I should like to underline the suggestion made by the House leader for the official opposition who indicated that this approach to legislation is legal and not improper, and that while he might wish to complain about omnibus bills in specific cases the practice was an acceptable one and well established and recognized under our rules.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Not acceptable, but recognized.

Mr. Goodale: I would want to check that phrase. I believe the word "acceptable" was used, but I shall stand to be corrected when I see Hansard tomorrow.

What members of the NDP are complaining is the complexity of legislation. This is a problem which faces all members of the House. It is unfortunate, but we live in a complex and complicated world—

Mr. Benjamin: But why make it worse?

Mr. Goodale: Sometimes parliament must respond accordingly. I suggest that legislation in this day and age sometimes must fall into the realm of things that are complicated. Our parliamentary process, well established as it is through years of tradition, as a "total process" is designed to cope with this complexity. As the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) has pointed out, we follow a very long, careful and reasoned deliberative process when dealing with legislation. This is a process which is distinctly different from the process which is designed to deal with resolutions in the House of Commons; if I may use shorthand, that is a shorter and much simpler process.

In dealing with legislation, the process that this House goes through, I think we would all agree, is time consuming, for a reason which basically allows members of the House to examine legislation very carefully and to make sure that their views and opinions are put on the record. We have the second reading stage where matters of principle are considered; we have the committee stage where legislation is considered clause by clause and votes are taken clause by clause; we have the report stage where it is possible again for consideration to be given to legislation clause by clause; and finally we have third reading debate, where positions can once again be stated. All of that must take place before making a final decision and taking a vote of the House. That is the procedure that must be followed by the House of Commons when it deals with legislation.

That procedure is distinctly different from the process and the steps involved in dealing with resolutions. That is one of the reasons why there may well be the distinction, to which Your Honour referred earlier this evening. A member might be in a position to complain about inconsistent or distinctly different parts of a resolution and to argue that those parts be separated. I do not think that argument can be valid or can stand in the case of legislation, as opposed to a resolution, for a number of reasons, one reason being the different process which this House itself follows in dealing with these two distinctly different things. The system, rules, and procedures of this institution already guard against the matter complained of tonight because of the step by step deliberative process of the House of Commons when dealing with legislation; and it was admitted earlier this evening by the hon. member for New Westminster that the bill itself is in fact within the rules of the House of Commons.

The propriety of omnibus bills is clearly established, and I think is accepted in our practices and our precedents. On that basis I think the objections which have been raised by the hon. member for New Westminster cannot stand, and that it is quite proper and within our practices and privileges to continue with Bill C-51 as it stands.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for New Westminster seeking to clarify a matter?

Mr. Leggatt: Yes, Mr. Speaker. What I wish to clarify is this. Your Honour put two propositions to me at the conclusion of my remarks. One had to do with the difference between a resolution and a bill. The second proposition you put to me was with regard to the opportunity that a member might have following second reading vote to clarify the situation either in committee or at third reading. In answer to the second reservation which Your Honour may have about this question, in order to clarify one's position in committee there would have to be 264 members on the committee.

The present procedure is that it is not the committee of the whole which will consider this bill, which means that members will not have the opportunity to explain in a procedural way the position that they would take in principle on this particular piece of legislation. In other words, Mr. Speaker, they are locked into the same inconsistency that exists on second reading and on third reading, and thus the procedure of this House does not resolve the dilemma that members of parliament are faced with in terms of the innate inconsistency that exists in the motion before the House.

The second question that was raised by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) was whether members were somewhat confused. It is not the members who are confused; it is the attempt of members to stop confusion of the public and to allow the public to be properly informed about what actually happens in this House in terms of the votes and proceedings. I submit Your Honour has ample authority under the terms of British precedents to establish a very worth-while precedent here in giving members the opportunity of voting separately on a bill which has such a clear inconsistency in principle. It is impossible to vote one way only on the principle of the bill before the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A point of order having been raised by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) earlier in the day, it was agreed that at a convenient time, which turned out to be at eight o'clock this evening, time would be taken to hear argument on both sides. That has now been done, and it has interrupted the House's consideration of another matter to which we will now return.

I should indicate, as would be expected, that on a matter of some importance I will take some time to consider the argument, to examine the precedents carefully, and attempt to rule on the matter before the bill is again before the House. The matter which was under discussion when private members' hour was called at five o'clock this afternoon was, I believe, Bill C-49, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan. If I understand correctly, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) had the floor.

Canada Pension Plan

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND DEFINITIONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) that Bill C-49, to amend the Canada Pension Plan, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the debate on the second reading of Bill C-49 was interrupted at five o'clock, I had indicated our readiness to support the bill because it takes two very timid steps in the right direction. The direction, of course, is to recognize the place of women who work in the home. My contention is that that place should be fully recognized, not just partially as is proposed by this bill.

We accept the splitting of credits of the two spouses for Canada Pension Plan purposes when there is marriage breakdown, and we accept the idea that a woman—or a man, but in most cases it is a woman—who stays home from work to raise children should not be penalized in terms of her Canada Pension Plan benefits because of that activity. I have already suggested that I think there is a better, more universal way to provide the equivalent of Canada Pension Plan benefits for those who have years when they do not contribute. I need not spell that out further tonight because I indicated the idea I had in mind when I spoke this afternoon, and I hope the minister and his department will give serious consideration to it. If it works out, as so often happens, that it takes a few years, five or ten, to put something like that into effect, I trust that those who are here today will remember when they first heard the idea proposed.

When debate was interrupted at five o'clock, I was proceeding to say a few things in reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). He had taken offence at the reference in the remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. McRae) to the non-concurrence of the government of Ontario in the proposed amendment which would allow mothers to stay home to raise their children and not lose their pension credits. The defence the hon. member for Hamilton West put up was that Ontario wants to look at the whole question of pensions and pension funding. My good friend from Hamilton launched into broad, general statements to the effect that the whole nation is concerned about what is happening to our pension plans, that everybody wants to get these things sorted out, and so on.

I suggest that the only people who are concerned in the terms indicated by the hon. member for Hamilton West are those who make money out of pension plans—the insurance companies, the Colin Browns, the people who support Geoffrey Calvert, those who see pension plans as a means of making money. Most of us see pension plans as a way of determining that the older people in our society will get their share of the wealth that society produces in any decade or in any year.

I know of no subject that is confused by figures so much as is the question of the funding of pension plans. When persons are pensioners and live on those pensions, they are not living on food, clothing and services that they saved when they were working. They are living on food, clothing and services that are being produced right then. What pension plans, pension accounts, pension figures and all the rest of it do is simply to arrive at a calculation as to how much a person shall get in his retirement years. These opponents of indexing are telling us that a few years down the road there will be pensions twice as much as are being paid now, and that that will break the system. When I came to this place, the old age pension was $20 a month.

Mr. Abbott: That was the nineteenth century, though.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No, it was in this century.

An hon. Member: Just barely. Anyway, it was a Liberal government which introduced old age pensions.

An hon. Member: It was the minister's father.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Oh no! But leave his dad alone because his dad is on a judge's pension.

If at that time I had suggested a pension of $100 a month or $140 a month, as it is now, members of that day would have said that would break the economy. We have now got more than $140 as the basic pension paid to everyone who is 65 years of age and over, and I submit we have a much better economy than we had then.

When I came here, the average wages for industrial workers were in the $2,000 to $3,000 bracket. If anyone had said then that 30-odd years later the average was going to be around $10,000 or $12,000 a year, these same people would have said that that would break the economy.

When I came here, members of parliament were paid $4,000 a year and no expense allowance. If anyone had said then that 30-odd years later we would be getting in pay and allowances over $36,000 a year—nine times as much—persons would have said then that that would break the economy.

Mr. Speaker, 30 years from now these figures are going to be ancient history. Wages are going to be higher; probably the indemnities of members of parliament, despite my opposition, are going to be higher; and pensions are going to be higher. I just hope that they will be higher in the same proportion. That is what the indexing of pensions is all about—making sure that as other incomes go up the share of the wealth we produce, which is allocated to senior citizens, will also go up. To say we cannot afford it or to say that it will break the system is not to pay any attention to the realities of the pension situation.

If we can afford today to devote a certain portion of the goods and services that are produced in this decade to the education of children, to family allowances, a certain portion to health and a certain portion to the retirement of senior citizens, we can do it ten years from now or 20 years from now or 30 years from now, even if that portion is in many more dollars. If wages have doubled and if costs have doubled, I hope that pensions will have doubled as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What seems to bother the Colin Browns and the Geoffrey Calverts is that indexing seems to guarantee that the pensioners will continue to get a share of the wealth produced that is commensurate with the capacity of society at that day. Let us not be confused by these figures or by these assertions that we will go broke. Let us not be confused by those who say we are putting an unnecessary burden on our children and our grandchildren. We are simply saying that tomorrow's generation will be human beings, as we are, and will do the same thing that this generation is doing. We will decide what portion of the wealth we produce is to go to those who are working, what portion is to go to the children, and what portion is to go to our older people.

I am immensely proud of the progress we have made in this field since the day I came here, which the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Abbott) thought was in the last century. We have come a long way from that $20 a month at age 70 with a means test. One of the tremendous improvements we have made is the Canada Pension Plan itself which, incidentally, is indexed. It is indexed while people are contributing to it on the basis of the wage index, and it is indexed after retirement on the basis of the Consumer Price Index. For a while there was a limit of 2 per cent per year, and then we accepted the proposition that it should be equal to the actual rise in the Consumer Price Index. It is a good scheme, and I see the day coming when it will have to be enlarged. Instead of just paying a pension of 25 per cent of the average of one's last three years, it will have to pay 40 per cent, 50 per cent or even more. I see this development taking the control of pensions away from those who sell pensions for benefit and cannot meet the need for all pensions to be indexed. I see the development bringing more of the security of our older people under the responsibility of the people as a whole in a greatly increased old age security pension and an improvement in the Canada Pension Plan itself.

To suggest that the Ontario government is saying no to this slight improvement for women, because it wants to take a look at the whole question of the funding of the Canada Pension Plan and all the rest, is a terribly backward step. No one has been more critical than I have of the slowness of the government across the way. The fact of the matter is that in the old age security system that we have built up, based on universality up to a point, and in the other stage—the Canada Pension Plan we have established—we have done well. I do not want to see it held back by the Colin Browns, the Geoffrey Calverts and the Ontario government who say we must not take even this little step without checking the whole pension system. It is a good scheme we have got. I think it is worthy of a lot better step forward than we are shown in this bill that is before us tonight.

To get back to the bill itself, as I said this afternoon when I began, it is like a good many bills we have to consider. It does not go far enough, but because it goes in the right direction we support it. I hope, as a member of this House, to see the day when we will establish women's rights on the basis of absolute equality. It is not good enough to say to the women of this country, "The kinds of pensions you will get will depend upon the man you have got or on your attachment to a male." Women should stand on their own feet. One of the ways to make that a reality is to say to the women who stayed in the home and made that a career that they are entitled to a pension equivalent to the Canada Pension Plan, just as much as the women who go out and work in industry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Let us not have the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare standing up, as he did this afternoon, to say that this is a major step forward. It is only a slight step forward. Because of that, I shall vote for it. But I hope to see the day, as a member of this House, when we go all the way and accord to women pension rights that are equal across the board—rights in their own stead. Only then will there be pension equality between men and women.

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, in order to give an unbiassed opinion on Bill C-49, as a preliminary comment and for the enlightenment of Hansard readers, allow me first to quote the beginning of the departmental press release.

Today in the House of Commons the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Mr. Marc Lalonde, has introduced amendments to the Canada Pension Plan the purpose of which is to recognize the role of working parents at home.

Those important changes were discussed during the federal-provincial review on social security which ended in June 1976 and were stated in the last Speech from the Throne.

The two main amendments are meant to provide some recognition and a measure of financial security to working spouses at home while keeping the same basic provisions of the plan: contributory, compulsory and related to incomes.

The first of the amendments will enable the equal splitting of CPP benefits acquired during the marriage between the husband and wife in case of divorce or annulment.

Pension credits would be equally divided, regardless of the amount of direct contributions paid by the husband or wife.

As a result, the assets accumulated during the marriage years would be divided equally when the marriage is dissolved.

Spouses having never worked outside the home and therefore having never contributed directly to the Canada Pension Plan, as well as those who contributed only for a short period of time, would be entitled to share the pension credits acquired by the husband or wife, by their contributions to the plan.

The division of credits acquired during the marriage years since the establishment of the plan in 1966 would be done on demand by either spouse within the three years following the marriage dissolution.

Further, the marriage would have to be dissolved after the amendment has come into force and the marriage would have lasted three years. The spouses would have lived together for at least three consecutive years.

I am going to dwell for a while on this amendment, for I should not have enough time to deal with all the other aspects of this bill.

I want to try to get to the gist of it so that Canadians will not be easily gulled by a presentation which is ambiguous, to say the least. The title of this bill inspires a lot more trust than its detailed reading. I would have hoped that this bill would bridge the gap between the woman working inside her home and the woman working outside. It is as though a mother with a family of two, three, four or even five children to rear is not considered as a working person on the labour market, not only by the Department of National Health and Welfare, but by all federal agencies, including the Department of Manpower and Immigration. Although it is a ridiculous situation, the working mother who must leave her job to care for her children is no longer considered an active worker and cannot receive unemployment insurance benefits. This is the sort of social mistake for which the authorities are responsible, without even knowing it. This is such a time honoured notion that, where we inquire with utmost simplicity whether a mother is working, we are told as stupidly as possible: No, she does not work. That is the answer because she does not work outside the home.

Today the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) introduces a bill which supposedly amends the Canada Pension Plan. Socially, it does not change a thing. Financially, it does not give a cent, it simply says to the husband or wife: From now on, the contribution shall be split in two, one part for you and the other for your spouse. That is what is called a reform in Bill C-49, and what is called the splitting of pension credits.

As a matter of fact, we can read the following in the statement released by the department:

> Objectives: The clause concerning the splitting of pension credits upon termination of the marriage aims at guaranteeing to the "spouse at home" an equitable part of the assets acquired during the union. That provision provides therefore, when divorce or annulment of the marriage occurs, some measure of financial security and recognition to the "spouse at home" and the dependent children.
> The amendments would permit the splitting, upon marriage breakdown, of the CPP pension credits earned by both spouses during their marriage, provided:
> (a) that the marriage lasted at least three years and that the spouses lived together during at least three consecutive years;
> (b) that a request for the splitting of the pension credits be submitted less than three years after the divorce or the annulment; and that
> (c) the marriage is dissolved after the amendment comes into force.

Thus, the bill considers only cases of divorce or annulment.

But what does it really do? It imposes a reduction to the spouse who was working outside the house in order to give something back to the other. That is all the minister does. If both spouses continue to live together till death, they will only enjoy the pension derived from the contbutions paid by the one who worked outside.

In my opinion, I would have preferred that the housewife raising her family at home get the same benefits as those provided to the woman with no family working outside. Indeed, when both spouses work outside, they both contribute to the plan and both have their Canada Pension Plan, or Quebec Pension Plan for those living in Quebec.

Had the government wanted to do justice to the spouse at home, they would have given some portion of the pension credits to the housewife, to the spouse staying at home—as the previous speaker said a moment ago—so that the spouse at home or the mother of a family raising her children be considered absolutely like a worker within the labour force of Canada. If there is someone who works hard for her country, it surely is the mother of a family! Yet, all governments have totally forgotten her till now. So I want to tell the minister that he has made a very little step ahead towards greater social justice.

In addition, this little step does not cost him any money because the working spouse will be the one to support its consequences. That is why I ask the minister to present an amendment during the committee stage to give justice to the housewife. We often hear, for instance, that a minister cannot amend such or such a bill because of its financial impact. The minister cannot refuse to amend his bill on that ground because I have already pointed out that it would not have any financial consequences.

Finally, we have another evidence of that in the release we have received:

> If the above conditions are complied with, pension credits of the spouses would be added and shared equally among them from the period beginning at the most recent of the following two dates: the first year of cohabitation or the year 1966 until the last year of cohabitation. For technical reasons, the sharing would apply for the first full year of cohabitation as well as the full year preceeding the last year of common life. If there have been periods of separation during the marriage, periods giving right to pension credit sharing could be affected.
> Moreover, pension credits would not be shared for the whole period in which one of the two spouses has not been entitled to contribute to the plan, namely when he was under eighteen or when he was seventy or over or when he was drawing disability allowance or CPP benefits. Furthermore there would be no credit sharing for the whole year in which the sum of the pensions credits of the spouses does not exceed twice the amount of the basic exemption for the year, namely twice $900 in 1977.
> Where one of the spouses or both are drawing disability allowance or CPP benefits when CPP credits are being shared, . . .

. . . or Quebec Pension Plan for Quebec . . .

> . . . the benefits would be established at a new level according to the pension credits which are being shared. The adjusted amount would become payable the month following the application for sharing. Furthermore, when one of the spouses becomes eligible for CPP benefits, after the sharing of the pension credits, the current provisions concerning retroactive payment of the present legislation would apply.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, I want to say how disappointed I am about the fact that the department always refuses to give up a few dollars in order to set up a more equitable social justice. We keep on reasoning and acting according to the money factor, instead of introducing renewed policies aimed at human capital. That is why people are so dissatisfied nowadays.

Once more, I appeal to the minister and all members of the standing committee of the House, so that they bring forward amendments and make of this bill an example of what the government can do, if such is its intention, on the matter of real social reform. I will vote of course in such a way that the bill goes to committee, because I hope my remarks will be seriously taken into account, so that for a change we steer towards a real social reform that will give justice to all our courageous family mothers.

● (2130)

[English]

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, speaking on this bill to amend the Canada Pension Plan Act gives us an opportunity to discuss not only these amendments but the state of pensions in Canada, both private and public. It is no secret that the state of pension plans is giving great concern to many Canadians who, in the past 30 or 40 years, have invested in certificates, life insurance policies, trust companies and so on. They are viewing with alarm the fact that their contributions are being wiped out by inflation. In the last budget we find the proposed tax on life insurance policies which would amount to a virtual confiscation through the tax system of what have been savings on pensions earned long ago. It has become increasingly apparent as time goes on that savings on private pension plans are virtually useless in many instances.

There are two major amendments in this bill. The first one is the splitting of the CPP earned during marriage. On divorce or annulment the total pension credit would be divided equally, regardless of the amount of contributions paid by husband and wife. Spouses who have never worked outside the home, as well as those who have contributed for a short time only, would be able to share the pension credits accrued through the CPP contributions made by the husband or wife. As I understand it, the application by either within three years of marriage dissolution would bring about the splitting. The marriage would have to be dissolved, and after three years they would get their share, but before the dissolution they would have had to be married for three consecutive years. This would apply if the amendment were to pass. This pension aspect seems to have the support of all the provinces as well as of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. It was extensively discussed at the federal-provincial ministers' conference on June 1 and 2 of 1976. It gives recognition to the wife who does not go out to work.

The proposal was that pension credits earned by spouses during a marriage would be divided equally between spouses on marriage dissolution. This would provide some financial security for the spouse who has remained at home as she would have immediate protection against disability, and also benefits for children, should the other parent die. Furthermore, she would be given some retirement benefits under CPP.

Under this legislation it would appear as if both partners had been contributing equally to the estate. I believe that an analysis would show that the splitting of credits would affect only a relatively small portion of contributors. Under the present legislation a series of exceptions would develop. These exceptions would complicate the plan further as they would retroactively alter accumulated pension credits. Situations would arise where individuals would move between split and unsplit pension credit circumstances. The effect of splitting pension credits would be greatest on single wage earning families. The CPP retirement income would become available in two stages, according to the ages of the wage earner and the non-working spouse, and would reduce the dollar value of the wage earner's benefits. Also, disability benefits would increase on the death or disability of the non-working spouse. However, in the case where both marriage partners earn an income, the splitting of the pension credit would not be so great.

There are other problems that might arise. In the case of one partner receiving CPP disability retirement pension, retroactive splitting would reduce the recipient's benefits. Also, there might be a conflict with the provision which states that a person cannot be both a receiver and a contributor to a retirement or a disability fund at the same time. How this will affect disability should be reviewed. There is also the problem of low income families. Will retroactive splitting result in a loss of coverage that has been paid for because the level of each partner after splitting may be below the plan's basic exemption for a year? Again, retroactivity may involve administratively complex calculations since long periods may have to be recalculated. Also, what about the implications of private pension plans which are often meshed with CPP and old age security?

Is the definition of marriage dissolution restricted to legally terminated marriages, which excludes those people who are deserted, separated or living common law? In view of the fact that divorce is more often the privilege of the well to do, this will work further hardship on the low income group. Furthermore, how will the authorities who administer the CPP be informed of the breakdown of the marriage? These are some of the problems in the bill to which we will have to address ourselves.

The second major amendment has to do with those who leave the labour force to raise young children. The provision helps them guard against the deterioration of their CPP benefits during periods of low or no earning in the child raising years. Contributors would be able to drop out from the labour force for certain periods when they were raising their children and include these years when calculating their lifetime average earnings for benefit purposes. Since this clause is applicable back to January 1, 1966, it has major implications in principle.

This drop-out provision raises a question about whether the CPP is an insurance fund or a welfare fund. In fact, raising children and contributing to the CPP emphasizes the welfare aspect of the plan. One may well ask whether the CPP disregards those who may have had to drop out because of illness or some such thing. When the CPP was introduced, it was introduced as basic insurance, and this change is not in keeping with the original principle of the plan. It was a contributory plan based on actual years worked. For these women the CPP cannot be an earnings related plan. There may be some difficulty in recognizing the idea that the work of housewives is valid in an earnings related plan.

Over the years the basic orientation has been to a wage earner, and the plan has been tied to the earnings of the participant in terms of coverage, contributions, and benefits. Furthermore, as the drop out provision has considerable exemptions, it raises further complications. There is no coverage or protection for a spouse at home if she has never worked, if she worked only for a few years or if she had to leave the labour force to care for a disabled child or parent.

This drop out clause provides a subsidy without contribution, and as such moves towards social assistance rather than the insurance intent of the CPP. Are mothers who remain at home to care for a disabled parent or child entitled to less subsidy? If there is a principle of social justice in this area, should we limit this subsidy to housewives who remain at home to care for children and then return to the work force? Certain inequities and subsidization will result.

It seems likely that there would be a transfer of benefit from low income contributors to high income contributors because the plan is not fully funded, and low income families will not likely be able to take advantage of the drop out provision. For instance, a woman who works ten years out of a possible 40 is not presently entitled to one quarter of the full possible pension. Now, however, if she was raising children for ten years and was eligible for 20 years drop out, her pension would be half of her full possible pension. She would receive double pension without any extra contributions. This subsidization may be for those mothers who work at lower average incomes because they are not likely to stay home to look after children but have to get into the labour market.

It seems that inequity could be created between those who could afford to drop out and those who could not, the more well to do being the beneficiaries. This bill seems to create inequities between and among women. These could be explained by government actuaries.

Then there is a very basic problem. What is the role of the CPP, provincial financing, and the method of funding the CPP? I understand that Quebec government actuaries claim the drop out provision will increase total pension pay-outs by 4 per cent in the next 50 years. This estimate could be erroneous if the behaviour patterns of women change after the institution of the provision and, like unemployment insurance, it seems very likely that people would take advantage of these changes.

By 1982 pay-outs from the CPP will exceed outstanding provincial loans and interest charges. If present contribution rates do not go up, the provinces will have to pay at least a portion of their annual interest on their loans. By the year 2000 all loans will be repaid, and the pension will become a pay as you go operation. This is certainly an area which needs extensive discussion. At the moment current contributors are paying for the pensions of those who are now retired, and the degree of individual subsidization will increase as the plan matures.

Currently retired persons receive an abnormally high rate of subsidy, and as modifications are made to the CPP, these will tend to be passed on to future pensioners. The CPP is underfunded at the present, so it will enventually become exhausted.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

There is also the problem of financial burden which can be placed on future generations, and there is a basic problem of the orientation of social insurance programs. In the United States social security system the situation has progressively improved. It has been extended over the past decade, but without appropriate adjustments at the contributory level. Therefore it is good to have a discussion about the role of the CPP. Is it a contributory insurance scheme? Is it an appropriate mechanism for providing something for spouses? Should we be doing it this way or some other way?

The second question relates to the orientation of the CPP, its social aspects and its insurance principle. The introduction of these amendments represents a further departure from the insurance principle.

A Globe and Mail article on January 21, 1977, had this to say about the CPP:

> The Canada Pension Plan is supposed to provide retired workers with security. Instead, in its present form, it could dupe them into insecurity, rob their children and reduce the ability of Canada to produce the goods and services that are needed by all Canadians.

Mr. McKeough told the Canadian Pension Conference to consider some of the dangers of the CPP and some means of correcting them. He pointed out that the CPP is only half funded by contributions. This means that those who are working are supporting those who have retired. Canada had a baby boom followed by a sharp reduction in the birth rate. There is no way that this small number of workers can support large numbers of pensioners. They may well feel it impossible to finance them. The Globe and Mail article went on to say the following:

> There are other problems arising from this redistribution of income. Workers, feeling that CPP will provide for their basic needs in retirement, don't save as much. Instead they spend, and the pensioners also spend their pensions. Underfunded public pension schemes create a double effect ... resulting in lower savings (a reduction in the money available for investment in the production of jobs, goods and services) and increased consumption.

A United States study into the effects of the wholly unfunded or pay as you go U.S. social security system was made. The system was introduced in 1937, and it has lowered the rate of personal savings by 35 per cent. Because it is pure pay as you go, it accumulated no fund to replace lost savings to be available for capital investment. If, instead, the U.S. plan had been fully funded from the start and had allowed its funds to be invested in the private sector, capital accumulation in 1974 would have been 55 per cent greater than it actually was.

It may well be that the CPP is one of the causes of diminishing capital resources that we are now experiencing. This bill gives an opportunity to debate the philosophy of pensions. More and more people are taking the view that the value of private pensions is not very great. People save money for a purpose, to buy a car or a home. Similarly in years gone by people saved money so that in their old age, when they were unable to work, they could look after themselves. However, with the advent of hospital, medical and drug costs protection the necessity to save is not nearly as great.

Indeed, the every day needs and wants of the retired are much fewer than they were when they were working people with growing families. Very often these people own their homes. They have accumulated many goods during their lifetimes. They generally have household furniture, cars and things necessary for their comfort. Indeed, a person approaching 65 years of age would be well advised to buy a good car and put his house in order, or to have a boat and motor if he enjoys the water or a cottage at the lake, rather than putting money into a pension plan which inflation eats up day by day. If people want to be especially prudent, they may want to take their money to a country where the climate is more hospitable so that they could take advantage of their money should currency controls come to pass.

This cynicism about the value of pensions was expressed by Mr. I. H. Asper of Winnipeg, a former Liberal leader in my province, when he spoke to the Life Underwriters Association in Toronto. Mr. Asper had this to say: "There are very few pension plans that are funded sufficiently." Some may dispute Mr. Asper's sombre warnings, but nevertheless there is abroad the opinion that pension plans are losing their value. The question of whether pension plans can be indexed has been raised. The private sector has suggested that it is unable to provide full protection to the federal public service. It is widely suggested that only through the taxation powers of the federal government are we able to give protection to the federal public service. This would be impossible for private companies.

Will the government attempt to move into the private sector to protect private pension plans? With inflation at 4 per cent a person retiring on a pension of $10,000 a year would find in ten years he could buy only $6,800 worth of goods and services. At 8 per cent the real value would be $4,600.

Could the private sector provide an indexed private pension plan? It would require a great deal of change in investment direction. Present pension funds are invested in a mixed bag of securities. Stocks tend to lose value when inflation rates are high. The returns on new bonds tend to rise with inflation, but those holding existing bonds suffer a loss. Perhaps we should look at an indexed bond type of security.

With those words, Mr. Speaker, I should like to resume my seat and hear the government put its case.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I shall only have a few words to say on this second reading. I understand that we are all eager to see this bill go to committee so that we can look at its detail and discuss it.

I will not take the time of the House tonight to give detailed information on some of the points that have been raised. I should only say that these points have been studied extensively by the Canada Pension Plan Advisory Board and by the Advisory Council of the Status of Women. The bill before us comes out of the recommendations of these two independent, autonomous bodies. The Canada Pension Plan Advisory Board is composed of quite a few experts in the field of pensions, and the Advisory Council of the Status of Women is composed of outstanding Canadians, mainly women, who have at heart the improvement of everything to do with the status of women in this country.

I would remind my colleagues in the official opposition who have expressed some reservations about this bill that all but one of the main provisions have the support of the ten provinces of Canada, and the other provision has the support of nine provinces.

I apologize for being absent at the beginning of debate this afternoon but I am glad to have had an opportunity to hear the speech of the main spokesman for the official opposition again tonight from the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie). I can find some of the words and exact quotations there so I do not think I missed too much of the argument of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). I will take his remarks about my absence as a tribute to the importance of my presence, but I want to assure him that this did not go to my head.

I want to agree with the hon. member that the bill before us is of major significance. I notice that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was not too sure that he wanted to go that far, and expressed reluctance in some respects. I am used to hearing from the official opposition that we are going too far, however, and from the New Democratic Party that we are not going far enough.

What concerns me about some of the arguments used this afternoon, particularly by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, is that some of the propositions he put forward would have very little support from provincial governments. That would be very important in this field since all amendments must have the support of at least two thirds of the provinces having two thirds of the population. After listening to him, however, I am quite convinced that there is a great difference in being the third party in this House and being in power in a particular province. I do not think I have heard any NDP provincial government put forward the proposals he has, and for good reason. There are tremendous costs involved in some of them. What surprised me is that he is not going any further; I have not heard him propose full salary for spouses staying at home in all conditions and all cases.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do. That is a good idea.

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member did not go that far this afternoon so I suspect we will have another speech along this line soon.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is always another year.

Mr. Lalonde: Questions have been raised about the actuarial soundness of the plan or the cost of the proposals. I should like to remind hon. members that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) recently tabled in this House Statutory Actuarial Report No. 5 put forward by the Chief Actuary in the Department of Insurance of the federal government. Under the Canada Pension Plan the Chief Actuary is required to put forward a report costing those proposals everytime there is an amendment. The conclusion of that report is as follows:

In our opinion, the enactment of Bill C-49 is expected to result in combined employee-employer contribution rates gradually increasing to be higher than projected in Statutory Actuarial Report No. 3 by 0.1 per cent of contributory earnings in the year 2005 and by 0.3 per cent of contributory earnings in the year 2025.

I think it is important to bear in mind this type of figure when we are talking about these particular amendments.

There are a lot of other points I should like to raise but I think I should reserve them for consideration in committee where I will be happy to discuss them with my hon. colleagues. I would therefore move second reading, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

TRANSPORT—DATE OF DECISION ON USE OF REFRIGERATOR CARS TO TRANSPORT POTATOES—POSSIBILITY OF RATE INCREASE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that a week ago today I asked both the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) a question with respect to the current status of this matter. I see both parliamentary secretaries are here, so I hope we will get a double-barreled answer because a single-barreled answer has not been too productive in solving the issue. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Roy) and I have had a number of exchanges on the issue. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Pelletier) comes originally from New Brunswick and recognizes the importance of this question to both New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island as well as to other potato growers all across Canada.

I make no apologies for raising the issue again this evening, Mr. Speaker. I will continue to do so until we get statisfactory action from the government on this serious situation. It is one of the most serious that has confronted this most important industry for many years, namely, the future availability of basic transportation equipment for potatoes. I have raised this issue repeatedly because there has been rapid deterioration in the number and quality of railroad cars to transport potatoes from eastern Canada to the central Canadian markets.

As both parliamentary secretaries know, a number of studies have been done by their departments, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I have heard rumours of studies done by other departments, as well as basic studies done by the Prince Edward Island Potato Marketing Board. I think the potato interest in New Brunswick as well has examined this problem seriously.

Frankly, the problem is that we are now down to approximately 1,000 refrigerator cars, whereas only two years ago we were operating well over 4,000 of them. Considering that the actual production of potatoes has not decreased significantly in the last half dozen years, that we have not been successful in transferring a large percentage of this perishable commodity to other sorts of transport, although there have been useful experiments involving intermodal transportation, and considering the strength of demand for this product at least in the foreseeable future, it is obvious that perhaps as much as 80 per cent of this important product will have to be moved by rail. Therefore we must have—we ought to have had it by now—a commitment from the federal government to make available adequate numbers of transportation vehicles.

Recently the transportation committee of the province of Prince Edward Island legislature examined this question seriously. Indeed not many weeks ago the legislature of my home province passed unanimously a resolution urging the federal government to take action to ensure that the rail cars will be available for the next shipping season. So far, the only assurances we have received from the CNR are less than satisfactory.

We know, for instance, that there will be a further decline in the number of reefer cars available for the next shipping season. The figure will be down to something like 700. Considering the condition of the reefer cars, the number available may be even smaller. In addition, we are assured that perhaps as many as 400 insulated boxcars, of 110,000 pound carrying capacity, will be available to transport potatoes to central Canadian markets. Mr. Speaker, I question how realistic CNR officials are in even making such suggestions, or suggesting such solutions. Considering the great problems the use of this equipment will create in warehousing, packaging and marketing, I am led to wonder if there has been any consultation with those who are directly involved.

Frankly, what concerns me is this. More than a month ago reports presented to the Minister of Transport, the Minister of Agriculture, and others made specific recommendations; however, I am not aware that there has been any significant consultation with the potato producers of eastern Canada, with potato shippers, with marketing boards directly concerned, or with the retailers in central Canadian markets who, in the final analysis, will distribute the product. Yet in the absence of prior consultation, any recommendations or any actions taken by the CNR could be counterproductive or destructive both to the general system of marketing of eastern Canadian potatoes and to the provision of employment which is so important to eastern Canada, given our current serious difficulties in unemployment. We have had studies done, but I have seen no evidence of action.

Both the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Transport keep telling me that they are still considering recommendations coming before them, that they will shortly present recommendations to their cabinet colleagues, that they hope to meet shortly with provincial representatives, as the Minister of Transport said to me on May 2, and that they hope to meet at an early date with the premier of Prince Edward Island. But neither minister has indicated to me that he has had satisfactory, direct consultation with potato interests in New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island. Even more important, the Minister of Transport has not given us a firm date as to when federal action will be taken in this field.

One talks about disparities existing in this country, but I suggest there has been no greater disparity than that illustrated by the minister's action a month ago when he ordered a further 2,000 grain cars from the manufacturing plants of this country, to be added to some 6,000 already purchased by the federal government for the transport of western grain. Yet for eastern Canadian potato producers, not one single car has yet been purchased or ordered by the government. This shows a shocking inconsistency. If there were a realistic and balanced policy with respect to providing equitable transportation facilities for both eastern and western Canada, surely we could expect more action from the government than we have seen up to the present on this crucial question.

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the problems related to the distribution of last season's maritime potato crop have been well documented and thoroughly discussed. As the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has indicated previously, he is most concerned that the distribution system not just be patched to prevent a recurrence of last season's problems, but that it be rebuilt in such a manner as to become a reliable system which will deliver a high quality product and encourage the purchase of maritime-produced potatoes.

The interdepartmental committee on maritime potato distribution has been working with this objective in mind. It has not filed a final report because, among other activities related to this topic, its members have been involved in discussions with provincial, industry and government representatives. As the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) has said, "We are awaiting a meeting with the provincial premier and the minister of transport of Prince Edward Island as a further concrete step in the resolution of this issue". Nevertheless, I can assure the hon. member that the committee's work will be completed and activities will be initiated in a time-frame to prevent a recurrence of last season's problems.

The troubles that can be initiated or continued through a panic band-aid solution must be avoided, and the strongly positive results sought will be achieved through the thorough planning and the discussion of solutions that is now taking place between the interdepartmental committee chaired by Agriculture Canada and including representatives from Transport Canada, the National Harbours Board, and the provincial governments of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, as well as key industry representatives. I can assure the hon. member that the results of these efforts will mean that future crops, including next season's, will move smoothly to their respective markets.

Those are the notes from the department, but I can add that the minister envisages the possibility of the Canadian government eventually buying cars which could be put to the use of the potato producers of the maritime provinces. This is one of the topics which has been discussed in the department although I do not believe the suggestion has yet been put before the cabinet. I know the minister has discussed it with maritime producers and with officials from the hon. member's province and from my own native province of New Brunswick. This is a matter which has been of great concern to the department for the past two years, and we hope that this year we can arrive at a formal solution which will be beneficial to producers and satisfactory to consumers also.

CANADIAN MINT—REASON FOR ACCEPTING ORDERS FOR COINS FROM FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, on March 31 I asked the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) a question concerning contracts awarded to the Royal Canadian Mint.

Before I deal with the substance of the question I wish to comment on the answer given to my supplementary question. I asked whether the services of agents had been used in obtaining these contracts, because the State of Israel was involved as one of the countries to which the coins were sold. I asked whether the government had used the services of Shaul Eisenberg or other agents in obtaining these contracts. The minister replied "The question does not sound very serious." That response raises a question in itself. I fail to see how it is up to the minister to decide whether or not a question is serious. Surely that falls to Your Honour. Besides that, the use of agents, particularly Shaul Eisenberg, has been the topic of much debate in and around this Chamber of recent months, and only today very serious questions were asked in connection with agent's fees in that particular case.

As far as the question itself is concerned, Mr. Speaker, it really has two parts. The first asks why has the government found it desirable to be in the business of producing coins for sale, in competition with private sector minting companies. The minister said that the mint, in doing so, does not compete with the private sector. I have had reason to contact some private minting companies. I do not know how many there are but I think there are at least six in Canada, and they certainly feel that the Royal Canadian Mint is competing with them.

If I may refer to some correspondence that I have had with them, the Sherritt Mint has been in business since 1961 and was selling blanks to the Mint itself. In 1964 the Sherritt Mint went into the export market for blanks only, and in 1966 it obtained its first export order. It finds that it is competing with national mints in other countries, because that is the competition on the national markets. They comment that when the Royal Canadian Mint decided to seek aggressively export orders after completion of the new Mint in Winnipeg, they indicated to the Sherritt Mint that they felt the Sherritt Mint should quietly vacate the export field and leave it entirely to them. They go on to say that they think the Royal Canadian Mint is competing with the private sector.

Another mint I have a letter from is the Lombardo Mint, located in Sherbrooke, Quebec. They point out another kind of conflict in that they were receiving help from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce which was trying to help them obtain contracts for minting coins. They say they almost succeeded in obtaining a very large order from the Bank of Mexico; unfortunately they were not successful for some hang-up reason with the Canadian government and a German company got that contract. However, they found that the Royal Canadian Mint was competing with them, and they think the Canadian government should be giving the private industry the opportunity rather than competing with the private sector. There is not only competition in coinage, Mr. Speaker. There are many other things mints make, including medallions and other things that souvenir hunters like to collect.

The second part of the question asked whether adequate steps had been taken to ensure that Canadian taxpayers will not be subsidizing coinage in other countries. There were seven other countries involved and six and a half million coins in this particular contract. All too often the Canadian government gets into enterprises which it finds unprofitable, and of course the taxpayer ends up carrying the load. The minister's answer to that part of the question was that there was no reason why the Royal Canadian Mint should not make maximum profits out of its operations, and then the minister goes on to speak about competition.

I should like to refer to the latest edition of the public accounts of Canada, 1976, wherein the financial statements of the Royal Canadian Mint are contained. It is true that in 1974 and 1975 the Mint made a profit; $1 million in 1974, and close to $3 million in 1975. However, I think it is interesting to note that on the income side in 1975 only $675,000 was attributed to foreign contracts. Other sources of revenue were domestic coin, numismatic coin, Olympic coin and refining. Foreign contracts contributed to gross revenue only to the extent of $675,000. Unfortunately, due to the manner in which the accounts are kept there is no way that one can tell whether a particular contract, and especially these foreign contracts, contributed or detracted from the operating results of the Mint. In any event, the Government of Canada has an equity investment of some $31 million in the Mint, and the return of $3 million is hardly what one could describe as being overly generous.

Mr. Rod Blaker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I shall try to take the remarks of the hon. gentleman in the order in which they were presented. He did, indeed, on March 31 ask whether or not Shaul Eisenberg had acted as an agent in any respect in connection with the Royal Canadian Mint for the sale of coins or blanks. At that time the minister replied that he did not think the question was serious. To the extent the hon. member wishes the department, myself or the minister to take that question seriously, then I will do so right now. The answer is that Mr. Eisenberg has not and does not now act as an agent for the Royal Canadian Mint. I will not make any reference to the future.

With respect to the comments in terms of competition between the Royal Canadian Mint and private companies in Canada, the hon. member may have been a little bit selective in his comments with regard to the Sherritt Mint. I have before me an article which appeared in the Financial Post magazine of March, 1977, in which, taking up that very question of competition between the Royal Canadian Mint and the Sherritt Mint, the president of Sherritt Mint, Mr. Pearce said:

> "I'll have to be a little more nimble, perhaps," he allows. He also looks forward to occasions when Sherritt and the RCM may be able to co-operate profitably and cites a case where they have already done so.

With respect to the Lombardo Mint, I think the answer is obvious that whether Lombardo had been bidding on a particular contract from Mexico or whether the Royal Canadian Mint became involved or not made no difference. The contract went to Germany.

With respect to the hon. member's remarks on subsidization of foreign currencies and whether the Canadian public is in any way subsidizing costs of production through the Royal Canadian Mint, the answer is no. All contracts undertaken by the Mint are usually at a profit and where not, on rare occasions, may be at cost. On those occasions they are accepted in order to keep employees on staff and utilize the facilities of the Mint and the maximum number of employees possible.

It is well known that the Royal Canadian Mint enjoys one of the highest reputations around the world for the quality of its production and its ability to undertake and successfully carry out large programs, as was done for the Olympic coin program. That the Royal Canadian Mint is successful in obtaining lucrative foreign contracts is a compliment to the efficiency of its operations. To the extent that the facilities which are already existing for the production of our own Canadian currency can be utilized to serve the requirements of other clients in an open competitive market, there is no reason why the Mint should not optimize its production and maximize its profits. In this way full use is being made of existing facilities and continuing employment opportunities are ensured for a significant number of Canadians.

Another important element is the impact the Royal Canadian Mint activities have on other Canadian industries which are in the business of processing raw materials or manufacturing by-products for Canadian and foreign consumers. It follows, therefore, that the successful ventures of the Royal Canadian Mint in the foreign markets are not only beneficial to the Mint but also to other important sectors of Canadian industry.

The Royal Canadian Mint Act clearly sets out that the activities of the Mint must be carried out in anticipation of profit and the Mint has the corporate powers, embedded in law, to carry out this mandate and ensure that it is a financially viable enterprise. It is not the intention of the government to subsidize the operations of the Royal Canadian Mint and it must therefore continue to undertake and carry out activities within its corporate powers to ensure that it remains self-sustaining financially. It follows that, in so doing, the Royal Canadian Mint may find itself in competition with Canadian private enterprises which have acquired or developed a minting capability.

In fact, the minister has been advised that since the Royal Canadian Mint has recently intensified its marketing efforts in the foreign markets, it has found itself competing along with a Canadian company in a few instances.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret I have to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but he has gone beyond his time.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—REPORTED INEFFECTIVENESS SURVEILLANCE OF THERAPEUTIC ABORTIONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO CORRECT

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, two years ago the largest petition ever brought into parliament, signed by more than one million Canadians, urged the government to tighten the law on abortion. The response of the government was to set up the Badgley commission which issued its report a few months ago.

Among the conclusions of the Badgley report was a very strong finding expressed in the report that the basis of the chaotic situation on abortions, which now amount to approximately 50,000 a year, is in the federal abortion law itself which does not clearly define the reasons for which abortions can be performed. The therapeutic abortion committees in hospitals across Canada are interpreting the word "health" according to their own whims and perspectives. The Badgley report maintains that most abortions now being performed are not based on any actual hazards to the woman's life or health.

The response of the government to the Badgley report, which is a very important document—time does not permit me to give the full range of its findings here—has been to tell the provinces that they will have to ensure that therapeutic abortion committees are operating within the perspective of the Criminal Code.

The response of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), who has taken the initiative in this regard, has been to advocate the setting up of comprehensive women's clinics across Canada and to collaborate with the provinces in ensuring federal-provincial support for these clinics.

The clinics have been attacked by such organizations as the Alliance for Life and indeed by many people across Canada who are espousing a pro-life position, on the grounds that such clinics will bring in by the back door what has been prohibited officially by the law, namely, wider entry to abortion. I appeal to the minister to make a definitive statement on such clinics.

Obviously clinics are needed for a wide range of health conditions related to women, including pregnant women. I appeal to him to make a specific and firm statement tonight that such clinics will in no way counsel abortions or lead directly to therapeutic abortion committees in hospitals. Otherwise the charge that is being made will be proven correct.

The issue I want to highlight at this moment is the fact that the terms of reference of the Badgley commission specified that the report would be debated in the House. It has not been debated. Rather, the action has been to toss it over to the provinces. It is scandalous that no debate is being offered in the House or that a standing committee of the House has not received the Badgley report for study.

Over the week end the Festival for Life met in Ottawa to try to indicate to members of parliament that the people who believe very strongly in the preservation of life insist that the basic issue is a change in the law.

It is to be deeply regretted that the pro-life movement is now fighting not only government inertia on this, because the government has taken a position that it is a political no win situation when both sides seem to be sawed off even though, as I said, a petition from one million people has made clear a very strong opposition to the widening of abortion or to the continuance of the present level of abortion. The fight is not only against government inertia but against the media which is giving a distorted view of the reality of the pro-life movement. I speak specifically of the Festival for Life over the week end.

I want to put on record a statement made today by Mrs. Gwendolyn Landolt, the vice-president of Alliance for Life, who said, and I quote:

> This week end Canadians of all religious and ethnic backgrounds, from every province, reaffirmed their commitment and concern for the well-being of those least able to help themselves, the unborn, the handicapped, the aged and the dying. Twenty-five thousand Canadians participated in the Festival for Life which featured distinguished international and Canadian speakers, including Malcolm Muggeridge, Dr. Paul David, Marshall MacLuhan, John Howard Griffen and Dick Gregory.

It was discouraging that such a gathering of important thinkers should have received such scant attention from the media. By giving such scant attention, the media indicated that the pro-life position was of little interest to them, and thus they have performed a grave disservice to the people of Canada.

When I watched the CBC news myself on Saturday night I found that the impression was created that the counterdemonstration to the pro-life movement was about equal. When I came back to Ottawa I found that there were around 30 to 100 pro-abortion demonstrators countering the demonstrations of 2,000 people who came up on Parliament Hill on Saturday afternoon. The CBC has done a real disservice to the fair representation of what actually took place on the week end.

I do not believe that abortion is by any means a lost cause. Perhaps the government hopes the issue will go away. I appeal to the government's sense of justice. I urge that the government ensure that the Badgley report will be debated in the House to give all members an opportunity to express views that have been communicated to us by thousands and thousands of Canadians across the country.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the question of abortion has been raised many times in the question period in the House and in motions. When the hon. member says he would like to have this question debated further, may I point out that the government has said it does not intend to amend the legislation at present. The hon. member knows that if he or his party feels strongly about debating the issue, there are many opposition days when this matter could be debated. As a matter of fact there is one tomorrow. They could use it if they want to do that.

So far as the question about women's clinics is concerned, I am glad he gives me the opportunity to reiterate what was in the statement, which appears to have been either misunderstood or distorted. Women's clinics, about which I have spoken, are to be completely and exclusively the responsibility of the provinces. It is their decision whether they want to go ahead with them or not. I indicated clearly that they should be part of recognized hospitals, as is the case at present when a therapeutic abortion takes place. There is no question of bringing in abortions by the back door. It is a matter of applying the law as it is at present.

Clinics which are properly set up and run would, I believe, reduce the number of abortions rather than increase them, because they would provide the whole spectrum of services to women. I am afraid that this is something that has not been examined very carefully by the critics. There exists already a women's clinic in Canada which, I am advised, is working very effectively. The question is rather whether we can improve the health services provided to women in this country within the context of the law as it stands at present.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 10.30 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF CONSTRUCTION OF A RAILWAY RATHER THAN NORTHERN PIPELINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the strong views expressed by the Honourable Mr. Justice Berger in connection with a gas pipeline from the Yukon and that a railroad was commended and approved by the Canadian Institute of Guided Ground Transport in 1972 following an engineering, economic and environmental feasibility study of a railroad to carry Arctic oil and liquefied natural gas to markets in central Canada, and as the institute agreed with an earlier preliminary analysis which concluded that a railway is technically and operationally feasible and appeared to be financially attractive, with unanimous consent of the House, I would move:

That a committee of the House be set up to examine this question without delay, as the conclusion of the Canadian Institute was that 360 locomotive units and 11,000 tank cars of 94 ton capacity with 20 trains per day could move the necessary requirements of oil and gas.

Furthermore, having regard to the unemployment situation, the report agreed that such a railroad would require 5,000 workers to build over a 5½ year period, and it would employ, on completion, some 4,600 people in the Yukon and Northwest Territories, and there would be very little disruption to the environment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUPPORT FOR RECOMMENDATION NO NORTHERN PIPELINE BE BUILT FOR TEN YEARS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the fact that Canada has a sufficient supply of natural gas to last until 1990, and given that a Mackenzie Valley pipeline would cost between $8 billion and $12 billion, and in particular given the conclusions of Mr. Justice Berger that: "a pipeline across the northern Yukon would entail irreparable losses of national and international importance" and that if a pipeline were built now "... it would bring limited economic benefits, its social impact would be devastating, and it would frustrate the goals of native claims", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House supports the principal recommendations of the Berger report that no pipeline be built across the northern Yukon and that no Mackenzie Valley pipeline be built for at least ten years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Presentation for debate of such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PROPOSED ASSISTANCE BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT TO COMPANIES DESIRING TO MOVE FROM QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Given the fact that a number of companies whose head offices were situated in Quebec have moved or will move on account of the Charter of the French Language in Quebec, and the fact that an alarming situation is being artificially created to discredit the legitimate aspirations of the Quebec government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the federal government do not provide any assistance by way of loans, subventions or subsidies to companies moving their head offices but that, on the contrary, government consider the advisability of giving them assistance so that they may remain in Quebec and comply with the requirements of the priority given to French in that province.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a motion of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. In light of the immense human problem that eight years of economic failure has created, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens):

● (1410)

That this House direct the government to bring forward a revised budget for the economic reconstruction of the country which shall include the following: income tax cuts of the order of $250 million to stimulate the economy, federal sales tax reductions on certain products such as building materials to stimulate demand and create jobs and long term tax contracts for companies investing in 'have-not' regions of this country.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

SUGGESTED MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT AND STIMULATE GROWTH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

When the "magnificent seven" gathered in London this past weekend, it was determined that unemployment is the cause célèbre of the industrial world today. As the administration's last budget did not give sufficient attention to our own mounting unemployment, the highest of the seven, ensuring as it does at least one million unemployed in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie):

That this House instruct the government to bring in a new budget which will address itself to the critical unemployment problem in Canada and our lack of real growth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Presentation for debate of such a motion can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

[Mr. Speaker.]

ENERGY

PROPOSAL TO DEBATE CONSTRUCTION OF NORTHERN PIPELINE FOLLOWING RECEIPT OF REPORTS THEREON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the government of Canada will have to make a decision on a northern pipeline and on the issues considered by the Berger inquiry and by the National Energy Board, by consultants and by Dean Lysyk of the University of British Columbia, and in view of the paramount importance of the involvement of and consultation with the House of Commons before the government makes any final decision upon proposals for the construction of a northern pipeline, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That the government be instructed to initiate a full debate in this House concerning proposals for the construction of a northern pipeline once all of the relevant consultants, boards, commissions and committees have reported on the matters referred to them in connection therewith, and that no final decisions be taken in connection with such matters until after full debate so that the views of members of the House as to what action should be taken in the national interest may be known.

Mr. Speaker: A motion under Standing Order 43 can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

PROPOSAL TO ACCEPT BERGER RECOMMENDATION TO SETTLE NATIVE LAND CLAIMS PRIOR TO CONSTRUCTION OF NORTHERN PIPELINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43.

In view of Mr. Justice Berger's strong recommendation in his report on the Mackenzie Valley pipeline, tabled yesterday, that a pipeline should await both a settlement and implementation of native land claims, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this government accept and implement the recommendation.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation for debate of such a motion can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR NEW MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Earlier this week, the communique of the London economic summit conference which was signed by the Prime Minister of Canada and six other heads of government, affirmed, and I quote, that "our most urgent task is to create more jobs" and went on to say "we are particularly concerned about unemployment among young people". I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether in the light of that declaration the government of Canada which is now talking about this problem, is prepared to bring in new and effective job creation measures to assist the more than one million Canadians presently out of work.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): The action taken by the government in anticipation of the current high unemployment rates was reflected in the budgetary proposals as well as in the special Canada Works and Young Canada Works programs. These actions were taken in the light of our expectation that we would be facing high levels of unemployment at this time. It is not proposed at this time to bring in further measures because we believe that over the next period of time the budgetary proposals will have an effect and we can look forward to increased employment.

Mr. Clark: I ask myself if the Acting Prime Minister will be able to get away with that kind of cold comfort when he goes home to the unemployed of Cape Breton.

An hon. Member: Perhaps he won't go home.

Mr. Clark: Yes, perhaps he will not go home. Given the fact that Canada's unemployment level is currently the highest of the seven nations that signed the summit conference communique and that the unemployment level in this country is among the highest of the 24 OECD nations, and in light of the signal failure of this country to create jobs and of the fact that the government stands out in the industrialized world for its failure to create jobs for its citizens, I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government of Canada is not now prepared to consider a significant change in its existing spending priorities to help reduce our shocking national level of unemployment, and whether the government will not consider a further selective reduction in federal taxes to stimulate demand and to get Canadians working again?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has referred to Canada's standing among the industrialized countries of the world. He will have noticed that the report prepared for the summit conference indicates that Canada's economic performance over the past number of years was the best among the seven industrialized countries meeting in London. I repeat the answer I gave earlier that it is not the intention of the government to introduce new measures at this time because we must give an opportunity for the economic stimulus package presented in the budget to work itself through the economy.

YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT—POSSIBILITY OF SEEKING CO-OPERATION OF LABOUR AND MANAGEMENT TO CREATE JOBS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister, first of all, if he would like to send that report to the more than a million Canadians who are out of work so that they can take the kind of encouragement from it that he has found. I would like to direct his attention to the time bomb that has been built into Canada by the fact that so many of the unemployed in this country now are under the age of 24 and are starting to look for work when there are no jobs available to them. Given the fact that that kind of unemployment among young people can cause serious continuing social unrest and alienation, particularly in the five eastern provinces, I would ask the Acting Prime Minister whether in the discussions that are now underway with business and labour on behalf of the government of Canada there has been any attempt by the government to get those two other partners in the economy to create jobs for young people since the government of Canada will not?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition obviously refers to a serious problem in the Canadian economy, but he should bear in mind the number of positive aspects, namely, the total employment in Canada has increased by about 110,000 in the last several months, the export picture is quite strong, the expectations of manufacturing intentions are quite positive, and the upturn in the United States is bound to have an effect on the Canadian economy—

An hon. Member: Don't hold your breath.

Mr. MacEachen: —in addition to the economic stimulus package contained in the budget of the Minister of Finance. There is no disposition of this side of the House to underestimate the gravity of the present situation, but I believe it should be placed in the proper context.

Mr. Clark: I presume that when the Acting Prime Minister talks about the improvement in the export situation he is talking about the export of young Canadians whom the Prime Minister counsels to leave this country if they cannot find work here.

● (1420)

Mr. Clark: The fact is that in the cheerful list of statistics cited by the Acting Prime Minister he neglected to tell parliament and the people of Canada that almost 40 per cent of our unemployed have been out of work now for more than three months. In light of that situation I will ask the Acting Prime Minister one last time whether the government of Canada will accept its responsibilities and begin to show the million Canadians who are out of work that their government cares about their plight and is prepared not simply to hope that budgetary measures, which we know will not work, will work, but instead will take action to create jobs now for Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the exports I had in mind were Canadian merchandise exports which increased by 14 per cent in the first quarter of this year compared with the final quarter of last year.

An hon. Member: It was low last year.

Mr. MacEachen: That is a very positive feature. The hon. gentleman is aware that in this current fiscal year we are putting almost $500 million toward direct job creation programs in the Canadian economy, which is an indication of the seriousness with which the government is dealing with the present situation.

POSSIBILITY OF REVISED BUDGET TO STIMULATE ECONOMY AND PROVIDE JOBS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, it is shocking to hear the Acting Prime Minister state that we have to wait for an upturn in the United States economy so that we can take advantage of it. In light of the fact that we are still in the midst of a national crisis in terms of high unemployment, will the minister tell this House whether the government is now prepared to bring in a revised budget to stimulate the economy and to restore confidence in its performance, thus meeting this tragedy by providing jobs?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered that question.

Mr. Alexander: I am very concerned about the answer the minister just gave to me because he did not answer the question. In light of the fact that we are faced with a national crisis and that the government only tinkered with the economy in the last budget, will the Acting Prime Minister now indicate to this House whether he is prepared to bring in a revised budget to stimulate the economy and restore confidence in its performance, thus meeting this tragedy by providing jobs?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have already answered that question also.

[Mr. Clark.]

ENERGY

SUGGESTION PRIME MINISTER ASK UNITED STATES FOR MORE TIME TO MAKE DECISION ON CONSTRUCTION OF NORTHERN PIPELINE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. We have now learned that U.S. energy adviser Schlesinger has informed the minister that the United States does not regard Prudhoe Bay gas as being significant in terms of over-all American needs. Considering that President Carter can obtain a 90-day extension on reaching a pipeline decision, and in particular, following the recommendations and suggestions in the Berger Report regarding alternatives to investigate, will the minister urge the Prime Minister, when he returns to Canada, to reconsider his answers given earlier last week in the House and to go back to President Carter and inform him that the government of Canada needs more time to reach this fundamentally important decision on a northern pipeline?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it would be helpful if, before making judgments and thinking out positions with respect to pipelines, hon. members opposite would await the report of the National Energy Board. When we have that report, we will be much better able to judge whether additional time is going to be needed.

ADEQUACY OF STUDY OF ALCAN ROUTE FOR PIPELINE—SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF TIME

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the minister misses the point. In light of Justice Berger's recommendations, which the minister praised so highly last night, that the Alcan route deserves more serious study—the report specifically referred to certain questions which ought to be more fully pursued—and in light of the ridiculously short time frame the Alcan study is now working with, does the minister agree that a three-month study is adequate to deal with the questions that are being considered with regard to the Alcan route? If he does not agree, why will he not agree to extend the time frame so that the job can be adequately done?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member has informed himself on the particular study to which he has referred. As my colleague the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has made quite clear, the situations are different—different in the sense that the Alcan study is associated with a corridor already in place, that is, the highway. The second point that I think he has made clear is that this would be a preliminary study and further work would be done upon receipt of it.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, if the minister is going to follow the logic of the statement he has just made, surely when the government report comes in, if it is going to require further study,—which means during the summer months—given the whole social and environmental aspect of the question that Mr. Justice Berger referred to in his report yesterday with specific reference to Alcan, would the minister not conclude on a rational basis and in terms of commitment to the people of Canada that it is impossible to reach a sensible decision on this prior to September 1?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is apparently prepared to prejudge all the questions.

Mr. Broadbent: You are prejudging.

Mr. Gillespie: Indeed you have. You have already prejudged virtually every issue related to this very difficult decision. The government's position is that the National Energy Board has been hearing evidence for many years and we expect to receive their report this summer. We will take our decision after we have seen that report.

Mr. Broadbent: After parliament has gone home.

STATISTICS CANADA

METHOD OF CALCULATING NUMBER OF UNEMPLOYED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In view of the fact that Statistics Canada is responsible for counting the number of unemployed in Canada, and that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration takes into account the data provided by Statistics Canada when computing the amounts to be made available to the various constituencies under the Canada Works Program, could the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce tell the House whether he is willing to suggest more effective and adequate means to compute the real number of unemployed in the various regions, so that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration can truly assess the needs of all regions and deal fairly with them?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, Statistics Canada has assured me on a number of occasions that no better method exists today for computing the number of unemployed than those it is currently using. These methods are internationally recognized and used, but if the hon. member has concrete suggestions to make to the House to improve the current system, I shall consider them gladly and refer them to Statistics Canada.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I wish to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

It is the first time that a member of the cabinet invites me so openly to make suggestions to help him in his work.

In view of the minister's answer, may I ask him whether he wants me to submit such suggestions orally or in writing and whether he is prepared to consider them?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, of course I will be prepared to consider them and I would be glad to meet the hon. member. If he wishes to see me, I am always available.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT'S KNOWLEDGE OF NUMBER OF JOBS NEEDED

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of his statement that 110,000 jobs have been created in past months, would he indicate if he was aware of the fact that 240,000 people actually came into the Canadian labour force in the past 12 months. This means that approximately one job was created for every two people looking for work in the past year. If the minister was aware of that may I ask if the government did not take into consideration the fact that jobs had to be created for 240,000 people, not just the 110,000 for which he takes credit.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are all aware that one of the problems we have faced over the past several months has been the rapid increase in the Canadian labour force.

UNEMPLOYMENT—POSSIBILITY OF DEBATE ON SITUATION IN CANADA AND OTHER COUNTRIES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): In view of the fact that there were 9,000 fewer jobs in April than in March and in view of the findings of the economic conference in London which has declared the unemployment situation in Canada and the other six countries as a cause célèbre, I have a supplementary question. Mr. Speaker, would the Acting Prime Minister indicate if there will be a statement on motions or if any other means will be taken to ensure a review of the conference in this House and, if necessary, a debate on current unemployment not only in Canada but in the other six countries?

● (1430)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no plans to arrange an early debate on unemployment. I have been asked to arrange debates on northern pipelines and national unity. I believe that the subject of unemployment, so important to all of us, could be appropriately set down for the allotted day debate which is to take place on Friday this week.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

SUGGESTED REVIEW OF TARIFF BOARD REPORT ON COMPUTER INDUSTRY

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my final supplementary question to the Minister of State for Science and Technology? As the unemployment situation is undoubtedly partly to be blamed on the lack of productivity in Canadian industry, and as Canadian productivity gains were literally the lowest among the seven countries attending the London conference, would the minister indicate if he has reviewed this dragging of Canadian productivity gains, to determine why we are faltering so badly? Specifically, has he reviewed the Tariff Board report of the computer industry, which has recommended full-scale tariff reductions with respect to that industry in the earnest hope that productivity will be helped in Canada?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, no, I have not reviewed that report, but I shall certainly be pleased to do so.

MANPOWER

ESTIMATE OF NUMBER OF JOBS TO BE CREATED IN QUEBEC

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Considering that only 5,000 jobs were created in the province of Quebec those last 12 months, that the labour force increased by 53,000 and that in his last budget the Minister of Finance promised the creation of 150,000 jobs in Canada, can the minister tell the House how many of the 150,000 jobs promised are going to be created, particularly in the province of Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to enter a statistical debate with the hon. member without having the figures at my fingertips. I have attended the committee considering the manpower estimates, and in the last eight or nine meetings we have gone over many of these statistics. It should be borne in mind, as the Acting Prime Minister said, that something like 110,000 jobs have been created—

Mr. Stevens: The figure should have been 240,000.

Mr. Cullen: —since December, up to the present. It is significant that employment in fact increased in Quebec over this past month. I do not know whether that is a month over month aberration. I will take a very close look at that, because the rates also fell in Manitoba by a significant number. I do not want to judge future programs on the basis of those two figures which seem to be an aberration. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, I ought to have said that unemployment went up.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

MEASURES TO IMPROVE ECONOMY OF QUEBEC

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Considering the conditions in Quebec and the importance of restoring economic development which is an essential short-term objective at the present time, and in view of the interest shown by this government in national unity, could the Minister of Manpower and Immigration tell us what are the concrete steps which his government intends to take to restore a more satisfactory economic climate in Quebec. This is important to provide Quebecers with the evidence of economic development within a constitutional context. If such is the case could the minister make at least a few suggestions or recommendations to restore economic development in Quebec in the near future?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is surely an overly general question to put during the oral questions period.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacFarlane: —my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Would the minister inform me whether anyone in his department has entered into a copyright arrangement with any members of my staff for the use of my name in recent publications, the use of which might cast aspersions on my good character?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacFarlane: In other words, did he ever request permission to use the words, "Garbage Gus"?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Alexander: That question was an abuse of the question period.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That question is garbage.

ENERGY

POSSIBILITY OF CONSTRUCTING RAILWAY AS ALTERNATIVE TO NORTHERN PIPELINE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the general appearance of the member opposite would indicate that he does not lift up garbage. I direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and ask him what, if anything, has been done in the last two or three years for the purpose of ascertaining whether railroads would provide an alternative to pipelines and, at the same time, meet the serious problem of degradation of the environment?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I know work was done on such a project. I believe that work indicated that although such a project might be technically feasible, it would be environmentally damaging.

An hon. Member: But not as damaging as a pipeline.

Mr. Gillespie: In economic terms, it would be very expensive. Although these figures may not be precisely accurate, they show that in order to duplicate the throughput of a pipeline, you would require say a 30 car or 100 car train going by about every 45 minutes. The figures are of that order. Clearly, the economics of the proposals place it on a far less attractive basis than that of the pipeline.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have figures which indicate that the proposal would require 20 trains per day, not the number the minister mentioned. Further, I should like the minister to bring his statistics up to date. I am told that consideration is not being given to the proposal because of the cost, but that does not agree at all with the very full investigation made by the group at Queen's University. In that connection, I ask if the higher echelons of the civil service oppose the railroad, and if Mr. Aguin, a top transport department official said two years ago that if pipelines were proven to be ineffective because of the danger to the environment and the like, as was pointed out in the Berger Report, then and only then the question of a railroad would be considered.

I ask the minister whether the government is giving any consideration to a railroad which would provide tremendous employment not only in the production of extra railway facilities but also in continuing work. Why is the minister so definitely set against a course which has been recommended quite widely but which the higher echelons of the civil service apparently oppose. The minister, apparently suffering from the osmosis of their opinions, takes the same view.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I seek out the best environmental information I can get and the best economic advice I can get. I think if the right hon. member were to reflect for a moment on his figures concerning the number of trains per day which would be needed, he would see that his figures are not inconsistent with mine. Much depends, of course, on how many cars there are in each train. Clearly, he should recognize that trains going by at 60 or 70 miles an hour at least every hour or hour and 20 minutes are likely to pose a greater environmental hazard to the north than a quiet subterranean pipeline. I can reassure the right hon. gentleman that we took seriously those considerations. We looked at them, and they just did not seem to stand up.

PRIORITY OF UNITED STATES ENERGY NEEDS OVER SETTLEMENT OF NATIVE LAND CLAIMS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In his report, Justice Berger said and I quote:

If we build the pipeline now there is every reason to believe that the history of northern native peoples will proceed along the same lamentable course as that of native people in so many other places.

Since a government decision to override that advice and basically to write off the native people of the north will come largely on the advice of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, may I ask the minister whether he now believes that the United States energy interests should take priority over the settlement and implementation of the native claims in the Northwest Territories.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, with all deference to the hon. member, I think that is an insulting question. Quite clearly the government is so concerned about the kinds of problems about which the hon. member is concerned that they commissioned Mr. Justice Berger to look into the question. There has never been any question in our minds that the Canadian interest, and that includes the interest of all Canadians and in particular the interest of the northern peoples, would come well ahead of any interests of the Americans south of the border.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER AGREES WITH BERGER RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): I wish to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I would like a yes or no answer. Does the minister agree with the major recommendations of the Berger report?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will get my answer in due course.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

COMMUNICATIONS

NUMBER OF COMPLAINTS ABOUT BIAS IN CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION PROGRAMMING

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications. Since this is May 10, the last day for the public to write to the CRTC alleging bias or about complaints with regard to CBC programming and since I gave the minister notice of my question, will she tell the House how many members, and in particular how many cabinet ministers, have complained in writing to the CRTC about bias or balancing in CBC programming?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): I thank the hon. member for the notice he gave me of this question. To date, a total of 945 letters have been received by the CRTC. However, there was no breakdown as to whether those letters came from members of parliament or from cabinet ministers.

NUMBER OF MINISTERS COMPLAINING ABOUT BIAS IN CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION PROGRAMMING

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): If it is not asking too much of the ministry or the CRTC, I wonder if it would be possible tomorrow or some other day later in the week to break down, not by names but by status the people who wrote the 945 letters so that the minister can tell us whether any ministers have written in literate form, either bilingual or unilingual, setting out detailed complaints about bias and balance in CBC programming. In order to expedite any supplementaries and/or to further the business later in the week, if no ministers have written setting out in literate form, in bilingual or unilingual prose, the complaints about the CBC programming, will she talk to the Prime Minister when he returns to see if in fact the ministry will decide there is any purpose to be served by proceeding with an inquiry when, using the Prime Minister's own words, no specific allegations have been made.

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I must first tell the hon. member there is no such thing as bilingual prose. Therefore, these letters would have been written in either English or French. The CRTC is very reluctant to give me this kind of breakdown. In their view, letters from ordinary citizens are equal to any letter that might be received from a member of parliament or a minister, as Mr. Boyle told me on "Cross Country Check-Up", if the hon. member was listening.

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—IMPLEMENTATION OF EMERGENCY RESPONSE PROVISION IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that unemployment figures in the province of Newfoundland have reached the unprecedented and disastrous rate of 19.2 per cent, figures which will increase drastically with the impending closure of one industry, is the minister now prepared to implement the "emergency response" segment of the Canada Works Program in the province of Newfoundland?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): As I indicated, Mr. Speaker, our officials are meeting with representatives from the company and with governmental officials in that area to determine if and how the emergency response part of Canada Works might be made applicable. I am not in a position to make any comment on that right now.

CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES TO CO-ORDINATE JOB-CREATION PROGRAMS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): In view of the fact there is an alarming rate of unemployment in all of the Atlantic region, and indeed right across Canada, is the minister prepared to call a federal-provincial conference to co-ordinate all federal-provincial programs in order to provide jobs in this country?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there is close co-ordination now between the various levels of government working in concert on a particularly difficult problem in that area.

TRADE

CANADIAN POSITION ON GATT FORMULA FOR REDUCTION OF TARIFFS

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Given the concern which many areas of the secondary manufacturing industry in Canada have regarding the apparent trends of the GATT negotiations, will the minister indicate whether our negotiating team or the government has accepted or is favourably disposed to the proposed formula which calls for a reduction of about 50 per cent in tariffs?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, a discussion is now going on and a tariff reduction is proposed to improve the flow of trade exchanges across the world. Of course, the tariff problem is only one aspect of it; there is also the problem of tariff barriers which may be as important as tariffs themselves, and all that requires extremely complex negotiations which should not come to an end before 1978. We are following the situation very closely and will keep the House informed on that.

[English]

REPRESENTATIONS FROM APPLIANCE AND ELECTRONICS INDUSTRIES ON GATT TARIFF FORMULA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Has the minister received many representations from management and labour, and in particular is he aware of the anxieties of the workers in the manufacturing of component parts for the appliance, electronics and communications industries, and what steps is the government taking to protect their jobs should there be a cut in tariffs in these items?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the problem is extremely complex. Of course, in some areas, a tariff reduction would foster exports of Canadian manufactured goods. In other areas, a tariff reduction could create problems for existing industries. We are looking into all aspects of the problem and hoping that the negotiations will benefit the whole country.

INDUSTRY

CLOSING OF DOMTAR PLANT AT EAST ANGUS—MEASURES TO AVOID LAY-OFFS

Mr. Claude Tessier (Compton): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce?

Since the Domtar Company expects to shut down its East Angus plant, which involves the lay-off of some 570 workers and economically affects over 300 other workers, close to 900 workers all told, can the minister tell the House what measures the government can and intends to take to counteract the current economic factors and to brighten long term perspectives for pulp and paper plants, measures which could be so efficient as to prevent the disappearance of jobs for more than 900 workers, who represent more than half the labour force in the third most important town in my riding and nearly 5 per cent of the labour force of my riding as a whole?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this is of course an extremely difficult problem. As we know, the pulp and paper industry is presently going through a rather complicated period because competition is becoming ever more difficult and because of the fact that, among other things, some of our plants have become obsolete and the hourly rate is higher than in the south of the United States, which makes the situation extremely complex.

I have not had the opportunity to review the situation of the Domtar plant in East Angus. I shall inquire to see whether there are any workable solutions and, if so, I shall be tremendously pleased to make all my departmental services available.

TRANSPORT

LOCK AT SAULT STE. MARIE—REDUCTION IN HOURS OF SERVICE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. It deals with the present unemployment situation, particularly in northern Ontario where the unemployment rate is running in excess of 12 per cent. Will the minister reconsider his decision to reduce services in the Canadian lock at Sault Ste. Marie, a move which can only discourage the use of that lock and ultimately lead to its closure and the loss of an additional 50 jobs in the area? If that is not the minister's intention, will he undertake to see that the Sault lock is fully utilized, rather than proceed with a decision which can only aggravate the unemployment situation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. lady seems to have missed the facts of the case. The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority had indicated its intention to reduce the number of hours the lock was open, but after further consideration I asked the Seaway Authority to avoid this restriction at this time while the whole question of the future of a lock at that position is considered. I think it is generally agreed on all sides that for the lock to be useful over the long term a larger capacity is required than is the present case, and that very serious capital question has to be examined carefully. While this study is going on the Seaway Authority has avoided any restriction in the volume of work being provided which it had originally planned.

Miss MacDonald: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Given the statement made by the minister in the House on March 29, when the proposal was made that services might be reduced in this area, is the minister now stating unequivocally that there will be no reduction of services in the lock at Sault Ste. Marie for this summer period and, indeed, into the ongoing future?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I will send the hon. member the announcement which indicates that a restriction has been placed on any change in work until the study regarding the future of the lock is completed.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

REQUEST FOR DELAY IN MOVING HEADQUARTERS TO HULL

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. When he appeared recently before the external affairs committee, the new president of CIDA stated very clearly his "grave concern" about the planned move of CIDA to new offices in Hull. His objections are based on the disruption that such a move will entail at precisely the time when major administrative reforms are being undertaken. Given these objections and the vital importance of sustaining the momentum for administrative reform at CIDA, would the minister undertake to have the matter of the move to Hull reviewed by the government with a view to postponing or stopping the move?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): As a beginning, Mr. Speaker, I will certainly discuss the question with the president of CIDA and determine what his misgivings are, and then discuss the matter with the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

MULTICULTURALISM

ASSISTANCE FOR TEACHING THIRD LANGUAGE IN SUPPLEMENTARY SCHOOLS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Multiculturalism). As the result of a statement made by the former minister responsible for multiculturalism in a speech delivered in Edmonton on January 29 of this year regarding further assistance to multicultural groups, I asked the new minister of multiculturalism yesterday if he is prepared to provide assistance in connection with projects to improve teaching skills of teachers involved in third language training in Canada's supplementary schools, and as well if he is prepared to provide support for the operation of supplementary schools in third language instruction. The minister replied, in essence, that he would look into it. I would like to ask the minister if he is now in a position to give me the answer.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform hon. members of the government's continued intention to provide support for cultural retention for all of Canada's cultural groups. As all hon. members will recall, all parties in the House were ardent and unanimous supporters of the multiculturalism policy.

An hon. Member: You are reading your answer.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Just as you read your questions. Even the right hon. gentleman raises questions once in a while and everybody reads research papers, so I do not see why I cannot read my answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): This policy recognized that the cultural value of many languages would not weaken the position of Canada's two official languages. I have instructed my officials to study all programming possibilities in recognizing the cultural value of heritage languages, and not only those referred to by the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe. I expect that program alternatives will be brought forward for my consideration in the very near future and that I will be able to further detail my government's position at that time. I am sure that the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe will enthusiastically support any recommendations I may make in this area as much as he has indicated his concern for the immediate implementation of the proposed programs he referred to yesterday.

[Mr. Roche.]

CLOSURE OF ELECTROHOME PLANT IN NOVA SCOTIA—SUGGESTED RECOVERY OF PORTION OF GRANTS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for either the Acting Prime Minister or the Acting Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Unemployment continues at exceedingly high levels in Pictou county, and indeed in all of Nova Scotia, and yet another DREE assisted industry, Electrohome Limited, which has benefitted from a $1.9 million allotment from DREE, has closed its doors after shipping some of their equipment to Ontario. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister or the Acting Minister of Regional Economic Expansion what measures are about to be taken to recover, or at least explore the possibility of recovering, some of this DREE allotment in this industry, as in others, as is required by law, and to keep closer control over situations such as this?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the specific details of the case mentioned by the hon. member, but I will endeavour to get information and will get back to him as soon as possible.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DRILLING IN BEAUFORT SEA—POSSIBILITY OF COMPLAINTS FROM OTHER COUNTRIES ABOUT RISK OF OIL SPILL AND CO-OPERATION ON CLEAN-UP

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment and concerns some of the statements made in the Berger Report about Beaufort Sea drilling. Has Canada received any representations concerning oil spill risk in the general Arctic from any of the neighbouring countries with which Canada shares the Arctic, either from the United States or from the Soviet Union? If so, can the minister advise the House what kinds of representations we have received and whether any negotiations are underway with countries in the Arctic in terms of oil spill technology, oil spill clean-up or co-operation in developing Arctic resources, in view of the very high environmental risk in that area?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am familiar with representations made on behalf of the government of the United States expressing concern, concern which we share, about the risk involved in Beaufort Sea drilling. In fact, we have kept them closely informed of our procedures in the last year. We will also inform them of the changes we are asking for this year if drilling goes ahead. We are sharing information with the United States government. As for sharing information with the Soviet authorities, I would have to check the record to know exactly where we are with that one.

SUGGESTED INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON DEVELOPMENT OF ARCTIC

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister advise the House, in view of the co-operation which is needed in the Arctic, whether he favours an international conference of the polar countries in terms of the development of the Arctic; and in view of the recommendations in the report, would the minister also advise the House whether he looks favourably upon the formation of a national wilderness park on the slope, upon the whale sanctuary as outlined in the report, and also upon the bird sanctuary in the Mackenzie delta?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Well, Mr. Speaker, I will have to admit to the hon. member that having just returned to Ottawa at lunch time I have not yet had a chance to read the Berger report; I have read only press reports on the report at this time. I am certainly in favour of any exchange of information with the international community on problems which are as vital as these.

AGRICULTURE

POSSIBLE CANCELLATION OF QUOTAS FOR FLUID MILK PRODUCERS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

During the year 1976-77, fluid milk producers managed to get 25 per cent of the quotas of manufacturing milk producers through the producers' boards, which situation is unfair and has reduced some manufacturing milk producers' quotas to what they were in 1971; can the minister tell us whether he is aware of that situation and, if so, what does he intend to do to improve it?

● (1500)

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we are meeting in the supply management committee tomorrow with, I hope, a majority of the ministers of agriculture concerned with this dairy problem. I understand there has been some inequity in the programs administered by the provinces and by the Canadian Dairy Commission. I do not think there are very many things which are perfect in this world, either.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Precisely to guarantee fairness to manufacturing milk producers, can the minister tell us whether he intends to suggest to them or their boards that they cancel present manufacturing milk quotas now held by the fluid milk producers in order to redistribute them among the manufacturing milk producers so that their production can reflect the year 1975-76?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, all the quotas that come under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Dairy Commission are administered by the provinces within the provinces. They are given a share of the national quota, and they administer them within the provinces.

POSSIBILITY OF MAKING MONTREAL DESIGNATED AREA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

As 40 per cent of all construction workers in metropolitan Montreal are unemployed, and bearing in mind the severe rate of unemployment in the manufacturing industry in Montreal, can the minister tell the House whether he intends to make it a designated area?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I trust, Mr. Speaker, that when the cabinet or government have taken a decision with regard to the possibility of giving assistance to the Montreal area, I shall have the wholehearted support of my colleagues of the opposition, including of course, the hon. member for Hochelaga.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. This is a day which is auspicious in the life of government, and I daresay of this parliament, because it marks the first anniversary of the Prime Minister's statement that separatism in Canada is dead. I wonder if the Acting Prime Minister could inform the House whether it is the intention of this government to honour this day by making any other predictions.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NYSTROM—SAFETY OF GRAIN ELEVATOR EMPLOYEES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I notified your office on Friday about a question of privilege. It was to be pursued yesterday, but the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) was not in the House; therefore, I wish to pursue it today.

In 1975 the minister of labour named Dean W. D. L. Finn, from the University of British Columbia, to head a one-man commission to investigate health and safety in grain elevators on the British Columbia waterfront. This commission was established following a tragic incident on October 3, 1975, in which five men died in a fire at the Burrard terminal. Dean Finn's report, which the Minister of Labour has had since October 7, details a potentially chummy relationship between some of the grain company management officials and the federal labour inspectors who have failed properly to enforce the law and safety regulations.

In his report, Dean Finn says working conditions in grain elevators are hazardous because the companies are behind the times in controlling explosive grain dust, use of electrical equipment is not up to standard, and they are casual in their use of pesticides. Not only has the governement failed to act on the Finn report, but it has failed to act following previous elevator disasters and investigations.

In the House, on April 20, 1977, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) directed a question to the Minister of Labour as follows:

In view of the recent government report on health and safety conditions in the country's grain elevators, which describes working conditions as deplorable at best, will the minister inform the House what action his department will be taking to ensure that the health and safety of Canada's 31,000 grain handlers will be protected?

The Minister of Labour replied:

Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wish to thank the hon. member for his expression of interest in this particular matter. It is a particularly troublesome matter. The department has upgraded its regulations very substantially to require a much higher level of safety and attention to the environment of grain handlers working in this country. We have also appointed a commission headed by Dr. Finn of the University of British Columbia.

The Minister of Labour went on to say that the final report of that commission had not been received. Last Friday, May 6, I pursued the same matter with the Minister of Labour in response to an article which had appeared in the Vancouver Sun on the previous Saturday which stated that the Minister of Labour had received the final report. I asked him about that final report and he said:

Dr. Finn's group has been studying the matter. When the report is available we will do what we did in the case of the Cape Breton mines—

I went on to ask him, and I quote from Hansard the following:

I would like to ask the minister whether he can confirm that he has now had the report since last October 7, and some of the unions have had it for five months.

The Minister of Labour said:

We do not have the final report. The hon. member may very well be dealing with the reports and findings of Dr. Finn. As he has progressed, naturally he has made his findings available to the parties who are co-operating with him to ensure the highest standards. As these findings and views are made known, it is in the interest of all parties and, I am sure, Dr. Finn's wish, that they receive them in a piecemeal fashion, so to say, so that action can be taken concurrently with the progress of the inquiry.

He went on to say they had not received the final report. Our offices have contacted Dean Finn, who has confirmed that the minister received the final report last October. The minister has either been misleading the House, misinforming the House, or he just does not know what goes on in his department. We have also contacted numerous officials in the minister's department and they confirmed that they have had the report since last October, and that the details in the Vancouver Sun article which talks about the report being in the hands of the minister last October 7 are accurate. These are officials in the minister's own department.

Given the points I have already raised, that this is a serious health and safety problem and that the minister has had the report for a long time, I have to conclude the minister is misleading the House or he is being very negligent in his duties as Minister of Labour. Mr. Speaker, if you find I have a legitimate point of privilege, I am prepared to move a motion referring the apparent misleading of the House by the Minister of Labour to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should advise the House and the hon. member that I am pleased to detect the tremendous interest that not only the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) is displaying but also that of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) in this very serious situation on the west coast.

Of course, this tragedy happened some time ago. We acted with dispatch in having the union and management come together, almost immediately, with respect to the constitution of an inquiry under Dr. Finn and detailing terms of reference so that he could do an adequate job. During all this activity of an urgent nature, undertaken with sincerity not only by myself but my officials and the interested parties concerned, there was no expression of interest shown in the House of Commons by any of the opposition members. Now the question of the report is raised. It is quite true that the interpretation of my remarks could be misleading: I concede that, Mr. Speaker. The fact of the matter is that the report of Dr. Finn was given to the parties the minute it was ready in its English version so that action could be taken right away.

As I indicated in my answer to the hon. member, it is not a matter you can delay. An official report is a report that is in both official languages and in my hands in that official way. Then I can decide to table it in the House of Commons in the appropriate fashion. That is the only fashion that is appropriate in terms of the official receipt and tabling of the report, when it is ready in both official languages. We did not feel we could wait until the translation was completed. It was in the English language only, and we wanted it in the hands of the parties so that it could be acted upon. That, indeed, happened. I would expect the French version to be completed within a week to ten days.

An hon. Member: Seven months.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): It is a very detailed and technical report. Our translation services have had other reports which require translation. I agree that it sounds like a long time, but there is constant urging to get reports like this put into both official languages. Other priorities had to be served. In the meantime, though, the findings of Dr. Finn have been made known to the parties for action. So the fact that the report has not been officially tabled in the House has not been allowed to delay action with respect to it.

That is the situation. I hope to be able to place the report in the hands of all members within the next two weeks when it can be presented in both official languages.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) gave the Chair notice of a question of privilege last Friday. Yesterday he indicated he would prefer to raise it in the presence of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) who was unavoidably absent. Therefore, he brings it forward today. It raises the question of the possibility of the House being misled by the minister's answers concerning the tabling of a report. In any event, the minister has now explained the reason for his answers. He concedes that they may have appeared to mislead the House but places an interpretation upon his answers which absolves him of any culpability in that regard. Other members may have a different interpretation, but that falls within the area of disagreement and dispute; it does not fall within the area of privilege.

Mr. MacKay: I rise on a brief point of order, Mr. Speaker. Since I did not have an opportunity to direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, might I make a brief representation to him? When he speaks in the debate this afternoon, would he deal with the question of the steps which are being taken to monitor more closely DREE-assisted industries which receive substantial funding and subsequently close? What steps are being taken to recover any loss of funds which result from the failure of these companies to fulfil their commitments?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member should realize that the Chair will not allow him to make such a brief representation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PLANT QUARANTINE ACT

AMENDMENT TO ENSURE AQUATIC MAROPHYTES INCLUDED IN PLANT PEST LEGISLATION

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-419, to amend the Plant Quarantine Act.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to amend the Plant Quarantine Act to ensure that aquatic plants coming into Canada, for example in aquariums containing exotic fish, are not subject to infection, so that noxious weeds such as Eurasian water milfoil do not get into our water systems.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

RESEARCH INTO CAUSES OF CANCER

Question No. 926—Mr. Muir:

In each year since 1965, what has been the total federal allocation to basic research directed towards an understanding of the causes of cancer?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned:

	Research (average) (Including testing and salaries)	Evaluation (Including evaluation and salaries)
1975-1976	$75,000	$50,400
1974-1975	75,000	43,500
1973-1974	75,000	27,500
1972-1973	75,000	17,600
1965-1972	240,000 (Estimated)

In so far as the Medical Research Council is concerned:

1975-1976	$4,751,819
1973-1974	3,752,149
1972-1973	3,515,318
1971-1972	3,316,297

NOTE: Information for the years previous to 1971-72 is not available.

NON-MEDICAL USE OF DRUGS DIRECTORATE

Question No. 1,211—Mr. Stanfield:

What, if any, are the criteria employed by the Department of National Health and Welfare's Non-Medical Use of Drugs Directorate in determining which groups, associations, projects, agencies or individuals qualify for a contribution or grant for (a) information/education projects (b) innovative projects (c) research, sociological and biomedical studies dealing with the non-medical use of drugs?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): (a) and (b) Through the Alcohol, Tobacco and Drug Resources Fund, the Department of National Health and Welfare's Non-Medical Use of Drugs Directorate makes contributions to projects which meet the directorate's national program goals. These goals are defined within well-established major result areas, of which the following relate more specifically to the Alcohol, Tobacco and Drug Resources Fund: effective information and advocacy programs; effective education programs; effective means of early identification and intervention; effective treatment and rehabilitation measures. The explicit purposes of the fund are: to facilitate community mobilization and action that support the achievement of priority goals; to experiment with and demonstrate the effectiveness of new programs or methodologies that have application beyond the immediate location of the project; and to facilitate joint action with one or more provinces, voluntary or professional groups or businesses where such action will facilitate achievement of priority goals and will have application beyond the immediate location of the project. Any public or private health or social service agency, community or citizens' organization or individual, with demonstrated ability to conceptualize, develop and manage demonstration projects in the above-noted areas, is eligible for consideration for financial support under the Alcohol, Tobacco and Drug Resources Fund. (c) The extramural research programs of the Non-Medical Use of Drugs Directorate have as their primary function the encouragement and support of research directed to providing information about all facets of the non-medical use of drugs. The directorate is particularly interested in research projects which will result in the development of scientific information pertinent to prevention, treatment and rehabilitation programs dealing with problems associated with drug abuse. Applications are assessed for scientific merit with particular reference to the adequacy of the methodology including specification of the subject sample, procedures, statistical design and analysis, when appropriate. Investigators holding an academic appointment in any Canadian educational institution, having an affiliation with an accredited treatment facility, or holding an appointment in a private or public research laboratory are eligible to apply for research support under this program. Occasionally proposals from other persons possessing less formal qualifications for research but having special interest and opportunities relevant to the NMUD priorities will be considered for support.

NON-MEDICAL USE OF MOOD-ALTERING SUBSTANCES PROGRAM

Question No. 1,212—Mr. Stanfield:

What, if any, are the criteria employed by the Department of National Health and Welfare under the Non-Medical Use of Mood-Altering Substances Programme in determining which groups, associations, projects, agencies or individuals qualify for a contribution or grant for (a) information/education projects dealing with the non-medical use of drugs (b) innovative projects dealing with mood-altering substances (1975-76) (c) research, sociological and biomedical studies dealing with the non-medical use of drugs?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): (a), (b) and (c) Please see answer to Question No. 1,211 answered this day.

REPORT ON RAILWAY PENSIONS

Question No. 1,251—Mr. Jones:

1. Will the report on railway pensions be tabled in the House and, if so, on what date?

2. Is the delay in tabling due to translation difficulties and, if so, will the government consider tabling the English version immediately?

3. Will the report be implemented and, if so, on what date?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): 1 and 2. It is not customary to table industrial inquiry commission reports, but the report was released in both official languages to all concerned, including members of parliament, at the end of January, 1977.

3. Implementation of the report will be up to all parties concerned after full consideration of its implications.

STORAGE OF POWDERED MILK AND BUTTER

Question No. 1,468—Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton):

What was the amount of (a) powdered milk (b) butter in storage in Canada as of December 31, 1976 and, in each case, in what locations and in what quantities?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): (a) Stocks for skim milk powder held by the Canadian Dairy Commission, not including stocks held by the private trade, at December 31, 1976, were as follows:

Province	Pounds
Maritimes	1,818,100
Quebec	249,140,850
Ontario	20,924,250
Manitoba	7,740,700
Alberta	13,802,350
Saskatchewan	3,460,150
British Columbia	546,900
Total in Canada	297,433,300

(b) Stocks for creamery butter held by the Canadian Dairy Commission, not including stocks held by the private trade, at December 31, 1976, were as follows:

Province	Pounds
Maritimes	632,072
Quebec	33,197,472
Ontario	6,308,792
Manitoba	520,408
Alberta	334,488
British Columbia	3,879,624
Total in Canada	44,872,856

STUDENT SUMMER EMPLOYMENT PROGRAMS

Question No. 1,713—Mr. Howie:

For the year 1976, did the Department of National Health and Welfare have any student summer employment programmes in (a) Canada (b) New Brunswick and, if so, in each case (i) what were they (ii) how many persons were given direct summer employment and what were the wages (iii) what was the cost?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In 1976, the Department of National Health and Welfare sponsored summer student employment through the following channels: The Health Activities Summer Employment Program (HASEPS) provided students with work experience in the health field through the funding of projects undertaken by volunteer health and health related organizations. The Non-Medical Use of Drugs Support to Community Agencies Program provided students with employment through projects funded for the purpose of gathering and distributing information on the Non-Medical Use of Drugs or evaluating the existing programs and services. The aim of the program was to support communities in their endeavours to cope with problems of drug abuse with a high priority given to problems related to abuse of alcohol. Through normal direct summer hiring the department was able to provide summer employment to students. (a) and (b) (i), (ii) and (iii):

	(i) Number of Students	(ii) Wages and Benefits	(iii) Operational Costs
HASEPS Program
Canada	381	$575,139.34	$47,113.03
New Brunswick	21	$ 29,246.47	$ 2,012.00
Non-Medical Use of Drugs Support to Community Agencies Program
Canada	194	$388,666.00	$62,104.00
New Brunswick	10	$ 17,091.00	$ 1,264.00
Direct Departmental Hiring
Canada	117	$297,648.60	operational costs
New Brunswick	nil	nil	New Brunswick nil
	Total Number of Students 692	Total Wages and Benefits $1,261,453.94	Total Operational Costs $109,217.03

NOTE: (iii) Operational Costs: HASEPS: Operational costs for projects were allowed for approved HASEPS projects in an amount not to exceed 10 per cent of salary expenses. These costs covered expenses for the successful completion of a project such as printing, travel, telephone, rental of equipment and office supplies. The Non-Medical Use of Drugs Support to Community Agencies Program: Operational costs represent expenditures incurred by projects such as rental of premises, telephone, transportation, printing and office supplies. Operational costs were not to exceed 15 per cent of salary expenses. Normal direct summer hiring: The cost for direct departmental hiring involved the use of continuing departmental staff and hence is not separately identifiable.

PONCEAU SX (RED DYE No. 4)

By category and brand, to which prepared foods on sale in Canada is it permitted for a manufacturer to add Ponceau SX (Red Dye No. 4)?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Ponceau SX may be added to the following categories of foods: fruit Peel; glazed fruits; maraschino cherries. The Food and Drug Regulations do not, at present, require manufacturers of food products to inform the Health Protection Branch of the presence of this colour in their products.

FOREIGN CONTRACTS FOR COIN PRODUCTION

Question No. 1,860—Mr. Huntington:

1. Are the new foreign contracts for coin production with Bangladesh, Barbados, Costa Rica, Israel, Nicaragua, Panama and Portugal on a cash payment basis and, if not, are they financed through CIDA and/or EDC?

2. If such contracts are financed through CIDA and/or EDC, what are the terms in each case?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by Supply and Services Canada and Export Development Corporation as follows: 1. The only contract assisted financially by CIDA is the one with the government of the People's Republic of Bangladesh.

2. CIDA, through a commodity grant, has participated in the Bangladesh order by providing shipping costs and metals from which the coins are made. The Government of Bangladesh pays the RCM for all other production costs via an irrevocable Letter of Credit.

1 and 2. Export Development Corporation has no contract.

HANSEN'S DISEASE

Question No. 1,932—Mr. Epp:

1. How many documented cases of Hansen's disease (Leprosy) exist at the present time in (a) British Columbia (b) Alberta (c) Saskatchewan (d) Manitoba (e) Ontario (f) Quebec (g) New Brunswick (h) Nova Scotia (i) Prince Edward Island (j) Newfoundland?

2. How many documented cases of Hansen's disease existed in Canada in (a) 1965 (b) 1970 (c) 1975?

Order Paper Questions

3. What record is there in Canada of contagion of Hansen's disease, either in the traditional way, or through the possibility of genetics?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. (a) British Columbia 9; (b) Alberta 5; (c) Saskatchewan 2; (d) Manitoba 6; (e) Ontario 68; (f) Quebec 8; (g) New Brunswick 0; (h) Nova Scotia 0; (i) Prince Edward Island 0; (j) Newfoundland 1.

2. (a) 38; (b) 51; (c) 92.

3. Information available on record indicates that less than one third of the registered cases of Leprosy may still be infectious. All of those infected persons, with only one possible exception, acquired the disease outside of Canada, while residing in endemic areas. Effective treatment is available and communicability is considered low. There is no evidence to indicate that genetic factors play a role in the actual transmission of Hansen's disease.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A CANADIAN SOURCE OF SUPPLY FOR INFLUENZA VACCINES

Question No. 2,001—Mr. Yewchuk:

Did the Armand Frappier Institute receive government funding in 1976 for the purpose of establishing a Canadian source of supply for influenza vaccines and, if so, in what amount?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes. During the fiscal year 1975-76, the Armand Frappier Institute received $200,000 from the Department of National Health and Welfare to establish a Canadian source of supply for influenza vaccines.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Question No. 2,012—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. How many persons in Canada, and in each province, are in receipt of the Old Age Security pension?

2. Of the recipients of the Old Age Security pension, how many persons in Canada, and in each province, are in receipt of the Guaranteed Income Supplement?

3. Of those receiving the Guaranteed Income Supplement, how many persons in Canada, and in each province, are receiving the full amount?

4. What is the average amount, in Canada, and in each province, being received as a Guaranteed Income Supplement by recipients of the Old Age Security pension?

5. Do the answers to the above questions take into consideration persons living outside of Canada who are in receipt of the Old Age Security pension and, if so, how many of such persons are there, and if they are considered as belonging to the various provinces, what is the number for each province?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

Province or Territory	1 Number of people receiving OAS	2 Number of people receiving GIS	3 Number of people receiving maximum GIS
Newfoundland	37,419	30,714	19,607
Prince Edward Island	13,376	9,915	4,578
Nova Scotia	81,146	54,191	24,453
New Brunswick	61,560	41,109	19,231
Quebec	489,582	308,122	144,656
Ontario	734,286	342,128	105,916
Manitoba	107,188	61,951	21,441
Saskatchewan	103,300	56,901	20,439
Alberta	136,764	78,229	29,214
British Columbia	237,687	123,942	44,457
Northwest Territories	1,089	839	720
Yukon	584	330	223
Total	2,003,981	1,108,371	434,935

NOTE: The above figures represent persons in receipt of OAS/GIS as of December 1976.

4. The average amount of guaranteed income supplement received in Canada is $77.29. By province, the average guaranteed income supplement received is as follows: Newfoundland, $84.40; Prince Edward Island, $80.22; Nova Scotia, $80.24; New Brunswick, $81.90; Quebec, $81.35; Ontario, $73.12; Manitoba, $75.52; Saskatchewan, $76.76; Alberta, $76.11; British Columbia, $75.52.

5. Yes. People who receive the Old Age Security Pension outside of Canada are paid from the regional office in the province in which they last resided. The statistical breakdown is as follows:

Province	Number of people receiving the Old Age Security pension outside of Canada
Newfoundland	96
Prince Edward Island	72
Nova Scotia	418
New Brunswick	351
Quebec	3,484
Ontario	5,522
Manitoba	576
Saskatchewan	366
Alberta	644
British Columbia	2,399
Total	13,928

NOTE: The above figures represent persons receiving the Old Age Security payments abroad as of December 1976.

CHEDDAR CHEESE PRODUCTION IN ALBERTA

Question No. 2,051—Mr. Schellenberger:

1. During the past three years, what was the cheddar cheese production in Alberta as compared to Canada?

2. In what category has the cheddar cheese produced in Alberta been classified by inspectors of the Department of Agriculture?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1.

	Alberta (pounds)	Canada (pounds)
1974/75	4,966,000	190,560,000
1975/76	6,838,000	179,399,000
1976/January 77	5,723,000	145,674,000

2.	First Grade (pounds)	Undergrade (pounds)	Not Graded* (pounds)
1974/75	4,027,000	711,000	228,000
1975/76	4,750,000	1,163,000	925,000
1976/January 77	4,608,000	342,000	773,000

*Grading of cheddar cheese is not mandatory pursuant to the Canada Dairy Products Act and Regulations.

ANIMAL DISEASES

Question No. 2,060—Mr. Schellenberger:

1. At federally inspected livestock sales yards, are veterinarians in any way held responsible for the sale of diseased animals?

2. Has the Health of Animals Branch of the Department of Agriculture considered IBR as an infectious contagious disease and, if so, will it place special emphasis on inspecting and then advising the purchaser of the seriousness of the disease?

3. Will the government institute in public yards educational posters and pamphlets advising purchasers to isolate all animals purchased for sales yards for a number of weeks in order to eliminate much hardship?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. A veterinarian is at each terminal stockyard to inspect animals for evidence of disease, and animals showing clinical symptoms are not released for breeder or feeder purposes.

2. Yes. IBR is not uncommon in Canada, and most livestock owners are aware that an acute outbreak can have serious consequences. Wherever possible, the Health of Animals Branch advises purchasers about IBR.

3. The Health of Animals Branch has always recommended isolation of additions to a herd. IBR is not a disease condition dealt with under the Animal Disease and Protection Act and Regulations and, therefore, there is no plan to institute educational posters and pamphlets on this disease in public yards, at the federal level.

CONSTRUCTION OF GUY FAVREAU CENTRE—MONTREAL, QUEBEC

Question No. 2,230—Mr. Herbert:

1. Has it been established when construction will start on the Guy Favreau Centre in Montreal?

2. What work has been authorized to design teams and what was the suggested date for completion of authorized design work?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works): 1. No.

2. Design teams have been authorized to proceed with the preparation of structural, electrical, mechanical and architectural working drawings. No date for completion of the authorized design work has been set.

GRAIN ELEVATORS

Question No. 2,271—Mr. Neil:

What (a) is the present capacity (b) has been the throughput for the past three crop years, of the terminal elevators located at the Pacific Coast, Churchill, Thunder Bay and the various eastern transfer elevators?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture):

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT GRANT—RED-HEADED PINE SAWFLY

Question No. 2,274—Mr. Beatty:

What is the expected benefit to the taxpayer to be derived from his contribution of $53,342 to Department of Supply and Services' Research and Development grant number 01SU KL013-6-0045 (OSU76-00226) entitled "Tests to demonstrate the safety of an insect virus-nuclear polyhedrosis of the redheaded pine sawfly"?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): DSS contract number O1SUKL013-6-0045 (0SU76-00226), the correct title of which is "Tests of mammalian infectivity and/or toxicity of the nuclear polyhedrosis virus of the red-headed pine sawfly, Neodiprion lecontei (Fitch)", is part of an on-going research program to develop more effective and safer pest insect control methods. The red-headed pine sawfly is a serious pest of red pine plantations in southern and central Ontario and south-central Quebec. It causes extensive mortality in young red pine plantations, and damage to jack, Scots, and other pines. These safety trials will provide information required to register the virus for operational use. Once the virus has been registered, the forest manager will have an economical, effective, and environmentally acceptable alternative to the chemical insecticides which must now be used for the control of the red-headed pine sawfly. Treatment will be effective over several years, thus avoiding repeated annual treatments.

DND GARBAGE REMOVAL AND DISPOSAL CONTRACT OTT76/24969/1

Question No. 2,275—Mr. McKinnon:

Is the cost of DND garbage removal and disposal contract, OTT76/24969/1 for the sum of $486,619, let to Charette's General Trucking of Petawawa, Ontario, over ten times the average of four other garbage contracts published in the Weekly Bulletin of Business Opportunities Volume 4, Number 9 and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): No. The contract OTT76/24969/1 is for a period of four years while the other contracts listed are for one or two years. The five contracts are not comparable in terms of the number of pick-up points, frequency of pick-ups, population at the bases or stations and type of service, i.e. containerized vs compacter trucks.

GRANT TO BÉLANGER-TAPPEN COMPANY FOR CONSTRUCTION OF PLANT AT ST. BRUNO, COUNTY OF CHAMBLY

Question No. 2,293—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Did Bélanger-Tappen Company request a grant for the construction of a refrigerator plant at St-Bruno, County of Chambly and, if so, has any decision been taken by DREE?

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: No. The County of Chambly is not located within the designated area of Quebec under the Regional Development Incentives Act.

NUMBER OF PERSONS IN OFFICIALLY RECOGNIZED SENIOR CITIZEN HOUSING ACCOMMODATION

Question No. 2,366—Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton):

Does the Department of National Health and Welfare keep records of the number of persons in officially recognized senior citizen housing accommodation and, if so, how many (a) are in such accommodation (b) receive the guaranteed annual income supplement in addition to the basic pension?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No. (a) and (b) Information unavailable.

[English]

Mr. Clarke: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am not celebrating an anniversary such as that referred to by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, but today marks six months since Question No. 1,019 was placed on the order paper on November 10 last. I realize that many dozens of questions are older than that. Some have been on the order paper since October 12, the first day of the second session of the thirtieth parliament. I should like to remind the parliamentary secretary that it is an easy question, one which does not require great study. It concerns federal expenditures on public transportation facilities, and it would be very helpful if the government could answer it soon.

Mr. Goodale: The hon. member raised this point with me informally in the last day or two. I did make some inquiries to determine where the matter stands at the present time. I think it is fair to say that the question is not as simple as the hon. member suggests. I might also draw attention to the fact that in the course of this session nearly 2,500 questions have been placed on the order paper and that almost 70 per cent of them have been answered already. We are endeavouring to answer all questions as quickly as possible.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on Monday the parliamentary secretary was kind enough to inform me that Question No. 642 would be answered today. I presume something occurred to prevent the answer being made available. Is it the intention to answer this question tomorrow?

Mr. Goodale: I am not sure I can give an undertaking that it will be answered tomorrow, but I think it will be in the near future.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO IMPROVE EMPLOYMENT SITUATION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont) moved:

That in the opinion of this House, the government's abandonment of its commitment to develop strong regional economies and its failure to give priority to regional needs in designing national fiscal, transport, energy and trade policies has resulted in a crisis of economic stagnation and unprecedented unemployment in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there has been such day to day concern about the basic fabric and future of this country among Canadians that those who live outside the five eastern provinces tend to overlook the existence of a deepening and widening crisis with respect to the lives and, indeed, the possibilities open to those who live in Atlantic Canada and Quebec. This debate is about Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, presently in the grip of record unemployment and economic stagnation, two regions which would not be in such a position today had the government gone even halfway toward living up to its promise of the late sixties to eradicate regional economic and social disparities.

This debate is about regional development. It is not about the Department of Regional Economic Expansion because the indifferent record of DREE in implementing lasting solutions to what the Economic Council of Canada has described as intolerable levels of disparity across Canada is only one aspect of the government's sad abandonment of this country's have-not regions and their aspirations. This debate is about the indifference, callousness, insensitivity and forgetfulness shown with regard to the legitimate economic needs of Quebec and Atlantic citizens especially on the part of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his cabinet colleagues responsible for finance, energy, transport, industry and manpower, to name only a few.

More important still, this debate is about the 408,000 people in eastern Canada who are without jobs, and what this means in terms of their ability to participate in the affairs of Canada, both today and tomorrow, and make a contribution to its development as equals. As a party which is prepared, when it forms a government, to take seriously its responsibilities as they concern the basic needs of those who live in the five eastern provinces, we bring these matters forward.

When you strip away the rhetoric which has been used by the Prime Minister and his colleagues, the fact is that the commitment which was made in the late sixties has not been met. Rather than being reduced, the disparity between the regions has widened. Economic differences have become more exaggerated and more critical. To eradicate or even chip away at disparity, the have-not regions must grow at a rate not just equal to the national level but faster than their wealthier neighbours in the other provinces. Not only has this not been occurring, but it is a fact that we are growing at an even slower pace.

I want to document that in a number of ways, but perhaps nothing stands out more clearly in the failure of this government adequately to deal with regional disparity than the comparison of rates of unemployment between 1970, a year after the department was created, to the end of 1976. In 1970, as the department was getting started in its responsibilities, the unemployment rate in Canada was 5.7 per cent. In the Atlantic provinces it was 6.2 per cent. There was something like an 8.7 per cent differential between the Canadian and the Atlantic averages. In 1971, Canada's rate of unemployment was 6.2 per cent and in the Atlantic region it was 7.1 per cent. In 1972, in Canada it was 6.2 per cent, and in the Atlantic region it was 7.8 per cent. In 1973, in Canada, it was 5.6 per cent, and in the Atlantic region it was 8 per cent. In 1974, in Canada, it was 5.4 per cent and in the Atlantic region it was 8.5 per cent. In 1975 it was 6.9 per cent for Canada, and 9.9 per cent for the Atlantic region. In 1976, 7.1 per cent for Canada and 11 per cent for the Atlantic region.

This indicates an increase in those seven years, during the presumed commitment of the federal government to alleviate regional disparity, of an unemployment rate that started by being 8.7 per cent greater than the national average and at the end of last year stood at 55 per cent greater. If that is evidence of the kind of commitment or performance of the government, then heaven deliver us from it because it is certainly not something that citizens in Atlantic Canada or Quebec can afford for a minute longer.

I want to indicate the implications of this in terms of the present situation with respect to private investment, something that this government has theoretically addressed in recent budgets. The disparity is widening in private investment, the crucial source of new jobs and higher incomes in any region. In terms of the capital investment intentions of the private sector in manufacturing, for Canada they are up by a very modest 3.5 per cent, but for Newfoundland they are down 11.6 per cent; for Prince Edward Island, down 35.6 per cent; for Nova Scotia, down 8 per cent; for New Brunswick, down 11.6 per cent; and for the Atlantic region as a whole, they are down 10.7 per cent. As I said a moment ago, they are up for Canada by 3.5 per cent.

It is obvious that the disparity is widening in productivity and output. In terms of the real domestic output for 1976, the Canadian average was 4.6 per cent, but Quebec suffered the lowest rise of all ten provinces, with 2.9 per cent. In the other eastern provinces there was a domestic rise of 3.1 per cent in Newfoundland to 3.8 per cent in Nova Scotia, all well below the Canadian average. It is obvious that disparity is widening in unemployment where after each successive business downturn the gap between the rest of Canada and Quebec and the Atlantic provinces does not only remain greater but is increased. Last year, with almost half of Canada's unemployed in the five eastern provinces, only 18 per cent of the new jobs were created in those five provinces, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) had the gall in a speech which he made recently on his latest budget to admit that his budget is not going to change the situation during the upcoming year. That is some commitment to the alleviation of regional disparity!

I believe it is possible to identify two highly significant reasons why the present government, with the vast resources at its disposal, has presided over the widening of the disparity gap between our regions. The first is that they have depended almost totally on transfer payments by the two individual governments as a solution to disparity. They have done almost nothing to help our so-called have-not regions to develop the economic base necessary to sustain themselves. For instance, in 1975-76 we find that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion spent in the Atlantic provinces a total of $204 million. That compares with equalization and transfer payments to provincial governments of $1.2 billion. The productive investment in the Atlantic region, therefore, amounted to less than one-sixth of the moneys that were spent there for the maintenance of services on a provincial basis. This does not even take into account the additional $1.3 billion spent in the regions under family allowances, pensions and unemployment insurance.

All of this is bad enough, but if you compare the figures that were tabled a few nights ago by the minister responsible for DREE (Mr. Lessard) in the committee, you will see the alarming developments that are taking place with respect to the expenditure of federal funds. In 1971-72, DREE program expenditures were listed at $141.2 million, while equalization and transfer payments to provincial governments stood at $696.2 million. In 1975-76, however, DREE program expenditures had only increased, as I said, to $204 million, whereas equalization and transfer payments had risen to $1,238.4 million, indicating that the program expenditures of DREE, the money that is being expended to create employment, to create a more productive climate, has increased something like 65 per cent over that five-year period—65 per cent to 70 per cent—but the transfer payments for that same time period increased well over 90 per cent. This gives an indication of the lack of awareness or commitment in the performance of the present government with respect to dealing effectively with long-term and chronic unemployment situations.

It seems to me that the inability to realize development opportunities in eastern Canada has its most direct impact on employment. By 1974, as a direct result of the negative balance of trade between the Atlantic region and the other provinces, there was a net imbalance of some $1.5 billion, with a loss to the region of 60,486 jobs, meaning, quite frankly, that what we are faced with here by the administration of this government is a program of greater and greater dependency in which we may be in some way or other sustaining or maintaining a capacity to consume in the Atlantic provinces, but we are moving farther and farther away from creating viable, effective and self-actuating economies where employment can be created in the Atlantic region.

I realize that no single department can be expected by itself successfully to carry out the task of eradicating disparity, and that is why I said at the outset that I do not want to deal here exclusively or even primarily with DREE. I believe, as a matter of fact, that there must be the most closely co-ordinated policies and programs of all major federal departments. My colleagues, during the course of the debate today, will outline in specific terms what we expect to hear from the departments which manage transportation, energy, fiscal and tariff questions.

I want particularly to deal with the whole question of the fiscal responsibility of the government, because I believe it to be so crucial. As the minister well knows, I have discussed this with him. An initiative was taken within the context of the last budget, the principle of which I believe to be very important. The performance of the actual initiative taken, I think, was nothing more than a throw-away on the part of the government, and I want to deal with that in some substance. The Economic Council of Canada's recent study on regional disparity, entitled, "Living Together", focused much of its discussions on the unrealized potential of fiscal matters as a development tool. They said in one of their recommendations:

> We recommend that the mix of fiscal policy instruments used by the federal government . . . be chosen in such a way as to increase the proportion of national demand going to high unemployment regions.

Therefore, we are not alone in our view that the Minister of Finance should play a special, if not a central, role in regional development. To begin with, we have the failure to date of any kind of active role on the part of this Minister of Finance and this government to recognize, much less to do anything, about the serious inequalities of the Canadian banking system which, in its performance at least, appears to discriminate against the low-growth regions which reinforce their position in the Canadian economy as consumers instead of producers.

If we look at the situation in the first quarter of last year in the Atlantic area, which has almost 10 per cent of Canada's population, in terms of business loans we find that we received 7.3 per cent of business loans, amounting to less than $200,000; 6.7 per cent of business loans, amounting to between $200,000 and $1 million; 6.6 per cent of business loans, between $1 million and $5 million; and 4.7 per cent of those loans over $5 million. Yet with respect to personal loans, those which foster consumption rather than production, the region received more than its share from the Canadian banks, a little over 10 per cent.

Perhaps we can understand why we would not receive the $5 million-plus loans, because we know that in the Atlantic region we operate primarily on a smaller scale with respect to our industrial structure; but in a non-discriminatory financial system we should expect this deficiency to be overcompensated in the small loans category. Yet even for loans guaranteed under the Small Businesses Loans Act only one of the chartered banks even comes close to compensating for the low level of large loans going to the Atlantic region.

To give an idea of the situation as it stands at the present time, the Royal Bank directed 7.8 per cent of its lending under the Small Businesses Loans Act in 1975 to the Atlantic region; Canadian Imperial, 8.3 per cent; Bank of Montreal, 8 per cent; Toronto-Dominion, 0.5 per cent. All chartered banks averaged 8.9 per cent, and the only exception to this record of discrimination was the Bank of Nova Scotia, with 13.8 per cent.

In the creation of permanent jobs in eastern Canada we are obviously going to depend heavily on the private sector, which must be assured access to capital funding if it is to expand. Obviously, these figures are of critical importance to the future role private investment can play in the Atlantic region. Yet in the government's proposals for reform in the Canadian Banking system contained in the white paper on banking last August, no mention was made of the problem of making banks more responsive to the have-not regions' needs. There was no mention of how banking structures might be decentralized to promote local sensitivities. There was no mention of ways in which interest rates or collateral requirements can be made more equitable for the small businessman. There was no mention about how the banks might imaginatively be used to promote new entrepreneurship in low-growth areas. I mention these facts because I think the federal government has a leadership role to play, and to date there has certainly been no such role played by the Minister of Finance. Nor have I heard any of his colleagues, including the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, address themselves to what I believe is a very critical matter.

The failure of the Minister of Finance to take into account the critical needs of our have-not regions is again manifest in the tariff system for which he bears primary responsibility. I believe our tariff system creates enormous difficulty for the underdeveloped regions of the country. It is a system, if I can use a phrase which will have some reminiscences to it, of "loser pay" which protects some of the industrialized portions of the country while thwarting development initiatives in the have-not areas. Even the government of Ontario—Ontario being the industrial heartland of Canada—has recognized the difficulties, the discrimination and bias of our tariffs and publicly stated as recently as its most recent budget that there will be a gradual phase-out and change with respect to the situation concerning tariffs.

By 1974 the people of Atlantic Canada were losing, on balance, $178,516,000 annually, as a result of our tariff system, to other provinces. To put that amount into perspective, it is just under the total combined DREE budget for the four Atlantic provinces in 1975-76 or 2½ times DREE spending under RDIA in the region since the program began in 1969. Our tariff structures are truly a system of "loser pay" as far as the Atlantic region is concerned.

However, perhaps no single act better reflected the insensitivity to regional needs of the Minister of Finance than his latest budget. It was an inadequate, almost insulting response to the short-term job needs of Quebec and Atlantic Canada, with its 600,000 man-months or 18½ days of work during the next year for each unemployed Canadian. The budget was, quite frankly, a message of despair for millions of Canadians. It has been common knowledge for decades that in times of economic slowdown, regions such as Quebec, and especially Atlantic Canada, are first to be hit by any kind of restraint program which the federal government might exercise, and the last to recover. Yet the budget ignored this elementary fact about the Canadian economy.

There was a refusal to re-examine seriously, as was called for by the leader of my party and by others, government spending priorities in order to bring on stream various labour-intensive projects in eastern Canada. We need not just an expansion of short-term job creation which will in most instances leave nothing economically permanent in the community; we need to look at some major job creation projects which will be increasingly valuable in the future.

The hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) has repeatedly suggested over the years that there is a tremendous advantage to using Fundy tidal power. Energy is certainly a major cost factor, and this adds a further element of disparity. The government should take an imaginative and positive role with respect to that project. That would do an enormous amount of good for the whole Atlantic region.

The budget was silent on the development needs of the have-not regions except for one single, lonely measure. It proposed an additional investment tax credit above the national allowance of 5 per cent for the Atlantic provinces and Gaspé region, and 2.5 per cent for the remainder of Quebec. This is a measure about which the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion appears almost ecstatic, to the point where, without meaning to do so, he mislead this House in saying that it is the first time the Canadian tax system has recognized that there are differences between the various parts of the country. I want to remind the minister that it is not the first time. It is not even the second time. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) recognized the importance of tax policy as an instrument of regional development as far back as the budget of December 20, 1960, as did the late Prime Minister Pearson in the budget of June 13, 1963.

I can understand the minister waxing enthusiastic in those rare instances when one of his colleagues in the cabinet takes note of regional needs. However, instead of misleading us about the significance of this tax measure, I wonder why the minister did not choose to spell out its impact on the have-not regions.

The budget documents say that extension and enrichment of the investment allowance will put $385 million back into the hands of business. They do not say how much additional funds will go to business in areas starved for investment. Will it be $150 million, $50 million, or $5 million? Yet we are expected to take the minister's word that this is a significant measure in aid of those regions. How effective is this measure to be in generating new investment? How many jobs will it create? I hope the minister will have an opportunity to tell us during the course of this debate. In the face of the government's silence on these essential questions it is difficult not to conclude that this special tax allowance is either not all it is made out to be or, worse still, is next to useless.

There are other questions about this tax allowance which the government, it seems to me, has ignored. Why is the measure only good for three years? Where did those 5 per cent, 7.5 per cent and 10 per cent figures come from? What analysis were they based on which showed that these were the ideal differentials needed to promote regional investment? In fields such as research and development I would have thought something in the range of a 75 per cent to a 100 per cent tax allowance would be required in the Atlantic region. But no, the budget assumes that a simple 5 per cent above what industry in the rich provinces receives will be sufficient to bring research relevant to Atlantic needs up from its present near-zero level. In other words, the government has taken a commendable principle—and I have told the minister it is a commendable principle—of making the tax system sensitive to regional needs, and is now proceeding to bury it with tokenism.

I believe there is enormous potential in the use of federal fiscal powers to combat disparity and equalize opportunities among our regions. Why this government has not risen to the challenge is beyond comprehension. There is much that could be accomplished in promoting regional development goals at the very basis of those structures and institutions which govern our economy. There is much to be achieved in creating new jobs and new investment. Government spending is up, the federal tax intake is up and the national deficit is up, yet the Minister of Finance cannot find any money for worth-while programs in regional development.

Mr. Speaker, if this had been a Progressive Conservative budget, the central position of fiscal policy in any credible regional development program would have been extremely well recognized. I think there is no doubt about that, because successive leaders of this party, both in office and in opposition, have committed themselves to that basic principle. Unlike the government opposite, ours is a serious commitment to the comprehensive and total eradication of regional disparity across Canada. Under a Progressive Conservative budget, the have-not regions of Quebec and Atlantic Canada would today have such things as a tax rebate of 75 per cent for small businessmen investing in research and development; special tax rebates on inventory valuation for corporations investing there; long-term tax contracts for new industry, negotiated on a basis similar to the present incentive grants but which would be of much larger value to those industries—say until 150 per cent of their original investment is recovered; and a thorough examination of the priorities in capital spending of all departments in order to shift funding for labour-intensive projects to eastern areas now in the grip of a major unemployment crisis.

I believe these measures alone would have meant a significant improvement in the job and investment outlook for Quebec and for each Atlantic province. But they are by no means all we are prepared to do in order to demonstrate our total commitment to strong regional economies in eastern Canada as equal partners in the Canadian national economy. We would give immediate consideration to a range of policies designed not just to cover up the problem or give some kind of slapdash, band-aid approach as seems to be favoured as recently as this afternoon by the government House leader in his comments on unemployment, but we would get at the complex structural roots of disparity.

We would give tax incentives to companies in industrialized areas to enable them to participate in investment funds aimed at bringing new, modern, high-growth industrial systems to areas which are poorly developed, particularly in the province of Quebec which is going to need some major assistance in order to upgrade aspects of its industrial structure which is not now operating efficiently and cannot provide the jobs so badly needed. We would look at the real possibilities for co-ordinated support for critical areas in transport and energy. I know this will be dealt with later this afternoon when my colleagues from other provinces speak.

The Minister for Regional Economic Expansion sits almost alone. He seems to be caught by a problem that has engulfed this government with respect to dealing with regional disparity. It now seems to be suffering from a heavy dose of tunnel-vision. When the problem becomes one of regional development, the answer comes from one department after another, "Let Marcel do it." I have some sympathy for the minister because I think he is faced with an impossible task.

The minister has been asked by the government to address the fundamental problems of a number of provinces—particularly, today, the five eastern provinces to which we are addressing our attention—while his colleagues attend to their particular programs and projects. It may be because of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) with his nefarious "user pay" schemes, or the tariff policies of this government that can only be described as "loser pay " schemes. The minister tries to pick up the pieces after the initial and basic damage is done by his cabinet colleagues. He is in the unenviable position of trying to bolt the stable door after the horses have gone, after the economic damage has been wreaked on at least five eastern provinces.

I hope we might be able to give the minister some assistance today when we deal with the specifics of an adequate and effective policy for the government. I hope he will be able to go to his cabinet colleagues and say, "You have to co-operate with me and listen when I tell you that particular energy policies, tariff policies, budgetary programs, or whatever, are going to widen the gap and make the chronic unemployment situation more serious in several regions of Canada." Perhaps the minister will find enough courage today to do this.

When we drafted this motion, Mr. Speaker, we wanted to be of real assistance to the minister and any other members on the government side who are willing to recognize the seriousness of the situation. Since the early 1970s at least, there has been a declining commitment by this government with respect to the alleviation of regional disparities. The government has virtually abandoned its commitment to develop strong regional economies, and there is no effective co-ordination or support expressed in the day to day performance of programs.

Unless concerted action is taken now we will still be standing here in months to come talking about an even more serious situation. If the Minister of Finance is correct in his budget, then nothing adequate or effective will be done about unemployment and the increase of some 70,000 unemployed that took place over the last year in the five eastern provinces will become even worse in the next 12 months. That is not a situation which the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion or any of his colleagues who are genuinely concerned about the situation want to face. That is why we urge the minister and his colleagues to take more seriously the representations being made today and promise this House that they will mend their ways and effectively deal with the serious and lamentable situation in the five eastern provinces.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, may I begin by saying that of course we support the basic principle enunciated in this motion. We have been talking about the tragedy of mass unemployment for at least the last 15 months in this parliament. I found it interesting that on the first opportunity, the day after Mr. Justice Berger tabled his tremendously important report on the question of whether we should proceed in the near future with a pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley, the official opposition chose to discuss, instead, the question of unemployment, particularly in the Atlantic provinces and Quebec.

This is a tremendously important question, Mr. Speaker. According to Statistics Canada we have the highest number of unemployed and the highest rate of unemployment that Canada has experienced since they began keeping figures. In April 1977, 914,000 people were unemployed—an increase of 145,000 over the same month last year. That figure demonstrates clearly and conclusively how wrong the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) was in his forecasts in the last two budgets, and how wrong was the proposal he put forward in those two budgets to deal with the problem.

On a seasonally adjusted basis, the 914,000 people unemployed last year constituted 8.3 per cent of the work force. For years we have been told that between 3½ per cent and 4 per cent unemployment would mean full employment in Canada. We knew that 4 per cent unemployment nationally would mean double that in Quebec and probably close to triple that in Atlantic Canada. When we have 8.3 per cent unemployment on a seasonally adjusted basis nationally, we should not be surprised to find that in Atlantic Canada the unemployment rate is 13 per cent, on a seasonally adjusted basis, and in Quebec it is 9.8 per cent. If they did, and took the area east of Montreal, they would find that the seasonally adjusted rate, instead of being 5.8 per cent, is probably between 14 per cent and 15 per cent. Mr. Speaker, we do not accept such high levels of unemployment in 1977, any more than any parties in this House were willing to accept, at the end of World War II, a return to the massive unemployment of the prewar years.

Today we have the best educated group of young people we have ever seen in this country. It is unfortunate, therefore, that a Statistics Canada report released at the end of last week said that in this country there is a glut of university and college graduates which will continue for the next 15 years, possibly creating massive social, economic and political difficulties. The report predicts that some graduates of some programs may be forced to accept low-paying jobs which provide little responsibility, little scope for individual initiative and advancement and, hence, minimal satisfaction. I am sure almost every member of this House has heard of young constituents who, at considerable sacrifice and much hard work completed courses in community colleges or were awarded Bachelor of Arts, or similar degrees by institutions of higher education, only to find after all their hard work, no work available. Often there is no work in fields which the federal government or the provincial governments have encouraged them to enter.

I suggest our society is sick, Mr. Speaker. We use our resources in people poorly, encouraging our young to attend institutions of higher education but not providing jobs for them to fill after they graduate. Our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has told the young that perhaps they should move to another country if they cannot find work in this country, as if other countries which also suffer from unemployment would welcome an influx of our unemployed.

We are not talking about difficulties which will disappear next week, next month or next year. According to studies commissioned by the government, the unemployment rate next year in Newfoundland will be 16.4 per cent, and in 1978-79 it will be 17.4 per cent. In Nova Scotia, unemployment next year will be 10.8 per cent, and in 1978-79 it will be 11.3 per cent. In Quebec, unemployment next year will be 9.4 per cent, and in 1978-79 it will be 9.8 per cent. In regions of Quebec east of Montreal, unemployment will be between 12 per cent and 14 per cent, and in areas like the Gaspé in the order of 40 per cent or 50 per cent. But the government is not worried. Last December 7, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) was asked to tell the House what the government planned to do in order to cut back the high unemployment of last winter. Last winter's unemployment figures look pretty good when compared with current unemployment figures. According to the pamphlet "Unemployment in 1976", the minister expressed himself, in reply to a question as follows:

> I suppose one can make statistics prove almost anything, but the unemployment rate for men 25 years of age and over—and I suggest with respect that these are breadwinners—dropped (from October to November) to 4.2 per cent from 4.9 per cent and the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate for women in the same age group fell to 6.5 per cent from 6.9 per cent. However, the rate would not have fallen, it would have risen, had not thousands of women dropped out of the labour force.

The tens of thousands of high school and university graduates who will not find jobs this summer will find cold comfort in the minister's words. I am thinking, as well, of the many women who must work part-time or full-time in order to provide their families with a decent standard of living. Surely the minister's remarks illustrate his cynical approach to the problems of this country's ordinary people.

For a number of years the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has done its work in this country. Incidentally, I note that the minister of the department is to be the first spokesman on behalf of the government in the present debate. According to an Economic Council of Canada report released last month, the federal government, despite its efforts in the past decade to narrow regional economic disparities, has not succeeded, and those disparities remain intolerably large.

The Economic Council calls the high unemployment in some areas of the country a national disgrace. I challenge any member of the House, of any party, to disagree with that observation, especially in view of conditions in the Atlantic provinces and eastern Quebec. The Economic Council said that a person's economic well-being is sharply affected by the region in which one happens to be born or raised. Their recommendations include the following: that provincial governments in poorer areas should upgrade the educational qualifications and training of the local labour force; that provincial governments in poorer areas should undertake formal studies of low productivity levels and how best to take advantage of population shifts to urban centres in order to bolster manufacturing productivity; and that the mix of federal government spending should be changed to channel a higher proportion of it to high unemployment regions. The council concluded by saying:

> The council believes that the federal government's tendency to concentrate on the role of industrial structure, physical capital, endowment in natural resources and transportation in regional development has caused other equally important factors to be neglected.

The council's views do not surprise me. Any member of parliament, regardless of party affiliation, who has had dealings with people trying to work with the Department of Regional Economic Expansion will tell the same story. The federal department is insensitive to the opinions of the provinces. It will not listen to local views or consult local feelings. Federal officials assume they know all the answers. I know that in the case of my own province, Manitoba, officials were unable to reach agreement with federal officials after three years had been spent in attempts to institute a jointly-funded program in northern Manitoba.

In the absence of my colleague from Nova Scotia, let me put on record some of my views concerning the terrible situation existing on Cape Breton Island. The steel industry of the area employed thousands for many years, at relatively high rates of pay. Unfortunately, in the last couple of years it has been forced to lay off several thousand workers—and this in an area without alternative employment. The lay-offs are the direct result of the recession which has affected not only Canada but all western industrialized nations. But it is also largely the result of the fact that the previous private owners of the plant neglected for many years to invest their profits in the modernization of the plant and its facilities.

The result is that the plant, which has geographic disadvantages, added to everything else, is not now able to compete with other plants in Canada or elsewhere. The people of that area are faced with the requirement that the federal government and the provincial governments together must spend a very large sum of money—several hundred million dollars at least—to bring that plant up to modern productive capacity.

Failing that, there are only two alternatives that I can see for the people of that area. Either they will be permanently unemployed, with thousands of willing and able workers on permanent welfare, or they will be forced to move thousands of miles to new jobs, leaving behind houses, schools, hospitals and all the facilities which are needed in order to have a decent life: they will be empty, not being used. Their movement would require the building of new houses, schools, hospitals and recreational facilities in the cities to which they move. Why has this not been done? It is because this government does not believe in and cannot see its way clear to the kind of long-term, permanent planning of the economy which is necessary.

There are two problems. There is the long-term problem of how Canada, a country large in area with a relatively small population, can compete on the international markets and its own markets with other countries which have very efficient industries. I refer to such countries as the United States, Germany and France. The government has given no indication to parliament or the people of Canada that it is really thinking about these problems.

We have the immediate problem of over 900,000 people officially unemployed. If we include those who have withdrawn from looking for work because there is no work, young people and women, and those who are in our community colleges and Manpower training courses, many of them there because there are no jobs to which they can go, we are not talking about 900,000 or even a million, but probably 1¼ million people. Do we believe that nothing can be done about that?

On Monday night I watched a program on the CBC. It was on economics. The commentator was John Kenneth Galbraith. He repeated an argument which some of us have made on other occasions: he said that governments all across the western world did not believe they had the ability, and could not find the money to put to work between 20 per cent and 30 per cent of their work force which was employed in the period 1929 to 1939. After war was declared in 1939, unemployment disappeared in Canada, the United States, Great Britain and other countries. We believe, as John Kenneth Galbraith believes, that unemployment is not necessary. We believe a government can find ways to put people back to work and do so in fairly quick fashion.

I wish to mention a few of the steps that can be taken in the very near future if only the government will make the decision. First, we need a new budget, a budget which will immediately decrease personal income taxes, particularly for those earning lower and middle incomes, in order to stimulate purchasing power and take up the current slack in the economy. We need immediately to reactivate all federal works projects, encourage the provinces and municipalities to follow suit, and at the same time lift any restraint on shared funding of such projects. We should immediately expand, in consultation with the provinces, the capital budgets for low-income and co-operative housing and land assembly. We should immediately launch an assisted repair and renovation program of homes owned by pensioners, the disabled and low-income families.

If such a simple program were begun by this government, by the end of 1977 we could cut the percentage of people unemployed by a substantial number from the present scandalous and intolerable level.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to participate very objectively in the debate on this opposition motion. I feel this motion is most relevant to the economic situation in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces. Of course, I shall restrict my remarks more specifically to the unemployment situation in the province of Quebec and the steps taken to remedy this situation. I am convinced that following our proceedings, the government will be more aware of the actual needs of our regions and of the action required to remedy the situation.

Mr. Speaker, because this country of ours is very large, I feel that Parliament must assume its responsibilities and make sure that all regions are dealt with fairly and allowed to develop normally. I cannot help being hurt and aggrieved when I read news about under-developed areas, as though only mental defectives lived there.

● (1610)

In each and every area, there are, however, highly intelligent people capable of developing industries and using our resources to create jobs for those Canadians who are able to work, and to ensure for the others affected by ill health or physical impairment a standard of living in keeping with Canada's potential. I had a study made for the South Shore area, as I like to call it, to have it recognized by the government and the nation as a region in its own right. It has always been called by that name. The study went back as far as the beginnings of our country. It shows how creative the people there have been, how many of them had the creativeness to establish industries and small businesses in the logging, lumber, textile and tanning industries, in every area that can meet the peoples' needs, and all this without any government subsidies.

Going through that study, I find industries there have been disappearing one after the other, especially during the last 15 years. The people who used to work there became unemployed, and later went on welfare. My suggestion is therefore that the policies that were put forward did not work. The government would be well advised to listen to other suggestions and change course, to promote continued growth in the area so that the local manpower can be employed.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that every government has always been advised by economists. Certainly those economists did their best, and tried to recommend measures to ensure full development in the area and also to give present and future generations an opportunity to stay there with full security and freedom. Unfortunately, the recipes put forward by those distinguished economists have not been working. Therefore, something else will have to be used. It so happens that yesterday we had an opportunity in this House to discuss motion No. 22 introduced by an hon. member and suggesting that a special committee of the House be established to consider the possibility of formulating the national objectives for the next decade.

Mr. Speaker, that motion suggested that intermediary bodies submit briefs designed to enlighten the committee and enable it to make recommendations likely to help Canada put to a better use the manpower available, our human energies, so as to check the plague of unemployment and, at the same time, fight the plague of inflation so that our young people may contribute fully to the development of our country.

On the other hand, the same day one could read in some newspapers a very pessimistic report to the effect that there would be a greater number of unemployed graduates every year until around 1990. Mr. Speaker, studies have already been made in the past, serious studies. For example, I should mention the study on poverty made by a Senate committee, when senators travelled across this country to look into the situation, find out the number of really needy people, poor people, and finally suggest remedial action to the government in order to enable those helpless people to take advantage of the blessings of this country and thus contribute through their work to its development.

Now, Mr. Speaker, Parliament is aware of those recommendations but they are still being studied in cooperation with the provinces in order to find the most suitable method of implementing the Senate committee report on poverty. We also had other reports submitted by various committees, and those reports are still on the shelves. They cannot decide to act upon them in an attempt to remedy the situation and thus provide equal opportunities throughout Canada. If only the idea began to sink in that Canada extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific! I am sure then that all this useless talk about regional disparities would stop and we would understand each other much better.

Mr. Réal Caouette has often expressed that idea in this very spot. He often asked the federal government to see to it that Canada develops as a whole, while respecting the various government jurisdictions. He used to say: Strong provinces make for a strong Canada!

Mr. Speaker, I still share this view.

● (1620)

Mr. Roy (Laval): Mr. Matte is not!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): What I would like is that the government stop talking and start enacting appropriate legislation, to fulfil its responsibilities within its jurisdiction and ensure that the provinces have the necessary revenues to fulfil theirs in their own areas. But, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that with the present public financing it is impossible to come to an agreement.

Mr. Béchard: Be careful, you are heading towards the Bank of Canada!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague from Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) says that I am going to suggest a greater reliance on the Bank of Canada. I am very pleased, Mr. Speaker, whenever someone can read my mind since it proves something, namely that when you keep making the same suggestions, you finally get them through to your colleagues, regardless of the political party to which they belong.

Mr. Speaker, the federal and provincial governments should not have to depend on a private banking system operating along the side of the public monetary system, and rely on the goodwill of the private sector for their operations and the implementation of their programs. I admit, Mr. Speaker, that the private banking system is well organized and most useful, and that it serves private interests very well. I want it to survive but I do not think it should be allowed, to control governments, Mr. Speaker. Parliament and the federal government should have authority over this system. If we were to decide—and in this respect I feel the way Mr. Réal Caouette did—to set things in order in this area, much less would be heard in Canada about separatism, regional discrepancies, and B and B. This would be a good step in the right direction and it would certainly bring Canadians together, throughout the country, from coast to coast, because the central government would have the necessary financial resources to meet the developmental needs and requirements of the people in all parts of this country.

Mr. Speaker, in spite of all the efforts made over 15, 20, 30 or 40 years to improve the training of our young people, prepare their future, make them learn a trade and all kinds of things useful to the community and encourage them to get diplomas so that they can profitably serve their country while earning their living, I am sorry to note that those efforts have not been completely lost but that they have not given the expected results. I am always very sorry when I open my mail and find five, six or seven out of ten asking for help to become entitled to unemployment insurance. It disgusts me and through all this I find some asking: Can you help me get a job? Everywhere I inquired I was asked to complete job applications. I had to state my work experience.

Mr. Speaker, how are young people supposed to answer such a question? They had no opportunity to acquire any experience. They should be given the possibility to start acquiring experience in life. Some openness of mind is needed. Mr. Speaker, everything seems aimed at making life harder for people. Here is an example. Take Canada Works, a good program. People are asked to prepare projects. In my riding I was pleased to find that quite a number of organizations and intermediary bodies have submitted projects and have tried earnestly to prepare very good job-creating projects and give an impetus to the development of our area, our province and our country. But after an analysis is made in cooperation with either the advisory committees or the member of parliament, manpower officials meet with a refusal from some provincial officials, at least in my province. This is what happens, they veto the projects. Nobody knows why, but they are against it. Every effort is made to go ahead, but those people veto the projects. Mr. Speaker, I think it is time we had something specific and precise on that matter . . .

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order please!

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I should like to refer to some of the remarks made during the debate by the three opposition spokesmen, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) and the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert).

I shall begin by the latter, who has just resumed his seat. I should like to tell him that, of course, we are greatly concerned, myself especially, about the general unemployment problem in Quebec, but I am also concerned about the rest of the country. The hon. member for Bellechasse mentioned his own area on the south shore, as he calls it. In fact, it is an area with which I am somewhat familiar, though not as much as he is, of course. I am aware of some of the problems in this area, and I would feel inclined to look favourably upon some of the problems and some of the answers suggested. As a matter of fact, in the last few weeks, I had the opportunity to consider one suggestion. Of course, it is very limited, but the project materializes, we shall have done something to help a municipality in the constituency of the hon. member to develop the structures which might prove somewhat more attractive for industries that wish to settle in the area. It would be a first step, and I hope there will be many others. I should like to point out to the hon. member that even though there is no specific program for his particular constituency or area, many departmental programs affect somewhat, although not enough to his mind, the economy of his area and might help to some extent.

I would like to take up one of his comments with which I agree, but I would alter it slightly. He states for example what our young people are told unfortunately too often when they reach the labour market; employers to whom they apply for a job ask them whether they have some experience.

I agree with him that such an attitude of some employers towards young workers who have just graduated from our institutions is absolutely incomprehensible. This is why representations were made to the government on several occasions. As a backbencher I also made suggestions concerning such a behaviour among employers. The Department of Manpower and Immigration has amended its educational programs to include a training program on the job. Under this program which was launched four years ago already, 75 per cent of the salary is paid for a period extending up to a year in some cases, but generally for 26 weeks, sharing with the employer the additional cost for training a new employee and keeping another worker as a replacement, not to mention that total productivity will decline during a certain period. This program exists and is operating but in my opinion, it should be used more often. However, I think that the establishment of such a structure reflects awareness of that special problem. I hope it can be improved to solve more specifically that dilemma confronting young workers arriving on the labour market.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) specially mentioned unemployment. He dealt with the regional economic expansion program, but he dwelled on current unemployment in the country. He referred to its causes, its effects, and possible remedies. It is evident that we are all concerned by that unemployment problem. Nobody is happy to see so many idle individuals, but a program aimed at creating what is called in certain quarters full employment could imply the control of employment and work could become compulsory. If we want full employment, it would mean compelling people to work, to take jobs that they do not necessarily want. I believe this is not acceptable in a system such as ours.

Of course, the hon. member for Egmont, the official spokesman for the opposition, zeroed in on the department's weaknesses. But he obviously failed to refer to what the department has done. We do not expect to be congratulated or highly praised by the opposition, that is normal, it is not necessarily the role of the opposition, although it might be good once in a while to recognize that things have been accomplished, that efforts have been made by the government and our institutions to meet problems that we recognized as being very, very serious. He quoted a great many statistics and I will not attempt to review them. It is easy to recite statistics, especially since he included several that I had personally referred to before the standing committee of the House at the time the estimates of my department were considered.

Most of those statistics are real, alas too real, and I would have liked to be able to quote more reassuring ones, but unfortunately, things being as they are, I have had to face the facts and say things as I saw them. I hope at least my frankness and sincerity will be recognized even though I have not found better solutions to those problems in my department. I would like, Mr. Speaker, to thank the opposition for giving me this opportunity today to speak about the department and refute certain allegations which were made here in the House and outside not only by opposition members but also by spokesmen for other economic groups in our society. I am glad precisely because the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and his spokesman, the hon. member for Egmont, have systematically refused to take into account the most basic facts to judge our policies and programs, thus misleading the people to a certain extent by their critics.

It has been said, here and elsewhere, that the policies of various federal departments impede regional development, and that there is no co-ordination between the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the other departments. It has also been said that the DREE operation is too centralized, that it does not know well enough the specific needs of each area, and that our industry incentive program is slow and ineffective. I appreciate this opportunity to correct the distorted facts presented by hon. members opposite, something which I have to attribute, to put it kindly, to a surprising lack of efficiency which I find quite strange among people who hope some day to lead the country. With the kind of ability they are demonstrating, I am afraid they will have to be satisfied with just keeping on wanting it for quite a while yet. I shall return to this in a little while, but for the time being, I should like to remind the House of the main policies and strategies this government and my department have developed and implemented.

Since 1972-73, the evolution of the regional development policy has followed three main themes: the need for an efficient subsidy program; the need to carry out, in every province, development strategies based on local concepts, aspirations, needs and objectives and implemented by federal and provincial civil servants stationed in each of the provinces; finally, the need for a service which can provide analytical research and liaison with other federal departments and help them develop their policies so that they can contribute to the realization of regional development objectives.

I would like to say a few words, Mr. Speaker, about our previous achievements. Our subsidy program is now well established. As for the industry assistance legislation, companies have received subsidies of about $580 millions until now, which should result in the creation of 127,531 jobs in low growth areas. The rate of failure among financially assisted industries through the assistance program is lower than 10 per cent. According to some critics, it would be desirable for the procedures involved in our subsidy program to be made less stringent. In fact, Mr. Speaker, shortly after the program was first implemented, the then minister realized that it was necessary to do so, and it was done.

Those who complain about the time it takes to process the requests for help know, for instance, that since that revision of the act in 1974, processing time has been reduced by over 25 per cent? Do they know also that since the 1974 revision it was reduced by 33 per cent in the case of the applications dealt with exclusively by our regional offices? Finally , do they know that over 80 per cent of the applications we receive are in fact dealt with by our regional offices? So one sees the results of the improvements and flexibility built into the regulations under the act. Do those same critics, Mr. Speaker, know that when it takes over 90 days to process an application, for instance, in most cases it is due to the fact that the applicant failed to supply all the information required, and that, indeed, once we have all the information, it seldom takes us more than three weeks to be in a position to make an offer or turn down the application.

That does not mean, Mr. Speaker, that the important and difficult cases do not take any more time. Of course, we are dealing here with taxpayers' money, and we know that often enough, as a result of failures and bankruptcies, the department is severely taken to task. So, obviously we must take our precautions before offering financial assistance to certain projects. We must look at the market, at the environment, Mr. Speaker, another element added in recent years, we must see whether the financial structure of the undertaking is reasonably healthy, and the sponsors of the project have the competence to manage it.

Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House that I am not prepared, in order to set a new time record, to disregard certain basic principles of prudence required for the consideration of those files because I still believe that we must consider very seriously each application we receive.

Last October 18, the opposition asked us to ease the application of this legislation. As regards the request submitted by the Atlantic Development Council which was referred to, this was almost done completely. The opposition continued its attack totally ignoring those changes. This is obviously why the Leader of the Opposition finds it so hard to understand even the basic principles of our policy of regional development. Moreover, the Opposition wants DREE to introduce some rationality in what it calls the more than 200 federal, provincial and municipal programs of assistance to the industry.

Every project carried out under this legislation follows a major effort of coordination with the provinces involved. Furthermore, DREE, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and some other departments took an active part in many conferences dealing with subsidies, which they also helped to set up. The provinces, as well as municipalities and private organizations sometimes also took part in these meetings.

Mr. Speaker, so that our stand is perfectly clear, I want to state that our position has never been and will never be to tell the provinces what they should or should not do as far as the various programs are concerned. We shall continue to discuss with them and to seek the best solution, and we shall resort neither to coercion nor to force. The opposition wants DREE to contribute to projects already in their operational phase and to make arrangements allowing for its involvement.

They do not find it absurd to ask us in the same breath, and sometimes in the same phrase, to rationalize and coordinate our programs and, at the same time, to implement already existing programs administered by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce through the Federal Business Development Bank at the federal level, and to set up mechanisms which are already in place at the provincial level and which are provided by their own agency,that is their own Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Mr. Speaker, the great co-ordinators on the opposite side who look forward to correcting the lack of co-ordination in Canada cannot even co-ordinate their minds on that matter.

[English]

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me turn to the second of the government's policy themes in regional development. Since 1972-73 and after the decentralization of the department which resulted in 70 per cent of our senior executive officers moving to the regions, the government moved to negotiate with each province a general development agreement. The exception would, of course, be Prince Edward Island which has a 15-year comprehensive development plan. These general agreements state in broad terms the development priorities of each province as agreed to by each provincial government. They are reviewed and discussed regularly with each province. We and the provinces know that development problems are not going to be solved overnight. The agreements are ten-year strategies. Under these agreements we enter into subsidiary agreements with each province designed to maximize the development potential of a specific sector of the provincial economy or a specific geographic area. Again, these agreements represent the priorities of the province as agreed to by each provincial government.

This GDA subagreement approach is only two years old, yet we have managed to sign some 66 subagreements across the country, committing over $1.1 billion of federal funds. The federal share of these agreements runs between 50 per cent and 90 per cent. The provinces have committed over half a billion dollars, and private industry over half a billion dollars, for a total development commitment under DREE, GDA programs of over $2 billion. This is what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) calls on the fringe of government priorities.

Our critics call for local involvement in decision-making. They call for more powers to the provinces. What better way is there to involve the provinces than to sit down with them and negotiate face to face with hard dollar commitments on a province by province basis? Do the members opposite mean to say that provincial governments do not understand the interests and priorities of their provinces? Does the Leader of the Opposition know what he means? The provinces and the people of Canada will want to know just who he thinks he is fooling.

An hon. Member: Who do you think you are fooling?

An hon. Member: Don't be so partisan.

[Mr. Lessard.]

Mr. Lessard: Now let me speak of co-ordination within the federal government. The hon. members opposite claim, without reference to the facts, that DREE plays no co-ordinating role. Let us look at some of the examples of how we have implemented our policy theme of research, analysis, co-ordination and liaison to which I referred earlier. A great deal of time and effort has been spent on research and analysis the primary goal of which was to assemble information which would be useful to other departments and the cabinet in pursuing a wide range of federal policies. This was done as a simple result of the stated government commitment to regional development as a policy crucial to national unity and the national interest.

Let me give a few examples where the opposition can find none. The government has launched a program of decentralization of certain government units. This is not a DREE program, but DREE has provided essential expertise to treasury board. Our analysis plays a key role in determining the suitability of towns and cities across the country for relocation. Our information has helped ensure that units and locations were well matched and that the development needs of slow growth areas were well served by the moves. This is co-ordination.

There are more examples. When we negotiate a subsidiary agreement with a province in an area where another federal government department has an interest, that other government department is usually involved from conception, through negotiation, to signing. They often sit on the management committee which implements the agreement. In Quebec alone this is true, for example, with the agreements on forestry, agriculture, minerals, industrial infrastructure, highways and PICA.

In the Newfoundland minerals agreement not only did the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources participate from conception to signing, not only did they sit on the management committee but, as well, they cost-shared the funding of the agreement with DREE and the province. That is co-ordination. I could list many subagreements that we sign with two, three, four and even five federal departments involved with the provinces and two or three departments in those provinces. Again, that is consultation, decision and co-ordination.

An hon. Member: Tell us about the 50 per cent failure.

Mr. Lessard: When you never try, my friend, you never fail. That was the record of your party when you were in power. You did not dare to try, and even so you failed miserably.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I also want to say that we work in close cooperation with other departments with respect to our program of direct aid to industry. We consult the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Environment, Fisheries, Agriculture, Manpower, Immigration, as well as others before making our decisions. We also have representatives on the committees approving the grants under certain programs of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. For example, in anticipation of the withdrawal of U.S. Armed Forces from the Happy Valley-Goose Bay military base DREE set up a research group composed of representatives of five federal departments, the provinces as well as the local community. We obtained very substantial results, including decisions by federal departments and the signing of an auxiliary agreement with the province. While we were expecting about 150 jobs to be lost in this area it seems today that out of the 150 civilians who could have been out of a job fewer than 25 report not having found another one locally.

That is yet another example, Mr. Speaker, of the cooperation between the federal government, various departments and the provinces. Finally, there was great concern about the coordination between the objectives of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the Department of Transport, and I want to assure the House that there was and will always be a great deal of coordination, consultation, discussion between my friend the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and myself, as well as between the representatives of our departments in terms of the general policy. That means transport services will be financed in all areas where they serve as a support for a springboard to development even if the total cost of investment cannot be charged to users. Such is our answer to the criticism where a general policy was set up but that general policy is actually being influenced by regional economic expansion policies, and that is why my colleague the Minister of Transport agreed to look into it.

There are other departments, Mr. Speaker, which are certainly interested in cooperating with our department. For instance I could name Manpower and Immigration Department through its job creation program which is oriented towards areas needing most job opportunities, and the recent amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act which once again recognized the particular situation of various regions so that they could have a different treatment in terms of unemployment insurance.

Gradually each department recognizes the necessity to coordinate government policies aimed at particular regional needs. That could not be done overnight, nor within a year, we had to gain experience. Mr. Speaker, if I had to quote only the report just published by the Economic Council of Canada, they took three years to find out what we knew well before because we had to fight the problem every day. There is a need for coordination, for many instruments to settle regional disparities. They recognized also the great complexity of that issue, that there were many intermediate agents, not only government agents but also private industries and individuals.

Evidently, if we try to co-ordinate all that, Mr. Speaker, to have everyone working towards the one and same objective, that is not an easy task, a challenge we could take up rapidly. Mr. Speaker, the opposition members should recognize that the government has committed itself to the job and has decided to live up to the challenge.

Many figures have been quoted and many things have been said. Of course, I could quote some figures myself. I have some here which I don't like at all. I find it interesting to look at some statistics on manpower, unemployment, income, participation. The figures concerning the increase in the labour force are interesting. For instance, let us take a specific province, Prince Edward Island, for instance. In 1966 the labour force consisted of 34,000 people and ten years later, in 1976, this figure had reached 48,000. As far as employment is concerned there is no doubt a problem in Canada: a large number of unemployed. It is obvious from the figures released this morning. There is nothing which satisfies me in all that, even though there is a slight decrease in unemployment in some Atlantic provinces and in Quebec. We are looking and hoping for a much larger increase. There is nothing gratifying in these figures, and I am not contented, Mr. Speaker. I am not any happier than the opposition members, and especially not more than those who are now unemployed and who are directly affected.

The other important factor to note, and it is a positive one even though to a certain extent, it is responsible for the unemployment rate, is the fact that while the participation rate in a province like Prince Edward Island was 49 per cent of the labour force in 1966, it is now 55.8 per cent. This is an indication. In Quebec, the rate was 54 per cent and it is now 58 per cent, and for Canada, the rate is now 60 per cent while it was 57 per cent in 1966. These figures are interesting since they seem to indicate an increase in the interest shown by the labour force to turn to the labour market and look for work.

The unemployment rate was released today. Everyone knows what it is. The per capita income is not satisfactory, Mr. Speaker, although the official figure has gone up. Of course, it has increased elsewhere in central Canada, that is obvious, but we must still admit that there has been some progress. In 1966, the per capita income was $1,576 and it was $4,400 in 1975. This still shows an improvement. Now, I am going to stop this enumeration to deal with a more specific subject.

● (1650)

I think it is clear from the figures I have just quoted that we have not succeeded in creating heaven on earth.

Mr. Paproski: No jobs, either.

Mr. Lessard: I do believe, however, that we began to turn the tide before the current economic slowdown. I believe, as well, that the multi-year agreement we have put in place with each provincial government will promote further gains when the general western economic climate and the national economy begin to pick up. Equally, I have no doubt in my mind that without strong DREE efforts on incentive measures, on GDA programs and on policy co-ordination, the situation in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces would be much worse than it is today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lessard: We certainly have to recognize that. Let us just look at the figures. Since 1969 DREE has spent—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. minister that his allotted time has expired. He may continue, however, with unanimous consent. Does the minister have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lessard: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. There was definitely a "no" from the opposition side.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke)—Urban Affairs—Granville Island, Vancouver—Future of property and purpose of expenditure; the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt)—Energy—Mackenzie Valley pipeline—Possibility of request by Arctic Gas for government guarantee to raise capital; the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche)—External Affairs—Conference on International Economic Co-operation—Request for progress report.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO IMPROVE EMPLOYMENT SITUATION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

That, in the opinion of this House, the government's abandonment of its commitment to develop strong regional economies, and its failure to give priority to regional needs in designing national fiscal, transport, energy and trade policies, has resulted in a crisis of economic stagnation and unprecedented unemployment in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the minister was not given time to finish his remarks, because I was looking forward to his explaining how he and the government are going to eliminate regional disparity in three years. That seems to be the implied undertaking in the new arrangements which have been made with respect to unemployment insurance. In other words, the government has recognized the need to make allowances for differences in regions, but only after a period of three years. I am sorry that the minister did not tell us this afternoon—I came here fully expecting he would do so—how the government proposes to eliminate regional disparities within the next three years.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Minister dealt with quite a number of topics today. He spotlighted many of them, but there are so many other very important things that he should lay down on the table. He tried to explain the rate of unemployment in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces. For instance, these problems did exist in Quebec before the election of a separatist, secessionist government. They developed under a Liberal government in Ottawa and a Liberal government in Quebec. The policy of the Canadian government with respect to alleviating regional disparities was and still is a mixture of improvisation and inconsistency. Unemployment is rampant. Its rate has reached the 10 per cent mark. In Quebec it is causing great anxiety especially among young people. And in that province, unemployment increases skepticism and even cynicism towards federalism. That is something really tragic for our country.

• (1700)

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to be entirely critical of the minister and his department this afternoon, he will be pleased to know. I have already heard him criticized by his own supporters for increasing disparity within the regions.

An hon. Member: He should be.

Mr. Stanfield: Perhaps he should be. I think one of the mistakes his department has made, as I look across the country, is that it and the government, rather than concentrating on the economy of regions, has attempted to reach down into communities and make itself responsible for the rapid growth of communities. I suggest that the minister and the government are not responsible for ensuring the rapid growth of every city, community and constituency in this country, although there will certainly be instances such as Stephenville and Sydney at the present time where events will be of such urgency and so beyond the capability of the province to deal with that the federal government will wish to become involved.

I simply say that in my judgment the Department of Regional Economic Expansion should concentrate on regional economic development. In a sense, it has been trying to do too much and this is perhaps one of the reasons it has had so little success in generating dynamism in the regions of slow growth, particularly in the Atlantic provinces and Quebec.

As to the Atlantic region, I do not see it as the responsibility of the minister at the present time to ensure equality of development in the near future throughout the region or in every community or every constituency. I admit that when I was premier of Nova Scotia it was recognized that some parts of the province lent themselves more readily to successful development, in the shorter term, than others. I would expect the minister to take the same attitude.

The growth centre concept is not the sacred cow it was some years ago, but it still makes sense to follow up your best possibilities. It also makes sense to recognize that some concentration of skills and services within a section or a region is an advantage in terms of regional development. The recent study of the Economic Council of Canada entitled "Living Together", to which the minister has referred, links urban living, within limits, to economic growth and progress. I am not suggesting the encouragement of disparity within regions unnecessarily or as a goal; I simply suggest that it is perhaps the inevitable result for the time being of pursuing the best chances first. The department and the government must simply be prepared to accept the flack from people, including members of parliament, who are unhappy about certain sections of a region moving ahead more rapidly than others.

Because there have been some failures with regard to large enterprises, some people suggest we should go entirely for smaller enterprises and concentrate upon community development, rural development and the development of villages and small towns. Certainly, there is nothing finer than the development of small communities, and I am in favour of this. It strengthens the lives of people in these communities and it should not be neglected. On the other hand, we ought not to neglect large-scale development.

The report of the Economic Council of Canada to which the minister referred examined the connection and found some association between the level of technological development of a region and the rate of economic growth in that region. This is an age of technology, and generally an area needs high technology as well as natural resources if it is to prosper. There have been failures in developing high technology industries in the maritimes, and probably everybody involved has made mistakes from time to time. But there have also been—and I will associate the minister with this if he wishes—some striking successes during the years. My point is that we should learn from our mistakes and not abandon the effort to promote and develop large-scale enterprises regions such as the Atlantic provinces.

I should like to say, also, that in terms of evaluating the effort to fight regional disparity, in terms of judging the success of provincial and federal governments in the Atlantic provinces since the mid-1950s, we have to remember that the traditional economy of provinces such as Nova Scotia went through a revolution during the 1950s and 1960s—and perhaps it is continuing—where thousands and thousands of traditional ways of making a living simply disappeared. A province like Nova Scotia has had to run hard to even stand still in order to make up for the traditional employment that was disappearing in the restructuring of traditional industries which involved a substantial drop in employment and personal incomes.

While it is easy to be discouraged, particularly when there are forms of discouragement around such as high power rates and continued erosion of traditional industries in the Atlantic region and the province of Quebec, it is important to recognize that despite failures and disappointments new developments have taken place. People in other parts of Canada should recognize this and not regard it all as an idle effort.

I should like to say that successive federal governments have been helpful to the Atlantic provinces. We just have to consider the program of equalization by itself, for example, and what this has meant to the level of governmental services to those provinces. When I think of what could have been done and what could be done by the development of a coherent plan, I become very disappointed about the development of such a plan under the leadership of this government.

It would not be fair to say that the government of Canada established the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and then said "Get on with the job and we will forget the whole thing." It would be fair to say, however, that when the government has been challenged about its efforts in the field of regional economic disparity, it has tended to point to the existence of DREE and say, "Look at all we have done by establishing this department." Despite the minister's remarks this afternoon, it is fair to say that DREE has not developed a planned attack to encourage growth in the Atlantic area or in any region. It is fair to say, too, that the government has not developed co-ordination of its own activities. The minister said recently in committee that DREE cannot do it all by itself: He said that co-operation and co-ordination with other departments was improving, but he was not pretending it was perfect. He said it was not perfect that morning, when he spoke from his heart, but today in the House, when he spoke from a prepared speech, his story was different; he put some emphasis on the degree of co-ordination which exists.

Mr. Lessard: I am still not totally happy. I suppose I never will be.

Mr. Stanfield: Of course the minister is not happy, and except for the minister no one who has been involved with the workings of the department would pretend for a moment that the degree of co-ordination between DREE and other departments of government is anywhere close to satisfactory. We have seen several examples of departments of government working at cross-purposes with DREE.

Mr. Paproski: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I regret that I must be so critical about the lack of co-ordination. I am also critical of DREE for operating largely on a provincial basis within the maritime provinces. This is something the minister just boasted about. It is fine and necessary to respect the existence of provinces. But I say to the minister through you, sir, that if one is to develop an effective attack on regional economic expansion in the maritime provinces, one cannot be satisfied just to deal with the provinces. There has to be a higher degree of integration than that.

I would never suggest that the government ought to try to impose its own plan of development in the Atlantic provinces, but I do say that the government of Canada, with all its departments, and the Atlantic provinces should develop and implement together a plan, as opposed to this hodge-podge of provincial and sectional agreements which the department has entered into and developed. I am not against an agreement relating, say, to the Gaspé, Cote de Sud, northern New Brunswick, southwestern Nova Scotia or any other region, but I do insist that such an agreement shall relate to a regional development strategy, to a development strategy for the whole region, if it is to mean anything.

I have long been struck by the lack of political courage of the federal government when it comes to matters of regional development. It seems afraid to offend a particular member of parliament, or is afraid of losing a seat. A proper strategy to develop the economy of the Atlantic provinces is not going to please everybody, every member of parliament or every community in those provinces; but it must be done. The strategy must be developed. The program be developed in co-operation with the provinces. It must be done, and it can be sold. If the minister wants to know about a technique, I suggest he should look into the technique of voluntary economic planning.

I am not asking him to use the particular plan which was evolved. By encouraging representatives of industrial sectors to work with officials it proved possible in Nova Scotia ten years ago to get agreement on a plan. That plan would never have been accepted if the province of Nova Scotia had tried on its own to impose it. If the minister or his colleagues in government are too timid to work toward a regional plan for the Altantic provinces, I suggest the technique I just mentioned might lead to a sharing of the risks and make such a course more acceptable. Surely the government can do something like that.

Sir, after eight years of existence DREE has not yet attacked the problems of the Atlantic region. It is not yet attacking the problems holding back the entire region. I recognize that each province is different, that each province has different opportunities; but there are factors holding back the entire region. After eight years the department and the minister have not identified these factors. Or, if the minister has identified them, he has failed to attack them.

My time this afternoon is limited. I am pleased that the Economic Council of Canada has once again interested itself in regional economic disparities. I am pleased by the fundamental optimism of the Economic Council of Canada report to which the minister referred. It is optimistic that we can succeed. I find some interesting suggestions in it. For instance, it says that we should use to better advantage the tools we have been using, and try new tools which are available but which we have not used.

It is interesting to note the council suggested that intraregional trade, or trade within the Atlantic region generally, is relatively more important than interregional trade. It is interesting to see the explanation for the jump in unemployment which always takes place in the Atlantic provinces in the course of a recession, and to compare that jump with unemployment in other provinces. The council explains that this is owing to greater shrinkage in demand in the Atlantic provinces than takes place in other provinces or regions of Canada. If this is so, this fact can have a tremendous cumulative effect in retarding the development of the Atlantic provinces.

I asked the minister in committee what he thought of this idea and what he thought of the council's suggestion that the federal government and the provinces should establish a fiscal stabilization program to overcome the shrinkage in demand in the region which accompanies every national recession. I say this because the theory of the Economic Council of Canada corresponds to the gut feeling of maritimers that this has been happening with drastic consequences to the economy of the region. Mr. Speaker, DREE cannot implement such a concept on its own. I therefore ask, what is the minister's attitude? The council's suggestion is far different from the government's suggestion concerning tax benefits within the region. The council's suggestion is related to eliminating the additional depressing effects of national recessions on economic growth in the Atlantic provinces. The concept of the council is different from that of the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Regional Expansion (Mr. Lessard). What are the government's views on the council's suggestion?

There is not any one solution to the problems of the Atlantic provinces, or the economic problems of Quebec. We cannot be content with the kinds of improvised suggestions and policies which have come forward so far from DREE. It is good to see the Economic Council of Canada taking a hard look at what has been happening. As the minister said, the problem is a difficult one. I agree that it is difficult. But no country has found the solution to such problems an easy matter. The Economic Council is not pessimistic. We have made some progress and we have seen some development—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him that his allotted time has expired. It has been suggested that since 12 more speakers wish to speak, we should have no extension of time.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, in my opening remarks I cannot help but compare today's motion to a spring shower. It was rather sudden, the initial downpour was heavy, if not exaggerated, and conducive to erosion.

Mr. Alkenbrack: And good for the country at the same time.

Mr. Corbin: There is something basically unfair in the way our rules allow opposition parties to bring sudden motions before the House, motions on which there should be substantial and in-depth discussion. If we finally get down seriously to reforming the rules governing this institution, the area of notice of supply proceedings coming under Standing Order 58(4)(a) should, in my opinion, be modified so as to allow backbenchers in particular more lead time for participating in debate in a meaningful way and preparing researched speeches.

With the heavy work load already on our shoulders in committees and our two offices, not to mention all sorts of other meetings, the present situation is not at all in our favour. Of course, there is an advantage here to the opposition which I am prepared to recognize in an adversary situation. That may be as it should be. It is a gain for them, but it is a loss for the total House if all backbenchers are not given sufficient advance notice.

On the other side of the coin, with today's motion there is cancellation of a scheduled meeting on DREE estimates. We were to examine the Ontario expenditures and programs of the department. However, that motion had to be set back one week because the minister was to be our principal witness. The motion, therefore, came rather suddenly for the committee and its members. We would have appreciated some advance notice. Speaking as a member of this House and not as the chairman of the regional development committee, I find it regrettable that the committee was not allowed to complete its examination of the estimates as well as its study of the Economic Council of Canada report on regional disparities. In that sense, I feel that today's proceedings are untimely and premature, in addition to being staged on short notice.

However, I am prepared to deal with the motion. One thing in the wording that I find annoying is the reference to "the government's abandonment of its commitment to develop strong regional economies". The motion would have made some sense in terms of equilibrium and fairness if it had addressed itself to the role of all levels of government, not just the federal government, in their combined and essentially co-operative efforts to combat perennial regional disparities.

I have on my desk and in my mind, as I am sure do other members, a number of examples which will serve to demonstrate that the provincial administrations were found, and are still found, wanting in their co-operative efforts with the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

First, Mr. Speaker, I cannot keep from noticing with all possible objectivity and charity that some provinces are far from fully playing their role in this joint effort against inequalities to which the federal government has resolutely addressed itself and on which the present minister is also actively working. I cannot accept that the central government should be blamed for everything, if blame is justified.

There are yet too many partisan considerations in the establishment of provincial policies and in the wording of development agreements. The provinces do not always show the goodwill and the determination which are indeed necessary for the implementation of concerted action schemes. While there are remarkably able people in many provincial jurisdictions, it is a fact—and the provinces should admit it in all humility—that they do not yet have at their disposal all the experts needed for identifying their priorities, for recommending appropriate solutions and quite often for carrying out programs.

It is not my intention to minimize everything that has been accomplished or attempted up to now by the provinces, by themselves or in co-operation with the federal authorities. There have been remarkable successes, but also, dismal failures; there have also been projects which did not even get started because, in my opinion, the required expertise, technology, and staff did not exist.

I merely say that in the area of regional development, the provinces, and unfortunately, most of the time the have-not provinces, do not yet have at their disposal the required staff, technology and administrative support. The mover of the motion, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), said earlier in the debate that the federal government must show leadership in the area of regional development. I will tell him very simply, for maybe the minister was too humble to say it, that this is what we have been doing since 1968, Mr. Speaker. This government has shown leadership since 1968; it has fully fulfilled, in my opinion, election promises after election promises. Perhaps it did not know how to come up to all our expectations, or it has not been able to, but it has definitely shown leadership. However, the hon. member for Egmont must recognize, as the Minister told him earlier, that in our federal system, this leadership cannot be and should not be imposed unilaterally on the provinces—at the risk of hearing those very same opposition members and the provincial premiers clamouring that we are trampling on the provinces, that we are making a farce of their powers, that we fail to respect their jurisdictions.

The crux of the problem and of the challenge which confront all governments is to find a compromise and seek a magic formula which would satisfy everybody in respect of jurisdictions. I am convinced that the people from the Atlantic provinces are sick and tired of listening to the whining of the opposition parties and editorialists, all snug and cozy in their offices, suggesting that DREE has fallen short of its objectives. In fact, I believe that the good and honest public will readily admit now that DREE effectively contributed in a very positive way to the development of the economic potential of the Atlantic provinces. No miracle has been accomplished yet by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion nor have the incumbent Minister and any of his predecessors, for that matter, yet been canonized.

Some hon. Members: It is coming, though.

Mr. Corbin: But I would simply like to say to the Minister not to get discouraged, not to despair, as I believe he is going in the right direction. Anyway, canonization is never achieved during one's lifetime. Of course, Mr. Speaker, we expect a greater participation from DREE. But we are not simplistic enough or candid enough to believe that DREE can succeed in its mission, in spite of the provinces.

● (1730)

The exercise in which the two levels of government have engaged, particularly since the conclusion of general development agreements in almost every province, should not be limited to a calculation in dollars and cents per capita. The outlook which inspired the signature of the agreements requires much more flexibility and humanism from the parties involved.

I, for one, am satisfied with the fact that the present minister is well aware of the importance of this openness of mind, of the search for a compromise, and I hope his provincial colleagues will follow his example. For instance, why does the government of New Brunswick still refuse to recognize the necessity of an overall plan, a comprehensive attack, in a small province such as New Brunswick which has some 660,000 inhabitants?

I was listening a moment ago to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), former leader of the official opposition, who said it was sometimes necessary, if not always, to adopt a piecemeal approach in regional development, that is to say, to deal first with large urban centres so that the effects of advantages that can be obtained there will gradually be felt in rural areas. That is not what happened in New Brunswick,Mr. Speaker. Under the guise of a planning policy of urban centres growth poles, an exodus from rural areas in New Brunswick took place. The population growth in the area I represent has been almost nil since the 1971 census. Yet, the people of my region want to work and they go wherever they have opportunities, in New Brunswick, in Quebec, in Ontario and often in the United States.

I repeat what I just said: I suggest that in a province such as New Brunswick, unless we have a comprehensive plan, an overall approach covering the entire province, we will not be able to fight efficiently against regional disparities in these provinces.

I agree that the hon. member for Halifax is probably right in saying that our overall strategy should not be restricted to the provinces and that we must concentrate our efforts on a regional basis. I am of the opinion that the Council of Maritimes Premiers, insofar as Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick are concerned, is indeed the most appropriate instrument with which to formulate this regional strategy. Why has the New Brunswick government for almost seven years concentrated most of its investments in the south of the province while DREE, under its industrial incentives program, its FRED program, was making an outstanding effort to meet all the demands, especially in the north.

Up to now the various development agreements have been quite discriminatory against several areas in New Brunswick, and that is not by sheer accident, precisely where the highest unemployment rates are to be found. How come people are now saying in New Brunswick that there is a provincial government for the south and a federal government for the north? In my opinion, it is the symptom of a major weakness in the development policies of the provincial government. I am aware that the Minister of Economic Regional Expansion has been making worthy efforts lately, if not during the past months, to try and correct this discrepancy and urge the provincial government to see to it that all areas in the province benefit from federal assistance. It will soon be nine years since I came here, Mr. Speaker, and all that time I have supported the government which often heeds my criticism that I mean to be constructive. I am proud to support my government and to have been associated with men like Jean Marchand and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson). The present minister spent two days in my region last fall to hear the municipalities, the regional development commissions and leaders in general. All those people unanimously agree that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) has his heart in the right place and understands very well regional aspirations.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I say once again that I regret we had so little time, such short notice, to prepare adequately for the debate on today's motion which hit us somewhat unexpectedly. I find this regrettable, because we have or would have had so many things to contribute to this debate, we would have so many positive recommendations to make, but because of our other duties elsewhere in these premises, we find it impossible to accomplish as much as we would like to. In conclusion, I want personally to congratulate once again the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, to urge him forward and encourage him to always seek with his provincial counterparts those compromises which are so hard to arrive at.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I am also pleased to take part in this allotted day debate on an issue of concern to all members of the House. According to the previous speaker, there is no doubt that the government is quite satisfied with its efforts and its attitude—

Some hon. Member: True!

Mr. La Salle: Surely some members opposite will say it is true. The minister was more honest. He said that he was not satisfied with the situation. I think that we will understand each other. Is there need to recall the statements made by government representatives at the time when that department was established and was supposed, mind you, to settle practically all economic problems at the regional level. Some efforts were undoubtedly made. The results prompt us today as members of the opposition to remind the government of the problems still facing the Canadian people.

And I recently heard and carefully listened to the statements made by the minister in Montreal or elsewhere which contained the best of intentions. Every opposition member agrees with those intentions, but asks that action be taken. Everyone will readily say that it is perhaps too late to talk about those intentions and the funds supposedly available to remedy the situation.

I come from a province that the minister knows well and I wish him of course every success in his new responsibilities, but I think that Quebecers could benefit from any measure the minister might take to improve the critical situation now prevailing in the province of Quebec. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) talked about the Maritimes and particularly about Quebec, and the motion refers to the regions hardest hit by unemployment, and I think nobody would blame me for reminding the House that the province of Quebec is much concerned about its unemployment rate.

Mr. Dupras: Give us examples!

Mr. La Salle: And the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras) speaks about a bad government in Quebec as if the situation there were recent. Mr. Speaker, we already had problems two, three or four years ago. And the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) pointed out the indisputable fact that under Liberal governments in Ottawa and Quebec there were already tremendous difficulties. The difficulties we are now experiencing could easily be anticipated. It was not for want of warnings. I think the hon. member for Halifax has given this government excellent advice for several years. He has been made the laughing stock, he has been called . . .

● (1740)

Mr. Béchard: And you dropped him.

Mr. La Salle: . . . a prophet of doom, and the government rejected his suggestions. The hon. member for Halifax had made his intentions clear following the 1974 elections. Besides, the government gave partial recognition to the value of his suggestion in adopting a very well known measure, but if it had been implemented 100 per cent, we would not have the problems the Anti-Inflation Board has had and still has. So this might be the problem now. Since the 15th of November, we have heard many comments of course. Reasonable people have told us of the difficult and delicate situation prevailing in Quebec. Quebecers have responded to repeated frustrations due to the action of the present government. Is it necessary to recall, Mr. Speaker, the representations and the recommendations which were made by the then Liberal ministers in Quebec. I remember very well men such as Mr. L'Allier, Mr. Saint-Pierre, Mr. Castonguay, Mr. Hardy and Mr. Choquette. I remember they made recommendations and demands concerning various responsibilities, particularly in the economic field, advocating additional expenditures. These men received a great many negative answers, and we were surprised to see on election night that Quebec had lost confidence. We are surprised, and there is the danger; we continue to ridicule the situation or to pretend that we are going to deny available services to this province through day-to-day provocation.

Mr. Dupras: This is not correct!

Mr. La Salle: I hear that this is not correct.

Mr. Dupras: Give examples.

Mr. La Salle: Examples? Well, we are concerned about the visit of Quebec minister Claude Morin to Paris. We are concerned about his visit. However, how many Quebecers have been in Paris? But we are concerned about this. Given the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, it is the government approach made up of confrontations which often lead to arrogance. We refused to establish a genuine dialogue with the provinces. We treated them as if they were opponents instead of allies.

Some hon. Members: Not true!

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I am shocked to hear my hon. friends opposite say that it is not true. The federal government should stick to the following policy at the present time: we want to be respectful in order to be respected. I think we have a unique opportunity to do it now and given the climate and concerns which are being expressed in Quebec, the federal government has the immediate obligation to prove that restoration of economic progress is possible within the framework of the constitution but it ought not to adopt a negative attitude. We cannot turn our backs on the government of Quebec at the present time. We cannot be sulky with it, and in the interest of Quebecers, Mr. Speaker, time has come now to prove that it is not only possible to help Quebec but also all provinces.

Mr. Dupras: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. La Salle: The hon. member for Labelle who almost never takes the floor!

Mr. Dupras: Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. member for Joliette to give material evidence on the way the federal government impedes or delays the economic progress of the province of Quebec. If he is fair and if he knows what he is talking about, he is going to give us concrete examples; otherwise he should refrain from talking.

An hon. Member: He has not got any.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I think we are getting into the realm of debate. That is not a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would invite my colleagues from Quebec to speak out. I am not talking about the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. He told the House what he intends to do and I think he means well, I simply say that the time has come to do something. I hear the hon. member for Labelle who makes me lose 30 seconds of my speech. Too many members from Quebec were absent, kept silent about the recommendations made by the province of Quebec well before November 15, Mr. Speaker. That representation of 60 members, taking Quebec for granted, preferred leaving their own government give as many negative answers to Mr. Bourassa's government, we remember that, not only today's government, but Mr. Bourassa's government.

Mr. Dupras: Give examples.

Mr. La Salle: And I say that with respect to communications, immigration, and so on, the Liberals were pitiful concerning the recommendations made by the government of Quebec. One wonders after why Quebecers are so concerned today and so frustrated about the current system. It is not the system or federalism as it is which is bad, Mr. Speaker, but the way it is applied. It was not applied properly.

Someone has suggested earlier to let the federal government establish priorities at the provincial level. I am against that because the provinces have not really contributed enough to important decisions. The minister underlined the importance of better cooperation between various departments and it is certainly a necessity but the cooperation of provinces is also needed to establish a dialogue between them and set priorities. Then, the federal government will be a complement to the desires and aspirations of provinces. I do not speak only for Quebec, actually—

An hon. Member: Like a federal-provincial conference!

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Labelle has something to say later, he will certainly get the floor. But as soon as they are criticized for having maintained a silence which is awkward and disappointing for Quebecers, they take the floor. Of course, they do not like it.

But the CBC, anyone, will be made responsible for the present situation when this government has been in power for 12 years. Twelve years ago, this government was supposed to deal with unemployment. There were 168,000 unemployed in 1968 and there are one million now but, nevertheless, some people dare say that Quebecers are privileged and not so unfortunate. No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think we could commend this government for its performance until now.

I could mention the north shore, northern Quebec where people are living far from large centres and penalized because of their geographic situation. I do not think that this government can refuse to consider giving compensation to these areas because of their geographic situation. Heating and transportation costs are higher, industries are less and less interested to go there because competition is more difficult. As members of parliament we have asked the government to consider the difficulties of the people living in remote centres and we are aware of their problems. I think that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion could bring about some solutions. An unemployment rate of 20 per cent has been mentioned for Témiscamingue, and in Gaspesia it stands at 25 per cent, the highest unemployment rate in Canada.

My area will reach the 20 per cent mark the way things are developing. It is important in my view that we reconsider this now, and DREE has the tool to do it, namely the setting up of designated areas. Recently, in Montreal, the minister referred to the possibility of investing millions of dollars in the metropolitan area. He recognized the problems now faced by Montrealers and the increasing unemployment rate.

This is important in my view, so I urge that the Montreal region be declared as soon as possible a designated area. Mr. Speaker, there is something I have never been able to understand. I was put in the Montreal-Mirabel corridor, and I call that taking quite a roundabout way. My constituency like many others is now in the throes of serious difficulties. We must urge the government to apply very special, short-term remedial measures in areas where the unemployment rate is the highest. Of course, we will be criticized for asking this at this point. But, in my view, we are committed to do so. We are also committed to remind the government that people are suffering, not only in the province of Quebec but throughout Canada. My colleagues have mentioned this before, and others will again. So, as far as my area is concerned, I will certainly take this opportunity to ask the minister to consider reviewing the issue of currently designated areas as related to those that are now experiencing worse difficulties. Reference was made to the Montreal area. My area is also having difficulties. There are districts where the unemployment rate is reaching disastrous levels. We certainly are aware of that.

DREE's main objective was to take care of regional disparities. In all fairness, I do not believe this government deserves any commendation for the result it has achieved. Of course, some will say that the government has spared no efforts, that it has invested money, that it has worked hard, that it has made studies. This is not enough, and I say definitely not enough, and when people talk about our million unemployed workers, especially in Quebec, there is concern about the close-down of a number of plants and about the fact that the government has failed to study or plan to save Canadian industries.

Mr. Béchard: Others will be closed!

Mr. La Salle: The hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine talks about the closing of yet other plants. This does not worry him, but it does worry me, Mr. Speaker, to see that plants are now closing down in Quebec. A decent and respectful government has no right to hesitate one moment to offer something to the Quebec government, and to all of the provinces. Since I am speaking about Quebec, I believe that this government should immediately offer concrete proposals to the Quebec government. This government should dare the Quebec government to refuse! Then the people of Quebec will be in a position to pass a judgment on their government.

Mr. Béchard: The industries do not want to stay in Quebec!

Mr. La Salle: I hope that this government will immediately offer the provinces—and especially Quebec in view of the present dangerous situation—ideas, legislation and possible investments, and that it will concentrate its efforts not only on keeping open the plants that we now have, but also on saving the industrial community in Quebec and Canada and on taking steps to create additional jobs. Of course, there is Canada Works and Young Canada Works. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been voted for these programs, but this is no insurance for the future, Mr. Speaker. These measures are merely remedial in character and we are forced by the circumstances to accept them. I am happy that some of those projects are being funded in my constituency, but it is not an insurance for the future, not only of Quebec, but also of Canada. I believe that DREE should co-operate as soon as possible with the provinces. Someone said earlier that certain provinces did not have the means to undertake the required studies. There is no doubt that the federal government should contribute to these studies and surveys.

I would want them respected, and the provinces free to set up their own priorities. I feel that nobody knows better than the provinces themselves what their goals and priorities should be. Therefore, the central government must commit itself to that, and the sooner the better, in the present context, while taking into account the unemployment situation and the number of unemployed. I am sure that there is no member of parliament who does not feel any concern for the great number of young people who are growing in this political climate which may eventually take a turn for the worse.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member for Joliette if he would allow me a question before six o'clock.

Mr. La Salle: No. After six o'clock.

Mr. Béchard: He said after six o'clock because then he will not be able to answer it.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, today the hon. member has a golden opportunity of rising and speaking on behalf of his fellow-citizens, a golden opportunity of telling the House that he and his electors are quite happy about the million unemployed in the country. That is not true! No one in the province of Quebec is happy. The minister had the courage to say so, but not the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine on a point of order.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, I object to the hon. member for Joliette making such cheeky and stupid remarks about me and my electors who are every bit as worthy of respect as his. A while ago, I wanted to ask him whether he feels the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is to blame for—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Does the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) accept a question?

Some hon. Members: It is fear!

Mr. La Salle: I have no time to waste trying to reply to the insignificant questions of the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I regret to inform the hon. member for Joliette that his time has expired.

Mr. McCleave: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the time of the hon. member who had the floor was taken up by interruptions. He lost about two minutes because of interventions by hon. members opposite, and I think he should have the benefit of those two minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I must inform the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) that this was taken into consideration by the Chair.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Tessier (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to take part in this debate, the more so because it will afford me the opportunity to calm down the tempers, something which I feel is necessary at this time. Just the same, I should like to suggest to my friend the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) that he will probably be satisfied, for I intend to admit later and do admit now that problems exist and that it is really together that we are going to solve them.

Then again, and I mean this as a very friendly suggestion, if the government has a part to play in this, a part which is in constant evolution, so has the opposition. It has to know what and how to ask and, in the near future, when it must stop asking.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Tessier: Mr. Speaker, just before dinner, I merely had the time to calm down the House, and I would now like to deal with the subject immediately.

As a matter of fact, this is an opportunity for me to speak on behalf of non-industrialized Quebec, and its immense rural regions. However, I must admit that as a government member, I am faced with a dilemma. I am faced with a situation that is not good, to say the least, and, on the other hand, with inadequate economic structures, which are common to all non-industrialized areas, with a sparse, aging population, and which are very often deserted by young people, because of the lack of job opportunities, and where industries disappear one after the other, and are very often not replaced. This is the dilemma a government backbencher finds himself in, namely to recognize certain facts and accept that problems do exist. But on the other hand we have to choose the hard course of trying to build in an economic climate where almost everything seems impossible because those who want something expect nothing short of miracles while lying, threatening and destroying.

Mr. Speaker, it has to be agreed that it is easy to criticize, and that is the course the opposition seems to follow; this week's motion is just a rehash of the one we heard last week—long theoritical statements that would mean anything but finally mean nothing. I would like to illustrate with a specific example the process which leads to unemployment in regions like mine. First here is the text of a telegram I just received announcing the closing of a plant in my riding, and I quote:

This is to inform you of the decision made by Domtar Packaging Limited to end all its operations and close its kraft paper and board plant in East Angus, Quebec. This move will involve the lay-off of about 570 employees mostly represented by two unions affiliated with the CNTU. This difficult decision is inevitable for us as a result of the problems set by the current economic factors and the long term out-look for this plant.

Besides, here is the text of the letter that the general director sent to each of his employees, and I quote:

We are sorry to inform you of the decision of Domtar Packaging Ltd. to discontinue all its operations and close down its kraft paper and board plant in East Angus. The Minister of Labour and Manpower and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce were informed of our decision. We know that you are aware of the economic problems which have been facing the company over the years. We fully understand the impact this decision will have on yourselves and families. The reasons for this important decision are as follows: 1. In the late sixties and early seventies, a major capital investment program was considered for the East Angus plant; the money was supposed to be used to replace the recovery boiler, reduce pollution, increase the production potential and improve productivity. This modernization program has never been implemented because it was not fully justified, at that time in view of other priorities and of the risks inherent to the kraft paper markets. Finally, the quick increase in capital costs in the last few years, due to inflation, made it impossible to reconsider such an investment program. 2—We had to reduce the operation rate of the recovery boiler in August 1976 for safety reasons. There followed a drop in the production capacity of the kraft plant from 70,000 to 50,000 tons which, combined with the present cost of wood, energy and manpower, made the plant economically not viable. 3—The funds which are necessary to increase production and bring productivity to a satisfactory level, to replace machinery and comply with the new pollution standards, cannot be generated by the operation of the East Angus plant. We could not have an acceptable return on investment, even if the funds were coming from external sources. In spite of the present labour situation, the company is prepared to give its employees a layoff notice as long in advance as possible. You are hereby notified that the plant will ceast its operations and that your employment with the company will be terminated at midnight on September 30, 1977 at the latest.

This is a story which happened repeatedly in my constituency, Mr. Speaker, in the cases of Épingles Mégantic Manufacturing, Kilgour Limited, George Sheard Ltd. and which combined with other layoffs to bring the unemployment level to over 20 per cent.

If we refer to the particular situation in the riding of Compton, where the labour force is made of about 22,000 workers, if we consider that in the town of East Angus alone, the third largest town in my constituency, unemployment now affects about 1,350 people, we get to the fantastic rate of unemployment of 36 per cent, if we include the forthcoming closure of Domtar Limited.

I must say that East Angus, the third largest town in my riding, was enjoying the best average wages among the 66 municipalities in my constituency. The economic factors considered are as follows: productivity, high wages and, more recently, language problems, labour relations issues, security and pollution problems.

The solution we should apply under the circumstances would cost about $30 million to update the East Angus plant. The question we must ask and accept that it be asked is the following: Why should Domtar invest in East Angus? Why should Domtar accept to invest in Quebec? Why should Domtar accept to invest in Canada or elsewhere? Who would venture an answer? Until we have proof to the contrary, the answer belongs to the one who will have to pay, which means that indeed the decision to close might very well stand.

Concerning long term opportunities, profitability, security and labour relations, can we look forward to new developments? Finally, Mr. Speaker, this motion is a good opportunity to ask the question: to what extent is the federal government responsible for that closing? Frankly, I would say that the government is in no way responsible, but if we say that the plant should stay open, that to be economical production costs should go down by 25 per cent, then who would be responsible for the cost of such an industry? Could we require the employees to accept wage reductions? If so, who would dare ask such a question? If so again, why should the employees alone have to pay? Why should some industry workers have to pay for the present economic situation?

The one hard fact is that we will have to use unemployment insurance immediately and perhaps even social welfare in the long run. How much would the federal government be prepared to pay to prevent such a situation? The opposition has been trying today to give us a lesson, but just what is it prepared to do to support the government to protect about 5 per cent of the manpower in a riding such as Compton?

That is a sad question and unfortunately the answer has been the same in past years—shut down after shut down. Let us consider Quebec generally. Certainly the government is criticized because it is supposedly responsible for everything, or so most people think.

So, on November 15, as he was regarded as the only one responsible for everything that went wrong in Quebec, Mr. Bourassa was voted out of office, and today what has become of it? We hear the same old story over again every day that we are fed up with multinationals and with employers who want to be their own boss and that such employers who refuse to pay high wages are not good citizens. In summary, we want to enjoy every benefit from capitalism and socialism without having to pay for it and often without even having to make a choice. Therefore, who is going to create employment? Is it the government or private enterprise?

It is about time we start being consistent and realistic. If there is such a thing as the right to work, it must certainly be extended wherever possible. Can we not be positive? If so, let us stop blaming workers, businessmen, manufacturers or multinationals. Our prime concern should be the respect for the worker and for the one who provides work. Only on those conditions is the right to work possible. But before that, we have to look back and see what are the responsibilities of each of us.

The Conservative motion could be useful as the government recognizes also the necessity to level off regional disparities. What was true yesterday still holds true today and, I dare say, will still be true tomorrow. It only takes a little honesty and realism to recognize this fact. Why then try to pretend? It is precisely what contributes to destroy the credibility of politicians who always find the solution when they are in the opposition but who would be quite powerless to act if they were in office.

Mr. Speaker, today's motion may once again be just so much wasted time, with all the stories people would like us to believe. But for us, we want to make history for the benefit of Canadians. As for me I want to commend the minister and the government for what they have accomplished. I believe that if the hon. member from Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) had taken the trouble to read the DREE annual report for 1975-76, he would have realized all the efficient work done by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. He could have read over the document on development context published by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. He could also have read various brochures on the development perspectives for each region of Canada, again from DREE. He would have found that these are not only empty words and vague hopes but concrete gestures to meet the needs of Canadians from whichever region they are.

Of course I agree with the hon. member that when one talks of a development strategy it happens too often that one cannot reach our remote areas where there is precisely the greatest need to show imagination and find the know-how to make our laws apply. It is well known, Mr. Speaker, that in my region, as it is the case for that matter in the whole of rural Quebec, people tend too often to think they are at the end of the world, that they never see anything from the government which always appears too remote. This is when we fall back on local arguments which are neither dynamic nor effective with reference to Canadian and regional economies.

I can understand the opposition's viewpoint but with some reflection and sufficient courage, the discussion can be carried on the national level. The government is not responsible for the present crisis and the solutions should rather come from the various government levels. Thus, the federal government must and does assume an effective leadership in regional development. Moreover this is the very essence of Confederation. The federal government is ready to do so, it is ready to provide that leadership without forcing its way otherwise we would already have heard complaints about its arrogance and its centralizing power.

Provincial governments also have a role to play, and even the one in Quebec must play that role to the benefit of Quebecers, because they have as much right to the benefits of Confederation as all other Canadians. Let the Quebec government be the true and good government they are committed to be, let them not prevent the Trudeau government from also being true and good government for Quebecers. But the way things are going, the Trudeau government will have to be not only the good government they are, but a tremendous one supported by a no less tremendous opposition, because they will have their minds up to whatever is needed to keep Quebec within Canada. I still believe this is possible, because it is what a majority of Quebecers wish for, with essential provisos that are nonetheless fair and reasonable. Mr. Speaker, all of us here in this House, wherever we may sit, we have an efficient role to play in meeting our constituents' needs.

Below provincial governments, there are municipal governments who are also responsible for development, and that development must indeed fit in with the wishes and possibilities of the people. Finally, citizens themselves are involved in development, to various degrees and in various capacities. In conclusion, I would suggest that the government is prepared to share its responsibilities. We know the job is far from completed, but together we hope to succeed in working for the good of all Canadians wherever they are, including those in Quebec and the Maritime provinces.

[English]

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, there is one thing that the present government can do that would be for the greater good of the country and that is to resign office tomorrow and allow a government to come in that would make an attempt to overcome the conditions discussed in the resolution now before the House. The policies of the government have led to the conditions set out in the final words of the motion which read:

> . . . has resulted in a crisis of economic stagnation and unprecedented unemployment in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces.

Who should take the credit or the blame for that? The government that has been in office for the last 14 years, since 1963, has to take the credit or the blame for the present economic conditions in Canada. It is the same government that took credit when things appeared to be going well that has to take responsibility when we are in a period of abysmal and unprecedented unemployment in eastern Canada and the Atlantic provinces—this government, this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his predecessor, who have been in office for the last 14 years. The best thing they can do to show they still have a feeling for what is good for the country, is to get out. The country will be ruined if they stay for another year before an election.

Is there a crisis of economic stagnation and unemployment in eastern Canada? Let me speak for a moment of Newfoundland. The latest figures available show that from April 10 to 15 the actual work force in Newfoundland was 180,000 people, 145,000 of whom are employed and 35,000 of whom were unemployed. The actual rate of unemployment in Newfoundland for that week was 19.2 per cent. Any government that felt any pangs of conscience at all would resign from office in the face of those figures. Unemployment stands at 19.2 per cent, when a Liberal government has been in office for the last 14 years, Mr. Speaker, doing such wonderful things for the people of Canada.

Get out! Get out before it is too late. Get out while people are still prepared not to hang you on the way out.

An hon. Member: Louder.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member keeps his ears open he will hear. In addition to the unemployment figures it is shown that the able-bodied on relief in Newfoundland at the end of March numbered 4,100 men and women. These people no longer qualify for unemployment insurance so we had to add them to that figure. Today I am told there are 63,120 people drawing unemployment insurance benefits. I have not had time to find out why so many should be drawing benefits when there are 35,000 unemployed. There must be some explanation of that.

It is a desperate situation, Mr. Speaker. Newfoundland is a province where 20 per cent—that is a conservative figure—of the labour force is unable to work because they cannot get jobs. Yet this government has the gall to stay in office. It should resign immediately.

The hon. member who just resumed his seat led us to believe we should congratulate the government. Congratulate them for what, Mr. Speaker? For 19.2 per cent unemployment? For the 4,100 able-bodied on relief?

An hon. Member: What did you do when you were a minister?

Mr. Crosbie: Let us in and we will show you. Are we to thank the government and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for reducing expenditures in Newfoundland despite the economic situation? The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) himself said in committee several days ago, as reported in issue No. 12 of the committee's proceedings, that in 1974-75 his department spent $68.3 million in Newfoundland. In 1975-76 the department spent $68.2 million. In 1976-77, last year, when the economy of the province was going down and unemployment was high, how much did DREE spend in Newfoundland? The minister says he expects the final figure to be close to $60 million. Why did DREE spend $8 million less in Newfoundland last year, when the economy was worse, than it did the year before? And the minister said that this year, with 20 per cent unemployment in the province and 4,100 able-bodied on relief, he hopes to spend $60 million in the province. Mr. Speaker, that spending will not even keep pace with our inflation rate.

If the minister wanted to keep up the level of spending of three years ago, he would have to spend more than $80 million this year in the province. Are we to get down on our hands and knees and thank members of the Canadian government for what they are doing to overcome this situation? Not on your life. We regard them with absolute contempt for the way they have handled the economy of Canada in the last five years. In Newfoundland we cannot wait for the chance to give them the works in the next election.

What can one say about the economy of Newfoundland? What has happened to our economy in the last few years?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I am here to speak on behalf of the people of Newfoundland who sent me here last October 18.

An hon. Member: Yes, you left Newfoundland.

Mr. Crosbie: Hon. gentlemen opposite are very sensitive. They are pretty touchy. What has happened under this magnificent Liberal government? What has this government done in the last few years to our Newfoundland economy? In 1975 the gross provincial product went up 0.8 per cent. We had less than 1 per cent growth in 1975 under the great Trudeau government.

An hon. Member: But the Tory government of Newfoundland has some responsibility.

Mr. Crosbie: The Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Horner) should resign from this government. But he is committed to it now. Yes, our economy grew 0.8 per cent. In the next year, 1976, our gross provincial product went up by the magnificent total of 1.2 per cent under this wonderful Liberal government. The forecast for this year is that it may go up in real terms by 2 per cent. That is the record of the great Liberal government. That is how it is swelling the economy in Newfoundland and eastern Canada.

And what has this government done about the inflation rate? What is the record of this magnificent government, the hem of whose pants we are supposed to kiss every day or else be accused of bad taste in the House of Commons? What has it done about inflation? While we are being crucified with unemployment, what has the government done about inflation? Why, Mr. Speaker, it has done magnificently. In 1975 the cost of living went up 11.5 per cent in Newfoundland. While our gross national product went up 0.8 per cent, the government outdid itself with permitting an inflation rate of 11.5 per cent. So much for its attempts to control the central banks and the currency. And what did it do the next year, in 1976? It twisted our arm even further.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Crosbie: I do not have the time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Since the hon. member has been talking about the economy of Newfoundland, would he say what he would like to see happening in that province? Let him tell us what he would like us to do, instead of criticizing. Let him be concrete, and let us hear what he wants.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman opposite may be in charge of multiculturalism, but he is not in charge of Newfoundlanders.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: In 1976 our cost of living went up 7.8 per cent, after wage and price controls went on, and these controls represented a direct about face on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. If living costs went down, it was mostly because food prices went down, and these prices have nothing to do with the great wage and price controls program. It is forecast that our cost of living will go up this year at least 7 per cent. That will show you what is happening in Newfoundland.

An hon. Member: Under a provincial Tory government.

Mr. Crosbie: Instead of bawling out and interrupting my speech, hon. gentlemen opposite should be thinking what to do about this problem.

An hon. Member: So should you.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, let us examine again unemployment in Newfoundland.

An hon. Member: What did you do when you were a minister?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps hon. members would be fair to the hon. member and allow him to make his speech.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I want to point to another serious problem in Newfoundland. In January, 1977, in Newfoundland 23,700 people were registered with the Unemployment Insurance Commission as contruction workers without employment. We have a crisis in the Newfoundland construction industry with 23,700 of our construction workers unable to find employment. What is the Canadian government doing to help us overcome the slump in the construction industry? It is spending less this year on public works and marine facilities than it has spent in the last five or six years. There has been no effort at all to help us overcome this kind of unemployment.

An hon. Member: Tell us about the linerboard mill.

Mr. Crosbie: Thank you for mentioning that, because the Canadian government was appealed to by the Newfoundland government for help, and the government opposite turned its back on the 1,500 people in Stephenville employed in the linerboard mill. The premier and government of Newfoundland appealed to the Government of Canada for special assistance to help Newfoundland put in place some special programs which would help us in this period of tragically high unemployment. But the Government of Canada turned its back on those requests. Actually it helped to push provincial heads farther under water. Yes, cabinet ministers went down to the province; the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and all the rest of them went down there, and they helped to push our heads farther under water. That is the only help we got.

An hon. Member: What is the Newfoundland government doing?

Mr. Crosbie: An hon. member asks what the Newfoundland government is doing. The Newfoundland government is borrowing $199 million this year; God knows it should not be borrowing anything. Of that sum, $54 million is for debt retirement, and slightly over $154 million will be used for a capital construction program in Newfoundland this year. That is what the Newfoundland government is doing. It is trying to get its construction workers back to work. They have just had to announce the closure of the linerboard mill at Stephenville. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing humorous about that. They appealed to the Canadian government for help in an attempt to keep that linerboard mill operating, but the Canadian government said no, it is not economic. It would not put its money into the mill and the 1,500 workers involved, it said, will simply have to go on the unemployment list. The government would not help.

That may or may not have been the right decision, but it is a fact that the Canadian government would not help to keep that linerboard mill going. God knows, the province of Newfoundland has done enough in the last five years to keep it going. In addition, the government of Newfoundland has raised its income taxes again. Our personal income tax has gone up 1.5 per cent again. We pay the highest income taxes in Canada. We are the most highly taxed province in Canada. So you cannot say the Newfoundland government and people are not making every effort possible to overcome their problems.

An hon. Member: By raising taxes!

Mr. Crosbie: The Government of Canada in Ottawa seems to be concerned only about national unity. The amount of business activity generated by the Newfoundland government's capital program will amount to $300 million, including housing, water, sewer and highway construction, and the like. While the Department of Public Works is to spend $63 million in the elephantine area of Ottawa and Hull, it is to spend only $240,000 in the whole of Newfoundland on public buildings this year. I was pleased to hear the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan) announce the other day that the department would undertake a few projects in Gander-Twillingate, and a few in the Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador district. I hope he will announce some programs in a few other districts before he is through.

The government in Ottawa is not taking seriously these tragedies, but the poor, strapped Newfoundland government is undertaking a special job creation program; through its department of social services it is to create 1,000 additional jobs. They are doing everything they can in that small bailiwick to overcome that situation.

Our plight in Newfoundland and in the east is desperate. Our economic outlook is bad. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion is spending less and less in our area. The Department of Public Works is doing practically nothing under its construction programs. We have another important industry closing, but what do we hear from the Government of Canada? It says it is throwing its hands up; it can't do anything about it. These problems are too great for it to solve. Its only answer is Canada Works and Young Canada Works. That is its answer.

Let us look at some of the things which could be done The Economic Council of Canada publication entitled "Living Together, A Study of Regional Disparities", says some interesting things. I will not deal with sections of the report to do with disparities, because we are all pretty familiar with them. I will give just one or two examples. In 1970 the average Newfoundland family had roughly one more child and about the third less income than its Ontario counterpart. Apart from housing, it faced a higher cost of living. These factors help explain why Newfoundland is an area of net-out migration and Ontario is not. I could go on through the figures and show the disparities between the Maritimes and Quebec and the rest of Canada.

If poverty is defined as the situation where at least 70 per cent of family income is spent on such basic necessities as food, shelter and clothing, then about 34 per cent of the families in Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island are poor, compared with 11 and 12 per cent in Ontario and British Columbia respectively. On and on it goes.

With regard to earned income, as might be expected in disparities in earning power, Ontario leads the nation while at the other end of the spectrum the earning power of the average Newfoundland in 1970 was only 55 per cent of the national average, and substantially less than half that of the average Ontarian. It is not their fault they have not got the earning power. They do not have the opportunity for high paying jobs. No matter what factor you look at, there are huge regional disparities in this country despite the transfers of income that have taken place in the past ten or 15 years.

Something interesting that is pointed out in this study that should be noted is the federal wage bill. The people in Ontario often feel how much they are contributing to overcome disparity through tax equalization and the like. It is interesting to note the figures given in this study. Take the wage bill of the Government of Canada, page 201. For 1974-75 the wage bill for general government workers in Canada and Canadian personnel amounted to more than $4 billion, with another $1.6 billion going to wages and salaries for employees of federal corporations.

The table shows that the wages and salaries of general government and military employees in the Atlantic provinces, particularly in Nova Scotia and Ontario, are substantially above the per capita average of $185 for the ten provinces. I will give the figures, Mr. Speaker. If you take the federal wage bill by provinces and territories, for 1974-75 it spent $130 per capita in Newfoundland, $70.7 million; $440 per capita in Nova Scotia, a good help to Nova Scotia; $238 per capita in Ontario, $1,927 million. That gives a tremendous cost to the province of Ontario. Ontarians should remember that when they are considering what goes out in tax equalization. There is $238 per capita in Ontario, $440 in Nova Scotia, which has done very well, and $130 in Newfoundland, the lowest of any province. The federal spending per capita for wages and salaries is the lowest in Newfoundland. Keep that in mind when we consider what the payments are for tax equalization to the rest of the provinces.

Then compare the distribution of the federal wage bill and the distribution in proportion to provincial population by province. It turns out that Quebec is the least favoured by the federal wage and salary bill. They have a deficiency or deficit per capita of minus $115. Compared to the average, Newfoundland is the next highest with minus $71, while Ontario is plus $74. These tables are very interesting to see how equalization is working in reverse when we look at federal expenditure for wages and salaries in government, Crown corporations, and the armed services.

It is also interesting to note, when considering the capacity of the Newfoundland government to do much about the terrible situation with respect to employment and the economic situation, that at page 223 of the study it is recommended by the Economic Council of Canada that the governments of all provinces should try to increase demand in bad times as in the Keynesian theory. The federal government should try to do it also on a regional basis. It is interesting to note their recommendation at page 223, and I quote:

> We recommend that, in all the provinces where unemployment rates are usually higher than the national average, except Newfoundland, each provincial government continuously assess how much of its unemployment is due to demand deficiency and stimulate demand by increasing the full-employment budget deficit or decreasing the full-employment budget surplus, as the case may be.

They exclude Newfoundland from that recommendation because Newfoundland is in such a precarious financial position that they cannot recommend that the province of Newfoundland do that. In other words, the province of Newfoundland does not have the financial wherewithal to spend more in bad times, as recommended at page 223 of the report. They will not take the responsibility of recommending that Newfoundland borrow more than it is presently borrowing. Newfoundland has to look to the Government of Canada which has the fiscal capacity and fiscal policy instruments to help overcome this tragic situation.

Is there any wonder that I am going to support this non-confidence motion today? The government has abandoned any commitment it ever had to develop strong regional economies. It still has a Department of Regional Economic Expansion but that department has not built strong regional economies. It is fine to have it spend money, but it and it alone it not developing strong regional economies. No priority is given to national fiscal policies to help the regions, or to transportation policies or energy policies that will help them.

The only new energy policy in the maritime provinces is designed to help only Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. It is a new conservation program. A grant of $500 is made to help a householder insulate his home. In addition to Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, that should be applied in Quebec, Newfoundland, New Brunswick, and in fact throughout the country. If the government does not have the fiscal capacity to start that all in one year, it can start in one part of Canada and then expand it to the rest of the country.

It is a good conservation measure to have homes properly insulated. It is a humane act of government. It would create tremendous employment in the insulating of homes and in construction work. However, for political reasons the government has only done that in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

It is not an energy policy to help overcome regional disparities. It is a policy to help the Liberal governments in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. Soon there will not be a Liberal government in Ottawa to do that.

My time has almost expired, Mr. Speaker. I just wish to add a few words by saying—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have already allowed a couple of minutes to the hon. member for interference. His full time has now expired.

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, this resolution talks about unemployment and regional disparity within eastern Canada. Representing Gander-Twillingate, on the government side, I would like to talk briefly about the problem, specifically about unemployment, not in the highly political manner of the previous speaker, but objectively.

To solve any problem one must know what the problem is. So it is with government and the problem of unemployment. The problem, as I see it, is that in economically depressed areas the problem itself has never been defined.

To tackle the problem, governments have established a maze of agencies. With every new provincial budget, this or that battle is announced to combat rising unemployment, but the war never really begins. Everyone agrees that, in order to combat high unemployment, industrial development must be encouraged. In order to combat inflation you must increase production and stave off high unemployment as well.

In Newfoundland on the provincial level we have departments of government like rural development, industrial development, and development corporations like the Newfoundland and Labrador Development Corporation. On the federal level we have DREE, FBDB, loans to small business, to the fishery and to agriculture. We have government agencies too numerous to mention unless one were to write them down. All of these agencies, departments of government, government established development corporations, sit down in a board room from time to time to consider this or that application for assistance to create jobs, to increase production. The government, and rightly so, is trying to increase production.

Government have an idea of what is wrong, they have a concept in mind, but they do not understand the problem. To understand the problem one would have to experience the problem, or have enough understanding, enough empathy, to put oneself in the shoes of those who form the majority of the unemployed in the areas defined as economically depressed.

You cannot understand the problem, Mr. Speaker, by taking a plane and flying over the area. You cannot understand the problem by taking a ride in a car through an area of high unemployment. To take a walk down the road does not help either. To speak to the unemployed will tell you something. To read their letters will tell you something. To question them will tell you more. What I am saying is that to really understand their predicament you have to investigate as closely as possible what they think, and do so this day, this month, this year.

By understanding them you discover, whether a person is skilled or not, that he or she would rather work than sit idle; that one feels better to come home after working that day. To understand that is the first step; to understand what it feels like to wonder where your next dollar will come from; to place yourself in the position of someone who cannot feed or clothe his children properly, or not be able to meet the cost of heating your home, or be troubled by bill collectors, or appear in court because you cannot pay the school tax. To understand all that is an absolute necessity. But if you do, then, and only then, are you committed, if you are in a position to do so, if it is your job to do so, to try to correct the disparity that exists, to create lasting employment, to rid that area of the depression, an economic and social depression. It would not be so if the rest of society were in the same condition. The grave injustice is that it is evident to the economically depressed that theirs is a situation of circumstance.

That brings you half way toward understanding the problem. The other half is to understand why established procedures employed by governments to encourage a solution have failed. When you understand that, you understand the problem. All of us may differ on the ultimate solutions to the problem, but to understand the problem is the first step.

In the second half of understanding the problem, one must realize that the initiatives of government have been filled with good intentions. A provincial or federal cabinet minister may feel as if he has accomplished a great deal with his department. A civil servant in that department may be just as committed to the cause. Think how distressed they must feel when they come to the realization that their efforts have been in vain. Or perhaps they never realized the truth. The established procedures have failed miserably. They have failed, perhaps, because the policy was devised by persons who do not understand the unemployed in the highly depressed areas, or who cannot comprehend why established procedures have failed.

The established procedures have failed because they have been based on incorrect assumptions. It is assumed that an extra loan at 11 per cent interest will do the trick for a failing enterprise; you assume that the economists are correct; you assume that the established limits of government support are adequate; you assume that these are the only priorities, that this is the direction you should support; you assume—and this gets to the core of the matter—that what you see is all that can be done, that the policy decision makers are correct.

The sole purpose of my intervention in this debate is to show you that the decision makers have been incorrect. Who are these decision makers? It must be humorous to a student of government, to one who might be investigating regional disparity and high unemployment areas, to visit the legislative chambers on the provincial and federal levels. He could visit us today here in Ottawa and listen to the opposition party blame the federal government. Tomorrow he could visit the Atlantic provinces and listen to the opposition parties blame the provincial governments.

Reality exists in looking at our spending structures. Apart from our normal departmental expenditures on both levels, infrastructure agreements on both levels, loans to small business and the normal housekeeping chores, we are left with over $200 million, in the case of Newfoundland, in equalization payments that is passed over to the province to do with as it pleases. Even in DREE the priorities are negotiated. It is a fact that the province should know how best to spend the money for industrial expansion. This resolution before the House is an example of skirting the edges. It displays the point I raised earlier, that the movers of the motion do not understand the problem and therefore can never comprehend the obvious solutions to unemployment in economically depressed areas.

What are the solutions? If you ask that question of a chronically unemployed man with 11 children, trying to make ends meet in Newfoundland, you would get a better answer than asking an economist, or the lawyers who seem so prevalent in legislative chambers or a provincial premier. He would put it very simply. He would say, depending on his geographic location, "Look, why not a fish cannery with markets for the finished product?" or "Why not a hardwood plant?," or "Why not agriculture?" He would ask the simple obvious question, "Why not let me produce?"

The typical response given to that question is, "Well, if a profit is to be made, private enterprise will move in". The typical response is that there are established government agencies to help him get established. Then that unemployed man will say, "You're full of baloney". And he would be right.

Not only are agencies non-existent to see an idea through seriously but there is no agency to keep a good secondary industry going once it is established or if it encounters trouble. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) spoke in this debate. He is a fine minister, probably the best the department has ever had, but if you examine his role in creating long lasting jobs you will find the mechanism just is not there. Yes, DREE has done a lot. DREE puts in water and sewer lines for industrial expansion, paves roads for industrial expansion, builds schools because the provinces cannot afford it, and has an industrial incentives branch to help out a prospective industry. The same can be said for the province of Newfoundland. They also have their departments, loans and grants agencies. They all help, but they fall short of a realistic incentive to do what should be done. It is for the province to deal specifically with the Newfoundland situation in a real sense; but it still has failed miserably. When you understand the problem, when you know the people labelled as living in a chronic unemployment area, when you know the existing agencies have failed, and when you know the opportunities that exist, then you realize that these areas need something extra. They need special attention.

Consider, Mr. Speaker, that the federal government spends about $1 billion in Newfoundland each year and, if we can believe the provincial budget of $1.2 billion, that makes $2 billion of government expenditure in Newfoundland this year. That is $4,000 for every man, woman and child in Newfoundland. I contend that lack of money is not the problem—it is how that money is spent. That is the problem. That brings me back to the matter of understanding the problem in order to understand the solution.

I believe what we need to solve our problem is a government agency that actually initiates industry, that is, a government department made up of persons who know the area and who can identify its potential wealth where possible, and then see it through with government money. If that sounds to anyone like too much government intervention, then I am afraid they are in favour of welfare and Unemployment Insurance Commission benefits instead of jobs. If anyone objected to that initiative, then that objector does not understand the problem.

A government department is needed that will say, "A viable fish cannery can work here," or "a secondary industry that will provide a finished product using our own natural resources can work here." I can tell the House that, as far as I am concerned, that is the only answer. Also judging from the present policies of provincial governments, like the Newfoundland government, they will never do what so obviously must be done. Therefore the federal government must undertake that chore. It can be done by existing agencies and with existing funding, but it needs to be redirected with new objectives.

The established agencies of both governments which presently have the role of encouraging new industry come into play after the fact, mostly with high priced loans which drag the entrepreneur down until he reaches the point of government initiated foreclosure.

Let me illustrate my point briefly by analyzing my riding of Gander-Twillingate. It is an economically depressed area, and private industry will never develop the wealth and natural resources in that area unless government is prepared to participate. By participation I mean financial; I mean marketing; I mean direct real involvement with present tax dollars that are for the most part presently being wasted on low priority spending. Some may say the present spending is high priority. Yes, high priority here and now, and for the next election; but not for the present and future generations. To put the horse before the cart, is what I am talking about.

The economic future of the northeast coast of Newfoundland can only be bright if government spending is directed toward small industry. The industry that does exist is just barely existing. The fishing industry, the lumbering and woods industry are just hanging on by their fingernails, unable to haul themselves up. We will soon be into July, and to some degree I call the month of July the dumping month in the fishery. Fishermen phone me with the news they have to dump their catch—squid, herring, mackerel—year after year. The lumbering industry is on the rocks; provincial government foreclosures, one after the other they fall.

When I first got elected three years ago small would-be entrepreneurs, several of them, came to me looking for direction to build barrels for the fishing industry. You see, we import barrels from Norway to Newfoundland. The provincial government finally conducted an experiment; it sent wood over to Norway to make barrels and it worked perfectly. Not one of the many entrepreneurs who wanted to make barrels could get government assistance because the agencies that exist are ineffective. We still import our barrels from Norway.

Smoked salmon sells for at least $15 a pound and up in markets originating in Boston. Yet in the one area where we permit commercial licences for salmon in eastern Canada, that is, on the Newfoundland coast, we have no such exports of smoked salmon. The possibilities are there for industry, long-glasting industry. We export our fish and our timber in a relatively raw state to be processed into a final product in other countries. When you do find someone interested in a final product, the loans are available at an 11 per cent interest rate, enough to get your head in the wringer if you are lucky enough to get them; and if things go sour for a couple of months, the same government agency moves in to shut you down.

As things presently exist, the man who wants to employ people is by himself, while the provincial government spends $1.2 billion in its budget, and we are at the federal level handing over another $1 billion this year. Thus, when this resolution says that there is now economic stagnation and unprecedented unemployment in Newfoundland, most of our unemployed in that province would ask the question:—so, what else is new?

The solutions are not to be found in shortrun, stop gap, band-aid measures. My opinions, of course, are based on my experience in Gander-Twillingate in the province of Newfoundland, in communities where men are fighting over jobs on Canada Works projects where you make $115 a week, if you are lucky enough to get a job. Do not forget the cost of living is higher in Newfoundland than it is in any other province.

I see my time is running out. Therefore, in conclusion, the best way to reflect the way I feel about the manner in which governments treat our chronically unemployed is to borrow the words of the poet, Elizabeth Browning, which read:

> There's too much abstract willing, purposing, in this poor world. We talk by aggregates.
> And think by systems, and being used to face our evils in statistics, are inclined
> To cap them with unreal remedies.
> Drawn out in haste on the other side the slate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, over the years there has been a great deal of faith put in the DREE program by members of parliament. It is time to look at some of the things that are wrong with that program because we have not received value for our money.

We passed the Regional Development Incentives Act in 1968. In Ontario in 1975-76 we had an approximate DREE program expenditure of $38 million, with subsidiary agreements under the Ontario General Development Agreement for another $15 million and the Regional Development Incentives Act for $14 million. It is interesting to note that Quebec is even in a worse position than Ontario. I am surprised that some of the members from the province of Quebec have not given some indication of why the agreements have not been signed in that province and why there is little activity this year, when last year they spent $114 million under DREE, with $38 million for activities under subsidiary agreements and $13 million for the regional development incentives program.

We should ask the minister why we have had very little success when we make these kinds of expenditures. I think a cabinet minister stood up not long ago to reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan). The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond was asking why there was a delay in making an expenditure in Cape Breton Island which would solve some of their problems. I heard the minister say that we cannot do that now because we have to wait until we can do it for everyone, and we cannot do it in the province of Quebec until the situation is settled there. It seems to me we should look at it. That indicates one of the problems we have had with DREE. There should have been no balkanization of this country by DREE. We should have provided a program where we could improve conditions in any province or in every province where an entrepreneur wanted to establish. That is not being done.

If the province of Quebec says it is not interested in signing an agreement, the minister is powerless to provide any help to an industry wishing to start up in that province, even though it might have the know-how and the will to do so.

Mr. Lessard: That is not true.

Mr. Peters: The minister says that is not true. It is true. That is how it works. We have signed a general agreement with Quebec. We have signed a general agreement with Ontario. We have also signed subsidiary agreements. The minister put out the DREE report, and if it is not true let him say so. If it is not true he is misleading the House. We have signed agreements with the provinces, and the provinces decide whether projects should proceed.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): No.

Mr. Peters: Let the hon. member make his own speech—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I suggest we take a look at Standing Order 12(3) which states that when a member is speaking no member shall pass between him and the Chair, nor interrupt him, except to raise a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: I am surprised that the minister and some of his colleagues do not know how the DREE program works. I would be prepared to read it to the hon. gentleman, but I do not think it would help. After all, he is supposed to have written it. The fact is, if we were to put in the program I thought we did, both under ARDA and under DREE, we would be able to help any part of Canada which needed help and there would be no need to "suckhole" to a province to get their help before we could put a program in that province. This seems to be one of our problems. We are balkanizing the country because the minister has not taken it upon himself to put these projects into operation.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): This is uplifting stuff. Listen.

Mr. Peters: Not long ago the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) directed a question to the minister and received a reply which hon. members will find on page 4860 of Hansard for April 21 of this year. The Ottawa Journal comments on this reply. It states that more than half the businesses funded under DREE during the last six years in the Renfrew-Pembroke area never got off the ground after getting the grants.

An hon. Member: That is totally inaccurate.

Mr. Peters: Members over there say it is inaccurate. But I have the Hansard here. Applicants in commercial production as of November 30, 1976, were marked with an asterisk. All one has to do is look at the case of Shuffleboard International. In 1970 Shuffleboard International of Pembroke expected to provide 30 jobs. It received a grant of $72,540. The same company, in Renfrew, expected to create 32 jobs and received a grant of $77,238. As of the date on which this reply was presented, the minister told the House that neither one of these plants was in operation.

An hon. Member: Add them up.

Mr. Peters: I shall not add them all up. My time does not allow for that. In summary, 32 out of the 62 companies financed under the Regional Economic Expansion Program were not in production as of November 30, 1976. That is what the minister said. Then the article in the paper states that a total of $13 million was provided in grants during the six years to last November on the promise that 2,729 new jobs would be provided in the upper Ottawa Valley region. But companies which received almost $7 million of the total grants either folded or never got started. At least 399 promised jobs disappeared with those government-funded enterprises.

I listened to the minister today and I agreed with him when he said he was dealing with high risk projects in many cases. But I have a word of advice for the minister, if he really wishes to make the program work.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Don't take your advice.

Mr. Peters: That is a stupid comment. That is the kind of comment you get from New Brunswick. If the minister wants to make it work, why doesn't he take equity in these companies? This would mean putting people on the boards of directors.

An hon. Member: We tried that before.

Mr. Peters: Very well. We did it in the case of Texas Gulf and we now run Texas Gulf. But that is a successful operation so we never talk about it. The minister pays about as much attention to his department as he does to members of the House, so I cannot expect him to learn much, but it would seem to me that by taking equity in some of these companies, if not all of them, in proportion to the amount of money we put in, we would be in a position to assist in the running of those operations. The minister will agree with me, I am sure, that there are some very capable people in his department.

Why do so many of these companies go broke? They go broke, very often, because they are unable to provide adequate management. The operation may be larger than the manager had ever handled previously. It might be encountering financial difficulties or marketing problems with which the manager is not familiar. In addition to the grants we make we should be prepared to contribute some of our expertise, since we are capable of doing some of the jobs management is not able to handle. There have been bankruptcies in my area the same as in the Pembroke area.

In many cases companies go broke because management was not successful in marketing the product. Experienced and competent advisers might, in a few hours, offer suggestions for changing the management structure in such a way that the operation would have a far better chance of success. We do not offer such assistance. We simply make a grant available and the minister does not even know whether a company is successful or not, whether it ever employs anybody. All he can go by is the amount of money repaid, and in most cases no repayment is made until the manufacturing operation has been in production for a year. So a lengthy period elapses, probably two years, during which the minister is unable to tell us whether there are any employees working in the plant.

If DREE is to be improved and is to be successful, it has to be improved in a number of ways. First, it should be a universal program. We should not have to worry about what the Ontario minister of industry thinks, or whether or not the province establishes a northern ministry, or whether or not

Davis likes the way you cut your hair. DREE should have the decision as to whether or not to put money in the plant if it meets DREE requirements. DREE writes the act, and if the industry does not want to do what it says, it will have to, because in most cases it is under an agreement and that agreement must be approved in Toronto. I just notice here that the head office is not in Toronto, as stated, but in Thunder Bay. The assistant deputy minister's office is in Thunder Bay, not Toronto.

Mr. Lessard: No, it is in Toronto.

Mr. Peters: It is in Thunder Bay for northern Ontario.

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, that is where it is.

Mr. Peters: It is the minister who should know, who else? If I were him, I would not open my mouth so as not to put my foot in it.

Besides being able to provide a universal program across the country, particularly in areas designated federally as underdeveloped, we should be willing also to take equity in a company. The Canadian Development Corporation has done so very successfully. I do not care if the minister only gets 10 per cent in the company, 20 per cent or whatever it may be, but this amount will provide him with knowledge of how the company is doing. He may decide he wants to put more money in it. Perhaps this linerboard mill will be a disaster. Perhaps if we had put some more money in it at the right time, it would have been successful. There is no point in waiting until the company goes broke and everybody in the subsidiary services is affected, then, when the new management comes, to say, "we will give you another grant", and start all over again. Perhaps the second expenditure could have kept the company in business in the first place. To do that we must have equity.

Finally, I think it is absolutely necessary that we unite the abilities we have in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce for sales purposes, our experts in the development of new programs, and our experts in management, together with DREE officials, so that when we start a company with a large DREE grant we may be able to provide it with other services to enable it to operate.

Right now if the government wanted to do anything, the Canadian Development Corporation should to into northwestern Quebec and northeastern Ontario to set up a new company there to take over part of the forest industry. We find bankruptcies by the dozens in both areas. The products of those industries go to exactly the same markets. Not one of those companies is capable of conducting a sales program because none are large enough and they do not have the money or the knowledge to do it. They could get some assistance in providing reasonable transportation facilities and in handling their product, as well as assistance in finding markets for the product. It is foolish to produce lumber if flakeboard is what you need, and conversely, it is stupid to produce flakeboard if you can sell lumber. We could increase the price of lumber by $20, $30 or $40 tomorrow if we could get control of the market structure on behalf of those companies.

I do not suggest that we should take over the lumber industry. All I suggest is that the government should become a partner with the industries that are in difficulty so that it can provide them with some loans, with sales ability, and with assistance in management. I do not think that the border between northern Ontario and northern Quebec should be a division. If the corporation could be established across that border, it would find no objection in northwestern Quebec or in northeastern Ontario.

If the minister really wanted to help in such places as the maritimes, he would find that the problems in northern Ontario are no different from those in the minister's area. If he would just take a look at his area of Lac-Saint-Jean, he would find the same problems there as are in all the areas that are not major manufacturing areas. He comes from an area that is mainly a one industry area, the same as I do. I think he should really look at how the DREE program applies there.

DREE is not doing the job it should be doing. We consider the upper Ottawa valley to be a disaster area. We made special concessions in that area, we set up a special incentives program for the area. It is a disgrace when we put that kind of money into an area to find that 32 out of 62 companies are not in operation at the time when the minister makes his report. This is not my report; the minister made it. If it is not correct, I think he has an obligation to rise in the House as soon as I have completed my remarks and to say so, on a point of order.

I believe there is a great deal of sympathy for areas such as Toronto, Montreal, and other industrial cities that are growing by leaps and bounds at great cost to themselves. Montreal cannot afford a sewage system and it will certainly not be able to afford it if it is made any bigger. The same is true of Toronto.

If there is going to be diversification, let us not have a stupid kind of diversification such as moving the files of DVA to Prince Edward Island. It is just about the silliest kind of diversification I could think of, Mr. Speaker. What we want in this country is a diversity of services. We would like the services moved out to the people.

Wherever possible DREE's obligation is to provide industry to those communities that have the infrastructure in the area, to provide it in cases where the area is in serious difficulty because it has lost its major and often its only industry. The Canadian people are willing to make the payment. We have spent a lot of money under DREE. I think we have an obligation to tell the general public that that money is being supervised and is being protected wherever possible.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, I support the minister 100 per cent when he takes risks that the banks and others will not take. But if we take those risks, let us not leave the guy with a huge mortgage on a string. Instead, let us provide him with the infrastructure that will make it possible to have diversification of industry that is successful for the people in the area. Remember that every time a company goes bankrupt, this hurts the people working in the plant and it destroys the service industries that provide the 30 day credit to the plant which they thought would continue to operate. One of the reasons we are having so much trouble in the areas we assist is that we do not provide the infrastructure necessary for those companies to operate. We could provide it at a reasonable cost. It is something that they cannot get at any price.

I hope the minister will give some consideration to what I have suggested, and if he thinks there is no merit in my suggestions I hope that at least he will think about them.

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to set the record straight regarding two or three major statements made by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) which are not correct, to say the least. First of all, he spoke about assistance for industry. I do not have to go to the province to ask for its authorization to offer a grant to an industry which has applied for it in accordance with the rules. This has nothing to do with the province; it is our own decision.

Secondly, the hon. member mentioned that my assistant deputy minister's office is located in Thunder Bay. That is not true. The head office is in Toronto, but we have an office in Thunder Bay headed by a director general. We have now announced the opening of an office in northeastern Ontario, to be exact, in Sudbury.

The third point is with respect to the Renfrew areas. We offered grants to industries, 60 of them. When we answered the question on the order paper, we answered it on the precise day when the industries we named went into operation. The others were not in operation. They had not failed. Some had just withdrawn their application, so they did not receive a grant from us. Others were in the course of getting started, so they also did not get a grant. They were not in operation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please.

Mr. Lessard: So it does not mean they all failed. That is not the case. My other point—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I suggest that the minister is now getting into debate. He has already spoken in this debate.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanbury: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: When I am after donkeys I am not going to be misled by jackasses.

There are one or two things which are fairly clear here this evening, and I think they bear repeating. The first has to do with the motion itself, and just to refresh the memories of hon. members present, the motion regrets the government's inability in three or four different areas: in fiscal arrangements, transportation, energy, and trade. It is rather interesting that this afternoon and this evening the only minister remotely interested in being here on a continuing basis has been the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard), and we all appreciate his presence. I hope he goes out of here this evening with a better understanding of the degree to which there is real concern on this side of the Chamber.

My comments this evening will be largely oriented to the role of transportation in the stabilization of the regions we have set forth in the motion, generally speaking, eastern Quebec and the Atlantic provinces.

It occurs to me and to many other people in regions of high disparity and in other regions of Canada that national unity, which has been so much on our minds these past few months, will never be achieved until some reasonable and acceptable measure of equal access to the wealth and opportunity of this country is available to all of us, not just to those who may be living in the central region or in other resource wealthy parts of the country.

I think the report of the Economic Council of Canada, "Living Together," goes a long way toward recognizing this. Indeed it has been much of the basis of our conversation here today, and it does show an understanding of the needs of Canadians, particularly those living in the economically depressed regions of Atlantic Canada and Eastern Quebec.

In this connection I have one basic disagreement with the report of the Economic Council of Canada, and that is with the assumption that ever increasingly transportation will play a less important role in regional stabilization and in regional development. I think that while the Economic Council may be correct in saying that, as a percentage of our total capacity to produce wealth on an annual basis, the relevance of transport in those over-all total global figures is going down each year, of course as our service industries grow, as our tourism grows, and as non-transport related industries grow, transport will assume an ever decreasing portion of that larger figure. However, the point is that neither the Atlantic region nor any region in this country will be able to survive without an adequate, well based, fully rationalized, total and complete transportation system. To assume otherwise or to tend to direct our thinking along other paths is wrong indeed, and to that degree I find the report wanting and deficient. Its information is basic statistical information, and some of the lessons it points out are very valuable, but I cannot help but wonder about the conclusion, particularly with respect to the role of transportation. I think transportation is important and always will be important.

I would like to discuss for a moment or two what has been a particularly touchy matter for the minister this afternoon and this evening. It is in the area of consultation, co-operation, and co-ordination with other government departments at the federal level and with the provincial level, with industry and, indeed, with users of transportation. I want to make one or two observations in this regard because from what we have seen and heard from the minister it would seem that transportation is virtually a non-existent area of co-operation and consultation within the minister's capacity.

We have the federal-provincial western transportation committee and the Atlantic transportation committee, but these are not really functioning as well as they could. Perhaps the one in the west is functioning reasonably well in terms of the number of meetings it is having, and perhaps in terms of the identification of goals, but it does occur to the onlooker that not an awful lot of useful, productive progress is being made.

I reiterate my point that in terms of the DREE economic programs which are being carried out to meet the problems we have set forward in our motion, a commitment to rid this country of regional disparity is just simply non-existent. Indeed, in the Standing Committee on Regional Development on May 3, when the minister was asked if Air Canada consulted him about cutbacks in the Atlantic region—this had to do with the so-called unprofitable runs in the Atlantic region operated by Air Canada—he said, and I quote:

Not me personally. I do not know, I am not aware if they have gone through any consultation with my department but I do not think so.

The minister was asked if he thought Air Canada's cutbacks would be detrimental to regional development. He said:

Well I am not totally sure of the implications that it might have on the potential development.

That again was on May 3. He went on a little bit further to say the following:

They answer to the Department of Transport and it is through the Minister of Transport that somebody can really answer the point you are making with me.

Why does the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion not take it upon himself to consult with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) about moves which are detrimental to regional development? Why is it that he is unaware of their impact, even their occurrence, despite the fact that he claims he has a close relationship with MOT with respect to co-ordination of plans and efforts by DREE? I think the minister overstates his case perhaps too much. Granted, he does get involved in the western and Atlantic federal-provincial committees, and I hope out of that some useful endeavours are being made. Perhaps I should be fair. It is not always a one-way street with respect to communication, consultation, and co-operation. The Ministry of Transport also has an obligation to make sure that its planning is fully in tune with the planning of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

Just before I leave this business of consultation, co-operation and co-ordination, it seems to me that the method of the former minister of transport, now a member of that other place, of eliminating what he himself described as a transportation mess in this country relied very heavily on close co-operation, consultation, and co-ordination with other governments and the industry generally. What concerns me about this close consultation and so on can be found in just one or two examples which I will cite. One example was the very detrimental effect of the utterances of the Minister of Transport at the Charlottetown Conference, those of the Council of Maritime Premiers, and I think of Mr. Logan from the province of Newfoundland. They put us off a little bit. We were told pretty clearly that user-pay had died as a principal economic tool of this government, but we find that in fact it has not disappeared, Mr. Speaker.

I would ask hon. members to recall the most recent conference of ministers of transport. What the Minister of Transport likes to refer to as inefficient subsidies and the redirecting of these into the upgrading of highways, support for regional air service upgrading in eastern Canada and so on, were not co-ordinated with DREE. I think it is time that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and the Minister of Transport started bringing their officials together so that they can pursue methods of ensuring that transportation policy and regional economic policy are in tune.

I should like now to touch on a few of the regional services that continue to be of concern to eastern Canada. We must guard against the growing attitude of downgrading as opposed to upgrading rail services in our region. We are pleased that the railway transport committee of the Canadian Transport Commission will hold public hearings, limited as they may be. But I wonder why the committee does not meet on the north and south shores of Quebec in relation to rail passenger service. I am surprised that members from Quebec have not made reference to that glaring oversight in their submissions today.

It must be recognized that one mode of transportation in a region such as Atlantic Canada cannot be improved at the expense of another mode of transportation without serious harm to the total program. What we need is a five to eight-year program of rail bed upgrading, modernization of signal and switching procedures, and the provision of new equipment for both passenger and freight services. In this connection it is interesting to note that tenders closed sometime ago for Canadian Pacific's experimental run between Quebec and Montreal. We would like to know when the minister is going to award the contract and when this experiment will take place. How many trains will run? I suggest that as things stand, transportation programs seem to operate in isolation from each other, to the detriment of the user.

With respect to ferry services, I think that if the minister insists upon the establishment of an independent Crown corporation to handle the Canadian National Railway's ferry service on the east coast, parallel discussions should take place on the essentiality of a marine service to Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. These discussions should cover matters such as no strikes, no withdrawal of service, and no shutdown of service. These things should be worked out ahead of time and it should be decided whether the service is a designated occupation.

We need a five to eight-year air program designed to stabilize regional air carrier services and rationalization of route structures between main line domestic carriers and regional carriers. We also need upgrading of regional and municipal airports with adequate navigational and safety aids to facilitate the third level air service which is so essential, given the geography and sparse population of Atlantic region centres. But this must not be done at the expense of any other mode of transportation.

We also need a three to five-year program to upgrade highways to all-weather standards. This has been promised for about six years but nothing has been done.

With respect to ports and shipping we must guard against the proliferation and development of ports so that we do not have them competing for a level of activity which is insufficient to support more than one. What has been the value to eastern Quebec of the millions of dollars poured into Gros Cacouna? The port is not in use and there appears to be no use for it. Is this another example of little or no consultation or co-operation?

There has been a startling failure on the part of the government to understand the reality of today's movement of containerized cargo. For example, Halifax does not really compete with Montreal; rather it competes with the ports along the Atlantic seaboard. We have to recognize this if we are to develop programs that are integrated and related to the part of the country from which most of us come who are here this evening. Failure to recognize this has cost us expanded container facilities in Halifax. There was poor co-operation between the federal government and the government of New Brunswick with respect to the expansion of the Rodney terminal in the port of Saint John.

What is DREE doing about these things? What is it doing about the rationalization of an over-all port authority—perhaps something like the Port of New York authority—with not only intraprovincial authority but perhaps interprovincial authority as well. What is DREE doing about the rehabilitation of the Halifax shipyard which by next September or October will lose 1,000 jobs? In committee a few days ago the minister told us that as far as he knew no talks had taken place in the last three or four weeks.

These are all areas that require the closest co-operation between the Department of Transport and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Unfortunately there do not seem to be any areas of close co-operation between the two departments. Perhaps the minister would look into these matters in the near future.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, an hon. member opposite seems to be trying to prove that his head size and his I.Q. are the same. If he would sit down and be quiet I will try to untangle some of the web of misinformation that has been woven here this afternoon.

I have sat here listening to all of today's debate, trying to see if the opposition had any purpose in presenting this trumpery motion which the House has considered today. The only conclusion I can come to, having listened to all opposition speeches in this debate, is that they had to include five or six different topics in the motion because they are so sterile of policy that they could not spend a full day discussing the one subject of regional economic expansion. They had to include in the motion the subjects of fiscal policy, transportation, energy, trade, economic expansion—the whole bag as it were. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear a single, coherent policy statement enunciated by hon. members opposite.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: Tell us about New Brunswick.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, there is another member opposite who is yelling out and becoming a bit of a pain in the neck, although some members may have a lower opinion of him than that. This afternoon we heard the opposition gloating about this country's unemployment rate. But not one of them bothered to mention that in the last ten years there has been an absolutely phenomenal growth in this country's labour force and a phenomenal growth in employment.

Mr. Alkenbrack: And unemployment.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): But they do not want to talk about these facts, because if they were to say something positive they would have to expose the fact that they cannot put forward any policy alternatives.

Mr. Rodriguez: Tell us what is happening in your own part of the country.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) was highly critical of the government's monetary and fiscal policy, but not once did he put forward an alternative solution. He criticized DREE for being insensitive to the needs of the provinces and regions of this country, but his criticism is absolute proof that he does not know what he is talking about when he talks about DREE. In the province of New Brunswick, for example, there are presently in existence ten subsidiary agreements under GDA dealing with highways, forestry, agricultural development, industrial development, the Kent region pilot project, the King's Landing historical settlement, the Saint John and Moncton arterial highways, tourism, planning, and minerals and fuels. Every one of those is a matter of provincial jurisdiction. The federal government is giving to the province under these agreements a total of $150 million.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) complained that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is not co-operating with provinces in developing a plan for the regions. I suggest that not one provincial government in the Atlantic region would countenance for a minute an area of another province getting special treatment at the expense of another province. My colleague, the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin), this afternoon referred to the behaviour of certain provinces. I suggest that the actions of New Brunswick illustrated in a classic way the hon. member's contention. The government of that province has been asking the federal government, and specifically the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, to solve all the ills of that province so that the provincial government can wash its hands of them. Indeed a provincial minister was heard to say at a public meeting, "I wish DREE would get on with the job so that we could look after the problems in the other part of the province." I suggest the hon. member was referring to that situation, when talking about the province of New Brunswick having two capitals—Fredericton for the south of the province, and Ottawa for the north. The people of New Brunswick can no longer tolerate that situation.

The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) in his usual, rambling way, spoke of DREE balkanizing the country. He forgot completely that this country was balkanized economically long before DREE was established. He spoke about the department taking an equity position in DREE assisted companies. Has the hon. member any idea at all of the increase which would be needed in the department's manpower if departmental representatives were to sit on every board of directors of DREE assisted companies and help in the making of the many corporate decisions which must be made? The hon. member's statement was absolutely silly. I am sure also, and I am still dealing with his speech, that the people of New Brunswick will be happy to know that he considers all statements coming from New Brunswick to be stupid. At least that is what he said. But that statement is probably indicative of the poor showing his party traditionally makes in New Brunswick elections.

Hon. members opposite suggested in this House that the minister and the department do not listen to the advice of provincial and regional authorities. I want to lay that spurious charge to rest, too, Mr. Speaker, because the record in New Brunswick is sorry indeed. The consequences have been unfortunate when the department has listened to the incompetent advice of the Tory provincial administration in that province. I refer to Bricklin, Brunswick Mills, Fleming and Gibson, Venus Electric, Cirtex, and a whole host of other companies which could be mentioned, all of them provincially incorporated.

In fact Bricklin was the dream child of our premier and a fly-by-night boy from south of the border. What happened? Mr. Speaker, $21 million of public money went down the tube, down the drain, with nothing to show for it except a couple of cars of a type no longer made, stashed in some political friend's garage across the river from Fredericton. That is the result of advice DREE accepted from the province in good faith. The department was led down the garden path.

Brunswick Mills was set up to saw 100 million board feet of lumber. A so-called expert was brought in from another part of the country to run the mill. But the 100 million board feet of lumber were not there to be sawed.

The case of Fleming and Gibson is another specific example of the department of natural resources in New Brunswick having absolutely no idea of the resources potential of the forests of New Brunswick. A mill was set up, under a company which had formerly managed its affairs well, to saw 37 million board feet of lumber. DREE readily agreed to give that company assistance. Unfortunately, only between 12 million and 15 million board feet of lumber were available to support the mill. What happened? The company is in receivership and DREE, of course, has lost the money.

Members of the Tory party opposite said repeatedly this afternoon that the minister does not listen to provincial authorities. I say to him, he had better not listen to some of them as much as he has in the past, or the department will be ruined with poor advice. It is not the minister's job to go to the forests of New Brunswick or any other province, to determine what resources exist there. That is the responsibility of the province to determine. And what is the province doing which is supposed to take this responsibility?

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being ten o'clock it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to Section (11) of Standing Order 58, the proceedings on the motion of the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) have expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

URBAN AFFAIRS—GRANVILLE ISLAND, VANCOUVER—FUTURE OF PROPERTY AND PURPOSE OF EXPENDITURE

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) a question concerning the expenditures of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation on the area known as Granville Island in the city of Vancouver. I asked what is the federal government's policy concerning the future of this property and what is the purpose of the proposed expenditure? Those are two clear inquiries in one question. Unfortunately the minister's answer was not clear. He gave, as those who have come to know him have learned to expect, a typical non-answer. He said that this is a demonstration project which has already given excellent results and which involves an important part of Vancouver. He said this project has been under way for a certain number of years and it is now about to be completed.

● (2200)

The words "demonstration project" have been used in the past. They certainly imply to me the use of housing. However, I can assure the House there is no housing involved in the Granville Island project. As to it being an important part of Vancouver, I certainly agree. It is still a major industrial site downtown in the city of Vancouver. Perhaps the minister was referring to the fact it lies in the constituency of his colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford). I am not certain about that.

The minister says it has been under way for a certain number of years and it is now about to be completed, but he does not say with what result or purpose. He in no way indicates why it is necessary to spend a further $25 million on that particular site.

Perhaps I should explain that Granville Island is not really an island. It is a man-made peninsula in False Creek that was built during the thirties. For many years it has been an industrial estate, well located I should say.

During the tenure of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre in the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs between January, 1972, and August, 1974, the property was transferred by the previous government body which owned it to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the corporation for which the Minister of State for Urban Affairs has responsibility. At that time the matter was raised in certain quarters. I raised it here because there is absolutely no housing and no mortgages involved in Granville Island. It was asked why CMHC should be involved in such a property.

Just 11 days ago the Vancouver Sun announced that in a surprise move on Friday, which would be April 29, the Granville Island trustees accepted not one but two proposals for new theatre facilities as part of island redevelopment. The Arts Club is going to build two theatres, one of 350 seats and the other of 200 seats. The Theatre Space Project is the other one. It too is going to build a theatre. I quote from the article:

> The federal government is in the process of transforming the former light industrial park to "people" use, and the introduction of some form of theatre space has been a major priority in government planning.

I still have not got anywhere near housing. Some four years ago, in June, 1973, the planning department of the city of Vancouver put out a policy booklet on False Creek dealing with Granville Island which lies in False Creek. I quote from that booklet:

> An urban public area, some open and park space with waterfront walkways. Recreational, commercial and entertainment facilities. A significant portion of current leases will expire in the early 1980's so that large scale redevelopment can be expected at that time.

All that happened when they first transferred that property to CMHC is that they hired a former president of the Liberal association in British Columbia, a gentleman named Russell Brink. They paid him a salary higher than that of members of parliament and called in a project manager. They bought a few leases when they expired and the project manager created a park in the corner of the island. Since then several restaurants and other people and places have come along. Now we are to have theatres. All of this is on this small so-called island which is served by a circuituous two-lane roadway which runs under the Granville Street Bridge. This is hardly a place for automobiles and people.

A $25 million expenditure should not surpise us very much. It is a continuing example of the operations of CMHC under the present president, Mr. Teron. There have been recent criticisms of blatant examples of the corporation insuring loans for a luxury hotel in Ottawa which went bankrupt, and ever increasing loans on buildings such as York Place in Hamilton which is in trouble at the moment because the developers were not able to finish the project.

Years ago when one wanted to fool Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, buildings were designed and called apartment buildings. Then after Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation financing had been obtained, it was a simple matter to convert them to hotels. It was a good way to finance hotels, and it happened in Vancouver a number of times. But in the case I referred to here in Ottawa, the building was originally planned to be, and was stated directly on the building permit filed with the city of Ottawa to be, an hotel.

I realize I am digressing a little, Mr. Speaker, but I do so to illustrate the irresponsible attitude which is being demonstrated by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. We need better answers than that.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is amazing how a member can confuse hotels, hostels, and Granville Island; it really surprises me.

The Granville Island project was initiated in 1973. At that time up to $25 million was authorized for the acquisition of land and the buying up of existing industrial leases for this long term redevelopment project. Granville Island has an area of 42 acres—it is quite a substantial site—and is located in Vancouver's False Creek, adjacent to the city centre of Vancouver.

The government's intentions with respect to the Granville Island property are to plan this site as an inner core redevelopment, related to the over-all plans and priorities of the city of Vancouver. The Ministry of State for Urban Affairs is generally concerned with improving the quality and efficiency of the urban condition. The department works closely with federal government departments and agencies as well as other levels of government which have programs and capabilities available in support of over-all urban objectives.

CMHC was appointed as agent for the assembling and management of the Granville Island site. Roughly $14 million of the $25 million authorized has been committed to the project to date to cover land assembly and site improvement. The specific end use of the island will determined when optimum alternatives, bearing in mind the development of adjacent areas of the city, have been identified.

Mr. Clarke: You mean, you don't know?

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): No, we don't know. It is a people place; you said that yourself. The eventual use of the site will relate to public needs and the development potential of the waterfront area.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, Granville Island may be cited as a demonstration project, and it is, but we hope that with the people of Vancouver we will be able to plan that area so that their local needs and wishes are met.

ENERGY—MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—POSSIBILITY OF REQUEST BY ARCTIC GAS FOR GOVERNMENT GUARANTEE TO RAISE CAPITAL

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, this matter arises from a question I asked in the House on May 6 concerning the Mackenzie Valley pipeline. It was prompted by evidence which was given before the National Energy Board by the Canadian Arctic Gas consortium. This consortium had indicated, not once but several times, that it would be seeking government guarantees in order to raise the capital which would be required to build a Mackenzie Valley pipeline. My question was a long one, and without going into it further what I asked basically was whether the government had been approached, at least initially, to provide some form of guarantee, and I asked whether negotiations were under way and, if so, what was their state.

The answer that I received from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) was that he did not know but he said "I will be pleased to find out". One of the reasons for putting this matter on the late show was to follow up that question in view of that remarkably co-operative answer given me by the minister. I am hoping tonight I can be enlightened not only in terms of whether negotiations are taking place with the Arctic Gas consortium with respect to guarantees—that is particularly significant in view of the Berger report that was just tabled—but also to find out what is really the nature of those guarantees.

Perhaps I can assist the hon. parliamentary secretary in a couple of ways, and perhaps he can correct me if I am wrong. The nature of these guarantees is really two-sided. The first guarantee they are seeking is an insurance scheme to cover interruption of service. Shippers would be subject to an all-events tariff and hence liable to pay Arctic Gas Pipelines despite non-delivery. The second form of guarantee is equally serious. It is a guarantee of backstop financing from the government. This is a guarantee where, if there are overruns, the government will back up major overruns on the project.

We have had some experience. We have seen what happened on the Alyeska line, and we have seen what happened on a myriad of other projects in Canada, such as the kind of overrunning we witnessed of James Bay. Alyeska started off with a $900 million projection. I think they are now at $9 billion in terms of costs. The risks in the Mackenzie Valley, in terms of overrun, are quite fantastic.

What is significant about the guarantees sought is that the people who know something about money, both in New York and in Toronto, have insisted that this government back up this private consortium because they cannot get the money from the private sector. That should tell the members of this House just how valid that Mackenzie Valley proposal is, because the private sector itself will not back it without government guarantees. That, even without the Berger report, should be a satisfactory reason to turn down this most unwise proposal in terms of bringing Arctic gas to the United States market.

In terms of the project itself, I should point out that I am not going to deal with the sensitive questions concerning native rights and the environment. That will be dealt with, no doubt, in this House in much more detail. On the narrow issue, the question of government guarantees, where this government is asked to guarantee a pipeline in terms of interruption of service, there is a clear conflict of interest between the Department of the environment and the Department of Finance. There will be a tremendous impetus on the part of the government to see there is no interruption of service. Therefore the protection of the environment, once the pipe is in, would be a great risk because of the guarantee proposal itself.

If you are talking about backstop guarantees, let us say the Mackenzie Valley goes to $15 billion or $20 billion by the time they are finished, and certainly in terms of Arctic construction we have a number of precedents to know these figures are very serious and can get away out of hand. The type of winter construction that is necessary is very high risk in terms of trying to put a figure on the construction cost. To ask the Canadian people to back up approximately $8 billion in guarantees for that pipeline would be one of the great sellouts in Canadian history. Even the private market will not touch it with a ten-foot pole unless the government steps in and guarantees it. That is sufficient reason alone, without the Berger report, to say no to the Mackenzie Valley pipeline.

That is why I ask the parliamentary secretary, if there have been approaches, what kinds of approaches they have been; is my information accurate in terms of the kinds of guarantee Arctic Gas is seeking; and last, but not least, I am pleased to know the minister said he did not know but would be pleased to find out. That is why I raised this matters tonight. I am waiting, with an open mind on the subject, to find out just exactly what has happened on the guarantees.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know only too well how open is the mind of the hon. member.

Mr. Leggatt: That was a facetious remark.

Mr. Kaplan: In that spirit, I am very glad to indicate to him that I do have a very full and complete answer on the question which he raised.

An hon. Member: That is unusual.

Mr. Kaplan: "That is unusual", as the hon. member said.

Canadian Arctic Gas Pipeline Ltd. now estimates the total capital cost of their project at over $9 billion. The equity investment is expected by CAGPL to total about $2.5 billion, with the bulk of remaining investment supplied by bonded debt and bank term loans. As in most projects of this nature, the financng arrangements have to be committed before construction can proceed.

CAGPL has said that lenders would be reluctant to commit themselves unless they could be assured with reasonable certainty that the project would, in fact, be completed and that its operation would not be susceptible to frequent or prolonged interruption. In their submissions to the National Energy Board CAGPL has made clear that their financing plans include a 25 per cent contingency allowance, to provide for cost overruns or cash shorfalls from operations. Even so, CAGPL maintains that potential lenders—mutual funds, trust companies and institutions—might not be prepared to bear the full risks of proceeding, and it is in this connection that the possibility of government completion guarantees have been raised.

CAGPL has raised the matter informally with several government departments. No application or request for government assistance as to either form of guarantee to which the minister referred has been made and there has been no commitment from the federal government. Certainly, it would be premature to consider guarantees until the NEB and Berger reports had been considered, the make-up of the successful consortium was known, and the implications of financial involvement had been studied in detail. Assistance could only be considered in the last resort if a pipeline were deemed to be of vital national interest and demonstrably incapable of a private financing.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—CONFERENCE ON INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC CO-OPERATION—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, some time ago I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) if he would keep the House better informed about the progress which is being made at the North-South Conference, particularly on the issues of commodity price stabilization and special drawing rights, the core issues in the building of peace, the very issues he himself introduced in his speech in Washington.

I made that request of the Prime Minister because of the very strong statement made by Robert McNamara, President of the World Bank, to the effect that the North-South Conference, otherwise known as the Continuing Conference on International Economic Co-operation, was in danger of foundering because the industrialized nations had not yet come to grips with the real issues. I am making my appeal tonight for a better flow of information to the Canadian people as a means of sustaining the policies which have been arrived at now, in the latest development, at the London summit conference which took place over the week end.

What we are talking about here is not just a question of aid to the developing nations. We have long since given up that band-aid approach. We are talking about substantive issues which are at the heart of the reasons underlying world poverty. We are talking particularly about institutional changes which would bring about, for example, a commodity fund for the 18 principal commodities produced by the developing world, as well as the establishment of some mechanism to repair the tremendous damage which is being done to developing nations in consequence of their debt position. The debt of the developing nations now totals $165 billion. The crisis of debt together with the need for a commodity fund is at the heart of the North-South Conference to which the Prime Minister referred in his Washington speech.

Now the London summit meeting has taken place I suggest to the House that, despite the little attention which has been given to it by representatives of the government here, both in the House and in the media, a break-through has been made over the week end which brings a new ray of hope for the North-South Conference which will be concluding its present round of business at the end of this month in Paris. I make this statement because, going through the communiqué which was issued by the seven leaders of the industrialized countries, I see such statements as these—I will quote a couple of them from the communiqué. They read as follows:

> We are agreed to do all in our power to achieve a successful conclusion of the CIEC (Conference on International Economic Co-operation) and we commit ourselves to a continued constructive dialogue with developing countries.
> We aim to increase the flow of aid and other real resources to those countries. we invite the Comcon countries to do the same . . . the message of the Downing Street summit is thus one of confidence: in the continuing strength of our societies and the proven democratic principles that give them vitality; that we are undertaking the measures needed to overcome problems and achieve a more prosperous future.

Not only have they given us just rhetoric, but there is a commitment to continuing the movement toward a common fund.

There are those who are interpreting the communiqué as a significant step forward in establishing linkages between the prices of commodities that are exported to the developing world and what has to be imported in the way of manufactured goods from the west. I will quote again one or two sentences that lend some hope to this positive interpretation of the communiqué when they say:

> We will provide strong political leadership to expand opportunities for trade to strengthen the open international trading system, which will increase job opportunities.
> We reject protectionism—it would foster unemployment, increase inflation and undermine the welfare of our peoples.

That is what took place over the week end, and I suggest that the influence of President Carter has been very notable in the changed attitude of the Americans who are the swing country in the industrialized world in all the negotiations that take place in international forums today.

We have to ask ourselves this question: are we only talking about rhetoric, or are there some substantial gains being made, because we have to keep in mind the admonition from that economic sage, John Kenneth Galbraith. I do not know if all my colleagues would agree with everything he has written, but I think that one or two of his choice comments are particularly relevant, particularly the one which says international conferences are meant to give an appearance of progress even if no action actually takes place.

The problem now is the situation between the rich and poor countries of the world, as demonstrated to us must convincingly in the statement made to the subcommittee on international development here in parliament by the Secretary General of the Commonwealth in a most eloquent testimony which I commend to members of the House. That situation is now critical. It calls for action, not just rhetoric. That is why I return to the question tonight which I posed to the Prime Minister's representative here. Is he going to make some specific comments tonight on what Canada is going to do as distinct from what we say and giving lip service to this type of communique that raises hopes all over the world?

I want to know if Canada's aid will go forward or will it go back, because we have been going back in our percentage which has dropped from .58 per cent of GNP to .51 per cent this year, and Mr. Dupuis, the head of CIDA, said he will not rule out the possibility that it might even go below .5 per cent because they cannot even estimate with precision what our aid picture is today. Are we going to go ahead in open trade or are we going to build more protectionism into our society?

The textile policy announced in the House last December was a retogressive step. If we are not going to have industrial adjustment programs that will help to solve the world's unemployment situation as we go into more high technology production for the goods that the world needs, I think this is really a step backward on the part of Canada and something that gives the lie to the Prime Minister's noble rhetoric.

On the question of unemployment, here we are talking about solving international unemployment. We are faced with the highest unemployment we have ever had in this country. Without a massive effort to show the world that we can cure unemployment in our own society, it hardly gives us credence to go into international conferences and say we will take steps to solve the world's unemployment situation.

On the question of the commodity fund, I want to know how much Canada will put into it. Will we actually press for the establishment of a mechanism to renegotiate the present debt and avoid a new debt, or are we just going to give lip service to communiques that raise hopes falsely? Those are the questions I put to the Prime Minister, and I ask for some specific answers tonight.

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I did not know exactly the topics which would be developed by the hon. member, I cannot answer all the questions he raised.

However, Canada continues to work to bring about a successful conclusion to the Conference on International Economic Co-operation. Hon. members will be aware that the North-South dialogue was an important element at the Downing Street summit this past week end. The Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) was especially concerned that the leaders of the seven industrialized nations present should give full recognition to the needs of the developing countries. The communique of the meeting will show that this concern was shared by all. The communique took note of progress which has been made, and the leaders made some specific pledges for action.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) and other ministers have been deeply involved in these issues and have made substantial contributions to the formation of Canadian policy. Action now appears likely at the CIEC in the key area of energy, commodity arrangements, including a possible common fund, and on a range of financial issues, including debt and levels of development assistance.

In all of this the role of the government House leader (Mr. MacEachen) in his capacity as co-chairman of the conference has been crucial to the continuing dialogue. Together with the other co-chairman, Dr. Manuel Perez-Guerrero, the Venezuelan Minister of State for International Economic Affairs, he has ensured the continuation of the conference, which at one time seemed very likely to fail. After considerable negotiation both developed and developing countries now appear ready to proceed to the final ministerial level meeting in Paris at the end of this month. The deputy co-chairman of the President of the Privy Council, the president of CIDA, is in Paris tonight for a review of the situation with conference participants following on the summit meeting last week end and following final preparatory meetings which have been under way in Paris.

The major concern of Canada is the desire to see a substantial contribution made to the economic development of developing countries. The government has been encouraged by progress in the North-South dialogue within and outside CIEC in recent months, and Canada will continue to play its part in contributing to concerted action by industrialized countries to improve the economic well being of developing countries.

Mr. Speaker, is my time up?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): I have other matters to discuss.

Mr. Roche: We want action.

Mr. Dinsdale: Words are not enough.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 o'clock p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.29 p.m.

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION PROVIDING FOR FREEDOM OF ACCESS TO INFORMATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity. One year having gone by since the government clearly stated that it was drafting freedom of information legislation to which it was giving priority, and dozens of organizations, such as CUPE, the Canadian Bar Association, the Civil Liberties Association, Canadian teachers, Canadian consumers, and many others in their hundreds of thousands, having indicated their support for immediate action, I move:

That this House urges the government to ignore the self-serving views of the small group of highly placed government people who fear open government, and requests that the government bring in a bill, or instruct a parliamentary committee to do so, and also provide for a free vote in connection with the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STATEMENTS BY MINISTERS ON BERGER REPORT—GOVERNMENT POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the same provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the statement today, as appears in the Alaska press, made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) that "no one invited Mr. Berger to recommend against a pipeline", and in view of the statements yesterday by the Minister without Portfolio from Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) in outright opposition to the Berger recommendations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House request the Prime Minister or the government House leader to make a statement on motions today stating whether these public remarks form part of government policy and, if they do not, that this House request this government to clearly dissociate itself from such irresponsibility.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

PROPOSED PAYMENT OF TRAVELLING COSTS OF CALPA AND CATCA EXECUTIVES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the attitude exhibited by the Department of Transport in invoicing CALPA and CATCA for transportation costs connected with bringing the executives of these organizations to Ottawa, at the request of Ministry of Transport officials, to resolve the crisis which crippled Canada's airline industry last June, in view of the circumstances whereby the ministry gave the impression that they could accept all financial responsibilities at that time for the transportation of these executives, who in fact played a constructive part in resolving the crisis, and in view of the lavish use of government aircraft by ministers of the Crown at the expense of the public for far less constructive purposes, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That the Ministry of Transport rescind or cancel these invoices and arrange payment from departmental funds for this very necessary and co-operative course of action by the executives of CALPA and CATCA in coming to Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SUGGESTION CORPORATION BROADCAST WORLD HOCKEY ASSOCIATION FINAL GAMES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that tonight marks the first time in ten years that two Canadian teams will be involved in a professional hockey final and in view of the fact that the mandate of the CBC is to broadcast events of importance to Canadians, thus promoting Canadian unity, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith):

That this House request the Secretary of State to instruct the CBC to televise the final series between the Winnipeg Jets and Quebec Nordiques.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORDERS FOR HAWKER SIDDELEY SHIPYARD TO AVOID LAY-OFFS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion on a matter of urgent and national importance. In view of the serious shortage of work orders for the Hawker Siddeley Halifax shipyards and the consequent threat of the loss of about 1,000 jobs by late summer or early fall, jobs embracing the bulk of shipbuilding and repair skills which form the backbone of an essential port requirement, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave):

That this government be instructed to take whatever new initiatives are open to it to reopen talks with the company with the purpose of exploring potential federal government ship requirements that could be advanced to fill the work gap and at the same time to further explore the possibilities of a program of rehabilitation of the yard and the construction of a new floating dry dock for the east coast of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ALLEGED FAILURE OF LIBERAL PARTY TO ADOPT POLICIES TO UNIFY THE COUNTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a motion of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion is promoted by the extremely significant statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson). I therefore move, seconded, in the absence of the hon. member for Winnipeg South, by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith):

That this House concurs with the view of the hon. member for Winnipeg South that the Liberal party and the Prime Minister have not been able to unify Canada, and further condemns the Prime Minister who ran on a ticket of national unity in 1968 in light of the fact that the country is more divided now than it was before.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Needless to say, I have some grave reservations about the urgency of the question.

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: You leave my countrymen alone.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion under Standing Order 43 can be presented to the House only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

ENERGY

NORTHERN PIPELINE—POSSIBILITY OF FURTHER STUDY OF ALCAN ROUTE AND DEMPSTER HIGHWAY ROUTE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It concerns the rush jobs that the department is doing on the investigation into the Alcan pipeline route. Inasmuch as the Alcan proposal was brought forward by the Alberta Gas Trunk Line on August 31, 1976, there seems little reason for an inquiry into the merits of the route to be beginning only this week. In view of the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that the inquiry is to be only a preliminary study, would the minister tell the House exactly how he will manage to stage a follow-up study to the Lysyk commission after it reports in August and before the Prime Minister's September 1 decision deadline?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, to begin with, the final, complete application for the Alcan route was only received in November, although there was a preliminary application in the early fall. So we were not able to set up something together much sooner. As soon as the application came in, we immediately undertook negotiations with the Yukon government and the Yukon Indians with regard to the type of inquiry which might take place. It is true that the inquiry is limited to a three month period, but it does not have to do all of the things the Berger inquiry had to do. It does not have to deal with the environment or with the conditions which will apply if that route is taken. There are only six communities along that route compared with about 35 along the Mackenzie. Finally, much of the work Mr. Justice Berger has done can be used by the Lysyk panel. So we feel that in that period of time they can deal with economic and social impacts.

The hon. member asked what will happen if the government's decision is to go for the Alcan route. There would have to be more work done by one group or another to determine the conditions which would apply for that route. Mr. Justice Berger dealt with both, and his report on conditions will come out in July.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it appears that if the Alcan route is ultimately selected, the preferred route for Canadian delta gas will be along the Dempster highway to connect with the Alcan express pipeline to the south. In view of the fact that a social environmental impact study of this route is absolutely essential if an informed decision is to be made, will the minister indicate whether he will now set such an inquiry into gear?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, if in due course a link is proposed or we decide on a link from the Mackenzie Delta to the Alcan pipeline, the proposed pipeline down the Dempster Highway, I suppose we would have to have some kind of inquiry or investigation into the social and economic impacts, but that inquiry does not seem to be necessary now. We do not have to do that right now.

NORTHERN PIPELINE—STATEMENT ON BERGER REPORT BY MINISTER WITHOUT PORTFOLIO

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, by way of observation on the last two answers—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —it seems that we are running into the danger of making a decision before some adequate inquiries have been made, and part of the responsibility for the delay can be laid at the feet of the government.

My supplementary question is to the Acting Prime Minister. It concerns the principle of cabinet solidarity, which is fundamental to our system. With regard to the remarks last night of the Minister without Portfolio that he is, and I quote, "not in any way in agreement with Berger" and that he has "no time for Berger's argument that the northern pipeline threatens wildlife", will the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether those remarks represent government policy or whether he intends to put a stopper in the mouth of the hon. gentleman to put an end to his bad habit of leading with his mouth from time to time?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: He's all yours now.

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF FENCO REPORT ON COST OVERRUNS

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister, and it concerns the Fenco study into cost overruns which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources last February undertook to table in the House. This report has not been tabled, despite the fact that the minister has had it in his possession for nearly a month. Will the Acting Prime Minister now undertake to release this report, and in addition, will he tell this House whether this study or any other study undertaken by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has examined the vulnerability of the Alcan project to cost overruns?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will check into the possibility of discharging the minister's commitment, as stated by the hon. member, to make this report available. I have to check into it. I think the second question, on the face of it, would require a negative answer, but I will check on that, too.

● (1420)

Mr. Neil: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When an examination of the economics of the Alcan route is undertaken it should be remembered that the Dempster highway route is part and parcel of the Alcan route. Will the Acting Prime Minister give an undertaking that the study will include the Dempster highway route and the possibility of cost overruns on it?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, these are in the nature of representations that will be studied.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF SPECIAL SUMMER WORKS PROJECTS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In the House yesterday he said that the programs the government has under way to deal with unemployment, including the allocation of funds for Canada Works and Young Canada Works, are based on anticipated high levels of unemployment. Considering that the most recent figure has established unemployment at 8.3 per cent—the highest level of unemployment since records have been kept—and considering that unemployment is higher today than the government's unofficial estimate said it would be, will the minister reconsider the answer he gave yesterday? Can he tell the House, for instance, that the government will consider bringing in a special summer works project that will deal with this extremely high level of unemployment in a serious manner?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that undertaking.

UNEMPLOYMENT—POSSIBILITY OF NATIONAL PROGRAM OF RESIDENTIAL INSULATION TO CREATE JOBS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Considering that the cost of current levels of unemployment to employed Canadians is about $9 billion per year, some $2 billion being for welfare and unemployment insurance payments, $6 billion for lost productivity, the rest being made up of taxes not paid by the unemployed, would the minister consider financing a national program of insulation for residential buildings across the country which has been estimated to cost about $1 billion? That $1 billion would provide at least 4,000 additional jobs and be important in conserving energy.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that the hon. member's proposal has merit. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has already implemented such a program in two provinces and obviously is concerned about its application in all of Canada. The hon. member mentioned that the cost of such program would be $1 billion per year. At the present time it is not possible to find resources to add to the present budget to finance such a special program, although undoubtedly the suggestion has all the benefits the hon. member says it has.

Mr. Broadbent: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When we first proposed such an insulation program last September we did not anticipate that even the government would take it up in such a half-hearted way as to apply it to two provinces. We estimated at that time that the savings in energy costs alone to the Canadian economy in the years ahead would justify the capital expenditure. Considering the savings in energy, which are so important to the Canadian economy as a whole, and considering the need to provide jobs early in the summer months particularly for young Canadians, will the minister not make a commitment to go ahead with this eminently sensible program?

Mr. MacEachen: I think it is eminently sensible but not financially possible at the present time, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

FINANCE

PROPOSITIONS CONCERNING TAXING OF LIFE INSURANCE BENEFITS

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Finance is not in the House, may I direct my question to the acting minister?

Considering the strong protest from members of life underwriters organizations against the new budget proposals of March 31 last concerning the taxation on life insurance proceeds, and in view of the fact that these new proposals will result mainly in penalizing the families of policyholders, could the minister tell the House whether he intends to reply to the statements made by the members of life underwriters organizations and if so, when and how?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member may be aware, we have given first reading—or are about to—to all the budgetary proposals that have been put forward by the Minister of Finance. They will be before the House in the present session, and before the committee of the whole, and it will be possible for the hon. member to make direct representations and receive direct explanations on this point at that time from the Minister of Finance.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INQUIRY IF MR. JUSTICE BERGER HAS RESUMED DUTIES AS JUDGE

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, my question—

[English]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Could the minister inform the House if, according to his terms of reference, Mr. Justice Berger has now completed his task with the tabling of his report and if he has now resumed his duties as a supreme court judge of British Columbia?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I understand Mr. Justice Berger intends to issue another report as a second volume. He has not resumed his duties at present as a member of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, but I know that he and his Chief Justice have discussed privately the date on which this is to occur.

POSSIBILITY OF MR. JUSTICE BERGER EMBARKING ON DEFENCE OF HIS REPORT

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has Mr. Justice Berger informed the minister of his intention to embark on a promotional campaign and of his desire, as reported, to accept invitations from the media and interest groups in order to defend his viewpoint which, clearly, now has political connotations and which obviously will now have to be resolved not by the itinerant judiciary but by the executive and legislative branch of government?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, only to the extent that there has been comment on that in the newspapers.

ENERGY

NORTHERN PIPELINE—ASSURANCE OF ADEQUATE SCIENTIFIC KNOWLEDGE TO ASSESS ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of Mr. Justice Berger's statement regarding gaps in environmental knowledge, specifically "that present scientific knowledge is inadequate to serve the needs of government in assessing the impact of proposed oil and gas developments in the north . . ." I ask, is our present scientific knowledge inadequate to serve the needs of government in assessing the impact of proposed oil and gas developments in the north, and, if so, will the minister assure the House that approval to proceed with the pipeline will not be granted until adequate scientific knowledge is made available both to the government and parliament?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Justice Berger examined much scientific and technical evidence with respect to the environment. I cannot prejudge the National Energy Board report; it may consider some of those questions as well. We hope to get such evidence from all sides before we make a decision.

NORTHERN PIPELINE—IDENTIFICATION OF SOCIAL AND ENVIRONMENTALLY SENSITIVE AREAS

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister support in principle the maintenance and enhancement of the natural environment through such means as intensifying ecological research, establishing national parks, ensuring wildlife conservation and, in relation to pipeline corridors, identifying geographic areas of specific environmental and social concern or sensitivity, areas in which will be imposed restrictions concerning route or pipeline activities and, possibly, areas excluded from pipeline construction? Have such areas of specific environmental and social concern or sensitivity been identified in the Yukon? If so, is the government now willing to exclude from pipeline construction such areas of the Yukon as were identified by Mr. Justice Berger?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to read that question before giving a proper answer. The hon. member lost me with all his questions and subquestions.

INFORMATION

DATE OF ACTION TO ENSURE FREEDOM OF ACCESS TO INFORMATION—REASON FOR SECRET MEETING WITH GROUP CALLED "ACCESS"

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State who I understand is now charged with responsibility for bringing in freedom of information proposals, if any are to be brought in at all. In view of the facts set out in my Standing Order 43 motion, which was so rudely and loudly rejected by hon. members opposite, and having in mind that in January, 1968, the then justice minister Trudeau quoted with approval, in the Canadian Charter of Human Rights, three United Nations and international charters which accepted freedom of information, when is the government going to minimize the public suspicions created by stonewalling such cases as CANDU and Polymer, and take immediate action to guarantee open government?

● (1430)

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, in the Speech from the Throne the government indicated that it would be presenting to the committee a policy paper on this subject. I am pleased to tell him that the paper is ready. It has been translated and is in the process of being printed. It will therefore, be available very shortly.

Mr. Baldwin: In order to establish his credibility as a supporter of open information, which I believe the minister to be, will he now agree to receive this afternoon the delegation from Access in connection with this proposal at an open meeting? If not, can he indicate why such a meeting should he held in secret behind closed doors.

Mr. Roberts: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to tell the hon. member that I am having a meeting with this group this afternoon, of which he is honorary patron.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roberts: I am glad to know that he shares the passion that I have for open government and the conviction that it is essential that the process of government be opened up much more than at present and information be made more readily available. The reason the meeting this afternoon is not open is, as I indicated earlier, that the report is ready to be presented. I felt it was my obligation to speak to members of parliament first about the report rather than to present it publicly to a body outside parliament. My understanding of the courtesies of parliament is that that is the appropriate approach. I am sure that if I had turned the meeting this afternoon into a press conference about the report, I would have received complaints that I had not presented the report to members of parliament previous to that. That is the explanation. However, the Access group will, as I am sure the honorary patron knows, be having a press conference of their own to explain the recommendations that are being made.

PUBLIC WORKS

ROLE OF DEPARTMENTAL STAFF IN VIEW OF GREATER USE OF PRIVATE CONSULTANTS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the fact that there is evidence that the Department of Public Works is now adopting a policy of "privatization" where more of the department's work is going to be farmed out to outside consultants in the private sector, can the minister tell us what he plans to do with the large expert staff built up by the Department of Public Works over the years to do this work within the department?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this is an area at which we are taking a look. In many areas the capacity does not exist within the department. There are some questions relating to the paving of the Alaska Highway, whether in fact we should use the staff within the department or use the private sector. I feel strongly that we should make use of the private sector. There are many cases where the expertise does exist. It is a question of whether one does it or goes to the private sector.

Mr. McKinley: I am sure the minister knows that a lot of expertise does exist within the department. How can he justify a policy of hiring many more outside consultants instead of using expertise within the department in a period of supposed government restraint? Would it not mean that there would be a lot fewer projects completed with the same financial outlay as a result of this policy he is intending to follow?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, the answer to the latter part of the question is no. Like any other department of government or any other employer, we have a certain turnover of staff. It is a question of deciding as this turnover occurs whether the individual who has departed should be replaced or whether we should look at consolidation and make use of the private sector. My inclination is that we should do the latter.

INDEPENDENCE OF JUDICIARY—LAYING OF PREFERRED INDICTMENT WHILE CASE PENDING BEFORE JUDGE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Justice a question. The other day he spoke in glowing terms about the independence of the judiciary. My question arises from a preferred indictment which his department laid against the relative of a senior pressman in this city. A preliminary hearing was held in reference to a charge of possession for the purpose of trafficking in marijuana. The charge was dismissed at the preliminary hearing stage. The matter was taken before a judge. The minister laid a preferred indictment while the matter was pending before the court. Is that the kind of independence of judiciary the minister endorses?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the matter, as was clearly indicated by the hon. member for Calgary North, is now before the courts. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, you will appreciate that I have great difficulty in making any comment on it. I can only say that in the interests of the administration of justice I felt it necessary to exercise my right under the Criminal Code to prefer a direct indictment on the basis of sworn evidence placed before me.

Mr. Woolliams: Apart from the case I have mentioned, when a charge has been laid before the courts and dismissed at the preliminary hearing stage, and the matter is then taken before a judge, is it the general policy of the Minister of Justice that while the matter is pending before a judge on which he has to make a determination to prefer an indictment on his own and run rough-shod over the courts of Canada?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, without in any way accepting the premise of the hon. member's question or in any way being taken to comment on the specific case to which he has referred, that is obviously not the general policy of my department.

ENERGY

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—REQUEST FOR DELAY OF DECISION UNTIL NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD HAS REPORTED

Mr. Alan Martin (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In his absence, I will direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the obvious and serious concerns facing this country over the next 15 to 20 years relating to our overall energy supply, and in view of the rather irresponsible and extremely premature action on the part of the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the New Democratic Party in firmly rejecting the Canadian Arctic Gas pipeline proposal at this early stage, will the Acting Prime Minister assure the House that the government will take a much more responsible stance, one which is obviously more in the national interest of Canadians, and await the further major reports to be issued in the near future by the National Energy Board, one dealing with an update on the demand and supply side of our oil energy reserves and the other dealing in detail with the northern pipeline proposals currently before it, as well as the benefit of parliamentary debate before making its final judgment on this most important matter?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, quite apart from any comment on the position taken by any other party, I want to make it clear on behalf of the government that no decisions have been made with respect, (a) to a pipeline and, (b) to the route of any such possible pipeline; that we regard the delivery of the Berger report as a very important element, providing very valuable information in the total context about a decision. However, it is certainly the intention of the government to await the report of the National Energy Board and other relevant reports before a decision is taken on this question. That is the general position.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

DRILLING IN BEAUFORT SEA—DATE OF DECISION ON RENEWAL OF PERMIT OF DOME PETROLEUM

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. One of the world's great experts on oil blowouts, Mr. Red Adair, said yesterday that a blowout in the Arctic is inevitable as long as drilling is done there; pray to God it does not happen but there will be an accident as long as men drill for oil. Eventually someone will make a mistake. In view of the clear indication from Red Adair and the evidence before the Standing Committee on Fisheries and the Environment by the Assistant Deputy Minister of the Environment opposing drilling in the Arctic, and in view of the overwhelming evidence in the Berger report of risk to the ecology, will the minister advise what date cabinet is going to come down with a decision on the renewal of the Dome Petroleum drilling permits and also advise whether it is his view that drilling should continue in the present circumstance?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I will give my advice to the cabinet committee. No date has been set for a decision on this matter. It is still a completely open question. Perhaps I will get in touch with Mr. Adair and talk to him about it.

DRILLING IN BEAUFORT SEA—PROTESTS FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): A supplementary on the same subject. Yesterday, the Minister of the Environment told the House that representations had been received from the United States regarding the risk to U.S. waters as a result of Beaufort Sea drilling but he was not able to be specific. Could the hon. gentleman be more specific today and tell us whether the United States has made any protest, and, further, whether any agreement has been discussed under which the United States would be compensated in the event of an oil spill damaging to its interests?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I know that representations have been made and discussions held. But that took place with the Department of External Affairs, not with my department, although the views expressed were communicated to us. In the arrangements for drilling last summer, provision was made to compensate all the parties, including the United States, in the event of a blow-out. Whether there have been further representations with regard to that aspect, I am not certain.

LACK OF WAGE PARITY BETWEEN HALIFAX AND SAINT JOHN LONGSHOREMEN—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Labour in the absence of the Minister of Finance? It arises from the historical relationship involving parity of wages between Halifax and Saint John longshoremen. Since wages at the two ports are now somewhat apart due to technicalities enforced by the Anti-Inflation Board arising mainly from the difference in the yearly starting dates of the contracts, would the hon. gentleman use his good offices to carry out the warm statement of the Minister of Finance when replying to me with regard to this matter at the dawn of the Anti-Inflation Program?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): I shall certainly look into the matter, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

STATUS OF EMPLOYEES' PASSES AFTER IMPLEMENTATION OF VIA RAIL SYSTEM

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief question for the Minister of Transport. In order to alleviate certain anxieties expressed by many employees and pensioners of Canadian National Railways, would the minister check with the company, or have an inquiry made to determine whether or not the system of railway passes for employees and pensioners will be continued once the proposed Via rail system is in place?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): I shall be pursuing this question. I have received many representations with regard to it from pensioners and others and I understand their great interest in the continuation of their rights and privileges.

Oral Questions

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

USE OF PAYMENT WITHHELD FROM NORTHROP TO MAKE LOAN TO CANADAIR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services. When the government reached an out-of-court settlement with Northrop requiring the payment of some $9 million to Northrop, the minister told the House that some $6.5 million of this was actually money which the government had previously withheld from Northrop. A report has now surfaced to the effect that this money was actually lent to Canadair in lieu of progress payments and that the debt is going to be magically converted into a Canadair asset. Could the minister tell the House whether it is true that the money which was withheld from Northrop was loaned to Canadair through the defence production revolving fund and whether this is the money which the government now proposes to write off by the device of renaming it an asset of Canadair?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is confusing two issues. It is a fact that our settlement with Northrop represented for the larger part money which had been withheld from their contract and thus was owed to them. Furthermore, the loan granted to Canadair was not related only to the Northrop contract but also to various contracts, and for the fruitful negotiation of those contracts, this loan had been granted and has been recently reimbursed to the government.

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: Bearing in mind that the government has owned 100 per cent of Canadair since January 5, 1976, according to the minister's reply to a written question, and is now perpetrating a financial shell game which permits a Canadair debt of more than $8 million to be turned into an asset, requiring, strangely enough, a further transfer of more than $8 million from the taxpayers to the company, is the minister now claiming another first for this Liberal government—that this group of financial geniuses has now bought and paid for 122 per cent of Canadair?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, the negotiation for the Canadair purchase has been done by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and of course any investment in the company is decided by this department. Our relations with this company are therefore on a supplier-to-customer basis.

CITIZENSHIP

ACTION TO CLEAR BACKLOG OF APPLICATIONS—SUGGESTED DELAY OF DEMAND PROVINCIAL EMPLOYEES OBTAIN CERTIFICATES

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State as the minister responsible for the citizenship branch; it follows a question which was asked last week by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal. At that time, the minister said he would be writing a letter to members of parliament asking their co-operation—I believe he has already done so. What we would like to hear is what he plans to do about the backlog in the citizenship branch which is causing serious difficulties to a great many Canadians who may wish to travel, join the Armed Forces or engage in a variety of other activities. Can the minister suggest at least one small step to be taken in clearing up this backlog within the citizenship branch by speeding up the processing of applications?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I wish to express appreciation for the hon. member's co-operation. As I indicated to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, we expect the backlog to be cleared up fairly quickly and I am exploring the suggestions which have been made by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal and other members that improved liaison might be arranged between the Passport Office and the citizenship branch. I would be happy to consider any other suggestions the hon. member might have to make.

Mr. Johnston: Is the minister aware of the undue pressure placed on the citizenship branch by various provincial departments and, I suspect, federal departments as well, demanding that provincial public servants apply for citizenship immediately upon qualifying, under threat that failure to do so will result in their jobs being posted, and that this situation has worsened since the qualifying period for citizenship became only three years? Can the minister tell us whether federal departments are demanding the same of their civil servants who might be in the position of holding landed immigrant status? If this is the case, has the minister considered asking the provincial governments to place a moratorium on that sort of demand, at least until the backlog of applications in the citizenship branch has been cleared away?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of the situation which the hon. member has described. I will certainly look into the matter.

IMMIGRATION

POSSIBILITY OF LAX HEALTH CHECKS IN VIEW OF INCREASED INCIDENCE OF LEPROSY

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It arises from an alarming increase in the number of documented cases of Hansen's disease, more commonly referred to as leprosy. The department has informed me that cases of leprosy in Canada have increased dramatically—there were 38 in 1965, 51 in 1970, 92 in 1975 and 99 last year. Can the minister explain this increase? Is it possible that our health checks are proving inadequate? Can he advise us what has been done by his immigration officials abroad to make sure that a person suffering from leprosy is not admitted to Canada?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Health checks are, of course, made but as a result of the hon. member's interest and the question he placed on the order paper I have asked my officials to take a long, hard look at the situation.

Mr. Epp: I thank the minister for that answer. Has he taken any steps, in conjunction with officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare to document the threat to Canadian health which these cases may be presenting? What steps are being taken to make sure that the disease, to the extent that it is communicable, is not spread in other areas of Canada?

Mr. Cullen: The officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare engaged in these tasks are highly competent and I know they work in close contact with their provincial counterparts. Given the dramatic increase about which the hon. member has spoken, I am certain they are watching the situation closely.

AIR TRANSPORT

FAILURE OF EMERGENCY LOCATER TRANSMITTERS AND CROSS POSITION INDICATORS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I wonder if we could ask him to leave the seat of his successor and perhaps answer my question.

At the time the regulations were put into effect, I asked the previous minister of transport a question with regard to research and Canadian manufacture of emergency locater transmitters and cross-position indicators. Since that time there have been many hundreds of failures causing many thousands of dollars worth of search and rescue activity falsely occasioned. I wonder if the minister can tell me now whether there have been any studies or research done, or are any going to be done, into the problems of the CPI's and ELT's that might take some of the strain off private flyers?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the question of a superior kind of ELT has been under examination, including the costs of a change and the reliability of any successor equipment. I have not looked at the state of the analysis for several weeks now. I will be glad to do that and bring a further report.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Transport. May I ask the minister if his research is going into the problem of batteries for the ELTs as well?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it goes into the whole question at the present time.

TOURISM

LOSS OF REVENUE AS RESULT OF REFUSAL OF UNITED STATES TO ALLOW DEDUCTION OF CONVENTION EXPENSES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. My question has to do with section 602 of the tax reform act of the United States which reads, in part, that Americans travelling abroad for conventions should not be allowed to deduct expenses from their taxes. Since this has caused a good deal of consternation and a loss of many hundreds of thousands of dollars to cities such as Toronto, Winnipeg, Montreal and Vancouver in lost convention revenues, I would like to ask the minister if the government has made an active solicitation to the American government, specifically the president, and could he inform the House, if they have done so, as to what reply there has been?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister was in Washington meeting with President Carter, he raised this problem with him. When the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce visited his counterpart, the Secretary of Commerce in the United States, the matter was also discussed. Canadian authorities are still pressing the United States government to review the matter in the hope that a change can be made to relieve the Canadian tourist industry.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I believe the particular section to which I alluded comes up for debate in Congress in July, when there will be public hearings held and technical changes can be made at that time. Can the parliamentary secretary give the House a firm commitment that further representation, as strong as possible, will be made to the United States Congress to see whether this severe injustice can be corrected?

Mr. Poulin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise the hon. member the United States Senate voted on such a motion within the last two weeks, and unfortunately it was defeated by two votes. I want to assure the hon. member that further representations are being made with the United States Congress in the hope that this matter can be relieved at the earliest possible time. There are ongoing discussions, as always, between Canada and the United States on these and other tax matters.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR CENTENNIAL COMMEMORATIVE STAMPS FOR CANADIAN NATIONAL EXHIBITION

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Canadian National Exhibition is the largest exhibition of its kind in the world, and in view of the fact that 1978 is the one hundredth anniversary of the Canadian National Exhibition, will the Postmaster General consider striking a centennial commemorative stamp for this event in 1978?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to receive the representations from the hon. gentleman. I have visited the CNE on a number of occasions. I find it is an excellent exhibition. We are considering the matter with all due seriousness.

PROPOSED MERGER OF TRANSAIR AND PACIFIC WESTERN AIRLINES—CONSULTATIONS WITH MANITOBA PREMIER

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and is in regard to the proposed merger of Transair and Pacific Western Airlines. This subject has been discussed in the Manitoba legislature in the last couple of days, and the premier has informed the legislature that he is having difficulty in contacting the minister to discuss this subject. I would like to ask the Minister of Transport if the premier contacted him yesterday or today, and can he bring us up to date on whether the merger will be proceeding or not?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the premier has been accurately reported because we have had no trouble getting in touch with one another. We did speak about the question, and I have nothing further to say about the question of ownership because any such announcement or indication would come from the directly interested parties.

POSSIBILITY TRANSAIR WOULD GIVE UP WINNIPEG-TORONTO ROUTE IN EVENT OF MERGER

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, one of the problems arising out of the merger is that Transair would have to give up its Toronto-Winnipeg run in return for some of Air Canada's viable western routes. Is the minister involved in this, and will Transair have to give up these routes if the merger is completed?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of some discussions among airlines about the various positions they would take in the event of a change in ownership and the appropriate application before the Canadian Transport Commission be approved. Of course, any discussion they may have about their positions can only be that and cannot affect the fact that the applications do have to go before the Canadian Transport Commission. That applies not only to changes in ownership but changes in licences for routes as well.

COMMUNICATIONS

ALLEGED IRREGULARITIES OF CRTC PROCEDURE IN CONSIDERING LICENCE RENEWAL OF RADIO CENTRE-VILLE

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications.

Can the minister tell the House whether she is now acquainted with the file on Radio centre-ville, in Montreal, with regard to the litigation which opposes that community radio station to the CRTC; whether she is acquainted with the grievances that have been expressed, and also with the fact that, contrary to the notice sent to those who complained about the renewal of that station's licence, no one has been summoned to appear before the CRTC; and also, why the complainants have not been advised so that they can oppose the renewal of that community station's licence?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I know nothing about the grievances of Radio centre-ville. Those matters, as the hon. member is aware, are dealt with by the CRTC without any intervention on the part of the Minister of Communications. With regard to the question of the hon. member concerning the procedure followed by the CRTC, I must remind him that it has been challenged. The CRTC, which is authorized to set up its own procedures, decided that in the case of renewals, it would not invite new applications or new witnesses to oppose them. The courts finally agreed to the procedure adopted by the CRTC. As for the grievances, I shall look into the matter and try to give an answer to the hon. member.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROPOSAL THAT RAILS BE PURCHASED FROM SYDNEY STEEL PLANT TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Now that the minister has admitted that in the past Canadian National Railways has purchased rails from Colorado Iron in the United States, will the minister advise if the Canadian National Railways is considering, or would he suggest to them, placing further orders for rails with the Sydney Steel Corporation, and if not required by Canadian National Railways at the moment, they could be stockpiled for future use as has been done in the case of uranium, coal, butter and other commodities—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: And eggs!

Mr. Muir: —thereby providing employment for unemployed steel workers in Cape Breton?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian National only looks elsewhere for rails when there are good reasons for doing so. There were some over-capacity problems not too long ago. Following visits from steel workers and the representations from my colleague, the President of the Privy Council, I had meetings with Canadian National. As a result of those meetings, discussions with the steel plant took place and orders for rails were accelerated with Canadian National agreeing to take the rails earlier. They have been doing just that and stockpiling them for use later in the year.

HOUSING

POSSIBILITY OF MORTGAGE DEFAULTS UNDER ASSISTED HOME OWNERSHIP PROGRAM

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Housing and Urban Affairs and relates to the government's Assisted Home Ownership Program. In view of the fact that the AHOP program is based on the assumption that real family incomes will rise over the long term, and in view of the fact that there is economic uncertainty in Canada, is the minister aware of the possibility that there will be large scale mortgage defaults after the interest-reducing loan becomes due at the end of the five-year period?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

● (1500)

Mr. Whiteway: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for the same minister also having to do with the AHOP program. In view of the fact that observers close to the financial markets of this country are predicting real difficulty—I think the minister is aware of this—and due to the ballooning which will take place five years from now when these loans become due, would the minister at least be prepared to concede that CMHC may not only have to maintain the subsidies but in fact have to assume those mortgage payments altogether?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, the only thing I can tell the hon. member is that this program is very popular in Canada and that it allowed a few thousand Canadians to acquire 38,000 new housing units in Canada; I should think those people do not share the concerns of the hon. member.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

IMPLEMENTATION OF HALL REPORT ON RAILWAY PENSION PLANS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour concerning the report of Dr. Noel Hall on Canadian railway pension plans. In view of the fact that very little has been done about this report, and particularly in view of the fact that nothing will be done to improve the pensions of those already retired unless some initiative is taken by the government, can the minister say whether the government is considering taking an initiative on behalf of those retired railway employees?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is quite accurate to say that nothing has been done with respect to the Noel Hall report. As the hon. member is aware, the report directly aims its remarks at the CPR, which is a private corporation. I have talked to some leaders of the railway unions and this is going to be a very serious subject at the bargaining table during the current negotiations. What flows from it may very well have implications for the pensioners already retired to whom the hon. member refers.

SUGGESTION PENSION FUNDS BE AVAILABLE FOR INSPECTION BY UNIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for the Minister of Labour. Surely the minister agrees that the CPR, or any other railway or corporation running a private pension fund, should be directed by legislation to make the pension fund available for inspection by the unions? This does not have to wait for other people. Why does the government not act on this part of the Noel Hall report?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, that is an area that we may very well look into.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Before some hon. members get too excited about the situation, if my interpretation is right, I believe it is the feeling of the union leadership, at least those to whom I have talked, that they would prefer the matter now to rest in their hands in the free collective bargaining system, and they are assured that they can do rather well, better perhaps than a lot of the rest of us.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAMBERT (BELLECHASSE)—ALLEGED BIAS OF RADIO-CANADA

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege in connection with a matter of utmost importance, to emphasize once more the lack of objectivity which the French network of the CBC is demonstrating in its news bulletins and which may infringe upon the privileges of hon. members. When I came to the House yesterday, together with my wife and brother-in-law, I was confronted by a battery of photographers bent on filming my arrival, as though this was a special event of some sort. Yet, not once before, out of the hundreds of occasions I covered the distance and entered through the same door to reach the House, was I considered newsworthy material.

During the Radio-Canada six o'clock news bulletin, reporter Paul Racine, a great man for imagining things, referred to a so-called disruption and possible rank breaking within the Social Credit Party of Canada. And to support his "story", he mentioned the contacts which Liberal members are reported to have had with the hon. member for Bellechasse in their efforts to have him join the Liberal party. This reporter also claimed that when he looked yesterday afternoon for the hon. member for Bellechasse, he finally found him in the lobby situated on the government's side.

Must one infer, from the presence of a man at a given time in the office of a bank president, that this man is there to negotiate the purchase of the bank? Does the fact that opposition party leaders meet each morning in the office of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), the Liberal Party leader, mean that the Liberal party is courting them? Are not hon. members, whatever their party affiliation, allowed to stroll about freely either on the right or on the left side of Your Honour's chair?

Mr. Speaker, it is true that during the House's sitting yesterday afternoon, I went to the lobby on the government's side to take part in the meeting of the Standing Committee on Agriculture, a meeting which the committee chairman had called and at which two Progressive Conservative members, one NDP and three Liberal members were also present, besides myself. Are we to infer that, because a New Democratic or a Conservative member is found with Liberals, he is being courted and that he will join them eventually?

Mr. Corbin: Who knows!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Racine, given his imagination, could have added the names of those persons, without rhyme or reason as he did in my case. Mr. Racine of the Radio-Canada news service got in touch with me immediately after this meeting. He asked me if I had been approached by the Liberals and invited to join them. I said no and I added that I happened to be in the lobby to attend a meeting of the agriculture sub-committee. Therefore, he knew why I was there and it is in bad faith that he gave the impression in his news bulletin that I had been approached by the Liberals. I find this way of informing the population repugnant and yet, newsmen are the first to demand honesty from politicians.

Perhaps we might expect the same degree of honesty from them. Why this sudden interest in me? After the Radio-Canada news last night, I realized that it was not by chance that the cameras were there at the entrance of the House and that Mr. Racine launched that rumour, because the reporter's statement was accompanied by a film which was intended to have viewers believe that there was some truth in that phony story. This is another proof that Radio-Canada does not always serve the Canadian people objectively. Yet it would have had plenty of opportunities to make headlines with the speeches I made in the House to denounce economic dictatorship, big finance, or in favour of pensions at age 60, in defence of small wage-earners, private enterprise, but it did not. Following this, the CRTC, which is making an inquiry into Radio-Canada, should add this incident to its agenda.

• (1510)

To conclude, I want to inform the House, through you, Mr. Speaker, that I was elected by the people of Bellechasse as a member of the Social Credit party and that I do not intend to renege my mandate. Indeed I have always believed that it was not the party—

Mr. Goyer: Until it becomes a federalist party.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): We cannot criticize newsmen for not respecting our privileges if you do not respect my privilege to express my point of view in the House itself. Anyway, I always thought that it is not the party that makes the man but the men who make the value of a party.

Mr. Béchard: Agreed, agreed!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I hope that Radio-Canada will have the courage to correct this failure to tell the truth, something which can deprive hon. members of their privileges. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin):

That considering the prejudice to my reputation as the hon. member for Bellechasse, this House request Radio-Canada to set the facts straight as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As always, the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Bellechasse involves a very important procedural matter and, if possible, I would rather delay my decision for a few hours perhaps. I shall make a decision tomorrow if possible, to deal with such an important matter.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I agree, Mr. Speaker.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the third report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. Because this committee and others, so far as I know, scrupulously present their reports in both official languages, I no longer intend to refer to that fact in presenting reports.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The order paper already indicates that Friday has been designated as an allotted day which has been assigned to the New Democratic Party. In order that hon. members might have all the notice possible as to what will be under discussion, I should like to indicate that the motion to be put down for Friday will be in the name of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) and it will deal with matters arising out of the Berger report. I should also like to indicate that it is our intention that this motion be put down under Standing Order 58(9)(a), which means that we would like a vote to be taken at the end of the debate.

In view of the fact that that is Friday afternoon and there are members who try to catch planes to get away for the week end, we are also proposing—and I have discussed this with each of the other House leaders—that on Friday we alter our hours of sitting slightly. Our proposal is that we sit through the noon hour from 1 p.m. to 2 p.m., and that we end the day one hour earlier than usual, in other words, that the debate come to an end at 3.45 p.m. instead of 4.45 p.m. We propose that the bells then ring for the 15 minutes set down in the Standing Orders and that the recorded vote, if it is called for, be taken at 4 p.m. I think you will find that this proposition is generally supported.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for giving us notice of the subject matter and particularly of his intention with respect to the taking of a vote on a Friday afternoon, which is unusual. I think his suggestion, which he was kind enough to discuss with me on behalf of the official opposition, is an eminently sensible one in view of the geography and airline schedules that afflict this country. It is certainly acceptable, and we are prepared to consent.

Mr. MacFarlane: That is acceptable, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: We agree, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the House is disposed to make an order to that effect today. It is suggested that on Friday, it being an allotted day under the control of the members of the NDP, the House will sit at the usual hour except that it will continue through the lunch adjournment and therefore the ordinary hour of adjournment will be considered to be four o'clock instead of five o'clock, and that for the purpose of taking a vote pursuant to Standing Order 58(9) (a) the hour at which the bells will commence to ring will be 3.45 p.m. on Friday afternoon and that the bells, as usual, be of 15 minutes duration, and that the vote be taken at 4 p.m. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

[Translation]

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I am sorry for that, but I was only trying to draw your attention before the question was put. I only want to say that this proposal may perhaps suit many members who come from cities not too far from Ottawa but it certainly does not suit hon. members who live in remote areas of this country.

[English]

However, I will not be a party pooper, Mr. Speaker, and I will go along with the motion, but I want that to be on the record.

Mr. Speaker: I think it should be explained that part of the discussions are discretionary and part are not. Those that are not discretionary relate to the fact that the motion is in the hands of one of the opposition parties on an allotted day, which must be agreed to, of course, by the government. That day has been allotted on a Friday and it is the right of the opposition to call a vote without any assistance. What is under discretion is the altering of the Standing Orders in order to take a vote earlier than usual. That was the only part that was put to the House for consideration at this time.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—REGIONAL OFFICES

Question No. 613—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

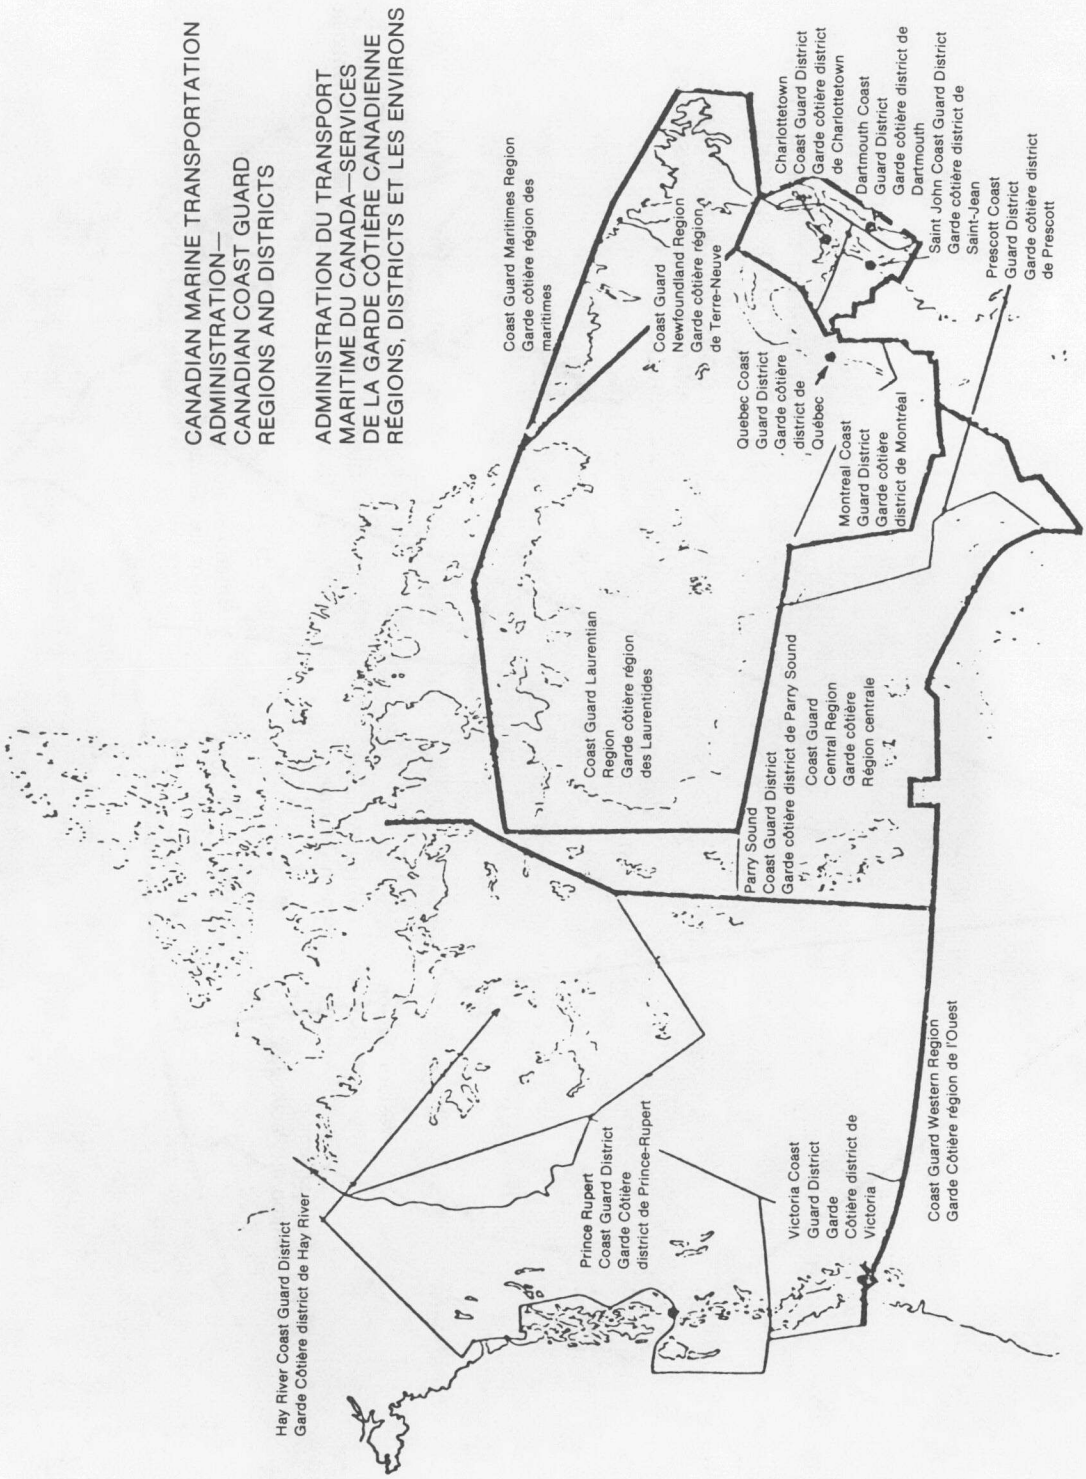
1. (a) How many regional offices are maintained by the Department of Transport (b) where is each located (c) for what area is each responsible?

2. On what date was each established and with how many personnel?

3. What is the present personnel strength of each office?

4. In addition to regional offices, are district or other sub-offices maintained and, if so (a) in what locations (b) how many?

5. Are the duties performed by those manning the regional and/or district offices line functions, in the chain of command from Ottawa to the operator in the field, or do they have other functions to perform and, if so, what are such functions?



Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1. (a) The Department of Transport presently maintains 11 regional offices. (b) The locations are as follows: (i) Canadian Air Transportation Administration (CATA): Moncton, New Brunswick; Montreal, Quebec; Toronto, Ontario; Winnipeg, Manitoba; Edmonton, Alberta; Vancouver, British Columbia. (ii) Canadian Marine Transportation Administration (CMTA): Dartmouth, Nova Scotia; St. John's, Newfoundland; Toronto, Ontario; Quebec City, Quebec; Vancouver, British Columbia. (c) See maps following.

2. CATA: Moncton, 1.6.48, 40 employees; Montreal, 2.11.36, 3 employees; Toronto, 2.11.36, 2 employees; Winnipeg, 2.11.36, 2 employees; Edmonton, 2.11.36, 2 employees; Vancouver, 2.11.36, 2 employees. ENVIRONMENT—EMPLOYEES HIRED FROM PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES

Question No. 1,544—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Has the Department of the Environment obtained (a) part-time (b) full-time employees from private employment agencies in (i) British Columbia (ii) Alberta (iii) Saskatchewan (iv) Manitoba (v) Ontario (vi) Quebec (vii) New Brunswick (viii) Nova Scotia (ix) Prince Edward Island (x) Newfoundland and, if so, in each case, how many?

2. Are such employees paid from supplementary estimates and, if not, from what estimates are they paid?

3. By province, what was the (a) average hourly rate paid to employment agencies (b) average hourly rate paid to employees (c) total amount paid by the Department in (i) 1975 (ii) 1976?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): In so far as the Department of Fisheries and the Environment is concerned:

SAINT JOHN RIVER—PARTICULATE DISCHARGE

Question No. 2,185—Mr. Fairweather:

What is the anticipated impact on the lower Saint John River Basin of the solid particulate discharge into the Saint John River at Union Point, Saint John, New Brunswick?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): It is expected that the impact of emissions at Union Point of atmospheric particulates on the Saint John River will be minimal. Approximately 99 per cent of the atmospheric particulate emissions are contained at source, resulting in a particulate discharge of about four tons per day. This emission rate is less than other major sources in the area and in our experience, is far less than the fugitive emissions of particulates from traffic and other human activities. The suspended solids emitted directly via the effluent are relatively inert chemically but can interfere with the transmission of light through the water. They also cause some interference with the gills of fish and can smother marine life on the bottom. However, a quantitative estimate of the effects of suspended solids in the effluent are not known at this time.

CANADA COUNCIL ADVERTISING IN "LE JOUR"

Question No. 2,229—Mr. Herbert:

What is the total cost of advertising placed by the Canada Council in the Montreal publication Le Jour?

Hon. John Roberts (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canada Council as follows: A total of $392 was paid by the Canada Council to advertise arts awards competitions in Le Jour: $182 for an ad published on September 6 and 13, 1975 and $210 for an ad published on February 21, 1977.

RECYCLING POLICY FOR TIN CANS

Question No. 2,309—Mr. Fortin:

Has the government a re-cycling policy for tin cans and (a) if so, what is it (b) if not, for what reason?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): The government advocates the recovery of all potentially useful resources from the municipal waste stream, including the tin and ferrous metal components of tin cans wherever a net benefit to society would occur. We would recommend this policy for provinces and municipalities; however, in some instances, a more desirable management option may be to prevent the generation of the waste in the first place. The relative merits of these alternate policies are presently under review by many of the appropriate authorities across Canada.

PENSIONS—COPY OF LETTER OF CONDOLENCE ON DEATH OF SPOUSE

Motion No. 75—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the letter of condolence the Department of National Health and Welfare sends to a woman, who has been in receipt of the Spouse's Allowance, following the death of her husband before she has reached age 65, including the portion of the said letter that tells her that her Spouse's Allowance is being discontinued.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1977

AMENDMENTS TO CRIMINAL CODE

On the order:

Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of Bill C-51, an Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Customs Tariff, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act and the Prisons and Reformatories Act—The Minister of Justice.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), by way of a point of order, seeks an order of the Chair that Bill C-51 be divided because it is an omnibus bill containing a number of amendments to the Criminal Code. It is the hon. member's contention that no member of parliament should be compelled to decide with one vote on one motion several questions which, even though not contradictory, are quite independent from one and another, except perhaps for their connection to the criminal law.

The hon. member makes two arguments, the first by analogy to the well-established rights of a member of parliament to force a division of a motion which contains distinct propositions. The second is that even if the practice in respect of motions has not previously extended itself into a practice in respect of bills, the reasoning is essentially the same, and therefore a member ought to enjoy the same right to force the division of bills.

The argument of the government is under three headings: first, that the Criminal Code is itself an omnibus piece of legislation for the obvious reason and advantage of attempting to collect the criminal law under one statute and is properly, therefore, amended by an omnibus bill; second, that the nature and impact of substantive motions is quite distinct from those motions relating only to the progress of a bill, so that both the practices and principles must remain separate and distinct. In that sense the several stages and the procedures and practices surrounding the several stages of a bill afford to hon. members ample opportunity to put forward the different views they may have in respect of the various clauses of the bill, whereas that does not exist in the case of a substantive motion which must be taken upon one decision.

Third, the government argues that the use of omnibus amending bills is a well-established practice in our House, notwithstanding the numerous attacks which have been made upon it in the past.

Indeed there is no shortage of precedents, for the same situation has arisen several times in the past, with all of the same arguments having been made, and obviously, judging by the rulings, carefully considered. I refer to two very thorough rulings by my distinguished predecessor, the Hon. Lucien Lamoureux, one on January 26, 1971, which is reported at page 283 of the Journals having to do with the government reorganization bill, and the second on January 23, 1969, which is found at page 616 of the Journals and which dealt again with an omnibus amending bill to the Criminal Code. Except for the wiretapping legislation which is, of course, a bill which has been passed since that time, all of the same statutes plus a few more were included in the amending bill.

All hon. members who took part in this discussion obviously studied these decisions very carefully and recognized the usual impeccable reasoning and precise expression of the Hon. Lucien Lamoureux. There is no need to repeat his language. His decision is crystal clear, and there can be no doubt that a motion containing two or more substantive provisions is quite distinct from a procedural motion or a motion which is generally described as having only the effect of dealing with the progress of a bill. The practice in respect of substantive motions has never been extended to those motions which relate to the progress of a bill. The use of the omnibus amending bill is well enshrined in our practices, and I really can find no reason to set aside my predecessor's very clear and sound reasoning, or the practice. Nor can I find any authority which would support an order of the Chair at this second reading stage that the bill be divided.

I should emphasize as well that the remedy sought by the hon. member is not to divide the bill according to the separate statutes to be amended but by subject matter. Were that to be attempted, it would place before the Chair, it seems to me, questions of interpretation and responsibility for the drafting of an extremely complex order, which in my opinion the Chair ought not to attempt.

I suppose there is no need to speculate on whether circumstances might arise in the future in which such a remedy might be available. However, I certainly am bound by the clear language of our precedent rulings and previous practices to reject the point of order of the hon. member for New Westminster, and I decline to make the order which he requests.

This still leaves, as it has in the past every time this kind of argument has been put forward, some very deep concern about whether our practices in respect of bills do in fact provide a remedy for the very legitimate complaint of the hon. member that a bill of this kind gives the government, under our practices, the right to demand one decision on a number of quite different, although related, subjects.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I think an hon. member of the House ought to have the right to compel the House to vote on each separate question. Previous rulings have made reference to several devices open to hon. members under our proceedings regarding bills, but it seems to me that each which has been mentioned in the past suffers from at least one weakness.

For example, it has been suggested that motions by way of an instruction to the committee, once the bill is in the standing committee, that the bill be divided, might be applicable. This is a practice which has been rather prevalent in the British House, but in our procedures it raises a very great number of serious and unanswered procedural questions, and in any case it has never really been successful. It has been suggested that hon. members have an opportunity to vote clause by clause in the committee and, of course, to persuade other hon. members to do the same, but even if that can be effective it still does not constitute an expression of the entire House.

It has been said that at the report stage hon. members can isolate clauses by tabling, with the appropriate notice, motions to amend, but even there it seems to me the point is not answered, as equally it is not answered by the suggestion that at third reading stage hon. members can put down motions to refer the bill back to the committee for reconsideration of certain clauses. I say that those two remedies do not answer the point fully because it may very well be that an hon. member might take the position that the law is fine the way it is and that he ought not to be put under the burden of contriving some kind of amendment or seeking further study when in fact he does not want further study. What he really wants to express is that the law is fine the way it is and that it ought to be left alone. It seems to me that he ought to be entitled to put that point at least at some stage in our proceedings, and furthermore, to require other people to come to a vote on that proposition.

Therefore, I think that in the past when attention has been directed to these remedies, not enough has been said about one device which does rest in the hands of hon. members, at least in my opinion, and that is a motion to delete pursuant to Standing Order 75(5). The reason this has not been developed fully in rulings in the past is that in the most recent rulings—the two I have cited, one in 1969 and the other in 1971, when the new procedures of the House were under discussion, and in the latter case when they were really rather fresh—I do not think the full impact of the motion to delete was recognized at that time.

Hon. members will recall that this subject of motions to delete pursuant to Standing Order 75(5) was very much before us when the House debated Bill C-84, the bill to abolish capital punishment of several offences. Opponents of the abolition of capital punishment sought to introduce in the House, at report stage, motions of two kinds. They sought to introduce motions to amend, which had the effect of reinstating the law by way of an amendment of one kind or another, and I ruled that those amendments, because they offended the basic principle of the bill, were out of order. However, there were also motions to delete the effective clauses pursuant to Standing Order 75(5). There could be no question but that those motions to delete equally offended the principle of the bill as those motions to amend, for in fact the effect of deletion would have been to have restored the law which was, in fact, to impose capital punishment for those offences, and it posed a great problem for the Chair.

I dealt differently with the motions to delete because I felt that we clearly were not subject to the same restrictions as those precedents relating to amendments only, because the motion to delete was enshrined in a specific Standing Order, and whether it had been the intention of the drafters of that Standing Order to hand this power to the private member was irrelevant to me. The fact was that it was in our Standing Orders, and it seemed to me that if there was doubt as to the extent to which the private member could take advantage of that Standing Order, that doubt ought to have been resolved—and in my opinion was resolved—in favour of the private member having the opportunity to use that motion to delete to bring the House to a vote in that situation.

I felt that there was some discrepancy between the two rulings, one having to do with amendments which contravened the principle, and the other having to do with motions to delete which might—and I stress might—have offended the principle of the bill, and in the course of that ruling I asked that the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization examine that discrepancy and attempt to resolve it for the House.

It also seems to me, however, that even if the greatest respect is paid to the principle and to the classic reasoning that we have applied in the past to amendments when we are dealing with motions to delete—in other words even if the greatest respect is paid to the principle that motions at the report stage are circumscribed in their procedural inability to offend the principle of the bill, it still seems to me that in most cases it is likely open, and certainly in this case it would likely be open to an hon. member who seeks to do what the hon. member for New Westminster and other hon. members have said they ought to be able to do, a point with which I have some sympathy, that is to say, that where a bill is presented—and certainly it is the right of the government to present such a bill—which contains amendments to several different areas of the law although all connected to the criminal law, a member ought to be able to use some procedure at some stage of the bill to cause the House to make separate decisions on those very subject matters.

Therefore, while I carefully guard the specific rulings on the contradiction between the principles of the bill and the motions that might be put forward until the actual stage arises, because we are speculating as to what the cases may be, it seems to me in advance that in a bill of this sort where several subject matters of the criminal law are sought to be amended in one statute, which is proper in our practice, a member ought to be able, if he wishes, to attempt through motions to delete under Standing Order 75(5) to isolate those sections which he feels ought not to be amended or that ought to be voted upon separately, without offending the principle of the bill. I think that would give the hon. member and other hon. members an opportunity that they should enjoy, to put their position on the record, which I think ought to be known, and also to require others in the House to vote in respect of that position.

This is again without prejudice to the specific arguments as they may arise, because I think hon. members will realize it might be foolish to speculate what the specific motions might be and what might be the arguments against them in terms of contravention of the principle of the bill. As a general proposition it seems to me that if we could accept it in a situation such as the capital punishment bill until it is further resolved, where the connection was the criminal law and where there were several sections or crimes for which abolition was sought and members were entitled to say, "I am in favour of abolition for some of those sections but not others; therefore when do I get my chance to require the House to side with me or against me?"—if that could be accepted as subject to further clarification by the standing committee on Procedure and Organization, surely it can be accepted in this situation where the hon. member seeks to say, "I may be in favour, for example, of amendments to wiretapping but not to gun control, or to gun control, but not to other offences and provisions with regard to dangerous offenders, for example, that are in the bill."

So, guarding it for the specific arguments that may arise, I wish to stress again that it seems to me the hon. member ought to have the opportunity he seeks through this point of order, which I have set aside, and that that opportunity ought to arise generally without offending the principle of the bill through the use of Standing Order 75(5).

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-51, to amend the Criminal Code, the Customs Tariff, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act and the Prisons and Reformatories Act be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the ruling that has just been made, as Your Honour knows I was unable to participate in the debate on the point of order on Monday night. I want to say that I appreciate the fact that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) raised the point of order on Monday so that it could be debated by the House and disposed of by Your Honour before the bill was called. I appreciate that it was done that way rather than raising his point of order today, as that would have thrown the business of the House into some confusion.

The theme of this bill is, of course, familiar to the House and was dealt with extensively in the last session. The theme is obviously the greater protection of the Canadian public through improved measures concerning the prevention of crime and the treatment of criminals. One of the essential features of criminal law in the system of administration of justice that we have in this country is that the Minister of Justice—as I pointed out in a speech on a similar bill last session—is responsible for seeking this protection and ensuring that the law provides such protection involving as it does the well-being, the safety, and ultimately the very lives of Canadians.

This theme has been debated extensively in the past—both in principle and in detail. Bill C-83 of the last session contained the same four elements—firearms control, electronic surveillance, dangerous offenders, and custody and release of inmates. Sixty-three different speakers were heard at second reading stage of that bill. The Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs studied it for some 9½ weeks, and received in total 38 briefs.

During that time, Mr. Speaker, those briefs instigated amendments made in committee, and the bill was then reported back to the House with a large number of these amendments. Furthermore, in the course of report stage, a number of letters and statements were sent to me, and these have been carefully considered by myself and members of the government. Indeed this new bill's whole existence is predicated on the contributions made during and following the debate on Bill C-83.

On this side of the House I would note the valuable work done in this regard—and it is always dangerous to name some—but I would refer to the valuable work done by the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne) and also those who had reservations about the bill and were helpful in making changes in it. In the latter regard, I note the contributions of my colleague from British Columbia, the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. Pearsall), the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont), the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale), and the hon. member for South Western Nova (Miss Campbell). This only represents a small number of those who were actively involved in the discussions and decisions made on Bill C-83 and the redrafting of the proposals such as are now contained in Bill C-51.

I should like to put on record as well recognition of the considerable work done in this regard by hon. members opposite, especially those who are members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs under the able chairmanship of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan). The spokesman for the official opposition at the committee was the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). I should also like to mention the hon. member for New Westminster and the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin). I repeat that it was the contributions of these hon. members along with those of many other members of the House and of the many and varied interest groups and provincial governments that led to the development of the bill now before the House. I hope that hon. members recognize the extent and the value of this effort.

The fact that this amount of work has been done in the House, in committee, and in the various caucuses of the House, combined with the pressing need for legislation of this type will, I trust, cause all hon. members to give these measures the quickest and most deliberate consideration. To that end, I will devote myself on this occasion to touching only briefly on some of the major provisions of the bill.

During the debate on Bill C-83 and the discussions which have transpired since then, the primary focus has been that of firearms control. The public contributions in this area have been particularly extensive, and I am thinking in particular of the work that has been done by concerned groups such as the Canadian Association for Sensible Arms Legislation, including as one of its members the Canadian Wildlife Federation; the Canadian Retailers' Association, and the city of Windsor, again to name but a few.

The major differences between Bill C-51 and its predecessor are found in the firearms sections, and I am confident the time has come to adopt these especially vital measures of protection for society. If some were able to claim when the predecessor bill was before the House that they were not consulted adequately, or their views were not taken into account in the preparation of that bill, let me say that is not the case with the bill now before the House. There has been extensive consideration of and consultation on all possible points of view on this bill.

It is clear to me that our laws in this country relating to firearms need to be changed. It is wrong, for example, that an escaped criminal from a penitentiary can go to the nearest sporting goods store and buy a gun, rifle or shotgun without questions being asked, as easily as he can walk into a drugstore and buy toothpaste. Something is wrong with the law when that is permitted and possible, and it is my responsibility to recommend to my colleagues and parliament the necessary changes in the law to alter that situation. I submit that it is parliament's responsibility to deal deliberately with that situation and with my recommendations.

In this country it is difficult to propose measures relating to firearms control. I say that because this country is diverse. The interests of those in the huge metropolitan areas of Montreal, Toronto, and Vancouver, have to be matched with the interests of the trapper in northern Saskatchewan, or of the Inuit in Tuktoyaktuk who depend on a rifle for their livelihood, or the interests of all those countless numbers of people across Canada who use rifles and shotguns for legitimate and responsible sporting purposes. Combining within one régime various provisions which will protect the public and take into account the diversity of our country is an immensely difficult job. As a result of the introduction of Bill C-83 and all the discussion which flowed from it we have been successful, in Bill C-51, in marrying the public objective with the need to protect the rights of certain people who, for responsible and legitimate purposes, use long guns in this country.

The objectives of the government's firearms control proposals remain unchanged. Simply, they are to prevent the potentially dangerous user from gaining access to guns to the extent feasible; to encourage responsible gun ownership and use; and to discourage the criminal use of firearms as much as possible. Bill C-51 addresses itself to meeting these objectives in a number of ways. It will do this, first, by screening new acquirers of firearms before they can obtain a weapon; second, by providing a mechanism for identifying existing gun owners who may be potentially dangerous and preventing them from possessing and using firearms; third by prohibiting certain particularly dangerous firearms which have no legitimate sporting purpose, and restricting others; fourth, by strengthening the registration provisions for restricted weapons—but obviously this in no way applies to long guns or shotguns; fifth, it will do it by strengthening and extending the permit provisions for businesses that deal in firearms and ammunition; sixth, by promoting the education and training of firearm owners; and seventh, by providing stiff penalties for criminals who use firearms.

The instruments for achieving these ends were developed with a view to utilizing existing schemes and mechanisms as much as possible in ensuring that they involved the least possible interference in the lives of responsible Canadians and provided the greatest effectiveness for the least cost. Thus we have moved away from the concept of universal screening of gun owners and zeroed in on those gun owners or would-be owners who might be dangerous to themselves or others if they have access to a firearm. These include persons who have histories of conviction for offences involving violence against anyone, those who have been convicted of firearms offences, those who have a history of violent behaviour or who have a record of treatment for mental disorders associated with violence. These provisions have been, to the best of our ability, spelled out in the most objective terms possible. Consequently there is an objective test governing who may or may not qualify for a firearms acquisition certificate.

Had we been able to use these screening criteria last year, and I do not want to spend much of my time dealing with incidents which have occurred—a number of tragic incidents would never have taken place, including the one involving Ernest Lamourandire, the Yonge Street sniper. He had a long history of convictions for crimes of violence, yet there was nothing in the law to stop him from walking into a Yonge Street gun store and buying the high powered rifle he used to wound five people and kill himself. That there exists no mechanism in the law which could prevent this is wrong.

For new acquirers of firearms we have developed a firearms acquisition certificate system. Anyone wishing to obtain a firearm would first have to apply for and be issued a firearms acquisition certificate application. The acquisition certificate application would be reviewed by a firearms officer, in most cases a police officer. This system has several important advantages. It permits the screening out of persons who should not have access to firearms. It provides an effective delay or cooling off period before a firearm can be acquired. It provides a tangible means by which firearm retailers can determine that a buyer is not under an order of prohibition. It offers a measure of control over the mail order sale of firearms. Also the need to obtain a firearm acquisition certificate should cause new acquirers, some of whom may be unbalanced, to reflect more carefully on the serious responsibility inherent in firearms ownership.

An added check is provided in the proposed acquisition certificate system in that not only must the new acquirer show the certificate when obtaining a firearm but the law requires the person transferring the firearm to see and record the certificate.

Concern has been expressed about the cost, which was to be charged under the previously proposed bill. I have been somewhat alarmed to note some of the statements which have been made about the matter of cost. Mr. Speaker, it is proposed that the cost of the acquisition certificate will largely be paid by the $10, five-year fee. I believe it is proper as the committee suggested last session, that people who wish to use firearms should bear a share of the cost of protecting Canadian society from the misuse of those guns, just as society itself pays for part of that protection. The remainder of the cost of the system will be covered by the federal government; therefore a contribution will be made not only by those obtaining acquisition certificates but by the public at large. This provision is in conformity with the view of the committee and was incorporated in the legislation.

The government recognizes that the ability of gun users to handle firearms safely and competently is of great importance. Competency training and testing have traditionally been an area of provincial responsibility and so provision has been made to allow each province to have the government require completion of a safety or competency course as a prerequisite for the issuance of an acquisition certificate in that province. I am of the same view as many wildlife groups who for many years have urged competency testing programs within their provinces. I look forward to working with them and encouraging the provinces to take advantage of that provision in the bill by which they could attach competency to the issuance of an acquisition certificate.

Furthermore, provision has been made in the legislation, and I direct hon. members attention to those clauses in particular, to allow the provinces to ask the federal government to declare that in their provinces hunting licences, competency certificates and other permits issued in connection with the use of firearms may substitute as federal firearms acquisition certificates under the conditions specified in the legislation. Much of the debate centred around the need for local administration and provincial administration. That is being provided in this section of the proposal, if provinces want to avail themselves of that facility.

The screening of existing gun owners will be achieved through a strengthening and broadening of the court's powers of prohibition. Thus, persons convicted of an indictable offence involving violence against a person and carrying a sentence of ten years or more, or using a firearm while committing an indictable offence, would be subject to a mandatory court order prohibiting them from using or possessing firearms for a minimum of five years.

Morever, the courts could impose prohibitions against persons convicted of other crimes of violence or offences against the firearms sections of the Criminal Code. Police may also ask the courts to issue orders of prohibition where they have information indicating that someone should not be in possession of a gun; for example, where someone consistently threatens a member of the family or a neighbour with violence. I emphasize that this is an additional screening measure affording a further measure of public protection. Now, in addition to the court or magistrate making a mandatory order of prohibition where a serious crime is involved, there will be a discretionary power in a court or magistrate to make a prohibition order with a power for police officers to aply to a court for this judicial order on proper information and belief that a certain person is a danger to himself or others, and his ability to have a gun should be restricted or prohibited.

In connection with potential domestic violence, a further preventative measure is offered through the proposal to strengthen seizure rights for police. Where police are called into a family quarrel, for example, and a gun is present, police would have the right to seize the weapon so that it does not become the tragic means of settling the dispute. Whether or not a gun is seized, the police course of action has to be justified forthwith by application to a court in order to prevent irresponsible seizure or harassment of innocent people by the police.

I submit that the two systems of an acquisition certificate for new acquirers of firearms and the provisions relating to court prohibitions and court order seizures go hand in hand. They provide an effective measure of public protection which we do not now have in the law and that we need, without at the same time unduly interfering with the rights of responsible citizens.

In all cases, a system of appeals is available to protect the rights of gun owners who have had action taken against them.

Some parts of these legislative proposals, particularly those relating to the business permit system, require the establishment of regulations in order to make them responsive and flexible.

I know there was a great debate on regulations the last time the subject was debated. Any student of Bill C-51 will notice that there is far less regulatory discretion in Bill C-51 than in Bill C-83.

On the question of dealers, it would result in an immensely rigid system to put all of the proposed regulations relating to dealers in the statute. However, these regulations have been discussed with those interested. They will be discussed with the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, as well as with police, gun owners, and representatives of the businesses affected by them.

We continue to believe that gun owners must be better informed about responsible firearms ownership. I have described the steps being taken in the acquisition certificate system to promote competency training and testing of gun owners by the provinces. We will encourage the fullest extension of such training and testing across Canada.

For people who do not store, handle, and use their weapons responsibly, penalties must be imposed. There are still far too many instances where children, for example, gain access to improperly stored weapons or ammunition causing tragedy for themselves or playmates. This cannot go on. Generally speaking, careful use of firearms is a matter of common sense.

Gun clubs and provinces make excellent material available advising people how to handle, transport, and store their weapons safely, and there is no excuse for people failing to do so.

As far as the use of guns by professional criminals goes, this legislation will make it as difficult as possible for them to gain access to firearms, and will provide penalties for committing crimes with guns which are so stiff that the crook feels it is too dangerous to do so.

I think one of the things the committee was looking for when we discussed this the last time, and I also agreed to, was somehow to write into the law a system of mandatory minimum sentences for the use of firearms in the commission of crimes which would be a signal to the criminal element that if they were going to commit crimes they had better not do it with a firearm. It was the unanimous feeling of the committee that that was the desirable and necessary approach to take. It is alarming to note that the incidence of firearms robbery rose 53 per cent between 1974 and 1975 while non-firearms robbery rose only 11 per cent. We must turn this trend back, and I believe that our new proposals can do so.

Hon. members will recall the discussion during the last year on the work of the Quebec crime inquiry. It was very much in the news. The recommendations made by that inquiry relative to the criminal use of firearms and what the law should be were carefully considered in the preparation of this legislation.

The firearms control provisions in Bill C-51 fill a critical gap in the protection that Canadians have a right to expect. They have a right to expect parliament and myself to deal with that. That gap must be filled now before yet more deaths and injuries point out in the most tragic manner possible the urgent need for improved control of firearms.

In a free society we have to take account of what the views of the Canadian people are, without at the same time using the strength of the majority to override the legitimate interests and needs of the minority.

The last public opinion poll taken on this subject in February, 1977, asked, "Would you favour or oppose a law which would require a person to obtain a police permit before he or she could buy a gun?" The responses were 85 per cent in favour, 12 per cent opposed, and 3 per cent with no opinion. I submit that the proposals relating to firearms contained in Bill C-51 are precisely in line with that question. The question refers to a police permit, the legislation to an acquisition certificate which would apply and be necessary for the new acquisition of a firearm. We have a responsibility to respond to the need and the desire of those 85 per cent who want that sort of system within the law of this land. We obviously have a responsibility to take into account the interest of the 12 per cent who oppose this system. Many of them are sportsmen, gun-users, trappers, and native people. In designing Bill C-51 and in the immense amount of consultation which has gone on, we have endeavoured, successfully I think, to take into account the proper interest of that 12 per cent. I hope this minority will recognize, as we proceed with the debate, that we have endeavoured to take their interest into account while protecting the majority of the Canadian people.

I wish to turn now to the provisions of the bill relating to electronic surveillance, an immensely difficult issue which concerns each one of us. As many hon. members will recall, the question was debated at great length in 1974 when the protection of privacy bill was under consideration, and again when Bill C-83 was before the House. The provisions in Bill C-51 in relation to electronic surveillance do not in any way derogate from the fundamental principles, approved by parliament, that the individual has a right to privacy in his lawful communications with others, and that private interception of communication is outlawed.

Just as the protection of privacy legislation was passed by parliament with no intention of frustrating the capacity of police authorities to uncover and prosecute crimes, the amendments in this bill are designed to ensure that the activities of the bosses of organized crime can be more effectively investigated than is possible at present. The amendments are essentially the same as the provisions passed by the House committee which reported on Bill C-83. There are two important changes and each of them further protects the fundamental right to privacy. I might add that in this speech I shall deal with those two changes only. In committee I shall obviously have to deal extensively with all the provisions relating to electronic surveillance.

The first change has to do with the 90-day notice provision. Your Honour will recall that the earlier bill allowed a waiving of the 90-day notice provision according to which, if surveillance had occurred, notice had to be given within 90 days. In committee last year the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) introduced an amendment to extend the 90-day notice to a period of five years if a judge so ordered. In other words, the giving of notice could be delayed for a period up to five years. This meant that while, as a general rule, the police had to give a notice to a person who had been the object of an interception within 90 days of wire tapping, in special cases a judge could order, upon the basis of a sworn affidavit, that the permitted period could be extended to five years.

This amendment, as I followed the committee proceedings, was generally supported. I quote, for example, the hon. member for Calgary North as reported in the official record of committee proceedings of June 16, 1976. The hon. member is reported as saying:

> Mr. Chairman, I am happy to see this change. I do not think any of us can take individual credit but I do know Mr. Leggatt took that position, as did Mr. Fairweather and Mr. Diefenbaker in our party, and myself, as well as Mr.

Lachance, the member for Lafontaine-Rosemont. He, too, is a big man in this field.

So I want to congratulate the minister—he is not here, but he will hear about it, I am sure—

As I obviously have.

—on being flexible, on making this change, and on making it realistic.

I am delighted that the hon. member for Calgary North has expressed support in that way.

We have suggested a further amendment by which the notice period would be limited not to five years but to three years. This is obviously an improvement over the provision which was contained in Bill C-83, approved by the committee and commended by the hon. member for Calgary North. What we are proposing in Bill C-51 is that a judge, upon special application and upon sworn evidence, may extend the delay in notification not to five years but to three years.

The second change in Bill C-51 is to ensure that the fundamental confidentiality of a client's conversation with his lawyer is protected. The amendment says that no authorization can be granted to intercept a client's conversation with his lawyer at the lawyer's office or at home unless, as the bill provides, there is evidence before a judge that the lawyer himself is involved in the commission of a crime. Hon. members may recall two instances which received a good deal of public attention involving electronic surveillance of lawyers' offices or telephones used by lawyers, one in Sault Ste. Marie and another in Perth.

Mr. Woolliams: There was one in Calgary in my own office.

Mr. Basford: In those instances the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) and I worked out guidelines, and the Solicitor General issued them as instructions to the RCMP.

It is essential that these amendments protecting solicitor-client conversations be passed. It is essential for the protection of the citizen. The bill must be looked at in that light. This is not something special for the lawyers. It is an essential protection for the citizen that he should be able to talk freely with his counsel knowing that no one will be listening or eavesdropping on the conversation. I commend these amendments concerning electronic surveillance to parliament, reminding Your Honour that they were approved by the committee in the last session, subject to two changes which tighten up proposals approved by the committee and which protect the citizens to an extent greater than was previously envisaged.

My colleague, the Solicitor General, will be speaking in this debate tomorrow and will have a good deal to say on other aspects of the bill. I shall touch on them only briefly. The proposed legislation in relation to dangerous offenders is virtually the same as that which was approved by the committee when considering Bill C-83. It will repeal the existing provisions of the Criminal Code dealing with habitual criminals and dangerous sexual offenders and enact new provisions which would enable the courts to impose an indeterminate sentence of imprisonment in the case of all dangerous offenders, including dangerous sexual offenders. The court may impose such a sentence if the offender has been found guilty of a sufficiently serious offence involving the use of violence or a serious sexual offence, if the court feels that there is a threat of continuing behaviour of this sort.

An application to the court to find a convicted offender to be a dangerous offender can only be brought with the consent of the attorney general of the province concerned. The National Parole Board will be required to review the case of a dangerous offender not later than three years after the sentence and every two years thereafter.

With regard to the last part of this bill, there has been in this country a great deal of interest in the custody and the release of inmates of penitentiaries. Because of the very extensive work now being carried on by the penitentiaries subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, much anxiety has been expressed. Most of these provisions, as I have indicated, will be dealt with tomorrow by my colleague, the Solicitor General, who will be speaking in detail on them. I touch on some of the highlights in order to remind the House, in terms of public protection which is the central purpose of criminal law, that one of the provisions provides that statutory remission in federal and provincial institutions would be abolished and replaced by an equivalent measure of earned remission.

When someone is in an institution, under the current law, they have a certain amount of their sentence remitted. Under the proposed amendment that would not be possible. As a result of the changes there would be a greater onus on inmates to earn time off their sentences through good behaviour in the penitentiary, and greater pressure to behave responsibly while in the penitentiary. Remission would be earned at the rate of one day for every two served, computed on a monthly basis. Earned remission could be forfeited and, once forfeited, could not be restored. Furthermore, the National Parole Board would be strengthened in a number of ways to ensure that we have an effective parole system.

The major new development in this portion of the bill is the revision that is planned in the Prisons and Reformatories Act which was not contained in Bill C-83. Again, the Solicitor General will deal with those extensively tomorrow. I draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that these provisions have involved considerable consultation with the relevant provincial authorities. These provisions will no doubt be dealt with in detail in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

I would return to what I said at the beginning of my remarks, namely, that the vital measures in this bill represent the culmination of considerable effort by many parties. I am referring to parties on this side of the House, parties on the other side of the House, and those outside of parliament. The time has now come to bring these long labours to fruition by prompt and deliberate consideration of this measure.

The process of law reform, especially in the criminal area, is a step by step one. Further work in all these areas will no doubt occur over the next few years. It is critical, however, that this process not be sidetracked because no society can afford to have its criminal law out of step with, and hence unresponsive to, the emerging problems which have to be faced.

As I said, as Minister of Justice I have a clear responsibility for submitting to parliament measures which are designed to protect society under the laws. The measure now before this House advances that protection in terms that are consistent with basic Canadian principles of individual freedom. To my mind Bill C-51 is a worthy example of the application of both of these concepts. I believe, as a result of all the discussions, all of the debates, and all of the resolutions that have been moved in this parliament on this subject, that after debate on second reading, and consideration by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, the time has come not to talk about firearms control but to pass laws relating to firearms control.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, before I commence my remarks on Bill C-51, I wonder if I might ask the minister one question in reference to the firearms section. Do I take it from reading the bill that the present owners of long guns aside from shotguns, do not have to have a certificate or documentation? I am referring to farmers, ranchers and hunters. There may be ten million or six million owners of those kinds of guns. I have seen two figures. Regardless of how many there are, they would not have to have any certificate or licence in reference to those guns?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has a perfect understanding of that section. His question represents what the proposals are. As far as existing gun owners are concerned, they will not require an acquisition certificate or a licence, which is the word the hon. member used, under these provisions. They will require an acquisition certificate should they decide to buy or acquire an additional firearm. Unless and until they go to acquire an additional firearm, they will not need an acquisition certificate.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer.

I want to join with the minister in his introductory remarks with regard to the work of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. In the years I have been in the House of Commons, I have sat on most committees. I must say I have always enjoyed my associations with the members of the Liberal party, the government, the members of the New Democratic party, and the members of the Social Credit party and have respected their abilities in committee to be non-partisan and to work together to improve legislation and other matters which come before us.

Often we lawyers are criticized by people who say there are too many of us in politics. I am sure the lawyers who are present today have also heard that remark. Some credit can be given to that profession because we are used to going into courtrooms and taking a certain position for our clients—of course I am prejudiced—but the lawyer on the other side may take another position, and naturally does. It is one commodity which you are selling. Fifty per cent of the time you are always wrong if you are litigating. Thus, you learn to lose, and you love to win. That is part of the confrontation in the dialogue, in the debate which takes place in the House of Commons and also in committee.

I join with the minister in saying that the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), is a very learned scholar in law, a very able chairman and, above all, is a very courteous chairman to people on all sides of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I think I have been very truthful.

Before leaving my introduction, I must say that working with the minister has been a great pleasure as far as I am concerned. If I am going to take a certain position, the minister generally knows I will be taking that position, or vice-versa. In that way we are able to come to grips with the subjects which are before parliament in a manner that is concise, precise, and we are able to take apart that portion we are going to criticize and agree on that portion on which we are going to agree.

Mr. Oberle: That is enough of that. Get on with it.

Mr. Woolliams: Sometimes you get heckled by your own party, but I am used to that.

An hon. Member: Start shooting.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Now, let us hear from Eldon Woolliams.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, once again we are faced with the deliberate effort to join five distinct, separate parcels of legislation into one omnibus bill. Some of them are new; some of them are merely amendments to the existing Criminal Code.

What bothered me all during the debate on Bill C-83 last session was that we did not get full reporting by the media; the only thing we heard about from the media was the firearms session, which was only one fifth of the bill at that time.

This bill is similar in nature, Mr. Speaker. It deals first, with firearms control, commonly called gun control; secondly, it deals with electronic surveillance, or in other words wiretapping or bugging; thirdly, it deals with dangerous offenders' legislation, formerly known as habitual offenders or habitual criminals; fourthly, it deals with custody and release of inmates under the Parole Act and the Penitentiary Act; and fifthly, the bill revises the Prisons and Reformatories Act. In other words, we really have five pieces of legislation here. It joins together these five parcels of legislation and, in my opinion, this is irresponsible, with great respect, as well as devious and reprehensible. It is done deliberately and purposefully, and, to say the least, is in the incompatible form of marginal, unrelated amendments which are designed to frustrate parliament, and which always result in delay and holds up the process of parliament.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I will be moving an amendment to the motion for second reading, and the amendment will be to the effect that the bill be not read a second time but sent to the justice and legal affairs committee for study. I found that necessary when we dealt last year with Bill C-83, and although there was some question as to the right to move such an amendment at second reading stage, the Chair upheld that particular amendment. It will therefore not be necessary for me at any stage, I hope, to spend time presenting arguments in view of that precedent.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the Chair directed that, if I were to leave out one phrase, the amendment which I moved to Bill C-83 was in order. Naturally having run the risk once and succeeded, I have followed the exact words of the amendment which was approved by the Chair then, and therefore the Chair will have no difficulty finding my amendment in order.

The purpose of this study will be to have the bill appropriately severed and to show ministers that they cannot in this parliament, as they did in the last parliament with Bill C-83, run roughshod over this institution, its processes and its procedures. Our party fought a long, tiresome and tedious fight not only to have the bill severed, with the support of members of other parties in the opposition, but to have changes made to the gun control legislation. We moved many amendments to Bill C-83; I think at one stage we had 34 amendments lined up. As a result, we can at least say there has been much improvement. In that regard I agree with the minister, and I will have something to say about that a little later this afternoon.

I wish now to zero in on what I consider the most damaging effect of part of this legislation, and in presenting this argument the House will see the reasons why the bill should be severed. This bill, under the heading of "electronic surveillance", makes very substantial amendments to that part of the Code entitled "Invasion of Privacy", known as "Interception of Communications".

Pausing there, Mr. Speaker, it is true that this matter was before the committee on several occasions. Once in 1972 or thereabouts the matter was sent to committee by reference. At that time Mr. Turner was minister of justice, and the only authorization that he wanted to wiretap or to bug was to have the Solicitor General and the Attorney General of Canada merely sign a slip of paper. I took great exception to that and said we should never allow bugging to be authorized without a judge's order. So Mr. Turner repented after speaking to members of the Canadian Bar, who did not like it either.

Mr. Paproski: Then he resigned.

Mr. Woolliams: It was a little later when he resigned and went home. Then the matter came before the committee after what we call the short parliament, and as a result of the efforts of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) and the then hon. member for St. Paul's, Mr. Ron Atkey, and with co-operation from the other parties, amendments were made to protect the citizen against erosion of freedom, and for this I think we can take credit.

The minister quoted me, Mr. Speaker, but he quoted me somewhat out of context. I was dealing with the fact that I was at least happy to have part of the act amended. The minister wanted to abolish notice altogether but I did not want it changed. Since then, I might say, I have learned a lot. I suppose a lawyer is always a student. When you share an office with your partner, as I do, and you have communications between solicitor and client being listened to and the Crown admitting those communications as evidence, then you have to take a hard look at the precedents—stare decisis, as the minister knows—to see how the court is interpreting this legislation and, above all, how the police are using it. Therefore when the minister quoted my affection for his amendment, it was affection for half an apple, because half an apple when you are hungry is better than no apple at all.

Trial lawyers, professors of various law schools, and learned newspaper writers on the subject—and I particularly want to congratulate the Globe and Mail—are well aware of the abuse that the law authorities have been guilty of in the application of the law as it now stands. Therefore when we give law authorities more power, we are assuring the erosion of the freedom and liberty of the subject as to his or her privacy, and are creating a new era of further invasion of privacy, and assuring a greater authoritarian state. That I will oppose.

What are the amendments in question which I challenge, Mr. Speaker? First of all, the granting of an authorization will be extended from 30 days to 60 days, doubling the time for invasion of privacy. That is a 100 per cent gain. Second, the minister wants to abolish absolutely the necessity to give the person who is the object of wiretapping a notice within 90 days that he has been subject to electronic surveillance of some kind—having his phone tapped, his place of residence or office bugged, or his means of transportation.

In regard to written notification to be given, there is an exception under Martin's Criminal Code, 1976, page 118, section 178.23(1), which provides:

> The Attorney General of the province in which the application was made or the Solicitor General of Canada, as the case may be, shall notify in writing within 90 days next following the period for which the authorization was given . . .

Now the period is to be extended to three years, or it could be up to three years. What is going to happen, Mr. Speaker? We were fooled in Bill C-83. The minister was so eloquent when he said that that was one of the greatest pieces of legislation ever to be brought down, but I do not want any member to be fooled today. The minister used much affection and eloquence in telling us today what a great bill we have before us, but what change has been made? Notice can be given up to three years, or within a shorter time. I can say from my experience that when the police draw up the usual order it will always contain the three year clause whenever a lawyer's office is to be bugged. They will then listen in to communications between a lawyer and his client, and a case will be before the courts long before the lawyer knows that his office is being bugged.

We are not only worried about bugging, Mr. Speaker; we are worried about derivative evidence. By that I mean evidence gathered as a result of listening in either through illegal bugging or legal bugging of which you are unaware. That is where the infringement of the freedom of the subject comes in.

● (1630)

In effect, this amendment means that if the authorities have up to three years to notify the person who has been the object of electronic surveillance, they have in fact abolished the notice altogether, as all orders will likely read that the rights shall exist for three years and no notice will be forthcoming until the last day of the third year, and by that time perhaps the people involved might have passed on to another land.

To make matters worse the courts have ruled under the old act—and this is what concerns me—that the failure to give notice did not make the evidence inadmissible at a trial against a person whose rights are being challenged by the all-powerful state. I want to emphasize that. The courts have ruled—and I will read some cases now—that the fact that they did not give a person notice of electronic surveillance did not make the evidence inadmissible. I attended a seminar of the Canadian Bar Association at which there was a lawyer who gave an excellent academic paper on the subject.

Clause 9(1) of the bill dealing with section 178.13 at pages 47 and 48 and subclause (1.1) are of some help, but even if there is an illegal wiretap against a solicitor in communication with his clients, the judge can still rule that evidence as admissible, for clause 10(2) states that the evidence will be made admissible, with or without authorization notice, if a judge is of the opinion that the communication is relevant to a matter at issue in the proceedings, or there has been merely a defect in form. I might digress and say to the Hansard reporters that they have in their hands a copy of what I am saying at the present time, except for the few phrases or sentences that I may add. The judges should not have this discretion, in my opinion, and it has been my experience as a trial lawyer, particularly today, that the judges generally rule and exercise their discretion in favour of the Crown.

Hon. members must remember that the Crown has the money, the Crown can buy the brains. The little citizen who is charged by the Crown can only get what he can afford. For example, in serious murder trials where the plea is insanity and you have to get a psychiatrist, at $5,000 a day the little man cannot afford a psychiatrist.

Now I come to the next part which I do not like with reference to bugging. I refer to the admissibility of derivative evidence. Under the new amendments to section 178.16 of the code, any evidence obtained, either directly or indirectly, as the result of an intercept, regardless of whether the private communication is inadmissible, becomes admissible. In addition, a judge or magistrate may receive in evidence an illegal private communication, if he deems it to be relevant to a matter at issue in the proceedings.

In this particular revision the government has clearly separated from current American trends and appears to have opted for the English tradition of admitting everything and anything that is relevant to an issue. I was told that at the last trial I had in January. There is some difference even from the English tradition. This obstacle having been removed, the Canadian courts will have much greater liberty in this area, and the time consuming deliberations on admissibility noted in certain recent cases will be eliminated.

There are many cases in which it has been held that not only was the evidence admissible but all derivative evidence from wiretaps was ruled admissible. For example, a lawyer might be talking to his client and his client tells him he is charged with a drug offence.

I raised a question today about four boys living together, one of whom had drugs in his suitcase under his bed. He likes a little drag of marijuana before he goes to sleep but, because they are all living together, they are all charged together. The three who may be innocent may call their lawyer and say to him, "We knew the marijuana was under the bed or in the overshoe." Thus the derivative evidence goes in. That becomes pretty difficult for the defence, and pretty difficult to defend the liberty of the subject. It will take more than the eloquence of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) to prove to me and to my friends of the Canadian Bar Association that this is good law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: No appeal has yet succeeded in reaching the Supreme Court of Canada. The case of Johnnie Dale McDonald (alias John Adam Dante, John D. McDonald) versus the Queen, an appeal from the British Columbia Court of Appeal, embraced secondary issues concerning the extent to which the Crown may invade solicitor-client privilege, but the court refused leave to appeal on June 29, 1976. Had the appeal succeeded, one question of major interest in regard to wiretapping, that is, privilege under section 178.16(5), might have been resolved.

By an important determination at the provincial appeal level in the Queen versus Violet Rose Douglas the Ontario court of appeal has held that authorizations to intercept at a specific address, naming a specific party, do not cover interceptions of unknown persons at such address, and that transcripts of intercepts must be "word for word" or they are inadmissible. The particular application of this decision was to sections 178.12 and 178.16 of the code. That has been of some help.

In a Saskatchewan case heard early in 1977, the Queen versus Patricia Dawn Trickett, of January 13, 1977, the Saskatchewan district court, Maher, D. C. J.—by the way, may I pause for a moment to say that I graduated with him, so naturally I was quite interested in his decision—it was determined that even though the accused was not named in the wiretap authorization, the intercepted conversation was, in part, with a named person and concerned an offence for which the authorization was granted. In other words, what Jack Maher ruled in that decision in Saskatoon was a little different from the ruling of the Ontario court of appeal. He has ruled that even though one does not have authorization to listen into the conversation of B, if you only had it for A, you could hook B into the evidence as well. It is unclear how this decision fulfilled the requirements of sections 178.12(e) and 178.13(2)(c) of the code.

One month before the Douglas case noted above, the Ontario court of appeal came to some important conclusions in another case, that of the Queen versus Albert Welsh and Anthony Ianuzzi, of February 10, 1977. Here what were mainly at issue were considerations of conditions precedent in relation to section 178.23(1) of the Code, the so-called notice clause requiring notification of the person who has been under electronic surveillance that he has been the subject of wiretapping. As I said, the code requires notice of 90 days. They ruled in this case, and now we are to have the three year clause, that this did not stop the admissibility of the evidence. I only mention these cases because of what my good friend, the Minister of Justice, had to say with reference to my words, and his having half an apple.

Then there is another case, the Queen versus Wai Ting Li, dated July 28, 1976, British Columbia county court, Spencer, county court judge. It was a case where charges of trafficking had been laid under the Narcotic Control Act.

Mr. Basford: I went to school with him.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, the minister taught him some funny things, judging by these facts. However, this judge was one of the top football players at the school. At a voir dire issues were raised whether wiretap evidence was admissible, in view of the problems of authenticating the recordings, and whether the requirements of section 178.16 as regards admissibility had been met. It was determined that derivative evidence was admissible under that section, a decision resting upon judicial discretion. In other words, the judge had the discretion. In other words, the evidence which is gathered as a result of listening in on an illegal bug becomes evidence against people. I dealt with a situation where three could have been innocent and one guilty, but that all goes into a package. I am not going to read the judgment. I have it here, but I hope I have described it in a succinct fashion.

There was another case, the Queen versus Ju Kong Cheng et al, December 13, 1976. I do not know whether that is a relative of the Minister of Justice or not. It was a British Columbia county court case, and the judge was Judge Wetmore.

It was held that the notice clause was not a condition precedent to admissibility of evidence and that interceptions are lawful for the duration of authorization under the unknown persons clause so long as the person is unknown when the authorization is obtained. That differs from the Hamilton case where they listened in and found that one of the police officers was involved in hanky-panky.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Without the oral evidence of the peace officer who swore the required affidavit to obtain a wiretapping authorization, the determination of the authenticity of the authorization at a voir dire is thrown upon section 30 of the Canada Evidence Act which requires seven days' notice by the party producing the affidavit to the other parties. It was held that that did not keep the evidence out. I could go on and on, but I shall not. I just emphasize these cases to show that whether it is the Minister of Justice or an official in his department—and I respect his officials—when we draft law, and parliament is considering it, it is subject to interpretation by judges. It is not what we say today in this debate that counts; it is what the judges interpret the words of the statute to mean. That is what often happens, and we often have to amend statutes because appeal courts find weaknesses in laws we pass which are not corrected in the Red Chamber.

In summary, there are five significant changes to the privacy sections of the Criminal Code in the criminal law amendments bill tabled in the House of Commons on April 20, 1977.

First, authorizations to intercept will not be permissible at a lawyer's office or other place where he communicates with clients unless the lawyer, a member of his family, or a member of his office is suspected of being involved in an offence. However, there again I say that under the clause and in view of the cases I have read, that would become a question of discretion for the courts.

Second, authorizations may be granted by a court in relation to any offence punishable by five or more years in prison, including bookmaking, smuggling, and offences related to organized crime.

The authorization period would be extended from 30 to 60 days.

Transcripts of unauthorized intercepts may not be admissible as evidence, but evidence derived from such transcripts would be admissible.

The notice clause will be extended from 90 days to any period not exceeding three years.

Our party has fought a hard fight in reference to human rights, and as the Globe and Mail said on May 2, 1977:

> A year ago Mr. Basford wanted to eliminate the need for notification altogether. A howl of outrage went up and last June Mr. Basford recanted by suggesting that the period for notification be up to five years from the end of the wiretap. Now he suggests that it be up to three years.
> Nonsense. Ninety days is adequate. Perhaps more than anything else it forces police to use wiretapping in only the most extreme cases and that, after all, is what the law should be aimed at doing.

I mention these facts because of what is developing in various provinces. A man is charged with murder, and there is some question about his emotional stability, whether he is sane or not. Before he has a lawyer he is wheeled into a mental hospital and interviewed by the Crown psychiatrist in order to help the poor fellow out, to find out if he is sane or insane. He is asked if he is under medical care, and he is given drugs. In one case a fellow was given 26 ounces of whiskey to see how he reacted when he was drunk. This came out in cross-examination at the last murder trial with which I was involved. Then after all that the man was found sane. It was said that after his 26 ounces of whiskey he did not react too badly. It took only three people to hold him down on the floor, but that was not outrageous. This is a fact. This fellow was sent to jail, and then he got a lawyer. However, that was too late. By that time the psychiatrist was not a person in authority. The question of admissibility of evidence did not apply to him, and anything the accused said, whether he was drunk when he said it, or under drugs or under the belief that he needed to tell somebody his problems and get them off his chest, it became evidence.

Worse than that, the defence was ordered to get its own psychiatrist. A Crown witness listened in, wrote a letter to the Crown, and the psychiatrist for the Crown admitted that he based his opinion on whether the man was sane or not on all correspondence. The statement was admitted. With this kind of law the police get more powerful every day. We are living in a different kind of world today. I am not criticizing the police, but the minister says crime is increasing so we have to get tougher and tougher. On the other hand, every once and a while some innocent person gets caught in the web and all this is used against him.

I dealt with a case today in which a fellow was charged with a marijuana offence. His case was thrown out by a magistrate. Then the Crown rushed to a judge to get an order for indictment. The judge asked where the accused was, and the Crown's lawyer said, "I do not want him here because he will interfere with my case". The lawyer for the Crown went to his office and got the minister or his agent—I do not know whether the minister did it personally—to lay a preferred indictment. I did not know we had a double jeopardy clause at work in this country. That is an abdominable process and a bad procedure.

When Mr. Turner first introduced this legislation some years ago, speaking to the Canadian Bar Association he said he thought it was enough just to have the minister sign a wiretapping authorization. Well, we got that changed. The first bill died on the order paper when the 1972 election was called by the government, and when the bill was presented to the short parliament by the minority government, my two good friends, Mr. Ron Atkey, and the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, carried on the fight and managed to get the privacy section amended as it now reads. Now we see the government once again coming forward to amend a good law for which the opposition so ably and intelligently fought. With all its weaknesses it is better than the government is doing now. I do not think all these things should be wrapped up in one bill. I honestly do not know how I am going to vote, but I cannot at this stage or in committee endorse these changes.

This bill should be severed so that this question can be decided by a vote of the House on second reading, so that we are not asked to vote against some legislation we approve of and some of which we emphatically disapprove. I say here that where a statute gives the authority to invade in any way the privacy of an individual and its provisions are not carried out properly, such evidence should be declared inadmissible, not to help the crook but to make sure that the all-powerful state does not erode the freedom and liberty of the little person who must battle for his freedom and liberty against all the odds in favour of the state, armed with money and brains.

To substantiate my argument may I quote from a few authorities to assist the House to see that we are not making a mountain out of a molehill.

Let us consider the approach of Mr. Justice Judson. In giving one of the majority judgments in the Wray case he wrote:

> In my opinion, there is no justification for recognizing the existence of this discretion in these circumstances. This type of evidence has been admissible for almost 200 years. There is no judicial discretion permitting the exclusion of relevant evidence, in this case, highly relevant evidence, on the ground of unfairness to the accused.

He held that if this law is to be changed it must be changed by parliament. We are writing in that some magistrates and judges have that discretion, yet here is a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada saying, "The evidence is there; I cannot do anything about it. I am going to have to put it in."

Mr. Basford: That is not what he says at all.

Mr. Woolliams: I just quoted right from the book. If the minister wants to change the law books, that is fine with me.

Let me contrast that statement with the words of Mr. Justice Brandeis, one of the most fair minded judges who has ever graced the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States. In his famous dissent in the case of Olmstead versus the United States he said:

> Decency, security and liberty alike demand that government officials shall be subjected to the same rules of conduct that are commands to the citizen. In a government of laws, existence of the government will be imperiled if it fails to observe the law scrupulously. Our government is the potent, the omnipresent teacher. For good or ill, it teaches the whole people by its example. Crime is contagious. If the government becomes a lawbreaker, it breeds contempt for law; it invites every man to become a law unto himself, it invites anarchy. To declare that in the administration of the criminal law, the end justifies the means—to declare that the government may commit crimes in order to secure the conviction of a private criminal—would bring terrible retribution. Against that pernicious doctrine this Court should resolutely set its face.

In other words, I do not think evidence illegally obtained should be admitted, because if you allow the police to break the law they will do so.

I do not mean to suggest by referring to an American decision that I am advocating the strict exclusionary doctrine that has developed in that country. In the United States, generally speaking, evidence is not admissible in a court of law that is illegally obtained. The application of this strict rule has led to scandalous abuse. There must be a balance, and I should like to see that balance in our jurisprudence.

Nevertheless, there is a large constituency in and out of our profession which adheres to the belief that the Ontario court of appeal in the Wray case was right—that Privy Council decisions touching the same concerns were right—that Their Lordships Cartwright, Spence and Hall, dissenting in Wray, were right, and that the court must consider factors other than just relevancy. I quote Mr. Justice Spence, in his dissenting judgment, who said:

I am most strongly of the opinion that it is the duty of every judge to guard against bringing the administration of justice into disrepute. That is a duty which lies upon him constantly and that is a duty which he must always keep firmly in mind. The proper discharge of this duty is one which, in the present day of almost riotous disregard for the administration of justice, is of paramount importance to the continued life of the state.

Unfortunately, few Canadians are aware of the serious ramifications flowing from the Supreme Court decision in the Wray case.

That prospect is frightening enough, but perhaps the most disheartening aspect of the Wray case is that the court's decision has the unintended effect of giving judicial permission to participation by the state in the illegal conduct of policemen. The rule in Wray denies any value other than the search for truth. But I quote Viscount Knight Bruce, who said:

. . . truth, like all the good things, may be loved unwisely, may be pursued too keenly—may cost too much.

But since the Wray case was decided in 1970, neither parliament nor the courts have taken any action to reverse the dangerous precedent that was set, despite the sensible guidelines regarding judicial discretion which have been issued by the Law Reform Commission of Canada.

Indeed, not only has Wray remained as the law of the land, but since 1970 the Supreme Court's ruling has obviously assumed the proportions of a huge umbrella under the shelter of which many of Canada's prosecutors feel impelled to tender as evidence some very questionable items, and the courts are required to condone practices that prior to the Wray case would have been totally unacceptable.

I want to refer now to what has been going on, Mr. Speaker. According to the annual report of the Governor General as it pertains to wiretapping, for the period of 1976-77, 548 authorizations were given under Section 423 of the Criminal Code; 21 authorizations under Section 192 of the Customs Act; 529 authorizations under the Narcotic Control Act; 106 under the Food and Drugs Act; 11 under Section 163 of the Excise Act, and one under 158 of the Excise Act.

Perhaps the most interesting statistic in the report shows that 1,062 persons were arrested whose identity became known to a peace officer as a result of an interception under an authorization. The number of criminal proceedings commenced at the instance of the Attorney General of Canada in which private communications obtained by interception under an authorization were adduced in evidence and the number of such proceedings that resulted in a conviction was 13. That is, criminal proceedings, 13; convictions 13.

I do not know what to think about this, Mr. Speaker. We see that when we give the police too much authority it results in 1,062 arrests.

Now I will turn to something that the minister spent most of his time on, gun control. Many of the amendments we suggested to the House in debate proved true and have been incorporated in the bill. I am thankful for that. It is like a prayer, Mr. Speaker—I am thankful for what I am about to receive. I am happy to say that we have helped bury Bill C-83. The function of the opposition was fulfilled in this case—with excellence.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Take, for example, the clumsy definition of ammunition and the denial of the rights of those who earn their living as trappers and hunters. The rights of the ranchers and farmers were infringed upon but all these things have been corrected somewhat. I could go on ad infinitum, Mr. Speaker. I, personally, and our party caucus prepared more than 30 amendments. Many were accepted, yet on second reading of that bill in the House we were told it was a beautiful piece of work. When it got to committee, however, it was stripped naked. The bill before us is brand new and streamlined, and amendments can also be made to it in committee.

I do not really believe that even this bill will do what all of us want, that is, take firearms out of the hands of criminals. I do not know whether there are six million or 11 million shotguns and rifles in the hands of Canadians now, but whatever the figure is, this bill does not affect them. I can sell my gun or give it to a member of the NDP—

An hon. Member: I do not want it.

Mr. Woolliams: —or even to the minister. How can the transfers be traced? What we have now is really a law for newcomers and a law for oldtimers. That may be better than nothing. I think the minister was being fair in trying to prevent people who have a shotgun and decide they do not like the lady they are living with from rushing down to the hardware store for ammunition to settle things or going out and committing other crimes—I know that is the purpose of this bill. I would be the first to say that that is a good object, but it does not really correct the situation. I do not know how many guns there are. One article I read said 11 million and another, more conservative, said six million. No matter how many guns there are, they will move around society.

I wish to discuss the regulations now, Mr. Speaker. The minister said that he has cut down on regulations. That reminds me of the man who in 1975 raped six women but in 1976 only raped three, so he contended he was better. I am not going to go into them all, but they claim to regulate the handling, storing, advertising, the kind of ammunition, mail order supply, fees, applications for permits, traffic in firearms deemed to be curios—the list goes on and on.

In 1976, 3,326 orders in council were passed, of which 653 were published in the Gazette—that is not the Montreal Gazette but the Canada Gazette. This means that Canadians did not know about 2,673 orders. A former Prime Minister said one should know the law, and as the minister well knows, ignorance of the law is no defence. But how can one know of laws if they are not published, or not promulgated? What is the use of proclaiming the law in the middle of the night, as it were, when you are asleep? Mr. Speaker, as the minister knows, the committee considering Bill C-83 won a battle.

Liberal members of the committee and the chairman agreed that rules and regulations proposed under Bill C-83 should be brought before the House of Commons and subjected to scrutiny. Mr. Speaker, that is the only way to legislate criminal law. In passing such laws, we must be concise and precise. I congratulate the chairman for his position, and I think he agrees with mine.

Mr. Gilbert: He is present in the House.

Mr. Woolliams: The duties of the commissioner are substantial. He will be busy indeed, being responsible for the issuing of permits, dealing with prohibited and restricted weapons and issuing certificates to people who want to buy guns. I do not know how large his staff will be, what the cost will be, or what fees will be charged. Mr. Speaker, one should not enact such provisions by order in council. The criminal law must be precise and concise, as the chairman of the committee said when we studied Bill C-83. Other members of my party will speak on other aspects of the bill, and possibly cover some of the ground I covered in my remarks.

I now deal with the clause which I think it is good to include in the bill and which I hope will do the necessary job. I am speaking of the clause relating to dangerous offenders. In March this year I addressed a question to the Minister of Justice concerning an inmate of an institution who had been released on mandatory parole by right of law. That person had, on several occasions, been charged with raping children aged six and seven. He applied to be released on parole. The Saskatoon parole division was not empowered by law to refuse that parole. The chairman of the Saskatoon parole division wrote a letter to the Calgary parole division about this man who had raped children. This man has lived a life of crime, involving rape and indecent assault, and it was feared that he was capable of killing his next victim. Unfortunately, this man was released in society. He left Saskatoon and came to Calgary, where he was an unwelcome guest.

I have put before the House our position on this bill and have said where we stand on the question of electronic surveillance, or bugging. As I tried to explain carefully, and I argued by referring to case law and precedents, judicial interpretation of electronic surveillance provisions has placed too much power in the hands of those in authority. I tried to show how such power can be abused, to the detriment of the citizens of Canada. We must examine this question as well in committee.

I spoke of the difficulties associated with gun control rules and regulations, and mentioned some of the weaknesses and strengths of the bill. I still remain to be convinced that the bill will prevent a crackpot from acquiring a gun and shooting someone. This is a technical bill, and in order to debate it thoroughly one needs to do a great deal of research.

In conclusion, may I move the amendment which I said at the beginning of my remarks I intended to move. Therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski), I move:

That all the words after the word 'that' be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

Criminal Code

Bill C-51, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Customs Tariff, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act and the Prisons and Reformatories Act, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

As reported at page 11636 of Hansard for March 9, 1976, a similarly worded motion was proposed. I moved an amendment in similar terms, which Mr. Speaker accepted. If one substitutes Bill C-51 for Bill C-83, the terms of the amendment proposed today and that moved previously become exactly similar.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate and I particularly appreciate the remarks initially made by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) who threw bouquets in all directions. He congratulated the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) on accepting his proposed amendment. For a while I suspected he was preaching for a call. I know the hon. member for Calgary North is secure in his position as a practising lawyer, but I am sure he would make an excellent judge.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: I was greatly impressed with the erudition of the hon. member for Calgary North and listened with interest to his arguments concerning the wiretap provisions of the bill, arguments he backed with case law. It is refreshing to hear an argument backed with that kind of in-depth research and logic. Too often we deal with such questions on the basis of emotionalism rather than logic. When speaking of wiretapping the hon. member did himself and his party and, indeed, the entire opposition, proud. Later I shall speak in some detail on gun control but for a moment let me deal with wire-tapping.

First let me say that in my remarks I do not intend to reflect on the ruling Mr. Speaker handed down in this House relating to the procedural point which we raised several days ago. Unfortunately our present procedures, which follow parliamentary tradition, do not give members of this House any chance on second reading to distinguish between their support or otherwise of wiretapping and gun control. That procedure is unfortunate, and it seems to me a device must be found beyond that suggested by the Speaker, which simply involves deletion on third reading. We need desperately a proceeding which will apply to the second reading vote, which is most important, in order to enable the public to understand our positions.

Obviously, in terms of gun control, this is a compromise bill. We have half a loaf, which is sometimes better than no loaf at all. But we do not support the wiretap provisions of the bill. We feel as strongly and vigorously as we ever felt that those provisions of the bill are an insidious invasion of the privacy of Canadians. These further extensions of that insidious invasion must be resisted by members of the opposition in the interests of their constituents and in the interests of freedom of the mind, that freedom of the mind which all Canadians cherish.

Why I say that the whole wiretap question becomes one that is insidious and, in a sense, immoral is that in the mind of a citizen, he must believe he is free. Surely that is one of the things that distinguishes Canada from totalitarian countries. However, you cannot feel you are free if you think you are tapped. You cannot feel free if you do not know whether there is a bug on your telephone. The wiretap amendments that have come down have expanded, not reduced, the areas of the law where wiretap becomes available.

I want to deal very briefly with the report of 1976 to the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) on the operations of the wiretap law. My understanding is that this does not deal with the many, many wiretaps that go out in terms of provincial attorneys general. These are the wiretaps that have gone out under federal statute only. I do not have the figures for the whole country in terms of province by province, just those that went out by federal statute.

In 1976, 1,224 telephones were tapped. That led to 1,062 arrests, but proceedings against 368 individuals. Of the 1,062 arrested, there were 824 whose names did not appear on the request for authorization. That means they were fishing expeditions. Innocent citizens were subjected to taps on fishing expeditions. That is surely something that we who cherish freedom in this country should oppose.

In 1976, 517 warrants were granted under the Official Secrets Act. The average time of each of those warrants was 241 days. All 614 original applications for wiretapping were granted. There was not a single denial by a judge, yet we have had the police, the law enforcement agencies, lobbying the minister over and over that they should not need to have their requests reviewed before a judge. Here the judiciary has clearly co-operated with law enforcement by turning down none. Only two of the 614 applications had any limitation at all in the terms and conditions attached to those wiretap approvals.

Nine warrants allowed police officers to listen for more than 180 days. What we have had is a rubber stamp provision under the wiretap law.

The minister raised the question of the good feeling in the committee that in fact the provisions for notification have now been reduced from the suggested five years to three years. I agree that consensus was developed around that. However, that argument about a consensus was a nice little carrot that the minister hung in front of the committee.

The key to the wiretap bill is the expansion of the offences. That is the insidious part. Let me give an example of what could happen under the wiretap provisions as they are now proposed.

Clause 7(1) (c) states that an offence mentioned in section 192 of the Customs Act (smuggling) is a wiretap offence. I ask hon. members how many people in their constituencies have ever come across the border with an extra can of beer or a pair of pants under their ordinary pants. Smuggling in Canada has become very widespread. It is a kind of human failing. Let us be realistic about the question of smuggling. A lot of people may take an extra package of cigarettes across the border. A tap can be made for that offence. No judge can deny the authorization to issue the tap. It is a case of "open sesame" to tap everbody the police wish.

Under the offence sections, comprising the guts of the wiretap provisions, it is so broad that there is almost nothing for which the police cannot tap. That is why we in this House must resist to the best of our ability this insidious invasion of the rights of individuals and, more important, the right of Canadians to feel they are free in their own minds so that they can pick up their telephone and have a conversation without thinking they have to be guarded in what they say. We know that happens in countries in eastern Europe and so on, but surely in the kind of democracy we have developed on the North American continent and to a large extent under British and Western European tradition, we should continue to protect the rights of people to feel free in their own minds.

There are other provisions in the wiretap section to which we take exception. The hon. member for Calgary North referred to them. There is no reason why police should be rewarded for illegal conduct. We should support our police in every way. They have a difficult job. However, when they cut a corner, when they do not bother with an authorization from a judge, when they go out on a job with the impression that it is O.K. because it is pretty important that they catch a particular person—I agree that it is important to catch a criminal—that little review process of going to a judge is very important in order to avoid abuses.

As a result of a breach of the wiretap provisions the police obtain illegal evidence. The tape is not admitted in court, but everything they learn from the tape goes into evidence. If that is the case, there will be a law for the police and a law for other people, because they can introduce illegal evidence as a result of illegal activity, but the rest of the population must abide by the law.

That is an unsound principle in our law. I am disappointed that the minister has not yet seen fit to accept what is now common practice in the United States. He has not accepted something that the British Bar Association has looked at very seriously and may very well accept. Instead, he has accepted the hoary old argument that if it is any kind of evidence, no matter where it is from, throw it all in. That reduces the standard of police work.

It is very easy to sit at one end of electronic equipment and listen to people. However, it can be seen from the records introduced by the hon. member for Calgary North and myself that the amount of convictions obtained in that way is almost nil. It is peanuts.

The police should be getting out from behind their earphones on to the street getting good, hard evidence the way policemen always did, through meeting and talking to people and getting informants.

When Ramsey Clark was the attorney general of the United States, he had the best record for getting Mafia convictions. He refused to use wiretapping. Instead of wasting police time, he told the police to get back out on to the streets to see what was happening. He told them not to waste their time listening to bedroom conversations, something that was quite common in the United States under their law.

The offensive part of this legislation is clearly the wiretap provisions. I am very disappointed that we keep getting this hoary old thing thrown back at us in an omnibus bill, confusing the issue of gun control with wiretapping.

Under the gun control provisions, I said earlier that half a loaf is better than no bread at all.

An hon. Member: It is the apple that was talked about last time.

Mr. Leggatt: You guys have the apples, we eat the bread. In any event, there is obviously a little food in it for all of us.

Under the gun control provisions, we should not proceed further in this debate without saying something about those individuals who fought very hard for the safety of Canadians in terms of gun control legislation. I am thinking particularly of Mr. and Mrs. Slinger whose son died during a very tragic event in Brampton. But they did not sit back and wring their hands. They decided to go to work to protect other people in Canada, to protect other sons.

I think of Maggie Burtinshaw of British Columbia who faced a severe personal tragedy when her son died. She did not sit back and wring her hands. She went out and did as a good citizen should. She went out and worked for a change in the law. Now, this change in the law may not go as far as Maggie Burtinshaw and others may wish, but I have to admit that it does go a significant distance toward curing what has been a major fault under our criminal law, that is, failure to reduce what we can call preventable homicide in cases where you can predict the behaviour of an individual who is unable to control his own emotions. The measure before us does provide a review process by requiring him to obtain a firearms certificate.

Sometimes statistics are dry, but on this occasion they tell an interesting story. Forty-six percent of all murders committed in Canada are domestic murders. The gun control lobbyists always maintain that you will never take the guns away from the criminals. But a criminal is not a guy who runs around the streets with a big "C" on his forehead so that he can be identified. There are a lot of criminals who are first offenders—they were not criminals until they committed an offence. And they are people just like you and me who have lost control of themselves. Those people are certainly involved in 46 per cent of the domestic homicides in Canada. In some 44 per cent of those cases the agent of death is a firearm, and 72 per cent of those firearms are rifles. These are hard statistics which we cannot avoid considering carefully.

The last statistic of importance is one which shows that in the United States 54 per cent of the homicides involve the use of the handgun, not the rifle. Almost the reverse situation occurs in Canada. In this country in only 10.4 per cent of cases is the agent of death a handgun. Therefore the gun control system we have used in Canada to date in terms of handguns has, in my view, significantly reduced the number of Canadian homicides in the area of handguns.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): What is the percentage of homicides?

Mr. Leggatt: The percentage of homicides where the handgun is used as the agent of death in the United States is 54 per cent, and in Canada it is only 10.4 per cent. In Canada we have a very strict handgun law and in the United States they have very poor handgun laws.

My argument is that gun control provisions, contrary to the argument advanced by the hon. member for Calgary North, do have a significant effect on reducing homicide right across the country. That is the reason I welcome this half loaf which is presented in terms of a firearms bill, and I think the hon. member for Calgary North may also welcome it, even if for different reasons.

When we get to the positive aspects of the measure before us I would agree that the efforts made by the hon. member for Calgary North and others in the committee to take away the guarantor provision were a positive step. Eliminating it did, in fact, reduce an unnecessary elitism in the system by which you had to know somebody important in order to get a licence. I agree it was desirable to remove that proposal.

Establishing the cost of the firearms certificate at $2 per year is something about which nobody can reasonably complain. Specific examples of preventable homicide are numerous. I shall not bore the House with many of them. These are headlines: October 23, 1976, "Bought Gun for Protection; Man Shoots Son by Mistake." "Lethbridge—Boy's Purchase of Rifle Leads to Homicide." September 12, 1974, "Children Watched as Mother Gunned Down by Commonlaw Husband." These were preventable homicides. They were cases where the conduct of the murderer was predictable because he had previously indicated the presence of mental disorder, or had a record of previous criminal activity. In those kinds of homicides the provisions contained in the bill are significant.

But what the bill fails to deal with is the six million rifles which are still out there in the hands of a few unstable people—a very minor percentage. One of the things we will get to, because of the provisions of the bill, in about 50 years is the reduction of the proliferation of firearms. Under the provisions of the bill you cannot transfer a rifle and you cannot sell your rifle unless the person you are transferring it to has a firearms certificate. Therefore the effect of these provisions will be to bring the licensing system to bear, and ultimately there will be a reduction in the number of emotionally unstable individuals who have access to firearms.

Competency training is useful but it does not provide an emotional test. In fact training someone to shoot straight may lead to a murder rather than to a wounding. Competency training is no answer to the question of gun control. However, I do not intend to criticize competency training. I think it is useful that a person know how to handle his weapons, and it should certainly reduce the number of negligent homicides which could occur during a foray into the forest.

I do, however, wish to deal with a key weakness in the bill which deserves examination when the measure goes to committee. I am referring to the provision dealing with mental disorders. We are in a position of risking a computer bank which will have information about everybody in the country in terms of where they were treated and what happened to them mentally. That is something to which I object as strenuously as I object to the wiretapping provisions. We do not want Big Brother to fill that computer full of information about private mental histories of people in Canada.

I urge the minister to be sure that when the applications for the firearms certificates are made up there is a question concerning whether the applicant has been treated for a mental disorder. Second, if the answer is yes, there must be a question concerning where and by whom the applicant was treated. Last, there must be a consent form in the application so that the firearms licensing officer has a full opportunity to investigate the information contained on the application. I do not know what the minister has in mind, but if the purpose of that section is to put mental hospital computer data in the possession of those not otherwise authorized to receive it, then I object to that practice as strenuously as I did to electronic invasion of privacy. It is another serious invasion of the right of Canadians to privacy. But I will say this: when a person applies for a firearms permit he is asking not for a right but for a privilege, and should consent to a search of the records being undertaken so that whoever issues a licence may know it is not being given to an unsuitable person. I agree with this in principle, although how it will work out in practice is, to say the least, uncertain.

The minister referred to a Gallup poll dealing with the way Canadians feel about gun control. He pointed out, I think, that 85 per cent were in favour of some form of gun control measures. What he did not tell us was that this 85 per cent approved Bill C-83 and the principles underlying it. In fact, that 85 per cent was not answering a question about new purchasers of weapons; it was answering a question about registration in terms of the whole ballgame.

An hon. Member: The words "newly acquired" were in that questionnaire.

• (1730)

Mr. Leggatt: I would not want to mislead the House. The minister can correct the statement he made, or if I am in error I would be happy to be corrected. My understanding was that the Gallup poll he referred to dealt with the general licensing of firearm owners and not newly acquired weapons.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Before recognizing the hon. minister, I am required to seek the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I would like to read the question to which I referred. "Would you favour or oppose a law which would require a person to obtain a police permit before he or she could buy a gun?" That was my question.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether that clarifies the situation with respect to existing rifle owners. It is a rather ambiguous question. It should have specified whether it was referring to a first time purchaser of a gun obtaining a firearm certificate.

Leaving that aside, not only that poll but every Gallup poll I have seen indicates a broad cross section of support in Canada for the licensing of all persons who own something as innately dangerous as a rifle, and not just new firearm purchasers. I support that position, and I have to agree that the bill has made a significant step in the direction of control. If we wait 50 years, 60 years or 70 years, by attrition the proliferation of rifles in the population amongst those who should not have them will be reduced through old age and through sales. In terms of this party's position, this is not the kind of legislation that we would adopt. At the same time, it is a step forward. I do not believe this legislation should be obstructed to the point where it is withdrawn, or to the point where it dies on the order paper.

I know how nervous the government is about gun lobbies. I would be worried if we went through the same exercise again and the minister had some more delegations from FARO and some of the other groups, and arrived at a decision that even this was more than the Canadian public or the gun lobby was willing to accept. I am hopeful the minister will stay firm with what he has. I have heard very little from the shooting sportsmen and the gun clubs in opposition. They have been remarkably quiet. Therefore we can congratulate the minister for putting out the fire. This bill is not what the majority of the Canadian public would have supported.

Mr. Woolliams: Gun club members do not know about it.

Mr. Leggatt: It is time we had this bill passed. I appreciate the motion the hon. member for Calgary North has made. He is as concerned as I am, and many of us are, with splitting the legislation so that our thoughts can be known. I have reservations in supporting the particular amendment that was moved, since it is an attempt to refer the subject matter to committee. If we get into further legislative delays, I am afraid gun control will die on the order paper once again. I refuse to be a dog in the manger on this subject. We need gun control in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: The minister has made a significant step forward. Therefore I want to say the minister has my support. Unfortunately I am not in a position to vote against wiretapping at the same time; but I am sure the minister will understand why I am supporting the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Woolliams: No, no yet.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The question is therefore on the amendment of Mr. Woolliams, seconded by Mr. Paproski—

Mr. Woolliams: On a point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) on a point of order.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, our House leader was called out of the Chamber for a minute. He is now ready to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) on a point of order.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I was rising on the same point of order as that raised by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I now understand what the hon. member for Calgary North said. I was, perhaps, a little hasty in starting to put the amendment. I saw no one rise and therefore concluded that the House was ready for the question. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in beginning my speech this afternoon there are some observations I would like to make with respect to this bill, and the subject matter of this bill, which has had such a checkered career in this parliament.

In view of what the legislation says with respect to firearms control, I am greatly surprised by the fact the minister devoted so much time, out of the time allotted to him, in the course of his speech to that particular provision in the bill. As the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) said, there was a tremendous parliamentary battle fought over that earlier.

I want to join with the hon. member for Calgary North in supporting the purpose of the amendment which he has put. I think it is a wrong parliamentary practice. I argued the case on a point of order the other night in another matter. We place in the legislation that comes before us so many sections dealing with different aspects that, as the hon. member for New Westminister (Mr. Leggatt) said the other evening, one may feel that he or she should vote nay to the entire bill. One may feel that he or she should vote nay because there is a difficulty with a group of sections, and yet be bound to vote yea, or be perceived to vote yea.

It is a blot on our legislative process that we have come to a point where that procedure is acceptable. It has been upheld by the Speaker on the basis of precedent that various aspects of a subject matter, or even unrelated subject matters, or even subject matters with respect to different statutes, can be dealt with in the same bill. The result of all of this is that it makes it difficult for members of parliament to be accountable. By the votes they cast, I believe it tends to prolong parliamentary debate that must follow, because members of parliament feel they must explain themselves with respect to their votes on account of the difficulties of misconstruction—

Mr. Blais: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to the hon. gentleman from Grenville-Carleton with a great deal of interest. He is coming very, very close to casting aspersions on a judgment of the Chair made earlier this afternoon, by referring to a matter that has been dealt with by the Chair and that the Chair has decided upon. The decision of the Chair was made pursuant to precedents set by Hon. Lucien Lamoureux, the predecessor of the present occupant of the chair. I hope that the hon. gentleman is very careful not to impugn the motives, or indeed the judgment, of the Chair in these matters.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The Chair was quite attentive to the remarks of the hon. member and I think he was relating his remarks to the reason why he was supporting the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has the floor.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais) for his interjection because it demonstrates to the House and to the country that while he was sitting in his seat he was asleep. The hon. gentleman is so quick to interject. Had he been listening he would know that I was not casting any aspersions on the Chair, or on the previous occupant of the chair. What I was saying was that it was unfortunate that the Chair was bound by precedent, a precedent in a matter which makes it difficult, on the one hand, for the public to understand, and on the other hand for parliamentarians to explain their actions in terms of votes and accounting for those votes.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, an observation of that nature is not a reflection on the Chair; it is a reflection on an unfortunate precedent which the Chair must follow in these circumstances. I take second place to no member of the House in regard to the respect which I show the Chair. I have to confess that from time to time I disagree with decisions of the Chair, but I am as aware as anyone of the position the Chair is in under our rules, the fact that there is no appeal from its rulings. This places a great responsibility on the Chair, and because of this my respect for the Chair is increased. I think it does not advance the debate in any way for the Postmaster General to rise in his place and show what is in fact a bona fide disrespect for the Chair by intervening the way he did, by asking the Chair to intervene by raising a spurious point of order.

Perhaps because of our complex legislative process or because we tend in modern society today to intervene to a greater and greater extent in the lives of individuals, this parliament is busier than ever, which means it is necessary for more and more provisions to be packed into fewer and fewer bills. That may be the case, or there may be a thousand explanations. It may be, as the deputy opposition whip said, a matter of some cunning on the part of the government, which I suspect might be the case. But whatever the reason, it is unfortunate that this is deemed to be acceptable parliamentary practice.

The fact of the matter, as the hon. member for New Westminster and the hon. member for Calgary North have said, is that this bill is perhaps the best example of how this sort of thing can occur. First of all, part of the bill deals with firearms legislation. Then it goes on to deal with electronic surveillance. Then the bill deals with amendments affecting dangerous offenders' legislation. Then it deals with the custody and release of inmates. Finally it deals with revision of the Prisons and Reformatories Act.

That is quite a formidable package of criminal law. A member of parliament may feel very strongly about one part of the bill as proposed by the government but not so strongly about another part. He may agree with one part of the bill and disagree with another. Each of those sections of the legislation could stand on its own merits, but when a member of parliament is ultimately forced to take a position, he votes perhaps in favour when in fact his point of view might have been completely different. He is then left to explain himself. Indeed, the legislative process is left to explain itself. Parliament becomes less understandable and there is even the chance of an attack on the relevancy of parliament. Some people are prone to attack the relevancy of parliament from time to time, and this process assists and aids it. That is why the bill is an unfortunate one in terms of its form—I will deal with the substance of the bill in a few moments—as well as in terms of the legislative process.

There is no doubt that there have been incidents involving the use of firearms. There is also no doubt that it is legitimate for parliament to intervene in this regard. It has been questioned whether or not, by means of this bill, we are setting up two classes of people who own firearms, those who own them now and those who may acquire them hereafter. Certainly in committee we will have to consider the validity of that concept.

I am satisfied that what the government intends in this bill is to see to it that over a long period of time firearms which are presently owned by people are gradually phased out, say over a period of 20 years. I would be very interested to hear, when the minister sums up, whether that is his point of view, that there will be a gradual phasing out of firearms presently in existence, and that as new firearms are purchased they will be made subject to licensing. If that is the philosophy in this bill, I should certainly like to have it explained in committee.

The new bill does away with a number of things which were obnoxious to a number of well intentioned people in Canada. I received tons of mail on the last bill, and there may be a significant amount of mail come in on this bill too. But I think one can say of the existing bill that there is a fundamental difference in the classes of person to whom it will apply.

Those who felt that the government should have taken a strong position on gun control regard this bill as a capitulation. I suppose that many of those who were upset by the position taken by the government last time, and who felt the legislation was too strong, on reflection will look at this bill and say there has been quite a considerable change.

Another part of the bill which concerns me as a citizen in a free society is the part which deals with electronic surveillance.

These provisions are so great an advance in terms of the power and authority of the state, as embodied in the approach and philosophy of the government in regard to electronic surveillance, that as a citizen and a lawyer I am concerned.

I do not see at this point any demonstration being made by the government in the application and use of the existing electronic surveillance provisions that could so move the Minister of Justice, who is responsible for some balance in the government's approach to legal affairs and the law of the country, to suggest that we should abandon to a greater and greater degree our regard for civil rights, for the freedom of the individual in our society, and for what has been held to be part of the rule of law in this country for many years.

If it could be demonstrated to me that the administration of justice and the exercise of the police authority found itself in a society which was deteriorating so that the only way that one could preserve law, order and justice was to extend the already extensive powers in the Criminal Code to the point suggested by the Attorney General, then I would be bound to say that this country was indeed in a bad shape and that the police authorities needed these new powers. The idea of being able through the electronic surveillance devices, without notice, to shadow someone on a mere suspicion, is repugnant to me, and I think it should be repugnant to anyone who reflects on this bill.

I think there is a duty on the government, whether it does it in the course of this debate when we discuss the principle of the bill or in the committee to which this bill will be referred, to show that the situation in Canada is deteriorating, that the police cannot operate under the existing sections, that the power that has been given to the police is not sufficient. I suggest that on the basis of the statistical evidence that was quoted in the report of the governor in council with respect to the use of electronic surveillance, and the new sections that were put on the record and alluded to by the hon. member for Calgary North, exactly the reverse is demonstrated, that the powers that presently exist are potent ones, that a police officer, properly instructed and properly operating within the laws that exist now, has a power which he never had before, the potential of which has not yet been tested. Unless it is demonstrated otherwise, unless it can be shown that the administration of justice will fail, that the police and the power of the state will not operate and that the public interest will not be protected, the Government of Canada should not ask this parliament to give to the police an extension of the powers which they seek.

It is important that we consider fully and fairly what is being sought. While the debate on Bill C-83 was overshadowed by the public outcry on gun control, whether justified or not, we ought not to let the capitulation—if that is what it can be called, put any label on it that you want—with respect to gun control, to allow us to breathe a sigh of relief in the House that all is well, that the government has finally moved in the way the people want, and let this bill slide through and forget about it because it does not really affect us at all. It does affect us, it affects us very badly, and on reflection I think that when the people of Canada view this bill and consider it in terms of the use of the new devices of electronic surveillance, the extension of the use, the lack of notice, and the power that is given to the police in an extended way, they will be asking the government some questions. There is a duty on the government to explain why it asks this parliament to extend those powers.

I hope there will be some speakers on the government side who will, for once, not sit mute and not acquiesce in whatever the minister says is all right, who will rise in their places and, on the basis of some evidence that they can present to the House during the course of this debate, tell us what has happened in the country that we have to place in the hands of the police, however well intentioned they may be, the power to intrude on our civil rights. I hope they will tell us why it has been necessary to take cognizance of the cases that were brought forward by the hon. member for Calgary North. The hon. member indicated that if the law is not followed—the law that this parliament dealt with—then the evidence that has been procured as a result of the law not being followed is still admitted in a court of law.

I think parliament has to take a look at that kind of question that has not been answered. I think the hon. member for Calgary North has done the House and the people of the country a great service by putting on the record the number of cases that have come to his attention and are likely to continue unless we, in the course of the discussions on this bill, review it carefully and decide whether or not circumstances have deteriorated to the extent that police should have these powers. My suggestion is that they cannot.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PENITENTIARIES

APPROVAL FOR LOCATING NEW INSTITUTION IN SELKIRK, MANITOBA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. This will be of particular interest to the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay). In light of the results of yesterday's referendum in Selkirk regarding the establishment of a federal maximum penitentiary, the results of which were 1,711 in favour, 974 opposed, a two to one ratio in support of locating the new penitentiary in that town, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That the Solicitor General move quickly and decisively to locate the new Manitoba federal maximum security penitentiary in Selkirk, and that this decision be communicated immediately to mayor Lloyd Wersch and the council of Selkirk.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

SUGGESTED REFUSAL OF INCREASE IN WELLHEAD PRICE OF OIL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising out of the fact that the energy ministers' conference of yesterday has resulted in an agreement to raise the wellhead price of oil by another $2 a barrel. In light of the fact that officials of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources have produced figures showing that the result of such a price increase on the economy would be a rise in the consumer price index of two per cent and an increase of nearly half a percentage point in the unemployment rate, resulting in the loss of 42,000 potential jobs, and in light of the fact that this price increase announcement comes at a time when the most recent labour force figures show a rate of unemployment already at a record 8.3 per cent and the most recent consumer price figures show an annual rate of increase of over 11 per cent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

● (1410)

That this House instruct the government to refuse any increase in the wellhead price of oil within the foreseeable future on the grounds of its disastrous effect on an already weak economy.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTED MEASURES TO GIVE JUSTICE TO INDUSTRIAL MILK PRODUCERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to raise a question of pressing necessity.

Since the Quebec Federation of Raw Milk Producers are objecting to the request of the federal government for a 25 cents contribution per hundredweight of milk under the pretext that this request announced in the recent dairy policy is unconstitutional, while those raw milk producers consider that it is quite constitutional to receive a gross subsidy of $2.66 per hundredweight exclusive of their quota for their production, and especially since they have gained 25 per cent of the quotas for manufacturing milk producers against whom a 20 per cent penalty was levied last year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin):

That the House immediately suggest that the Minister of Agriculture take the necessary steps, through the organizations involved, to state once and for all in all fairness to manufacturing milk producers that if the constitution allows subsidies to producers, it also allows to withdraw or amend them and to table in the House a thorough report on this matter in the shortest possible time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MONTREAL—SUGGESTION FUNDS BE USED FOR CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to discuss an urgent and important matter.

Since 40 per cent of construction workers are unemployed in Montreal and considering that the housing sector in that area has reached a critical point and that it is urgent to find solutions, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That the government grant as soon as possible the funds available for the Montreal region to undertake public works and urban renovations, in order to relieve the unemployment which affects that area.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

REQUEST FOR MORE RIGOROUS SAFETY STANDARDS FOR OFFSHORE DRILLING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development just recently released a report recommending the establishment of minimum training standards for workers on offshore oil platforms and requested the member countries of OECD to ensure the best possible safety standards are applied on offshore rigs to prevent injuries and oil spills, and in view of the fact that there have been 80 deaths in connection with attempts to retrieve oil from the North Sea and that the potential for such may be high in the Beaufort Sea, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth):

That Canada immediately take a lead in establishing more rigorous standards and support early actions on this important OECD recommendation.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

MEASURES TO CONTROL INFLATION AND DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT—POSSIBILITY OF NEW METHODS OF FORECASTING

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, this week once more Canadians have been informed of record unemployment and record inflation levels. The consumer price index released today shows a year-end inflation rate from April 1976 to April 1977 of 7.6 per cent. The Minister of Finance said one and one-half months ago that the government would meet the 6 per cent annual inflation guideline. Two weeks ago he upped it to 7 per cent, and with today's announcement we see that for the first four months of 1977 Canadians are faced with an annual inflation rate now of 11 per cent. In view of the absolute bankruptcy of government policies, what new measures, if any, can the Canadian people and this House expect from the government? Will the government now abandon its inflation rate forecasting procedures which are obviously beyond a joke.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I saw the report on the price increase. We still think that the goal set by the hon. Minister of Finance will be met by the end of the year.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, may I put a further supplementary question to the minister. In so far as the minister announced a target of 6 per cent a month and a half ago, then two weeks ago it was 7 per cent and now it is 11 per cent, may I ask the minister how he can make such a statement and can he inform the House that the government will now abandon its forecasting procedures and announce new methods?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, if you look carefully at the statistics published today you can see a trend that will lead to the goal set by the Minister of Finance.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF NATIONAL FOOD POLICY

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question and it is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Since the figures announced today largely involve an excessive increase in food prices with terrible effects on the many people unemployed and low-income Canadians, may I ask when the minister intends to announce to the House a precise and coordinated national food program?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member correctly identifies, a large part of the increase was occasioned by an increase in food prices but a large part of that increase was occasioned by the importation of foodstuffs from abroad that are beyond our control.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Like wheat and puffed rice.

Mr. Abbott: The government is continuing to work toward the preparation of a national food strategy, an effort that I strongly endorse.

MEASURES TO ESTABLISH NATIONAL CONSERVATION PROGRAM

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The increase in gasoline and heating oil prices comes at a time when the annual rate of inflation this year is up to 11.4 per cent. The minister has rationalized the increase in oil and gas prices as a means of encouraging energy conservation and exploration. These price increases are only acceptable if there is an effective conservation and exploration program. In view of the fact that the International Energy Agency has said that our achievements in conservation are below average, may I ask if the minister is now going to create a truly effective national conservation program for energy and if so, how does he plan to do it?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have taken a look at what the International Energy Agency had to say about our efforts, particularly in the area of conservation. They have given us a great deal of credit for the initiatives we have taken in energy conservation but they have been critical in one area and that is with respect to our prices. They said that Canada had been holding down prices for too long below international price levels and they strongly urged that Canada should increase its prices. I would say that the view of the majority of ministers yesterday that we should raise our prices in orderly steps, is very much the view of the International Energy Agency.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, a final supplementary question. At the meeting yesterday I believe the minister suggested he is going to do something to expand the energy conservation home insulation program from the provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island to the rest of the country and this would be an effective step. Would the minister tell the House what other effective steps he might take and how does he explain, if he has an effective conservation program, now, that the chief of the office of energy conservation, Mr. David Brooks, resigned on the grounds of a dispute about conservation policy, describing the minister's policies as minimal? How does the minister explain that? This is a man on the scene in Canada and not some international agency.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, Dr. David Brooks has served my department and Canadians extremely well.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He continues to do so.

Mr. Gillespie: I want to make it quite clear that I wish him well with the work he has chosen to do. In making a change as he has at this time, after a year's sabbatical granted to him a year ago to consider other options and career opportunities and where he would like to place his efforts, he has chosen a path that will undoubtedly be of advantage to Canadians. I wish him very well.

● (1420)

Mr. Crosbie: My question to the minister is this, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Brooks explained that he left the federal government because of a disagreement with the minister's department over conservation and he called the conservation policy minimal. We all wish the gentleman well in his next career, but can the minister answer his statement to the effect that the minister's policy is minimal, and what is the minister going to do about that?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think if the hon. member were to check he would find that Dr. David Brooks was misquoted.

EFFECT OF INCREASED PRICE FOR OIL ON COST OF LIVING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources regarding the minister's announcement that the price of crude oil will rise $2 per barrel during the next 12 months. Since federal government studies show that a $2 per barrel increase will result in a 2 per cent increase in the cost of living, a 1.2 per cent decline in the gross national product and the potential loss of 42,000 jobs, I ask if these facts were taken into consideration when the federal government decided to approve the $2 per barrel increase? If so, will the minister tell the House if the government has considered that the plight of wage and salary earners in this country, who are restricted under the AIB to a 6 per cent pay increase and who now face an 11 per cent increase in the cost of living, will be further aggravated by the $2 per barrel increase in the price of oil? What does the government propose to do about the fact that this represents a reduction in the net incomes of millions of Canadian workers in Canada?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the hon. member's figures at all. Frankly, I think there are serious errors in his figures.

Mr. Rodriguez: What are the minister's figures?

Mr. Gillespie: The point which the hon. member, and I hope other Canadians, should recognize is that we would be derelict in our duty if we did not consider the long-term needs of Canadians for future energy supplies, and the importance of energy conservation. Energy ministers yesterday addressed themselves to that question and overwhelmingly—I include in that the majority of the consuming provinces as well as the producing provinces—they felt it was in Canada's interest that we should move our price up, because any other policy would have disastrous consequences for Canadians in the future.

OIL—ALLEGATION COMPANIES SPENDING LESS ON EXPLORATION WHILE RECEIVING HIGHER PRICES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The figures I quoted were given to a meeting of federal and provincial officials on March 4, 1976, and were quoted at the meeting of ministers over which the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources presided on March 5, 1976. The minister should be familiar with the figures of his own department. I ask the minister a question arising from a statement he has made repeatedly inside and outside the House, that these price increases are necessary in order to secure exploration and development. In the light of that, how can he explain that this country's petroleum industry in 1976, according to his own department's figures, when the price of oil was $9 a barrel, used 52 per cent of its internally generated cash flow for exploration, whereas in 1971, when the price of oil was only $3 per barrel, the industry invested 61.7 per cent of its cash flow in exploration. Will the minister explain why, despite the billions of dollars Canadian consumers have paid the petroleum company, that industry is spending a smaller percentage of its cash flow on exploration and development, therefore nullifying completely the minister's argument that higher prices will accelerate exploration in this country?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is being extremely selective with his figures; I suppose we should not be surprised. But if he would look at the next year, 1972, which was also a year before the increase of international prices and the start of the rise of Canadian prices, he would find that the percentages for 1976 which he quoted at 52 per cent, were higher than those in 1972. The hon. member has been selective in taking a particular year which best illustrates his particular case. I suggest to him that he look over the whole five year period. He would see that there is an increasing trend on the part of the oil industry toward exploration and development.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if he is satisfied that the additional cash flow which the oil industry has received from the steady increase in the price of oil is only 52 per cent. May I ask him what percentage of the oil companies, internally generated cash flow ought to be used for exploration and development. What is the percentage? Will the minister tell us what the goal is that the federal government has set or is he leaving that matter entirely to the discretion of the oil companies?

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should also acknowledge there are other calls on the internally generated funds such as increases in working capital during an inflationary period and other capital expenditures which produce jobs for Canadians right across the country. The hon. member has not acknowledged this. If he were to acknowledge this, he would be able to state that a much larger proportion than the proportion he mentioned has been devoted to these capital projects. I say to him that I hope to see that particular trend increase for some years to come.

AGRICULTURE

RESULTS OF MEETING WITH PROVINCES ON INDUSTRIAL MILK QUOTAS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture of which I gave him a copy.

Can the minister tell the House about the results of the meeting he had with the supply management committee and the provincial Ministers of Agriculture which he mentioned in reply to my question of Tuesday last concerning manufacturing milk producers' provincial quotas for the 1977-78 production?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we had a lengthy discussion. Two provincial governments or their milk marketing boards have made a decision that they will participate in the program. The others have not. Some wanted longer to consider. Some took a strong stand toward participating in our program in the way we had suggested to them. We said if there was any other way they could come up with an equitable method of finding a way to pay on all class one milk, we would accept that, and that they had until the first week of June to do it.

[Translation]

INQUIRY WHETHER JUSTICE WILL BE GIVEN QUEBEC INDUSTRIAL MILK PRODUCERS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

Can the minister tell us whether the people he met, who represent the manufacturing milk producers for the year 1977-78, are willing to recognize the problem of equity towards the Quebec manufacturing milk producers, whether that problem can be solved and whether government has the power, through the bodies involved, to demand that justice be done to those producers?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the provincial minister of agriculture for Quebec did not attend the meeting yesterday. One of his representatives was there. He sent the message that he thought what we were suggesting appeared to be fair. However, there is no way that I, as federal Minister of Agriculture, can deal with the inequity of quotas and so on, which may be as the hon. member has intimated, and tell the provinces how its quota should be administered.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, on a final supplementary.

Can the minister tell us whether the special envoy of the Quebec government is aware of the problem, whether he takes seriously the problem facing our manufacturing milk producers who have been wrongfully denied 25 per cent of their raw milk quotas in some provinces?

● (1430)

[English]

Mr. Whelan: The representative sent by the government of Quebec is very familiar with all aspects of the dairy industry. He is one of their top civil servants and he has attended many meetings in Ottawa in the past.

FINANCE

REASON CHARTERED BANKS DELAYED LOWERING INTEREST RATES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Has the government received an explanation from the chartered banks as to why they have chosen to delay lowering their prime lending rate until June 1 when the Bank of Canada obviously hoped for an immediate reduction in interest rates when it made its announcement last Friday. If such an explanation has been received, would the hon. gentleman inform the House as to its nature? I ask this, bearing in mind that every day's delay in lowering the rate by even half a point means that an extra one million dollars at least is being charged to Canadian borrowers.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I noted the article on which the hon. member bases his question. I have looked into the matter and it appears that some banks did respond immediately by lowering their rates but that others did not. I am disappointed that the banks did not respond more immediately to the change in monetary policy indicated by the governor. I expressed my disappointment to the governor and I expect that he will convey our views, and the views of hon. members expressed here, to the banks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: The answer just given by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance indicates that some banks have responded while others did not. Could the Acting Prime Minister or the parliamentary secretary go further and tell us what banks have failed to respond and what explanation has been received in this regard?

Mr. Kaplan: We have not asked the banks for an explanation. I do not think the article which I read indicated which banks had responded. But some have done so. I would point out that banks are in competition with each other. The public ought to know that some banks have responded and are offering to lend money at lower rates of interest than others, and govern itself accordingly.

Mr. Stevens: As the Provincial Bank has announced plans to lower consumer interest rates by half a per cent to 13 per cent, would the hon. gentleman indicate whether the government has used, or intends to use, moral suasion to induce banks which have not chosen to lower consumer interest rates to do so, bearing in mind that lower rates on consumer credit would help reduce prices and create the stimulus which is presumably needed to deal with unemployment?

Mr. Kaplan: Well, Mr. Speaker, the public has a free choice among the banks. If some banks are offering lower interest rates, the public ought to know it and act accordingly.

CANADA SUMMER GAMES

INQUIRY AS TO PLANS FOR PROMOTIONAL CAMPAIGN

Mr. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Amateur Sport and Fitness. The Canada Summer Games will take place in Newfoundland this year and I invite all hon. members to visit the province and enjoy our hospitality at that time. In view of the fact that there is now an urgent need in this country to express national unity, and since there is no more appropriate place to do this than on the sports field, I want to ask the minister, coming, as she does, from the beautiful west coast, what plans she has for the promotion of these games on the equally beautiful east coast?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We are in fact beginning to promote the Canada Games at this time. We have an agreement with the Western Canada Lottery to promote the games via television twice a week starting very shortly. Also, the CBC is scheduled to commence regional television promotions of St. John's and the Canada Games. Its live national coverage of the games will be the most extensive ever in the history of the Canada Games. I should like to offer an invitation to all hon. members to attend the official kick-off ceremonies which will be taking place on Monday, May 16.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Oral Questions

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

DATE PROGRAM WILL END—CONTROLS AS A METHOD OF FIGHTING INFLATION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. The hon. gentleman said last Monday in the House that the law clearly stipulates that contracts cannot continue after December, 1978, even though I think there is a twist in the law which might permit the government to continue them after that date. Since the parliamentary secretary said a week ago that controls will not end by the end of 1977 because the expectations of Canadians have not decreased to the level where we can accept voluntary restraints, I should like to ask whether the government has now abandoned all hope of ending controls before the end of next year?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Clarke: In view of the continued presence and even acceleration of high inflation despite some 18 months of controls, is the minister still satisfied with controls as the main attack on inflation?

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, sir.

ENERGY

POSSIBILITY OF EXPANDING HOME INSULATION PROGRAM IN NEWFOUNDLAND—DEVELOPMENT OF GULL ISLAND PROJECT

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that the increases in oil prices agreed to at the conference yesterday will cause serious hardship to the Province of Newfoundland which is already torn asunder by increases in fuel prices affecting low income-earners, is the minister now prepared to expand the insulation program, or Enersave, in that province to alleviate the serious situation?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I am pleased the hon. member mentioned Enersave. I think the response in Newfoundland to this federal initiative for energy saving has been almost 100 per cent. I think it has demonstrated to Newfoundlanders the real opportunities for energy saving which exist. As to whether we shall be able to provide any help additional to that which we have provided and are now providing to Newfoundland, I am not in a position to give the hon. member any information at this point. I do know that energy ministers all across the country are addressing themselves to the question of what additional measures they, and we, may be able to take in the near future. Perhaps in a matter of a few months I shall be in a position to say more.

[Mrs. Campagnolo.]

Mr. Marshall: The minister realizes the need to develop alternate sources of supply. Has any progress been made to help the province develop the Gull Island site?

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member would be helping his cause and the cause of Newfoundlanders if he would ask the premier of Newfoundland to get on with the job of providing me with the information. I have been waiting for six weeks now, for information which was promised to me much earlier.

AGRICULTURE

EFFECT OF OIL PRICE INCREASE ON COST OF PRODUCTION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. The Science Council of Canada stated that the food and agriculture sectors of the economy in this country consume about 28 per cent of the petroleum products used. Since there is to be another price hike amounting to about $2 per barrel on oil, may I ask whether the minister has studied the impact of this increase on food prices? If he has, what does he intend to do about it? Is he considering tax cuts or other benefits of that nature for farmers and fishermen?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): The government's concern in this area is evident from its actions. The fact is, we are taking care of our farmers in a better manner than ever before. We have surpassed the United States in the measure of aid we give to farmers through our stabilization programs and the marketing programs available to our farmers. In most instances these costs are taken into consideration and if necessary we use the stabilization legislation as a further measure of assistance.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF STUDY OF IMPACT OF RISING ENERGY COSTS ON PRICE OF FOOD

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): In view of that totally useless answer I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Would he tell us whether his department is making any study of the impact the rising energy costs will have on the price of food, the Science Council having stated that food and agriculture use about 28 per cent of the petroleum used in Canada?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): My department is not equipped to carry out research of that sort.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

REASON INDUSTRIAL WAGES INCREASING AT RATE ABOVE GUIDELINES—RESTORATION OF COMPETITIVE TRADING POSITION

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that Statistics Canada has reported that average weekly earnings increased by nearly 10 per cent in the 12 months ending in February—a rate considerably in excess of the second year wage guidelines under the anti-inflation program—can the minister explain to the House why, after well over a year of controls, average industrial wages are still increasing at rates well above the wage guidelines?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer is extremely complex because all wages are not necessarily controlled in Canada. Businesses with fewer than 500 employees are not submitted to the controls, and I shall have a look at the figures which were mentioned this afternoon by the hon. member and give him a more explicit answer tomorrow.

[English]

Mr. Darling: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Noting that the latest available measures indicate that Canadian average industrial wages are rising at a rate of some 4 per cent faster than comparable wage rates in the United States, can the minister explain to the House what factors led the Minister of Finance to pronounce so confidently in his budget speech that the erosion in our competitive position was being checked, and can he indicate to the House when he expects some progress to be made towards the restoration of our competitive position?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think it is evident that since last year, when the Canadian dollar went from $1 to 95 cents U.S., we have substantially improved our competitive position.

TRADE

EFFECT OF INCREASED PRICE OF EXPORTS ON TRADING POSITION

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As Canadian export prices have increased 18 per cent in the first two months of this year, can the minister tell the House why this sudden increase has occurred, whether it will likely continue for the balance of the year, and will it erode our export position?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, according to the forecasts for the current year, we are doing quite well on the export market in spite of the increase mentioned by the hon. member.

TRANSPORT

POSSIBILITY OF DREDGING THE SHIPPING CHANNEL AT QUEBEC CITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport?

Could the minister tell the House whether the government will soon be in a position to consider the representations which have been made by the Quebec Urban Community and the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Metropolitan Quebec about dredging to 41 feet the shipping channel of the port of Quebec City?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we had asked for tenders at several depths, and on examining the tenders it did appear that we would be able to get a very good price at the 41 foot level. I have today joined in announcing that that would be done. This, of course, respects the representations of members of parliament from the Quebec region as well as from the city and chamber, to the effect that the development of that area very much depends upon that extra depth. Therefore, we decided to go ahead with it and act immediately, in the hope that the dredging can be completed by November of this year. That is our expectation and we will deal with the question of appropriate cost recovery in another manner.

ENERGY

REASON FOR CLAIMING STATEMENTS AGENT NOT USED IN SALE OF CANDU REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA FALSE

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my questions are for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and are further to those raised Monday regarding the fee paid to Shaul Eisenberg on the sale of a CANDU reactor to South Korea. Having read the report from the Canadian embassy in Seoul which quoted the ex-president of Korean Electric Company as having said that Eisenberg performed the normal liaison functions of a commercial agent, and as well having read and listened to the statements of the vice-president and the executive vice-president of that same company who state categorically that there was no connection with an agent and that the Korean Electric Company negotiated directly with AECL for the sale of the CANDU reactor, can the minister say on what basis he makes the claim that the statements of these two top ranking officials of the Korean Electric Company are false, as he did in the House on Monday?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, based on the testimony of the senior officer who was present at the time. May I say I think the hon. lady is referring to another press report which appeared in a Toronto newspaper this morning. If that is the source of her information, I have been told that the two persons who gave that information were not members of the Korean Electric Company at the time so they did not have first-hand knowledge of the events at that time. If she wants to put further questions on this matter, though, I suggest to her that perhaps the right person to ask would be Mr. Campbell, the chairman of AECL, when he appears before the committee. I believe that the public accounts committee will be meeting next week and that is surely the place to pursue her inquiries.

Miss MacDonald: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Having put numerous questions to Mr. Campbell on this already with no response forthcoming, I should like to ask the minister this question. Given the fact that there has been very little information forthcoming to the public accounts committee, and vouchers to substantiate the $15 million in payment of fees to Mr. Eisenberg have not been produced, and since both Eisenberg and Korean officials refuse to appear before the public accounts committee and we are now presented with two quite strikingly different accounts of Mr. Eisenberg's activities, is the minister satisfied that this brief report from the Canadian embassy in Seoul is sufficient to warrant the expenditure of some $15 million of public moneys as an agent's fee? In other words, is this as far as the government is prepared to go to satisfy itself that this money of the Canadian taxpayer has not been misspent?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I want to help the hon. lady and I will do everything I can.

Miss MacDonald: Answer the question then.

Mr. Gillespie: We have gone to the source where we think the information is likely to be accurate. She is quoting from a newspaper report based on the supposed statements, the alleged statements, of two persons who were not even there at the time. If she is not satisfied with that information, let her put those questions to Mr. Campbell.

Miss MacDonald: I have.

[Miss MacDonald.]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question for the minister is supplementary. Will he not establish a revolutionary precedent in this House by admitting that he does not know what he is talking about and is only parroting the statements made to him by his advisers, who have a vested interest in concealing the facts on this issue?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PROPOSED PAYMENT OF TRAVELLING COSTS OF CATCA AND CALPA EXECUTIVES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Transport. Would the Minister of Transport shed a little light on his attitude respecting the invoicing of CALPA and CATCA in connection with trips made by executives of those two organizations to Ottawa about a year ago at the request of the minister's departmental advisers, who helped resolve the very serious air travel situation existing in this country at the time and indicate whether or not he is prepared to rescind or to cancel those invoices and arrange to have whatever billing is necessary paid for out of departmental accounts?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not yet prepared to comment on that question. I had not been aware until very recently that there was any dispute about it, and I have not received a report.

• (1450)

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I understand correctly the minister's comments on this matter that is now before him, to which he is directing some of his attention, that perhaps we will have an answer within a week?

POST OFFICE

TORONTO—MEASURES TO IMPROVE SERVICE—COMPLAINT OF INDEPENDENT BUSINESSMEN'S ASSOCIATION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General whom I trust will help to resolve the current confusion in the mail service in the Toronto area. Has the Postmaster General been made aware of the test conducted recently by Alderman Ying Hope on mail delivery in Toronto, where only five of 49 letters reached their destination overnight; some took over a week to deliver; and six letters never arrived at all? In view of the vital importance of a reliable speedy mail service in the Toronto area, will the minister launch a wide-scale investigation in an attempt to resolve the problem and give the city of Toronto the quality of mail service it urgently requires?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): And that it has been used to, I might add, Mr. Speaker. As I indicated to the hon. gentleman in committee, when we were dealing with the estimates, the situation in Toronto is an aberration that is of short duration. It is one that was brought about as a result of the acceleration of the program of transferring from the manual sorting in terminal A to the three postal plants. As of Monday of this week, the backlog represented one shift in Toronto, and that was concentrated in the south central plant.

With reference to Mr. Ying Hope's experiment, I am not personally familiar with his experimentation or what the criteria were that he employed in conducting his test. All I know is that it is an old test, and surely he has received all the pieces of mail. The discrepancy in the usual service provided, which is the service he has been used to, was due to what I have just advanced to the hon. gentleman, namely, a temporary aberration and one that we are sure has now been removed. I am now asking all members if they have any specific instances of difficulty which they are encountering to make me personally aware of them so that I can check them all out.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is with regard to the same subject. I am sure the alderman agrees that "hope" springs eternal in these matters. Arising from the complaints of the Independent Businessmen's Association with regard to the fact that mail is so slow in the Toronto area and that the cancellation date on envelopes is no longer accepted as a payment date for outstanding accounts, would the Postmaster General also investigate this problem to see if he can resolve it as well?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, I am very interested in the opinions of small businessmen and of the federation as well. We depend on them as they depend on us. I am not aware of the substance of the representations of the hon. gentleman having been made by the Canadian Federation of Independent Businessmen. I will look at those representations and see what can be done.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ALLEGED REFUSAL OF MONTREAL EMPLOYEES TO PROVIDE SERVICE IN ENGLISH—DATE OF REPORT ON BILINGUAL BONUS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the hon. President of the Treasury Board who is responsible for so many matters affecting the Public Service. My question is prompted by reports in the press this last day or so indicating that a language boycott has been organized by some 13,000 public servants in the Montreal area by refusing to provide services in the English language until certain conditions are met. I am wondering whether the minister can say what steps he and his government are taking to restore these services to the taxpayers of Montreal?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the situation could be described as being somewhat hypothetical because, other than the press reports, there have been no communications to us about this action. As of this moment, the best information I have—and I have checked with all departments—is that there are in fact no instances of refusal to serve in both official languages. Thus, it is more of a threat than concrete action at the moment.

Having said that, I want to clearly indicate those people in Quebec or anywhere else, who are incumbents of designated bilingual positions, clearly understand that their duties are to perform a service and to deliver information and services in both official languages to the populace as requested. That is the official policy of this government, and indeed it will be enforced. Dealing only with the press report, because there have been no other indications of this issue, compensation bonus is one of the issues which is subject to final determination when we complete the deep analysis of the implementation of the official languages policy which is now under way. We anticipate that completion within a few weeks.

The other issue is an apparent request to reduce the number of bilingual positions in Quebec, which is rather interesting to us because just a year or so ago the very same people, who are now complaining about it, were pressing for an increase in the number of bilingual positions in that area. Indeed, we might favour their newer proposal rather than their earlier one.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the minister has been able to clear this up. It is perhaps pressure tactics on the part of that group. I am wondering if the minister has any comment to make about the study undertaken, which started about two years ago, concerning the bonus, and whether in fact there is some date that can be looked forward to for the publication of this report and its implementation?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, there was an earlier statement by the government that such action would be effective. That would be, of course, retroactive to November 1, 1976. At that time it was clearly indicated—and I think the unions fully understand—that it was a very complex single issue. There was the question of methodology, the question of amounts and the question of criteria for making available such compensation. That complexity has been further exacerbated because it is totally related to the announced intention of the government to review its official languages implementation policy, not the least important of which would be the delineation of the number of designated bilingual positions which would carry access to such compensation when implemented. I also heard comments by union spokesmen that they fully recognized the first thing that should take place, which is the announcement of the new implementation policy of the Official Languages Act when that is available. As I indicated in my previous answer, that is likely to be forthcoming before the end of this session hopefully, but I would think within the next few weeks.

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON WHETHER MR. JUSTICE BERGER EXCEEDED MANDATE

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. He indicated earlier that Dr. Brooks has been misquoted by the press. I would like to give the minister a quote of his own to see whether he has been misquoted. This appeared in the Alaska press two days ago. The article quoted the minister as saying that no one invited Mr. Berger to recommend against a pipeline. Would the minister advise the House as to whether he was misquoted? If he was not misquoted, would he advise the House whether it is now the government's position that Mr. Justice Berger has exceeded his mandate in the Berger report?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, on a number of occasions I have lauded the Berger report as a very comprehensive document and indeed a very eloquent statement. I have nothing further to add at this time.

NATIONAL INSULATION AND TAR SANDS PROGRAMS—MINISTER'S PREFERENCE FOR FUNDING

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to find out, first of all, if the minister made the statement. Second, the minister indicated, when he announced the insulation program in Nova Scotia, that the cost of gaining an extra barrel of oil by saving it is a fraction of the cost of finding and producing the same barrel. I commend the minister for that statement.

In view of the fact if we had a national insulation program that we would save more energy than we can get out of the Mackenzie Delta and it would be at one third of the cost; in view of the fact that the minister has two programs in front of the Treasury Board—one a national insulation program and the other another tar sands program—and in view of what the minister said about conservation, would the minister advise which one of those two programs he wishes to have funded? Would it be the national insulation program or the extra tar sands?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would recommend to the hon. member that he reread "Energy Strategy for Canada—Policies for Self-Reliance". If he does, he will see the kind of gap we are faced with—the gap between domestic production and foreign imports of oil—that is to say, the problem of reducing a growing dependence on foreign oil which is what the situation will be in 1985 if we do not increase our conservation efforts, bring on a tar sands plan and bring down our resources from the north. We will be in real difficulty.

● (1500)

Mr. Leggatt: My final supplementary question is this, Mr. Speaker. On the program for national insulation some provinces have indicated acceptance and some have indicated refusal. Why does the minister not proceed with the national program with the provinces that have accepted and are willing to go on with the program, so that we can make some energy decisions?

[Mr. Andras.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Come on, Alastair, up on your feet.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAMBERT (BELLECHASSE)—ALLEGATION OF BIAS IN RADIO-CANADA

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) rose on a question of privilege in connection with a news bulletin issued by a Radio-Canada reporter and reflecting on the political loyalty of the hon. member for Bellechasse.

I have examined most attentively this question of privilege, together with the following motion:

That considering the prejudice to my reputation as the hon. member for Bellechasse, this House request Radio-Canada to set the facts straight as soon as possible.

I have considered a number of precedents, especially that of the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) on May 20, 1976. I suggest the two cases are similar. This issue of the objectivity of the media is often discussed in the House following questions of privilege. It would be difficult, however, to claim that the quality of the information spread by the press could warrant a question of privilege.

As I indicated in the decision I rendered on May 20, 1976, we must take into account here a basic right which is as important as parliamentary privileges, namely the right of the freedom of the press which must not be interfered with, except in cases of very serious contempt of Parliament, which is not the case today. The hon. member for Bellechasse certainly entertains an important grievance but, on the basis of our precedents and parliamentary practice, I must regretfully find that this is not a true question of privilege.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Postmaster General in his position as deputy House leader. I should like to ask whether he can inform us of the business of the House for the balance of this week. I understand he is prepared to designate two days next week as opposition days. If he could do that, I would be grateful.

I wonder, at the same time, if he could tell the House the intentions of the government with respect to the notice of motion appearing in the name of the President of the Privy Council respecting the question of northern gas pipelines. It appears on page VIII of todays order paper. I am really interested in knowing the purpose of the motion. Is it merely as window-dressing, or is it the intention of the government to bring in that motion for debate quickly and, if so, is it the intention of the government to bring the motion on in such a way that the matter may come to a vote? I really want to know why it is there.

Mr. Blais: I had hoped the hon. gentleman, in raising his point of order, would seek information and would refrain from editorializing or engaging in debate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: If the hon. member is interested in knowing the business of the House, I would be pleased to inform him. If he wants to engage in debate on various items on the order paper, we can oblige him as well. I am pleased to advise him that we will be continuing today with Bill C-51. Tomorrow is an opposition day, as the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton knows. On Monday we will resume debate on Bill C-51 and, I hope, dispose of it—if we do not do so today. I hope we might refer it to the committee this afternoon.

An hon. Member: Don't editorialize.

Mr. Blais: Then we will proceed with Bill C-38, the fisheries and environment bill. Subsequently, we will deal with the customs tariff, the excise tax legislation, followed by the Bretton Woods Agreements Act. As well, we will be dealing with allotted days on Wednesday and Thursday of next week, as the hon. gentleman has indicated. We hope that the items I have enumerated will take us through next Friday. With reference to the item on the order paper mentioned by the hon. member, I have a great deal of respect for the President of the Privy Council and I believe that when he puts an item on the order paper it is there, not as window-dressing but as a substantive item to be dealt with by the House.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am surprised that the deputy House leader should think I am editorializing, when I speak so gently to him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I asked him two questions which may have escaped him. He has indicated that the President of the Privy Council seriously put the motion on the order paper. I asked him two questions arising out of it. He can tell me if he has no instructions, and if he has instructions I would appreciate an answer. Is it the intention of the government to arrange to bring that matter to a vote? If that is the case, would he be prepared to discuss that motion? Also, can he tell the House when the motion will be brought forward? It deals with an important matter. If he does not have instructions on this, let him say so today and I can put my question to the government House leader. If he does, can he answer the questions?

Mr. Blais: First of all, Mr. Speaker, I have announced the business for next week. It is not the habit of the House leader or the deputy House leader to deal with a matter of that importance without due consultation with all the representatives of the other parties. Today we have not discussed that; we have not entered into any discussions relating to that item. When it is time to discuss that item and negotiate the time the House is ready to allow, the hon. gentleman from Grenville-Carleton will be advised.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): In other words, you don't know.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think the Postmaster General has indicated why there is some concern about this motion. It was understood there would be a discussion among the House leaders about a possible debate on the northern pipeline situation, so it comes as a surprise to us that a motion is on the order paper without that discussion having taken place. But in view of the question asked by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton about the motion coming to a vote, may I ask what is the point of having a vote on a motion which simply says we will not take any decision?

Mr. Woolliams: It has been done before.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FORTIN—ALLEGATION OF BIAS IN RADIO-CANADA

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise a question of privilege. I could not do so before since I just received this answer to a question I had asked the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) through the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about the by-election coverage by Radio-Canada of the Social Credit Party of Canada. Here is the answer, and I submit that our privileges are actually affected. This answer comes from the Secretary of State himself.

Dear Sir:

As I had promised in my answer to your oral question on May 3, 1977, I am happy to inform you that I have received from Radio-Canada a report about the news coverage made last weekend on the by-elections.

Radio-Canada has given me the following information:

The French TV network initiated in the middle of April a first series of programs regarding the by-elections to be held at the end of May.

One must then not assess the value of the coverage on the first part alone.

The objective of those programs was not to take stock of all nominations in each riding, partly because all parties do not yet have candidates in all ridings, and the nominations are not all made.

The objective was to give a preliminary picture of the ridings with the main forces already in place and committed for sure in the election campaign.

Now, Mr. Speaker, here is where our privileges are violated.

In Langelier and Louis-Hébert, the candidates already identified and campaigning at the time of the program were Liberals Lamontagne and Dawson and Conservatives Hamel and Lavoie. Apparently the third parties had not yet fielded candidates.

So far, this is true.

In Terrebonne—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) and to refer him to the provisions of the rules of the House, and in particular to Standing Order 17 which reads as follows:

17.(2) Unless notice of motion has been given under Standing Order 42, any Member proposing to raise a question of privilege other than one arising out of proceedings in the Chamber during the course of a sitting shall give to the Speaker a written statement of the question at least one hour prior to the opening of a sitting.

I shall particularly underline for the hon. member Standing Order 17 (2). Unfortunately, in the absence of the formal notice described in this subsection, it is impossible at this time to hear a question of privilege.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I could not give you a notice in accordance with the rules of the House, because I have just received this answer. This is a question of urgent and pressing necessity since the by-election is underway and since this discrimination objected to by the Secretary of State himself and the Prime Minister is continuing.

Mr. Speaker, I raised myself that very question in the House. As I was saying:

In Terrebonne, two leading personalities are engaged in the by-election bout, Liberal Comtois and Conservative Delorme. Our reporting related to the campaign already launched and to the fight that was already going on.

Mr. Speaker, I contend that it is Radio-Canada management which decides by-election results. They decide to eliminate systematically Social Credit candidates from their information programs. Our candidate for Terrebonne has been nominated since March 9. This information was conveyed by Telbec to Radio-Canada as well as other electronic media during a press conference which was held in Sainte-Thérèse city hall. Therefore, Radio-Canada was aware of that fact. The Prime Minister and the Secretary of State undertook to inquire about that fact so as to ensure that our party was being fairly treated. Is there or is there not any democracy in this country, Mr. Speaker?

Radio-Canada decides by-election results by ignoring Social Credit nominations in its news bulletin. That is how they totally ignored our candidate in their letter. And moreover, Mr. Speaker, the letter states the following:

In Verdun, our reporting insisted particularly on the nomination of a surprise candidate from the NDP, a well known personality among consumers.

No mention is being made of Liberal, Progressive Conservative and surely not of Social Credit candidates. Mr. Speaker, Radio-Canada has no right to interfere in the democratic rules of this country.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is obvious that the hon. member for Lotbinière is not raising a question a privilege under the Standing Orders, but he certainly makes a grievance, maybe against Radio-Canada. The grievance was adequately set out by the hon. member this afternoon. He expressed himself in strong and clear terms. When recognizing the hon. member for Lotbinière, I gave him, I think, a very reasonable opportunity to formulate and air his grievances against Radio-Canada but it is in no way a question of privilege, in the sense of the rules regarding the rights of members of the House. Perhaps this is a grievance introduced by a political party which does not involve the executive or the government in the House, as far as procedure is concerned, but a grievance from a political party against Radio-Canada. The grievance was well handled, expressed and set out very clearly and vigorously by the hon. member for Lotbinière, but technically this is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order prompted by the exchange between the House leader of our party, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, and the Postmaster General who occasionally, when he is not looking after the Post Office, doubles as deputy House leader. It involves the very serious issue which involves the opposition day tomorrow and the motion in the name of the government House leader dated May 11, 1977, dealing with the question of northern pipelines. If we are to believe the press releases and other information from the New Democratic Party—the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre nods his head, and I give to the nod of his head the same acceptance as if it were made under oath—

An hon. Member: He is just clearing his ears.

Mr. Baldwin: —the issue tomorrow will be a question dealing with the Berger report on these pipelines. This is a very important issue for parliament and this country. We all have reason to believe that the Prime Minister has made a secret agreement with President Carter.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Baldwin: During the time this House will be in recess the government will make decisions which will be irrevocable. We in this House demand the right to debate and discuss this matter, to move amendments and to put questions. This question was raised yesterday and the day before. An indication was made by the government House leader that some opportunity would be given for this. If that is the case, it may well be that the motion appearing in the name of the President of the Privy Council represents that view of the government and that that is the decision. If that is the case, we should be advised, because tomorrow we will be debating an issue on which there will be a vote and which is subject to amendment, and by that vote and by that amendment we may be binding ourselves to a very narrow issue and preventing ourselves from debating the rather broader issue which the government may want to raise.

We may be finding we are irrevocably prohibited from debating, moving amendments and having the question put on the whole issue of the development of northern pipelines, what we do about the native peoples, the environment, the ecology, and so on. I think there is a responsibility on the government before tomorrow to tell us truthfully and honestly, if the government can bring itself down to that level, precisely what its intentions are with regard to this motion. Otherwise, there may be decisions made which may make it impossible for us to proceed.

I suggest that if we are to have meaningful debates in this House which are of some value, we should have them in light of what is proposed in advance. If the government's intentions with regard to this motion in the name of the President of the Privy Council are to be realistic, it may well be that the Minister without Portfolio has been appointed as the spokesman for the government on this, and it may be that he is able to respond to me and say what are the government's intentions. He nods his head. I expect him to rise after I have spoken and tell us what the government is going to do. However, I suggest that this parliament has fallen to low enough levels at the insurance of the government and that it should not be allowed to handle this matter in this way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, in view of the remarks just made by the hon. member for Peace River, it is interesting to observe how the opposition performs when it is in a box.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Goodale: The difference between the suggested wording of the two motions, the one on the order paper in the name of the President of the Privy Council and the one described in general terms by the House leader for the New Democratic Party, indicates very clearly a difference in approach on this particular point. I do not think there is a problem presented to the House as the hon. member for Peace River has described. The President of the Privy Council has indicated that parliament will have a significant role to play with respect to this question. The acting House leader, the Postmaster General, indicated a few moments ago that the motion appearing on the order paper in the name of the President of the Privy Council is not an exercise in window-dressing; it is a serious proposal and one which parliament will have to consider.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) on a point of order.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I am referring to Standing Order 17(2), page 14, where it is said that any member proposing to raise a question of privilege other than one arising out of the proceedings during the course of the sitting is allowed to do so by giving to the Speaker a written statement of the question at least one hour prior to the opening of the sitting. The question of privilege I raised referred to a question and to the proceedings of the House. Therefore, the letter I mentioned and which gives evidence that Radio-Canada has inopportunely decided of the result—

Mr. Speaker: Order! The point raised by the hon. member for Lotbinière certainly did not arise from the proceedings which took place during this afternoon sitting. This is quite clear. If the question had been about events which took place this afternoon during the oral question period, it would not have been necessary for the hon. member to give the Chair notice of the question. That goes without saying but if it has to do with the proceedings of a previous day, under the rules of this House a notice is required. That too is quite clear.

I recognize the hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I do not want, as the Standing Orders say, to challenge the decision of the Chair, but you did admit earlier that my colleague from Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) has a valid grievance. From now on we will not be able to talk to one another without being filmed and without Radio-Canada being able to interpret that the way it wants. You just stated that this is an excellent grievance. Well, Mr. Speaker, nowhere in the Standing Orders does the word "grievance" appear, and that means we are going to go into the by-elections without of any kind of possible recourse.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Lotbinière can certainly understand that I already gave him ten minutes this afternoon just to allow him to make a point that is undoubtedly a grievance. I recognized him and allowed him ten minutes to state this grievance, but it is indeed a grievance, and not a question of privilege.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker—

MR. CHRIS PATTERSON—FRENCH LANGUAGE TRAINING

Question No. 182—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is Mr. Chris Patterson, Senior Operations Officer for the Unemployment Insurance Commission at Belleville, Ontario, presently taking a course in the French language at the government operated Asticou Language School in Hull, Quebec and, if so (a) on what date did his course commence and on what date is it estimated that it will conclude (b) what funds have been expended to date on behalf of Mr. Patterson including accommodation, meals, etc. (c) what is the total estimated cost of his entire course upon completion?

2. Has the government at any time used Loyalist College in Belleville, Ontario, for employees of UIC in Belleville to study the French language and, if so, for what reason did Mr. Patterson not take his course in the city of his employment?

3. Does Mr. Patterson's French course at Hull, Quebec, create more cost to the taxpayer than if he took it in Belleville, Ontario?

4. What is the cost of a French course for UIC employees at the Loyalist College in Belleville, Ontario, based on any charges paid by the government for such courses in the past?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Unemployment Insurance and the Public Service Commissions as follows: 1. Yes. (a) Commenced August 9, 1976, with a possible duration of 52 weeks. (b) As of September 30, 1976: $1,632.62 (c) $8,800 provided that the course is of 52 weeks' duration.

2. Yes, Courses were not available at Mr. Patterson's level of learning ability as established by P.S.C. diagnostic tests.

3. No. To take the course in Belleville would require the establishment of a special class with private tutors.

4. The staff development branch of the Public Service Commission has a contract with Loyalist College in Belleville for the teaching of French. The contract is for one year, from July 1, 1976 to June 30, 1977. It calls for the payment of $35 per group-hour, with five to eight students per group. The cost is met by the branch from its appropriations budget, and is not charged back to the participating departments. The size and composition of any group may vary from time to time, depending on the number of students who require training, and the length of time required by any individual student for completion of his or her training.

IMPROVEMENT AND MAINTENANCE OF RAILWAY TRACKS

Question No. 328—Mr. Orlikow:

Have the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railway increased programs of improvement of standard of track and maintenance of some which will require more staff, more and better material, such as new, heavier rail and fastening, and more work equipment as recommended by the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission on April, 1973 and, if so, how much has this staff been increased?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The Canadian Transport Commission advises as follows: Canadian Pacific Limited: Since 1973 CP Rail has installed over 1,200 miles of heavier section new rail and fastenings, including 215 miles of special chromium alloy rail, together with 200 additional miles of heavier section rail in their relay rail program. Heavier rail section, whether new or relay, is mainly installed as continuous welded rail or welded in lengths of 78 feet or 72 feet. Approximately 300,000 larger tie plates have been installed since 1973 and six-hole joint bars are now being used. Over this period, almost 5,000,000 treated track ties have been installed along with a test section of 1,300 concrete ties in the Pacific Region. Ballasting has been carried out on 2,600 miles of track since 1973. In 1973, a track-recording car was placed into service and each year 26,000 miles of track are tested. During this period, 96 bridges have been replaced and over $7.5 million was spent on additional roadway machines. The actual number of employees involved is difficult to ascertain, but the following has been developed as the actual man-hours worked during the period of 1973 to 1975 as follows:

Year	Man-Hours Worked Maintenance of way only
1973	13,283,055
1975	14,004,873

Canadian National Railways: Since 1973 CN Rail has installed 2,035 miles of heavier section new rail. Major grade stabilization, tie renewal and ballast improvement projects were carried out as required in conjunction with the installation of heavier rail. During the next five years CN Rail proposes to install approximately 2,000 track miles of new rail, together with grade stabilization, tie renewal and ballast improvement work. In addition, a program for the installation of concrete ties in heavy curve areas on its Transcontinental main line between Capreol, Ontario, and Vancouver, British Columbia has been initiated. Approximately 1,500,000 concrete ties, equivalent to over 550 track miles, will be in place by 1981. A substantial investment in track maintenance equipment has been made in conjunction with the track renewal program. In 1977 an additional $4.5 million in operating funds has been allocated to field activities to retain a high standard of maintenance throughout the system. The actual number of additional employees involved is difficult to ascertain, but the following has been developed as the actual manpower count of maintenance of way employees, excluding management:

Year	Maintenance of Way Manpower

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Question No. 1,868—Mr. Allard:

1. In (a) 1973-74 (b) 1974-75 (c) 1975-76, what was the amount of operating and investment expenditures of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in each province and territory?

2. For the same years, what amount did the government recover from the provincial and municipal governments in the (a) western provinces (b) Maritimes?

3. For the same years, how many RCMP officers were posted in each province and territory?

4. What are the RCMP's areas of activity in the Province of Quebec?

Order Paper Questions

4. The activities of the RCMP in the province of Quebec center around the maintaining of national security and the enforcing of all federal statutes and executive orders. The RCMP also provide investigative and protective services to other federal departments and agencies, and provide investigative assistance to other Canadian and foreign police forces upon request. The RCMP Security Service collects information touching on Canada's internal security relative to subversive activity, including espionage, as defined in section 16(3) of the Official Secrets Act. Security inquiries are also conducted on employees of the government of Canada or applicants for employment who occupy or will occupy positions requiring security clearance.

GRANTS FOR SHIPBUILDING

Question No. 2,092—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

1. For the fiscal year (a) 1973-74 (b) 1974-75 (c) 1975-76 (d) 1976-77 to date, did the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce provide grants to the shipbuilding industry and, if so (i) to which firms (ii) in each case, what amount?

2. For the same years, how many workers were employed in each shipyard and for each category of worker, what was the average hourly rate of pay?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Insofar as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: 1. (a) see Public Accounts of Canada, volume 11, Section 35, pages 21-22 (1973/74); (b) see Public Accounts of Canada, volume 11, Section 35, page 19 (1974/75); (c) see Public Accounts of Canada, volume 11, Section 35 page 21 (1974/76); (d) see following list.

NOTE: All grants and contributions are included in the amounts given.

2. This information is considered commercially confidential and could be released only by permission of each of the companies listed in the reply to Part 1 of above question.

CANADA WORKS AND YOUNG CANADA WORKS PROGRAMS—ADVERTISING

Question No. 2,148—Mr. Brisco:

1. What was the cost to date of all advertising in newspapers and other media to promote in 1977 the (a) Canada Works Programme (b) Young Canada Works Programme?

2. What was the total cost of advertising in newspapers in the Constituency of Kootenay West for the (a) Canada Works Programme (b) Young Canada Works Programme?

3. What was the total amount allocated to the Constituency of Kootenay West for the funding of the (a) Canada Works Programme (b) Young Canada Works Programme?

4. What was the total amount of all applications received from the Constituency of Kootenay West for the (a) Canada Works Programme (b) Young Canada Works Programme?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. (a) and (b) The Canada Works and Young Canada Works advertising programs were combined in one advertising campaign; Cost to date: 985,259.68.

2. (a) and (b) As noted above, campaigns were combined. Cost: $2,860.43

3. (a) Subsequent to the provision of an additional $50 million to the first phase of the Canada Works program, a supplementary allocation of $72,000 was made to Kootenay West, for a total allocation of $225,000. Under the program's second phase, the constituency will of course receive a share of the some $120 million to be committed to direct job creation. (b) Subsequent to the provision of an additional $20 million to this year's Young Canada Works program, the constituency of Kootenay West received a supplementary allocation of $51,000, for a total allocation of $117,000.

4. (a) $1,512,487; (b) $517,895.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES INVESTIGATING CRIMINAL ACTIVITIES

Question No. 2,165—Mr. Stevens:

As of December 31 (a) 1968 (b) 1976, what was the number of federal employees engaged in investigating criminal activities?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned: (a) During the course of their duties, some 215 employees were involved in investigating violations of the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act. (b) Approximately 350 employees were involved in investigating violations of those acts mentioned in part (a) as well as violations of the Radiation Emitting Devices Act.

In so far as the Department of National Revenue is concerned: (a) General records disposal schedules of the government of Canada require that records be retained for a five-year period only. Therefore, information is not available. (b) 634.

In so far as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is concerned: (a) 5,341; (b) 8,787.

FEDERAL INSPECTION OF MEAT

Question No. 2,167—Mr. Stevens:

As of December 31 (a) 1968 (b) 1976, what was the number of federal employees engaged in the inspection of meat and poultry for purity?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as Agriculture Canada is concerned: (a) 970; (b) 1,381.

In so far as Health and Welfare Canada is concerned: in 1968, the Health Protection Branch (then the Food and Drug Directorate) employed approximately 150 inspectors. By December 31, 1976, the figure had risen to approximately 225. These inspectors undertake activities related to food, drug, cosmetics, medical devices and radiation emitting devices. Slightly more than half of these inspectors spend their time on food safety matters. The inspection organization is involved in a wide variety of food commodities, including meat and poultry, fruits and vegetables, dairy products and beverages. The main responsibility for meat inspection in Canada lies with the Department of Agriculture. Health Protection Branch inspectors do visit some meat plants. Specimens of various meats are obtained at both the retail and manufacturing level and are analyzed for microbiological and chemical content and, in some cases, for nutritional concerns.

FEDERAL INSPECTION OF IMPORTED GOODS

Question No. 2,168—Mr. Stevens:

As of December 31 (a) 1968 (b) 1976, what was the number of federal employees engaged to inspect imported goods?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as Agriculture Canada is concerned: (a) 177; (b) 207. Departmental personnel devote only a portion of their time in the inspection of imported goods.

In so far as the Department of National Revenue is concerned: (a) General records disposal schedules of the government of Canada require that records be retained for a five-year period only. Therefore, information is not available. (b) 726.

In so far the Ministry of the Solicitor General is concerned: inasmuch as the inspection of goods imported into Canada is primarily the responsibility of Revenue Canada (Customs and Excise), this question has only limited application to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The RCMP has on occasion, been involved in investigations, and has acted on information received, which resulted in members of the force examining goods which were unlawfully or lawfully, imported into Canada. The majority of such members would have been attached to our customs and excise sections which, in 1968, had an approved establishment of 151, and in 1976, an approved establishment of 237. As these sections carried the dual responsibility for both Customs and Excise Acts enforcement, it is not possible to provide a further breakdown of responsibilities.

FEDERAL INSPECTION OF SHIPS

Question No. 2,176—Mr. Stevens:

As of December 31 (a) 1968 (b) 1976, what was the number of federal employees engaged to inspect ships arriving at Canadian ports?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as Agriculture Canada is concerned: (a) 30; (b) 33. Departmental personnel devote only a portion of their time in the examination of ships.

In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned: the number of quarantine officers employed to inspect ships arriving at Canadian ports: (a) 18; (b) 7.

In so far as Transport Canada is concerned: there are no employees in Transport Canada who were engaged exclusively to inspect ships arriving at Canadian ports. The number of employees on staff of the Ship Safety Branch of the Canadian Coast Guard available to inspect ships arriving at Canadian ports were: (a) as of December 31, 1968, 122.; (b) as of December 31, 1976, 176.

FUNDING WITHIN NATIONAL PARKS

Question No. 2,245—Mr. Brisco:

Are applications for funding by individuals, groups, organizations, municipalities or others within national parks given the same consideration as applications for funding from outside of national parks for (a) the New Horizons Programme (b) LIP (c) Canada Works (d) Young Canada Works and, if not, what are the details of the differences?

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of National Health and Welfare and Manpower and Immigration as follows: (a) Yes. (b) Yes. (c) Yes. (d) Yes.

PROLIFERATION OF NUCLEAR STATIONS

Question No. 2,307—Mr. Fortin:

Are there any laws limiting the proliferation of nuclear stations and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Atomic Energy Control Board reports as follows: no. However, the construction and operation of these stations are controlled by the Atomic Energy Control Board, pursuant to the Atomic Energy Control Act and Regulations.

PASSPORT APPLICATIONS FOR CHILDREN

Question No. 2,370—Mr. O'Sullivan:

1. Is it standard procedure for the Passport Office to require that parents of children 16 years and under, must have their children's passport applications and pictures signed by the same guarantor as the parents and, if so, for what reason?

2. Is there a stipulation on passport applications that a guarantor must have known the applicant for at least a period of two years?

3. Can the parent's guarantor sign the children's application and pictures if he/she has not known the children for the required period of time?

4. Would the signature of another guarantor fulfilling this time requirement be acceptable and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Children under 16 cannot apply on their own for passports. The parents apply and guarantors are required to know them for a minimum period of two years. While the guarantor generally could be expected to know the child for whom the passport is required, personal knowledge for a period of two years is not essential, particularly in the case of a very young child.

2. Yes.

3. See answer to part 1.

4. Not applicable.

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have the honour to inform the House that the following communication has been received on May 12, 1977.

Government House
Ottawa

May 12, 1977

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Jean Beetz, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor general, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 12th of May, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Esmond Butler
Secretary to the Governor General

Mr. Beaudoin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Richmond on a point of order.

Mr. Beaudoin: I would like to ask government members, members of the opposition, as well as the NDP and my own colleagues to hear me out concerning changes that have to be made to our rules.

Whenever we have grievances, cases of encroachment upon our parliamentary or private rights as representatives of a political party in this House, we cannot express them because our rules forbid it.

I would ask Your Honour to give the Committee on Procedure and Organization the possibility of changing our rules so that between the hours of 7 and 8 or 10 and 11 in the evening, we may express our grievances and obtain a reply from the minister responsible for the CBC, the Canadian National Railways, or any other agency to obtain a specific answer concerning our grievance.

At the present time, in the case mentioned by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), a serious grievance has been expressed in the House but according to our rules Your Honour does not have the possibility of allowing the minister responsible for the CBC or other agencies to reply. I hope that eventually we shall truly solve this problem once and for all.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Richmond has certainly raised an important and interesting question. In my opinion, one of the weaknesses of our procedure in Parliament is the lack of opportunities for private members to express grievances according to the Standing Orders; one aspect of the political life of an elected representative consists in expressing grievances in the House. In general, it is easy to do so by asking questions, but this is not absolutely perfect for this purpose. However, it is possible for a few members to ask questions at ten o'clock, but this is limited to two or three members maybe twice a week.

This is a very interesting question and I hope that the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization will be able to find a means to allow members to express their important grievances and to request an immediate reply from the government.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1977

AMENDMENTS TO CRIMINAL CODE

The House resumed, from Wednesday, May 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-51, to amend the Criminal Code, the Customs Tariff, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act and the Prisons and Reformatories Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, yesterday before debate on this bill concluded I gave the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) notice of my intention, as a solicitor, citizen and one charged with responsibility for making a decision on the bill in this House, to voice my concern about the electronic surveillance provisions of the bill. I said that if the minister was proposing a far-reaching change in law affecting the civil rights of people in society, then he is under the duty of explaining to the House of Commons why the practice established under that earlier bill introduced in the twenty-ninth parliament ought to be changed.

The minister did not, during his speech introducing this bill, deal with that point to any great extent. Perhaps he will differ with me. Nevertheless, I suggest he ought to deal with it substantially. He is asking the House to grant to our police forces powers they do not now possess under the law. If he seeks to change the law concerning privacy in this manner, he is under a heavy onus to prove the need.

I will not take up much of the time of the House. The opposition does not intend to delay this bill. Before concluding, I pay tribute to the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) whose remarks of yesterday on the content of this bill deserve the commendation of all hon. members. He showed how far our jurisprudence as interpreted by the courts has strayed from the law we thought we had established in 1973. By presenting his argument forcefully, clearly and succinctly, he did a great service not only to the legal profession and the courts but to parliament and the people of Canada.

We are all in his debt for the work that obviously he did in preparing his argument. It was well handled, well in keeping with his pre-eminence as a member of the Bar of Alberta.

I also pay tribute to the former member for St. Paul's, Mr. Ronald Atkey of Toronto, who served in this House in the twenty-ninth parliament. He led the battle in 1973 against the use of sophisticated electronic surveillance devices snooping into the day to day lives of Canadians and their documents. While such snooping may to a certain extent be inevitable in our society, he insisted, against the objections of the then minister of justice, on including in the bill then before the House certain safeguards or limitations governing the conditions under which surveillance could be carried out. I have read several times what he said in this House, and I commend to hon. members a reading of the speeches made on the bill in 1973.

I suggest that because of our determined opposition a sense of justice and fair play became evident in the government's approach to amending the Criminal Code. The amendments proposed under this bill can in part undo that which was fair and just. Therefore, we should not lie down, as it were, and say there is not a battle to be fought—because there is. Any time a free society accepts an amendment which without justification provides intrusion into the private lives of citizens by unusual and electronic means, by means too complicated for the ordinary citizen to understand, freedom in that society is diminished. That is what I am afraid of, and that illustrates my concern about this bill.

As reported in Hansard at page 3477 of May 7, 1973, Mr. Ronald Atkey spoke these words in the House of Commons:

> To put my jurisprudential premise at its simplest, I believe that in a free society the right to privacy should be protected by law and that there should be derogations from this protection only where public need is clearly demonstrated by those who seek to use means to invade privacy in a rational way for the public good. The onus should always be on those invading privacy, not on those seeking the legal protection of the right.

Those are important words, straightforward and easy to understand, whether one is legally trained or not. Simply and fairly, they put forward the proposition the minister must answer. Really, the minister is saying that society in general, the members of which are just as interested as the Attorney General of Canada in defending individual rights, should grant the minister those powers he seeks in the bill without asking him to defend his request for such powers. We take that position. It is important for the House of Commons to speak loudly, and for its members to protest loudly against the government's attempt, no matter whether it is well-intentioned, to intrude one step further into the right of privacy, the right of civil liberty, the rights which accrue to any member of a free society, without first coming to parliament or one of its committees to justify what it is doing. They have not done so thus far. Until they do, this bill is a suspicious one, and the onus that is on the government as set forth by Mr. Atkey has not been satisfied.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we heard speeches by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) and the main spokesmen of the opposition parties. I have never heard such an exchange of flattering remarks concerning the Minister of Justice, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), and the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt). In fact, I heard somebody say they were statesman-like speeches. My definition of a statesman is a dead politician. Therefore, I am not going to make a statesman-like speech today. I am going to tell it the way it is with regard to Bill C-51.

I say to the Minister of Justice that he has abdicated his responsibility to Canadians to make certain there is adequate protection for the safety and security of law-abiding citizens and to protect the legal rights and dignity of the government. That is the first comment I have with regard to the Minister of Justice. Second, the Minister of Justice has surrendered to the pressures of the gun clubs with regard to firearms, and to the police on wiretaps, thereby endangering the safety and freedom of most Canadians.

With regard to the main spokesman for the Conservative party, the hon. member for Calgary North, after making a fine speech showing the shortcomings and failures of the legislation, ended his speech by making a motion to refer the subject matter to the committee which would, in effect, kill the bill. To me and to many other people that was an irresponsible action with regard to a very important matter.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I would have thought the distinguished member who is now speaking would have told it as it really is. My motion was within the rules of second reading as far as I could go. I set out very clearly that it was being done so that the committee could sever the bill. The bill would be severed into the five different parts of the legislation so that we could pass our opinion as parliamentarians according to our responsibility. I think it ill behooves this member to misrepresent the position I took yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I wish to intervene for a moment on this question of privilege. I think the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) has stated the position correctly. While I will oppose his motion, I do not think it has the effect that the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) is suggesting. That, of course, is the difficulty when the hon. member for Broadview tries to be a politician rather than address these important matters of justice and law like a statesman, as he should.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, when I look at the content of the bill, I think the Minister of Justice far outstrips me as a politician. He certainly does not appear like a statesman when I read the provisions of the bill. It is a cop-out with regard to some of the main problems affecting the peace and security of most Canadians. If the motion of the hon. member for Calgary North were accepted, this bill, for all intents and purposes, would be killed.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise again on a question of privilege. I do not know how much clearer I can put it to the distinguished member. If the hon. member reads the motion, he will see it clearly states that the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs can direct that the bill be severed, sent back to this House and debated in the normal way on the five points. If he does not understand that, then I am sorry for him.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Now, Stanley, you stay out of it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Why should I stay out of it? It is a point of order which is being used to try to twist the situation. The motion which the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) made yesterday is very clear. It asks that the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter be referred to a committee. The hon. member stated that his purpose is to get that committee to recommend the splitting of the bill. However, if his motion were to carry the committee would not have the bill: it would have only the subject matter. Notwithstanding what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) tried to say, that would be the end of the bill for this session.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): No.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It has been ruled scores of times that a motion to refer to committee the subject matter of a bill precludes its second reading. If you do not give the bill second reading, there is no bill.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on this question of privilege. Clearly, what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) says is so, if the government does not act. Surely, if the government is intent upon the provisions of the bill as they now stand, and I take it they acted seriously, if the hon. member's amendment passes and the bill goes back to the committee—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Not the bill.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If the subject matter went back to the committee, and the committee made a recommendation—which it would do with reasonable speed because the object of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) is so clear and so helpful to the House that they would so act—it would still be the intent of the Minister of Justice to bring that new bill into the House of Commons, and the House would deal with them properly. That was the whole point of the argument made yesterday and the day before by the colleague of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I do not know how that party can suck and blow at the same time.

Mr. Leggatt: You want to kill the bill. We do not.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A very eloquent argument was made by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) that it was immoral and wrong for the bill to be dealt with in that way. What the hon. member for Calgary North has done is provide a way for this House to deal with the subject matter of the bill properly and in accordance with the position taken by the hon. member for New Westminster.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, if I could answer the argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I would like to ask the distinguished member what we are talking about when the subject matter goes back to the committee. Let's not play ducks and drakes with words. The bill is full of subject matter. It is made up of five things. What are those five distinct things? There are the questions of gun control, electronic surveillance, dangerous offenders, parole, and prison reform. That is the subject matter of the bill. When the subject matter goes to the committee, the bill goes to the committee.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No, not the bill.

Mr. Woolliams: If that is not the procedure of the House of Commons, then there is something wrong with it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The point raised by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) is well taken. I do not think any hon. member should reflect on the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Calgary North. I would therefore suggest that the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) should resume debate on Bill C-51.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I and many others are very concerned about the problem of peace and security for most Canadians. It is the intention of those of us in the New Democratic Party to vote for the bill because of the necessity to ensure the safety of Canadians, even though parts of the bill restrict their fundamental freedoms.

I was hoping the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) would speak before me. I was going to say that the provisions with which he is going to deal, dangerous offenders and release of inmates from custody, concern the effects of crime and not the cause. Therefore, we in the New Democratic Party find it is necessary to support the legislation in order to give a small measure of security at the price of infringement of personal liberties.

What is the problem? On March 8, 1976, on the introduction of second reading of Bill C-83, the Minister of Justice set forth the problems in Canada concerning peace and security. This is what he said, as recorded on page 3 of his statement:

● (1550)

Few would dispute that many people today are deeply and genuinely concerned about the increasing incidence of criminal violence, the growing penetration of organized criminals in our midst, the number of accused or convicted offenders on the streets committing further crimes and the difficulties the system of justice has in coping with criminal activities.

He went on to say:

> This is not to suggest for a moment that crime in Canada is out of control. Indeed, it is not, and our timely response to these concerns will ensure that it does not become so.

In addition to setting forth the problem, the minister outlined his attitude in this way:

> The criminal justice system is both a powerful and delicate instrument for achieving justice and order. In adjusting the policies underlying it we must exercise great care to guard the continued proper balance between the system's two imperatives: the adequate protection of the safety and security of the law-abiding and the legal rights and dignity of those charged with offences.

He set this forth in a clear and concise way back in March of 1976. Here we are, in May, 1977, with Bill C-51 before us, and his response to the problems which he set forth is, to my mind an abdication and a surrender. It is an abdication with regard to the duty providing adequate protection of the citizen, and it is a surrender to the gun clubs on the firearms issue.

I shall deal only briefly with the firearm question, because my hon. friend from New Westminster yesterday set forth our position in detail. What is the problem? These are the facts from the booklet which was published by the Department of the Solicitor General. They say there are 10.2 million firearms in Canada, and this number is increasing at the rate of about 260,000 annually. The department also states there has been a substantial increase in deaths and robberies in which firearms have played a part. There has, in fact, been a sweeping increase in the number of deaths caused by firearms and in the number of robberies in which firearms have been used.

Yesterday, in the most eloquent terms he could muster, the minister spoke about the availability of guns. He told us how easy it is for a person to go into a department store and buy a gun. Other members reminded us of various horrific incidents, for example, those at Brampton and in Ottawa involving students who went berserk and killed other students. Then there was the mental patient who, after his release last October, went to a store, purchased a gun, proceeded to wound five people in Toronto and then turned the weapon on himself. What is the attitude of the public? Gallup polls have shown without a doubt that between 80 per cent and 85 per cent of all Canadians want strict gun control.

Mr. Brisco: Garbage!

Mr. Gilbert: The Gallup poll to which the minister referred yesterday reflected answers to questions which asked, in general terms, whether a person should be required to possess a permit before being allowed to buy a gun. The answers showed that between 80 per cent and 85 per cent of all Canadians want strict control to be exercised over the purchase and use of firearms.

What has been the response of the minister in this legislation? It is that if a person owns a long gun, he may continue to use it without having to register it, without having to secure a certificate of competency or a licensing certificate. In short, nothing is required of those who already possess long guns. But the bill does provide that if a person wishes to buy a gun he must possess a firearm acquisition certificate, and conditions are imposed with regard to the obtaining of such a licence. For example, such a person must be without a criminal record or history of mental disorder. But I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that this relates only to the purchase of a gun. Nothing is said with regard to a person already in possession of a gun.

Moreover, cleverly shifting the onus, the Minister of Justice says that provincial attorneys general may request the federal government to require that certificates of competency be issued within provinces. Mr. Speaker, this was not within the terms of Bill C-83. As I say, the minister is doing nothing about people who already have guns in their possession. He is only imposing restrictions on those who propose to buy guns, and he is shifting the responsibility from the federal government to the provinces in the area of competency tests.

No one in this House complains about persons who hunt or trap to support themselves or their families, and no one wishes to impose upon them measures which would be restrictive and onerous. But as far as other classes are concerned, most Canadians want restrictions. Possession of a firearm is not a right, but a privilege, and conditions should be imposed upon ownership. Thus, we need provision for registration, competency tests and licensing. Why? Because we must control availability. The proliferation of guns has been enormous. Not only the federal government, but provincial governments should restrict the sale of guns in stores. They should be sold in stores which are government-approved and inspected.

Mr. Brisco: With government inspectors?

Mr. Gilbert: Absolutely. Controls should be imposed with regard to the possession of guns. That is why the minister, in Bill C-83, attempted to impose competency tests. This is why I say the minister has caved in to the pressure of the gun clubs.

• (1600)

Let me relate to the House what happens in gun clubs in England. Members of gun clubs do not take their guns home and leave them there; they leave them on the premises of the gun club, where they are properly secured and a count is easily available. This is what is required of members of gun clubs. All others who are not members of gun clubs and who are in possession of guns surely have some responsibility regarding those guns. This is why it is so important to know the number of guns in circulation. We may have to impose registration but, more important than registration, we have to impose some form of licensing.

We accepted the approach of the Minister of Justice in Bill C-83, which he said would have taken three years to phase in. I suggest the approach of the government in Bill C-51 will take at least 20 to 25 years to implement. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that registration of hand guns in Canada gives the proof of the requirement of registration. We must register hand guns, and rightly so. The number of murders committed by persons with hand guns in Canada compared to the number of murders committed by persons with hand guns in the United States proves my point. In Canada, 10.4 per cent of all murders are committed by people with hand guns; in the United States the figure is 54 per cent. Does that not prove the necessity of registration and control of guns? In Canada, 46 per cent of all murders are of the domestic kind—murders committed within the family, among acquaintances or neighbours. Of that 46 per cent, 72 per cent are committed by people with rifles which are not registered and are easily available.

All of us are in agreement with the expanded powers of judges to restrict the use of guns. There are mandatory provisions and there are discretionary provisions, and power is given to a peace officer to take away guns without a warrant in disputes involving the family, acquaintances or neighbours. That is not in issue, Mr. Speaker. What is in issue is what is contained in this bill. I respectfully submit the minister has caved in; he has shifted responsibility to the provinces and, in doing so, has endangered the lives of Canadians. This government will have to accept responsibility for deaths in the future caused by carelessness with and failure to control the availability of guns. Those are my comments with regard to firearms, Mr. Speaker.

With regard to electronic surveillance, the House will recall what I said about the famous speech of the Minister of Justice of March 8, 1976, in which he said he wanted to protect the legal rights and dignity of individuals. He set forth that there should be no invasion of privacy, but he said that we had to make certain exceptions. What are these exceptions, Mr. Speaker? The minister said, "I think there should be a right to wiretap in regard to indictable offences carrying a sentence of over five years"—I think it was. In this bill the minister wants to expand this provision to bookmaking and smuggling as well as to organized crime.

With regard to notification, the minister said, "I think a person should be notified not after 90 days have expired but any time between 90 days and three years". On the subject of intercepts, the minister said, "It should not be 30 days; experience has shown the average has been about 54 days; therefore it should be 60 days for intercepts, with the right of renewal". Then the minister comes right to the nub of it and talks about derivative evidence. The minister says that use will not be made of the complete transcript of illegal wiretaps, but part of the transcript may be used.

If I were living in the United States, perhaps I would feel that that type of legislation is appropriate; but this very provision is totally opposed there. We now have a movement in England which claims that experience has shown that derivative evidence obtained from illegal wiretaps is not a good rule and that in no time at all changes regarding that type of evidence will be made. We have had some experience of wiretap laws in Canada—and what has been the performance? The performance in 1974, 1975 and 1976 shows that there has been almost no refusal to tap on the part of the police. Last year, 614 applications were made under the legislation, none of which was refused. More importantly, last year 1,062 people were arrested as a result of taps yet there were only 13 convictions. Surely, the obvious inference from that is that there are very few charges laid, and very few convictions obtained. It is also obvious that the police are not reaching the so-called untouchables in crime.

One reason put forward when the wiretap legislation was presented a few years ago was that we had to get to the heart of criminal activity. I should like to quote to the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General some of the remarks of Ramsey Clark, former U.S. attorney general and opponent of electronic surveillance, in his testimony before the justice and legal affairs committee in 1973. Please remember, Mr. Speaker, that these are the remarks of a former attorney general of the United States who worked very closely with Senator Edward Kennedy who wanted strong electronic surveillance provisions.

He said that wiretapping was not used between 1966 and 1969, yet indictments against members of organized crime tripled. He concluded that wiretapping is a wasteful and inefficient means of investigation and is not, moreover, effective against organized crime. Having had very wide experience, Mr. Speaker, a former U.S. attorney general has gone on record as saying that indictments against members of organized crime tripled, yet no use was made of electronic surveillance. He also said wiretapping destroys the professionalism of investigators, that electronic surveillance encourages, not investigation but just sitting and waiting for something to happen.

This is what a good number of the members of our police force will be doing. It is enormously expensive; for example, the use of laser beams that can pierce walls up to 12 feet thick. Such all-encompassing eavesdropping evades human dignity. This is the example he gave: the listening in on the sexual activities of Martin Luther King and the subsequent use of this information to smear Martin Luther King's reputation.

I have heard the spokesman for the Conservative party speak, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), and the spokesman for our party. They spoke in very eloquent terms in regard to how it destroys the basic freedoms of people, how it endangers, how it infringes and how it destroys the human dignity—not only of the police but of the public. This is why we are concerned about the firearms' legislation and the electronics' legislation.

The next subject I am going to deal with is something the Solicitor General will also deal with. That is, dangerous offenders. We have learned from experience the shortcomings of the present provision of habitual offenders and dangerous sexual offenders. Experience has shown that some of these people were not violent. The best case was the Klippert case which finally went to the Supreme Court of Canada. We have also seen lack of uniformity with regard to application of the legislation concerning habitual offenders and dangerous sexual offenders.

The Ouimet report studied this in depth wherein it was stated that we are now going to change the habitual offender and the dangerous sexual offender to one title—"dangerous offender". I would have thought the minister would have picked that up from the Ouimet report. The report indicated that before an application to make a person a dangerous offender is made, which carries with it an indeterminate sentence, such person should be confined for six months in a diagnostic institution. This institution would have facilities to diagnose the person's problems and may or may not have treatment available. After that we could determine whether a person should be classified as a dangerous offender. I do not see that recommendation in the legislation. All I see is some protection with regard to the person. The protection is composed of the fact that the application requires the consent of the attorney general and requires evidence from a psychiatrist and a psychologist which can be tendered on behalf of the person who is being termed as a dangerous offender. The other protection is that three years after the sentence and two years thereafter the decision can be reviewed.

I would like to ask the Solicitor General, with regard to the question of violence, to look at the study by Professor Greenland of McMaster University who studied this problem in depth. He studied five groups, Mr. Speaker. The first group was of 100 people who had committed violent crimes against persons and had been found not guilty by reason of insanity. Also included in that group of 100 was another group of people detained in the Ontario mental hospital because they were found unfit to stand trial. These were serious offences—murder, manslaughter, sexual offences and violent offences. The second group was a group of 100 people who were inmates of penitentiaries who had been found guilty of the same types of offences. The third group was one of 96 people who were currently incarcerated as dangerous sexual offenders. The fourth group consisted of people involved in murder followed by suicide. In the last five years, in Ontario, 65 individuals have murdered, usually their children, then their spouses and then destroyed themselves. The last group was with regard to the battered child.

What were the conclusions with regard to this problem of violence? This is what we are dealing with under the dangerous offenders section. Professor Greenland's conclusions were as follows: First, there was a tremendous overlap in all these groups and in all these cases. The same people and the same members of families appeared in each of the five studies. It was dealing with violence, which takes on many forms but often involves the same individuals and families.

Second, and this is the most important part, almost all the individuals studied had a common experience of severe deprivation in childhood. They were victims of inadequate child welfare and health services which failed to provide them with a basic system of care and protection. There has been a cycle of deprivation passed on from generation to generation, thereby multiplying violence and abuse in our society. His third point was that between one-third and one-half of the cases of violence, more especially criminal violence, involved alcohol and drug abuse. Lastly, in half of all the cases involved there was adequate warning and help-seeking behaviour. In other words, the person would have a mental problem; the mother of a young family would seek help; and the failure to deal with that problem resulted in the subsequent conduct.

Is it any wonder that we cannot deal with the question of dangerous violence in isolation? This is why we must have programs to deal with environmental stresses—the problems of poor housing, the problems of poverty and the problems of unemployment. We have to set up research to identify the problems and to identify the persons. What the minister has done does not begin to touch the very serious problem with regard to violence. It deals with the effects; it does not deal with the causes.

Dealing with the problem concerning the custody and release of inmates, I am sure no member in this House can complain about those provisions. There is a tightening up of provisions with regard to prison escapes. The increase is from five to ten years. There is an abolition of statutory parole in favour of earned remission, which is a step in the right direction. There is an improvement with regard to release. There is an increase in the number of members who will be appointed to the board. There are amendments with regard to the Prisons and Reformatories Act. One cannot complain about those measures. The measures on firearms, electronic surveillance and dangerous offenders cause a great deal of concern to most Canadians.

In closing, I would repeat that the provisions of this bill do not provide adequate protection for the safety of most Canadians, more especially with regard to firearms, and the provisions of electronic surveillance infringe the fundamental freedom of most Canadians. Mr. Speaker, it is a cave-in, in many respects, by the Minister of Justice. It is weak medicine for a very sick society.

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am particularly pleased this afternoon to participate in the debate on Bill C-51.

As we know, this bill proposes major amendments to the Canadian Criminal Code and related acts. Its main object, and some people could be inclined to forget it, is to give Canadian society better protection against those individuals who commit violent crimes. Yet in so doing the legislator must always bear in mind the importance of reaching a measure of harmony between the protection owed to law-abiding citizens, the respect of their rights as well as the rights of any individual facing a charge.

There is no doubt in my mind, Mr. Speaker, that society not only has the right but the duty to protect itself against those who commit crimes, particularly in the case of violent crimes and that in performing this part of its mandate, the government is not only bound to carry out punitive measures, namely those steps taken after a crime has been committed, but also to apply measures of detection likely to help the police in getting their job done and finally to adopt an increasing array of preventive measures concerning rehabilitation of prison inmates and what can be done to help reduce the number of crimes committed in our society.

However, it goes without saying that as far as preventive measures are concerned, one cannot expect, as the hon. member from Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) would imply, that this whole task can be accomplished thanks to the Criminal Code alone. It goes without saying that all the other governmental social policies must play a part in helping us meet this objective.

[English]

I would argue, Mr. Speaker, that the measures we have before us today are in keeping with these principles. They are aimed at keeping that delicate balance between protection of society and the rights of individuals while, at the same time, being responsive to emerging concerns about crime.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) has already outlined the proposals to you, Mr. Speaker, but as Solicitor General I would like to take some time to reinforce some of his points and to expand on some of the measures for which I bear a special administrative responsibility. I would like to discuss, first, the proposal in Bill C-51 concerning firearms, and if I repeat some of the themes and points of my colleague, the Minister of Justice it is because I share his very deep concern on this question.

Hon. members will, of course, have noticed a number of significant changes in the proposals contained in Bill C-51 as compared with those contained in legislation introduced last year. Reconsideration was given over the course of last fall and winter to the many suggestions made by MPs and by concerned groups.

As a result, several changes have been proposed, especially to the provisions dealing with the prevention of potentially dangerous users from gaining access to firearms. Instead of a universal licensing system, Bill C-51 provides for the screening of all new acquirers through the requirement for a firearms acquisition certificate. In addition, there is an element of what might be called "negative screening" for present owners who are shown to be demonstrably unfit in the opinion of a judge. The expanded potential involvement of provincial systems calling for competency testing, and the possibility of certificate equivalents in such circumstances, is an innovation which could very well lead to making the legislation even more effective.

[Translation]

And concerning that, Mr. Speaker, I think it is an innovation which has not been noticed until now by most commentators. It is obvious that as government we have the responsibility to make legislation under our jurisdiction over criminal law, and we have the authority to do so. In fact, the question of jurisdiction has been raised by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert). For him, it is the solution to the problem: that area is under the jurisdiction of the provinces. We have attempted in our bill to encourage provincial governments to exercise their authority, their jurisdiction, because we strongly believe that stricter requirements in competency and firearms use training could only have beneficial effects.

[English]

But in saying this I cannot stress too strongly the point that the over-all principle is maintained in the bill we are discussing now. Nor can I emphasize too much the fact that action is required on this issue. I urge hon. members, Mr. Speaker, to ask themselves the fundamental question of whether it is acceptable that long guns continue to be as easily accessible as they are today to people clearly unfit to own them. This is the key concern I have; this is the key concern the government has.

The danger of a situation where someone may walk out of, or escape from, a prison or mental hospital and purchase a shotgun, rifle or semi-automatic weapon and ammunition with absolutely no questions asked was never brought home to Canadians more clearly, or more brutally, than last winter in the incident in Toronto described by my colleague. Other tragic incidents—in Brampton, Vancouver, Whitby—have shocked the public in the last several months.

I cannot but repeat the statistics cited by others in this debate concerning the rising toll of firearms deaths in Canada, up 27 per cent since 1970 to over 1,400 in 1974. Firearms murders have risen 46 per cent since 1970. Firearms robberies in 1975 increased by 53 per cent over 1974. We simply must make an effort to stop this shocking trend. The key to the problem, as I have said before, and as the Minister of Justice has said before, is the too ready availability of such weapons to the unstable and criminal. For this reason, the government is proposing measures directed toward three main goals: first, of reducing the access that potentially dangerous users have to firearms; second, of discouraging the use of guns in criminal activities; and third, of promoting responsible gun ownership.

In suggesting proposals to fulfil these objectives, the government is mindful of the need to balance the need to protect society with the need to protect individual rights and freedoms. Furthermore, care was taken to balance our aims with regard to reducing the misuse of firearms with those of providing services which maximize both efficiency and effectiveness. This, I believe, has been achieved by providing for the enlistment of already existing groups and agencies at the provincial level and in the private sector, and by cutting red tape and bureaucracy to the bare minimum necessary to accomplish the goal.

As Solicitor General, I might be expected to have the most enthusiasm for the measures which crack down on the criminal misuse of guns, and I do strongly support the provisions which impose stiffer penalties on people using firearms in the commission of crimes, including a minimum mandatory sentence of one year for a first offence and three years for a subsequent offence. Also, there are new penalties for use of a firearm while committing or attempting to commit an indictable offence. This sentence, which could be as long as 14 years, would run consecutively to a sentence imposed for the commission of the substantive offence.

Provision is also made for increasing the maximum penalty to five years for several other firearms offences, and to ten years in cases of possession of a weapon for a dangerous purpose or to commit an offence. These are important parts of this legislation. They constitute a clear indication to the courts that parliament, if it adopts the bill, will not condone the criminal use of weapons and that the legislative will is to see stiff sentences imposed in such cases. But in saying this I must again stress the importance of not losing sight of the fact that most of our crime with firearms is not committed by people we would normally think of as hardened or professional criminals. Two-thirds of our murders occur in circumstances where the victim and the murderer are either related or have had previous relationship with each other. Too often neighbourhood disputes or family quarrels are transformed into tragic incidents by the ready availability of a firearm.

In order to keep such dangerous weapons out of the hands of those unfit to use them, the government proposes that new acquirers of guns be required to apply for a firearms acquisition certificate, which would then enable a firearms officer to ascertain that the applicant had no record of conviction for an indictable offence under the firearms sections of the Criminal Code, nor for an indictable offence involving the threat or use of violence during the previous five-year period. Further, a check would be made to verify that the applicant had no known record of violent behaviour or treatment for a mental disorder associated with violence.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, these proposals make use of existing information and do not place an onerous burden on responsible citizens who would acquire firearms, while at the same time providing an essential and fairly simple method of screening-out new acquirers who are clearly unfit to own or handle firearms. Those who already own firearms but who are considered to be potentially dangerous could be subject to court-ordered prohibitions.

I would like to make it clear that the onus would be on the peace officer applying for a prohibition order under clause 98(4) to satisfy a judge that the gun owner is not fit to possess a weapon. Other clauses provide for the seizure of firearms in potentially violent situations without a warrant, but subject to later justification before the court.

Responsible use of firearms is encouraged by the active promotion of safety and competency training in all provinces. In fact, clause 106 of the bill authorizes agreements with the provinces designed to maximize co-ordination of the firearms part of the bill with provincial laws and programs dealing with game hunting, firearms competency testing and firearms safety training. This would enable some provinces to substitute hunting licences or competency certificates in place of the federal firearms acquisition certificate, though the normal screening procedure would apply to the substitute firearms acquisition certificate. Such programs can be a prime vehicle for participation by gun clubs and wildlife associations, which are equally concerned about the responsible use of such firearms.

[Mr. Fox.]

For the minority of gun users who use, carry, handle or store their firearms or ammunition in a careless manner, thus endangering themselves or others, provision is made for legal penalties. It is not anticipated that there will be many charges under this clause, especially since many gun clubs now carry out the training function which educates new gun owners on the proper and safe use and storage of weapons. But the fact is that many gun owners are not members of such clubs, nor are they covered by provincial competency test requirements, and the misuse of weapons by such people leads us to propose these penalties.

Care has been taken in the development of these proposals to take into account special needs and special situations, and for this reason several exceptions and modifications to the basic plan are built into the measures. Many of these modifications were developed as the result of concerns raised during consideration of legislation brought before the House of Commons last year.

[Translation]

It is fair to say, Mr. Speaker, that this legislation reflects the government's and the public's concerns that a stop must be put to increasing firearm abuse, without undue restrictions upon legitimate use, for leisure or as a livelihood by a number of responsible Canadians. The current system, including the review of police records, prohibition by the courts, public and private provincial proficiency and safety courses, should help reach that goal without the need for a huge bureaucracy, and at minimal cost to the user and the taxpayer.

The proposals put forward after discussions with the Association of Police Chiefs, provincial governments, gun clubs, wildlife societies and native groups are both practical and reasonable in my view.

I hope they will receive favourable consideration in this House and will soon become law. I would now like to review the provisions in the bill now before us dealing with detention and release of inmates, a specific responsibility of the Solicitor General's department. While discussing those provisions, we should remember that this legislation has two goals, which is protecting the Canadian public against crime and humanizing our laws, making them fairer and more equitable.

Of course, these two goals must be considered in the broader context of the commitment made by the government to have its programs and its policies continuously reviewed as to their efficiency and flexibility. Therefore, Bill C-51 should be regarded as the latest of a long series of measures designed to improve the penitentiary system and to adjust it to changing situations and concerns, with a continuous view to ensure protection and justice.

This means some parts of our criminal law and regulations must be strengthened to give Canadians better protection against dangerous and violent criminals whereas other parts of the legislation and regulations can be changed to humanize the penitentiary system. I would like to set out briefly some of the changes that were put forward in these two general areas.

Many measures to ensure better protection for Canadians are submitted to hon. members' attention. Although the number of escapes has considerably decreased in recent years, and hon. members will hopefully consider the recent developments in this regard, Mr. Speaker, the government is determined to move forward and ensure that inmates convicted by the courts to serve their sentence in a penitentiary be kept in safe custody throughout their sentence. For this purpose, we propose to increase from five to ten years the maximum sentence for escaping or attempting to escape from a penitentiary.

From now on temporary leaves without escort will be authorized by the National Parole Board rather than the Penitentiary Service. Therefore, all leaves without escort in the community will fall under National Parole Board jurisdiction and thus the law will be more consistently enforced throughout the country. There will be delegation of powers from the board to penitentiary authorities for specific classes of inmates and under conditions prescribed by the board. Under that provision, the board will have the power to authorize the Penitentiary Service to grant temporary leaves without escort to inmates considered less dangerous and to concentrate its attention on dangerous offenders, of those having committed serious crimes and who cannot leave unescorted, without the authorization of the Board. The number of National Parole Board members will be increased from 19 to 26 so that the board will be able to study each case more carefully.

This bill also provides for the appointment of regional teams of the National Parole Board. The members of the community will participate in decision making concerning the release of inmates convicted of murder or placed under preventive custody. Those members could be representatives of police forces from any area, representatives of provincial, municipal or local authorities, members of local community labour or professional associations. The bill proposes also the addition of a provision providing for the arrest of inmates and their immediate return accompanied by an armed escort, under a warrant delivered by order of the parole board pending the cancellation of a suspension order or the annulment of the release on parole. It will be proposed to issue a regulation under the parole legislation so as to ensure better control over the release of prisoners. That regulation would forbid the board to release an inmate on parole before he becomes eligible.

Second, offenders convicted of certain violent crimes and who have already committed violent crimes in the past will not be eligible for release of parole until they have served half of their sentence or seven years, whichever is the shorter period. Most inmates are now eligible for release on parole after they have served one third of their sentence or after seven years, whichever is shorter.

Third, no inmate will be eligible for temporary leave without escort if he has not served six months of his sentence or half of the period preceeding his date of eligibility, for release on parole, whichever is the longer period.

Under the current legislation, no prisoner can go out unescorted on a temporary leave of absence before completing six months of his prison term. The bill maintains the exceptions for convicted murderers and prisoners in a number of other categories. Before they become eligible for parole, these must have served a larger share of their sentence.

Mr. Speaker, the new legislation would also repeal statutory remissions. Following the coming into force of the new legislation, no prisoner would have his sentence automatically reduced by one fourth. Instead, he would have to deserve any remission he could get. If he mends his ways, fulfills his work duties and complies with the regulations of the institution, the prisoner who is not entitled to parole may obtain a leave of absence after having served approximately two thirds of his term. The clauses which provide that all sentence remissions must be deserved, that no part of this remission is automatic and may be lost if the prisoner behaves reprehensibly, will hopefully compel prisoners to assume more fully the responsibility for the advancement of their liberation. This should promote a better operation of our institutions, especially through increased participation in penitentiary programs. This last proposal, Mr. Speaker, shows that the two objectives of protection and humanity are closely related, since the concept of the deserved reduction of penalty implies responsibility on the part of the inmate and the notion of responsibility extends to the notion of right.

With your permission, I will now describe some of the other proposals contained in the bill and which are aimed at making the system more human. As far as the Parole Act is concerned, a measure of fairness and equity will be introduced by adding some safeguards to the procedure for individuals appearing before the board. Under the regulations to be implemented, the board will be compelled, when holding hearings on applications for parole from federal inmates to comply with the rules set in the regulations and justify its decisions. The regulations will also provide for the creation of an internal organization to review the decisions of the board. In addition, the board will start to place at the disposal of the inmate, before the hearing, the major part of the information on which its decision will be based, thus giving him some form of representation before the board; it will also hold revocation hearings after parole is suspended. Those regulations, which will be applied gradually over the next few years, will introduce obvious procedural guarantees for those who appear before the board. In this regard, I do intend to examine very closely what recommendations the sub-committee on penal institutions may make in the report it will be submitting soon.

It is also intended, Mr. Speaker, that parole will no longer be automatically forfeited, as is now the case, when a paroled inmate is found guilty of a criminal offence punishable by two years of imprisonment or more. The circumstances that can lead a parolee to commit a new offence are so varied that no automatic punishment should be stipulated by law. The problem of those delinquents will be settled through revocation hearings at which each case will be looked into individually by the board.

On the other hand, it is suggested that in cases of revocation, the inmate will be credited anew that part of his term of imprisonment which he spent successfully while on parole. In addition, the board may, according to criteria it will determine on its own, recredit the inmate, in whole or in part, that part of the remission automatically lost as a result of revocation of parole. Those criteria would allow the board to deal with cases where attenuating circumstances indicate that the inmate could become the victim of unfairness or be inflicted too severe a penalty.

Under the new provisions of the bill, an inmate will be allowed to stay at the institution instead of being placed under mandatory supervision, this in order to take into account those inmates who may not feel ready to go back to society and could not manage to adapt to it, thereby exposing themselves to the penal sanctions provided for by the regulations on mandatory supervision. The bill will also give the required legislative authority to pay indemnities in cases of disability or death resulting from accidents occurring in the course of an inmate's participation in the normal life in an institution.

[English]

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, these twin objectives of protection of the public and humanity toward the inmate should be viewed in the framework of the continuing need to adapt and improve the effectiveness of the criminal justice system. There are several provisions in this bill which can be described in terms of the ongoing process of improvement of the system itself. I expect to receive shortly the report of the parliamentary committee which is investigating the penitentiary system in Canada. I will be pleased to examine their recommendations in detail and no doubt will be influenced by them.

Under the proposed amendments, the Commissioner of Penitentiaries will become the commissioner of corrections, and the control and management of the National Parole Service will be transferred from the National Parole Board to the commissioner of corrections. The commissioner will become responsible for the preparation of cases for all types of release and the supervision of inmates on temporary absence, day parole, full parole and mandatory supervision. This will relieve the National Parole Board of its management responsibility for the parole service and, therefore, allow it to maintain its independence as a decision-making body.

This action will also result in better co-ordination of programs and services between the Canadian Penitentiary Service and the National Parole Service, and will lead to the formation of a unified Canadian corrections service. A possible approach to this unification was discussed in the report of the task force on the role of the federal corrections agency, published under my authority in March. I look forward to the comments and reactions of hon. members to the ideas contained in this document. I understand that the subcommittee studying the penal system expects to have its final report ready in the next two or three weeks and will undoubtedly be making comments in this regard.

Under present legislation, the federal government can enter into agreements with the provinces to confine in federal penitentiaries those provincial inmates who have offended against the criminal law of Canada and who have been sentenced to more than six months but less than two years. To allow for greater flexibility and effectiveness it is proposed that the lower limit of six months be removed.

The proposed legislation also contains a complete revision of the Prisons and Reformatories Act, with the aim of leaving the provinces more discretion in the administration of provincial prisons. Several archaic and obsolete sections will be removed, and provision would be made for the lieutenant governor in council of a province to make regulations within the framework of the federal legislation with respect to the administration of provincial institutions under provincial direction.

The proposed legislation will also authorize the transfer of inmates from any penitentiary to provincial prisons under agreements which may be made with provincial governments. Also, the provinces would be enabled to enter into agreements with one another providing for the transfer of prisoners from a prison in one province to a prison in another province. The remission system presently in force in provincial institutions under the Prisons and Reformatories Act would also be repealed and replaced by a system identical to that being proposed in the federal system under the Penitentiary Act.

Another change affecting the provinces is proposed under the Parole Act, where provision is made for the establishment of provincial boards of parole. Such boards would exercise parole jurisdiction over almost all inmates serving terms of imprisonment in provincial institutions for offences under the Criminal Code, in order to allow provinces to plan a full program for the offender from entry into the institution through parole release to an ongoing life as a responsible citizen. These provincial boards would exercise their authority in accordance with the provisions of the Parole Act and regulations made by the National Parole Board.

A further proposed amendment to the Penitentiary Act would enable the Commissioner of Corrections to designate any portion of a provincial prison or hospital as a penitentiary in respect of any person or class of persons, by agreement with provincial authorities. Also, the federal government could declare any facility, such as a community-based residential centre, or a forestry camp, a penitentiary, in order to improve the effectiveness of programs and services under the federal corrections system.

As I just said, the government is concerned to balance public protection and individual rights and to exercise restraint. This point, I believe, is sometimes lost sight of in the discussion of the wiretapping sections. All of the safeguards in the Protection of Privacy Act are retained under Bill C-51. When listening to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) I was at a loss to understand whether he was making suggestions about how the bill could be improved or whether he was against wiretapping in principle.

Mr. Leggatt: Take out the offences section or narrow it down.

Mr. Fox: In response to some of the comments made in the debate, I should like to point out that a very high standard is required on the part of the Crown in seeking authorizations. I think hon. members opposite make too little of the internal procedures that apply to police forces, the RCMP in particular. For instance, the investigating police officer must satisfy his superiors that the need exists for such an authorization. Secondly, an agent of the Crown must be satisfied, and finally a judge must be convinced by the Crown agent on the basis of affidavits and, under the provisions of this bill, more detailed information than in the original act. The requirement for an annual report to parliament and also on the provincial level forms a part of this accountability process.

What we are trying to do here is to improve the law in so far as it unduly restricted police effectiveness in the fight against crime, and especially organized crime, while maintaining the basic right to privacy of the individual. I believe these amendments accomplish that goal.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that some have criticized the electronic surveillance sections of the code and have cited in support of their argument certain figures showing a low total of convictions registered as a result of the use of wiretap evidence. I should like to point out that trials often take some time to conclude after a charge is laid, and that examination of updated figures for earlier years indicates a larger number of convictions than shown by preliminary figures which must be released in January of each year.

Furthermore, this conviction total refers only to cases in which the electronic evidence is used as formal evidence, and therefore does not include the number of charges laid and convictions obtained as a result of wiretaps, but where the wiretap evidence itself is not adduced at trial. Furthermore, such interceptions have uncovered serious offences previously unknown or unreported and have led to the seizure of substantial quantities of illicit narcotics. In other words, the utility of the tool is highly valued in the investigation, detection, prevention and prosecution of offences in Canada.

While I do not like to engage in battles over statistics, I wish to point out that the appropriate annual report to parliament for 1975 showed, under section (1)(i), that criminal proceedings in which a private communication obtained under authorization was adduced in evidence totalled 18. The annual report to parliament for 1976 showed updated figures for 1975 under this section which revealed that the figure had risen to 70. Similarly, under the same section, the 1975 report showed resultant convictions as totalling 18, but when the updated figures for 1975 were published the 1976 figure had risen to 69.

These figures reflect only those prosecutions and convictions made on the use of wiretap evidence produced in court. It is important to realize that many persons arrested as a result of wiretap information decided to plead guilty when confronted with the wiretap evidence. In such cases, the actual wiretap evidence is not produced in court. Thus, the updated figures for 1976 show, under sections (l) and (m) of my report, that 514 convictions out of 1,492 arrests resulted directly or indirectly from evidence obtained through wiretaps. And, of course, the prosecution of many of those arrested and charged in 1975 is still before the courts. The end result will be an extremely high ratio of conviction to arrest on the basis of evidence collected under the provisions of this law.

However, it is important to realize the strength of the ratio of arrests to authorizations made on the strength of wiretap investigations. The updated figures for 1975 show that 1,492 persons were arrested on the strength of 563 applications for intercept. This ratio, of roughly three to one, is considered by all police jurisdictions to be extremely high.

These statistics indicate several points: first, that where wiretap evidence is produced in court, the resultant conviction rate is almost 100 per cent; second, that the annual reports required by parliament do not reflect action before the courts which at the time of compilation is still incomplete. Accordingly, I think it is necessary to analyse not just one year's report but successive reports in order to fully appreciate the success achieved under this law. Third, wiretap investigations are only taken when other investigative methods seem unlikely to succeed. Thus, wiretaps are used against individuals who might well be free from arrest and prosecution were this means not available. Such persons are normally important members of the criminal community and the convictions reflected in the statistics given represent the apprehension of persons more important than, say, simple burglars. In other words, wiretaps represent a means of getting at some upper echelons of the criminal community in Canada.

There are other benefits—spin-offs, if you like—resulting from investigations carried out under this law. In 1975, for example, the following narcotics seizures were made as a result of wiretap investigations: heroin 27 pounds; cocaine 18 pounds; hashish, 1,335 pounds; liquid hashish 81 pounds and marijuana 2,235 pounds. Similarly, other offences were detected, including murder, fraud, bookmaking, firearms and escape from custody.

I now deal with the dangerous offenders legislation. I sometimes think that the very stringent safeguards which protect individual rights are forgotten in the discussion. We are concerned here with the need to protect society against those very few individuals who pose a serious and continuing threat to the security of the public. This concern was voiced in such reports as that of the Ouimet committee and the committee chaired by Senator Goldenberg, which both recommended replacement of the current sections dealing with habitual and dangerous sexual offenders by dangerous offenders provisions such as those contained in this bill.

That such a need exists would be denied by few, Mr. Speaker. Yet in providing for such a means the bill takes care to surround the dangerous offenders procedure with stringent safeguards aimed at protecting the rights of the individual as well. The offender must first have been convicted of a serious violent or sexual offence. Then consent of the provincial attorney general must be given for a further application to the court to have such person declared a dangerous offender. The court must be convinced that the offender constitutes a threat to the life, safety or well-being of others, or that there is a likelihood that the offender will cause injury or other evil to other persons through failure in the future to control his sexual or violent impulses. Finally, the National Parole Board will be required to review the case not later than three years after conviction, and every two years thereafter.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that these amendments represent a marked improvement over the present sections of the Criminal Code dealing with habitual and dangerous sexual offenders. As with those sections, the dangerous offender provisions will be used with restraint. I trust such restraint as exercised in the past will continue, but I think such provisions are necessary to protect society from the tiny minority who pose such a serious threat to public safety that we must unfortunately contemplate their indeterminate detention.

There can be no doubt that Canadians are concerned about the problems of crime which all of these proposals are directed toward. I would therefore, ask, Mr. Speaker, that all hon. members give these measures their most urgent consideration. We have talked about these issues for many months. The time has come to act.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, in view of the time I wonder if I could call it five o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith)—Harbours—Churchill—Status of program to alter facilities in view of cancellation of plan to lay heavy steel on railway route; the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen)—Multiculturalism—Provision of English language training in Vancouver schools—Government position; the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston)—External Affairs—Southwest Africa—Alternatives to Tournhalle conference offered by delegation.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions for the production of papers, private bills and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTION FOR PAPERS

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Notice of motion No. 1.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Discussions have taken place among members of this House, and I suggest there is disposition to consider notice of motion No. 25, standing in the name of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway), and to allow all preceding motions to stand.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, we agree.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is it agreed that all motions on the order paper preceding motion No. 25 should be stood at the request of the government?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MINUTES OF MEETINGS OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL TASK FORCE ON INTEGRATION OF GOVERNMENT VESSELS AND AIRCRAFT

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk) moved:

That an order of the House do issue for copies of the minutes of all meetings of the interdepartmental task force on integration of government vessels and aircraft and copies of all materials considered by the committee on search and rescue operations and the patrolling of Lake Winnipeg.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in order to make sure hon. members understand my request, I shall read again the notice of motion standing in my name:

That an order of the House do issue for copies of the minutes of all meetings of the interdepartmental task force on integration of government vessels and aircraft and copies of all materials considered by the committee on search and rescue operations and the patrolling of Lake Winnipeg.

That request, relatively simple and straightforward, relates to search and rescue operations on Lake Winnipeg. Hon. members should know that the area of Lake Winnipeg is some 9,417 square miles. So we are not talking about a body of water the size of the Prime Minister's swimming pool, large though it may be in comparison to other swimming pools in this country. We are talking about a substantial body of water on the edge of which are to be found 10 or 12 towns of substantial size, and some 20 recreational beaches. There are thousands of cottages there. Indeed, it is the source of livelihood for a thousand fishermen who glean the pickerel and whitefish that Canadians have come to love and cherish and look forward to over the years. On a day like today in Winnipeg, when the sun is shining and the temperature is 20 degrees—

● (1700)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Whiteway: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) knows it well. The lake would have the appearance of a paradise, not only for fishermen but those who love to relax and use the lake for recreational purposes.

Within a matter of an hour, the waters of Lake Winnipeg can be whipped up and become treacherous. From time to time my seatmate, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), and other members of this House have expressed concern over the capability of our search and rescue on both the east and west coasts. They have a real concern which this government has yet to recognize. On Lake Winnipeg, life is just as precious as it is on the east coast. The government has the same responsibility to provide adequate search and rescue on Lake Winnipeg as on the east and west coasts. On this large body of water of over 9,000 square miles there are only three boats designated for search and rescue.

One problem is that there are many jurisdictions. One of these boats, the largest, the Namao, out of Selkirk, comes under the control of the coast guard. Ironically, it is the responsibility of CFB, Trenton. Generally search and rescue comes under the Department of National Defence in Edmonton. However, the nitty-gritty rescue operations are with the other two boats. One is a rubber boat designed for inshore search and rescue. It comes under the jurisdiction of the RCMP. That is one problem. There are at least three jurisdictions. There seems to be a problem with the co-ordination of the efforts of search and rescue. I have requested these papers, studies by the government which I am sure must have taken place, reports, memos, minutes of meetings where they discussed the problem of co-ordinating research and rescue operations on Lake Winnipeg, to provide the critical safety measures necessary to react to the kinds of emergencies that can come up because of what I mentioned earlier.

Lake Winnipeg is a shallow lake. With the western winds which blow from time to time, in a couple of hours the lake can become treacherous. We do not have long-range warnings which they have on the east and west coasts. One of the problems is that the people, both the fishermen who depend on Lake Winnipeg for their livelihood, as well as those who use it for recreation, are anxious about this matter. I do not know whether there have been any considerations by the government, any studies, any meetings, whether those in the three levels of government I mentioned have put their heads together and studied the problem and have come up with any recommendations. The people are anxious to know whether there are any plans by this government to co-ordinate in order to have the most effective and responsive search and rescue that can possibly be put into place on Lake Winnipeg. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the production of these papers is an essential element for the effective performance of parliamentary government. The availability of these few memos, papers and studies which I have humbly requested the government to put before this House are very much linked with the issues of the right of the public, and parliament, to information concerning the public business.

Before I outline in more detail my reasons for these remarks, let me quote from two of the most senior members of the government whose word can hardly be doubted. Shortly after assuming office, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated:

> I confess to the House that in our view—

I assume he was talking about the view of the government.

> —information is perhaps the most important single subject which is facing not only this government, but all governments in Canada.

Those are most noble words, Mr. Speaker. More recently, on March 15, 1973, the government House leader stated in this House it was the government's objective to make as much information available as possible. I quote:

> We believe that members of parliament require factual information about the operations of the government in order that they may carry out their parliamentary duties.

That sounds good.

> That statement is included in the general principle. We are also aware that the desire to make available as much information as possible must be balanced against effective public administration, protection of the security of the state and rights to privacy.

This is the important part.

> It is always a delicate matter of judgment to balance the desire to make information available with the effective administration of the government, security of the state and other considerations.

Clearly, Mr. Speaker, members of this House—members from all sides, in fact—will agree that matters pertaining to search and rescue operations on one of Canada's largest lakes is hardly a matter of concern for national security reasons. I am endangering no treaty, no national trust by requesting these papers. But the government is endangering the lives of those who venture on to that lake for work or pleasure by not giving us more documentation as to its search and rescue operations.

Nor is it reasonable for the government to argue that the release of these papers might jeopardize the future conduct of federal-provincial relations, or the relations of provinces inter se. I must admit my surprise to learn of the complexity involved, in terms of the various authorities and their geographic location involved in search and rescue operations. It seems that depending on the reason for the search, different levels of government, or at least different departments, are responsible. There is an administrative problem. The studies, papers and documents which I have requested show their efforts to co-ordinate search and rescue on Lake Winnipeg.

If the people of Selkirk and the members of this House of Commons are to exercise any kind of direction and proper interest in this matter. They must have all the facts, or at least some. The safety of Canadians should be of paramount importance to any government. Yet because not all the relevant material is before us, parliament is prevented from fulfilling its role in giving adequate consideration and adequate supervision for providing such an important service to the persons who use this lake, whether they use it to earn their living or for recreation.

I have lectured in this House on two previous occasions, and I find it necessary to lecture again today as to the nature of parliamentary democracy in Canada. I said on those two occasions, and I say again today, that I agree with and recognize the absolute right of the Liberal party of Canada to govern this country and bring in legislation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Not forever.

Mr. Crosbie: Just until the next election.

● (1710)

An hon. Member: We are ready.

Mr. Whiteway: Members opposite are so sure of the position of the Canadian people that perhaps they would like to put it to the test on a vote. Whenever they are ready, we on this side are.

I recognize the right of government to set fiscal and monetary policy, to set external affairs policy and to give national direction. That is their right. It has not been their practice, but nevertheless it is their right. They have the right to set taxes, a right they have exercised more than they should. They have the right to bring in a budget. In general, it is the right of the government to govern absolutely, and I recognize that. But if that is true, it is equally true that the opposition has the absolute right to scrutinize, to question, to investigate, to double-check, to suggest alternatives—yes, to criticize—and to be sure to oppose.

I cannot do my job as a member of the opposition without the kind of information I am asking for. I have already pointed out that the information I am seeking is not in any way going to jeopardize the security of the country or relations between the federal government and the province of Manitoba. I cannot in any way fulfil the responsibilities I have, not only to those who elected me to the House, but under the law of the land, unless I have this information. Surely that sort of information, which has been gained by taxpayers' money in the payment of public servants, ought to be as readily available to members of the opposition as to the government.

I am not asking for cabinet documents, or for letters or memos between cabinet ministers, or for information about what goes on in the Privy Council. I am not asking for secret agreements, if there are any, between one country and another. I am not asking for the deep secrets which lie in the mind of the Prime Minister. What I am asking for, Mr. Speaker, is to be told whether or not there have been studies, documents and meetings concerning the three levels I have already mentioned in relation to search and rescue on Lake Winnipeg.

This question is important if for no other reason than to alleviate the anxieties of those who use Lake Winnipeg for recreation or to gain their livelihood. I am not digging in the hope of uncovering some kind of government scandal, though heaven knows I suppose I could dig almost anywhere and come up with one. The former president of the privy council, the hon. member for Eglington (Mr. Sharp), on February 18, 1975, said this about members such as me who request information from the government:

> (The government is trying) to encourage members of parliament to be more pointed and more precise in their requests for information.

That is a fair statement. He goes on to say:

> If I may use a rather partisan word, the government is trying to discourage what are generally called fishing expeditions when the member does not quite know what it is he wants but hopes that if sufficient material is produced he will find something with which to criticize the government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what fisherman ever caught a fish without first casting his line? Trying to get information from this government is like trying to scoop up water with a fish net. I am not trying to dredge up a scandal or to uncover some wrongdoing on the part of government. I am simply asking for information so I can answer questions which have been put to me by my constituents, questions which time and time again have been put by civil servants, some of the very people who have been given the duty of carrying out search and rescue operations on Lake Winnipeg. It is as simple as that.

This government is paranoid when it comes to giving out information. I suppose if I asked the government for a name, they would not give it to me for fear I was asking for some devious reason. The secretiveness of this government is clearly demonstrated in its refusal, for example, to give details of the Canadian CANDU reactor sales to Korea and Argentina. The government has refused to give details regarding the degree of radioactivity in the waters of Port Hope. It has refused to give details of the arsenic poison levels at Yellowknife. It has refused to give details of the tendering practice in dredging Hamilton Harbour. It has refused to give the details of CMHC tendering procedures for Sky Shops and the student co-operative housing at Rochdale. It has refused to give the Price, Waterhouse report regarding CIDA. It has even refused to give detailed information regarding the cost of the new Air Canada logo. I can see how that can bring down the government.

In short, Mr. Speaker, the government can be paranoid if it wants, but I hope there will be at least one member on the government side who can see the reasonableness of my request. I hope it is within the heart of at least one cabinet minister to produce this information which the people of Selkirk need, which they want and to which they have a right. It is ironic that the Prime Minister, that great knight in shining armour, would deny me, the hon. member for Selkirk, information that could jeopardize the safety and the lives of virtually hundreds of Canadians.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, any government that stifles opposition by secrecy destroys the very principle of parliamentary democracy which gave it its birth.

Mr. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Friesen: You believe in air and sea rescue, don't you, Bill?

Mr. Rompkey: I certainly do. We may even rescue you one of these days. I want, first of all, Mr. Speaker, to reply to some of the comments made by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway). I appreciate it is his responsibility to get the kind of information he is seeking, and I believe in general terms that when it is available it should be forthcoming. I am afraid he is not going to get all the answers he wants from what I have to say, but I want to point out that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc) is out of the country at the moment on business which is very important to the fishing industry of this country, and it is unfortunate that he could not be here today. Obviously, he would have been able to give a much more substantive answer.

I hope the hon. member will not think that some of what I say is irrelevant. He mentioned search and rescue regarding certain swimming pools in the country, and what I have to say is not more irrelevant than that particular aspect of search and rescue. I do want to talk about the question of jurisdiction, which was one of the points the hon. member raised. He finds there are a number of different departments involved in the administration of search and rescue operations, and I think that up until a while ago this was a problem. However, some of the difficulty has now been resolved.

I want to talk about the jurisdictional aspect of the hon. member's remarks in the context of the research done by the interdepartmental committee of senior officials on search and rescue. I want to talk about the question of how government ships and aircraft have been co-ordinated for fishery surveillance and enforcement.

Commencing in March, 1975, the interdepartmental committee representing the Department of National Defence, the Department of Transport, and Treasury Board, was established under the chairmanship of the Department of Fisheries and the Environment to examine the most cost-effective means of conducting fishery surveillance and enforcement on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. The interdepartmental committee was asked to make recommendations to cabinet on the minimum levels of additional surveillance and enforcement capabilities, equipment and associated costs that would be required prior to Canada extending its fisheries jurisdiction. The committee was requested to define appropriate criteria and to establish minimum levels of effort to be dedicated to the air and surface surveillance of foreign and Canadian fishing activity offshore, and to the enforcement of fisheries regulations required to achieve a credible management regime and effective conservation of Canada's fishery resources.

It was also requested that the committee identify all shortfalls in both surface and air surveillance between existing and proposed minimum levels of effort; the most cost-effective mix of existing federal resources, ships and aircraft, to eliminate the shortfalls; and the associated equipment and cost that would be required to overcome the identified shortfalls.

The interdepartmental committee's examination of this subject resulted in a report to cabinet in early 1976. The committee concluded that the minimum level of fishery surveillance patrol activity required for effective surveillance of fishing activity enforcement of regulations must be sufficient to permit at-sea inspection of one third of the foreign fleet and one sixth of the Canadian fleet every month. At the same time, the patrol fleet must maintain a Canadian presence over all of the most lucrative fishing grounds found within 200 miles of our coasts. Air patrols must be sufficient to permit location and identification of every fishing vessel in areas of Canadian interest, once per week throughout the year as a minimum, with an additional increase in total flying activity to ensure more frequent coverage of sensitive areas and areas of high foreign fleet concentration.

In order to meet these requirements it was determined that a total of 1,950 on-station sea days and 4,230 flying hours were necessary. It was also pointed out that the Department of Fisheries and the Environment could not, alone, meet these required levels and that it would, therefore, be necessary to rely on support both for aircraft and ships from the Department of National Defence and for ships from the Department of Transport. It was established that the Department of Fisheries and the Environment would carry out 56 per cent of the sea patrols, Department of National Defence about 31 per cent, and MOT vessels about 13 per cent. The entire air surveillance needs would be met through the utilization of DND tracker and long-range patrol aircraft.

The findings of this committee were endorsed by all three operating departments, as well as Treasury Board and the Department of External Affairs. The cabinet approved these recommendations and on June 10, 1976, the hon. Roméo LeBlanc publicly announced that, effective immediately, Canada would be doubling its level of seaborne surveillance and more than doubling its level of aircraft surveillance. To achieve these increased levels of surveillance 23 vessels are utilized on the Atlantic coast, 8 Fisheries and Environment patrol vessels, 12 destroyers and 3 transport vessels. A total of nine vessels are being used on the Pacific coast, 3 Fisheries and Environment patrol vessels, 4 destroyers and 2 transport ships. The increased levels of air surveillance are being maintained through the use of 15 tracker aircraft and 12 Argus aircraft on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) on a point of order.

Mr. Whiteway: This is rather enlightening, but Lake Winnipeg, which was specifically mentioned in my request, is some 2,500 miles from the area being described by the hon. member. I wonder if he might address himself specifically to what the interdepartmental task force said about Lake Winnipeg. That was my question.

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker, in all fairness, the hon. member's original question, as I understood it, dealt with the deployment of search and rescue facilities in general, and then the last line of the question dealt with Lake Winnipeg.

Mr. Whiteway: That is not so.

Mr. Rompkey: I realize in his speech today he dealt with Lake Winnipeg specifically. I indicated to him in my opening remarks that in the absence of the minister he was not going to be fully satisfied with the indications of what was being done with regard to Lake Winnipeg. I wanted to get to the question of jurisdiction which he raised in his speech. Hopefully, at some future date he can get more specific information, which is what he wants. As a member of parliament, I respect his responsibility to get that information. When the information can be made available, I hope it will be forwarded to him.

To continue with my remarks, I was talking about the deployment on the east and west coasts where we have, as the hon. member will understand, the greatest return to the country in terms of fisheries. Something like $1 billion is returned to Canada as a result of the fishing effort on the east and west coasts. It is important that this be put on the record. I refer to what Canada is actually doing to step up its search, rescue and surveillance activities.

From the outset it was recognized by all concerned that use of the diverse nature of the resources that would be employed in accomplishing the increased levels of surveillance it would be necessary to have firmly established mechanisms of co-ordination and liaison between the three operating departments. All three departments were committed to developing the necessary co-ordination and liaison mechanisms with the Department of Fisheries and the Environment, identified as the lead agency in this regard, because fishery surveillance and enforcement is its statutory obligation as established by the Fisheries Act.

Furthermore, the Department of Fisheries and the Environment was responsible for paying to the two other departments the increased operation and maintenance costs arising from the increased levels of fisheries surveillance. Against this background the Department of Fisheries and the Environment held in May, 1976, an interdepartmental meeting with a view to establishing a framework that would ensure rapid and well co-ordinated implementation of the increased levels of surveillance.

It was proposed by the Department of Fisheries and the Environment, and agreed to by all departments, that on both the Pacific and Atlantic coasts interdepartmental co-ordination committees, chaired by a senior Fisheries official, would be established and would meet on a regular basis. Part of the confusion over jurisdiction on the east and west coasts, and part of the fragmentation in terms of administration, has been overcome. There is now a committee on each coast under the Department of Fisheries and the Environment to administer search and rescue activities. That was one point, albeit possibly a minor point, which was raised by the hon. member. I hope my remarks will clarify that issue.

In addition, it was agreed that, as necessary, interdepartmental meetings involving senior officials from Ottawa headquarters would be held. The Department of Fisheries and the Environment also identified officials in Vancouver, St. John's, Halifax and Ottawa who would be responsible for day to day co-ordination of the fisheries surveillance and enforcement program. I note there is nobody identified for the area to which the hon. member referred in his question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) on a point of order.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member should know, all matters relating to fishery inspections come under the jurisdiction of the province of Manitoba. Inland fisheries is a provincial resource and a provincial jurisdiction. Therefore, comments relating to inspections or areas of jurisdiction have nothing to do with Lake Winnipeg.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. On the point of order raised by the hon. member, I would like to say he should give the Chair an opportunity to listen to argument by other hon. members. It is not helping the progress of the debate if the hon. member intervenes. I hope the hon. member, as he normally does, will stay within the confines of the motion before the House.

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker, I understood that we were talking about search and rescue operations and the administration of those, and it is quite possible that, if in fact inland fisheries are the responsibility of the province, the hon. member should be raising his question with the province of Manitoba rather than in the federal House. If in fact that is the case and if the jurisdiction is there, obviously there must be some relevance if the hon. member is raising it in the House. He is raising the question of search and rescue. I am assuming that therefore there is some federal involvement. Possibly one of the problems here is that in fact there is a shared responsibility, and possibly the over-all responsibility is more that of the province than of the federal government.

I think that the committee which was set up had indicated that, in relation to the vessel resources advocated, the vessels allocated on behalf of the federal government would do their duty in the Great Lakes and on the St. Lawrence, as well as on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. I understand also that there is a certain lack of marine search and rescue incidents on non-international inland waters such as Lake Winnipeg, for example, and I note also that search and rescue operations are covered for Lake Winnipeg by a new high performance MOT navigational aids vessel. The acquisition of this vessel was justified in part on the grounds that it would be used for marine search and rescue in addition to normal program duty. So it is my understanding that there is now, or at least there will be—I am not sure of the time frame of the information—a vessel which is to be deployed for use on Lake Winnipeg.

Possibly one of the difficulties here is in fact the division of responsibility between the province and the federal government. We do not have as clear cut a jurisdiction with regard to inland waters as we do with regard to the east and west coasts. On the Great Lakes, for example, our jurisdiction is shared between the two countries that share the Great Lakes, and I would assume that part of the difficulty here is the difference in jurisdiction between the federal and provincial governments with regard to Lake Winnipeg.

That is an overview of the position of the government generally with regard to search and rescue. As I said at the beginning, I know that possibly the hon. member will not be satisfied with the information that came forward today, and I want to repeat again that since this information and the recommendations that were put forward may not be available now, I hope that in the future they will be and that at a future date the minister can provide a more substantive answer on the Lake Winnipeg situation. But it is very important that we put on the record today what has been done on the east and west coasts because, with the imposing of the 200 mile limit, it is important that we step up our surveillance, as we have done to protect that resource, to protect the stocks which are so important to our fishermen on the east and west coasts and in fact to the whole of the Canadian fishing industry.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I just want to participate briefly in this debate, not for the purpose of holding up any disposition of the motion which I know should receive the unanimous consent of every member of the House who wants to preserve the right of members of parliament to represent their constituents properly.

I was very interested in the remarks of the preceding speaker with respect to search and rescue and his obviously deep interest in this area, coming as he does from the province of Newfoundland. During the course of his remarks I detected a reference to the fact that he sympathized with the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) and considers that this is the kind of duty that a member should be expected to carry out in the House of Commons. Therefore I am sure that the hon. member will give full support to this reasonable request for papers.

While the remarks of the preceding speaker were interesting and heartfelt, I think it was clear that they were completely out of order, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Selkirk, because they did not deal with the specific request for the production of papers relating to Lake Winnipeg. There has not been as yet any indication from the government side of the basis on which the government refuses to produce these papers.

We are in the position of again being confronted with a legitimate request—as has been pointed out by the preceding speaker—from a member representing an area which is seriously concerned about search and rescue of Lake Winnipeg, a member serving his constituents, as he does so ably and well, and we are faced again with the stonewalling tactics and the arrogance of this government in refusing to give any information which should legitimately be available to every citizen of this country.

Many members of the House, including the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Goodale), have spent a lot of time in the Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments which, among other things, has been dealing with the freedom of information bill presented by my distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). I think that in that investigation there has been a certain unanimity and a non-partisan approach to the whole question of freedom of information, and there has been an indication from the government that this is committed to bringing forward some kind of legislation, although when that will be one never knows.

There is absolutely no justification, I submit to you, Sir, on the basis of the government's own guidelines which it has proposed with respect to the production of a papers, for not producing the papers requested by the hon. member for Selkirk. I simply wonder aloud why we have not heard a representative of the government indicating the reason why it is not producing these papers. I can only surmise that it will in fact consent to this motion, because there is absolutely no defence. If we have come to the point of the government being so arrogant that it refuses not only to produce papers but to give any reason for the production of papers, we have come to a very sorry state indeed.

I was interested in the recent occurrence when the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts), who now has the responsibility for freedom of information, met with a representative group called Access and indicated that he was very interested in their propositions. The irony was that he refused to have the meeting in public—he wanted to have a closed meeting. Be that as it may, what are we to believe of a government which, on the one hand, pays lip service to freedom of information and, on the other hand, refuses on every occasion to provide the most innocent kind of information, the kind of information which was described quite properly by my colleague as being essential and important information to people in the Lake Winnipeg area? I suggest to you, Sir, that this attitude indicates an unacceptable degree of arrogance on the part of the governement, which has lost its will to govern but not its will to stay in power.

An hon. Member: You are dreaming.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Of course hon. members opposite are very irritated and agitated when the facts are presented to them in a non-partisan way, as I am doing—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —but I want to say that if there is a particular example of why we should get rid of this bunch and put in a fresh bunch—members opposite will of course question whether members of the opposite have the same level of capabilities as their own members, but on the other hand, we poor people in the opposition try our best—it is the arrogance demonstrated by this government on every occasion with respect to freedom of information.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A concerned government would give serious and immediate attention to a freedom of information bill which is really worthy of the name, and would not waste the time of the House with this kind of attempt to stonewall attempts to obtain very straightforward, legitimate, and as far as I know, non-confidential information. Hon. members on the government side sit by idly on their hands, which they are used to doing. Backbenchers have a stake in this, and I think the rights and privileges of every member of parliament are affected.

I do not speak here on the basis of party politics. I simply say to all backbenchers opposite that it is as important to them to have access to information from the government as it is for opposition members, and if in their hearts they really believe that the institution of parliament is important, they will not participate in this sham debate and prevent information from being given to the hon. member, to this House, and to the people of Lake Winnipeg. Backbenchers on the government side have every bit as much at stake in this matter as any opposition member.

I want to conclude now. I did not intend to participate. The reason I rose was because I thought the previous speaker was going to enunciate at least one reason for refusing the reasonable request of the hon. member for Selkirk. Since that is not the case, I can only come to the very regrettable conclusion that the government is again demonstrating the kind of arrogance we have had to put up with for too long in our country.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on other recent occasions I have had the opportunity to address a few remarks to this Chamber following my friend, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn). I find myself in the same position this afternoon—

An hon. Member: Confused.

Mr. Goodale: —of having to respond to gross overstatements and misstatements which the hon. member has attempted to put on the record with reference to the subject we are discussing this afternoon, as well as other topics we have discussed on other occasions. His remarks today in relation to the question of freedom of information and in relation to the motion we have before us, which was proposed by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway), overstated and misstated the case, and they seem to me to be reminiscent of remarks we often hear from Conservative members in this House and outside this House when they address themselves to the concerns of western Canada.

I would like to draw a parallel between what we have just heard from the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar and what we often hear from Conservative members from western Canada. Their impact here and across the country always tends to be minimized simply because of the way they approach their arguments, and by that approach they destroy the very case they try to make. In this Chamber we often hear complaints about western issues. As a member of parliament from western Canada I believe I understand those complaints. I sympathize with a great many of them, but hon. members opposite complain in this House, in bitter and vitriolic tones about, for example, snowslides in the Rockies with the same degree of emphasis as they complain about such legitimate concerns as freight rates, transportation problems, agricultural problems or whatever.

If they are trying to present a case to Canadians which they want redressed and if they are trying to explain what westerners are concerned about, and what westerners want to see corrected within Confederation, I think it would be more to their advantage, and certainly to the advantage of western Canada, if they could stick to the point and make their arguments in compelling terms and in realistic terms without resorting to overstatements, misstatements, or to tactics which simply undercut the very arguments they are trying to make.

Mr. Whiteway: What is your point?

Mr. Goodale: The hon. member asks, "What is the point?" The point is that if we want to see our concerns addressed and redressed in this parliament or by the government, then surely it is important for us to state our cases here in fair, honest, and frank terms, sticking to the facts and presenting those cases in the best way we can, rather than trying to overstate or misstate our cases and by those very tactics themselves undercut the very arguments we are trying to make.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Goodale: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member tell us what motion he is speaking about? What are we talking about?

Mr. Goodale: It is very rare that I have an opportunity to draw to the attention of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) the motion we are discussing. I am sure he is aware it is motion No. 25, the motion I am responding to.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Has the hon. member read it?

Mr. Goodale: Yes indeed, I have.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What does it say?

Mr. Friesen: He doesn't even know.

Mr. Goodale: Mr. Speaker, I can read the order paper as well as any other hon. member. I am dealing with the argument we heard from the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, who tried to deal with the very serious issue of freedom of information and the access of members of parliament to information, but instead of dealing with that point in a credible, realistic, and practical way, and instead of trying to obtain some real results, he again lapsed into that old Tory habit of overstating his case and of dealing with matters in a peculiar and partisan way rather than dealing with the substance of the issue. It is an important issue. The hon. member managed to undercut himself by the very way he approached his case. That is the point I was trying to deal with, and I think that applies to the kind of approach we have seen displayed here today. That approach does nothing to back up the argument which the hon. member for Selkirk was trying to make in a serious way, I think, in his remarks earlier today.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

● (1750)

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills.

Bill C-2, An Act to facilitate the making of advance payments for crops—Chapter No. 12.

Bill C-11, An Act to amend the Pension Act—Chapter No. 13.

Bill C-52, An Act to provide for the consideration of certain unemployment insurance entitlements—Chapter No. 11.

Mr. Speaker: I believe there is agreement to have the Chair call it six o'clock, unless some hon. members wish to speak.

It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1977

AMENDMENTS TO CRIMINAL CODE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford that Bill C-51, to amend the Criminal Code, the Customs Tariff, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act and the Prisons and Reformatories Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. At five o'clock the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) had the floor.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, initially I have no hesitation in supporting the position of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), namely, that this bill should be referred to committee, for appropriate division. As I recall, we went through a similar exercise when debating the predecessor bill, C-83, at which time a similar proposal made by the hon. member for Calgary North was accepted without difficulty.

I know that a proposal of the sort advanced by the hon. member has sparked much discussion and the raising of points of order, but I am confident that his amendment, if accepted, will lead to the appropriate division of this bill. Certainly it is the view of many that we should not deal with the bill in its present form. It makes little sense to debate a bill dealing with gun control on the one hand and wiretapping on the other. Except that they come under the Criminal Code, both subjects are unrelated.

I am concerned about something that has happened since the timely death in committee of Bill C-83. After that bill died in committee, and even before Bill C-51 was introduced, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) and perhaps the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) expressed concern and dismay about the fact that Bill C-83 had died at the committee stage. I understand that the Minister of Justice expressed concern that in the city of Vancouver there are criminals driving the streets with shotguns and rifles in their cars. If I am accurate quoting my supposedly reliable sources, the minister made these statements on open line radio. In any event, the information I received is that the minister has indeed expressed these concerns. If that is the case, I must say that I share the concerns of the minister.

I share even more the concerns of the general public. If such has been the case, they ask why the minister has not used his good offices to discuss that type of situation with the provincial attorney general in the province of British Columbia and with the minister responsible for the legislation and the licensing of hunters in British Columbia.

If known criminals are indeed driving the streets of Vancouver with rifles or shotguns openly or covertly displayed in their vehicles, has the minister made any intervention? Surely the provincial government would be most anxious to cancel the licences of these individuals. I cannot foresee any difficulty in the province of British Columbia responding to any request by either the Minister of Justice or the Solicitor General.

I have another concern with reference to the former Bill C-83, which the minister has not publicly declared was a bureacratic nightmare. He did not indicate that it was drafted in a vacuum by officials who had no concept of the issue. He did not say that the bill was such a disaster that, at least in my brief parliamentary experience, an unprecedented number of amendments had to be introduced, not by the opposition but by the government. He did not say that the preponderance of witnesses who appeared before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs were opposed to Bill C-83 and the government's conception of gun control.

The minister says that the new Bill C-51 is so watered down that he is concerned that the public may be offended about this new legislation. He feels that perhaps the bill has been so softened that the public will be alarmed that it will not have the necessary impact. I could not disagree more with the Minister of Justice.

There is one point that bothers me considerably in both Bill C-51 and Bill C-83 with regard to gun control. During the summer recess of parliament I received a couple of publications through the offices of the Solicitor General. It was patently obvious that Bill C-83 had dies at the committee level. The government was certainly not anxious to reintroduce it into the House, yet during the summer recess I received a couple of booklets from the Solicitor General's office. They were very detailed, well documented, and very appealing, even though they were dealing with a bill that was dead. I had to ask myself why this unnecessary response to a dead bill? Why this unnecessary and needless cost? It does not matter whether the cost to the taxpayer is $1 or $1 million if it is spent in an unnecessary and needless fashion.

I placed certain questions on the order paper. The replies indicated that the two efforts from the office of the Solicitor General cost the taxpayers of Canada $65,000, not counting the costs of mailing these booklets to Canadians who might be interested. I estimated the cost of mailing at another $20,000.

For what reason would the office of the Solicitor General go through a needless, unnecessary exercise dealing with a bill which they knew was not going anywhere? These pamphlets or brochures were probably produced at the very time that civil servants within the minister's office were busy drafting what is now Bill C-51. I fail to see why Canadians were subjected to this additional insult to their pocketbook.

I also determined that in spite of the statements and protestations of sweet innocence made by various members on the government side, the RCMP were conducting their own inquiries in the business community. They wrote to shopkeepers and small businessmen in the business of selling guns, rifles and shotguns, asking for a lengthy and detailed report on the entire procedure. Why were they doing this? Their response was that it was for their computers. They had to have that information in order to compile the necessary statistics to implement gun control. That is very interesting in view of the fact that gun control has yet to be implemented. Again I say, at what cost? Surely the people involved within the offices of the RCMP could have been more productively occupied in other matters.

[Mr. Brisco.]

If the Minister of Justice is prepared this evening to respond to the comments of those who have spoken in the debate today on Bill C-51, I hope he will indicate whether he approached the provincial government with reference to these known criminals driving the streets of Vancouver with their rifles and shotguns on display. I hope he will indicate that he asked that their gun permits or hunting licences be revoked, because surely only under those two provisions could they legally carry these weapons.

I wish to ask another question of either the Solicitor General or the Minister of Justice. I will not deal with semantics because, quite frankly, I am not aware of whose responsibility it is. Both these have declared their concern with reference to gun control and with reference to the need, which I am pleased to see met in this bill, to tighten up and increase the sentences of those who are convicted of crimes pertaining to the mishandling of guns, and possession of weapons which are restricted without permit, with reference to crimes of violence involving guns. I must ask whether or not they have indicated to the Crown prosecutors that maximum sentences should be sought between the time in which Bill C-83 was introduced and the introduction of Bill C-51.

Did these two hon. gentlemen say to the Crown prosecutors, "Look, those who commit crimes of violence involving the use of guns should receive maximum sentences as currently provided, and you have our assurance that when the new bill is passed we shall escalate those maximum provisions?" Did they approach the Crown prosecutors with that point of view or that recommendation? I must say, looking at the cases in which charges have been laid in British Columbia, the end result of one charge with which I am familiar shows that the answer to that question is no. A soft sentence was provided, and the Crown prosecutor did not in any way reflect the concerns which have been addressed to the House by either the Solicitor General or the Minister of Justice.

This afternoon we had an opportunity to listen to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert). I could not help smiling in some degree of agony at the hon. member's suggestion to establish yet another level of bureaucracy under the federal government. It was a revelation of the true nature of the ideals of the NDP—to strengthen and extend the bureaucracy regardless of the issue. It really makes no difference what the issue is—in their minds the answer can be found by letting the government handle the problem. "Big brother will look after you, the taxpayers will pay the shot." The NDP urges the government to establish yet another level of bureaucracy to look after gun control. The hon. member said this question should not be left to the provinces but that authority should be centralized here in Ottawa, requiring yet more civil servants. Gun control, we gather, is probably good for 600 or 700 or 1,000 man years. "Look at the reduction in the numbers of unemployed alone." One sees in the attitude of the hon. member for Broadview the basic philosophy of the NDP.

The Minister of Justice, I believe it was, provided the members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs last year with a document which outlined in detail the provincial training courses and tests for those seeking a licence to carry a rifle or a shotgun. A review of this document clearly shows that the provinces are well equipped to handle the situation and that they do not need the intervention of the federal government. It is certain that the taxpayer does not need it.

The province of British Columbia requires a minimum of 20 hours of study before an application for a licence is made, and the issue of a licence is still subject to an individual who has followed that course of study passing a test on the subject material. What is the subject material? It includes outdoor ethics, in other words, how to treat your neighbour, the farmer or the rancher; the proper way of handling a gun when out with someone else; gun-handling and firearms safety; the regulations of the province of British Columbia; animal identification; bird identification; survival, and first aid. That is 20 hours of good, common sense education. I know that some provinces require certain periods to be spent on the gun range. Mr. Speaker, in every province in Canada, and in the Yukon—with the sole exception of the Northwest Territories—provision has already been made for proper training before licensing, in one form or another. I suggest the government could do a great deal to ensure uniformity by urging that certain criteria be established in every province. Beyond that, the need for federal intervention is limited.

I am disturbed that as a result of this bill the small businessman, the shopkeeper who sells guns and/or ammunition, will be subject to long and detailed documentation with regard to what he has in the store, what he sells, what he purchases, and the measures he takes to secure his stock. It amounts to one more piece of bureaucratic "bum-f", one more time-consuming operation inflicted by law upon the small businessman. No one has thought of saying, "Now look, we, the federal government, recognize that it is going to take a certain number of hours to fulfil the requirements we have laid down in the bill and we are prepared to provide some type of remuneration because we feel that this is important." After all, in British Columbia, at least, they refund 3 per cent of the sales tax, in many instances, to the shopkeeper who collects it. But not a dime is offered in this case. It is just another piece of paper to be filled out.

The other day we heard the Minister of State for Small Business (Mr. Marchand) telling the House how concerned he is about the bureaucratic red tape which must be cut in order that small business, the employer of more than 50 per cents of Canada's work force, may survive. Well, perhaps he succeeds in removing one piece of red tape, but when he turns around he finds another in its place. Where does it all end? Surely the Minister of State (Small Business) should have been consulted before the Solicitor General or the Minister of Justice—he is the sponsor of this bill—decided to propose that particular provision, which I think is Section 104 (11). I hope the Minister of Justice will reconsider the terms of reference of the bill. I see he is scratching his head so I think my message has got through.

There are a multitude of concerns which I have about this bill, and one of them refers to murder statistics. I heard a great variety of figures bandied about this afternoon indicating that that the crime of murder involving the use of guns was escalating. The hon. member for Broadview compared the number of cases in Canada with the number of cases in the United States. This is an oranges and apples argument because he did not give the per capita ratio. I have always been under the impression, and I judge from your smile, Mr. Speaker, that you have also, that the United States has a somewhat larger population than Canada. Therefore I would seriously question statistics offered by the hon. member for Broadview having to do with the number of crimes of violence resulting in death in which the use of a gun is employed.

The hon. member also says that a Gallup poll had revealed that more than 85 per cent of Canadians were in favour of gun control. I would ask, where was this Gallup poll conducted? Was it conducted in the city of Montreal, or in the city of Toronto, or in Vancouver? What was the question asked? How was it posed? Was it a motherhood kind of question? Was it a question of: when did you stop beating your wife? How many times was the same question posed to the rural community? Where is the rural balance in this Gallup poll? I am not convinced that that Gallup poll is in any way, shape or form, accurate.

I recognize that in major urban centres crime does present a serious problem, one which the government has to date categorically failed to address itself to because of its soft treatment of violent criminals. Wall to wall carpeting and television will be next, Mr. Speaker. I can understand the concern of people in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver. I can understand that they may feel the next step is the ghetto situation in New York, where apartment dwellers require security guards 24 hours a day and have to show identification to get into their own apartment building. It is to be hoped we will never reach that stage. These people fear crimes of violence committed by criminals who, through one means or another, have obtained registered or unregistered handguns.

No one can convince me, nor can statistics demonstrate, that crimes of violence in major urban centres in Canada or in the United States involve the use of shotguns or rifles. These crimes, simply because of the dimension of the weapon, involve the use of either licensed or unregistered hand guns, so do not give us this shallow argument that these crimes involve the use of rifles and shotguns.

I am aware that statistically, as the Solicitor General pointed out earlier today, some crimes of violence are committed by people against someone they know—for example, the family quarrel. But do you honestly believe, Mr. Speaker, that if an individual applies for a licence to buy a rifle or shotgun this week, this is going to have any bearing on a murder which may be two or three years down the line? I would challenge the Solicitor General to demonstrate statistically, or in any other way, how many of these people involved in family quarrels which sadly end in death are found sane and sound, and are sane and sound at the time they register for the right to purchase a rifle or shotgun. You can twist statistics anyway you like, Mr. Speaker. I am not directing this comment to anyone in this House, but I could quote the old saying that figures don't lie but liars can figure.

Earlier today I listened to the hon. member for Broadview suggesting there had been a remarkable increase in the number of guns purchased in the past year; I think he quoted the figure of approximately 260,000. The hon. member was astounded that 260,000 guns had been purchased in Canada last year. I ask, how many were hand guns? One hundred, 200? If the figure is above 1,000 I would be astounded. The hon. member for Broadview has not the foggiest notion because he lives in the city, and probably does not know one end of a duck from the other. He would not know that the average hunter may decide that for upland game his 20 gauge is fine but that he needs a 12 gauge for the geese. He may think that because he had an 8 per cent increase in his wages under the guidelines of the Anti-Inflation Board he might be able to afford a new 12 gauge shotgun. Or he might decide his old double barrelled shotgun is worn out. The hon. member for Broadview probably does not realize that guns do indeed wear out and new ones must be purchased. Neither does he realize that someone with a 30.06 or gun of similar calibre may get interested in target shooting and that instead of his 30.06 or his 7 mm. or his .308 he may decide to pick up a .22 rifle, which is quite satisfactory for target shooting.

I suggest that the increase in the number of guns purchased across Canada last year is really an innocuous and innocent circumstance. The manner in which the argument was presented by the hon. member for Broadview would give one the impression that all of a sudden 260,000 people were bent on murder and crime. That is unadultered nonsense, Mr. Speaker.

● (2040)

I noticed there was reference made by the Solicitor General today to the careless handling and storage of guns. I hope we are not again going to be put through that exhaustive exercise in committee, asking for a definition of what is careless storage of guns.

An hon. Member: What is your definition?

Mr. Brisco: I could make some suggestions; first that the amnunition not be stored with the rifle; second, if the rifle is a type from which the bolt can be removed, that the bolt also be stored separately from the gun; and third, if you wish, that the gun itself be locked.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but remark on a response from the hon. member for Calgary North in case Hansard missed it, and Hansard does not miss very much. The hon. minister said that I was improving on my address of last year, and the hon. member for Calgary North has just remarked, "And so has the legislation". I have to agree. I am glad to be able to put that on the record.

An hon. Member: But that is not enough.

Mr. Brisco: Let us give the member credit for his interjection. Which riding is that hon. member from? Would you help me on that point, Mr. Knowles?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) should refer to another member of this House by his riding and not by his name.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: That intervention completely upsets my entire trend of thought, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member for Broadview, who is replete with suggestions today, suggested that those who use rifles and shotguns should store them at the local club and not take them home, as they do in England. That sounds like a jolly good idea, Mr. Speaker. I can just see the local gun club being broken into and 50 or 60 rifles and shotguns disappearing in one fell swoop! I suppose the hon. member for Broadview did not think about that particular point.

What concerns me and what concerns people in the rural areas, who do not live in cities and do not live next to or close to crimes of violence, is what point is there in storing rifles and shotguns at some remote gun club when the next evening you have at your doorstep a cougar that is about to take away your pet dog or cat? I suppose the odd member will snicker and say, "What is the member talking about?" I would refer that sneering member to the town of Nakusp, British Columbia, which is a quiet little community of 4,000 or 5,000 souls.

If one were to drive through there, one would see water, trees, the forest, people, some industry—not enough—but you would not see a cougar. Yet this winter there have been three separate instances in that community where cougars have come to the doorsteps of houses and have seized a pet dog or cat and have run off with it. In terms of size, there is not much difference between a pet dog or cat and a small child. There are documented incidents of that as well. What use is a gun in that community if it is stored at a gun club?

I remember dealing with Bill C-83 in committee last year and remarking about bears walking the streets of Trail. I was somewhat oppressed because some hon. members thought it was all very funny and really did not think it was true. Yet, some ten years ago, within 100 yards of my house a neighbour killed a marauding grizzly bear. Surely in the city of Trail you are not going to come across a grizzly bear wandering the streets. That is true, but you must remember the outer fringe of some of these communities borders on mountains, trees, streams, bush and hillside, really all very innocent-looking. Within a block and a half or two blocks of my home, regularly every summer the British Columbia department of fish and game has to establish a bear trap because bears move down from the hillsides and into local communities. It is unfortunate when they do that, because they become susceptible to a habit pattern which keeps bringing them back. Although it might be quite fine for a child to cuddle a teddy bear, I do not recommend the same type of treatment with an unpredictable black bear.

While there are some very legitimate concerns on the government side with reference to the need for gun control, concerns that I recognize, I urge that the government maintain the posture of allowing the provinces to handle the control of this particular problem, that the government co-ordinate it, and if a shopkeeper is to have imposed upon him a great deal of bureaucratic paperwork, that he be given the right and the opportunity to receive some reimbursement for that effort. If that is not the case, then the government is giving the lie to its expressed concern that it is going to cut red tape for small businesses.

I ask that the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General recognize that there are concerns which are not just urban but also rural. I notice in the bill there is a happy provision that a hunter who relies on game for his livelihood or to provide for his family, does not have to pay a fee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco).

Mr. Brisco: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was going to conclude by saying—

Mr. Basford: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Brisco: Did somebody say no?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford).

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I would hope the hon. member would conclude his remarks fairly quickly. I would point out, on a point of order, that as the debate has gone on he is the first person on either side of the House who has exceeded his time. I would be happy to give my consent to his having more time, but I think the House would be interested to know that previous speakers, including the official spokesman for the opposition, completed their remarks within time.

Mr. Paproski: So what? That is the same as consent.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I am now at my concluding sentence.

I note there has been special treatment within the context of the bill for those people who must live off the land by hunting and trapping. I am delighted to see that particular provision has been introduced in this bill. I am sure the native peoples of Canada will also appreciate it. I will have more to say with respect to the new gun control section of this legislation when it reaches committee stage.

• (2050)

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I will try to make the points I want to make rather quickly. For one thing, I think peace and security seem to be in a bit of a retreat. The Toronto Globe and Mail says of this bill that some members of parliament have not read it. In fact the Globe and Mail specified six. I think the Globe and Mail is being generous. The bill was introduced on April 20. There are 86 pages in it. I suspect there are at least 40 additional pages of explanation, and the bill, of course, amends half a dozen statutes in a rather fundamental way, so I have no shame at all in saying that until I got ready for this debate, I had not read the bill either.

Mr. Speaker has ruled on whether this bill, which might be called a hodge-podge of legislation, conforms with the rules, and of course I would not presume to comment on that ruling. The fact remains, however, that I think we should reflect on whether it is good public policy to include such disparate concepts as wiretapping, gun control, dangerous offenders, custody and release of inmates, parole and probation, and some changes in the penitentiary service, within the ambit of one bill, and of course there are a couple of other aspects the enactment of which has been postponed because the bill's predecessor, Bill C-83, covered such a wide range of topics.

I think it is a great pity that this form of legislation seems to be coming more into fashion. I suspect that that means that a good many reforms that many of us would be anxious to have on the statute books are postponed because of other sections which are not acceptable.

I share the view of the minister that the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) made significant contributions to the debate. I am sure that the hon. member for Calgary North introduced his amendment, not to kill this bill, but in an attempt to divide it so that those parts which are amenable to quick passage will have that quick passage. I therefore propose to support his amendment, but because I think that the wiretapping provisions in particular are reprehensible, I hope I have an opportunity to vote against the bill on second reading.

Having said that, I think my hon. colleagues would want to share in a commendation of the mayor of this city. He has engaged in a voluntary program for the pick-up of guns of all sorts. This is an amnesty program initiated by Mayor Greenberg of Ottawa, and I hope that his idea spreads to other metropolitan areas in Canada. I suspect that no such need exists in rural areas.

It has been my experience as a representative of a predominantly rural area that most rural people are responsible owners, and I assume that that is the reason why the minister has made some fundamental changes to this legislation. I have no hesitation in commending the mayor of Ottawa for his program of picking up unwanted, unused weapons. I also have no hesitation personally in saying that I like, and will support, those provisions of the bill which end over-the-counter sales of long guns, hand guns, or any other guns. I think society is at a state now where if anybody wants a firearm he should have to go through certain safety procedures to acquire one, and it will not really be very awkward for people to go through the somewhat modest procedures proposed by the minister.

I do not want to spend my entire speech on gun control; I want also to mention wiretapping. I do so with a great deal of sadness because I think there is a fundamental retreat by the minister. The addition of cases in which wiretapping can be used will be a retreat for the civil liberties enjoyed by Canadians, and the testimony in earlier hearings was against extending the list. There is no doubt about that. A careful examination of the evidence when the legislation first came before us shows that there should not be an extension of this list.

There are now 44 major crimes for which an authorization can be obtained. I believe very fundamentally that the wiretap is an extreme remedy. It should be confined to extreme cases, and the proposals of the government surprise me because of their illiberality. I think they are wrong-headed and unnecessary, and they fly in the face of the evidence given before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. The current restrictions on wiretapping have not meant an upsurge of major crime, and nothing I have heard in this debate makes me change my mind on that point.

The wiretapping law is, in terms of jurisprudence, new legislation, and this legislation should be tested. I think I am correct that there were no more than three reports given by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) about wiretapping. I may be generous by one or two, but this is not any test of the efficacy of this law, and I am ashamed that the government would think it needs to broaden this law in such an illiberal way. Its double irony, of course, is that it is brought in under the so-called heading of protection of privacy, and it in no way protects individuals against wiretapping. Rather, I regret to say, it licenses police departments to proceed.

The government is flying in the face of editorial writers from one end of this country to the other, from the largest metropolitan areas to very small towns and communities, and I am rather proud that the press has understood the concept behind the government's extension of wiretapping and has been quick to remind the citizens of a fundamental invasion on their liberties which will take place should this bill get the approval of parliament. I am not ashamed at all to take a minute or two to say that it will be a poor day for the history of this parliament if this measure does not undergo fundamental amendment when we get to committee. I am very surprised that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) and the Solicitor General—for both of whom I have considerable respect—would countenance such an illiberal measure as this. Society does not need this change, and the present jurisprudence has not been tested sufficiently to warrant this invasion.

The minister seeks to make admissible in a courtroom evidence obtained by following up leads uncovered with an illegal wiretap. It is the old indirect evidence rule. I hope to live long enough to see the fruits of illegal wiretapping ended in our evidence law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: I would have thought that particularly the young Solicitor General would have been one person who would not lend his name to such a provision.

The minister wants to extend the period for notifying a person that his conversations have been wiretapped from 90 days after the tap to anything up to three years. Once again the Government of Canada is flying in the face of the evidence provided to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. This will mean that it will always be three years. We are told that three years is the maximum; I am willing to bet that in 95 per cent of the cases three years will become the minimum.

● (2100)

The hon. member for New Westminster, in a summary of the report of the Solicitor General on this particular part of the Criminal Code, reminds us that of the 1,062 people who were arrested as a result of wiretaps, there were 824 whose names did not appear on the authorization lists—those innocent citizens become the victims of "fishing expeditions"; of the 1,062 arrested there were proceedings against 368; all the 614 applications for wiretapping were granted. There was not a single denial by a judge.

I think this says something about the use of wiretapping and the need for it in this country. I find it a fundamentally reprehensible concept. I had hoped the government would have seen the light and not have asked this parliament to change the law and make it more restrictive than ever for our citizens.

I want to speak about two other parts of the bill very quickly, Mr. Speaker. I did not hear the Solicitor General speak, but my information is that the part of Bill C-83 which dealt with dangerous sexual offenders has not been changed in the present bill. The minister nods his head. Because of this sort of package deal—this is the clumsy cliché that we are now using—when we were considering Bill C-83 this part of the legislation was not given very close examination although the standing committee on Justice and Legal Affairs called a couple of important witnesses and had some written material of very great interest.

I want to read into the record now the comments made by the undoubted expert on this subject in Canada, Professor Cyril Greenland of McMaster University. I should like to quote from a paper given to the Royal Society of Medicine, London, in July, 1971, on dangerous sexual offenders in Canada. Sadly, six years later his words are just as apt, which says something about the way we have moved to address some of the social problems facing the country. He ended by saying:

> Confronted by complex problems of modern society, inaction is an enormously tempting solution for middle-aged men. In dealing with sexual matters, academic lawyers and some eminent jurists of this age also seem peculiarly prone to be more excited by shadows rather than the substance.

He went on to refer to Hans Mohr who did such excellent work for the Law Reform Commission. He said:

> My friend, Hans Mohr, probably had a similar thought in mind when, in the final paragraph of his book "Pedophilia and Exhibitionism" he wrote:
> 'Because sexual offences evoke an emotional reaction, not only in the general public, but also in those dealings with the offender, it is especially important that judicial and correctional procedures be based on what the problem is, and not on what it is feared to be.'

I am certain that that admonition of Professor Mohr, reinforced by Professor Greenland, has not been met by the proposed amendment to the act.

Professor Greenland went on to say:

> The real problem in Canada, as in other jurisdictions, is that the public are being cruelly deceived into believing that the law protects them and their children from assault by vicious sexual criminals. Dangerous sexual offender legislation does nothing of the kind. What it does—often in a mockery of justice—is to give the public a false sense of security by incarcerating, virtually for life in conditions of appalling degradation, a pathetic group of socially and sexually inadequate individuals.
> Legislators, jurists, lawyers and psychiatrists must be convinced that punitive action is no solution for that most painfully human condition called sexual deviation.

I suppose that these words are not popular and that Professor Greenland and Professor Mohr are not listened to by governments. But I for one feel that in any sensible debate of an act to change the Criminal Code, these words should be considered.

My last point is about the penitentiary section of the bill, Mr. Speaker. It is somewhat ironic that we should be dealing with some changes in the parole and also in the penitentiaries section of it a day or two before the subcommittee on penitentiaries of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs is expected to bring in its report. I would have thought that this section might have been hived-off and the subcommittee at least extended the courtesy of waiting for their recommendations, which we all know are coming—I suspect in a rather cross-party way—in respect of some needed reforms. Yet the government bulldozes on with this hodge-podge of legislation covering six or seven statutes, several of them in a retrogressive way; and in no way that I can see, except perhaps in the provincial prisons section, is there any reform in the law that is worthy of being considered liberal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) began his remarks by saying that not very many members have read this bill. I want to say at the outset that I have read all 80 pages of it and I cannot help but think that the premise of the legislation is that more laws will make more law-abiding citizens. That is certainly far from the truth. If it were so, Canadians ought to be the most law-abiding people in the world. But presumably the government has introduced this bill because it is a security package.

Mr. Peters: There are more people in our jails than in any other country in the world.

Mr. Friesen: That may be so, and perhaps some of them should not be in jail.

My objection is that this is an omnibus bill containing five separate and distinct pieces of legislation which ought not to be yoked together. Parliament deserves an opportunity to debate and decide upon them separately, and the public has a right to know exactly what is contained in the legislation. With this kind of package we will never know for sure.

Hon. members will recall that when we were discussing the old Bill C-83 in committee last spring some members complained that certain sections got scant attention just because the package was too big. If the government were really serious about passing the measures contained in this bill then it would separate it into the logical components into which it already falls, and let us debate them separately.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) has already been quoted as saying that he is afraid this bill has been watered down too much and the public may think it will have very little effect upon society. That simply underscores what I have said—that the bill is based on the premise that more laws will make more law-abiding citizens. If this bill has been watered down so much, why introduce it to the House in the first place?

The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) handed me a note just before I began to speak, Mr. Speaker, with a message from the B.C. Wildlife Association which is holding its convention at Williams Lake today. The message reads as follows:

> B.C. Wildlife Association at convention today voiced total opposition to Bill C-51. Disgusted with Basford's incompetence and insincerity and convention demands his resignation.

The Minister of Justice met with the B.C. Wildlife Association last year and presumably listened to them.

An hon. Member: They also got their Liberal memberships.

Mr. Friesen: That is right, at the nominating meeting. Maybe that is why the minister has announced he does not plan to run again. Perhaps the minister does not want to run again because he knows the difficulties he would face from the avid hunters in his part of the country.

● (2110)

An hon. Member: Perhaps he'll be made a judge.

Mr. Friesen: Perhaps he will be made a judge. Mr. Speaker, if this law is necessary, it should contain provisions which will make it effective.

I noticed two days ago an article entitled "New Gun Law Measures Are 'Just For Show'" printed in the Vancouver Province. The author is Mike Cramond who, for all I know, may be one of the minister's constituents. I wish to quote part of his article. He begins by saying that he met a member of the police administration in British Columbia and asked him what he thought of the amendments to the Criminal Code. According to the article:

He replied: 'Well, it looks as if the public criticism over the lawlessness of recent times had made them feel that they have to look as if they are doing something to deter it. By taking the action of presenting a bunch of amendments to the law it will get the public off their back. And, they can say: 'Look, we have done something.' Then, they can sit back and say: 'We've done our best'

He went on to say:

Frankly, for a moment I was stunned at the revelation. This was a man of the law, an experienced executive police officer. My next question was: 'Do you think the changes are necessary?'

He shook his head. 'There isn't anything ineffectual about the Criminal Code as it stands. It covers everything in the way of a crime. It just has to be administered properly. Agencies interfere with the proper course of justice. Case loads are so high that courts can't handle them.'

I asked: 'Then, do you feel that the 'gun control' measures are necessary?'

His reply: 'There is a law to cover any gun infraction right now. They might make some new infractions.'

I could see that he was uncomfortable, really not sure of his position as a law administrator, specifically talking to a reporter.

Mike Cramond went on to say that we do not need more laws. We need to make our present laws more effective, by enforcing them. He went on to take pot shots at some of my colleagues in the House, and at esteemed members of the legal profession. He said, and I quote:

The main problem for the long-suffering public, in particular the gun owner, is that delaying tactic with which the legal profession is very familiar, 'getting an adjournment', knowing that each delay suffocates the public's willingness to go on fighting to maintain its rights.

That is the nub of the problem. We do not need more laws. We need to give authority to those who administer the law; we must make sure that we enforce laws we already have. We must remove some of the rights which practitioners in law now possess of holding up due process of law. They have that ability under current practice.

Now I wish to turn my attention to the bill itself. As I said, it is divided into five parts. There have been some improvements made to the bill, as I said previously. The minister obviously has listened, but listened with only half an ear. If he had listened properly to the people representing—

Mr. Leggatt: Gun owners?

Mr. Friesen: —gun owners, gun clubs, antique owners, and the legal profession, as they appeared before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs last spring, he would have introduced an effective bill which would do for the public what it ought to do. I am cheered to note that the bill now requires gun users to prove their competence with guns. I called for such a provision last spring, as did many other members. We said, what is the good of having a licence if you do not know how to use a gun?

Mr. Leggatt: If you don't know how to shoot straight.

Mr. Friesen: That is right. The gun licence should be something like a driver's licence. You may have a driver's licence but not own a car. On the other hand, if you possess a driver's licence you must know how to operate a car. Similarly, because you possess a gun licence does not mean that you necessarily own a gun, but you should not be allowed to use a gun unless you have a licence. In other words, you should be able to produce proof of your ability to operate a gun properly, if you own a gun. I am glad to see such a provision included in the bill.

Why should we include in one bill provisions like the one I just mentioned, and other provisions which are reprehensible not only to members of this House but to the sense of justice of all in society? Specifically, I am referring to the wiretap provision, which is an invasion of privacy, to the parole legislation in this bill, and to certain aspects of the dangerous offenders provisions of this bill.

Let me read into the record one of the provisions in this bill having to do with the Penitentiary Act. Proposed section 26.2(1) on page 76 of the bill reads:

Where, pursuant to an agreement under subsection 19(1), an inmate has been admitted to a provincially operated mental hospital or to any other provincially operated institution in which the liberty of the patients is normally subject to restrictions, the officer in charge of the provincial institution may permit temporary absences from that institution within the limits prescribed in paragraph 26(b) . . .

(b) without escort, when he is delegated that authority by the National Parole Board.

My understanding of this part of the bill may not be correct, but if that provision says what I think, it is a dangerous provision. Any provision which allows a local official to release without escort someone who has been convicted of a crime and then put in a mental institution is dangerous. I suggest that is a dangerous practice and dangerous provision to include in the bill.

Subclause (3) on page 77 reads:

For the purposes of paragraph (1)(b), the National Parole Board may, if it has determined that an inmate or a class of inmates is one for whom or which temporary absence without escort is appropriate, delegate authority to grant temporary absences without escort to that inmate or class of inmates to the officer in charge of the provincial institution described in subsection (1) subject to any conditions it deems advisable and for such period as it sees fit.

Let us suppose we are satisfied with the gun provisions of this bill and want to pass them as they are. That is not the case, but let us suppose it is. Why should that legislation be included in the same bill which deals with the Penitentiary Act, about which we have some question? In other words, why hold up the legislation because, although we may agree with one part of it, we may have some questions to raise about the other? Bringing together in one bill these various pieces of legislation verges on the immoral.

I repeat what I said at the beginning of my remarks. This bill has been drafted on the premise that more laws will make our citizens more law-abiding. We know that is not so. Therefore I cannot support this bill, will vote against it, and ask for the support of hon. members to defeat this bill.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, when I participated in the debate on the late and unlamented Bill C-83 one year ago, I drew attention to some of the zany features of it. After I had finished speaking I walked down the corridor with a friend. He said, "You must be crazy to say what you did, because no government would ever be so foolish as to put so many stupid features in one bill." I said, "Wait and see." Time has vindicated me, because Bill C-51 does not contain three or four zany features which I had particularly illustrated in my speech. It has also helped to save Aunt Minnie from being thrust into a federal penitentiary.

First, let me allude to the zany features about which I spoke in the debate on Bill C-83. I drew the example of a Canadian serviceman trying to defend that beautiful part of Canada known as Halifax-East Hants against invaders who were armed with nothing more than that deadly weapon Bill C-83 as presented to us then by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford). These bookladen invaders were able to tie our stout defender up in no time at all. For one thing, they found that as a serviceman he was entitled to carry a weapon. However, he had not obtained a licence to put ammunition in that particular weapon. This was one of the features of the brave attempt by the Minister of Justice in Bill C-83 to deal with some control of deadly weapons.

The Canadian soldier was rash enough to point the weapon at the invader. This drew a further penalty. On the way back to headquarters, they marched through a field in which was scattered ammunition. The ammunition provision in Bill C-83 provided a further penalty against our stout Canadian defender. When the Canadian defender wanted to leave all his arms behind him in the museum of his own choice, it was pointed out that this too was an offence.

By the time that particular mythical war was over, the Canadian soldier had lost 17 years of his life in the Canadian penitentiary, although some of that might have been forgiven on the grounds of good behaviour. The enemy, armed only with Bill C-83, was in firm charge of the field.

Those things have been corrected. I hope that the hon. member who thought that no government could be so zany as to bring in measures like that will now realize that a government can be that zany. In any event, I want to give the Minister of Justice full credit for removing those zany features.

One part of pursuing zaniness to its ultimate conclusion was when I pointed out to the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that there would have to be somebody in every detachment across Canada who would licence the undermembers of each particular detachment to chase the criminal element with loaded weapons. Otherwise the RCMP officials would be in violation of the law. The Commissioner of the RCMP said that was impossible. Somebody then whispered to him and he said that they were correcting that with an amendment to Bill C-83.

I enjoyed myself. The press obviously felt like the member of parliament who said that no government could be that zany. The speech never created the slightest stir of ink on any newspaper page across Canada that I can remember. However, the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox), and people in their departments knew that I was telling the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. They knew they had to get rid of the zany features in Bill C-83. Some attempt has been made to do that at this time.

May I also say something on behalf of a grateful public which never has a chance to know the depths I went to in order to try and correct the zaniness at that time? May I say something to the minister on behalf of the Aunt Minnies of Canada? These were the old souls threatened with incarceration, fines and all sorts of prohibitions, criminal records in any event, when they dared to harbour antique firearms. The provisions in that bill were also zany insofar as they dealt with firearms.

One of the great occasions I had with that particular bill was to have a group of people drive up one Sunday afternoon to my home in Halifax. They brought antique firearms, some dating back to the time when Cromwell was terrorizing various parts of the United Kingdom in the name of peace and order. Some were from the time of the American revolution, some from the war of 1812, some from the revolution in the Northwest Territories, and the like. All these weapons were trotted into my home. I was told that all of them were subject to the sanctions of Bill C-83. I do not think anybody could have been shot with those particular weapons. They would not have been able to find ammunition that could be used in them. Nonetheless, as the bill proposed by the government came before us then, the owners of such weapons could have found themselves in great difficulty indeed.

I suppose across Canada there must be thousands of homes occupied by Aunt Minnies and other people where these antique firearms exist. We now have in this measure that which we did not have before, some method of saving Aunt Minnie from going to jail, from paying a fine, or at least from having her fingerprints taken by the constabulary of Canada. I have to thank the Minister of Justice for listening to the Aunt Minnies of this world. I also have to thank him for not attempting to apply the definition presented to us in the bill before us as it was an absolute farce and led to all kinds of strange results.

I will not take too much time because I want to see the bill get into committee. There is one point I want to draw to the attention of the Minister of Justice. I thought the natives of the northwest made very strong points indeed about their difficulty in buying firearms, either from dealers in their own localities or, as they seemed to prefer, from mail order shops. I want to give the minister notice that when the bill reaches committee I will ask some questions to see that the rights of the people in Canada who should have the use of firearms, those for whom shooting game is an absolute part of their lives, have that right without hindrance and a lot of bureaucratic foofaraw, to bother them.

I should say to the minister that I armed myself with four advisers, all of whom had a hand in telling me what they thought was wrong with the bill when it came in last year in the form of C-83. They were largely responsible for initiating my speech about the mythical invasion of Halifax-East Hants. I told the House tonight some of the hilarious and crazy things that the original suggested reform would have brought about. All of the four are now reasonably satisfied with the measure that is presently before us. That says some thing for the committee system of the House of Commons. People had a chance to come before the committee, present their views and, after pounding away at the government for a while, to convince the Minister of Justice and others that the measure that was being proposed was totally inappropriate in a democratic society. Even though it did take a little bit of arm twisting and friendly persuasion, those people were heard in a democratic way. Some thanks should be given to the sinner who has reformed.

The other point I should like to make before concluding is that I think the proposal to extend what I call the liberalization of the wire tapping provisions is a heinous one. I believe it has to be fought, and I hope we do fight it as hard as we can in committee, if indeed the bill goes to committee.

Finally, I should like to support the suggestion made by my hon. friend from Calgary North. The trouble about these large helpings of Criminal Code reform—and this one runs to 85 pages—is that they cover too many subjects and make it almost impossible for one to take an honest stand for or against. One's inclination is to make a stand against certain areas of the bill while voting in favour of others. The process becomes a mockery. I know that governments have used this technique for years and years but some day, Mr. Speaker, this will stop. I hope that tonight we shall stop it with a vote.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I intend to be very brief because the hour is late. Besides, my colleagues insist on it. Nevertheless, I should like to say something about this legislation. I am of the opinion that the bill is not nearly as bad as it was when introduced in the last session of parliament. But it has been improved only in degree. It is true there is no need for us to get our neighbours to certify we are capable of owning or buying a gun. But it is a fact that when someone buys a gun from a neighbour they both have to be licensed. It is not only when it is bought downtown from one of the stores. It means that in any of the trading done between neighbours, if they pick up a shotgun or a .22 rifle, both those guns would end up registered.

The government is so hard up that it sets out to collect money on the basis of legislation meant to apply, largely, to the law-abiding, a bill that satisfies all the rednecks. Surely we ought not to be getting money out of this. If the minister is sincere in wanting to get guns registered, then why does he charge a fee for doing so? If a fee is insisted upon, why does the bill not say that the fee might be paid at the same time as the gun is bought in the store? There is really no point in making it necessary to renew the permit every year. The gun is registered and its location is known. Why does the minister want to collect a buck a year for five years? I predict this clause will be as difficult to operate as the attempt to secure $2 for licensing every radio in the country, which meant keeping track of all the radios. We found after a while we did not need it.

If the minister really wants to know where guns and rifles are, then why not encourage voluntary registration except in the case of new guns? I am sure many people, if asked, would voluntarily register their guns. But it would be absurd to expect them to register voluntarily if they had to pay a tax. Therefore they keep the guns at home and do not tell anybody. They are not obliged to tell anybody.

You know, Mr. Speaker, I am never sure whether the people who are talking about this gun legislation are policemen, or just fools, or hunters. The hunters, as a group, do not want any kind of control because they do not need any. The fools don't know. They are the civil servants who have never been off their fat derrières. They will rewrite a piece of legislation any way you want it. There may be exceptions, of course, and I hope that will cover the situation.

One of my hon. friends mentioned the number of guns which are stolen. It is true there are quite a number. Maybe that is why they should be registered. But there are 10 million guns in Canada, and it is my guess that if a fee were not involved and the minister asked for voluntary registration he would get 50 per cent of those guns registered. I do not know what the RCMP were able to find out when guns were registered years ago. At one time all guns in this country were registered. At the beginning of the war everybody was asked to register their guns. It was not so much the guns they were interested in. You went down to the police station and said, "I have a 44-40 Winchester, or a .309 Remington, or a .303 Enfield." Whatever you might have, shotguns included, you registered them. In this way a lot of guns were registered, including handguns. In my area a local gun shop is selling a handgun almost every day. These are not Saturday night .38 specials—they are conventional handguns. And they are not all going to gun clubs.

An hon. Member: Ontario separatists!

Mr. Peters: We may need these guns some time, Mr. Speaker. I have been listening to my colleagues who come from other parts of the country, and we may need them to protect ourselves from the rape of our resources in Northern Ontario.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: But seriously, Mr. Speaker, I am shocked by the figures. The dealer was not the least bit shy. All the guns are registered. The police inspect them all. And the dealer does not see anything wrong with registering new guns. What he thinks is wrong is all the hardware stores being allowed to sell guns. He does not think the Canadian Tire stores and other stores where there is absolutely no protection should be allowed to sell guns. This dealer has police dogs and all kinds of alarms set up to protect the stock. His premises are not in town; they are located off by themselves and he needs a lot of protection because at times he has a large number of guns in stock there. He is a gunsmith as well.

Mr. Speaker, I don't go hunting any longer and I therefore do not need to buy guns any more. I have two or three and they are in a drawer, probably, and I handle them very carelessly because I do not use them. Most of the people in my area handle their guns carefully because they use them. It is not unusual to go into a house in many small communities and see four or five guns hanging on the livingroom wall. The people think they are very nice.

Guns are very elaborate pieces of machinery. A number of people who were watching the news the other night saw that the mayor of one city has gathered up all the guns. They put them in a bucket and grind them up. That shocks me, actually, because some guns are beautiful pieces of workmanship. Many of them are as difficult to repair as a watch, and not many of us are competent to do that. But that is not to say that they are not dangerous. I am sometimes shocked at the insensitivity of my colleagues who like to see the destruction of guns which to many people are very valuable.

I do not want to speak for very long, Mr. Speaker, but I do want to say I am surprised at my colleagues who have not been vocal in their defence of the differences that exist in this country between various regions. We talk today about Quebec and its language being different from the rest of Canada. We talk about western Canada being different from the rest of the country because it grows grain. There is also a big difference between major urban centres and rural areas in the matter of guns.

I agree with people in the city of Toronto who say that a gun in the average apartment is purchased only for shooting people. Many of these people never get the opportunity to do anything else with a gun. The keep it for what they call defence, and that is defence against people. In my area it is used as a defence against the elements. Some members say they use a gun to shoot bears and wolves, but that does not often happen. But we who live in rural areas train our young people to use a gun for that purpose; we do not keep them for shooting people. So there again there is a difference. I am surprised at the insensitivity of many members of this House who support law and order but who are not willing to reflect the opinion expressed by many of those who live beyond the urban fringe and the "Golden Horseshoe."

I hope that when the bill goes to committee we will have an opportunity to state our position on wiretapping and on other parts of the bill, but I would not like it to pass second reading without having had an opportunity to put forward my northern views on this important subject.

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I am only going to speak for a few moments this evening, and it is very painful for me to have to admit that. However, we do want to have a vote tonight so I am going to take just five minutes to put on the record for the first time my views about wiretapping, which is all I shall address myself to now.

I am surprised and amazed that a government which is supposed to be headed by a great libertarian, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), would bring in a bill like this which would allow wiretapping with no notice being given the person being wiretapped for three years if a judge sees fit so to approve. Well, there are judges and judges. There are judges who are great upholders of the prosecutorial process. As one hon. member said this evening, there has not been one instance of a wiretapping application being turned down, according to the records filed for last year.

I am certainly against any widening of the law applying to wiretapping, any extension of the 90 period to three years, or even to 91 days or 100 days. The Prime Minister made his reputation on stating that the state should not intrude in the bedrooms of the nation; this was in 1968, or whenever it was he was justice minister. His government is now bringing in a bill like this, a Liberal bill, extending the powers of the police and the government to wiretap private citizens. I am unalterably opposed to that. If the state should not be in the bedrooms of the nation, I see no reason why the state should be able to wiretap the bedsprings of the nation, because that is what they can do, Mr. Speaker, under this piece of legislation. I do not believe in wiretapping.

When the justice minister spoke the other day he gave the usual false reason. He gave the usual reassurance to the ordinary citizen which is always dragged up. Whether it is Senator Foghorn in the United States or the Minister of Justice of Canada, the same old excuse is always given—I refer to Hansard for May 11—namely, that the activities of the bosses of organized crime can be more effectively investigated by wiretapping than is possible at present. I say piffle! That has nothing to do with it. At least, wiretapping has only slightly to do with the bosses of organized crime. It is the ordinary people of this country who can be wiretapped, yet we always hear this talk about the bosses of organized crime. When we hear about wiretapping we all get this vision about the Mafia, that only the Mafia is being wiretapped, and therefore it is all right for us to approve anything that the Crown wants to introduce in order to catch the Mafia or the people who were on television in Montreal a few months ago. Well, Mr. Speaker, that does not wash.

The two or three hundred wiretaps which went on last year were not all of people involved in organized crime. I am irretrievably opposed to the use of evidence obtained through illegal wiretaps. We should follow the United States precedent, not the English. I do not care whether the evidence is relevant or irrelevant; if it is obtained by illegal means it should be blocked from the courts. If we do not block it from the courts we are only giving the police and RCMP the incentive to obtain evidence by illegal means. If they know it can be used in court in any event they are not going to worry too much about the means. That is an inconsistency, and I hope to have a chance to vote against it.

I am also completely opposed to wiretapping of solicitors. I do not care if somebody persuades a judge that a solicitor or a lawyer may be involved in a crime. It is an absolute infringement upon our system of civil liberty to place a wiretap on a lawyer, or in his office, or anywhere near his place of business. You can do the same in his home as you can do in other people's homes if the law so permits, but to wiretap conversations between solicitor and client is absolutely abhorrent and should not be permitted. Unfortunately this legislation does permit wiretapping of a solicitor if he is himself suspected of being involved in a crime. If it turns out that he has not been involved in a crime, Mr. Speaker, we are still wiretapping all his conversations which he is having with his clients most of whom have nothing to do with the alleged crime about which he is being wiretapped.

I do not have the time tonight, Mr. Speaker, to expand on these matters, but we did learn years ago that the Prime Minister is no great libertarian. In fact he is quite the opposite, as we learned under the War Measures Act implemented in Quebec a few years ago. This bill is another instance. Once it has served his purposes, the Prime Minister no longer cares what goes on in the bedrooms of the nation, and the police and RCMP can do what they like if this House will give them the power. Well, Mr. Speaker, I say count me out. I am going to vote against the wiretapping provisions of this bill if I get a chance to do so.

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I suppose that in my initial remarks it is almost needless to say that the portion of Bill C-51 which concerns amendments to the Criminal Code with respect to firearms is far more acceptable than last year's effort, this of course being the result of very substantial changes to the content of that area of the previous omnibus bill.

Nobody can argue with the government's intent to protect more readily the lives and safety of citizens of this country. However, I think that legislation of this nature can be measured by degree. The previous gun control legislation, for example, was not acceptable because it went too far. I do not feel that such a severe proposal would have been very widely accepted. So far as I am concerned, though, the principle and content of the latest firearms legislation will not elicit the same degree of adverse reaction.

I will reserve comment on the other areas of the bill in favour of confining my remarks to the portion strictly related to firearms legislation. I am pleased to see that this latest proposition does not appear to have attached to it an inherent need for a large administrative structure. That was a very negative factor in last year's bill. I see that much of the actual administrative aspects, if you want to call them that, are left to the jurisdiction of police officers. I am thinking specifically of the areas that mention the fact that the new proposals build on existing systems such as the courts' powers and police record checks, and the fact that firearms officers will usually be police officers.

When I think of my own riding in particular, the allowance of certain concessions for exemptions to people who are dependent upon the use of firearms for their livelihoods is quite acceptable. I have no argument against the exception to the requirements for firearms acquisition certificates which allows persons dependent on trapping or hunting to lend firearms to each other without a certificate being produced. Second, I have no protest over the exemptions from certificate fees for those who hunt or trap for their living. This would go over well in the Churchill constituency, as it would in all northern areas where people depend on trapping and hunting for a living. The bill also honours current provincial safety programs that have traditionally been of provincial jurisdiction. I am in agreement with that portion of the bill.

There are still many areas of the new gun control proposal which are open to speculation however. For example, it is going to be difficult to determine accurately, and possibly legally, whether an individual can be considered potentially dangerous. Such a determination would make him subject to a court order prohibition that would prevent him from owning or using a firearm. This system would surely be abused.

The bill might also be labelled discriminatory in terms of the provision which stipulates that anyone with a history of mental disorder associated with violence is immediately prohibited from owning or using a firearm. This clause would also be open to abuse as it could possibly promulgate a steriotypic view of former mental patients in the eyes of law enforcement officials. I am talking about, a patient who has been released from a mental institution and who is now deemed to be of sound mind. What I mean is that an ordinary citizen could be discriminated against because of his past. This would surely be a difficult law to enact fairly. I know the intent behind this provision is well meaning, but it appears to me that the ethics of fair, just treatment and jurisprudence would be disregarded. It is also going to be hard to judge cases in which police can issue prohibitions where reasonable grounds can be shown that a certain person is likely to harm someone if he or she has access to a firearm.

The question of why the government still chooses to present firearms proposals in an omnibus form arises. The Progressive Conservative party has held firm to the belief that this sort of legislation should be introduced separately or severed from the rest of the bill altogether. However, the government has again given us an everything-in-one bill.

Although there are some weak areas of Bill C-51 in the portion dealing with firearms, I am sure that many of the bugs will be ironed out in committee stage. With those remarks I would like to conclude. I hope this bill will be cleared up and a lot of amendments made and accepted by the government at committee stage.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The question is on the amendment (Mr. Woolliams) to the main motion. All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Call in the members.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HARBOURS—CHURCHILL—STATUS OF PROGRAM TO ALTER FACILITIES IN VIEW OF CANCELLATION OF PLAN TO LAY HEAVY STEEL ON RAILWAY ROUTE

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I am rising tonight to speak about the port of Churchill which, in light of recent events about which I will tell the House, does not have a very bright future.

Churchill has long been of priority concern to me. I have spoken in this House time and time again about how the port of Churchill must be developed if it is to remain operative and keep up with advancements in the grain handling system. I have told hon. members about the efficiency of the port. Churchill has been highlighted as one of the most productive and capable ports, for its size, in Canada. I have tried to convince the government that it must promote exports through Churchill and that the port has a capacity which far outweighs its current use. Churchill is capable of handling between 30 million and 40 million bushels of grain per season without difficulty, and the test year of 1976 proved that the port could easily handle a record shipment of 28.4 million bushels of grain.

The federal government has committed a great deal of money to the town of Churchill and to the port. The government funded an $11 million complex for the town, and a total federal budget of about $10 million has been committed for the restructuring and upgrading of the port. This estimate, however, has increased as the result of inflationary factors.

When broken into its elements the budget reveals that $200,000 will be expended to automate the scales and convert them to metric readings; $70,000 will be spent to improve loading chutes; $1.1 million is the anticipated cost of facilities for controlling grain dust; $500,000 will be spent on new staff quarters; $400,000 will be set aside for modifications to the tugboat there; $5.9 million will be expended over the next two years for dredging the port; and $800,000 was planned for changing the elevators to accommodate new aluminium hopper cars which will eventually replace Canadian National's fleet of grain handling boxcars.

It is with the last two items in mind that I am greatly concerned over a recent announcement by CNR that upgrading of the track to Churchill, which is necessary if the port is to keep up with CN's new grain hauling innovations, will not be completed as expected. Since there are moneys in the estimates for altering the car dumping mechanism to handle the new hopper cars, and since tenders have been called for the dredging of the turning basin at the port, it is my fear that these programs will have to be suspended as the result of CN's decision to discontinue upgrading of the track in question.

The Canadian National decision to halt work on the Herchmer subdivision could prevent Churchill from participating in long-term grain exports because the grain handling system in Canada is rapidly moving toward exclusive covered aluminum hopper car utilization. I have been led to understand that by 1986 the heavier aluminum hopper cars will have replaced the box cars that are currently in use on the Churchill line. If Canadian National Railways does not complete upgrading of the remaining 180 miles between Gillam and Churchill, the Churchill line will be obsolete in the realm of grain transport. Churchill could lose from 25 to 30 million bushels of northern Saskatchewan grain throughput if the line is not upgraded to accommodate the new cars.

The CN announcement which, incidentally, was brought to the attention of delegates to the 34th Annual Convention of the Hudson Bay Route Association in April of this year, came as a complete and utter shock to everyone. The Snavely Commission Report on Grain Handling Costs had recommended to the government that the 180 miles of track constituting the Herchmer subdivision north of Gillam be designated a "development" rather than a "grain dependent" line. CN, which had originally assumed that the line would be eligible for federal subsidy, had already invested $6 million in upgrading part of the line. Eighty-five per cent of the traffic on the Churchill line is grain. CN, however, cannot now justify a further expenditure of $15 million which is necessary for the completion of the line.

This entire situation has left me with the feeling that the government and CNR are in a flux. Although the government has injected a great deal of money into Churchill, it refuses to promote the port facilities. And until the Hall Report on grain handling and transportation is made available, the federal government will take no action itself in upgrading the Herchmer subdivision.

Then there is CN, which refuses to commit further expenditure on a line that, at this moment, appears as if it will never be profitable. The Snavely Report has reduced CN's confidence that money would be forthcoming for expenditures on the line. It, too, wants to hear the recommendations of the Hall Commission which, so far as I know, will be tabled Monday.

The people of Churchill, Mr. Speaker, do not know what is going on. They just do not understand why it is that their future is so precariously unstable. CN's decision, compounded by the government's refusal at least to reassure these people, has left eveyone with the impression that their livelihood and future are in jeopardy. The people of my riding are furious about the announcement. Feelings of exasperation are outweighed only by feelings of helplessness.

It can be argued that upgrading of a rail line that is so important to many people must be in the national interest, so it is incumbent upon the government to see that money is made available should the recommendations of the Hall Report not favour Churchill. In any event, I believe the government should promote exports through Churchill. If the port was promoted, then the rail line to Churchill could be very profitable to CN, for example, if commodities other than grain were moved.

The government must also promote greater co-operation between Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway in transporting commodities to the port. The government must also encourage the Canadian Wheat Board to make greater use of the port. But the single, most important matter with which the government should deal expeditiously is the upgrading of the rail bed between Gillam and Churchill so that it can handle the new hopper cars. As I pointed out earlier, Churchill has a lot to lose if that project is not completed. The whole future of the port depends upon its ability to handle the hopper cars.

I urge the government to take my comments into serious consideration, for the future of the port of Churchill rests in its hands. I would like to say in closing that the people—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the hon. member has raised this matter this evening. At the outset I want to assure him that the government does not share his pessimism regarding the future of the port of Churchill. About four years ago Canadian National Railways announced a program to upgrade its rail line to Churchill. This program would enable grain in the new style hopper cars to be handled all the way through to the northern port. Work has proceeded from the south and upgrading has generally been completed as far as Gillam. This leaves the northern section, known as the Herchmer subdivision, still to be upgraded.

● (2320)

Canadian National has applied, under the provisions of the Railway Act, to receive subsidy on the Herchmer subdivision. The Canadian Transport Commission has reviewed the case and subsidy payments were made for the years 1973, 1974, and 1976. No payments were made for the 1975 because of heavy sulphur shipments. The Canadian Transport Commission found that in that year no loss was in fact incurred on this line and no subsidy was therefore payable.

Earlier this year the Canadian National vice president for the western region announced at a Hudson Bay Route Association meeting that the railway had decided to delay plans for completing the upgrading work. The reason given was that the Commission with respect to the costs of transporting grain by rail, the Snavely Commission, which reported last December, found that the line was not a "grain dependent line." The interpretation by the railway seems to have been that because of the Snavely finding, the railway would not be eligible to receive reimbursement for capital investments made in the line. Quite frankly, it is hard to understand this reasoning because there is provision in the branch line subsidy program of the Railway Act to make such payments. The findings of the Snavely Commission really are not relevant in this context.

Canadian National has requested that its upgrading projects be treated as operating expenses so that they can be recovered through the subsidy process in the year in which the expense is incurred, rather than over the long-term life of the asset through depreciation.

The whole question of railway upgrading on this and other lines is one which will be taken up with the railways in the very near future. The Hall Commission on the prairie grain handling and transportation system has addressed itself to the over-all question of railway rehabilitation and upgrading and it is, of course, advisable to wait for this important report rather than to adopt an ad hoc approach to the prairie rail line problem. The Hall report is expected to be published at the beginning of next week.

In the meantime my hon. friend from Churchill can be assured that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is in contact with Canadian National, specifically in connection with the Herchmer subdivision. The importance of that rail line to the continuing viability of the port of Churchill is fully appreciated. Every effort is being made to ensure that the rail line does not restrict the port from playing its full role in future grain export programs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary but his allotted time has expired.

MULTICULTURALISM—PROVISION OF ENGLISH LANGUAGE TRAINING IN VANCOUVER SCHOOLS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, on May 3 I directed a question to the Minister of State responsible for Multiculturalism (Mr. Guay (St. Boniface)), and I asked of him information regarding the plans of his department to help the Vancouver School Board to provide a better standard of education for those students in the school system of Vancouver who need training in English as a second language. The minister's reply was confusing. It confused me, and also shows how confused the minister himself is. Even after several points of order had been raised he still could not get the matter straight. Eventually I dropped the subject and wrote him a letter. That I found it necessary to write a letter shows, I think that the minister does not know what is going on in the department. Finally, I sent the minister all the material which several members from British Columbia have received from the British Columbia school board.

The minister replied to my letter. Part of his letter reads:

> Since this matter falls within the jurisdiction of the hon. John Roberts, Secretary of State, I have forwarded the above-mentioned to him.

I wish he had told me in the House that the matter is not within the purview of his department because I could have directed a supplementary question to the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts). Be that as it may, I wish to point out to the parliamentary secretary some of the salient facts which face the Vancouver School Board as a result of the government's immigration policy. Again, the children are used as pawns. They are the innocent victims of the mismanagement of which the government is guilty.

The children have suffered ever since the former hon. member for Verdun, acting in his capacity as minister of manpower and immigration, introduced the new policy in 1968. The innocent children have been suffering because the support system which ought to have been in place for their benefit and that of their parents in Canada, was not in place. Without adequately investigating all that Canada can do for those new Canadians, or immigrants, the minister introduced a policy which has subjected those people to a lot of misery.

The brief that the Vancouver School Board sent to us points out, and I quote:

> Since 1975, the situation has reached the point where, for example, 42 per cent of our grade four children are from English as a second language background and we estimate that at least 40 per cent of our total school population come from homes where English is spoken as a second language.
> The Vancouver School Board is concerned that the federal government has ignored the special needs of this large segment of Vancouver's young society. We feel it incumbent on us to point out some of the problems encountered in the educational management of students who have English as a second language. Such students enter our educational system at various ages, from various cultures, particularly Asians in Vancouver, with varying educational standards, with the trauma described as cultural shock, with educational lag, and with a different native language.

It is not that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) has not heard about this because the Vancouver school board submitted a brief to him. I again quote from the brief:

> The Vancouver School Board has, as stated earlier, made presentations to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration without success. We find the negative responses from the federal government difficult to understand when we consider that:
> a) the Joint Parliamentary Committee has recommended to the government that direct funding be made available to school boards to assist in the education of immigrant youngsters;
> b) the problems regarding ESL students are a direct result of federal government immigration policies;
> c) although we have been told that constitutionally the responsibility for education lies with the provincial government, the federal government provides substantial grants for French language instruction and in the past has entered into agreements with provinces to upgrade vocational-technical facilities in secondary schools throughout the country and to provide funds for post secondary education;
> d) both the former and present B.C. ministers of education have assured us that there would be no problem in accepting federal funds for distribution to school districts for the education of ESL students.

[Mr. Friesen.]

Both ministers of education in the past two administrations said they would welcome this support. I would like an answer from the government. Is it going to implement a policy that works hardship on people and simply forget them? Is it going to neglect them? Is it going to provide the $2.9 million that is necessary for just the Vancouver School Board let alone the outlying regions of Vancouver, to provide the kind of education that is necessary if these youngsters in school and their parents at home are to become properly adjusted in our way of life and be able to make it on their own once they have been invited here? The people in Vancouver deserve an answer. We await that answer from the government.

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that major metropolitan school boards in all the principal immigrant reception areas of Canada, including Vancouver, have expressed increasing concern in recent years over their need to cope with effective teaching of immigrant children whose mother tongue is neither French nor English. Several such school boards, including the Greater Toronto, Scarborough and Vancouver school boards, have written to various of my colleagues setting out in detail the difficulties in which they find themselves.

As hon. members are no doubt aware, there have been for more than 20 years agreements between the federal government and the provincial governments under which the two levels of government share equally the cost of providing citizenship training, including language training, for adult immigrants. There are also agreements, with every province except British Columbia, under which the cost of language textbooks for such instruction is borne entirely by the federal government, subject to certain provisions on the rate of yearly increase.

In recent discussions on these agreements, officials of the various provincial governments have expressed their concern that the agreements are not applicable to children of school age, and have cited the various extra costs and expenses and difficulties that school systems encounter when there are very large numbers of immigrant children in the schools whose grasp of one or other of the official languages is not such as to allow them to progress at what is considered to be the usual rate. The concern of these provincial governments has been recognized and they have undertaken to provide further detailed information to the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) whose department administers these agreements. Under our constitutional system education is, of course, exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provincial governments.

I am informed that the Secretary of State is considering raising this matter with the Council of Ministers of Education, Canada; and no doubt, the school boards in the major immigrant reception areas—Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver and Winnipeg—will wish to convey their views on this to their respective departments of education.

I should also like to point out that legislation is currently before the House concerning immigration, and that one of the provisions of this legislation is for consultation with provincial governments on immigration demographics. As soon as the legislation is passed, and detailed consultations with the provincial governments can begin, some more systematic planning in this area will be possible.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—SOUTHWEST AFRICA—ALTERNATIVES TO TOURNHALLE CONFERENCE OFFERED BY DELEGATION

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, on April 25 I directed a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs with regard to Canadian participation in a delegation to South Africa, and received no answer to my question. Subsequently I directed a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on the same topic and received no answer.

I am curious as to the progress of this conference. We are told through newspaper accounts that Canada has sent senior diplomats to join those of Britain, the United States, France, and West Germany in talks with the Prime Minister of South Africa regarding the future of the territory known as Southwest Africa. I realize it is rather heady stuff for Canada to be part of a five-power conference when the other four participants have been traditionally regarded as great powers in the world. But I wonder whether the government realizes what it is getting into.

Southwest Africa is a quarter of a million square miles in extent. It is larger than the combined areas of England, Austria, Sweden, Belgium, Denmark, The Netherlands, Portugal and Hungary. It is two thirds the area of South Africa itself. I have a feeling that the delegation which has officially gone out, and about which so little has appeared in the newspapers, is probably less informed on conditions in South Africa than were the volunteers who sailed to take part in the Boer War almost 80 years ago.

I am amazed that the government should send any representatives, whether we have a seat on the Security Council or not, to talk to the prime minister of South Africa about the future independence of Southwest Africa. I wonder what commitments we have made in terms of the policing of that land in the future. Our experience in becoming involved in United Nations peacekeeping is one of perpetual involvement. I doubt whether the impoverished United Nations organization is in any shape to finance the policing of that vast territory. And, somehow, I doubt that we are either.

I wonder if there was a commitment there to become part of the occupational force which would supervise the proposed elections in the regions. I wonder whether we have undertaken any commitment to the various native groups of that land and whether we have any real regard for the future of the kind of state which would be formed if it followed the pattern of so many other states in Africa—I think of Uganda as an example to chill the mind—as we consider turning over Southwest Africa to that possibility.

It is very strange indeed to find the government involved in all this at a time when we have just received a report on affairs in northern Canada, a report which discusses the homeland and spells out in chilling words a policy of apartheid for Canada and one which will certainly influence the discussion of native claims in this country for a long time to come. We have in the past rejected outright the policies of the South African government. We have refused, for example, to recognize the existence of the State of Transkei. Yet we are part of a representational group of five nations who are off to Johannesburg to talk seriously to the Prime Minister of South Africa about the future of Southwest Africa, when our own native policies in this country are a record of failure from start to finish. It seems to me absolutely presumptuous that we should form part of any delegation going that far to instruct South Africa as to what it should do, either in South Africa itself or in any neighbouring territory.

We have heard little about this matter, Mr. Speaker. We have had no progress report. The minister is not here tonight. I hope we will be given some reassurance that we have not started down the road to an endless commitment in another peacekeeping operation, because I suspect that once the South African government has withdrawn, if it does withdraw, from Southwest Africa there will be a bloodbath there unless the United Nations is prepared to supervise that territory for a very long time.

Have we had any assurance from the Soviet government that they will help to pay the cost? Although they have demanded removal of South Africa from the United Nations, they have refused to make any commitment to pay the cost of what is to come if the United Nations take over the territory. Have we had any regard for the people of Namaland, Okavangoland, Boesmanland, Hereroland, or Damaraland? What commitment have we given to them or to the people of Ovamboland, the most populous of all of the proposed homelands in the area?

What has this delegation gone to South Africa to talk about? It seems to me that if we have some good minds on how to handle native relations they should be transferred from external affairs to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development so that they can begin to tell the government what to do about our own problems in this country.

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the persistent illegal occupation of the international territory of Namibia by the South African government has been of concern to the international community since way before 1966, at which time its responsibility was entrusted to the United Nations. Canada voted for the resolution of the United Nations General Assembly in that regard, and the decision was later reaffirmed repeatedly by the Security Council, and also in 1971 by the International Court of Justice.

Despite that clear manifestation of the international will on the matter, South Africa has refused to recognize the responsibility of the United Nations towards that territory and, in recent years, took unilateral steps finally to grant Namibia some form of independence. In fact, in 1975, South Africa organized at Windhoek, capital of the territory, constitutional talks based on ethnic representation, but excluding some interested Namibian political groups. Those discussions continued in spite of Security Council resolution 385 passed on January 30, 1976, that provided among other things for the holding of a free election in the territory organized under the supervision and control of the United Nations, to lead to the total independence of the United Nations and the total independence of a united Namibia.

The government of Canada and the governments of France, the United Kingdom, the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany support the Security Council petitions without reservation and feel that only a settlement in accordance with the provisions of resolution 385 will be considered acceptable by the international community. That is the message which our representatives conveyed to the South African government in Capetown.

The discussions between South Africa and the five governments are only preliminary and are mainly aimed at determining whether it is possible to arrive at a settlement of the Namibian problem in accordance with resolution 385. Any major aspect of a settlement of the conflict should be secured between the UN and South Africa. It follows from the foregoing that the terms of reference presiding over the ongoing discussions do not cover issues like upholding the peace or sharing expenditures, which come under the United Nations.

The first phase of the discussions that ended Friday April 29 was characterized by open and useful exchanges between the representatives of the five governments and that of South Africa. The five governments are now examining the results of those discussions and are considering further talks to take place soon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

PROPOSAL TO DENY SALARY TO PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise to move a motion of vital importance to parliament and to Canada. In view of the fact that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Pelletier) admitted last night before the Standing Committee on Agriculture that he is not knowledgeable about agriculture and attempted to ask questions of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) in that committee, and in view of the fact that the responsibility of parliamentary secretaries is to answer questions in the absence of their respective ministers, for which they receive additional remuneration, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That parliamentary secretaries not be paid the extra stipend for that position when they are not capable of performing their assigned duties, that of replying to reasonable questions pertaining to the ministers to which they are attached; and that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture be denied the salary paid to him as such until such time as he at least has read the Farmer's Almanac.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville.

REQUEST FOR DECISION ON CHICKEN MARKETING BOARD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion under Standing Order 43 as well. Imports of broilers have increased to levels 50 times what they were five years ago. The over-all loss in gross economic activity in Canada resulting from the importation of broilers in 1976 alone is estimated by the Agricultural Economics Research Council to be over $101 million. Given the attempt by large food giants to undercut a national chicken marketing board by raising imports to this level, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That this House urge the government to make a decision on a national board immediately since the longer the delay the more difficult it will be to operate that board in an effective manner.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

CONTINUATION OF SERVICE TO CHURCHILL BY RADIO STATION CHFC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to deal with a matter which is of urgent and pressing necessity to the people of the town of Churchill. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has as its mandate extending national television and radio service to all areas of Canada. It has designed a $150 million program, known as the accelerated coverage plan, and northern Manitoba has been a beneficiary of this program. English language FM and AM radio and television repeater stations have been installed, and pursuant to obligations imposed on the CBC by the Broadcasting Act to extend national services in both languages, French radio and television now serves the north; the CBC now, contrary to its mandate, will terminate the CBC English language radio station in Churchill, Manitoba, after 25 years of service, and since there is no other radio service to the area, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman):

● (1110)

That the CBC, as a federal Crown corporation, be instructed to continue the present service of CHFC Radio to this community.

REQUEST FOR EXEMPTION OF NORTHWEST QUEBEC FROM PRICE INCREASE ON GASOLINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a question of pressing necessity.

Since the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) has stated that the price of gas and heating oil would increase by 14 cents a gallon within two years and since northwest Quebec is now paying almost 10 cents more for gas than the rest of the country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to take the necessary steps to exempt northwest Quebec from the forthcoming price increases on gas till the prices paid in that area are comparable to those paid in the remainder of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

ALLEGATION STATEMENTS IN "SEX EDUCATION: A TEACHER'S GUIDE" IN CONFLICT WITH CRIMINAL CODE PROVISIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

PROPOSED SPONSORSHIP OF INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE INTO RISKS OF OIL EXPLORATION IN ARCTIC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that Canada is the first Arctic nation to commence drilling offshore in the Arctic waters; in view of the serious risk not only to our northern waters, but also to Arctic waters shared by our neighbours, the United States, Denmark, Norway and the Soviet Union, as pointed out in the Berger Report; in view of the possibility that an accumulation of oil in the Arctic could affect the northern climate by the albedo effect and all cause irreversible damage to the polar environment; and in view of the fact that there is no international agreement on Arctic development, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth):

That Canada sponsor an international conference of Arctic nations to commence joint research into the risks and consequences of oil and gas exploration and transportation activities in the Arctic Ocean.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CONFEDERATION

SPEECH BY GORDON ROBERTSON—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON VIEWS EXPRESSED

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put my question to the Acting Prime Minister. It concerns a speech made by Mr. Gordon Robertson, secretary to the Cabinet, on federal-provincial relations when he spoke of the division of Quebec in the event that northern Quebecers voting in a future referendum do not vote to separate. I say that this can only be taken to mean that the government is prepared to at least partially comply with the results of a separation referendum. Would the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether that speech represents government policy and if not, what authority did this senior public servant have?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was aware personally that Mr. Robertson intended to make this speech. His views are his views. They are his views on a personal, individual basis, they are not necessarily government policy and were not intended to be an expression of government policy.

CONTINGENCY PLANS IF QUEBEC SEPARATES

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that in his speech the head of the federal-provincial relations secretariat of the cabinet was speaking not on a matter of government policy. In fact, so far as the government is concerned, he has been denounced by the Acting Prime Minister for what he said. The speech also took the form of a blueprint for discussing the separation process, for discussing technicalities, at least in the context of the death of our country, such as the ownership of the Canadian National Railways in Quebec, the St. Lawrence Seaway and the division of the national debt. Will the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether this speech represented contingency plans for separation being made by the government and whether there are any plans of this nature being formulated by the government?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would immediately want to correct any impression I may have created that I had denounced Mr. Robertson's speech. I tried to make it clear that Mr. Robertson was speaking as an individual Canadian and I think his speech was an impressive contribution to the debate on national unity.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: And it was not government policy?

Mr. MacEachen: The speech could be read with profit by all. That is the context in which we ought to regard the speech and we should not conclude from it that these are government plans or that it is an indirect way of indicating government policy. Mr. Robertson is one of the most knowledgeable and experienced men in this field, and it is excellent that he should have spoken out and given us his views on this question at this particular time.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister did not answer the question I asked, namely, whether the government is preparing contingency plans for separation, which is the issue we are considering, and whether in his speech Mr. Robertson indicated that those plans are either in existence or being formulated by the government. Sir, the speech also discussed the notion that the federal government might be willing to ensure that those people living in regions where a majority voted against separation could remain inside the union. Will the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether this policy will apply to other parts of Quebec, such as the Gaspé or Montreal, or what is the government's policy in that respect, if it has any policy?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, first, there are no contingency plans. That ought to be made perfectly clear, and in so saying I am answering the question the hon. member asked. The answer is, no.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): What about the answer to my second question?

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING THIRD ORGANIZATION CONCERNED WITH UNITY

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister? We now have two bureaucracies dealing with national unity, and a short time ago the Prime Minister promised a third which seems to be a vehicle for recycling Jean-Luc Pepin. In view of the obvious confusion which surrounds the roles of the various unity agencies being set up by the government, will the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether there are now any definite plans to establish the third unity organization to which the Prime Minister referred?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not clear what the hon. member means by a "third unity organization". It is unknown to me. I would say, in reply to the hon. member, that I hope at an early date to arrange a debate in the House of Commons on the question of national unity, and I believe that would be a good occasion to explore all the options the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. Paproski: Can we expect that debate before 1978?

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ALLEGED CONFLICT BETWEEN QUEBEC LANGUAGE CHARTER AND JAMES BAY AGREEMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I understand, from the Acting Prime Minister's answer, that the government will set up no further national unity organizations. May I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development? Mr. Robertson, in the speech referred to by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, also raised the question of the rights of native people in northern Quebec. Last week the minister said he would be examining Bill 1 of the province of Quebec with a view to ascertaining its impact on native rights in general and the James Bay Agreement, Bill C-9, in particular. Is he now prepared to tell this House what is the legal opinion or whether he intends to take any steps to further test the constitutionality of this legislation?

● (1120)

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet received the legal opinion on Bill 1, but I have had discussions with the chief in charge of the Quebec Indian Association. He has confirmed to me his opposition to Bill 1. That is Chief Andrew Delisle. I received from Chief Billy Diamond his exact words on this question in which he states that he cannot accept any legislation in Quebec which would be contrary to his rights under the Indian Act or the James Bay settlement. I intend to support him on that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Will the minister undertake to the House to have that legal opinion brought forward before the statute of limitation expires? Also, will he tell us precisely when he expects to be able to report to the House in so far as the legal opinion is concerned and whether the government is going to take any action to test the constitutionality of Bill 1 by reference to the courts rather than giving us reports as to whom he has spoken outside of the legal side of things.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to make the legal opinion known as soon as I receive it. The lawyers are doing work. As the hon. member knows, they must do it thoroughly and carefully.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: These non-lawyers do not understand. My hon. friend will understand. In any event, the work will be done well in advance of the passage of the bill. As well, I promised the Indians in Quebec that we would not proclaim the bill until this matter is settled.

NORTHERN PIPELINE—REASON FOR FAILURE TO REQUEST UNITED STATES TO POSTPONE DEADLINE FOR DECISION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, as a non-lawyer I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a question.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You are not only a non-lawyer, you are a non-nothing.

Mr. Baldwin: You are not even a good client.

Mr. Broadbent: According to a press report, the United States Ambassador to Canada, Mr. Thomas Enders, indicated in a very clear way that the United States is not under undue pressure to reach a decision on a northern gas pipeline. Since this assertion by the United States ambassador confirms what I said earlier in the week in this House, will the Acting Prime Minister explain why the government of Canada has not requested a postponement of the September 1 date at which time the Prime Minister of Canada informed President Carter that he would give our country's recommendation on a pipeline decision.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Prime Minister has indicated several times the desire of the government to reach a decision as quickly as possible, hopefully, which is the word he used in London, by September 1. If that time frame is not achievable, it would then of course be an option to consider whether the President ought to be requested to extend this period. I find it difficult to understand why the hon. member is constantly raising this question of more time. He does not seem to need very much time because he made up his mind on the Berger report in three days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: We will deal with the brilliance of that answer in about a half hour's time. Since the Prime Minister, both in his statements inside the House and outside the House in Europe, has always indicated that the pressure was coming from the United States for a September 1 deadline decision, since the United States Ambassador as recently as yesterday apparently said there is no such pressure and since the energy adviser to the President of the United States, Mr. Schlesinger, indicated there is no such pressure, why is the government of Canada maintaining that we must make a September 1 deadline decision when, as the Acting Prime Minister should know, there are so many unresolved issues, particularly on the Alcan possibility, which will not be settled by September 1.

Mr. MacEachen: I think the hon. member misunderstands the source of the pressure. The pressure arises from the United States law which obliges the President to meet a certain time frame.

Mr. Broadbent: Check again!

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): You check again!

Mr. MacEachen: What the Prime Minister is saying is that we ought to make up our minds and not be overtaken by events elsewhere over which we have no control.

Mr. Broadbent: That is not only nonsense, it is palpable nonsense.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Look who's talking about nonsense!

Mr. Broadbent: It will not do the minister any good to smile. Is he aware that the President of the United States is able to extend the deadline by 90 days, and, if he is, will he explain why the Canadian government, through its ambassador or through the Secretary of State for External Affairs, has not requested that use be made of such an option? I believe the United States expects a little initiative to be shown on our part.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROBLEMS CAUSED BY TIMETABLE CHANGE ON SAGUENAY-LAC-SAINT-JEAN ROUTE

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport dealing once more with the passenger service in the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area. In the last few weeks, the timetable has been changed in our area; the CN realized it was an impossible schedule and finally came back to the former one, which is satisfactory to us. However, we had requested an inquiry into passenger service and a few weeks ago I received a reply. I had addressed my letter to the CN St. Lawrence region and a Mr. Yvon H. Matte answered my request by saying Mr. Emery Leblanc was the one involved in this matter. I then wrote to Mr. Leblanc who told me that the matter did not come under his jurisdiction and he sent me to Mr. Adrien Levasseur who said that this was not his problem but rather that of the Canadian Transport Commission.

I would like the minister to enlighten me a little and try to find the responsible person in this matter.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will see whether I can help the hon. member.

REASON FOR USE OF OLD COACHES ON SAGUENAY-LAC-SAINT-JEAN ROUTE

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, while the minister is trying to do his best, I shall ask him a small service: I do not know if it is meant to play a trick on people in my constituency, but an old passenger car has just been put in service, directly from the museum, a coach which dates back to 1900, with wooden benches and heated with a huge oil furnace. That is making fun of people! I thought it was to save energy! I urge the minister to examine the matter and at the same time try to communicate with Mr. Robert—we also call him "Roberts" and "Robert"—he is responsible for that, and to put an end to that joke, because that is making fun of people!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REASON FOR EARLY RETIREMENT OF ADMIRAL BOYLE

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to direct to the Minister of National Defence. Yesterday the hon. gentleman put out a very uninformative press release concerning the early retirement of Vice-Admiral Boyle, the senior naval officer in the Canadian Forces. Will he enlighten the House as to the reasons for this early retirement, bearing in mind that last year the Admiral received the Order of Military Merit in the grade of Commander for conspicuous merit and exceptional service to Canada?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): I think the press release was explicit. It reflects the normal rotation of commanders which has taken place throughout the armed forces with the appointment of the new CDS. Admiral Boyle has served with distinction and vigour. I had hoped he would serve even longer but he has chosen to take early retirement. It is a decision I regret, but I know the country and the Navy in particular are grateful for his distinguished services.

● (1130)

Mr. McKinnon: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister deny that Admiral Boyle was asked to resign some few weeks ago but refused to do so? Or is the minister telling the House that action culminating in the early retirement of the senior naval officer in our forces was carried to an irreversible stage without his knowledge?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I can absolutely deny the allegation of the hon. member. Quite the reverse was the case; he was asked to remain and, as a matter of fact, at that time indicated that he would.

Mr. McKinnon: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister may use whatever euphemisms he wishes to attempt to conceal the fact that Admiral Boyle was fired by the route of being made an offer that he could not possibly accept.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKinnon: Is it not true that after he declined to resign he was offered a position which would have removed him from any participation in naval affairs for the rest of his service?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is still suggesting that the admiral was asked to resign. He was not asked to resign. Admiral Boyle is acting completely on his own volition, and indeed the other work that I had hoped he would take would be of considerable importance to the future of the armed forces of this country.

NORTHERN PIPELINE—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES UNTIL LYSYK COMMISSION REPORTS

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. There is a report today from U.S. government sources that the government of Canada will have to start formal negotiations with the United States on a pipeline across Canada by mid-August, if not several weeks sooner, if we hope to have any say in the United States government's decision, and that the extra time is needed for the President to meet his deadline of September 1. Will the government state unconditionally that there will be no such negotiations until the Lysyk commission has reported? It is supposed to report by August 1. Will the minister state that there will be no negotiations with the United States until after that report is received?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of a report to that effect. It is not the intention of the government of Canada to open negotiations with the United States within the time frame suggested. It is obvious that there will be discussions between the two countries from time to time on these questions, but the matter of negotiations is not in the cards within the time frame suggested.

NORTHERN PIPELINE—POSSIBILITY OF DEBATE PRIOR TO DECISION ON CONSTRUCTION

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Acting Prime Minister will agree, I am sure, that the deadline set in the United States is one set by legislation, and that legislation can always be changed if need be. Would the Acting Prime Minister confirm whether or not this timetable is the main reason the government refuses to allow the House to debate this issue before the government makes a decision, or is it possible that the government will permit the House to debate this whole issue when all the reports are in and before a decision is made?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can give the hon. member an assurance that the government will give the House an opportunity to debate the matter before a decision is reached. As the hon. member may have noticed, I have put a motion on the order paper which is intended to provide for such debate as the occasion warrants it. It will be my intention to call that motion at a suitable time. For example, if further discussion is required on the Berger report, I could call it at a later point in the session if necessary, say following the NEB report. So the House will have an opportunity to debate the question on a number of occasions prior to any decision being taken by the government. I can give the hon. member that assurance without any conditions.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

POSSIBILITY OF CANCELLATION OF MOVING INCOME TAX DIVISION TO JONQUIÈRE

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, since he is responsible for the federal services decentralization program.

A year ago, the minister announced that a tax data centre would be built in Jonquière, even though the Quebec government introduced its Bill number 1, which may affect the teaching language of the children of federal civil servants who will come to Quebec, and in spite of the statement made yesterday by the Quebec premier, who said he was fed up with federal ministers who act as terrorists. Does the minister see himself as one of those ministers and does he intend to change his decision regarding the building of that tax data centre in Jonquière?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should be angry now because Mr. Lévesque has called me names. I think I will tell mommy. I feel it is absolutely ridiculous. Nevertheless, I do not intend to change the decision we have made. However, some other decentralizations will be proposed and I have told the Quebec government that if they cannot give the Anglophone civil servants who would have to settle in Quebec the guarantee that their children could attend English schools, we will not be able to decentralize in this province.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Lévesque referred yesterday to the decentralization in Charlottetown, and again this morning I have contacted Premier Campbell of Prince Edward Island who told me that if Francophones were to be transferred to Charlottetown, French schools would be available for them. So I would like Mr. Lévesque to show the same generosity vis-à-vis the Anglophone civil servants who could have to settle in Quebec as Mr. Campbell is showing vis-à-vis the Francophones who could be transferred to Charlottetown.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—NEW PROGRAMS TO REDUCE LEVEL

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the Conference Board survey published today which shows that consumers are growing increasingly uncertain about the national economy and their belief that inflation will worsen in the next few months, and in view of the fact that the real economic growth declined in the final three months of 1976 and that unemployment rose to more than 8 per cent, is the government now giving consideration to new programs to reduce this disastrously high level of unemployment?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in general terms the answer was given yesterday to questions about possible changes in economic management policy. I have not seen the Conference Board report and I will certainly take a look at it.

POSSIBILITY GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA EXPRESSING GOVERNMENT POLICY IN HALIFAX SPEECH

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Was the Governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Bouey, expressing government policy when he said in a speech in Halifax recently that putting more money into the economy and increasing government expenditures to restore strong economic growth and high employment would only compound Canada's difficulties rather than resolve them?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Governor of the Bank of Canada speaks for himself and he certainly has the status to do that.

DROUGHT

INQUIRY AS TO ARRANGEMENTS TO DEAL WITH SITUATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. On May 4 I brought up the question of drought conditions, particularly in the Palliser triangle. While there have been some rains since, they have done no more in the Palliser triangle area than postpone the seriousness of drought. I ask the minister whether or not any preliminary investigations have taken place and arrangements made as to the course to be followed if serious drought follows in the days ahead?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the right hon. member for Prince Albert is aware of our announcement last Friday in the House. There have been interdepartmental discussions. I also had some discussions with three of the provincial ministers of agriculture from the western provinces when they were here on Wednesday. We have arranged a meeting for next week in Regina. We have appointed a federal co-ordinator in Regina who is one of our top advisers in western Canada to work with the provinces to co-ordinate efforts and actions and to put them into force. We will be meeting the provincial ministers no later than next Friday, possibly sooner if we can arrange that kind of meeting. Our officials are having another meeting here on Monday to put forward the final type of system that is needed. As the right hon. gentleman knows, that committee consists of members of the cabinet from western Canada who will be meeting with officials, plus the minister in charge of DREE and the President of the Treasury Board.

● (1140)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the minister that I deeply appreciate what he has just announced. There has been some mention made by him about ministers from western Canada. I wonder whether the lion and the lamb are going out to Saskatchewan to look into the drought situation. The hon. Minister without Portfolio and the Minister of Transport are supposed to be in Saskatchewan today in the Pelly constituency where there is a by-election. Are they going out there to look at the drought or the political drought of the Liberal Party?

ROYAL COMMISSION ON CORPORATE CONCENTRATION

REPLACEMENT OF CHAIRMAN, ROBERT BRYCE—INTENTION OF COMMISSION TO ISSUE REPORT

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government has made a decision as to who is to replace, if anyone, Mr. Robert Bryce as chairman of the Royal Commission on the Concentration of Economic Power?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, no decision has been taken on that point. I should say, in order to avoid a misunderstanding, that it is not the intention of the government to add a further person to the royal commission. That option has been explored, as I understand it, with the two remaining commissioners. Because of their desire to complete the report by September of this year, it was decided not to appoint a new person to the commission because if that happened it would obviously delay further the making of the report.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Do I take it from his answer that he is now giving an unequivocal undertaking to the House of Commons, which he was not able to do a week or so ago, that a report will be issued from the Royal Commission on the Concentration of Economic Power?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the two remaining commissioners to produce a report, and as I understand it, to make it available in September, if possible. That is certainly the wish of the government. The report will obviously be made public although we all realize the regrettable resignation of the chairman has altered, to some extent, the balanced composition that had hitherto existed within the commission.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary will be short. Just to be absolutely certain, this report will come out under the auspices of the royal commission and will not come out as a special report of the Economic Council of Canada?

Mr. MacEachen: That is right, Mr. Speaker. That was an option that had been considered at one point. It was abandoned, and the intention is it will come out under the auspices of the remaining commissioners.

PUBLIC SERVICE

POSSIBILITY OF IMPLEMENTING RECOMMENDATIONS IN FIFTH REPORT OF ADVISORY GROUP ON EXECUTIVE COMPENSATION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board which arises out of the fifth report of the advisory group on executive compensation in the Public Service. May I ask the President of the Treasury Board if he intends to adopt any of the recommendations that have been advanced in this report, and if so, is he in a position to outline those recommendations which he is considering at the present time?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we are examining that report with great interest. We are giving it consideration. When a decision is arrived at, it will be made known.

USE OF PERFORMANCE STANDARDS TO SET EXECUTIVE COMPENSATION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, since the committee placed great emphasis on the performance assessments and the need of establishing principles of accountability which can be applied to clear and, if possible, quantifiable terms in respect of activities and responsibilities of executive personnel, could I ask the minister if he is undertaking any new initiatives in that particular area with respect to performance measurement standards?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the comment on the performance measurement standards referred to in the report of the committee on executive compensation was critical of perhaps the over-enthusiasm which has been applied to some of the assessments throughout the senior executive group. Certainly, we are conscious of this and are inclined to agree it has been a bit extravagant. We have taken steps to alert all the people involved in such assessments. Their standards must be more rigorously applied and indeed we would expect to see a more credible group of assessments of those people.

On the second point concerning the accountability of senior executives of the Public Service, as the hon. member knows, we are examining that area very carefully. Indeed, it will be a very fundamental part of the Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability which is undertaking that analysis now.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UNITED NATIONS SUGAR CONFERENCE—REASON CANADA INSISTING SUGAR STOCKS BE PAID FOR BY PRODUCING NATIONS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister on a matter in which I am sure he is most interested. It concerns the ninth United Nations Sugar Conference rapidly coming to conclusion in Geneva. In view of reports that hopes for an agreement at this conference are fading, despite the fact the Secretary General of UNCTAD (Gamini Corea) sees an earlier agreement on sugar stabilization as a major test of the sincerity of the support expressed for a common fund by Canada and the other six industrialized nations at the recent London summit, will the minister indicate why Canada is insisting that all sugar stocks be paid for solely by producing nations—a position which runs contrary to what we agreed under the Tin Commodity Agreement?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check into that particular situation and provide the information later to the hon. member.

UNITED NATIONS SUGAR CONFERENCE—COMPOSITION OF CANADIAN DELEGATION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, while the minister is checking into that aspect of the negotiations, I wonder whether he would also provide to the House some indication as to the composition of the delegation. In view of the implications for the Canadian consumers, could he indicate whether there is a full representation, not only from the major sugar companies, but from consumer groups as well as direct agricultural interests which surely must be important to a balanced delegation on this subject?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will also do that.

AIRPORTS

PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF FACILITIES IN NORTHWEST NEW BRUNSWICK—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, during the oral question period on the eve of the last sitting day before Christmas, I asked the Minister of Transport whether he had made up his mind about building an airport in St. Léonard, in northwest New Brunswick, and the minister replied that I had done enough already and that no further action on my part was needed. In spite of that, I have been fairly active, Mr. Speaker, and I now want to ask the Minister of Transport whether the cabinet has made its final decision in connection with the construction of airport facilities in the Atlantic provinces, including St. Léonard, and what are the odds on the construction work starting before the first snow?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the matter is progressing favourably although the final and detailed decisions have not been taken into consideration completely. I expect, however, to have more news for the hon. member within the next three weeks.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

GOVERNMENT SECRECY—FREEDOM OF PUBLIC SERVANTS TO MAKE COMMENTS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister which is related to the very searching and intelligent question asked by the learned and hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. It deals with some statements made by Mr. Gordon Robertson to a parliamentary committee dealing with secrecy in government. Some of us in that committee have laboured under the impression the government was secretive because they wanted to hide mistakes, bad judgment and improper instructions given by deputy ministers to their ministers. Mr. Gordon Robertson said, however, that the purpose of secrecy in government was to permit public servants to be open-handed and anonymous. He was supported in that by the hon. member for Eglinton. Has the government now rejected that position, and will public servants now be allowed to be more open and free in the comments they make?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that has always been the position of the government.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY IF MINISTER CONSULTED ON FOOD POLICY AND POLICY ON MARKETING BOARDS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. On May 2, 1977 at Montebello the Minister of Agriculture, in his speech to the National Dairy Council of Canada, said:

> . . . the Minister of Agriculture . . . in some ways is the last one to be consulted on food policy . .

I would like to ask the minister whether he has any input at all into the food policy that has been drafted by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and if he does not, what is he going to do about it?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, you heard what the hon. member said. He said, "in some ways". Those ways are so insignificant that perhaps I should not have mentioned them.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister can explain his remarks further on in his speech when he goes on to say that when the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs drafted a policy on marketing boards, and I quote, "we simply weren't consulted although . . ." I wonder if the minister could explain that statement and explain what he is doing to make sure he will be consulted on a food policy. If he is not, does he mean what he says, that he will resign?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we certainly do have full consultation on food strategy such as we are talking about. There may be the odd thing which comes out on which we are not fully consulted. I do not hesitate to make a comment on it. I do appreciate the hon. member's reference to my talk to that distinguished group of people, the dairy processors from all across Canada, who commended the government and the Minister of Agriculture for what they are doing for the dairy industry.

ENERGY

USE OF SOLAR ENERGY IN DESIGNING PUBLIC BUILDINGS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. A draft financial report of the Department of Supply and Services indicates that on present trends only 5,000 solar houses will be built in the next decade, which is far below the estimated potential of 750,000 during the same period, because there has been no clear, unequivocal commitment by the government to encourage solar installations through low interest mortgages, loans and grants. In view of the Carter administration's widespread implementation of solar energy in its public buildings program, has the government made any plans for a single public office building in the future using solar energy?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I mentioned, in answer to a question earlier this week, that there were two specific projects underway with respect to retrofit in the Ottawa area. I am not at liberty at the moment to indicate which they are, but I hope to be able to make an announcement shortly. They would not be set up with the idea of providing full solar energy for heating, but a substantial portion of the heat would be provided from this source.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): I hope very shortly, Mr. Speaker.

DROUGHT

ALLEGED APPOINTMENT OF MINISTER WITHOUT PORTFOLIO TO STUDY LONG-TERM EFFECTS

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister without Portfolio. I wonder if the minister would confirm to the House that he has been commissioned by the Prime Minister to study the long-term effects of the drought and to correlate that with the findings of the Berger commission. Perhaps I can ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If it is true that the Minister without Portfolio is no longer allowed to talk about these things in public, I will direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

An hon. Member: Resign.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister without Portfolio): I thank the hon. member for his question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: I want to assure him and the House through you, Mr. Speaker, that no constraints are placed upon me—

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DISCONTINUATION OF SERVICE TO CHURCHILL BY RADIO STATION CHFC—CORPORATION POLICY

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State responsible for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Last night in Churchill, Manitoba, CBC officials held a town meeting with the residents of Churchill and informed them that the radio station CHFC, after 25 years of service, would be discontinued. I wish to ask the minister if this is part of the CBC's accelerated coverage program—now that they have brought in French FM and French TV to northern Manitoba—to phase out an English radio station?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I shall undertake to bring the representation of the hon. member to the CBC and reply forthwith, giving him a full explanation of the factors which led the CBC to make the initial announcement to his constituents last night.

CUSTOMS

POSSIBILITY OF REFUSING ENTRY TO PORNOGRAPHIC FILMS

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact that the Supreme Court of Canada upheld a decision made by customs officials to refuse entry into Canada of printed pornographic material, can the minister say whether or not there are regulations under which pornographic films can be denied entry to Canada by customs officials similar to those applied to pornographic printed material?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, when the officers of my department ban such a film, they are acting under a tariff item under the Tariff Act.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF ASKING SENATE TO INVESTIGATE SAFEGUARDS OF NATIVE INTERESTS IN JAMES BAY AGREEMENT

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Can he say whether there have been any discussions with the government leaders in the Senate to ask them to take a sober second look at the ratification of the James Bay Agreement in light of the recent developments in Quebec and in light of the recent statements by Chief Delisle who is now concerned about the safeguards that have been built into the agreement by the federal government protecting the interests of the native people signatory to the agreement?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I did not ask the Senate to give any sober second look to Bill C-9. As a matter of fact, I asked the leader of the Senate to pass the bill quickly, and so have the Indians. I do not think the hon. member interprets Chief Delisle correctly. I saw Chief Delisle this morning and he never expressed those views to me.

CONFLICT BETWEEN QUEBEC LANGUAGE CHARTER AND JAMES BAY AGREEMENT—TEST OF CONSTITUTIONALITY OF QUEBEC BILL

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, Chief Delisle made of course a number of public statements. He is concerned about the recent legislative proposals in the province of Quebec and he is concerned at the prospect—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a supplementary question?

Mr. Oberle: Can the minister tell the House whether he will cause an investigation to be carried out of the validity and the legality of the agreement and of the bill which will offend the agreement, a bill which is proposed in the Quebec legislature at this time?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): The hon. member is correct. Chief Delisle is concerned about Bill I and its effects with respect to the Indian people in Quebec. As I said in answer to an earlier question, I have requested a legal opinion on that bill and its relationship to the James Bay settlement. As soon as I get the legal opinion, I will make it known to the House.

AIRPORTS

REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT OF FACILITIES AT ÎLES-DE-LA-MADELEINE AND GASPÉ—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Following the recent meeting of Department of Transport officials with public representatives for the Îles-de-la-Madeleine and Gaspé areas, to iron out the last minute details concerning the necessary and urgent improvements—considered as a priority by the minister himself—to the Îles-de-la-Madeleine and Gaspé airports, could the minister advise the House whether he will soon make an announcement concerning the calls for tenders for the work which has been delayed too long already and which should start before the first snow, to use the expression conned by my colleague the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria a while ago?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am very conscious of the concern of the hon. member from the Gaspé area about this matter. I understand I am to receive a report as a result of those meetings as early as next week, and following that I should be able to take the necessary action to secure the improvements which have been sought for so long.

ENERGY

GASOLINE AND FUEL OIL—POSSIBILITY OF EXEMPTING NORTHWEST QUEBEC FROM PRICE INCREASES

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Bearing in mind the recent statements of the minister to the effect that the price of gas and heating oil will be going up by 14 cents over the next two years, and the fact that people in northwest Quebec are now paying 10 cents a gallon more than in the rest of the province of Quebec, can the minister tell the House whether he is willing to consider the possibility of exempting areas such as northwest Quebec from the coming price increases to have parity between that part of the province and the rest of it?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of exempting any one part of the country or any one part of a province. There is a differential in retail prices for gasoline in the province of Quebec. There are differentials in virtually all provinces, I suppose. These differentials are partly caused by additional transportation costs, but the largest part of the differential is caused by market forces, and if there is concern on the part of the hon. member about marketing arrangements within his province, then I think he should speak to the provincial authorities about that.

REASON PRICE OF GASOLINE IS HIGHER IN ROUYN THAN KIRKLAND LAKE

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell us why we, in Rouyn, are paying 15 cents or even 20 cents more a gallon than in Kirkland Lake, some 15 miles away, when he claims that the higher prices in northwest Quebec depend on transportation costs?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had listened to all of my answer, he would know that I placed the major emphasis on market forces and competition.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

ALLEGED USE OF TWO DIFFERENT INDICES AS BASIS FOR PENSION INCREASES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In the envelopes in which the recent Canada Pension Plan cheques were mailed there were enclosures, one of which stated that the cost of living during the year had risen by 8.2 per cent, and that that was the reason for the enclosed cheque. The other one stated that the consumer price index over the past 12 months has increased 8.6 per cent. I am tempted to ask from which branch within Statistics Canada the minister gets his information, but I will ask why he uses two different indices to pro rate the increase on the pension cheques and why there is therefore a different amount which the pensioners get under that system.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member gave himself the trouble of checking the text of the act passed by Parliament some three or four years ago to index pensions under the Canada Pension Plan, he would see that the period for indexing purposes does not correspond to the calendar year but, if I remember well, runs from October to October. That is why the results for the 12-month period do not correspond to those of the calendar year.

[English]

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, the minister did not answer my question. Why does he use the CPI on one and the cost of living on the other?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I fail to see the difference the hon. member makes. There is only one index used to calculate the rate of adjustment of the Canada Pension Plan and that is the consumer price index.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine on a question of privilege.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

FAILURE OF DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT TO SHOW ÎLES-DE-LA-MADELEINE ON MAPS

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege on a matter which affects my rights as member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine, those of the people of the Magdalen Islands and all the sovereignty of the Canadian territories. On May 11, 1977, in answer to a question on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro), as reported in Hansard, on page 5518, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) tabled for publication in appendix two geographical maps of Canada which appear on pages 5519 and 5520 of the official report of this day.

Mr. Speaker, these maps, which are supposed to illustrate the Canadian coast guard regions and districts and the Canadian air transportation administration regions are incomplete and inaccurate. As a matter of fact, there is an important part of my constituency, the Magdalen Islands, missing on both maps, which gives the impression that this important part of the Gulf of St. Lawrence is not or is no longer part of Canada. In view of this gap, Mr. Speaker, I cannot help thinking that it is not surprising that the approval of the Magdalen Islands airport facilities should take so long. The Magdalen Islands are not even shown on the maps of the Department of Transport.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask the government to abandon this practice of publishing incomplete maps which do not reflect the Canadian reality and furthermore, which could give a false image of our country and inconvenience its people.

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for bringing this matter to my attention, and I will look into it.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise on a point of order. I have served in this chamber under Mr. Speaker Michener, Mr. Speaker Lambert, Mr. Speaker Macnaughton, Mr. Speaker Lamoureux, and Your Honour. It seems that I have great difficulty being seen by Your Honour. I do not know whether I have grown smaller, or what it is.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before the hon. member proceeds, he should be aware that I extended the question period five minutes today to try, if possible, to recognize all hon. members who were seeking to be recognized. The last three members of the official opposition I wanted to recognize, if possible, were the hon. member, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock, and the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo. The hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo was recognized yesterday. The hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys was recognized the day before, and the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock had not been recognized for several days. Therefore, between the three of them I gave those last three minutes to the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock.

Had there been another couple of minutes—I extended the question period five minutes, in any event—I would have recognized the hon. member, and had there been even more time I would have tried to recognize everybody today by recognizing also the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo. Once the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock took the clock to five minutes past twelve, I thought there was very little more I could do.

Mr. Muir: If Your Honour had been good enough to hear me out before making a decision, Your Honour would have heard what I was going to say. It is quite true that I was recognized the other day. I tried to ask a supplementary question, but I was refused. Several others following me asked not one supplementary but perhaps two. If Your Honour will check the record, Your Honour will find that at no time in this House have I ever abused the rules, nor have I been reprimanded by a Speaker of this House. All I want is my fair share, and for Your Honour's information, I do not feel I am getting my fair share. We all got here the same way. I was sent by my people. There are matters I have to raise, and I hope in future that Your Honour will give me more recognition.

I do not want any more privileges than anyone else, just equal rights. I had to raise this question previously, and if Your Honour would check Hansard, Your Honour would learn how many times I have been recognized since the session started and, indeed, prior to that. I hope Your Honour will give some consideration to this matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will also realize that on a regional basis today the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants and the hon. member for South Shore, both from the eastern region, were recognized. I have always tried to balance off in any one question period the various regions of the country. Considering the number of hon. members from that region who are in the House today, and the number of hon. members from all regions who are in the House today, that seemed to be a fair balance under the circumstances. If the hon. member could advise me which one of his colleagues ought to have been excluded so that I could have recognized him in addition to other hon. members from his region, I would be very pleased to have that advice.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Muir: I am not in the chair. It is your job to decide, not mine.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ENERGY

NORTHERN PIPELINE—MOTION FOR DEBATE

On the order: Government Notices of Motion.

May 11, 1977—The President of the Privy Council:

That this House recognizes the social, economic, environmental and energy issues surrounding the question of northern gas pipelines and, believing that the resolution of these issues must reflect the national interest, approves the position of the government that all relevant reports must be considered before deciding on a pipeline and its route.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section (2) of Standing Order 21, this Notice of Motion is transferred to and ordered for consideration under Government orders later this day or at the next sitting of the House.

TRANSPORTATION

STANDING COMMITTEE TRAVELLING TO EAST COAST

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to seek the unanimous consent of the House, which I believe is forthcoming, to move a reference to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. My motion is as follows:

That the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to travel to St. John's, Newfoundland, Saint John, New Brunswick, and Halifax between May 29 and June 4, 1977, for the purpose of examining transportation facilities and studying transportation problems in the Atlantic provinces, and that the necessary supporting staff do accompany the committee.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, we are quite prepared to consent to this motion. We are in agreement with it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Caouette: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the terms of the motion proposed by the President of the Privy Council. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Question No. 275—Mr. Orlikow:

1. On (a) April 30, 1975 (b) April 30, 1970, how many classified positions existed in each department at the ES-3 level?

2. By department, of the authorized positions in the category, how many incumbents occupied the positions on (a) April 30, 1975 (b) April 30, 1970 whose annual salary was more than $27,500?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): 1. (a) The number of classified[1] ES 3 positions by Department as of March 31, 1975 follows. (b) No reliable data is available for April 30, 1970.

2. (a) The number of incumbents occupying the positions in 1 (a) whose annual salary was greater than $27,500 follows. (b) No reliable data is available for April 30, 1970.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—BERGER REPORT ON NORTHERN PIPELINE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby) moved:

That this House urges the government to accept the principal recommendation of the Berger report that no pipeline be built in the Mackenzie Valley for at least ten years.

Mr. Speaker: I would note that, by agreement, not later than 3.45 o'clock p.m., every question necessary to dispose of these proceedings shall be put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order 58(9)(a).

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): It is rare in politics that a nation is given the opportunity to make an historic decision that can be both practical and decent, that can be at once just and prudent. We in Canada are now on the threshold of such a decision. On Monday, when Mr. Justice Berger handed down his historic report, Canadians were given more than an unprecedented and comprehensive assessment of a proposal for a major project. We were given a unique opportunity to change the way in which we treat our last frontier. We were advised by Mr. Justice Berger that the native people of Canada at long last deserve more than verbal respect. We were told they deserve the chance to develop in the north a pattern of growth of their own making, to have a crucial say in the shaping of their own future.

We were also advised by Mr. Justice Berger that some values and some areas of unique wilderness in our magnificent country must be preserved for all time. All of us have heard these things before, but Mr. Justice Berger has asked us as a people to listen and to listen with care. And he asks us to remember the past before we jump mindlessly into the future. The Inuit, the Dene, the Métis and our grandchildren throughout Canada are watching us today in this important debate.

Powerful interests, however, are already at work to undermine Mr. Justice Berger's plea to the Canadian people. We are told that his sentiments are all very well, but if we do not get the gas now from the north, mothers and children in Toronto, Halifax, Vancouver, all the cities of the south, will freeze in the dark. We are told that putting off the pipeline decision delivers a generation of northern natives to the welfare lines and beer halls. This is the new propaganda which must be countered in Canada, and countered immediately.

The New Democratic Party has put forward this motion today because we believe it is essential that the Canadian people hear from the House of Commons clear support at this stage in the debate for the principles of decency and practicality that are embodied in Mr. Justice Berger's report. We hope to hear support from the government side, in particular from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Allmand) whose prime responsibility is our native peoples in the north. But we also want careful clarification of the position of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), who said critically on Monday, "No one asked Mr. Berger to recommend against a pipeline". In addition to the government, we also hope to have confirmed the support of the Progressive Conservative party. We were pleased to hear their leader say the following before the television cameras on Monday afternoon:

I think it's very clear that the Gas Arctic proposal is not going to be a viable one. I think it would be very hard to contest Mr. Berger's evidence indicating that we should not proceed directly with the Mackenzie Valley pipeline. I think the 10 year delay appears, on the basis of evidence we now have, to be a sensible one.

I said at the outset that our decision about the Mackenzie Valley can be not only decent but practical. This must be emphasized. Those people who are now telling Canadians that we have to sacrifice decency because we need the energy are posing a false choice. We are not dealing here with a choice between respect for the people and environment of the north and an energy crisis. It just is not so. Approving Mr. Justice Berger's recommendation for a ten-year delay in building a Mackenzie Valley pipeline will do more than allow native land claims to be settled and implemented on a just basis. It will not affect the gas needs of Canadians, wherever they may live in the southern part of Canada. The truth is, we will not need frontier gas in Canada until the mid-1990s.

● (1220)

Mr. Woolliams: Who said that?

Mr. Broadbent: The self-interested predictions that we are in imminent danger of running out of gas are flatly wrong, and flatly contradicted by the evidence. They simply ignore the most recent assessments of our gas supply and deliverability.

Mr. Woolliams: Who made the assessments?

Mr. Broadbent: Canadians must note, Mr. Speaker, that these ominous predictions of gloom come primarily from the same sources, the oil and gas industry, which told us in 1970 we had enough gas in Canada to last us 392 years; therefore, they said at that time, we can expect and desire to export more gas. When lucrative exports were cut off one year later the industry argued, for some strange reason, that we would run out of gas by 1978 and that we therefore needed the Mackenzie Valley pipeline to bring down what they called huge amounts of natural gas from the Mackenzie delta.

An hon. Member: They are a bunch of liars.

Mr. Broadbent: Every year the decision to build a pipeline has been put off. Similarly, the date on which we are supposed to run out of natural gas has been pushed back by the industry. What is the truth? The truth is that last year, in one year alone, more natural gas was found in southern Alberta than is contained in all the natural gas proven reserves in the whole of the Mackenzie delta. That is the truth; that is the reality. We should heed it, and not the propaganda of the oil industry.

Mr. Woolliams: You can be certain they did not find gas in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Benjamin: Not at all. There were a couple of finds.

Mr. Broadbent: How many Canadians know this basic truth, Mr. Speaker? I repeat, at current rates of consumption, and on the basis of known supplies in the south, Canadians have enough natural gas to take us into the 1990s. Again I ask, how many Canadians know that there are now three proposals for renewed gas exports while at the same time Arctic Gas supporters are shouting that we are running short of gas supplies. Once again, the erroneous arguments of the oil and gas industry are merely self-serving. They are mere propaganda, designed to serve their own interests.

A serious conservation program, which should be considered apart from the real leeway in time that we have, could bring more energy at cheaper prices than would be available from projects which have been proposed in the frontier regions. For instance, a national home-insulation program would save more energy every year than we can produce from current Mackenzie Delta reserves, and it would cost less than one-third per energy unit. And, unlike natural gas, insulation never runs out. A decision now to build the Mackenzie Valley pipeline would be, in part, a decision to ignore serious conservation measures. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) said three months ago:

The cost of gaining an extra barrel of oil by saving it is a fraction of the cost of finding and producing that same barrel. Conservation measures are the surest, quickest and most efficient way of making an ongoing investment that will reduce Canada's dependence on imported oil.

What are we, as a country, doing in terms of taking serious conservation steps? We have no national home-insulation program, which the New Democratic Party advocated as early as September last year. We have weak automobile mileage requirements. I say this as one who represents an automobile constituency, whose people would support and defend conservation measures for the automotive industry. We lack even mandatory labelling of appliance efficiency targets. We have no targets at all in this field. We are left merely with the true symbol of the Liberal party of Canada: public relations gestures, and nothing more.

Even if we were to use Delta gas now, the cost would be astronomical. As the minister himself said in an internal memorandum dated March 7 of this year, Delta gas would cost double what it is now and all other prices would be raised to match it. To bring in Delta gas now, he said, would be a decision which would arouse a good deal of resistance in the east. Some understatement! Some concern!

What the minister said does not even take into account what would happen to the price of gas after the inevitable cost overruns of the pipeline are added to the final figures. Recent major projects in the north, such as the Trans-Alaska oil pipeline, or the James Bay project, have suffered from cost increases ranging between 100 per cent and 1,000 per cent over original predictions; yet Arctic Gas has estimated an overrun of only 25 per cent. A cost overrun likelihood has recently been documented by studies undertaken in both the United States and Canada. The evidence concerning overrun is overwhelming. The final result is that Canadians would end up holding the bag. The only way the Arctic Gas project could be built is with financial guarantees from the government of Canada. Arctic Gas has admitted this at hearings before our National Energy Board. The moral of the Arctic Gas proposal is clear: the Americans would get the gas and Canadians would get the cost. Some justice!

An additional economic argument must be considered by all Canadians. On top of paying for the completion of a pipeline Canadians do not need, the economy would suffer severe dislocation. In three years, if it is decided to proceed with the Arctic Gas proposal, a company would be created in Canada with more equity than the largest Canadian bank has.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Broadbent: That course would have profound consequences for the future of our country. Raising the $900 million Canadian equity would represent 25 per cent of all the new stocks issued in Canada for three years and bleed our ability to finance plant expansion, new businesses, housing and hospitals, to name only a few sectors which would suffer all over this country. Our exchange rate could be knocked out of whack and the economy would go through a slump in the north and elsewhere once the construction phase of the project had ended. These are serious economic arguments, negative economic arguments about which almost no one in the country is talking and which the NDP wants to emphasize. I say, let us not hear, to quote a gem of instant, propagandistic wisdom, that "we may have to sacrifice all that noble sentimentality of Berger's report because we need the gas." The truth is we do not need the gas until the mid 1990s. If we did get the gas from the Mackenzie Delta now, it would be too expensive. Building a pipeline to provide a conduit for United States' gas to United States' markets, according to the Arctic Gas proposals, would totally distort other Canadian investment priorities to meet other Canadian human and regional needs.

● (1230)

What about the economic impact of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline on the north itself? Mr. Justice Berger's report deals specifically with the myth, and it is a myth, that the pipeline is essential to the economic well-being of the northern part of our great country. His conclusions after two years of study and after more years of carefully sifting the economic evidence are as follows. I want to quote at length because the report of Mr. Justice Berger has been erroneously dismissed as consisting of moral platitudes. What does he say about the hard-headed economic evidence? He says the following:

> It is an illusion to believe that the pipeline will solve the economic problems of the north. Its whole purpose is to deliver northern gas to the homes and industries in the south. Indeed, rather than solving the north's economic problems, it may accentuate them . . . The fact is that large scale projects based on non-renewable resources have rarely provided permanent employment for any significant number of native people. There is abundant reason to doubt that a pipeline would provide meaningful and ongoing employment to many native people . . .
> Construction of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline could produce a serious distortion of the small business sector of the Northwest Territories. This would raise problems for the orderly development of regional economic and commercial activity in the long run.
> The point is simple enough: the extension of the industrial system creates unemployment as well as employment . . . We must cease to regard large-scale industrial development as a panacea for the economic ill of the north.

There are many economists who are experts in regional development throughout Canada and, indeed throughout the world who would agree overwhelmingly with Mr. Justice Berger's hard-headed economic conclusions about the north. Added to this, Mr. Justice Berger documents, and this is very serious, the social costs that would occur as the result of hastily going ahead with the pipeline at this time. What does he say would occur? What does he say would be the result for the native people of Canada whom we have treated so badly through most of our history? He says the following would occur in increasing degree: alcoholism, family breakdown, crime and welfare dependence.

Can that evidence be ignored? I think not. These are human facts. They are not bleeding-heart laments from some well-meaning do-gooder. They are based on the actual experience of building the Trans-Alaska pipeline and the DEW line. They are based on the overwhelming evidence of nurses and doctors who have lived among the native people of the north for many years. In short, they are rooted in the experience of the native people's eloquent and sad testimony to their own history.

It is important to note that Mr. Justice Berger does not ask that we turn back the clock of history, another erroneous, ill-informed and stupid criticism of the report. Mr. Justice Berger is not burying his head in the sand of history. He is simply saying to Canadians, "Let's take care". He is saying that a little time is required, only ten years, ten years out of the hundreds that the native people have lived there, so that they themselves can have a hand in shaping their own development in the resource development that will come, so that they may develop their own institutions and make them relevant to events that will change their lives.

The native people of Canada, no less than the rest of us who live elsewhere, are not planning for a no-change society. They know that change will come, that history marches on. What they are asking for through Mr. Justice Berger's report is a crucial part in the decision-making that is going to affect their lives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: We in the south demand no less for ourselves. Why should we expect less for the native people of our north? I want to make this point as clear and unambivalent as I can. To ignore Canada's native people now would be a moral crime. We would have committed this crime without the slightest practical justification. It is essential that we affirm now our commitment to justice and practicality for all the people of Canada by supporting Mr. Justice Berger's recommendation that no pipeline be built in the MacKenzie Valley for ten years so that the land claims may not only be settled in principle but implemented in detail.

Mr. Justice Berger's report has meant for many that the spotlight is now on the Alcan proposal to bring Alaskan gas through Canada to the United States along the Alaskan Highway. I want to say something about that proposal. The view of the New Democratic Party is now, as it has been for more than a year since we stated this position in a brief to Mr. Justice Berger, that the most desirable of all the pipeline proposals put forward for northern gas development is unquestionably the Alcan proposal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Is it at this point totally acceptable? I want to not only ask the question, but answer it. Clearly, more work and some changes are required. In our view, it has received insufficient study. If full assessment shows that the Alcan pipeline can be built with acceptable levels of social and environmental impact, and assuming that the native land claims are settled before construction, with one major change we as a party would favour precisely this kind of pipeline. The major change required is financing. Since this pipeline would be used to ship United States gas to United States markets, surely it is reasonable to require that such a pipeline will be financed by the Americans themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I have not the slightest doubt that our friends in the United States would share that view. If they want to get their gas from the northern part of the country to the south, as they do—and it is understandable, desirable and acceptable to us—the vast majority of Americans would consider it entirely reasonable that that project be financed by the Americans themselves and not put as a financial burden upon Canadians.

I urge the government to respect the process of public inquiry, a process democratized by Mr. Justice Berger, and to extend the deadlines now set for the two inquiries into the Alcan route by a further three months. Mr. Justice Berger's hearings were successful precisely because the communities affected were given sufficient notice to discuss the issues that concerned them before giving evidence. In the Yukon they have been given six weeks' notice and they will have only 36 days of hearings before the decision in principle is scheduled to be made. Only another three months would be sufficient to do a proper job. If the government sticks to its September 1 deadline, the inquiries will merely blink at the questions before them and then write reports. A serious mistake could be made in rushing when we do not need to. In the process, the government will have given notice that it has started to ignore Mr. Justice Berger, because one of the most important aspects of his inquiry was its respect for proper on-the-spot hearings, hearings affecting people directly affected by the decisions that are made.

Another important aspect of the government's "mulish" adherence to a deadline of September 1 is that parliament would be excluded from the decision. I listened with amazement to the answers given in the House today on this issue by the Acting Prime Minister. He referred to the motion which appears on today's order paper. What does it say? The motion put down by the government House leader dealing with the need for parliamentary decision-making on this question reads as follows:

That this House recognizes the social, economic, environmental and energy issues surrounding the question of northern gas pipelines and believing that the resolution of these issues must reflect the national interest approves the position of the government that all relevant reports must be considered before deciding on a pipeline and its route.

What does this verbiage amount to? Does it amount to giving parliament the right to make a decision? Does it say that the elected representatives of the people of Canada, including those in the north, will have a role to play in the decision-making? It does not. It is a collection of platitudes. It asserts, in effect, that it is the government, the cabinet, which will make the decision after it has looked at the reports. And when will it make a decision? It will make it during the summer months when it knows full well that parliament will be in recess.

Mr. MacEachen: Don't count on it.

Mr. Broadbent: It is a sham motion, and the hon. gentleman knows it. The government's position is that the United States needs to be given an answer before September 1, because legislation in that country places President Carter in the position of having to make a decision by then. However, as the government knows, the real deadline is not September 1 but December 1. The minister is well aware that President Carter can get a 90-day extension beyond September 1 if he wishes. But he has not even requested it. The fact is that the United States will not suffer if there is a three-month delay. As the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) noted in the memorandum to which I referred earlier, U.S. energy chief Schlesinger advised that the gas in Prudhoe Bay would be helpful but not really significant in terms of their over-all gas consumption.

Today, in the question period, I pointed out to the Acting Prime Minister that the United States Ambassador to Canada, Mr. Thomas Enders, had stated there was no urgent need for either Canada or the United States to make an early decision. So the government has no excuse for blaming the United States on the grounds that there is a deadline which this country has to meet. The reality is that the government of Canada does not wish to postpone a decision beyond September 1 because it knows that if it did so it would have to face parliament and the prospect of a debate.

With regard to the Alcan proposal, I call upon the government, on behalf of the NDP, to respect the Berger precedent for adequate discussion. The Yukon hearings must be given slightly more time. The Americans must agree to finance the project, since it will carry their gas, and parliament, not just the government, must discuss the final decision, one of the most important in our social and economic history. However, apart from the Alcan proposal—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I was ready to allow the hon. member a minute or two, but he has gone beyond his time and he can only continue by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Broadbent: I thank hon. members for their consideration. I am about to wind up. I call upon the House today simply to express its respect for, and support, of Mr. Justice Berger's principal recommendation that there should be no pipeline in the Mackenzie Valley for at least ten years. The evidence before Mr. Justice Berger was substantial and persuasive. His arguments, on practical and moral grounds, are irrefutable. When he began his hearings, Mr. Justice Berger said that the way in which we decide to treat the north when making this decision will tell the world what sort of people we are. This statement has often been quoted. The time has come for us to show the world what sort of people we are. I hope we are equal to the test. And the place to start that test is right here and now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I was particularly pleased to hear the reference of the leader of the New Democratic Party to the importance of there being a debate in the House of Commons before a decision is taken. But I cannot forgo passing a comment on the irony of the situation. The NDP wants parliament to debate the matter before taking a decision. But the NDP is quite prepared to take a decision itself before there has been any public debate.

Nevertheless, within the next few months the House must take a very important decision regarding energy and the attitude we should take toward northern development and native claims. I emphasize that it is the House of Commons which must take that decision, not just the government, and that we must do so on the basis of all the available evidence. This means that a simple debate, a simple exchange of views in the House, is not enough. There would have to be an opportunity for a committee of the House to consider all that is involved, and then, on behalf of the people of Canada, to make recommendations which will reflect and determine the general national interest of the country on these questions.

Mr. Justice Berger has submitted an extensive and excellent study. He has carried out his terms of reference in an extraordinarily effective way. The methods he used in his inquiry are a model of participation and democracy, and he deserves the gratitude of the country—not simply for his work but also for the standard he has set. He makes a recommendation for delay in the construction of a pipeline, a recommendation which the evidence before him supported. It would be hard to contest his evidence—although, naturally, some of it will be contested—but the fundamental fact for parliament and the people of Canada to understand is that there is other evidence yet to come, evidence into other parts of this question which deserves to be considered as seriously as the Berger report.

As I said on Monday, Mr. Speaker, it is necessary to consider the evidence from the National Energy Board, whose report on pipeline applications is expected this summer. Then there is evidence from the study by Dean Lysyk into the Alcan route. There is evidence from various studies prepared for governments, or agents of governments, and not yet made available to this House of Commons. There is evidence, indeed, concerning the accuracy of some of the conclusions of the Berger inquiry—or filling in information that Mr. Justice Berger felt was beyond the terms of reference of his inquiry—in the way that future design proposals from pipeline companies were beyond what Mr. Justice Berger described as "my responsibility . . . to assess the project proposals as they now stand".

I was pleased, Mr. Speaker, not only that the leader of the New Democratic Party quoted me in his opening remarks, but that he quoted me correctly as saying that, on the basis of the evidence we now have, the Berger recommendation for a delay would seem to be a sensible proposal. That is the statement which I made, and I am pleased to have that statement correctly quoted by the hon. member. I also said at that time that we may well receive new information regarding Canadian reserves, regarding Canadian requirements, regarding some new techniques for dealing with some of the problems that Mr. Justice Berger raised which could change the time-frame that he proposed. Certainly, we in the House of Commons should not prejudge this important question in the way this motion requests, when only part of the evidence is in. Indeed, that is the fundamental fault with the motion now before us. This motion wants the parliament of Canada to take a binding decision before all the evidence is in. The reason for that is that the NDP is not really interested in the evidence. Not only are they prepared, with this motion, to prejudge the evidence of the National Energy Board, and any other evidence that may come available, but three months ago they were prepared to prejudge the Berger report. On February 23 the hon. member of parliament for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) introduced an amendment expressing the opinion "that the proposed construction of a Mackenzie Valley pipeline is not in the best interest of the Canadian people". That was well before Berger—

Mr. Leggatt: It was ahead of your time.

Mr. Clark: It was ahead of the evidence. That determination to prejudge the evidence indicates that the major motive for most of the NDP—and I would exclude here probably the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth)—is not hard evidence and it is certainly not the high ground of decency, which the leader of the NDP sought to pre-empt; it is, instead, their old, blind bias against business and against the United States of America.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What worries us is that there appears to be an equal bias, on the other side of the question, among ministers of the government. The only minister who has expressed a view on the Berger report said categorically, to quote him, that he was "not in any way in agreement with Berger". The government was given the opportunity to dissociate itself from that view on Wednesday, and expressly refused that opportunity, so we can only assume that the minister spoke for the government when he said he was "not in any way in agreement with Berger". As my colleague points out, not only did they not dissociate themselves from the statement of the minister; as soon as he made the statement they rewarded him with two minutes as Acting Prime Minister of the country.

Mr. MacFarlane: That is closer than you will ever get, Joe.

Mr. Nowlan: They are all actors over there.

Mr. Clark: Without dwelling too long on Acting Prime Ministers, the important point to make here is that the position of the Prime Minister himself is not clear, except that he seems to be bound to the September 1 deadline. He has been threatening Canadians—and I use that word advisedly—that unless we decide by September 1, the United States will decide for us choosing the El Paso route. Two parts of this argument are curious. The first is the insistence upon September 1, when it is well known that the government of the United States has at least three months, back to December 1, to make a decision under its own existing legislation. Since the Prime Minister insists so much upon September 1, the question must arise as to whether there was some secret arrangement between himself and President Carter by which the Prime Minister of Canada gave away three months of time which might normally be available for this country to consider a question of utmost importance to our future.

The second curiosity is that the Prime Minister seems to be giving away, in advance, any capacity, on behalf of Canada, to argue for a delay in the United States timing, if—and I emphasize "if"—the evidence made available to parliament indicates that the Canadian national interest would not be served by American deadlines. We will want to know why the Prime Minister has deliberately chosen this approach which could limit our negotiating power on this question.

Of fundamental importance here is that Canada takes the right decisions on the related questions of an energy corridor, northern development, and the treatment and future of our northern people. The best way to guarantee that the decision will be right is to have it taken in public, in the parliament of Canada. For that reason, this party has consistently sought to have all the evidence brought before a special committee of the House of Commons, a committee to which should be referred the Berger report, the National Energy Board report, the Lysyk report on the Alcan route, the Fenco consultant study of the possibility of the cost overruns, and all other information which relates to these decisions.

The government has now been pushed toward a public debate but cavalierly dismisses, as the Acting Prime Minister did the other day, a reference to committee as being simply another inquiry into an inquiry. That misses two points. The first is that each of the previous inquiries, whether the Berger inquiry, the NEB, the Lysyk study, or any other, was into a limited subject, and there is no agency now established to pull together all of the recommendations of all the separate inquiries and consider them together. I should specify that there is no public agency for this purpose. The government has the option, as always, of pulling this work together in secret and making its decision in secret. This is the style of this government. That is no doubt about their intention now, and that is the proposition which we in this party simply will not accept.

It is the job of parliament to make these decisions. Parliament, and only parliament, can make national decisions. Mr. Justice Berger, the National Energy Board, Dean Lysyk, even the Prime Minister himself, do not represent the people of Canada in our system. Parliament is not just another level of study. It is not one more inquiry. It is the only legitimate place for the mapping of the course that we must take in the north, and the only effective way that parliament can gather the information which we need and to have the right to call witnesses and debate the issue in some kind of committee format. Among other advantages, a parliamentary inquiry will provide a responsible public forum—a court of appeal, if you will—to those major groups who disagree seriously with the reports of Mr. Justice Berger, Dean Lysyk, or the National Energy Board. For example, Canadian Arctic Gas, having spent $140 million in preparing its proposals, should have some public forum in which it can take issue with some of the conclusions of the Berger inquiry. Serious parties who disagree with recommendations Dean Lysyk might make, or with recommendations or calculations that might come from the National Energy Board, also require some public forum to which they can present their evidence so that Canadians will be in possession of all the facts when we take the decision which we must take.

● (1300)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: There are a number of important questions which flow from the Berger report. One of them has to do with the design changes which might change the feasibility of some of the projects referred to by Mr. Justice Berger. Another talks about the technical uncertainties documented by Mr. Justice Berger relating to frost heave and the possibility of new methods being developed which can deal with that serious problem.

Mr. Justice Berger stressed the potential of scheduling and work delays forcing some construction to take place over the summer months. We need to know whether that is likely to be the case. Mr. Justice Berger said that the environmental threat of an interior Yukon route was not as compelling as the threat from a coastal route. There is some potential threat to the caribou wintering grounds. The people of Canada need to know, before they make a decision, how serious that threat is.

There has been an indication that there may not be an adequate opportunity for native employment on large-scale development projects. A committee of this House has the responsibility to inquire into means by which we can ensure, if large-scale projects go forward, that there will be opportunities for the native people of the north to work not just on simple projects but to make use of the opportunities to develop their own skills. That is an area which must be investigated by a committee of the House of Commons. That flows from a question raised by the Berger inquiry.

Mr. Justice Berger has indicated it is going to take some time to resolve questions relating to native titles. He suggests ten years, but there is no guarantee that it would take ten years. We need to have the opportunity to hear other evidence and other views as to other time-frames that might apply. Mr. Justice Berger suggests that an economy in the north can be based upon small business, and the orderly development of gas and oil resources could be in partnership with small business. That is a theory which has to be examined in some detail. It is essential to examine that theory if we are to have all the evidence we should have.

Those are some of the questions which flow from the report of Mr. Justice Berger. They are questions which need to be answered before a decision can be taken. Those questions can only be answered by a special committee of the House of Commons of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: There are innumerable other questions which arise outside the report of Mr. Justice Berger. One relates to the viability and the feasibility of a railway. Another relates to the extent of our gas reserves and the possibility of new frontier discoveries in the Delta or the Arctic Islands. We need to have some solid information about the effects on exploration in the Beaufort Sea, in the Delta and in the High Arctic. If there is no pipeline, we need to know the effect of that on the economy of Canada generally.

We need to know the effect of proceeding with a pipeline or not proceeding with a pipeline. We need to have a clear understanding of the environmental, the social and the economic impacts of an Alcan route. As a committee of the parliament of Canada, we need to give our advice, to gather our evidence and to make our views known on the broad question of what constitutes the Canadian national interest in a question of this kind.

Mr. Speaker, this is a time when we face highly important questions. The report of Mr. Justice Berger, as well as the particular recommendations it brought down, was a clear indictment of the failure of this government to develop an effective policy for northern Canada or to operate within the context of a comprehensive national energy policy. There is no policy in either of those areas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: That is a matter which the parliament of Canada must study and consider in detail, with the power to call witnesses, with the power to gather evidence and with the power to make recommendations and not simply talk. We have ahead of us some highly important decisions. As the parliament of Canada, we have an obligation to gather evidence with care and to consider it with the utmost care. We have the obligation to do that work in public. This is not a time to close doors, as the motion by the New Democratic Party proposes. This is a time, instead, to open doors and to allow full examination of all the evidence in the public eye of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: For that reason, in the interests of ensuring we have the broadest possible opportunity to gather all the evidence, to open all the doors and to make in public the best possible decisions for the future of Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

> That all the words after the word "government" be struck out of this motion and the following substituted therefor:
> "to appoint a special committee of the House to consider the recommendations of the Berger report and all other reports, studies and recommendations relevant to the building of a northern pipeline, and the method of settlement of native land claims and urges that no commitment in principle be made to build a northern pipeline without parliamentary approval".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The subject matter of today's debate is too important for us to spend any time on the procedural argument, but I suggest that Your Honour should seriously consider whether this amendment is in order. An amendment to the kind of motion that is down for today is certainly provided for, but it has to be relevant and it must not introduce a totally new proposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Nonsense. How does it do that?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If my hon. friends wanted to do this, they should have done it on Tuesday.

Mr. Speaker, the proposed amendment substitutes for what we put down a totally different proposition, the kind for which notice would have to be given. Without taking the time to read the citations, I suggest to Your Honour that as an amendment it is clearly out of order.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We mentioned Berger.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) seems to feel it is all right for the NDP to move amendments to opposition day motions, but when we move amendments to opposition day motions suddenly it is a little different.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the other thing is this: if it is your intention to make a ruling with respect to the matter, I respectfully suggest that matter ought to be argued in full by the person who objects to the amendment. I suggest there should be a corresponding argument from those of us who support the amendment and that this matter not be allowed to be raised in this way.

• (1310)

As to one other point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, he says we could have done it on Tuesday. Mr. Speaker, this matter is so important that the one way we could ensure there will be a vote on it and that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and his colleagues will stand up for parliamentary democracy was to do it the way we did it today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The hon. member cannot have it two ways. I am in the Chair's hands as to whether or not an argument is to be made now. If an argument is to be made now, then I think the hon. member should put his objections first and I will then make the argument.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I understand the feeling of the hon. member, but he knows that the Chair does not have to pass judgment on the merit of the motion or of the amendment. The purpose of a procedural debate on the acceptability of the amendment would definitely and strictly be to debate the question of relevancy which has been raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. That point had occurred to me even before the hon. member raised it in the House. There is difficulty with the amendment. There might be some precedents in this House so far as special debates are concerned, such as the Speech from the Throne or on motions to give second reading to a bill. But we are dealing right now with a very limited motion which urges the House to come to a decision on a recommendation of the Berger report. At first glance the proposal of the Leader of the Opposition seems to bring in a new subject, or subjects.

Mr. Broadbent: That is a total red herring.

An hon. Member: You mean a blue herring.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I want to understand the right of an hon. member to make a procedural argument to enlighten the Chair, but I find it is also the responsibility of the Chair to be fair to other hon. members who wish to participate in the debate on the subject matter of the motion and not to lose the time of the debate on a procedural argument.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: So, with the agreement of hon. members, I will reserve my decision and at this time and I would welcome arguments by one member from each party. Otherwise, hon. members cannot prevent the Chair from making the ruling immediately. I want to be fair and I invite arguments from hon. members, but this day has been set aside for the opposition. The opposition has decided to give the right to one opposition party to present a motion. As hon. members know, a procedural debate could take up hours, and I think this would deprive hon. members who want to participate in the debate from doing so. So I could either allow procedural arguments to be made immediately, if the House so agrees, or we could hear them later in light of the fact that some hon. members are out of the House for lunch. I hope, however, that the arguments put forward are limited, and I leave that to the judgment of hon. members.

Mr. Broadbent: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Given the importance of this debate, I would like to suggest, through you, to other members of the House that if there is to be further procedural discussion we would be happy with the ruling as soon as you want to make it, sir, and not contribute further to the discussion. If there is to be any further discussion, I suggest that we postpone it to the end of today's debate.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not doubt the motive of the leader of the New Democratic Party behind his suggestion, but I would say that we have to give some order to the proceedings of the House because it goes right to the root of the matter of the relevancy of speeches of members of parliament. I think it is most unfair and improper for a suggestion to be made—that is the essence of the suggestion made by the NDP, and I do not suggest that the motive is improper, but it would amount to the same thing in terms of the House—that members be put in the position of making a speech which might turn out to be irrelevant on a motion which may be ruled out of order.

So I should call Your Honour's attention to the fact that there is no lunch hour today and I certainly have no objection—nor, I am sure, does the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre have any objection since he has amended so many of our motions—if there were an arrangement to ensure sufficient time, at the end of the day perhaps, to replace the time that was taken up in arguing the procedural matter. I think it is extremely important to the whole business of opposition days. The whole business of amending opposition day motions has not been commenced by our party; it has been commenced by the very group which now complains.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Goodale: You get as good as you give.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I do think that even if that is the case, no one should be allowed to rise in the House and say he thinks the matter is irrelevant, and then sit down having advanced no argument at all. Then a person who is defending the motion is put in the position of presenting a point which has not yet been propounded except in the most general way.

This would reduce our procedures to a ridiculous state. I say that we should argue the point in the usual way. None of us will be very long in his arguments, but the arguments are extremely important, not just to the question but also the rules and procedures of the House of Commons. We should not do it in any other way than the one I suggest, with the greatest respect to the Chair.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: One of the points the hon. member just raised was the right of the official opposition to amend a motion. That right has not been taken away from them. Even if the amendment is out of order, this does not mean that his party is precluded from presenting another amendment. In this case I am ready, as I said, to listen to the arguments in the procedural debate, and I welcome them. I was just cautioning hon. members and making them aware of the fact that the longer the procedural debate lasts, the less time hon. members will have to debate the subject matter of the motion before us or even to debate the proposed amendment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is still my determination to keep this as brief as I possibly can. In my first submission, although my friend, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) may not have heard it, I said clearly that there is no objection to an amendment being put down to an opposition day motion. It is perfectly in order to do so. We have often done it.

● (1320)

An hon. Member: You'd better believe it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It has been done quite a few times. I point out that our amendments have not taken away what was there; they have added something to it. What is wrong with this amendment is that it introduces a totally new proposition which is not relevant to the motion. The motion asks for a decision on the question of supporting Mr. Justice Berger's recommendation that there be no pipeline in the Mackenzie Valley for at least ten years. The amendment strikes all of that and replaces it with something else. That something else may be good, bad or indifferent, but it is a totally different proposition which can be presented to this House only on notice.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton seems to be trying to make me give one of my long speeches, and I could do it but I have no intention of doing so. However, I have made the case, as I see it, that the amendment is a totally different proposition which can only be made on proper notice and is not in order as an amendment to the motion before the House today.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of precedents with which you should be aware, and I am going to present them so you can have an opportunity to study them. The rulings are dated March 16, 1971; November 3, 1971; June 1, 1972; June 4, 1973; and May 14, 1975. Out of those rulings certain guidelines have come forward. First, it is not proper to amend opposition motions to provide for an entirely new debate. This would be supported by Beauchesne, section 203(3), which reads this way:

An amendment setting forth a proposition which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved.

That is the first proposition. The second is that one of the standards of judgment would be the relevance of the original notice for the motion to the proposed amendment. If people would not be prepared for debate on the amendment by being prepared for the original motion, then the amendment obviously brings in a totally new debate. This does not do that, in my respectful submission. Third, it is not relevant to reject an amendment simply because it makes it easy or difficult to support the original question. The fact that the mover of the motion cannot support the amendment does not make the latter irrelevant, in my respectful submission.

Those are the rulings. These three points are a matter of judgment for Your Honour, and I suggest that the amendment we have brought forward is neither irrelevant nor does it raise an entirely new question. It brings in a modification of the proposal—I have to concede that—and it is most unlikely that the NDP, certainly in view of its position of some months ago, could vote for that amendment. I can see that. But the question was, and remains, if and when a pipeline should be built along the Mackenzie Valley. That is the question. That is the issue in the motion put by the leader of the New Democratic Party, and that is the subject matter of the motion put by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark).

The NDP feels that only the Berger commission is relevant, and the NDP is ready to confirm its original viewpoint. We want to examine all the reports before deciding. That is the purpose of our amendment. Our amendment is not an expanded negative, nor is it irrelevant to the motion. It interposes a necessary stage before the decision is made, but the focus of the decision remains exactly the same.

Mr. Goodale: You are not serious.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is the situation. Let us think about it for a second. Anyone arguing the wisdom of endorsing Berger now without further consideration must, of necessity, address himself to the substance of the amendment, the need or lack of need for a study of other reports or recommendations. It is not my object to cause anyone—and I do not think there is any need—to change his or her speech in this debate, and I therefore feel that the amendment does not change the question we are dealing with when it proposes a relevant modification. That is the issue.

This matter is not merely one of procedure; it is a matter of ethics, and I think this is important to the operation of this House. Opposition days are divided among the opposition parties in strict proportion to numerical strength in this House, except on that basis the official opposition gets a day less than it ought to. Hon. members who have anticipated in this point of order may have noticed that the official opposition has not amended another party's motion for two years. We came to the conclusion that it is not right to give another party the choice of accepting an irrelevant amendment or wasting its valuable time in argument. That is the decision we made some time ago. Hon. members may also have noticed that the NDP has amended almost every motion the official opposition has put forward this year.

Mr. Benjamin: By adding to them.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We have not challenged any of them, even though some of them were wildly irrelevant. I am going to use those as precedents for the purpose of this argument. After complaints from my colleagues I spoke to the NDP House leader, the virtuous member for Winnipeg North Centre, and told him quite frankly that we thought his actions were unethical.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He may not have liked it, but that is what we told him. He smiled that smile which has all the warmth of a gleam from a silver coffin and kept on moving amendments. Today when we do that, he begins to howl. I am not going to give the House all the examples of the amendments moved by the hon. member, but I will cite two examples which the Chair found to be acceptable, since they did not interpose. They intervened, which suggests to me that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has one standard for himself and another standard for everyone else in this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The first example was the motion of February 10 of this year. We move the following motion:

That this House denounces the government's failure to generate jobs in Canada, particularly in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, and urges immediate and resolute action, including the early presentation of a budget.

The leader of the NDP, seconded by his House leader, moved a five-paragraph amendment. I am going to read the amendment because Your Honour will have to contrast it against the delightful simplicity of our motion as well as the subject matters which were introduced and which were held to be quite proper by the Chair at that time. The following was the amendment moved on February 10:

That the motion be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words:

"This House also urges that the government

(1) immediately decrease personal income taxes for those in the lower and middle incomes to stimulate purchasing power and take up the current slack in the economy,

(2) immediately reactivate all federal capital works projects and encourage the provinces and municipalities to follow suit, and at the same time, lift any restraint on shared funding of such projects,

(3) immediately expand—in consultations with the provinces—the capital budgets for low income and co-operative housing and land assembly,

(4) immediately launch an assisted repair and renovation program of homes owned by pensioners, the disabled and low-income families, and

(5) immediately launch a program—in co-operation with the provinces—of insulating or improving the level of insulation in all residential buildings—a program which would provide not only jobs but would also conserve energy."

● (1330)

In other words, our opposition day which related to eastern Canadian unemployment was, by that amendment, not objected to by the Chair, turned into a standard NDP day in which they would tell us how they would collect billions less, spend billions more and at the same time combat inflation. That is the end of it. If that amendment, which the NDP House leader must have believed to be in order or he would not have advanced it, was in order and we use it as a guide in this matter, then I have no fears whatsoever for the amendment we have advanced today.

I will add, Mr. Speaker, that we could have used up the whole day in arguing procedural motions, but we did not. The Leader of the Opposition referred to the motion of February 23 in the course of the debate. We moved:

That this House regrets the failure of the government to develop and apply policies in the fields of the oil and gas non-renewable energy resources that are fair or just or adequate for the people or the provinces of Canada today or for the future.

That was a nice, straightforward motion. An amendment was put by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) to add these words:

—and this House expresses its opinion that the proposed construction of a Mackenzie Valley pipeline is not in the best interests of the Canadian people.

If anything, that departed from the matters that were held in our motion of that day. If that amendment was acceptable—and it was acceptable to the Chair in this House on that day—then our amendment must be perfectly in order. However, in light of the second amendment, Mr. Speaker should consider whether today's motion falls foul of the rule. This is the judgment the Chair will have to make having seen the NDP amendment of February 23. The Chair has to decide whether the NDP motion today falls foul of the rule against putting the same motion in the same session. That is exactly what they have done, and Your Honour might want to make some judgment on it. The House should wonder whether it is worth listening to people who declared over two months ago that their minds were made up before the evidence was in.

Mr. Goodale: That is what Joe Clark did on Monday.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): My respectful submission to the Chair is that our amendment is a relevant modification of the main motion. It is certainly more relevant than the two concoctions of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) which I have just recited. The choice it offers is important to many hon. members. If Your Honour feels that some way could be devised to deal quickly with the relevancy of such amendments, I would be delighted; or if hon. members of the NDP would accept that no amendments should be moved to opposition day motions, we could avoid diversions such as the ones we are now involved with because of the objection of the greatest sinner in this House in terms of moving amendments.

Failing such agreement, we have as much right as hon. gentlemen to my left to move amendments. My respectful submission is that on the authorities and the precedents that have been advanced by the persons who object today, this amendment falls well within the rules of order. It is my respectful submission that it ought to be allowed as one of the questions to be put to this House today for decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. As there does not seem to be any other participant in this procedural debate that I have invited, I would like to thank the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) for trying as hard as he has to enlighten the Chair. I will certainly take his remarks into consideration. Before I reserve my decision, however, I want to say that the latter part of his intervention is not exact, in the sense that the Chair or the House does not prevent him or any other member from moving amendments to motions that are before the House. Any member can do that. The fact that an amendment is not relevant does not mean that the Chair is taking away the right of a member to move an amendment. If an amendment is refused on its procedural acceptability, it is only because it does not correspond to the rules of the House or precedents. The rules of the House are the standard by which we operate and the only standard by which this House can progress. I will reserve my decision until a later time, and at this time I call upon the hon. President of the Privy Council.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): I would like to join hon. members in expressing the appreciation of the government for volume I of Mr. Justice Berger's report. I know of no report submitted to the government which has been more thoroughly prepared and more clearly presented. Mr. Justice Berger has raised basic philosophical questions about the structure and values of Canadian society and the choices to be made in terms of meeting the interests of the Canadian north.

As has been mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, these issues must be addressed not only by the Canadian parliament but by the Canadian people as a whole. These are difficult issues. We all face the difficult problem of reconciling and balancing the needs of the native people both in terms of their traditional way of life and new employment opportunities for those that wish to become involved in Canadian industrial society, as well as our environmental heritage, our energy requirements and more general Canadian economic interests which might be served by so substantial a national enterprise as the construction of the pipeline.

I should like to remind hon. members that we face a timeframe in reaching a decision, but are under no obligation to approve a particular pipeline route or, indeed, any pipeline. Let me explain why. The United States needs Prudhoe Bay gas. We are all aware of the problems faced by the United States economy last winter because of gas shortages. We were able to help out to some degree, but that certainly is no permanent solution. We have our own requirements for gas not at present committed to the export market.

The President of the United States faces a legislative requirement to recommend a pipeline route by September 1, though he does have the power to postpone a decision for 90 days. I would not wish, however, to emphasize the legislative aspect as much as the underlying energy requirement. I think that all members in this House can understand why the United States Congress and administration wish prompt access to the significant quantities of energy available in Prudhoe Bay gas. If the only route for delivering this gas were across Canadian territory, this might present major political difficulties for Canada and, indeed, as some hon. members have suggested, it might appear that we were being pressured or blackmailed. Fortunately, this is not the case.

In their recent recommendations to the President, members of the Federal Power Commission considered a land route across Canada as a preferable means of delivering gas to the lower 48 states, but they were unanimous in their view that the El Paso alternative was a viable and acceptable alternative. As you know, this would involve movement of gas across Alaska, its liquefaction and subsequent shipment by tanker along the Pacific coast to a port in California.

There are possible advantages for Canada in one or the other overland route, and there are also costs and disadvantages. These must be, and are, assessed. It is for this reason that the government has commissioned studies over and above the normal consideration by the National Energy Board. Mr. Justice Berger has looked at the proposed Mackenzie Valley pipeline with regard to social, environmental and economic concerns. We look forward to the second volume of his report which will deal with terms and conditions which might be imposed at such time as a pipeline along the Mackenzie Valley might be constructed, to moderate its socioeconomic and environmental impact.

The government has also commissioned Dean Lysyk to undertake a socioeconomic inquiry on a pipeline route, known as the Alcan route, which would parallel the existing highway system in the southern Yukon, either along the main route of the Alaska Highway or via Dawson, as well as a possible spur to the Mackenzie Delta along the Dempster Highway. A separate environmental assessment panel has been established for this route by the Department of the Environment. The National Energy Board, for its part, has before it applications for the Canadian Arctic Gas route across the northern Yukon and down the Mackenzie Valley, the Foothills Maple Leaf route designed to carry Canadian gas only down the Mackenzie Valley, and the proposed Alaska Highway, Alcan route. The government understands that the board's report will be submitted in July.

Hon. members will recall, particularly those who were in the House when the National Energy Board Act was brought before the House by the then minister of industry, trade and commerce, Mr. Gordon Churchill, as I recall, of the government led by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) that under the act the government can turn down recommendations put forward by the National Energy Board but it cannot substitute recommendations of its own. In other words, we have a double veto with respect to pipeline construction. No pipeline can be built unless there is an affirmative decision both by the National Energy Board and the government on the basis of the board's recommendation. I would go further and say that in this context there is a triple veto, that of the National Energy Board, the government and parliament.

An hon. Member: Coming from you, that is revolutionary.

Mr. MacEachen: I emphasize this point in order to underline that as matters now stand, a decision to have no pipeline is still an option for Canada. The assumption underlying the discussion is that this is not an alternative in principle. I say it is still an alternative. A decision to have no pipeline is still an option for this country. The El Paso alternative means that this need not impede United States access to Prudhoe Bay gas. As hon. members are no doubt aware, construction of an overland route across Canada has advantages for Canada in terms of earlier and more economic access to northern gas and in terms of economic activity generated in Canada by such a project. It would be foolish, therefore, for Canada not to study all factors in play within the time-frame available, that is, before the United States must decide on the El Paso route or an overland route.

Mr. Clark: When is that?

Mr. MacEachen: That is why I welcome the Leader of the Opposition joining the government today, somewhat belatedly, in suggesting that all relevant reports must be taken into account—

Mr. Clark: By a committee or parliament.

Mr. MacEachen: —before a decision is taken. I was under the impression, probably it was wrong, that the press had reported him on Tuesday as already having endorsed the main recommendations of the Berger report.

Mr. Goodale: He did.

Mr. MacEachen: I do not debate whether that change in opinion has occurred. It is important that the Leader of the Opposition has said today that no decision on this important question ought to be taken until all the evidence is in.

Mr. Woolliams: Right on.

Mr. MacEachen: That is an extremely sound position which I have been arguing on behalf of the government ever since the Berger report has been produced. Of course, the NDP is obscurantist in the extreme. They seem to be able to make up their minds without hearing any evidence at all. They have, again, put on the order paper a motion which is totally premature and, to some extent, unfair to Mr. Justice Berger. I say that because even if this motion is turned down an inference could be drawn that in some way the House of Commons is unsympathetic to the valuable work Mr. Justice Berger has done. I believe it is somewhat unfair to ask the House of Commons in a clear-cut decision to reject or accept a particular recommendation made by Mr. Justice Berger—

Mr. Clark: You had better accept our amendment.

Mr. MacEachen: —the validity of which can only be considered in terms of other relevant evidence which must be brought forward at a later date. Therefore, as a move to advance the national interest, the motion moved today by the New Democratic Party cannot be taken seriously for reasons already stated and to be stated in the course of the debate. In our view, Mr. Speaker, it would be most unwise to reach a decision until all the available information is in hand.

Mr. Baldwin: Then why did Pierre make a promise to President Carter?

Mr. MacEachen: I would not wish, and I am sure most hon. members of the House would not wish, to reject a possible National Energy Board recommendation before it is submitted, any more than I would have wished to have taken a decision on pipelines in the absence of Mr. Justice Berger's recommendations. Today we are being asked to reject in advance a decision which may be submitted by the National Energy Board.

Mr. Paproski: You had better support our amendment, Allan.

Mr. MacEachen: Prudent decision-making requires a timely choice amongst available options upon the basis of all available information. In the present case there are elements not yet available to the government, and we therefore will not be rushed into a decision until the National Energy Board's recommendations, Mr. Justice Berger's second volume, and Dean Lysyk's report and the environmental assessment on the Alaska route are available. Equally, Mr. Speaker, we do not intend to postpone a decision when the information is before us, since as is so often the case in this world an absence of a decision in itself is some kind of decision.

● (1350)

If we do not want a pipeline across Canada, we are free to turn it down, but I see no advantage in eliminating an overland pipeline option because we are unable to make up our mind or make it up on the basis of incomplete information. That is the basic position of the government. That is why I put on the order paper a motion which was referred to earlier by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent).

I did it for two purposes, basically. One is to provide a continuing opportunity for parliament, by calling this motion, to make its views known as the situation develops. If today our debate is not regarded as sufficient on the Berger report, I am prepared to recall the motion that I have put on the order paper at a later date and have a further debate, as I am prepared to call it later after the National Energy Board report is delivered so that we can have a further opportunity to hear the views of parliament. The views of parliament will be clear before any decision is taken.

The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) made a somewhat similar proposal in the House of Commons on Tuesday of this week when he suggested in a motion:

> That the government be instructed to initiate a full debate in this House concerning proposals for the construction of a northern pipeline once all of the relevant consultants, boards, commissions and committees have reported on the matters referred to them in connection therewith, and that no final decision be taken in connection with such matters until after full debate so that the views of members of the House as to what action should be taken in the national interest may be known.

I say "Amen" to that. That is the purpose of this motion. It provides a continuing opportunity for parliament to make its views known as additional information is brought forward before a final decision is taken. It also indicates that the government does not intend to take a decision on this matter until all the relevant information is before us. I cannot understand why the New Democratic Party, regardless of the validity of the point which it puts forward, would ask the House of Commons to take a premature decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: That is the main objection to the motion put forward. It is premature and, I believe, unfair to the very valuable and historic report that has been brought forward by Mr. Justice Berger. I have read most of the report. I find it extraordinary that a serious political party would ask that we decide on Friday on a report of this enormous significance which was only produced and made available to members of parliament on Monday. On Friday of the same week they ask the government to make a decision on this fundamental matter before it has been considered by the Prime Minister and the cabinet as a whole.

I am sure hon. members, no matter how dutiful they are in terms of their other obligations, have not been able to give to the Berger report the attention it deserves in order to reach a proper decision on a motion of this kind on Friday of the same week. I find it incredible that we should be asked to do that. For the reasons I have stated, we are not supporting the motion. It is premature. It is a prejudgment that is unsuitable in this case.

I cannot understand why the official opposition did not take proper precautions by taking this day for themselves and putting down their own motion, and not putting the House in the ridiculous position that it is in today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: That option was open to the official opposition, because it was apparent to me that once the Berger report was tabled the first moment the NDP had an opportunity to put a motion it would put a motion asking us to accept the main recommendation of the Berger report. The Leader of the Opposition should have stopped them at the pass. He should have prevented them from spearing him in the way they are doing through this motion. He could have avoided all that self-inflicted damage that is so apparent today.

Mr. Clark: Are you supporting our amendment?

Mr. MacEachen: I cannot say anything about the amendment that has been moved by the official opposition, because it is not before the House. It exists in some ethereal, procedural oblivion of never-never land.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: If it is ever put before the House—and I cannot see that it has any possibility of existing, from the procedural objections that have been raised by the Leader of the Opposition—we will take a position on it. However, we are not ready to take a position on this ethereal image that is temporarily dazzling the members of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, for a few minutes I should like to discuss the motion introduced today by the New Democratic Party concerning the inquiry report and the proposal by Mr. Justice Thomas Berger. It is obvious that the matter of building a pipeline in the Mackenzie Valley for the movement of natural gas or oil is of the utmost importance.

And the representative of the New Democratic Party was undoubtedly well inspired today in introducing such a motion. I do not mean that I agree entirely with the motion but I think the subject deserves consideration. However, without prejudging the decision to be made on the official opposition's proposed amendment to the NDP motion, I find it quite unreasonable that this method should be used during those allotted opposition days and that an attempt should be made to use the day of another opposition party to change almost entirely the subject matter to be discussed.

Mr. Speaker, even if the procedure allows it and there are precedents in that respect I think this habit should be discontinued to allow opposition parties to choose themselves the subject matter to be discussed—that is a thing for them to decide. For those reasons I think the amendment proposed by the Progressive Conservative Party, which by the way is quite incomplete, should not be accepted because if I wanted to be smart I could myself move a sub-amendment to their amendment.

I note that Justice Berger's inquiry required at least three years; he took three years to tour a vast spread of land to consult the natives, the white people living there, the companies involved in exploration or development, to determine the advantages and disadvantages of constructing a pipeline. And now, Mr. Speaker, the Progressive Conservative Party is asking us to appoint a committee to look into the inquiry that lasted three years. That committee could take three, five or ten years to look into Justice Berger's inquiry. No deadline is set.

I do not intend to support the amendment of the Progressive Conservative Party. Unfortunately, I cannot either support the motion of the New Democratic Party because I think that there must be development in this country. We need energy sources and we must develop those that are in existence and we must try to find others.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, in so doing we will upset someone or something, but had we never done anything in the past, we would still be in the Stone Age. I was not around at that time. Early in the century, when it was decided to build a railroad to develop the area where I now live, that is Abitibi, someone was disturbed. There were native people living there at the time. There were also wild animals around. So, someone was disturbed; still, that area was settled, and today it is one of the most beautiful in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, looking back even further, we realize that if the same objections had been made when our country was discovered, Canada would not be what it is today. That proves then that obstacles should not be put in the way of development. If you inconvenience someone, then you find ways of compensating them. A project is now being built in northern Quebec, in the riding I represent, Abitibi: I am talking about the James Bay hydroelectric project. There again, I may not agree completely with the methods used. The native people who lived there were not consulted. The area was invaded, without warning, without concern for the environment. What were the results? To say the least, the Indians and Inuit living there were inconvenienced. We should do the same in northwestern Canada, in the Mackenzie Valley or northern Yukon for those who will be disturbed, those who will be in one way or another deprived of their property, of their land. They should be compensated because they are being moved to other areas where they will be able to live and find a new life.

Mr. Speaker, if there is something to develop, if there truly are resources to develop in those areas, I think we should develop them. I have noted in the report a few sections which seem to indicate resentment against our southern neighbours benefitting from this development. For instance, the report says that a major part of the energy resources that will be developed lies in Prudhoe Bay and that this will mainly serve the American states, which seems to bother some people.

Mr. Speaker, I remember that in the early sixties, when we considered the development of the Columbia River in British Columbia, the objections raised were exactly the same. The development of the Columbia River was supposed to help mostly industrial development of the American west. There seems to be some objection to seeing the United States develop their industry. Mr. Speaker, I find this way of thinking somewhat small-minded and I believe that this development would help Canada itself through the routes and railways which will have to be built. This will allow, first exploration, and later development of any natural gas or oil found along the Mackenzie River. The existence of such resources would not be impossible on our own territory.

Mr. Speaker, I believe we should not interfere with this development. Of course, we must be careful. We must take all necessary precautions to cause as few problems as possible in the area. Mr. Speaker, the Canadian engineers and technicians who have worked independently from the Berger Commission have also made some studies. The National Energy Board is now interested in this subject and will soon submit a report, at least I hope so. I believe that all these people are able to take the necessary action to minimize damages while allowing as much development as possible.

[English]

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to the motion and as energy critic for the Progressive Conservative party I have to say quite frankly that I have not made up my mind on the issue of the pipeline or on what should be done on behalf of Canada or, indeed, what decision we should come to in the next few months. Unless you are a partisan in favour of one project or the other, or unless you are thinking blindly and come to the conclusion that there should be no more pipeline construction in Canada, no more damage to the environment and no more damage to the ecology, or that we should see no more spread of industrialization, I do not know how you can come to the opposite conclusion either. It is obviously too early for that.

Mr. Speaker, as I say, I have not made up my mind, and our party has not made up its mind yet. We do not intend to make a decision until we have examined the other reports which were referred to by our leader and by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). When we have had a chance to study these reports we will then make our decision.

I will deal with some of the remarks of the President of the Privy Council first. He has come a long, long way since the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) began some weeks ago to insist that this matter be debated in the House of Commons before the government reaches a decision. We are now in the position, Mr. Speaker, of seeing the government today stating for the first time that before it makes a decision on the question of a pipeline it will permit a debate to take place in the House of Commons in which it will listen to the viewpoints expressed. It will then make a decision. This is what the President of the Privy Council has told us today, and this is something entirely new. He has been brought to his senses—and to his knees—by the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: And the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Horner) has been brought to his knees also. Berger lives despite Horner. Despite Horner, Berger is alive. Now, Mr. Speaker, we want one further concession from the President of the Privy Council before he leaves office following the next election. We want a committee of this House to be appointed to consider the Berger Report and then later to consider the Lysyk Report, the NEB Report, and the other reports as they become available. We do not want to spend weeks or months visiting the communities in order to hold hearings but we do want members of this House to have a chance to question Mr. Justice Berger on how he arrived at his conclusions. We do want the chance to question the NEB on how they arrived at the conclusions in their report. And we do want to hear from Dean Lysyk on how he arrived at his conclusions. That is why we want a committee. It will give members of the House with interests in energy and in northern and Indian affairs an opportunity to discuss the question before it is debated in the House.

● (1410)

If the President of the Privy Council can twist the Prime Minister's arm that is, if he ever comes back to Canada—and get him to make that concession, then he will have gone a long way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Hon. gentlemen opposite are very touchy. Once one criticizes the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) they get all upset. Perhaps there are going to be more cabinet promotions for those who are the most upset at anyone criticizing the Prime Minister.

The government should support our ethereal amendment if the Speaker finds that it is in order. The President of the Privy Council kindly referred to my motion on Tuesday. I did not know that I had any influence on this government whatever, but it has now been acknowledged that the motion that I moved on Tuesday is now the government's policy. I am delighted to have them steal my ideas.

An hon. Member: And you did not have to walk across the floor to do it either.

Mr. Crosbie: No, I did not have to join the cabinet to have that happen. The President of the Privy Council said he thought that the official opposition should have moved a motion to cut the NDP off at the pass. Why should we prevent the NDP from cutting their own throats? The sooner they cut them, the better. They certainly cut them today. Has anyone ever seen a more foolish motion than the motion of the leader of the NDP? His motion was premature, pre-historic, and hysteric. His mind was made up pre-Berger. His mind was made up before a pipeline was ever suggested. His mind was made up on this issue 30 years ago. It does not matter who is going to make a report.

On February 23 the NDP moved a motion. Did they have copies of Mr. Justice Berger's report on February 23, or are they so omniscient that they knew what he was going to propose? Are we to expect that they are supernatural beings? I do not think so, because they have shown that they have feet of clay, and that clay is going to bury them today.

Not only has the NDP come to the conclusion that there should be no pipeline, that it should not go down the Mackenzie Valley, despite the fact that Justice Berger made a positive recommendation that the route was all right but that he wanted there to be time to settle other matters first—not only have they cast aside the Mackenzie Valley and Delta route, but they have now decided that there should be an Alcan pipeline. What kind of supermen do we have? Before Dean Lysyk even makes his report the leader of the NDP has come to the conclusion that the Alcan route is the route the pipeline should take, from Alaska down through the Yukon, into B.C. and Alberta, and on to the United States. I marvelled when I heard these hon. gentlemen make such a quick decision before the report is even in.

The leader of the NDP said that so long as financial guarantees are not required the Alcan route is the one that should be adopted. He wants three months more for the Lysyk committee to report. Why does he want this time? He has made up his mind that we do not need the Lysyk inquiry. The leader of the NDP has made himself a laughing stock, as anyone who reads today's Hansard and reads the premature conclusions he has come to will concede.

The Leader of the Opposition does not need the National Energy Board. If he ever becomes Prime Minister he will eliminate the National Energy Board.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: If any hon. gentlemen want the floor, they can speak after me.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. gentleman for St. John's West was recognized, and if anyone wishes to participate in the debate or interject, they must address their remarks to the Chair, or raise a point of order. But they must first be recognized.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not know whether the hon. member for St. John's West was getting carried away with his own rhetoric, but he suggested that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) would do away with the National Energy Board. I believe he meant to say the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent).

Mr. Crosbie: I am glad to have that correction, Mr. Speaker. The leader of the NDP would do away with the NEB because he has already found that we have sufficient gas supplies without using frontier gas to last us till the 1990's. What a piece of puffery. We all remember the three monkeys, Mr. Speaker: they see no evil, they hear no evil, and they speak no evil. The leader of the NDP sees no pipeline, he hears no pipeline, and he speaks no pipeline. The poor fellow, we have to pity him. That is the position of the NDP. I hope our ethereal motion will come before the House so we have something we can get our teeth into.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: I can see they do not like that, Mr. Speaker. Let them all shout and bawl, but they will not out-shout me.

The position taken by the Leader of the Opposition today was entirely consistent with the position that he took on Monday, the position he took a month ago and five months ago, when he said that Justice Berger's report was excellent, an important step in the process. But he wanted to ensure that there would be an opportunity for parliament to consider, not simply that report, but also have access to all available consultants' reports which had been prepared, and to have a full debate after the NEB had reported on reserves and on the pipeline applications which are now before it. That is exactly what our position is today.

When we are considering the Berger report—a first class document and anyone who reads it will be impressed—we must realize that changes are in store, not just for Indian and native people, but for all Canadians, if we cannot overcome the energy crisis, if we cannot ensure that we can heat and light our homes and factories in the future as we have in the past. Unless we can overcome these problems, life might well change for all Canadians. Canadians are not taking sufficient alarm at what faces them with respect to energy in the future. One reason why they are not thinking sufficiently about it is that the government has no policy in the field of energy. It is a government which, when you ask a question, responds with a timid titter. When you ask this government a question about its energy policy, you get no information. A smile is no substitute for the truth or for an informative answer when questions are asked. There are too many happy titters running through this House.

The government has no energy policy. It has strategies, it has techniques, it has documents, it files reports, but it has no policy. What has it done which is in any way effective in the field of energy conservation? Canada's energy needs on the supply side are not going to be met without a fantastic effort toward conservation in Canada.

In the United States of America their goal is to have no more than a 2 per cent increase in the use of energy per year. Our timid Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) has a goal of 3½ per cent per year. A goal of less than 3.5 per cent was announced in May, 1976. I am tired of this government announcing goals. I want to hear it announce a policy and to tell us how it is going to fulfil that policy.

I have here a document put out by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources comparing President Carter's energy conservation proposals with the minister's own mouse-like steps. On the one side we have the United States latest energy growth in demand of 2 per cent, and that is quite explicit. On the other side the minister says he has a goal of less than 3.5 per cent, an announcement made in May, 1976. This is typical Canadian bureaucratic obfuscation. He says a further analysis suggests that a 2 per cent growth rate may be feasible. Did you ever hear anything so foolish?

Because the United States has set a target of 2 per cent, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources now says 2 per cent may be feasible here. What steps is the minister going to take to achieve that target? Is he going to do it by having energy conservation programs in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island and discriminating against the other eight provinces of Canada? He is slithering around now because he knows he is in trouble in oil and gas price changes by saying he may extend it to the other eight provinces of Canada. If there is an election this fall, he will have it done before the fall. If it is not this year, then he will have it done before next year. It is not going to help him because the people of Canada are going to remember his great energy conservation policy applied only in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. That is not what we want.

We want a true energy conservation policy with some muscle behind it. We want the minister to get together with the ten provinces of Canada. If the provinces are not doing their share—and most of them are not—we want the minister to persuade them that together they have got to start an emergency program of conservation and more efficient use of energy. The answer is not on the supply side only. We are never going to be self-sufficient in supply. It is going to be too expensive.

The hon. minister opposite has no hydro policy either. His hydro policy is lacking. There are hydro sources throughout northern Canada that can be developed. There are certainly many thousands of megawatts. The minister is doing nothing about that. He is letting them lie fallow. There is no assistance program for those sources, many of which lie in less wealthy provinces which cannot develop them with their own financial resources. The minister is doing nothing there. He has no hydro policy. It is time he got his water aroused and got a hydro policy.

What is the minister doing on the tar sands? The tar sands are lying idle. There was one project—Syncrude. What has happened since? What is going to happen in the tar sands? What is the minister doing for exploration? He is doing nothing.

The government of Alberta did something. Last year exploration and development in Alberta burgeoned up. I am not saying it "Bergered up"; I am saying it burgeoned up. What is the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources doing to see that we get more of the tar sands developed? He is doing less than nothing. The gentleman should resign, unless he can start making some progress in these areas. What is he doing for heavy oil? He is doing less than nothing. Will the Minister without Portfolio help direct his mind in these directions? He is trying to direct his mind into an anti-Berger direction, but will he use his influence? Will he try to get the government to adopt some kind of policy? We know we are going to see some fantastic changes in Liberal policy now that the Minister without Portfolio is there. The lion has returned.

I am not one of those who scoff at the oil and gas companies and the chances and risks they are taking. I think something should be said about them occasionally—what they are trying to do and what they are risking. I am referring to companies such as Dome Petroleum. I know we have a very risky, tricky situation in the Beaufort Sea. Canada is lucky to have entrepreneurs and companies which are willing to risk millions of dollars on long shots to develop the technology and try to find and develop the resources with it. Although I think it is time a good word was said about them and the rest of the oil and gas producers in Canada, they have to be regulated in the public interest. I think they should be praised because of the fact they are willing to go for the long shot, to invest their money and wait years before they have any return. We should keep that in mind.

What are some of the questions to be considered before we decide whether Mr. Justice Berger's recommendations should carry the day? He has reported on certain aspects. We have got to decide on Canada's economic situation. What is the expense going to be on our balance of payments if we do not bring gas from the frontier areas down into the area along the Canadian border? What would be the effect on the balance of payments? The picture is grim. The picture with respect to oil shows us as having a deficit on the balance of payments accounts with respect to oil alone if present projections go ahead and even with conservation of $5 billion or $6 billion by 1985. What about that? Are we going to need gas to replace some of that oil to help us with our balance of payments problem? Because of this government, we know Canada is fast sinking down into the sink hole in its international trade and balance of payments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: If Canada can be saved with a change of government, then it should come this year rather than next year. Hon. gentlemen opposite should get their nerve up and call an election. It may be another year before we can start saving Canada. We have got to keep the balance of payments in mind. We have to keep the financing conditions in mind. We have to keep in mind the economic activity that will be developed in Canada if the pipeline does go ahead.

One thing we should not do is to make a premature decision. Neither the government nor parliament should make a premature decision. Because the United States of America passes legislation which indicates they want to make their decision by September 1 or 90 days thereafter, that should have no effect here in Canada. If it takes us another six months, we should tell them it is going to be six months, and they can change their legislation. Who ever heard of anything so foolish as the President of the Privy Council saying that we have to decide in August because the Congress of the United States passed legislation a year or two ago saying that the President has to recommend something by September 1? I say to the United States Congress, "Get your amendment ready. You might have to change it from September 1 to March 1, or even to June 1. If you do not want to wait until we are ready to make our decision in our national interest, go ahead and bring it down by LNG tanker from Alaska". We are not going to be rushed or hurried because the government of another country passes legislation. Has anyone ever heard of anything so foolish?

If we could properly make a decision, if the Lysyk report were on time and we had enough time to consider it, perhaps by December 1 we would be in a position to do it. We would not be in a position to do it by September 1. There is no government in this world, unless it were composed of the leader of the NDP, which could decide this issue by next September 1 properly and give all the various facts their proper consideration. The Leader of the New Democratic Party, if he were the Prime Minister, would have solved the whole thing five years ago. He would not have had a Mr. Justice Berger. He would not have needed him. There would be no pipeline.

The final twist today is: what about the Yukon Indians? Mr. Justice Berger has dealt with the Indian and native people along the Mackenzie Valley. He has not gone into detail concerning how they would be affected by the other area of the Alcan route. The Leader of the NDP is prepared to abandon the fewer number of Indians who are there.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman that his allotted time has expired.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, as the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) said earlier, we are going to vote against this motion today, not because we are opposed to or decided on its substance or the arguments in its favour, but because it is premature. It is premature because parliament has established a National Energy Board to consider, among other things, pipeline applications, and to advise the government accordingly. For the government to accept or reject the principal Berger recommendations at this time would be an affront to parliament and the institutions established by parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: What would the NDP say if the National Energy Board report happened to be published first? It was only an accident that it was not. If that report were published before the Berger report and the government were to make its decision on that basis without waiting for the Berger report, what would they have said? Obviously they would have cried murder, and justly so, if we had dealt with the National Energy Board report merely because it came out first and had not waited for the other principal report in this matter. It so happens that the Berger report has been published first by accident. That is no reason for a response now without examining the others.

If the government is to be fair and responsible, our response to whether we build a pipeline at all; what route it should follow; whether it should be delayed for ten years or any other period, must be based on a thorough study of the Berger report, the National Energy Board report, the Lysyk report and all other relevant documents. Any other course of action would be clearly irresponsible and even dishonest. Therefore we will vote against the motion, as I said, not because we oppose the substance but because it is premature.

● (1430)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: I will not even take issue with the arguments put forward by the NDP to support its motion. I will, however, put forward the government's position on some of the questions involved and where we presently stand on land claims.

Mr. Justice Berger in volume I of his report has given us a timely, thoughtful, and eloquent commentary on a very complex situation existing in the Mackenzie Valley at present. It is a report of very direct significance for me as the Minister responsible for Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It reflects in a coherent way many of my current pre-occupations and appreciations relating to native land claims, economic development and political evolution in the Northwest Territories. It was clear from the proceedings of the Berger inquiry, whether in the representative public meetings held in the large centres or in the less formal small gatherings in the tiny communities, that the Berger Commission was receiving evidence on a whole range of concerns. These concerns were triggered by the pipeline applications but extended well beyond them in terms of both content and implication.

Many of the same concerns have been raised in other forums and at earlier times. Some are less well known than others. Some are susceptible of effective government response, others raise real difficulties that are not easily overcome.

Judge Berger was asked to make recommendations in relation to the pipeline applications. In the course of his inquiry he has heard references to a whole range of problems that have been raised by various people in the Mackenzie Valley. Accordingly, his report does make certain recommendations that will be considered by the government in the months to come, along with other advice and recommendations on the same subject.

He also makes comments on other issues and problems that are valuable, and especially to me as the minister concerned with Indian and Inuit affairs, because they bear directly on key aspects of the government's continuing responsibilities for and relationships with these native groups.

In the first place there is much that I can agree with in the commission's assessment of the needs and aspirations of the northern native peoples. I am aware of their concerns—many of them shared by Indians generally in this country—about the threats to Indian and Inuit identity that are inherent in the rapid economic and social development all around them.

Since assuming my responsibilities as minister I have had frequent occasion to assure representatives of the Indian people, both in public and private meetings, that the government is committed to continuing its special responsibilities in relation to them; to safeguarding their Indian status, rights and interests; to ensuring their continuing Indian identity within Canadian society. This commitment is expressed and reflected in a whole range of policies and activities the government is pursuing at the present time north and south of the 60th parallel.

This can best be illustrated by the following quotations from current policies of the government: first, from a statement entitled "Canada's north 1970-1980" made in March, 1972, which reads as follows:

> The people of the north have survived for many centuries in spite of the harsh conditions prevailing there. In recent decades the native northerners have been offered new opportunities and facilities for strengthening their capacity to survive. But survival for them must be more than mere subsistence supplemented by government subsidy. It must above all permit the people themselves to make their own choices as to the place they wish to occupy and the part they wish to play, in the evolving society of Canada, north and south of the 60th parallel.

Second, the statement on claims of Indian and Inuit people, released on August 8, 1973, which reads as follows:

> The government has been fully aware that the claims are not only for money and land, but involve the loss of a way of life. Any settlement, therefore, must contribute positively to a lasting solution of cultural, social and economic problems that for too long have kept the Indian and Inuit people in a disadvantaged position within the larger Canadian society.

Third, a directive to all directors general of the Indian affairs program issued by the minister on July 26, 1976, enclosing a paper entitled, "Approach to Government-Indian Relationship", which reads as follows:

> The emphasis of the approach is on processes of joint participation in policy/program developments with organized Indian leadership at all levels. In conveying to you this paper, I intend that you should be guided at all times by this approach, the various implications of which are summarized in the paper. The approach would also serve as a broad policy framework for all federal departments and agencies having programs that affect status Indians, with heavy emphasis on systematic consultation among departments concerned both in Ottawa and in the field.

These policies are reflected in the processes established and contemplated under the National Indian Brotherhood-Cabinet Committee, in the claims negotiations, in the progressive transfer of authority and resources to Indian bands, and Indian people.

Judge Berger has also commented about the need for a partnership of interests between government and the native peoples. This is something else that I subscribe to whole-heartedly and that has become a principal thrust of departmental effort, during the past year or so, toward an improved relationship with the Indian people.

In a wide subject area including housing, education, economic development, and Indian Act revision, departmental officials and I have been engaged in closely-knit, joint working arrangements intended and designed to arrive at agreed accommodations of policy and program, whereby the Indian people can take charge of their own affairs in ways of their own choosing.

I agree with Judge Berger that the Indian and Inuit groups in the north must have freedom and latitude, in making their own choices about how they wish to run their own affairs. It is basic to the government's current Indian and northern policy that self-government, education, municipal services and economic development in native communities should reflect native values and take into account suggestions advanced by communities themselves. This is a key consideration in the negotiation of comprehensive land claims and in the proposed political consultation that I will be mentioning later.

The Berger report refers frequently, though not precisely, to native institutions, including their own political institutions.

We have already seen in the James Bay Agreement the establishment of various institutions, controlled by Indian and Inuit groups, for governmental and developmental purposes. We have seen that Indian and Inuit peoples of the James Bay area are to have ensured representation on governmental bodies concerned with such key matters as land use, environmental protection, and game management.

The government is not wedded to any particular model for achieving and ensuring native self-government along those lines, but it is committed to ensuring that effective native participation is brought about. This is an essential and central element in our approach to comprehensive land claims in the north, in both the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

Since the Berger report emphasizes the significance of native claims, it may be helpful if I summarized the status of the various claims arising in the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

In the Yukon, representatives of the council for Yukon Indians, the federal and territorial governments, have established a co-operative planning process which is providing a new and effective framework for discussion and negotiation, and serves as well to inform all Yukoners about claims developments as they occur. This process functions under a Yukon planning council, which has reached agreement on the goals of settlement, and set up several working groups to examine the issues and prepare mutually agreed solutions. If the current rate of progress were to continue, an agreement in principle could be reached before the end of this year.

● (1440)

The Inuit of the Northwest Territories, represented by the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, submitted in February of 1976 their proposals, entitled "Nunavut", for the settlement of Inuit land claims in the territories. A number of clarification meetings were held before September of last year when the Inuit representatives decided to consult further with their communities on the claim. The government is expecting to receive a revised proposal later this year.

The Indian Brotherhood of the Northwest Territories, representing the Dene, presented its proposals to the government last October. Among other things, the brotherhood seeks to establish an Indian territory in the Mackenzie Valley. Since last October there have been several meetings with the brotherhood aimed at clarifying various elements of the Dene position, including the issue of an Indian territory. The questions that have emerged are very complex and relate very directly to the future political evolution of the Northwest Territories.

The Metis Association of the Northwest Territories has prepared a discussion paper concerning its land claim in the Mackenzie Valley, which is now being reviewed by native communities in the valley. The association has indicated that it will submit its claim to the government by July 1.

Finally, I have just received settlement proposals from the Committee for Original Peoples' Entitlement, known as COPE, which represents 2,000 Inuit people in the Mackenzie Delta. COPE is particularly concerned about the increasing pressures of population and resource development in this area, and it has expressed a wish to work out an agreement in principle before a decision is made on a northern pipeline. We shall be studying COPE's proposals and discussing them with COPE in the months ahead.

The effective presentation of these complex native claims proposals is the product of research and other claims development activity which has been directly funded by the federal government, through our department. Since 1972 nearly $7 million have been provided to native northern associations for these purposes, including $1.6 million to the Indians of the Yukon, $1.7 million to the Indians and Metis of the Mackenzie Valley, and $3.3 million to the Inuit.

The political responsibilities, economic and social benefits, and practical working arrangements that the various native groups do achieve through patiently negotiated claims processes are to be incorporated in enabling legislation, including, above all, special enactments of the federal parliament. This procedure has been contemplated from the outset in the government's policy on comprehensive claims, enunciated in August, 1973.

It is intended to give Indian and Inuit rights and interests in this country precise definition, lasting effect, and the full protection of Canadian law. The basic aim of the government in this regard is not to diminish or dilute the identity and culture of these native peoples, but to safeguard them. It is also to promote their self determination within Canadian society to the extent that this is possible in contemporary circumstances. Judge Berger's report is much concerned with self determination for native peoples in the north, and it refers to several aspects, some of which I have already mentioned. In our Indian and northern policies at the present time we are concentrating on goals and measures that improve the prospects for political self determination and economic self-reliance in native communities. The two go hand in hand.

The Berger Report refers at some length to the native economy in the Mackenzie Valley, and particularly to the traditional pursuits of hunting, fishing, and trapping. I am largely in agreement with what it has to say about the importance of these pursuits to the native peoples and about the related questions of surface land use and environmental protection.

The report also lays heavy emphasis on the need to diversify the economy of the Northwest Territories. It suggests that more reliance be placed on modernizing the methods used in native pursuits, encouraging small industries and promoting tourism. These are among approaches that have been considered from time to time and that are being pursued by the federal and territorial governments, but not always with great success.

Far from ruling them out in the future, I believe that we need to renew such efforts with greater energy, innovation, and commitment on the part of all concerned. It goes without saying that the various sectors of the rather fragile economy that exists in the northern territories are closely interdependent, whether they are under the control of government, private industry, or the various native groups. The Berger Report assumes that resource development and related activity will continue and should do so, as long as it complements, rather than displaces, the traditional mixed economy of the native communities.

The northern economy is, moreover, sharply affected by external factors such as inflation, transportation costs, and non-renewable resource activity, or the lack of it. Judge Berger has noted these factors, among others, in his comments on the economic impacts of pipeline construction. They would exist whether or not a pipeline was built in the Mackenzie Valley in the near future or after a delay.

As the report suggests, the small, predominantly native communities, with their involvement in native economic pursuits, are perhaps better able to weather changes and fluctuations in the northern economy than the larger, mixed communities where the local enterprise tends to be largely in the service sector and in support of major resource development. This accounts in part for the concerns being expressed in Yellowknife and in other towns in the Northwest Territories about the Berger Report.

It also underlines what we have increasingly realized, and what the Berger evidence reinforces: that there must be a more cohesive strategy of economic development in the Northwest Territories, and in the Yukon for that matter. It must be shaped in the north through participation of all the interests involved there: government, industry, and native peoples. It must be related to claims negotiations and settlements and to constitutional development in each of the two territories during the coming years.

Most of the tensions and pressures in the Northwest Territories today can be traced to three major sources: first, the general demand for a greater degree of self-government; second, the determination of the native peoples to gain recognition and power through land claims; and third, the urgent need for direction and pacing in the development of the economy. These three factors, and the disruptive forces they let loose, interact among themselves and bear heavily on the whole question of how the Northwest Territories is to evolve politically in the years to come.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. minister that his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I have only a few minutes to go, and I thank the House for its permission.

As Judge Berger has suggested, the way we resolve these issues and situations in the north may tell us quite a lot about ourselves and our country. Certainly there are some national implications of grand magnitude, beginning with the claims settlement that can be contemplated.

The various processes set up for negotiating land claim settlements are not sufficient to serve all the major purposes involved in the north. Neither are the normal processes and channels for government to government communication. Both these processes will continue and, no doubt, grow in importance, but in addition there is an apparent need for an essentially political process of consultation and negotiation about constitutional issues. It should be systematic, action oriented, and ongoing, under the direct guidance of the minister responsible. It should have for its mandate and framework for conducting business a broad policy statement endorsed by the federal government and take into account the various views which have been expressed by all interested groups in the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

During recent months I have been engaged in preliminary consultations with these groups about the policy statement and political process I have in mind. Once these preliminary discussions have been concluded, I intend to make recommendations to cabinet about the whole matter. Although I would be the last person to underestimate the complexity of the issues involved, I am hopeful that the proposed policy statement can be ready for publication this summer.

I believe we are indebted to Mr. Justice Berger for the way in which he has carried out his demanding task. I have already indicated ways in which views expressed in his report related to my responsibilities as minister and to those of the government in the north. To have these important matters presented in this informative, comprehensive, and readable report is bound to enhance public understanding of the major issues involved.

Before concluding I wish to add a few words about the board of inquiry, announced on April 19, 1977, to examine in a preliminary way the socio-economic aspects of the proposed Alaska highway gas pipeline. Its establishment followed consultations with the Yukon territorial government and the Council for Yukon Indians, both of whom are represented on the board. In this way this inquiry is different from the Berger inquiry.

In the course of public hearings in the Yukon, the board is to review the application for construction of the pipeline in order to identify areas in which additional information should be provided by the applicant and where further studies may be required.

As well, the board is to advise me of the measures that should be taken, including arrangements for a further inquiry, to produce a final socio-impact statement upon which specific terms and conditions could be developed for the construction and operation of the pipeline in the event that the Alaska highway application receives approval in principle.

I emphasize the preliminary nature of this inquiry and of the report the board is asked to make by August 1. I do this because of some suggestions in the press that Dean Lysyk and his colleagues have been asked to carry out in three months a task that occupied Judge Berger for nearly three years. What seems to have been overlooked is that the Berger Commission conducted its own preliminary inquiry before engaging in more detailed investigations. The Lysyk Commission will not deal in environment or conditions for construction at this time.

Concurrent with this board of inquiry under Dean Lysyk, the environmental assessment and review process of the Department of the Environment will be examining environmental matters, and there will be continuous exchanging of information between the two investigatory bodies.

The Yukon board faces a major challenge in trying to arrive at preliminary findings in a relatively short time. Judge Berger's report suggests, however, that the socio-economic impacts in the southern Yukon may not be as severe as those encountered in the Northwest Territories. In any event, the experience and reports of the Berger inquiry, the first of its kind in Canada, should greatly assist Dean Lysyk and his colleagues in carrying out their assignment.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank hon. members for the additional time given me, and I assure them and the Indian people of Canada again that while we are voting against this motion we are doing so simply because it is premature.

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, the concluding remarks of the minister astound me. I find it rather difficult to accept the argument that he and hon. members who spoke earlier on this motion have made. They say they cannot support the motion. They say that, even after three years of very careful and hard work done by Mr. Justice Berger.

The motion reads as follows:

That this House urges the government to accept the principal recommendation of the Berger Report that no pipeline be built in the Mackenzie Valley for at least ten years.

That is a straightforward motion.

I wish to start out by stating very categorically that I wholeheartedly support the report brought down on Monday by Mr. Justice Berger. It is a totally comprehensive analysis of a most important issue. In its style it is forthright, and therefore I believe that you either have to be for it or against it, and I personally feel that anyone against the recommendations in the report is either fooling himself or, even worse than that, is rather shortsighted.

The magnitude of the proposed Mackenzie Valley pipeline is, to say the least, immense. I say that for several reasons. As Justice Berger points out, this endeavour is the greatest construction project ever contemplated by private enterprise. The impact upon the north, especially the western Arctic, is massive. And, due to the issues involved, the proposed undertaking assumes international importance. Consequently it would be foolhardy to try to minimize any of the matters we are dealing with here.

From the beginning the NDP has pushed for consideration and evaluation of such a proposed undertaking. Indeed it was due to our prodding that the Berger Commission was initially established. We feel that it is absolutely essential that, rather than push blindly ahead, we should have a clear picture of our energy needs, to determine, in the first place, if and when such activity might be necessary. In addition, we are concerned about the environmental matters, and, most important, the social impact on the northern people, especially the northern native population. It is consideration of these issues which we sought, and now we have the Berger recommendations. It is essential that we proceed with reasoned caution and try to do what is right.

Mr. Justice Berger has come out very strongly against any pipeline in the northern Yukon. The environmental concerns are of utmost importance, and any headlong rush to development and exploitation could cause catastrophic and irreparable damage in that area.

Maybe people in the south, environmental and conservation groups notwithstanding, are more accustomed to pollution and the like, and possibly are a bit more complacent, though this is changing. We in the north, who have historically had a very close relationship with the land, are very much aware of the tenuous state of the relationship. Justice Berger has explained, at great lenght, the potential dangers to the environment which would result from such an undertaking. It certainly would be difficult to argue with his conclusions as to the environmental impact that could be inherent in such a venture. But there may be those who would be willing to sacrifice the clean waters, the rare wildlife, and unspoiled land, for what they consider more important things. We all well know that it has been done before. However, let us be clear about one thing; if not immediately, then over the long run, we would be doing a grave disservice to this country.

I have no intention of going into great detail on this; but surely we are all aware by now of the often catastrophic and, usually, unforeseen results that have occurred where man has interfered with the balance of nature. And I assure you that there are very fewer areas where nature exists in such a delicate balance as it does in the north. It is a harsh land, with its own unique beauty; but due to the existing conditions, the slightest upset could have far-reaching detrimental effects. I really cannot over-state the importance of this. But this is not the only matter which we must take into consideration. There is even a very bigger concern. It should be no surprise that that concern is the people, especially the people of the north. At this point we must consider seriously the social, cultural and economic importance of such an enterprise as the building of a northern pipeline.

As Mr. Justice Thomas Berger points out, Euro-Canadian society has not taken native culture seriously. At best, its attitude can be described as patronizing. Now I admit that this is changing. It might not be changing as fast as we would like, but it is changing. Certainly people are becoming more aware of the importance of our native cultural heritage. We have seen the damage that has occurred to our way of life since the coming of the white man. It is not overly dramatic to say that the social fabric, especially in the part of the country I represent, has been torn apart. Depression and frustration in trying to cope with—or evade—the white man's lifestyle have led to social breakdown, to alcoholism, and even suicide. Now we want to change this. We want to retain control over our lives and take our rightful place in Canadian society. But we also want to be accepted on an equal footing.

● (1500)

As I have said many times inside and outside this House, we want to be accepted as native people, not as brown white men.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Firth: Who can say this is unfair? It is pretentious to say that so and so discovered the north. Our people have survived in the harsh environment of the north for a very long time. And when the white man came, we helped him and shared with him, as is our custom. I ask, should we now be forced to take a back seat? Most emphatically I say, no!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Firth: Our people, in great numbers and with essentially one voice, said it to Mr. Justice Thomas Berger. That point is extremely important, Mr. Speaker. He listened to our views, and was made aware of this sentiment. He was made aware of the fact that central to this feeling was the feeling of the people that they need to gain legal control of our land.

Please note that I used the word "legal." It is difficult for a native person to accept that he might not have control over land on which he and his forefathers have lived, hunted and fished from time immemorial. We native people realize that our destiny is tied to an important decision which must be made, the decision to settle the land claims of the people of the Northwest Territories, the land claims of the native population. We have always understood the value and worth of the land; perhaps we did not look at it in terms of ownership, as white society does. Now we are looking at it with different eyes. First of all we are now thinking of owning the land, which was not our concept in the past. We now realize that only if we own the land can we achieve the necessary control. Only that way can we control the direction of our lives and the direction in which we want our society to go. In this respect I suggest that we want no more than the rest of the Canadian population wants.

We also understand that in future we may take our wealth from the land in a manner different from that of the past. I do not think I can improve on the words of Mr. Justice Thomas Berger who said, on page 18 of his report:

> Native society is not static. The things the native people have said to this inquiry should not be regarded as a lament for a lost way of life, but as a plea for an opportunity to shape their own future out of their own past. They are not seeking to entrench the past, but to build on it.

There are those who feel that the land claims could be settled even if the pipeline went ahead. I disagree. With the examples of James Bay and other examples behind us, the native people believe that land claims must be settled first. With this Mr. Justice Berger concurs. Frankly, given all the implications of the question, I fail to see how any fair minded person can disagree.

Mackenzie Valley Pipeline

Those who say we should proceed at once with a pipeline also argue that the economic development of the north depends upon such immediate action. With such a view, as well, I must disagree.

We need to look at some basic questions. What would be the real impact of the pipeline, in a purely economic sense? Certainly there is a lot of money involved. But in return for the incredibly large capital outlay, what are the long-term prospects? Aside from anticipated, increased exploration activity along the pipeline, which would add considerably to the environmental and social impact, what, I ask, would be the effect on substantial economic development? We must be realistic. It is proposed that the line will carry gas, and perhaps eventually oil, to the south, the implication being that no spin-off industries are to be expected. And what of the construction companies, hotels, restaurants, supermarkets and so on which could spring up? How many enterprises of such magnitude can we expect will be established? I agree with the words of Mr. Justice Berger, who said:

> . . . the Mackenzie Valley pipeline could produce a serious distortion of the small business sector of the Northwest Territories. This would raise problems for the orderly development of regional, economic and commercial activity in the long run.

That is why I say we cannot afford to put blinkers on when looking at this proposal. We cannot and must not be short-sighted. There is far too much at stake. It would be an illusion—we would really be fooling ourselves—if we thought the pipeline would solve our economic problems.

Finally, I wish to state again my support for the recommendations against the building of the proposed Mackenzie Valley pipeline. Further, I wish to add my conditional support to the proposed Alcan route. I say conditional, because many questions must be considered. The main condition, of course, would be the settlement of native peoples land claims in the Yukon. So my support is conditional, since many questions affecting the area must be considered before a final decision can reasonably be made. However, my own initial view is that the Alcan route seems to be a more suitable solution. A gas pipeline can be built in Alaska; you could hook it up with a new pipeline to run through the Yukon, along the Alaska highway. Later on it might be feasible to run a pipeline from the Mackenzie Delta, along the Dempster highway, to tie in with the proposed Alcan gas pipeline, which could be used in future to move Canadian gas from the proven fields of the Mackenzie Delta. I suggest that the environmental impact of that proposal would be somewhat lower, and the infrastructure already exists along the proposed route for accommodating more conveniently the venture. However, I point out that even if we should move in that direction, many issues remain to be settled.

I want to see assurances that any pipeline built would not be built solely for United States interests. I want to see Canada maintain control over any such pipeline. Also, before any money is spent, I want to see some hard-nosed negotiations take place to ensure a good deal for Canada. Further, if the venture is proceeded with, I want to see a provision calling for a period review—say every five years or so—of any deal made with respect to a pipeline carrying gas or oil to the United States through Canada.

In summary, I believe, first, that we must determine what are our energy needs and resources. It is important to get a true picture. I suppose I am concerned about this because, in the past, the petroleum industry has exhibited what could fairly be called a credibility problem.

Mr. Benjamin: That's putting it mildly.

Mr. Firth: Next, we must look at the best way to reconcile this need with the interests of the north and northern people. That is simple enough to say but more difficult to do. It took Mr. Justice Berger almost three years to get this excellent report together. And what is one of his most important recommendations, Mr. Speaker? It is that the pipeline should be postponed for ten years, which would allow for the settlement of land claims and the establishment of new programs and institutions. That is the heart of the matter, and the heart of the motion before the House.

● (1510)

If we were faced with a graver energy crisis than we are confronted with now, the decision we would have to make would be even tougher than it presently is. However, I believe that we may still have a few years to decide. I think we should take time to work out the best possible solution. Anything less would be almost criminal.

We must get a perspective on this matter. There are many issues to take into consideration. I am against the pipeline, but I would like to see more jobs for the people of the north. I do not want to hold up economic development, but I want to see land claims settled. So, where does this leave me? And where does it leave those on the government side?

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Justice Thomas Berger has helped us in our job. He has given us an honest, straightforward, intelligent and comprehensive report. It is now our responsibility to go from here. I feel it would be less than responsible for anyone not to give this report his wholehearted endorsement.

Another point I would like to make is that I have run in two federal elections in the Northwest Territories, 1972 and 1974. A major plank in my platform in both elections was that there be no Mackenzie Valley pipeline built until such a time as the native claims are settled. I won both elections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Possibly the minister will allow the Chair to make the ruling which had been deferred upon the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). The decision was reserved at the time the amendment was proposed.

I wish to thank hon. members, in particular the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), who attempted to enlighten the Chair as to the judgment to be passed on the amendment moved by the Leader of the Official Opposition to the motion moved by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). That motion reads as follows:

> That this House urges the government to accept the principal recommendation of the Berger Report that no pipeline be built in the Mackenzie Valley for at least ten years.

The amendment offered by the Leader of the Opposition reads as follows:

> That all the words after the word "government" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "to appoint a special committee of the House to consider the recommendations of the Berger Report and all other reports, studies and recommendations relevant to the building of a northern pipeline, and the method of settlement of native land claims and urges that no commitment in principle be made to build a northern pipeline without parliamentary approval."

The Chair at this time must make a decision on the relevancy and acceptability of the amendment. In so doing, it must look very carefully at the amendment in terms of its relevancy to the main motion.

In this particular case we have before us a motion, the subject of which is very clear. The motion asks the House to accept a particular recommendation of the Berger Report. That is very definite in the motion put forward by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent).

On the other hand, the amendment seeks to widen the scope of the debate. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton says there is nothing wrong with that. The amendment seeks to widen the scope of the debate by asking the House, not simply to accept or reject the proposition contained in the main motion, but to consider whether the Berger Report ought to be studied by a committee of this House. That was not part of the main motion. To my mind this is a new proposition. The motion proposes the acceptance of the main recommendation of the Berger Report while the first part of the amendment proposes referring the Berger Report to a committee of this House for study.

While I can have sympathy with hon. members who feel we ought to proceed in this way in the sense of going through a thorough examination of the report before making a decision, I cannot overlook the fact that the amendment states that the proposed committee also study "all other reports, studies and recommendations relevant to the building of a northern pipeline". It seems that the amendment travels even farther beyond the rather narrow confines of the motion.

I am, of course, aware that these matters are all closely connected and related to the issue raised by the main motion. However, I am rather uncertain about their relevance to the subject matter of the motion which is a definite and specific request to this House to accept a recommendation of the Berger Report.

I can say the same about the third subject dealt with in the amendment, the bringing in of the settlement of the native land claims. Clearly it is an issue related to the broad area of the Berger Report and the northern pipeline, but I have difficulty seeing it, in the procedural sense, as relevant to the very narrow proposition contained in the main motion.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton complained about the fact that hon. members have the right to move an amendment, and the Chair should not in its decision preclude any members from doing so. I referred to that point in my previous comments. The Chair has one main function, that is, to apply the rules and regulations of this House and make judgments, not on the judgments of hon. members on subject matters, but in the application of these rules.

The hon. member denied the fact that his motion was an expanded negative or was not relevant. I feel that this is a question of opinion, especially in the perspective in which he is putting his argument. He referred to his amendment as a relevant modification. This I have to admit is quite the fact, that the amendment is directly related to the report and to the construction of a pipeline in the north of Canada, but that is quite far from denying the fact that the amendment is not a new proposition.

Finally, however, the amendment proposes that the House pronounce itself on the proposition that no commitment in principle be made for or against the building of a northern pipeline without parliamentary approval. In my view this is clearly a new proposition. The main motion asks the House to make a decision on a recommendation which could delay for ten years the construction of a pipeline. The official opposition proposes to refer the subject matter and all related subjects to a committee. Finally, it adds a limitation to the decision of the House, a limitation which makes it subject to a future parliamentary approval. In my view this is clearly a new proposition and beyond the scope of the original motion. It is the kind of proposition which the House might want to debate some time; however, according to our rules it cannot be debated as an amendment, but only as a motion. As I say, it introduces a new proposition—I refer particularly to the words "and urges that no commitment in principle be made to build a northern pipeline without parliamentary approval." Because of all these considerations, it is impossible for me to accept the amendment.

● (1520)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do not wish to take the time of the House—

Mr. Peters: Then sit down.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I listened carefully to the points Your Honour has made, and I am rising merely to seek clarification. Your Honour may have been greatly moved in your consideration of this matter by the words "and urges that no commitment in principle be made to build a northern pipeline without parliamentary approval" on the ground that they imposed a new principle. If that is the case, and bearing in mind it has been the consistent hope of the official opposition that the House will be able to pronounce itself on the establishment of a parliamentary committee, I wonder whether the Chair would reconsider its judgment if I were to indicate that the removal of the phrase to which I have referred would certainly be acceptable to us.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I say this because it has been a consistent hope of the official opposition that the whole question of the pipeline together with all these reports ought to be considered by a parliamentary committee.

An hon. Member: The Chair has ruled on it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Despite the chit-chat from the noisy rump down there, I advance this suggestion, not in any way to question the judgment of the Chair, but to seek clarification.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I might, of course, have referred during my judgment to some of the precedents mentioned by the hon. member. I have them in front of me and the majority of them refer to cases in which the purpose of the amendments proposed was to narrow the subject matter of the motion. In this case we are clearly widening the scope of the subject matter. My reference to the words mentioned by the hon. member does not mean that the consideration of relevancy is less important. The hon. member will agree with me that the reaction of hon. members while he was seeking to convince the Chair and the House that there might be some kind of agreement possible to remove the latter part of the amendment was not entirely favourable. As he knows, this could only be withdrawn by unanimous consent; the hon. member does not have the floor, and it is my judgment that such consent would not be forthcoming. The only alternative left to the hon. member would be to put forward a further amendment while another speaker has the floor. At the same time, there would still be grounds for refusing the amendment and I suggest that the course the hon. member has in mind would not alter the decision of the Chair.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I open my remarks by saying that I listened carefully, as always, to the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth). He is a man who speaks from experience, and obviously he is a very articulate spokesman within his own caucus. He is probably responsible for the decision of his party, even earlier than today, to take exception to the building of a pipeline through the Mackenzie Valley. Perhaps this is related to his election promise. I do not know.

I was encouraged by his statement that he was very anxious to obtain a better understanding of the country's energy needs. He was clearly keeping the matter within a national context when he made that comment. It seemed to me he was making the case which the government has made in this debate—that until the report of the National Energy Board has been submitted, and until parliament has had an opportunity to discuss the matter, we cannot be sure what those energy needs are.

At the same time I was discouraged by what I can only describe as the "shoot from the hip" attitude of some members of the official opposition. I regret that this particular tactic, one which they have followed with great success in recent times, should have had the effect of preventing more members from taking part in the debate today. A great deal of time has been used up dealing with procedural matters. Fortunately, we have got that amendment out of the way.

Some of us on this side were amazed by the suggestion that a committee be formed to deal with this matter. Mr. Speaker, when those of us who are interested in energy matters attend meetings of the committee on national resources we sometimes have to wait for as long as 50 minutes after the time officially appointed for the meeting to begin before one member of the official opposition turns up.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Gillespie: We hear a lot of noise from the other side about the need to discuss these energy issues, but when a committee is set up to do so we have to wait for 50 minutes for one of their members to turn up.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the minister should know the rules well enough to realize that Your Honour has ruled against the amendment. It should not therefore be discussed. If the hon. gentleman has any reasonable contribution to make, let him make it now.

Mr. Gillespie: Perhaps the hon. member will be able to persuade some of his colleagues to show a greater interest in energy matters. His own chief energy critic—I do not know whether he made an error or not, but the record will show it—said that if the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) were the prime minister of this country—

An hon. Member: A natural slip!

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member said that if the Leader of the Opposition were prime minister he would abolish the National Energy Board.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Gillespie: Are we to take that party seriously?

• (1530)

The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) said that if the Leader of the Opposition were Prime Minister he would abolish the NEB. Now, I ask you—

Mr. Paproski: You know that is a lie, Alastair.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): With respect, Mr. Speaker, the remarks which were made just now by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) were the worst form of pettifogging that I have heard in a long time. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources knows, because he was here, that the record was corrected, and corrected properly, and he ought not to leave that impression. Perhaps he will enhance what little reputation he has by getting on with the debate.

Mr. Gillespie: I am very pleased that the record was corrected, Mr. Speaker, but I point out it was corrected by a member on this side. I believe the Leader of the Opposition has also corrected the record as far as his remarks on Monday night are concerned.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You have no record to correct.

Mr. Gillespie: We are dealing here with an important national question, one particularly important to the people of the north. If I may have the attention of hon. members opposite I should like to make a few remarks in respect thereto.

I believe that Mr. Justice Berger's report was one of the most significant the country has received and will certainly set a new standard in terms of its approach and its impact. I very much appreciate the work that the author has done, because I think he has done his job well. Indeed I think his eloquence in the report speaks for itself. I am sure that both he and the many people who appeared before his inquiry will want this House and all those who are interested to take longer than the four days that we have had since his report was made public to digest what he said, to reflect upon it, and to reach our own conclusions respecting the many complex and difficult issues that he has addressed.

He dealt, as we know, with two main questions, the question of the impact, social and environmental, and the economic impact. He dealt as well—and this part has yet to be completed—with some of the conditions that should be imposed in the event that a decision is made to have a pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley.

He did not deal, of course, with another issue, a very important issue, nor was he asked to deal with it, that is, the question of the national interest. That is why the National Energy Board report is so important. Parliament assigned this equally difficult responsibility to the National Energy Board and it is still in the process of conducting its inquiry, with a report expected early in the month of July.

As the House knows, the government has consistently taken the position that a decision on whether it would be in the Canadian interest to approve a northern gas line at this time should be taken once all the evidence is before it, and that it would be premature to reach a conclusion until all issues have been examined in depth and set out fully so that they can be assessed together. There was never any doubt, at least in the mind of the government, that a northern pipeline along whichever route might seem desirable could have significant consequences for the lives and futures of the people living along the route. It was, in fact, that very concern which prompted the Mackenzie Valley pipeline inquiry in the first place.

There is, however, another very grave concern, and that is the energy future of this country, and the role that frontier natural gas, particularly delta gas, can and should play in meeting future energy requirements. The government over the past few years has heard from many groups asserting that northern natural gas would be required to supply southern Canadian markets within a relatively short time period, and in fact an earlier report of the National Energy Board has indicated that natural gas supplies from western Canada, while adequate for today's needs, may not be sufficient to meet future demands. The government was not prepared at that time to conclude on the basis of these concerns that a pipeline from the delta would necessarily be the best or only solution to our future energy requirements. This can be done only after the National Energy Board has had an opportunity to assess fully each of the proposals now before it, and to present its decision and reasons for reaching that decision on the basis of the evidence it has heard.

I think we need to look at some of our concerns respecting our energy future. We have just entered into a period where our total net imports of crude oil exceed our total net exports. We are therefore becoming more and more dependent on imported oil to meet our future energy requirements. This comes about not solely because of growth in demand but also because of declining supplies and deliverability of crude oil from western Canada. We can in the short term count on imported oil, but there is no basis realistically for thinking that we can do so for very long.

For reasons of national security, and in order to reduce our exposure to a price system established outside Canada, we have adopted a target to limit our total crude oil imports to one third of our total consumption by 1985. We will not reach that point for some years yet, but with greater conservation, and the development of our own petroleum resources, oil and natural gas and other substitute fuels, we will exceed that target.

That is not to say that delta gas is our only source or the only solution to new supplies, but we must assess whether, in looking to the long term, we can afford to reject the opportunity now presented to us to bring that gas within a known time frame to Canadian markets. There may be many Canadians who are not concerned with the balance of payments implications and with growing dependence upon foreign countries. It has been estimated that our dependency on foreign oil requirements is of the order of $4 billion to $5 billion a year. It seems to me that all Canadians should be able to understand the question: what do we do when that offshore oil is no longer available to us, or indeed to others?

I agree that this is obviously an important and constructive approach to the problem, but it is not a solution. All it can do is help reduce the size of the problem. We may very well be able to reduce our energy consumption to 2 per cent growth, which is roughly a zero rate of growth per capita, something which "An Energy Strategy for Canada" set out as a possibility a year ago. Over that period of time I have repeatedly referred to this, and I was particularly interested to see that the United States energy policy contemplated the same kind of target.

We are going to be increasingly pressed to develop our own supplies, our own substitutes, for the reasons I have given and for the reasons which President Carter gave his own people not very long ago when he set out the stark realities and talked to the United States people about their energy future. We have little enough time to put our own house in order. If we were to set aside, for a period of ten years for example, projects and plans which would help provide future energy for Canada, we could be losing a very significant opportunity. If we are not prepared to face that head on, to look at the disastrous consequences of an energy shortage ten years hence, which implies greater unemployment and greater inflation, then we will be derelict in our duty. For that reason it is important we await the views and the judgment of the National Energy Board before reaching a conclusion on this aspect of our energy needs.

● (1540)

It may be that through alternate sources of energy, such as the Athabasca tar sands, the Cold Lake deposits and other heavy oils, Arctic Islands natural gas, renewable solar energy and coal gasification, we can make up for the predicted shortfall of our oil and gas requirements. I am leaving aside, for the moment, our requirements for electrical energy. It is true we do have these options but, so far as I know, none is lower in cost than delta natural gas at this time. Each of these options, moreover, has its own particular set of difficult issues, economically, socially, and environmentally.

Mr. Stanfield: Which side of this are you on, Alastair?

Mr. Gillespie: If there were delays in bringing natural gas down from the north, we would be forsaking one of the options we have before us. It is not clear that the next major option, the development of the tar sands and heavy oil, can be done at a pace which would fill in the shortfalls that otherwise would occur in Canada. This point was made very clear by Mr. Getty, the Alberta energy minister, as recently as two days ago. We have got to use time between now and this summer to assess the many points made by Mr. Justice Berger in his report. These are points with respect to the importance of trapping, hunting and fishing employment levels which one can hope to obtain for those in the area. We also have to address ourselves to such questions as: what about the young people who are leaving the school system? Will they all be interested in becoming hunters and trappers? How many will be able to find a livelihood from such pursuits? Will some not seek a greater variety of challenges and opportunities to enter an industrial economy?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: They will probably be the next ministers of energy, mines and resources.

Mr. Clark: Tell us about the buffalo.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I suggest we need to reflect upon Mr. Justice Berger's landmark report. Four days is too soon for such a purpose. I believe Mr. Justice Berger would want us to understand thoroughly what he is saying, to know what we would be accepting if we adopted his recommendations and approach, and in fact be prepared to give full support to the implementation of his ideas and suggestions for the north—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Paproski: Order.

Mr. Gillespie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 3:35 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the supply proceedings now before the House under the provisions of Standing Order 58(9)(a).

[English]

The question is on the motion of Mr. Broadbent. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Broadbent) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare the motion lost.

Pursuant to the order made earlier this week, and it being after four o'clock, this House now stands adjourned until Monday next at two o'clock in the afternoon.

At 4.10 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Special Order.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR NEW MEASURES TO DEAL WITH INFLATION AND UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the consensus at the recent summit meetings that inflation and unemployment are priority problems, Canada leading in the latter category and being a strong contender in the former, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

That the Prime Minister make a statement on motions of new initiatives, if any, of the government to deal with these severe Canadian problems rather than pirouetting around the difficulties of our country.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

EXCESSIVE SALARY INCREASE GRANTED TO PRESIDENT OF KAISER RESOURCES LIMITED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present a motion under Standing Order 43. If anyone is opposed to the presentation of this motion I hope he will identify himself clearly. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House, noting that the President and Chief Executive Officer of Kaiser Resources Limited received a pay increase in 1976 of $60,363, while the employees of his companies were held to a 6 per cent increase in their hourly wage, and noting also that this massive increase of $60,363 was approved by the Anti-Inflation Board, expresses its sense of outrage and calls on the government to insist that restraint should apply to those at the top, not just to those in the lower and middle income brackets.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The provisions of Standing Order 43 require that for the presentation of such a motion for debate the unanimous consent of the House is required. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Who said no to that?

MANPOWER

MEASURES TO PROVIDE ALTERNATIVE EMPLOYMENT IN VIEW OF CLOSURE OF LABRADOR LINERBOARD MILL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I, too, wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity which I am sure will be given consideration. The continuing and rapid deterioration of the economic structure of the Port au Port and Bay St. George area in western Newfoundland, as a result of the impending closure of Labrador Linerboard Mill which will affect some 2,100 jobs directly or indirectly, demands more than the passive action presently being directed toward that part of Canada. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald):

That this government orders that an immediate review of decentralization policy affecting the province of Newfoundland be carried out to consider the western sector of that province in order to provide alternative employment, a sensible direction of policy which is justifiably in line with government objectives, and existing infrastructure.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such motion can only be presented for debate in the House with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA SUMMER GAMES

SUPPORT FOR HOLDING OF GAMES AT ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the new addition to the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) family, and I refer to the Newfoundland dog, Rideau '77, presented to him and his family today by the Summer Games Committee,—I promise no barking or yapping at the government today, because of the occasion—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: —I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall):

That this House supports the holding of the Canada Summer Games in St. John's, Newfoundland, during August, 1977, congratulates the committee on the preparations made for the holding of the games and urges all members of parliament to attend the games in St. John's, during August, when Newfoundland hospitality will assure them a visit not to be forgotten.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have no hesitation in recognizing the importance of the motion, its desirability and its cordial terms, but have some doubts about its urgency and pressing necessity.

SPORTS

CONGRATULATIONS TO LES CANADIENS HOCKEY TEAM ON WINNING STANLEY CUP

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering that on Saturday May 14 the Canadiens won a brilliant victory and once again carried off the Stanley Cup, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That congratulations be sent to the directors, coach and players for their success and for the fine way in which they contribute to the international prestige of Canada in the world of hockey where their fame is proverbial.

Mr. Speaker: Order. For exactly the same reasons stated about the previous motion, I naturally refuse to put the question to the House under Standing Order 43.

INCREASE IN LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT IN ATLANTIC AREA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Prime Minister relates to the original commitment made by this government, and repeated on occasion, with respect to the importance of eliminating regional disparities across Canada. In view of the fact that since 1970, the year after the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was created, the differential in the unemployment level between the Atlantic area and the rest of Canada has risen from 8.7 per cent to something like 55 per cent last year, in the province of Quebec 37 per cent fewer jobs have been created during that same period as compared with the rest of the country, can the Prime Minister say how seriously the government views this alarming growth in disparities between the five eastern provinces and the rest of the country, and, particularly, what steps are being taken to establish priorities which will substantially turn that direction around, so that these disparities may be substantially eliminated and not increased, as they have been during the past half dozen years?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government of course views this situation with considerable concern, because many hundreds of millions of dollars have been put into the Maritimes and the eastern parts of the country in order to correct some of the traditional, structural imbalances in this country. I remind the hon. member that in the budget, as recently as one month ago, we took specific fiscal steps in order to add to our effort to correct this imbalance.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Neither the Minister of Finance nor the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion have been able to indicate even one specific job created as a result of that specific fiscal measure. I point out that the recent Ontario budget indicated a net balance of trade deficit with the Atlantic provinces of some $1.5 billion, this indicating a loss of some 60,846 jobs from the Atlantic region. Can the Prime Minister indicate whether these figures have been studied by himself or any of his ministers? What steps are being taken generally to co-ordinate overall government policy with respect to regional disparity, or has it been just a one-shot affair under one department which is now fading into oblivion?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I feel I can presume to say these figures must already have been drawn to the attention of the ministers. Lest they have not been, I will ensure that they are.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as in the Speech from the Throne last fall, which I am sure the Prime Minister will recall, there was no specific reference to the need for reform of the Regional Development Incentives Act, a program which has been part and parcel of the government since 1970 and which has now been reduced in terms of budgetary funds and restricted because of its rigid structures, so much so that it has been renegotiated with three separate provinces in terms of separate development agreements, can the Prime Minister indicate if he has instructed either the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion or any other minister to develop permanent job creation programs so that the economy in these five eastern provinces can begin to function as they should?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is assuming that such steps have not already been taken. I am sure the hon. member is aware of the very, very considerable funds which have been spent in those provinces and which indeed have created jobs. The reality is that they have not created jobs at the rate we would like and we will find every other way we can to increase this rate.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REASON FOR DELAY IN NEGOTIATING AGREEMENTS WITH THE PROVINCES

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Since Quebec and British Columbia complain about the length of time his department is taking before concluding regional economic development agreements related to particular projects in the two provinces, can the minister explain the reasons for this delay and the nature of problems delaying the signature of such agreements?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to go into the details of small difficulties that can arise during our negotiations, because that would take too much of our time, but I can say to the hon. member that at last two agreements have been signed recently with the British Columbia government. Another one will probably be signed and announced in the very near future, and I hope that discussions going on on two other very important matters for the British Columbia economic development will be concluded within the next few weeks and that we will be able to announce the signature of another agreement in this field.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL PROCEED WITH QUEBEC PROJECTS AGREED TO BEFORE NOVEMBER 15

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in view of the reservations and objections the legislative programs of the independentist government of Quebec have given rise to throughout the country, can the minister tell the House whether all the projects his department was engaged in prior to November 15 last in Quebec are being pursued according to the original time table and whether their respective budgets are being spent without restrictions?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House and the hon. member that the programs we had undertaken with the provincial government prior to last November's election are being implemented as planned, except for very few minor details which have nothing to do with the change of government. Minor adjustments, we always run into in developing and implementing those agreements with the various provincial governments. In short, no major changes or problems have developed in the application of the current programs with the province of Quebec.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, if I understood the minister correctly, he indicated to the House that some agreements involve problems. Can the minister be specific about those?

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, no: I did not say there were problems. In every agreement, a provision allows for adjustments in the sense that for instance, the two governments agree to do certain things under a secondary agreement and it is understood that in the course of its implementation, at the request of the provincial government, we will accept minor changes. There have been a few of those but only of minor importance which are not even worthy of mention. In short, I can say that no serious problem has come up.

[English]

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the President of the Privy Council. I notice he has just stepped out of the chamber, temporarily I hope. Possibly I might have permission to postpone my question.

INQUIRY WHETHER TERMICA SILICE LIMITÉE WILL OBTAIN GRANT—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

As House leader of the Social Credit Party and considering the present political and economic context in the province of Quebec—I hope the minister will understand the importance of my question—and considering also that Termica Silice Limitée whose head office is located in Noranda, in the riding of Témiscamingue, made an application for a subvention to allow it to exploit a natural resource of the area, while creating a certain number of jobs, can the minister tell the House whether this company will get a favourable answer within a few days so it can go ahead with its project?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the hon. member for Bellechasse, whom I congratulate for the new responsibility his group gave him, that indeed I have had the application for about three weeks now and that a few days ago I met two promoters involved in this project with whom I discussed it at length. I agreed that a representative of my department could meet them any time to get more information on the extent and the implications of their project. I hope we will soon know what we can do. The House and the hon. member will realize that the promoters sent us this application only three weeks ago.

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER WILL TREAT QUEBEC REQUESTS THE SAME AS THOSE OF OTHER PROVINCES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary question.

Can the minister tell the House whether, notwithstanding what the head of the Quebec government has said about him during the weekend, he is willing to consider the requests from Quebec on the same level as those from other provinces and to treat them accordingly?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, yes. Notwithstanding the statements made by the premier of Quebec about me last week, I must say this will not in any way change my attitude toward the province of Quebec and its citizens and that I am still willing to negotiate agreements with the Quebec government, of course within my responsibilities. I hope we can sign those agreements very soon, after our respective officials have presented and analyzed to my satisfaction the contents of those agreements. Because there is more to it than signing agreements and investing money in them: we must also make sure that what we will be doing under those agreements does meet the objectives at least we at DREE are pursuing.

POSSIBILITY OF DISCUSSIONS CONCERNING AGREEMENTS WITH QUEBEC

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

You will doubtless understand that I am somewhat worried by the remarks I heard this afternoon on the radio, as I was proceeding from Montmagny to Ottawa. A reporter was claiming that Quebec is no longer willing to negotiate agreements with the central government unless these agreements respect the sovereignty of the government of the province of Quebec, failing which there would be no agreement signed at all. Could the minister advise the House whether any similar statement was made in his presence during recent discussions with officials or political representatives of the Quebec government? If so is he in a position to inform the House of any such statements or conversations?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to hear of these remarks by a reporter, because the Quebec government and I never had to deal with or discuss the question of the province's jurisdiction or priorities in the sense indicated here. What we are proposing now fully respects Quebec's jurisdiction and priorities, for we are not trying in any way to stop the Quebec government from doing whatever it means to do. As a matter of fact, we are trying to accelerate the realization of projects in a number of Quebec areas about which we are especially concerned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF CARIBBEAN DELEGATION TO COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Speaker: Before recognizing the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, may I just borrow half a minute to say that, during this past weekend we conducted, I think successfully, the Canadian regional meetings of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association and extended an invitation to representatives of the Caribbean region to join us. Our meetings were graced with a rather strong delegation from the Caribbean region. I think there was a very fruitful exchange between the two regions. We were also fortunate to have during the meetings the Secretary General of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, who is with us in the gallery today along with our Caribbean friends, Sir Robin Vanderfelt. May I ask Sir Robin and all our Caribbean visitors to rise for a moment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENERGY

NORTHERN PIPELINE—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF PROPOSAL TO DEBATE ISSUE PRIOR TO CONSTRUCTION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Privy Council arising out of his statement in the House last Friday to the effect that there should be a triple veto on the construction of a northern pipeline, first by the National Energy Board, then by the government and finally by parliament. However, later in his speech the minister spoke of providing an opportunity to hear the views of parliament before any decision is taken. In order to prevent any misunderstanding, I should like to ask the minister whether he would clarify the situation and tell the House whether or not we are correct in assuming that the government is making a twofold commitment, first that when all reports have been made available there will be a debate in parliament to ascertain the views of the House, and secondly, that when the government has reached a decision with respect to a pipeline, parliament will have an opportunity to approve or reject the decision before any permit for the construction of a pipeline has been granted?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, that certainly is a succinct summary of my statement. I might add some qualifications to the interpretation. With respect to the triple veto, I said that a pipeline could not be built unless it had been recommended by the National Energy Board, by the government and then by parliament. I had not taken into account the contingency where no decision would be taken and no pipeline would be built. That is the only qualification I would make.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the National Energy Board report is expected some time in July and the right hon. Prime Minister has promised President Carter a decision by September 1, does this mean that, if parliament is recessed at the time, it will be called back into session in order to discuss the National Energy Board report and also to express its views with respect to the government's final decision whether or not a pipeline should be built?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, quite apart from the hon. member's reference to President Carter and the Prime Minister, I have stated that the intention of putting a motion on the order paper with respect to pipelines was to provide the House with an opportunity to express its views from time to time before final decisions were taken. That is still my view and my commitment. I realize the practical difficulty that I may have in carrying forward that commitment, but in this case I am encouraged that my commitment can be fulfilled because of the tardiness and slow passage of legislation in this House and that probably we will be here all of July.

● (1430)

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, irrespective of whether the present legislative program keeps the House in session until August, surely the minister's commitment that parliament will have the final veto power on any decision to build a pipeline requires the additional commitment that if parliament is not sitting at that time—in the month of August and prior to September 1—that parliament will be called into session in order to express its views on the decision which the government has made. Can we have that commitment, otherwise the minister talking about triple veto power is absolutely meaningless?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I agree. On the triple veto scenario I posed, what the hon. member says is perfectly right. A decision taken by the National Energy Board and by the government has to be approved or rejected by parliament. It would be inconceivable that such a project can be undertaken without the specific approval of parliament. That is a view I repeat today.

I am not as certain how I relate the passage of legislation to the ongoing events that may take place in the summer—the keeping of the House and the recalling of the House. That was something that was very much in my mind and which had to be considered when I made my statement last Friday. I do not know the practical answer, but the principle still stands.

DATE OF SIGNING AGREEMENTS WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and it is related to the very serious unemployment situation which has doubled the national average both in northeastern and northwestern British Columbia. Having regard to the fact the agreement between the province and his department was signed and has never been implemented, and also having regard to the announcement the minister just made that two subagreements have been signed, both of them merely to study an already intolerable situation, is the minister in a position today to give us a more precise date as to the signing of agreements which would address themselves to the serious situation in which several of the industries find themselves? Can he tell us whether the umbrella agreement which was signed in 1974 is so out of date now that it does not really respect the priorities of the provincial officials?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, no, certainly not. The agreement we signed with the province is not out of date because the basic potential of the province lies in the development of its resources. In those two recent subagreements we signed, there might not be a complete answer to some of the questions asked by the hon. gentleman. When one looks at what we have tried to achieve, one will see that it was to find the best solution for creating new jobs in those parts of the province of British Columbia.

The $10 million being invested under the last agreement, although it is not a huge amount of money, is certainly going to go to the real potential of one resource of this province. One of the subagreements which we have under intensive negotiation right now is addressing itself to industrial development and as such will have a broad effect. We will try, with the province, to arrive at some kind of a strategy to promote the industrial development in some parts of the province, at least.

POSSIBILITY OF THREE FURTHER AGREEMENTS WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is not only supplementary to my previous question but supplementary to questions I have asked the minister and his predecessor since 1974. Would the minister confirm the fact that there are three agreements ready to be signed in British Columbia which would reflect the priorities of the British Columbia government and which would have been worked out with the encouragement of the federal department? Can he tell us what is holding up the signing of these agreements which would address themselves not only to the coal situation, which is now receiving another study, but also that of the wood converting industries and other industries in the area? I think he would agree there should be some dialogue with the senior minister in front of him so that we can finally get an answer to take home.

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. gentleman will be in support of the agreement we are in the process of developing and will be in support of the two agreements we have already signed because they are likely to affect his regions. What we are discussing with the government of British Columbia is in line with the priorities set by that province. I am satisfied with what we will be trying to do together, and that is to support the best proposal we can obtain.

MEASURES TO PROVIDE ALTERNATIVE EMPLOYMENT FOR THOSE AFFECTED BY CLOSURE OF LABRADOR LINERBOARD MILL

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the same minister, taking into account another intolerable situation which exists in the province of Newfoundland. I wonder if the minister is now prepared to make a statement on what progress he is making with regard to the impending closure of the linerboard mill which will affect up to 2,100 jobs. Is he now prepared to show some flexibility in the directions of the DREE policy in order to be able to combat this disastrous situation which occurred?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, in the case of the Labrador Linerboard mill, unfortunately I do not see how we can give enough flexibility to any of DREE's policies to match the need and challenge of that particular case. Unfortunately, this is a case where, no matter what DREE tries to do, we will not be able to achieve taking over this particular firm which the province took over a few years ago but has not been able to find a way to get it on its feet because of marketing difficulties and the kind of products this factory was putting out. We will probably have to find some other product or some other company which might be interested in buying out this facility, bringing in new machinery to turn out a new product. That is obviously going to take a long time. It will require a complete change in approach. I hope we will be able to approach the province and succeed in rectifying the problem. At this point there is no good news that I can report.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer the minister gave me and in view of the fact there is no easy solution, I wonder if the minister would be prepared to decentralize segments of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion now existing in Newfoundland to show a physical presence in order to enable him to look at new initiatives, to rehabilitate present industry still existing and also to create new industry in line with the infrastructure which exists in that part of the province?

Mr. Lessard: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have had under consideration for some time a possible decentralization of our offices in Newfoundland and some other parts of the country. I will probably be making a decision very soon to extend some of our services by having offices opened in other parts of the province of Newfoundland.

EFFECT OF CUTBACK IN AIR CANADA SERVICE ON DEVELOPMENT OF ATLANTIC AREA

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Since the minister admitted recently he was not sure of the implications that Air Canada's cutbacks in service might have on the potential development of Atlantic Canada, will the minister explain this lack of knowledge in view of the commitment made by the government, at the urging of our party, that regional economic development would be made possible by transportation as a tool for this purpose? At the same time, could he assure us the commitment made by his predecessors is still in effect?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, reduction of service by Air Canada will not greatly affect the economy of that province, although it will affect it to some degree. What we need to help the industry out there is much better ground communication facilities and not better airline facilities. I suppose a better railway system, a better road system and a better tariff system will help those manufacturers move their goods to the centre of Canada. That will be much more appropriate than a few airline tickets.

• (1440)

REASON FOR FAILURE TO DEVELOP HYDROELECTRIC SITES IN ATLANTIC AREA

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's answer, but on this business of coordination with other departments, something on which his predecessors were quite strong, why in the energy field is there no real emphasis within the departments as far as general development agreements are concerned in such essential cornerstone projects as energy to create long-term assets so that we could alleviate the job problems and get assets which would be of some value in the future? I ask this keeping in mind that there are two potential hydroelectric sites in Newfoundland, 20 in Labrador, 5 on the Saint John River in New Brunswick, 5 in eastern Quebec as well as the Fundy tidal project, none of which are being developed, which, it seems to me, would be appropriate in the circumstances.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, that matter of hydroelectric resources development in Newfoundland and that part of Labrador has been considered extensively by the Newfoundland government of course but also by our department and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in Ottawa, and we have agreed on a certain strategy. We have recognized the potential, as well as some of the difficulties inherent in the development of that potential. Again very recently two of my colleagues and some ministers of the provincial government of Newfoundland have had discussions about that and we have considered what could be done in the short, medium and long term to develop those energy resources in Newfoundland to serve the province's interests but also to incorporate them in a network to serve the Maritimes.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

REASON FOR REDUCTION IN BUDGET PROVIDED UNDER ACT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the same minister. Will the minister explain why, in a period of record unemployment, his department has cut back on its spending under the Regional Development Incentives Act, the one program which is directly aimed at permanent job creation? The DREE budget, as I understand, is up 11 per cent, but the RDIA budget is down 10 per cent.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question really ought to be put to the minister when his estimates are before the standing committee.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

POSSIBILITY OF PLACE GUY FAVREAU BEING USED TO HOUSE ELDERLY PEOPLE

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Supply and Services.

Considering the high percentage of unemployed in the construction industry in Montreal, that is 40 per cent, and since this high rate of unemployment could be considerably reduced if there were more housing starts in that region, and following the statements of the minister during the weekend to the effect that the use of Place Guy Favreau could be altered, could the minister tell the House whether the government intends to undertake the construction of Place Guy Favreau taking into account that with the co-operation with the provincial government the building could become a residence for senior citizens?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the comments of many citizens, several commentators of the mass media and some members of this House as well as the last suggestion of the hon. member show that questions are raised about the future use and design of Place Guy Favreau. The Minister of Public Works who is ultimately responsible for that building will certainly take into consideration the various representations made to him.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

REASON FOR DELAYING DECENTRALIZATION OF DEPARTMENTS UNTIL QUEBEC LANGUAGE BILL PASSED

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but because of his absence and because of the involvement of the Prime Minister in this matter, I will put my question to the Prime Minister. I welcome him back to the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Muir: Regarding decentralization of government services, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce indicated in his answer to me on April 26 that because of the introduction of the language bill, Bill 1, in the Quebec legislature, it appears that government action and future announcements in this regard pertaining to other parts of Canada will have to be held up. In his press conference on April 28 the Prime Minister said that, and I quote, "The minister is now waiting to see how the Act is going to come out before making any announcement on decentralization into Quebec."

Would the right hon. gentleman explain why, in so many words, the premier of Quebec indirectly by his actions is going to decide if decentralization is to go to other parts of Canada, particularly Cape Breton Island, and why does the government not proceed with its plans for decentralization to other parts of Canada and deal with Quebec when the minister sees, to use his own words, "what is going to happen on that score," namely, Bill 1?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure when the hon. member hears the eventual announcement by the minister, he will understand that decentralization is not only a very complicated package but an intricate one as well, and it means affecting various departments of government. They are all interlinked. Any decision which would move people in one direction in one province is not irrelevant to other moves, and we want to have a total picture of the possibilities before making that statement. That seems to be a very sensible way of proceeding.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the explanation of the right hon. gentleman as far as it goes, but in view of the fact that the right hon. gentleman also said, and I quote, "There would have been hundreds and thousands of jobs moving around the country and in Quebec in particular" why should Rene Levesque be making the decision as to whether the unemployed on Cape Breton Island may be given an opportunity for jobs? Why does the government not go ahead, in view of what has been said, with what can be done in other parts of Canada?

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, if I may add—

An hon. Member: What do you know, Charlie McCarthy.

Mr. Poulin: —to the previous answer, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said in the House last Friday that he had been in touch with Premier Alex Campbell of the province of Prince Edward Island on Friday last. Mr. Campbell assured him that when public servants were moved from this community to Prince Edward Island, there would indeed be Francophone education available for their children. He went on to say that he wished Premier Levesque of the province of Quebec would provide at least equal service for Anglophones moved into his province.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: What's that got to do with the question?

Mr. Muir: You've got the wrong island.

Oral Questions

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

EXCESSIVE SALARY INCREASE GRANTED PRESIDENT OF KAISER RESOURCES LIMITED—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance may I direct a question to the Prime Minister? In view of the disclosures in a Canadian Press report today to the effect that the head of Kaiser Resources Limited received a pay increase last year of over $60,000 and that the heads of other companies such as Massey-Ferguson, Bell Canada, Northern Telecom, Candel Oil, Canadian Homestead Oil, Imperial Oil and others received pay increases last year ranging from $10,000 to $22,000 a year, will the government take serious steps to see that the policy of restraint applies to those at the top the same as it does wage earners and others in the middle and lower income brackets?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I read the Canadian Press report and brought it to the attention of the Anti-Inflation Board. The board informed me that some of the guidelines and exceptions as stated in the article are wrong and that the policies are not as stated, but the board was asked to look into the matters referred to in the article, and it has agreed to do so.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that some weeks ago I asked a question about one of these companies, Bell Canada, and was assured that there would be a reply, will the parliamentary secretary make sure that there will be a reply in the House with respect to all of these companies?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the parliamentary secretary give that assurance?

Mr. Speaker: I presumed that that was a representation to the hon. parliamentary secretary which ought to be noted.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

EXPIRATION OF ACT IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO REPLACEMENT

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. The Regional Development Incentives Act expired in 1975 in both British Columbia and Alberta. The food processing nutritive agreement has emerged in Alberta as a substitute for the RDIA, but as yet nothing has been negotiated in B.C. for a replacement. What initiative has the minister taken to arrive at an agreement with British Columbia for replacing the Regional Development Incentives Act?

[Mr. Muir.]

• (1450)

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, there is no negotiation to replace the Regional Development Incentives Act because this act remains in effect and it does not now apply to the province of British Columbia because there is no area designated as such under the act in this province. What we have in the province of Alberta to replace the act is an auxiliary agreement under the general development agreement which enables both governments to share costs. We are negotiating cost-sharing agreements with the government of British Columbia as a contribution to the infrastructure which is necessary for the establishment of new businesses in some areas of British Columbia. I am also considering the possibility of extending the scope of RDIA to businesses in other areas in Canada which are not covered by the act at the present time. This decision is not yet definite. We shall report to the House when we make a decision on this one way or another.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

SUGGESTION AGREEMENT WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA BE SIMILAR TO AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In connection with the negotiations with British Columbia in regard to regional and economic expansion to which the minister referred and because of the difficulties as a result of no precise section of the province being designated and therefore programs such as the one we have been discussing failing to have any effect in British Columbia, what response would the minister have to the suggestion that the agreement with British Columbia coincide or be related rather closely to the agreement with Quebec, to the effect that a large part of or almost the entire province would be designated, giving the province greater flexibility in selecting areas where regional development and economic expansion grants would be available in the province?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, during these negotiations, we said we were interested in designating some areas of this province for the implementation of our industrial assistance legislation. Without being opposed to it, the government of British Columbia would rather have us use another method, but doing this does not necessarily mean that we—for it would be our decision—would not extend the implementation of this legislation to other regions of British Columbia. However, there again I would rather wait until we have completed the current negotiations and come to an agreement before taking any other step. Should the pending agreement meet most of the goals both governments have in view, maybe no further action will be necessary. If not, we will have to look further into this matter.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROPOSED MINIMUM SENTENCE FOR CAR THEFT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that we have just finished an omnibus bill covering five phases of the Criminal Code, in light of the fact that car theft is on the increase and because of the large increase set out by Statistics Canada and the Attorneys General of the various provinces, car insurance is very expensive, would the minister now consider setting a minimum sentence under the Criminal Code of one or two years for car theft? At the present time many courts are suspending sentence or treating this offence very lightly.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly take the hon. member's representations into account. I would advise him that to my knowledge I have not received any representation from the provincial Attorneys General with regard either to their amending the substance or the penalties associated with car theft. I will be meeting with them in June and will raise the subject with them. In connection with the hon. member's representation, I would point out to him that in a speech in the House about a year ago the hon. member took me to some considerable task for suggesting a minimum mandatory sentence be used as a remedy in the law as seldom as possible.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Justice would refer to Hansard he would see that I asked for a minimum sentence in the last omnibus bill. For the crime of cattle rustling there is a sentence of five or seven years but a suspended sentence for automobile theft. Surely, the Minister of Justice in his own right would consider the facts coming from Statistics Canada. I would suggest to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Mr. Speaker, that he ask automobile manufacturers to change car window locks from the ordinary type that can be opened with a coat hanger to the tumble lock used by more sophisticated manufacturers.

MANPOWER

USE OF INFORMATION SUPPLIED TO OFFICES—POSSIBLE BREACH OF CONFIDENTIALITY

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I am concerned about access to information filed with his department, particularly that affecting applicants for landed immigrant status, jobs and unemployment insurance. Does the department intend to require employers to notify Canada Manpower every time they hire someone in order that the government can use this computerized information to get the unemployment insurance cheaters, as stated, as well as illegal immigrants?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker. I have the same interest as the hon. member in protecting the confidentiality of our customers. By the same token, any representations we had in briefs from the CMA and the CLC were to the effect that something should be done in this particular area and the new hiring procedures to help in situations where, for example, there are honest over-payments which later have to be collected. There are a series of other administrative things that I think could be better taken care of if we could get this program into effect. We hope to meet in the future with representatives of the CMA and the CLC to get their further views on this and probably implement something along this line in a pilot project just to see how it works.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. So there will be no mistake about the minister's attitude I would refer him to the weekend press and I am sure his departmental officials have briefed him in that regard. Does the minister deny the Canadian Press story carried in the weekend papers alleging that departmental officials acknowledged that information on manpower, unemployment insurance and immigration applicants could be used by other federal departments, including the RCMP or even outsiders such as collection agencies? I hope the minister will stand up and state that that is not the policy of his department.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I would commend to the hon. member a very careful reading of section 114 of the Act which I think goes a long way to protect the individual. We would be looking to ways and manners in which that could even be enhanced.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, it is all right for the minister to refer me to a section of the Act but I wonder if he would give the House the assurance that the confidentiality of information given to his department by those who are seeking landed immigrant status or who are looking for jobs or are involved with unemployment insurance will be respected and the information will not be given to the RCMP or, in particular, to outside agents? I do not want to hear anything about any specifics in an Act. We would have to read that. I want information from the minister right now. Can he give us that assurance?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I would again commend to the hon. member the fact that this information has not been made available to outside agencies, the RCMP or others. That has been the policy and it will continue to be the policy.

Mr. Alexander: That is all I want.

Oral Questions

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST THAT ADMIRAL BOYLE APPEAR BEFORE COMMITTEE

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): In the absence of the chairman of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence perhaps the vice-chairman of that committee, the hon. member for Algoma could reply. As Admiral Boyle will probably not be serving for much longer I wonder if the vice-chairman would invite him to appear as a witness at the committee meeting scheduled to be held tomorrow evening. The committee would no doubt benefit from hearing the opinions of the commander of Maritime Command on the ship replacement program, and other matters?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. While in order initially, this question also became a representation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

USE COMMON FUND TO FINANCE COMMODITIES

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It has been reported that the Prime Ministers' meeting in London agreed to create a common fund to finance commodities. Could the Prime Minister tell the House if this fund would be used only for Third World countries or is it to be used for the purchase of reserve stocks of grain such as is proposed by the United States and Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the discussion was in the context of the north-south dialogue of the CIEC conference which will be meeting at the end of this month under the co-chairmanship of the President of the Privy Council. Therefore, both discussions turned on the fund which could be of assistance to Third World countries, particularly the less developed countries, those most in need. It is at this stage only a commitment in principle. My colleague, the President of the Privy Council, will be able to give the final answer to the hon. member's question when he returns from Paris.

ASSURANCE BY FRANCE OF NON-INTERVENTION IN INTERNAL AFFAIRS OF CANADA

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister. In view of the assurances that the President of France is reported to have given to the Prime Minister in regard to non-interference in the internal affairs of Canada, can the Prime Minister tell the House if this assurance of non-intervention will likely hold even if other political parties or forces come to power in that country in the forthcoming elections?

● (1500)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question is hypothetical, but is also incorrect in its assumption. I think the hon. member has been misinformed. The President of France did not give me any such assurances. The government of France has, through ministers visiting in Canada and indeed through statements made as recently as two or three weeks ago in Paris through the mouth of its own foreign minister, given the assurance to which the hon. member refers. So, in that sense, I want to correct the question a little bit. Its intent is to speculate on what would happen if the government of France should change. Of course, I cannot reflect on that; I have no idea, and if I had, I would not want to speculate on it in public any more than I would want the President of France to speculate on the probability that the Tories will remain in opposition for many years to come.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, or question of privilege, relating to my exchange with the Minister of National Defence as reported at page 5601 of Hansard concerning the resignation or retirement of Admiral Boyle. I have checked Hansard and transcripts of various reports since last Friday and can arrive at no conclusion other than that the Minister of National Defence misled the House in his replies to my questions last Friday. I understand that points of this nature must be raised at the first possible opportunity, and this is my first opportunity. Unfortunately, the minister is absent from the House, and will be for several days.

My point in rising at this time is simply to serve the necessary notice that I intend to raise this matter as a question of privilege the next time the minister and I are both in the House.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Since the parliamentary secretary in his reply apparently did not know the difference between Prince Edward Island and Cape Breton Island, although many people throughout the world know where Cape Breton Island is—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Muir: —I shall pursue the question of decentralization further on the "late show".

Mr. Poulin: Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member that I know the difference between Cape Breton Island and Prince Edward Island. Mr. Speaker, my mother was from Cape Breton, and I think she would like to encourage the hon. member to represent it more adequately.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

MULTICULTURALISM

CELEBRATION OF ONE-HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF ARRIVAL OF FIRST JAPANESE IMMIGRANT TO CANADA

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, beginning this week, Canadians of Japanese descent across Canada will be celebrating the one-hundredth anniversary of the arrival of the first Japanese immigrant to this country. The efforts of the Japanese Canadian community in contributing to the development of Canadian society, despite their experiences during World War II, are to be commended. They are truly a strength, both in the public and private sectors of our society, and Canada is a much richer society because they, despite their unfortunate experiences, have chosen to continue their contributions to Canada.

In recognition of the very special role played by this ethnocultural group in Canada's history and the significant contribution made by its members to Canadian multicultural society, I request all my colleagues to join with me in offering our warmest congratulations and best wishes to members of the Japanese Canadian community for a successful centennial year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party, may I also extend to Japanese Canadians all across Canada our warmest congratulations on the one-hundredth anniversary of the arrival in Canada of the first Japanese immigrant. The progressiveness of the Japanese community in Canada and their most important contributions in the fields of commerce, industry, agriculture and the professions are well known. Theirs is a most enviable record, a record of which they can justly be proud. As well, their contribution of Japanese culture to our Canadian multicultural society has enriched, and will continue to enrich, our society immensely.

They have been a source of enrichment in our attempt to reach our ultimate goal, a distinct Canadian culture formed not only by input from our two founding races, the English and French, but input, also, from our native people and from the more than 70 ethnic groups in Canada whose combined numbers now make up one-third of our population. If we all work together in honesty and sincerity, we shall reach that goal and fulfil our aspirations more quickly. To that time we all look forward with much hope and anticipation.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party I am happy to join in the words of congratulation being expressed today to the Canadians in our midst who are of Japanese origin. It is a significant occasion, the one-hundredth anniversary of the arrival in Canada of the first Japanese immigrant, and it is good that we should pause to think of the contribution this group has made to Canadian life at all levels.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) and I were just saying to each other that the two of us were in this House in the early 1940s when this country did things to Canadians of Japanese origin of which we should still be ashamed. I am glad to note that some reconciliation has taken place and that some correction of the situation of the past is being attempted by the recognition we are now giving to that community. I am happy, on behalf of my party, to join in the words of congratulation which have been expressed today by the minister and by the hon. member who preceded me.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 1,877, 2,209, 2,222 and 2,341.

[Text]

OCEAN DUMPING ACT

Question No. 1,877—Mr. Brisco:

1. (a) How many employees were hired to manage the Ocean Dumping Act (b) how many are on the payroll to date (c) where are they located?

2. (a) How many employees are classified as Inspectors (b) where are they located (c) what is the number of ships inspected (i) per week (ii) per month in major Canadian seaports?

3. (a) How many charges have been laid under the Ocean Dumping Act in each port in Canada (b) for what reason were the charges laid (c) what was the general nature of the complaints?

4. (a) What was the total additional cost to the Department for salaries (b) what is the salary breakdown?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): 1. (a) Since the Ocean Dumping Act and its regulations went into effect on December 13, 1975, two people have been hired and 19 have been diverted from other programs to manage the Act; (b) 21; (c) Ottawa/Hull 3.3; Maritimes 7.2; Pacific 7; Quebec 1; Northwest 2.5.

2. (a) 174 employees of DFE, in addition to their regular functions, have been designated as inspectors under the Ocean Dumping Control Act. (b) British Columbia 99; Yukon 4; Prince Edward Island 1; Labrador 1; Newfoundland 21; Nova Scotia 13; New Brunswick 3; Northwest Territories 11; Manitoba 2; Quebec 19. (c) (i) approximately seven per week. (ii) approximately 30 per month.

3. (a) None. (b) Not applicable. (c) Not applicable.

4. (a) $8,000 (two employees hired within the last four months). (b) $22,500 and $10,800 annual salaries.

COMMUNICATIONS SYSTEMS TO MEET NEEDS OF DECENTRALIZATION OF DEPARTMENTS

Question No. 2,209—Mr. Herbert:

1. Has it been necessary to develop faster and more effecient systems of communications to meet the needs of the decentralization of departments across the country and, if so (a) what are such systems (b) what has been the cost for the current fiscal year?

2. What is the cost included by all departments in the 1977-78 Estimates and what is the etimated total additional cost arising from the needs of decentralization?

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned: 1. Because many improvements have been made to the government's intercity telecommunications network in recent years to accommodate increased telecommunications traffic, including the extension of direct dialing services, improved transmission facilities and new teletype and data services, no special communication systems have been required to meet the decentralization needs of departments.

2. No specific costs are identified in the 1977-78 Estimates since decentralization needs are provided by the existing intercity telecommunications system.

NATIONAL HISTORIC SITE—BRIDGE/CHIMNEY ISLAND

Question No. 2,222—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development receive a written request dated November 17, 1975 from the hon. member for Leeds on behalf of a constituent, Mr. G. W. Mallory, Mallorytown, Ontario, owner of Bridge/Chimney Island?

2. (a) Has Bridge/Chimney Island been declared a national historic site with the cairn and plaque to be erected nearby on the mainland (b) did Mr. Mallory request that some indication be made on the plaque that it was "private property" and, if so, did the Minister agree to forward such a request to the Historic Sites and Monuments Board?

3. Did the Minister advise the hon. member for Leeds, in a letter dated March 22, 1977, that the Historic Sites and Monuments Board had refused to indicate on the plaque the Bridge/Chimney Island is "private property" and, if so (a) will such decision be reviewed in order that the general public will not be encouraged to trespass on the private property unknowingly and to prevent great inconvenience to the owner?

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Yes.

2. (a) Yes. (b) No. However, the hon. member for Leeds so stated in his letter of November 17, 1975. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development advised the hon. member that the request would be brought to the attention of the historian preparing the text.

3. No. The Minister advised Mr. Cossitt that the board had not made any reference in the text to the fact that Bridge/Chimney Island is privately owned. (a) No. However, the Minister in his letter of October 25, 1976 to Mr. Cossitt suggested that if Mr. Mallory has not already done so, he should post no trespassing signs on the Island to deter unwanted visitors.

TREASURY BOARD PUBLICATION "FEDERAL SPENDING PLANS"

Question No. 2,341—Mr. Friesen:

1. What was the cost of production of Treasury Board publication Federal Spending Plans: 1977-78, Special Edition, Volume I, No. 1?

2. How many were produced and to whom were copies distributed?

3. Is there a mailing list for this edition or future editions and, if so, how many persons or groups are on the list and what are their names?

4. What was the cost of postage for the distribution of the publication?

5. (a) How many such publications does the government plan to produce in the future (b) what is the proposed time frame (monthly, annually, etc.)?

6. (a) What percentage of the material used in this edition was previously used in other government publications, releases or documents (b) how much is original material?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): 1. $22,569.61.

2. 300,000. Distribution is continuing in response to requests. Initial distribution included all members of Parliament and the general public through the regional offices of the Departments of Manpower and Immigration, National Health and Welfare, Canada Post Office (Grades 1 to 7), and the Public Service Commission. Individuals receive the publication when they enquire about the spending estimates. Teachers of high school students can also obtain the publication in classroom sets upon request.

3. No.

4. $4,610.01, as of May 4, 1977.

5. (a) and (b): One per year at the time the Main Estimates are tabled.

6. (a) Photographs supplied by other departments may have been used previously. Minister's statement and opposition reaction were in Hansard. Two charts were from Federal Expenditure Plan: How Your Tax Dollar is Spent. Press comments were taken from various papers. (b) Most of the text is original material based on the Main Estimates and related news releases.

REGIONAL OFFICES MAINTAINED BY DEPARTMENT OF SOLICITOR GENERAL

Question No. 612—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

1. (a) How many regional offices are maintained by the Department of the Solicitor General (b) where is each located (c) for what area is each responsible?

2. On what date was each established and with how many personnel?

3. What is the present personnel strength of each office?

4. In addition to regional offices, are district or other sub-offices maintained and, if so (a) in what locations (b) how many?

5. Are the duties performed by those manning the regional and/or district offices line functions, in the chain of command from Ottawa to the operator in the field, or do they have other functions to perform and, if so, what are such functions?

Return tabled.

DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE—PROGRAMMES WHICH PROVIDE GRANTS TO CITIZENS

Question No. 1,395—Mr. Symes:

1. What are the names of all the programmes under the Department of the Secretary of State which provide grants to citizens?

2. For the years 1975-76, how many applications were (a) received (b) approved for grants under the Human Rights and Group Understand Programme?

3. For the same years, by constituency, what is a list of the applications (a) received (b) approved and the name of the applicant, in each case?

4. For the same years, what was the (a) total amount (b) total amount by constituency of the approved applications under the Programme?

5. For the same years, by constituency, which applications were (a) referred for approval to (b) rejected by the local Member of Parliament?

Return tabled.

FISHERIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND CRIMINAL CODE IN CONSEQUENCE THEREOF

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment) moved that Bill C-38, to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

[English]

He said: Mr. Speaker, as we start discussion on amendments to the Fisheries Act, Bill C-38, it is necessary to remember that the Fisheries Act is already powerful in the principles it sets forth. It protects the fish and man's use of fish. It states that no one may harm the waters of fish. This principle makes it our main legal arm in controlling water pollution within Canada. It also has great importance in controlling ocean pollution in ways I shall discuss. Although the principles of the existing act are good, it lacks the flexibility and the force to apply these principles fully. Social growth and change bring forth new threats, dangers hardly dreamed of by the drafters of the original act in 1868. They lived in days when the Atlantic salmon crowded the banks of eastern rivers. Since then, this famous fish has provided one of the best, or worst, examples of what a species can suffer from society.

In those major rivers of New Brunswick that still harbour Atlantic salmon, the fish that reach the spawning grounds yearly now number only in the low thousands. To reach the spawning grounds they must pass poachers who have used everything from pitchforks to dynamite. These vandals have assaulted my fisheries officers, have fired shots at them and have threatened to burn down their homes. When we catch a person poaching, the law does not provide sufficient punishment to deter him and others like him. What fines we can levy often amount to a minor tax; their criminal gains are far higher.

There were also other causes for the widespread loss of the great Atlantic salmon fishery, mainly growth—urban and industrial growth—with accompanying pollution, loss of fish habitants and other damage that the Fisheries Act and its application failed to prevent. The same effects of industrial growth phenomenon threaten other species in Canada, not the cute-looking seal, a thriving and increasing species in its deep waters, but homelier and truly endangered species in our rivers, such as the shortnose sturgeon which attracts no glamorous defenders.

A Fisheries Act strong enough for its purpose of protecting fish and man's use of fish has obvious side benefits. Although Canada has the longest coastline, and probably the most fresh water of any country, size has no necessary relation to health. Our water resists pollution no more than the water in Minimata. If our laws can protect the water, if we give the fish a place to live, we can have a better place for man to live. People should be able to see clean water, swim in it, maybe catch a fish. The changes we are suggesting will increase the government's power to protect the fish and their waters.

These changes reflect a stronger public attitude that anyone whose actions affect these resources must take full responsibility. In particular, those who wilfully despoil should face strong penalties. Perhaps the most vicious offenders are the poachers who make a career of robbing honest fishermen. The poacher is the opposite of Robin Hood: he robs what belongs to everybody, a common property resource, to enrich himself, and sometimes he does so on a grand scale. He threatens the very existence of Atlantic salmon in some rivers, and unless something is done his activities could well threaten parts of the Atlantic lobster fishery. He takes lobsters that, if left alone, would eventually give legitimate lobster fishermen three million more a year.

On the west coast, the loss of potential earnings from the British Columbia salmon fishery through poaching is estimated at $3.5 million annually. One illegal set by a purse seine in British Columbia could bring in $20,000. The fine might be $200. We have many cases where the magistrate's failure to understand the significance of an offence meant that the poacher, even when convicted, made a net profit. I suggest that what is a dangerous game for the fish should become more dangerous for the poacher. The testimony of my officials of legitimate fishermen who suffer from poachers and of the dollar losses I have noted, show that our system has been inadequate. We need more deterrence. Beside raising fines of $5,000 maximum we should increase the threat of forfeiture.

At present, the Minister of Fisheries can take away the licence of a commercial fisherman upon conviction for illegal fishing. The minister lacks other powers of forfeiture. The courts may apply forfeiture against anyone, licensed or unlicensed. They can take away the offender's catch, boat, gear, or vehicle used in illegal fishing. Many of the courts, however, have a history of failing to do so, even in cases involving serious infractions of the law. I am asking that, in future, convictions by a court should carry with it the possibility that the Minister of Fisheries himself may order forfeiture of anything from a salmon poacher's net to a foreign factory trawler. I think the testimony of my officials in committee hearings will convince hon. members of the need for this strong deterrent.

In addition, I ask that fisheries officers, who must frequently deal with armed and violent poachers, receive the additional powers of peace officers.

● (1520)

Our suggested amendments provide also for a ticketing system, like that for traffic offences. At present, even minor infractions of the Fisheries Act make necessary a magistrate's hearing, and these take an unwarranted amount of time from the courts, the fisheries officers, and the offenders themselves.

But, Mr. Speaker, as the case of Atlantic salmon shows so well, the regulation of fishing itself is only part of what we need. Protecting fish means protecting their habitats. Protecting the aquatic habitat involves controlling the use of wetlands. The banks of streams, the foreshores of estuaries, provide nutrients to the larger eco-system of lakes and oceans in amounts far out of proportion to their size. The chain of life extending to the whole open ocean depends on bogs, marshes, mudflats, and other "useless-looking" places that ruin your shoes. Biologists have likened these areas to the cornfields and wheatfields of the ocean. These rich shore areas support salmon, lobster, herring and other local populations; their influence extends for hundreds of miles, even to the most rocky shorelines. They are the irreplaceable nurseries of fisheries well-being.

Today, if someone with a bulldozer starts plowing up the foreshore, the law gives us no direct recourse. An afternoon's bulldozing can destroy the work of centuries. Salmon are considered the crown jewels of British Columbia. Yet on the world's most important salmon river, the Fraser, development has already destroyed 70 per cent of the estuary for supporting the foundation of fish life. Public opinion and the government in B.C. strongly support our salmon enhancement project, which can double the numbers of salmon and restore them to their historic abundance. Volunteers are already at work clearing streams and restoring habitats. But we would be wise to provide a law that can prevent unchecked developments on the shore from undermining their efforts.

The suggested changes to the act would broaden the definition of fish, and thereby extend protection to eggs, spawn, and the juvenile stages. The changes would make it clear that aquatic habitat includes everything necessary to the life of the fish, and we would provide severe penalties for destroying this habitat: up to $5,000 on summary conviction, and up to two years imprisonment on indictment. The main effect of the changes would be this: for landfill, dredging, excavation, or other such projects in these sensitive areas, we would be able to examine the plans first, and to require modification or, if necessary, prohibition. Instead of accusing someone, after the fact, of destroying fish habitats, we would be part of the planning to save them.

There is ample precedent for such legislation. The Navigable Waters Protection Act controls construction projects and land use that would interfere with navigation. Under provisions of the existing Fisheries Act, we work with logging operators to plan their activities so as to protect the fish. We can bring about similar working arrangements with land developers. It is vital that the suggested amendments to the law should give us the power to do so.

Habitat protection will always remain a difficult battle because it runs against the energies of good people following their natural bent: developers, loggers, land reclaimers, and so on. The work of constant monitoring and restraint where necessary is hard, but the alternative prospect of forever losing stocks or species of fish is not acceptable.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I speak a lot about habitat protection because it must be recalled that the welfare of fish population is closely linked to what is taking place on shore. As regards water, its importance is obvious. Unfortunately, after years of efforts to make people aware of water pollution, despite clean up campaigns by the federal and provincial government, our waters remain very polluted and this arises partly from weaknesses in our legislation.

The amendments we are proposing will provide us with two means to fight pollution. The first is based on a very simple principle—he who causes harm must correct it. The effect of the changes we are proposing as regards deposits of deleterious substances would be as follows: First of all, anybody responsible for depositing materials that are detrimental to fish, such as hydrocarbons, chemicals or any other deleterious substances, must report it as prescribed in regulations made pursuant to the legislation.

Second, the offenders, those responsible for the deposits, who own the deposited products or who were carrying them must, and I quote:

counteract, mitigate or remedy any adverse effects.

In other words, they must try to correct the harm they have done, that is to clean up waters by removing deposited substances.

The inspectors designated by the department will have more powers in terms of directing the cleaning work. Finally, offenders will be liable to higher fines, which might be as high as $100,000 in some cases. There will also be a change of attitude to deal with those who are likely to deposit such substances. Things are much easier whenever preventive rather than remedial action can be taken in this regard.

This statement on prevention from source of deposit leads to an area in which our legislation is obviously very complex. Depositing sources are numerous in rivers and coastal waters, but there is only one in high seas: ships.

So the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act concerning the prevention of pollution are very important. They are aimed at preventing the pollution of all elements of the environment by one polluter—ships. On the other hand, those provisions of the Fisheries Act are aimed at preventing the pollution of one element of the environment—fish—by all polluting agents.

As far as ocean dumping is concerned, the Canada Shipping Act is complemented by the Fisheries Act and the Ocean Dumping Control Act. The latter has to do with the dumping of garbage into the sea from an international point of view.

Departmental officials are working in close cooperation with officials of the Department of Transport to prevent high sea pollution hazards. For example, our two departments set up a system of public hearings on the potential hazards that could stem from the proposed oil tanker routes and the oil tanker terminal at Kitimat, British Columbia.

[English]

When we think of offshore pollution, we think of the Torrey Canyon, the Argo Merchant, the Arrow, all the spectacular tanker disasters. And we do well to be wary about ship-caused pollution. One spill can destroy a long coast in a matter of hours. In guarding the health of the ocean, however, we should remember that more than 80 per cent of the pollution in the ocean—oil, chemicals, garbage, all the rest—gets there directly from the land, via rivers, seaports and the air. And most of this land-based pollution comes less from spills than from built-in sources: municipalities, factories, pulp mills and the like, that pour effluent into our waters day in and day out. Our second set of amendments to the pollution control provisions of the Fisheries Act takes aim at these built-in and most dangerous sources of pollution.

In the application of the pollution provisions of the Fisheries Act to industry, we try to work co-operatively with provincial governments. Over many months leading up to the final preparation of this legislation, my officials consulted with their provincial counterparts. Many of the proposals in this bill are a result of those consultations, and I might say that in some cases provincial input helped us to improve this legislation. To the best of our knowledge, all provincial fisheries ministers are supportive. Several provincial ministers of environment or resources have written to me outlining some concerns over the impact of certain environmental aspects of the legislation, asking that there be some discussion of this at the meeting of the Canadian council of resource and environment ministers to be held in Saskatoon on June 1 and 2.

I am completely agreeable to that suggestion and have so informed the concerned ministers. I am anxious, however, that this important legislation receive reasonable and prompt consideration here in the House so it can be studied in more detail and any possible problems cleared up at committee stage. I see no problem in ensuring that provincial concerns can be fully met and considered in time for the committee's consideration of this bill, if the House so agrees to passage.

All components of the environment interact with each other, and therefore it is essential that all government agencies, federal, provincial and municipal, work together to get the job done. This sort of teamwork is particularly important in dealing with the vast quantities of sewage often containing industrial waste waters discharged daily by cities and towns into our lakes, rivers and oceans. Although the focus of this government's activities in municipal effluent in the past has been through the provision of CMHC loans and grants to speed the construction of municipal sewerage projects, we may have to be more relentless than we have been in ensuring that fish are protected from these dangers.

Our suggested amendments for prevention of industrial pollution mainly concern older industrial plants. In 1970, parliament changed the Fisheries Act to enable us to prevent pollution at new plants, those to be built, altered or expanded, but we left the government's authority over the other existing plants pretty much as it had been, even though these older plants were the major source of industrial pollution. The Fisheries Act already included the general statements prohibiting the deposit of deleterious substances. We thought that this, plus the specific changes I have mentioned, would give enough authority to clean up our rivers and lakes.

Although we have made headway in the clean-up, it has been less successful than we had hoped. Our care for fish and the environment is still not good enough. Part of the reason is the unwieldly nature of the Fisheries Act as it applies to existing plants, the prime source of noxious waste. The power we have now to regulate pollution from existing plants is of an all or nothing nature. We can prohibit the deposit of deleterious substances above specified quantities from any source.

That means that we could ask a court to order a plant that pollutes to close down.

The threat of closure, however, works both ways: A company can say, "Look, pollution control equipment is expensive: We can't afford to clean this place up completely. If you keep pestering us, we'll close down the mill and the closure could destroy this community". In that way, a company owner may refuse almost entirely to co-operate. Or, at the other end of the spectrum, officials may have talked to a plant owner about cleaning up his operation and he is proceeding with reasonable speed. We believe in his good faith. A citizen's group, however, is taking, or can take, him to court under the general provision prohibiting the deposit of deleterious substances, and could bring about the immediate shutdown of a big employer who is doing his best to clean up his operation.

Most cases, obviously, fall between such extremes. Nevertheless, the unwieldy nature of the act at present has handicapped our anti-pollution work. We are unable to make the regulations fit the circumstances as they should. The act contains no specific authority to make regulations for specific types of existing plants on an industry by industry basis. The environmental protection agency of the United States, on the other hand, has such authority. We need it, too: it is a practical way to solve pollution problems.

The amendments we ask would give us more flexibility in our approach to polluters. We need authority to demand specific improvements in specific situations, for individual industries and individual plants. We need authority to let a plant owner keep depositing pollutants in regulated amounts provided he is working toward a cleaner operation. We need bigger fines, up to $100,000 for wilful polluters who refuse to co-operate with clean-up regulations. The new powers, if this House approves them, will let us push the plants along at a reasonable and realistic rate in the clean-up of their operations without driving them out of business.

Many of these industrial plants discharging noxious wastes are old. Companies built them when we thought nature could dispose of whatever we threw at it. Now we know better. What we put into the water can change it. We can destroy the natural environment. Our dependence on nature has become a dependence on our governance of nature.

As in most issues, the course of reason is the middle way. We find extremists on both sides of these issues. We also find moderates; and the moderates usually represent what turns out to be the common interest and, more frequently, common sense. Some extremists would close down any industry which emits an effluent regardless of the environmental needs, regardless of what pollution control technology may have done to reduce the threat. They turn a blind eye to economic or social consequences. Fortunately, most environmentalists are not unreasonable. They want, quite simply, a cleaner and healthier environment. They do not want our life support systems sacrificed for temporary industrial gain.

There are extremists on the industrial side, too—people who refuse to accept the environmental realities, people who see every move to forestall degradation as a pretext by government to control them out of existence. But here, too, we are talking about a minority. The majority of industry's representatives that I have met see the need for changes; they recognize that new problems call for new solutions, that what the public asks of them is not only reasonable and necessary but is economically and technologically possible. To sum it up, the reasonable approach is one that recognizes that the quality of the human environment has economic and ecological elements. The answer lies in balance.

I want to go on record now as saying that I will continue to listen to the voices of reason, but that I have little time for extremists from either side. I will strive, through these amendments, to see the provisions of the Fisheries Act consistently applied, and I am confident that these very necessary amendments will be applied in the spirit of reasonableness which has characterized Canadian environmental progress over the past decade or so. Growth must respect the environment. In the past, where society has grown, fish have tended to die. If we can save them a place to live, the changes are better for us. We have made of progress a god. But mercury was named for the messenger of the gods, and mercury has warned us clearly that the gods of progress have a darker side.

I am sure all hon. members here believe in some growth and change, but we all draw the line about someone changing, without our consent, the water or other elements that support the life of the fish or of ourselves. The fish and their waters are a public resource. With the changes to the Fisheries Act that I am asking for, my department will be better able to carry out the public responsibility of guarding them. I commend, Mr. Speaker, these amendments to the House. I hope hon. members will support them, and, where committee discussions so warrant, that together we can improve even more Bill C-38.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this measure. This bill deals with pollution, power problems, penalties, poachers, police officers, protection, politics and prohibition.

I want to thank the minister for his statement. I listened to him with interest. I want to welcome him back to the House from his visit to Cuba, even though he was there such a brief period that he does not come back to us with a typical Cuban suntan or even his pockets bulging with cigars. Hopefully, at an early date the minister will find time either to give the House or the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry an outline of what he discussed in Cuba or an outline of what the Cuban government plan to do in its fishing operations off the Atlantic coast of Canada.

Bill C-38 is indicative of the Liberal government's fishery policy—laced with good intentions but brought in too late. Is it any wonder that back home fishermen look at me with a twinkle in their eyes and call the minister the Rip Van Winkle of the fishing industry?

There is absolutely no excuse for this bill, which was introduced on February 21, 1977, to have been delayed until now for second reading. The fishermen, the Progressive Conservative party, and even the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc), have been pleading for stronger enforcement measures in fisheries for the past several years. Bill C-38 provides for those measures. They are measures which should have been brought forward much earlier.

We on this side of the House in the official opposition support Bill C-38 in principle because the present Fisheries Act needs immediate revision. The bill provides a number of improvements such as the establishment of more realistic penalties for those contravening the act, the production of a ticketing system for minor infractions so that fishery officers will no longer be tied up for ages in court proceedings, and the extension of anti-pollution controls to existing industries.

However, we are concerned with several aspects of this bill: the extensive search and seizure powers of fisheries officers; the extensive search powers of the federal pollution inspectors; the possible federal-provincial constitutional clash over anti-pollution jurisdiction; the small number of fisheries officers and inspectors with which the department expects to do the job; and the content of the regulations which the governor in council may prescribe in the future.

Under section 35 of the Fisheries Act, any fisheries officer can break open and search any house, vessel or place where he has reason to believe that fish taken in violation of the act are concealed. No search warrant is needed, although a departmental directive was issued which prohibited entry into a personal dwelling unless "hot pursuit" was involved. I wonder what they mean by "hot pursuit". In the television serial "M.A.S.H." we learned the reason for calling one of the actresses "Hot Lips Houlihan". I wonder what the minister means by "hot pursuit". Perhaps someone on his side will explain.

We question whether a departmental directive is sufficient or appropriate to prevent the abuse of such extensive powers. Clause 9 of the bill grants federal pollution inspectors the right to enter any place, except a private dwelling, where he presumably believes the act is being contravened. Why should these inspectors and fisheries officers be granted powers greater than those of peace officers, especially since fisheries officers have been designated as peace officers? Once again, the government seems to be encroaching unduly upon the privacy and upon the rights of an individual.

We must ask ourselves, what is a peace officer? The Criminal Code states that a peace officer includes a mayor, warden, reeve, sheriff, deputy sheriff, sheriff's officers and justices of the peace. The term also covers wardens, deputy wardens, instructors, keepers, jailers, guards and any other officers or permanent employees of a prison. It includes police officers, police constables, bailiffs, constables or other persons employed for the preservation and maintenance of public peace or for the service or execution of civil process.

It includes customs or excise officers, pilots in command of aircraft, and officers and men of the Canadian forces who are appointed for special duties under the National Defence Act. Now fisheries officers are to be added to this list. I fear we are getting somewhat close to a police state. I believe our fishermen should be listened to when they say, without tongue in cheek, that we have a little too much control. As I said a moment ago, in the course of carrying out his duties, a fisheries officer may conduct a search without the authority of a warrant. The only limitation on his power is the necessity for him to have reason to believe there has been contravention of the act.

Let us for a moment contrast this power with the position of a peace officer within the provisions of the Criminal Code. In such a situation, a police officer must present information to a justice of the peace, showing reasonable grounds for believing that in a specified location there is something which has relevance to the commission of an offence against the provisions of the Criminal Code. The justice of the peace, in his discretion, if he feels requirements have been met, may issue a search warrant authorizing the police officer to carry out a search.

The important point I wish to make, and one I want the House to note, is that the peace officer's honest belief as to the particulars detailed is insufficient. It must be the justice of the peace, and not the peace officer, who is to be satisfied that there are reasonable grounds for believing the matters to be established before the issuance of a warrant. Moreover, it was held that search warrants cannot be used to carry out general searches. There is need for describing in detail the items to be searched for and seized. In other words, the issuance of a search warrant is not a mere administrative act, but a judicial act of the justice of the peace. Under the Customs Act, for example, a customs officer may, upon reasonable grounds of suspicion and without authority of warrant, search any package or board or enter any vehicle or vessel. However, if he wishes to search any building or place, he must obtain such authority from a justice of the peace.

Why is there not a similar provision required of fisheries officers classed as peace officers? An exception to the rule is that any such act may be carried out by a customs officer without a warrant when there is no justice of the peace within five miles. That is a restriction which, I submit, should be the last one written into this bill. I hope the minister gives consideration to this point.

Unfortunately, this bill does nothing for some of the major problems facing our fishing industry. It does nothing to alleviate the fear among our fishermen as generated by the present management policies established by Ottawa bureaucrats, that we will have to wait at least five years before getting any real benefits from the 200-mile limit. This situation is due to Ottawa's generosity when negotiating bilateral agreements with foreign nations fishing within our economic zone. We have, in effect, given away the keys to our banks in order to obtain tacit agreements. As a result of these bilateral agreements, our resources continue to be raped, pillaged and plundered, while our own fish catches decline and the size of fish caught by our people becomes smaller and smaller.

If anyone doubts that statement, all he needs do is to read the government's own reports as put forth by the Canadian Salt Fish Corporation. The fish caught in 1976 were so small that the corporation's markets were affected—and the report for 1977 will be even worse. This indicates that overfishing is still going on, depleting our resources below the sustainable yield level and depleting them, as well, below the age level when they spawn and reproduce the species.

This government's whole management approach has been based on guesstimates not supported by adequate research data. The blame for the decline in our inshore and offshore catches must be laid squarely on the shoulders of the Liberal government and its "wait and see" fisheries policies during the past ten years. I realize the present minister did not hold that position during the past ten years, but he and his predecessors must share some of the blame for the problems our fishermen now face. Right at this moment this government is making crucial decisions on quotas for Canadian inshore and offshore fishing. These are quotas for 1978 and are quotas for our own people which will be established on what I submit is outdated information.

For example, at the Fisheries Council of Canada meetings which I attended last Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday—May 9, 10 and 11—among other things I learned that quotas for Canadian inshore and offshore fleets and the foreign fleets operating within our 200-mile economic zone for 1978 will be set around the middle of June. This information was reinforced by officials appearing on Thursday, May 12, before the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

However, I submit that by following this course we will have no way of knowing the total possible catch of the large inshore fleet, for example, which operates off the northeast coast of Newfoundland and which concludes its major fishing effort in early September. In fact, we will not even have the opportunity to gauge the catching capabilities of the Canadian offshore fleet. The danger inherent in this type of management program is that officials in Ottawa will be setting total allowable catches—or TAC's, as they are called—for 1978 without really knowing the catching capability of the Canadian fleet. We will be declaring stocks of fish as surplus to our needs and making them available to foreign fleets without basic, practical or scientific data on which to base our figures.

This problem was covered by some of the resolutions put forward by members of the industry in attendance at the Fisheries Council convention, and in order to help the government—which obviously has not given fisheries research the priority it requires—the industry has suggested that it would be practical for the government to have much of its stock assessment and research done from Canadian commercial fishing vessels. This is a viewpoint I have put forward in previous debates on this matter, and in view of the obvious need for greater research before an adequate fisheries management plan is established, I hope the government gives this proposal favourable consideration in the immediate future.

The Fisheries Council made this recommendation. It is in resolution No. 5 in its list of resolutions. It is a sound recommendation, and I commend it to the minister's attention. I believe that we, as Canadians, must follow this course, because in my opinion it is simply not enough just to know the standing stocks. We have to know what kinds of changes in abundance and distribution to expect as a result of natural environmental factors. I ask the minister, for example, how many fish and fishing stocks were destroyed as a result of recent oil spills? The minister himself mentioned his concern about the Torrey Canyon and the Arrow. These spills may have taken place in parts of the globe which are far removed from Atlantic Canada, but our shores off the coast of Atlantic Canada are swept by the Gulfstream, albeit far out to sea. Closer into shore we have the Labrador current coming down past Newfoundland and the coast of Nova Scotia, and wherever these spills occur it is quite possible for the oil to be carried, either on the surface or in the deeps, over great distances and to have a great effect on our fisheries stocks.

We have to know what kinds of changes to expect as a result of these environmental factors. We have to know the interdependence between stocks. We have to know the distribution of stocks at any given time, both horizontally and vertically. We have to know where the various species spawn, and when. Using the ships of the industry, I submit, will go a long way toward providing this data which is fundamental to establishing a sound fisheries management program. I submit that if this course is followed, it is just possible—I do not say it would happen, but I submit it is possible—that we will learn what is happening to Atlantic Canada's salmon industry.

In his remarks the minister stated that at one time in his native province of New Brunswick the salmon crowded the banks of the rivers. I can well remember when salmon fishing in my native province of Nova Scotia and, in fact, in my own county of Lunenburg, was a very good industry. We caught many salmon in the La Have River, for example, and in the Medway, whereas today it is almost cause for announcing a national holiday if salmon is caught in any of these rivers. The stocks have become badly depleted. It is just possible that if an adequate research program were established by the minister, we could find out what is happening to our salmon industry. This is one species which seems to have been totally neglected in recent years, and in my opinion there is an immediate need to establish adequate protection for salmon originating in Atlantic Canada's coastal waters. In fact, I submit that we need a salmon enhancement program in Atlantic Canada immediately, a program which would, hopefully, restore depleted stocks and would bring improved earnings to inshore fishermen in our coastal areas. This is something we tend to ignore from time to time when discussing over-all fishing problems, but I would like to emphasize the problem this afternoon.

I hope the minister will recognize that this problem should be of immediate concern and that action should be taken. After all, if we started today on a program to re-establish Atlantic salmon, the minister and I are well aware that the effects of that program would not be felt for at least seven or eight years. So it is necessary to get moving as soon as possible.

There are a host of other questions and problems facing the industry. I am not going to deal with them in detail. One problem is higher oil prices. Those prices will increase the cost per pound of fish landings, making Hamilton Bank fishing very expensive. The minister suggests that this is one area which is still open to Atlantic fishermen and that there are still surplus stocks to be caught. But I wonder how the fishing industry in total will offset this increased cost.

Why was the quota on squid and capelin—the food fish for cod fish—increased this year, when under the management program every effort should be made to rebuild ground fish stocks? After all, capelin and squid are the food fish for codfish and other ground fish species, the stocks of which we are trying to rebuild. To give away to foreign countries capelin and squid in vast quantities, the food fish for other fish, seems to me to be a regressive step which should not be continued in 1978.

Under their 200-mile limit, the Americans are catching more fish. Therefore, they will be supplying their own market which is, in effect, our market. I wonder what steps the minister is considering to assist in long-term marketing. I realize this is not an immediate problem because the catch of fish is down at the moment and the industry itself is not having any difficulty marketing its catch, but I submit we should not wait until a crisis arises before we take steps to meet it. It would be a good idea to do some forward-planning, and I wonder if the minister will give us an indication of what his forward plans are in this area. I would like to know if it is possible to establish a herring industry in Atlantic Canada. There is an industry on the west coast which has become very profitable, and we certainly welcome the news when any segment of the industry is doing well, but I wonder whether the minister is taking any steps to investigate the possibilities in Atlantic Canada.

I wonder if it is possible to establish a porbeagle shark fishery in Atlantic Canada, rather than leaving this industry entirely to the Faroe Islanders. It was interesting to talk to the representative who came from the Faroe Islands to the Fisheries Council of Canada meeting. He informed me that the large porbeagle shark is caught there, and many of these fish are caught off our coast, as the minister is well aware. These fish are marketed in Europe, even though they contain 7 per cent of mercury and more. Apparently in some Scandinavian countries there is no concern whatever about the possible danger to the health of humans as a result of the mercury content in these large fish. I submit that this is an area in which the minister and his officials have been somewhat negligent. They have neglected somewhat those who would like to pursue this type of deep sea fishery. It is not unrelated to the swordfish industry which has been inoperative since 1970, at least in Atlantic Canada, even though it has been re-established in the United States.

● (1600)

These are points that I hope the minister will examine. They deal with just a few of the problems. If I used all the notes I have before me this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, there would be no time for other speakers. I hope the points I have raised will be examined very carefully by the minister and that some action will be taken on them to benefit our fishermen.

On this side of the House we are also concerned about the possibility of a federal-provincial confrontation over pollution. At the present time the federal government has control over any pollution which affects fish in their aquatic habitat, while provincial governments have control over any pollution which affects their waters in general. In my view, the federal and provincial governments should come to a firmer understanding and commitment on what each controls, and the powers that each can exercise. Otherwise, there is a tendency to confrontation, which I submit can only place further burdens on our presently strained national unity and on our already overstrained Canadian confederation.

It seems to me, when I look at some of these proposals, almost as though they are part of a deliberate plan to break up Canada, a deliberate plan to confront the provinces with policies and powers that should be vested in the provinces. I submit that federal-provincial co-operation is essential, because a province can delay the implementation of any federal anti-pollution regulation. In the case of controversial pollution issues, the provinces could claim that the federal government has responsibility, whereas the federal government could claim the opposite. Without a previous understanding, nothing would be done except pass the buck. Furthermore, what might happen is that an industry located in an economically depressed region of Canada—heaven knows, the minister is well aware of some of these regions—might refuse to comply with the federal anti-pollution standards. If the province came to the defence of the industry, would the Supreme Court uphold as constitutional the federal government's claim over water pollution?

Although these are hypothetical examples, they are real possibilities if federal-provincial jurisdiction over pollution is not clearly delineated. It is because of factors such as I have outlined that the government not only faces unrest in one province—namely, Quebec—but similar unrest in Atlantic Canada, central Canada, Ontario and the western provinces. I raise this not to be critical but in the hope that the minister and his colleagues will carefully examine these matters when drawing up bills.

Clause 11 of the bill authorizes the government to establish licence fees for the harvesting of marine plants. Do we really need more fees in the fishery, Mr. Speaker? I do not think so, especially since the government in this case should be encouraging aquaculture, not discouraging it will licences and fees.

I note that Clause 4 of the bill requires that fish guards, or screens, must be placed on any water intake, ditch, channel or canal in Canada where the minister deems it necessary in the public interest. The present Fisheries Act only extends this provision to the western provinces, but now the owner of the water intake, ditch, channel or canal is to be responsible for the upkeep and repair of fish guards. I should like the minister to tell us how he will determine where fish guards should be placed, and if there will be a regular inspection of them by the department. If there is to be no regular inspection, I submit that this clause is meaningless.

Clause 5 of the bill states that no person shall destroy fish by any means other than fishing. It also defines "aquatic habitat" and states that no one can disrupt or destroy it without the minister's consent. This raises the question of the man who wants to carry out dredging operations. Will he need the minister's consent before starting work? If fish are destroyed through dredging, is the dredge operator liable, since he destroyed fish by means other than fishing? Does the department intend to apply clause 5 to every body of water in Canada, or are there only certain bodies of water which the department does not want disrupted? If the latter assumption is true, is the minister going to table a list of those bodies of water to which he gives priority?

Finally, Mr. Speaker, several clauses in the bill allow the government to prescribe various regulations in the future. The Progressive Conservative party has constantly argued that the Canadian people, through parliament, should know what the regulations are under any bill before granting blanket approval to them. A government can bypass parliament very easily in making future changes to an act if it has already been granted the power to establish regulations, because regulations do not need parliamentary approval. More consultation, for example, was recommended by the Fisheries Council of Canada in their resolution No. 8. It is interesting that they should bring forward this matter. Following four "whereas's", resolution No. 8 states:

> Therefore be it resolved
> that Canada, in consultation with all segments of the industry, formulate its long-range fisheries goals for all marine stocks off its coasts and adopt well-defined principles upon which management plans and regulations can be based.

All through these resolutions you can detect a fear that changes are being made by bureaucrats, that bills are being formulated, that acts are being implemented without adequate consultation with the industry. They are literally begging for the right to be consulted by the minister and his officials before acts are implemented which may be harmful, over-all, to the fishing industry.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, we in this party endorse the principle of Bill C-38, although we have reservations about certain aspects of it. We wonder why the bill could not have been brought forward earlier. However, when we look at this government's track record in fisheries policies, its delays in declaring a 200-mile limit, its delays in completing second reading of Bill C-7, the only other fisheries bill on the order paper, which has been there since December 10, 1976—the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) says we are obstructing parliament by not allowing bills to go through, but that one has been on the order paper since December 10, 1976—and see this lack of interest in our fisheries problems, it is indicative of the low priority the government has given the fishing industry, and its problems, for a long time.

[Mr. Crouse.]

We look at all these things, and the government's delay in reaching agreement with the United States over Georges Bank, for example, and the delay in reaching agreement with France over fishing boundaries, and we realize that the United States, after 16 years of not recognizing Cuba, was able to reach agreement with them on the 200-mile limit in a matter of three weeks. Cuba is only about 90 miles away from the United States, and when it declared a 200-mile limit and the United States declared a 200-mile limit, there was, naturally, an overlapping of boundaries which had to be settled. This was achieved within two or three weeks, although the United States had not recognized Cuba for some 16 years.

We in Canada are friendly with the United States—certainly we in the Progressive Conservative party are, and we hope the government has a friendly attitude toward our great neighbour to the south—but no agreement has been reached on what could be the most valuable fishing bank off the coast of Atlantic Canada, namely, Georges Bank. It is a prolific bank, yielding many millions of dollars worth of scallop landings in my constituency, Lunenburg, Shelburne and Liverpool, and in Yarmouth, in the constituency of the hon. member for South Western Nova (Miss Campbell).

● (1610)

Mr. Speaker, this matter is important to us. I wish, to high heaven, it was equally important to the government. There is nothing I would welcome more than an announcement by the minister, that agreement had been reached on the ownership of Georges Bank, or on how the resources of that bank are to be shared. If it is not possible for the Canadian and United States governments to come to an agreement, perhaps the minister should consider asking a third party to negotiate on his behalf. In any event, I submit that two friendly nations, Canada and the United States, can surely resolve this matter to the benefit of both. But these difficulties remain unresolved.

In conclusion, one can only say that if there is not an adequate solution it would appear that the Liberal government wants to maintain its almost perfect record of national procrastination.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take much of the time of the House, since this bill can be discussed more thoroughly in the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry. Let me say that I support the minister wholeheartedly in his desire to deal not only with the pollution of our inland waters but with the pollution of our coastal waters.

Pollution damages our fishing industry, on which many of our people depend for food, and from which thousands of Canadian citizens earn their livelihood. As the minister said, a good deal of thought and drama surrounds the problem of an oil spill at sea, and rightly so. Certainly, the NDP is concerned about the possibility of an oil pipeline being built from Kitimat to Edmonton. We are concerned because there is a dangerous, 60-mile channel leading to Kitimat which, according to my information, has not been surveyed for over 30 years. Originally it was charted for vessels drawing up to 35 feet; but that channel may have to accommodate oil tankers drawing over 80 feet. Therefore, we are concerned about oil spills, about ships being wrecked close to the coast, ruining our fishing areas and polluting our shores. I submit there is cause for real concern in this regard.

The minister said that although we are concerned about oil spills on the high seas and in our inland waters, we must realize that a major part of our pollution occurs on the landward side, from industry. For instance, on the west coast of British Columbia mining industries are dumping their highly toxic tailings into coastal waters. All kinds of materials from various plants and mills are being dumped into our waters. They are noxious to fish life. Also, some fairly large communities are still dumping raw sewage into our coastal waters.

It is interesting to note that many of those who are most forthright in criticizing industries which dump their tailings into the sea are also the same people who complain to high heaven when one suggests that municipalities should spend money on sewage treatment plants. The fact is that both kinds of pollution are equally destructive of our waters. I used the example of the Pacific coast, but I know that the same conditions apply on the Atlantic coast. In my part of the country some communities are still dumping raw sewage into our waters. I suggest we must deal with that kind of complacency. This legislation attempts to correct the general lack of concern of many municipalities, a lack of concern shown by the dangerous industrial trend in pollution which is killing off our fisheries.

Man is the most destructive creature ever to have ruled the earth. Other species kill for food, but man often kills for the sheer love of killing. He is thoughtless and careless about the effects of his industrial development, what it is doing to his own environment, and the possibilities of survival of future generations. We shall support wholeheartedly and enthusiastically the minister's attempts to correct the situation. But the government has been lax in coming to grips with the problem.

Three or four years ago the minister's predecessor, the Hon. Jack Davis, brought in, with much fanfare, legislation labelled as the clean air and pure water bill. It was hailed by the press and the electronics media, and fine speeches were made in this House. I agreed with almost every word the then minister said. Noble sentiments were expressed. Yet in my party we felt that it was more an exercise in public relations than in effective legislation. We said we supported the purposes and thrust of the bill, but were not convinced it had sufficient teeth to guarantee the people of Canada the kind of clean air or pure water the bill promised.

There was talk of the government's setting up pollution control districts. The idea was good. It would bring together federal, provincial and municipal governments which, with representatives of industry, would seek out the root causes of pollution and deal with them. So far as I know, not one pollution control district has been set up. Some may have been set up of which knowledge escapes me. However, as I say, I do not know of one such district which has been set up in the area I represent. I doubt if any districts have been set up anywhere across Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the public gets awfully fed up with pious platitudes and statements of noble sentiment, after which nothing is done. The Chinese have a saying: There is a lot of noise on the stairs, but no one enters the room. I say, the time has come to do something. When the Hon. Jack Davis introduced similar legislation several years ago we said: Instead of trying to deal with pollution by setting up pollution control districts which may not be effective, why cannot the government amend the Criminal Code. This the minister is now proposing to do, for which I commend him. I say to him that amendments to the Criminal Code will depend, for their effectiveness, on the activities and aggressiveness of fisheries officers. It will depend on those who search for and find the sources of pollution and a department which is sufficiently concerned to lay the several charges provided for in this bill. I will give the minister an example. In my constituency, many of the ships which come into the ports clean out their bilge tanks in the ports. The whole port is covered with scum. Everybody complains about it, but usually by the time the authorities are notified, the ship has already left.

In one case which was particularly offensive, charges were laid. The owners of the ship and the captain were hauled into court and fined, if I remember correctly, $5,000. As a matter of fact, $5,000 would not have begun to clean up the mess in the Chemainus harbour which was caused by the oil being dumped out of the ship's tanks. It would not have covered cleaning up the oil on all the small craft moored there which had to be hauled ashore and scrubbed and cleaned, to say nothing of the mess on the shore generally.

Therefore, unless the proposals which the minister is now making are going to be backed up by an adequate number of fisheries officers, the legislation will mean very little. I say this for the benefit of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) who should see that the department gets sufficient money in its budget to hire adequate staff to monitor the situation. This must then be backed up by the minister and an aggressive department to deal with the culprits. If culprits are dealt with decisively and seriously, it will be surprising how quickly the example of what has happened to those who are careless about polluting our waters will be transmitted to others who in the past have been equally careless.

I commend the minister for tackling this problem. It has been a long time waiting for some effective remedial action. I am glad the minister has brought this bill before the House. I think the comments which our party will want to make with respect to it can best be made before the standing committee. In the meantime, when this legislation passes with whatever amendment the House may choose to make, I trust the minister will provide the action to carry out the very excellent sentiments which he expressed in the House today.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to tell the minister that I am pleased about the general contents of Bill C-38. It is somewhat rare to have unanimity in the House about a bill. I therefore hope that the information given to the public by the press will be objective, and that the Canadian people will understand the importance of the subject covered by the bill and, in general, cooperate so that this legislation may be applied with good results.

The bill aims at protecting our fisheries, at protecting the fish resources against poachers, especially professional poachers. There are some in all areas of the country. There are also a few small-time poachers, but they do not cause as much damage as those covered by this bill. There are also the polluters, those who use all sorts of chemicals in their industries and who do not care about the effects of the products used during manufacture. In my opinion, this legislation will invite them to be more cautious in the use of chemicals and more concerned about the damage that this waste material can cause.

There are also the destructors of the environment. They are not mentioned in the bill, but I think that the minister could examine this question. I refer to the polluters who damaged the environment by an inconsiderate destruction of our forests along our rivers or around our lakes. I have often witnessed destruction caused by the development of our forest resources, and even though this development provides employment for workers, it has disastrous consequences for the local environment: the fish disappear.

These are all matters that we should consider seriously. I remember, Mr. Speaker, when spring came when I was a child, we could witness nature's awakening and it was marvelous. On my parents' farm, there was a beautiful river which flowed into Lac-à-la-Truite. There were a great many lakes in my area and I used to accompany my parents, my older brothers and my friends on fishing expeditions: never would we come back with an empty bag; in fact, we always came back with large quantities of fish, while abiding by the laws, and it was interesting. Mr. Speaker, I remember that when, as a boy, I would go and get the cows, I always brought my fishing rod and tried my luck along the riverbank, so that there were always four or five fine trouts for my mother. She liked them very much and ate them with great appetite, and I knew this was one of the greatest pleasures I could give her. Last year, I went back to that area; again I tried my luck casting my line in these creeks and rivers, to no avail. There is nothing, not a single fish left in Lac-à-la-Truite or anywhere else. I realize that the company which operates the asbestos mines in those areas had to do it. They emptied the lake which is called Black Lake. There were natural resources there and the largest deposits of asbestos are under the lake. But, in developing that natural resource, they completely destroyed the environment: lake Williams, Black Lake, Lac-à-la-Truite, all rivers and brooks. There is nothing left now because at that time the necessary measures were not taken to protect the environment.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

It is as a result of intense industrial development that our rivers, our lakes, our brooks were gradually emptied out and that we have seen at the same time enormous social benefits disappear. Our children could not only enjoy during their leisure time the beauty of nature, but also learn what nature is exactly. They could spend hours fishing, those were healthy leasure times which did not cost much to society but were very rewarding. Today when we say to our children: Go walk in the forest, go fishing. Their reply is: "There is nothing anymore, you fished everything out, you massacred everything." They blame us, and rightly so.

Over the weekend, Saturday to be precise, I went with the chairman of the Montmagny-l'Islet Rod and Gun Club, despite the bitter cold, to visit the "big lock" as it is called in the area, in the beautiful nearby municipality of Cap Saint-Ignace. The lock was built through grants from the Department of Manpower and Immigration. Significant amounts were invested twice to build a dam to regulate the river and provide a shelter for fish and give local people in Montmagny and other towns a recreational forest area. I was disappointed to note that although the lock was very well built, the force of water at high levels caused it to flow around the dam, so that large basin has now disappeared. This is a very unfortunate, because there was a lot of fish, and the scenery was beautiful for canoeing. I promised the chairman of the Montmagny-l'Islet Rod and Gun club I would raise the matter at the first opportunity, and call this to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries and Environment (Mr. LeBlanc), so that funds can be allotted to repair the damage and restore that beautiful area. It is a real asset, a real encouragement to protect the environment, forests and wildlife.

I therefore welcome this opportunity, and I hope that the legislation can really open the door to a renewed effort to give better protection and get the people involved so that we may leave healthy environment to the next generation.

Yesterday, I also attended a maypole ceremony which, in our area, and probably everywhere else, consists in planting a tree to mark the end of an organization, of a series of meetings on a topic which may have been studied over a period of weeks. There again, this ceremony was held thanks to an assistance program.

Mr. Speaker, some may tell me that I insist too much on that program but I do so precisely because it gave such good results in my area that I want to talk about it and say to the government how much I appreciated it. Hundreds of young people, especially, attended that ceremony and I took advantage of it to point out to those youths how precious that tree, and the forest are to us; close by there flows a river towards the south. I also took that opportunity to invite the young, the whole population, to get together and see to it that the river, which has been polluted over the years, is cleaned up and become once again interesting, one in which nice fish may live again.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that last Thursday a 13-year old boy happened to spot a big 29-inch trout struggling to get free of the mud on the river bank. Then, courageously, the little boy jumped in the river to get that 29-inch trout weighing seven or eight pounds and whose photo was published in the local paper. I have congratulated the little boy for his courage. He learned how to protect the environment, the fish and it is a fearless act that deserves to be mentioned.

Mr. Speaker, for all those reasons, I entirely support the fast passage of that legislation and then I hope that the regulations will be rational and known to the public. If we want the public to comply with regulations, those must be known because if they are not, they cannot be respected and we are not encouraged to cooperate. Those regulations should be well known to the public. I also wish that the department responsible for enforcing that legislation will apply it courageously not only to the weak who will fail to comply but also to the powerful. There should not be two standards of justice, there should be just one justice, one standard and the legislation should be applied strictly to big corporations that do not comply with regulations and laws. We should be as zealous as regards big corporations as we have been and will continue to be toward the weak. And the minister can be sure of one thing: he will have any co-operation and I will not intervene needlessly if I sincerely believe the legislation is properly applied, no matter the punishments or the fines that will be imposed. It will be in the public interest and I shall be pleased about it.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to participate in the second reading debate on Bill C-38 to amend the Fisheries Act, and to support my hon. friend from South Shore (Mr. Crouse) in his excellent suggestions drawing attention to some of the inequities which exist in some parts of the bill. However, he supported the principle of the bill, as have all my hon. friends who have spoken thus far.

It is obvious that the Fisheries Act needs revision. I am not too sure we should not be more concerned about the extensive powers of search and seizure given fisheries officers, because we have to keep in mind our fishermen, the extensive search powers of pollution inspectors, the possibility that conflict could arise over anti-pollution measures, and the possible conflict, constitutionally, with the provinces over anti-pollution measures. But I am sure that when the bill is sent to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry we can go into detail and correct any clauses which need correcting with the support of the minister.

The item I want to deal with has to do with clause 12 dealing with the catching of Atlantic salmon in sports rivers. It brings into focus measures to be taken to prevent the poaching of our rivers. I was glad to hear the minister tell us he needs to strengthen the capability to protect against the abuse of these resources. He is even going to the extent of confiscating gear and increasing fines dramatically. He mentioned the problems they are having in the province of New Brunswick, and I can tell the minister that those problems are being duplicated in Newfoundland, the province I represent. Poaching is becoming increasingly a threat to the preservation of our salmon rivers.

The minister should direct his attention to the number of guardians hired, as well as to the number of man-hours and man-months provided for fisheries guardians who are taken on in the summer months during the salmon season. I say, with the greatest respect, that the government is being completely unrealistic in the measures it takes to prevent poaching when, on the one hand, many millions of dollars are spent in studies and meetings, decisions are made on man-hours and budgeting, restrictions are placed on quotas to help conserve our stocks to support the future of the industry—and I commend the minister for the action he has taken in a patient and progressive way in trying to protect the industry in years to come, an industry that could be the greatest industry in the country—while, on the other hand, completely ignoring the need to build up our guardian strength, giving as a lame excuse the lack of funds.

Each year the government keeps reducing the number of guardians and the number of man-hours or man-months. For example, last year the salmon season lasted from May 24 to December 15—and I presume it will be the same this year—but the number of man-hours allocated only allowed for guardians to patrol the rivers for 12 weeks, leaving many rivers unattended for most of the salmon season, which is contrary to the objective of river guardians.

What does this situation invite, Mr. Speaker? It invites poachers to have a field day—in fact, to have several field days. They can poach to their heart's content and literally rape our beautiful rivers, which are the wonderment of sports fishermen who in most cases are dedicatedly objective to the protection of our rivers and who I am sure will be happy with the amendments we are debating today to the bill.

What I find strange, Mr. Speaker, is that while the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc) does not have the funds to keep the guardians on for the whole of the season, but has to lay them off in a good many cases after 12 weeks, his colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), can continue to pay the same personnel the greater portion of their salary for doing nothing for another 39 weeks. On the other hand, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration has programs, such as the on the job training programs which allow an employer to train personnel—and I do not think the minister's department is excluded—and obtain 75 per cent of their salary. I can only suggest that the minister apply to his colleague for such a program so that he is able to protect our rivers by building up the strength of the guardians.

The minister must recognize the seriousness of the potential destruction of our salmon stocks. The government is inviting poaching because it lacks realism. The minister knows all about this, Mr. Speaker, because, as I said when I started my speech, he has this same problem in his own province of New Brunswick, which has evidently become not only a poacher's haven but, I understand, a prosperous business as well.

Due to the shortage of staff and the length of some of our rivers, particularly in the province of Newfoundland, a fisheries officer, whether he be a warden or a guardian, has to take his life in his hands in that he travels alone, while poachers travel in pairs or in threes or fours. The minister can give a fisheries officer all the powers as a peace officer that he wants, but the problem is that the force is much too weak to provide the service which is needed. Unless the matter is treated with the urgency which it requires, this will be a blight on their responsibility to conserve stocks, an objective to which the minister is dedicated.

I see no reason whatever for not keeping on river guardians for the remainder of the year, especially at the present time when they have to be trained to accept more powers as peace officers, as well as trained in anti-pollution measures which are being introduced in this bill and which will assist in attaining the objectives outlined in Bill C-38.

I receive letter after letter during the salmon season, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to refer to one, among many, from an individual who has the conservation of our salmon stocks at heart. He writes:

> I appeal to you, as a person who is greatly disturbed by the inadequacy of our present fishery in Newfoundland, to do something about providing more protection for our natural resources of fish. This protection should not only be given during the day, but there should be also increased night patrols and more adequate protection for our wardens during this time. Some people (I will classify them as no-nothings since I would rather not put my true feelings on paper) these people think that night patrols should be discontinued, however I can truthfully assure you there is a need for this protection and night patrols must continue no matter what the cost. Any warden who has done night patrols on any kind of a continued basis knows that there is certainly danger involved. What can one or two wardens do when faced by four or five men intent on poaching and not being stopped in the process. By far the greatest percentage of salmon poaching is carried out during the night hours.

I can confirm the statement that this gentleman makes, Mr. Speaker. Last year, during the salmon season, I contacted a fisheries officer in my district and asked him to allow me to visit one of the rivers. We picked one at random, and as soon as we got there we found not only no guardian but that poachers had damaged the fisheries hut, stolen the equipment, caused destruction of the beach and would have got away scot-free if I and the fisheries officer had not by chance made our visit.

Another serious inequity involves the treatment of guardians. It is of interest to note that in this day of inflation fisheries guardians within their headquarters area or patrol area are allowed one 65-cent meal or box lunch per day. This in 1977, Mr. Speaker. I must qualify this by saying that when outside their area of patrol or assignment they receive the regular allowance of $11.45; but a 65-cent box lunch per day for a river guardian who is on duty for only part of the season cannot be reconciled. The only way a guardian can properly fill his stomach and survive is by poaching some of the salmon. One of the guardians in my district has to patrol a 50-mile stretch of river. In view of some recent increases in salary, I would ask how the government can justify a miserly 65 cents box lunch per day. Enough about poachers of salmon, Mr. Speaker; I should like to move on.

It might be worth while to refer at this time to how the act will apply to fisheries officers during the seal hunt and the powers that they will have as peace officers. In this connection, I hope you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, to commend the conduct of fisheries officers during the recent seal hunt.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: The minister can be justly proud of his fisheries officers who participated in the recent hunt. I also want to thank the minister for personally allowing me to visit the hunt and to witness at first-hand the restraint shown by fisheries officers in the face of deliberate attempts to provoke them on the part of the members of the "Greenpeace" organization who caused altercations in an effort to give a distorted image to Canadians of Newfoundlanders and their conduct of the seal hunt. To my mind, this is not only provocative but it is phony: it is ridiculous and it is not Canadian.

• (1650)

This focuses attention on the fact that, while fishery officers will have more power as peace officers, how do you deal with the case of—the adjective I want to use is not parliamentary, so I will use a "bleep". I refer to Brian Davies, who deliberately contravened the seal protection act last year and was still allowed, with complete freedom, to carry out the same misdemeanours again—and he will continue to contravene the act as long as our laws for delays in acting against a man who is conning the public as the great pretender, the great protector of the seals. I ask the minister how he will give the officers more power if cases such as the Davies case are allowed to go on? I hope the minister will further amend the Fisheries Act, which he might have done in this bill, to give better protection to the sealers.

It is worth mentioning that myself and one of the hon. members from the other side, the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey), visited the hunt and saw the attention paid by interested Newfoundland citizens to support us in presenting a petition to the House of Commons. All members have sent out petitions to householders, fishermen and citizens in their districts. I am happy to say that out of the 25,000 I sent out less than a month ago, I now have over 13,000 names in my district on the west coast of Newfoundland alone. I am hoping every good Newfoundlander will sign that petition and gather other names. This is aside from the representation and the support given to us by many community councils and every organization in Newfoundland which knows the traditions and feels for the traditions of Newfoundlanders which have been in existence for so many years.

I will allow some of my colleagues to continue on other aspects of the bill. I hope we will be able to rectify some of the slight anomalies which exist. I would like to commend the minister for his efforts. He has the assurance we will get the bill through as quickly as possible so that we can put teeth into the act in order to protect our fishermen and the valuable stocks which we hope to preserve for the future.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to hold up the passage of this bill unduly. We must take into account the difficulties in the committee structure as it now exists in this parliament and existed in the previous parliament. I disagree with the words of my hon. friend and neighbour, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), that this will be the place where we can look into these matters. Because of the committee structure, we cannot effectively look into them. Ten minutes for each member to bring forth his point and to get questions put forward are, surely, not enough.

Because we are talking about amendments to the Fisheries Act, I am going to use this opportunity to put on record a variety of matters which concern and trouble fishermen on the west coast. Before proceeding to specific itemization of those problems, as I have said on previous occasions, and as was mentioned by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), I want to make a comment concerning the regulations the minister is empowered to formulate. One other hon. member might have mentioned it as well. We are continually running into this problem. The regulations which the minister formulates, and possibly publishes, are difficult to obtain. I will come back to some of the existing regulations on which fishermen are having great difficulty getting their hands. They do not know the terms under which they are fishing, for example, and they are being regulated by regulations they do not know about. This is not good enough. We should have the regulations in front of us before we deal with this bill.

I make a special request to the minister. He should have draft regulations covering the areas he is planning to change. There should be texts of the regulations before us when this bill goes to committee for study after second reading. This is vitally important. We saw in the maritime code when we were dealing with that matter the fear expressed across the country about those regulations. That made us hesitate to proceed with final reading on that occasion, and there is legitimate cause for fear about this legislation. I ask the minister to bring forward the draft regulations which he is planning to issue using the powers granted to him under this bill.

The first matter of concern to me, and of concern to the fishermen on the west coast, is the Canada-United States fisheries agreement which was concluded rather hastily following discussions in Los Angeles late in February where certain broad terms of agreement were reached, but not sufficiently firm to permit the conclusion of an agreement. Within a matter of a week, in order to enhance and give more propaganda value to the visit which was made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to Washington and the discussions that were concluded there, there was a Canada-United States fisheries agreement concluded at that time.

On an earlier occasion I gave an indication, through presentation of statistics, of the value of the westcoast fisheries to the Canadian economy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Kaplan) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, a number of hon. members wish to speak in private members' hour on notice of motion No. 11. In view of the position we have reached in dealing with the bill before the House, I wonder if there might be unanimous agreement to allow the hon. member to conclude his remarks in private members' hour. I point out that this is the second hour on which motion No. 11 has been before us in this session. The mover has already spoken on it, as have a number of members from both sides of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The House has heard the proposal of the hon. parliamentary secretary. Is there agreement that we allow the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I gather the proposal of the parliamentary secretary is that we continue this debate for a few more moments and intrude on the private members' hour. Am I correct in my understanding?

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, my suggestion is simply that the hon. member be given time out of private members' hour to conclude.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I do not think that is necessarily going to solve anything in itself, inasmuch as there are two speakers who want to participate. While I want to co-operate in every way to expedite the business of this government, I think, since it is five o'clock, we should proceed to private members' hour.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens)—The Canadian Economy—Possibility of industrial strategy to avoid future high levels of unemployment; the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn)—Confederation—Possibility of establishing third organization concerned with unity; the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski)—Energy—Proposed upgrading facility for heavy oil at Lloydminster—Government position on feasibility report.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Notice of motion No. 16, in the name of the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Martin).

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe there is disposition to deal with notice of motion No. 11 and to allow the rest of the motions to stand at the request of the government.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, because of the interruption I would like to know whether it is clear to the House that I called it five o'clock.

Mr. Goodale: That is understood.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed that all notices of motions prior to notice of motion No. 11 shall stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not want to delay debate in private members' hour, but I want to make it clear, as the parliamentary secretary to the minister responsible for the business which was before the House said, that there was no effort to cause any difficulty. We are anxious that the bill which was before the House until five o'clock should receive fair and reasonable debate.

EXCISE TAX ACT

SUGGESTION TO EXEMPT MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENTS FROM LEVY OF FEDERAL SALES TAX

The House resumed, from November 29, 1976, consideration of the motion of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Excise Tax Act in order to exempt all purchases made by municipal governments from the levy of federal sales tax and in so doing relieve municipal governments of the necessity of imposing additional local taxes to cover such federal sales tax.

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on the motion proposed by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). Municipalities in Canada are facing severe financial difficulties in spite of rigorous austerity measures on their part. Mayor Dan Munroe of Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, president of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, has said that the municipal level of government could disappear from Canada in five years unless there is increased financial support from the federal government and the provinces. Mr. Munroe said, further, that property taxes cannot be expected to continue to pay for all municipal services. The situation facing many municipalities is so serious that Mr. Munroe was prompted to say on their behalf:

We don't have money even for basic services now. I don't think the importance of our problem is being recognized at other levels.

That is a direct quote from the Ottawa Citizen of December 13, 1976. Recent increases in the consumer price index are especially distressing in the context of this motion, when we realize that such an index reflects increases in municipal tax rates. Another increase in municipal tax rates is likely because of rising costs in local government, so the Canadian citizen faces yet another inflationary blow to the power of the dollar. Municipal tax rate increases are reflected directly in the consumer price index.

Municipal taxes form 2.8513 per cent of the expenditure basket upon which the consumer price index is based. As a result, a 10 per cent increase in municipal taxes adds nearly one-third of 1 per cent to the rate of inflation. The impact of municipal tax changes to the consumer price index is nearly as great as the impact of changes in the mortgage interest rate. There is a great hue and cry by the financial community, and in newspaper editorials, when mortgage rates change. But who takes up the cry when hundreds of small and large towns must raise taxes to cover rising costs?

The gravity of this increased financial burden at the local level can be seen in the extreme pressure it places on people with fixed incomes who have spent their lives paying for houses as a retirement investment, only to find that increasing property taxes are turning their retirement dreams into nightmares.

One of the most challenging problems facing Canada today is that in ten years the senior citizen section of our nation will double in population. It is imperative that we do something positive to keep people independent and in their homes as long as possible. We simply cannot construct homes for the aged to cope with this increase. Then, too, the great human benefits that come to our citizens when they can remain independent of assistance as long as possible are part of a quality of life in Canada which we all seek. The removal of this property tax burden is part of the answer to this problem.

The anti-inflation white paper contained a commitment by the federal government to reassess the costs to the economy of its programs, rules and regulations. Surely, this tax by one level of government on another represents a cost to the Canadian economy, not to mention the fact that such a situation runs contrary to the basic principle of common law that the Crown should not tax itself.

As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Vegreville and others, much attention is paid to municipalities as centres of Canadian life and generators of employment. Funds saved by municipalities by the removal of the tax burden in question could be valuable sources of financing for programs at the local level or, better still, for decreased taxes. Instead of a circular type of financing in which we tax local governments to generate funds for the federal government and then see Ottawa use that money in programs such as Canada Works or, as it is commonly known, "Liberal works" which are implemented back at the local level, would we not serve the Canadian economy better if we left this money with local authorities?

In this say Canadians would gain money previously spent on administration, collection and other areas of red tape. As well, more of the responsibility for local problems would be in the hands of municipal governments which are closest to the people and can respond to local situations. My experience with local municipalities is that they know best what their people need. It is not always what provincial or federal authorities deem to be in their best interests. Municipalities in Canada face numerous difficulties of administration as they try to sift through the complex of exemptions and inclusions which appear in the Excise Tax Act.

Water treatment plants have now been made exempt under the act, but certain equipment is taxable. In a water treatment plant, a pipe on one side of a wall may be taxable, but the same pipe can be exempt from taxation if it is connected on the other side of the same wall. As I have said in this House before, if the sales tax was removed from electrical supplies, as it has been with water treatment equipment, just think what it could mean to subdivision costs, thereby lessening the cost of new home building. When a bridge is built, the guard rails on it are exempt from taxation. However, the materials used in the road leading up to the bridge, including its guard rails, are not exempt.

A day-care centre, if properly registered with the Department of National Revenue, still pays federal sales tax on equipment which it purchases, but receives a rebate for such moneys. The effect of this situation is to force a municipality the size of Ottawa-Carleton to add two additional accountants to its payroll in order to administer the bookkeeping necessary to claim a rebate.

Municipal fire department buildings are taxed, but fire hoses and couplings are not. A municipality which runs its own printing service will find that materials used in that operation are taxed on the basis that such printing service is in competition with local private printing businesses. This is a fair and logical situation. However, municipalities' building and maintenance of road and water services is not done in competition with other businesses, and yet taxes are still levied on the purchase of equipment necessary for those projects. If we apply the rationale which seems to be involved in the Excise Tax Act and its provisions, perhaps the government should consider taxing the Post Office since it operates in competition with private courier services.

The complicated nature of the Excise Tax Act means that much unnecessary time is spent by municipalities separating potential purchase items according to whether they are exempt from federal sales tax as well as on the actual paperwork for the taxes themselves. These administrative costs can present a substantial burden in time and payroll to Canadian municipalities, especially smaller communities. The whole matter of preparing bids for capital expenditures is greatly complicated by this maze of exemptions and non-exemptions.

• (1710)

The increased cost for this "sheep and goats" situation can only be financed by municipalities through an increase in property taxes which, as has been mentioned, is a shrinking source of funds and causes great hardship for people on fixed incomes. If a municipality is forced to borrow in order to finance capital expenditures made more expensive by federal sales tax, such loans are only available at rates higher than those which the federal government can borrow.

In one department of one municipality alone, the savings which would accrue from the exemption of municipal governments from federal sales tax is very significant. In the transport and works department of the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton, the withdrawal of federal sales tax would lead to a saving of $450,000 on the 1977 budget. As well, similar exemptions applied to the 1977 construction program would gain an additional $250,000. Thus, Mr. Speaker, one department of one municipality in Canada would realize $700,000 from the exemption of federal sales tax—money which could serve the needs of Canadians in their local communities.

The duplication of services and double taxation is all the more distressing in the inflationary times which Canada faces today. The Globe and Mail of May 11 reports the former auditor general, Maxwell Henderson, referring to the $45 billion budget the federal government brought in this year, as saying:

> That $45 billion is fuelling the fires of inflation, and we should cut spending by 10 per cent each year until it's cut in half to $22 billion—it's feasible.

If the federal government spending could be cut by one-half, why is it necessary to tax Canadian municipalities in their efforts to provide services to their citizens? In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct the attention of the House to the words of Jules Renard, a Frenchman of letters and former mayor of Chaumot. Renard said:

> I know at last what distinguishes man from animals: financial worries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to talk on this very worth-while motion, even though I have some problems with it. I come from a large suburban riding and I am aware of the tremendous problems that face municipal taxpayers as a result of the increased costs faced by municipalities which they have had to pass along to taxpayers.

Without reflecting in any way on the riding of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), if there is a burden faced by small communities, and special arguments can be made for exemption of equipment and materials they buy under the Excise Tax Act, then certainly there are different but equally important arguments for huge metropolitan areas with dense populations. These and other factors make it worth while considering the merits of the motion.

At the outset I want to recognize that the motion does not, in principle, call for something new in the sense that the Excise Tax Act currently exempts from federal sales tax a comprehensive list of articles and materials sold to or imported by municipalities for their own use and not for resale. Included in the list are exemptions of which some hon. members may not be aware, such as goods for use in water distribution, sewage or drainage systems, materials and machinery used in the construction of municipal incinerators, culverts, equipment at a price in excess of $500 per unit specially designed for use directly for road-making, road-cleaning or firefighting, but not including automobiles or ordinary motor trucks, fire hose, including couplings and nozzles. Only in the last year or so have couplings been perfected by researchers and scientists.

I am sure the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Maine), who is very interested in research and development in Canada, will be glad to know that there has been designed what is called a "unisexual" coupling for fire hoses. This is terribly important when there is a fire and experts move quickly to put together the hoses to reach the source of the fire and put it out. Certainly, it is going to be terribly important in fighting forest fires. Exempt, also, are fire truck chassis for the permanent attachment thereon of firefighting equipment for use directly in firefighting.

It can be seen from the long list of exemptions that there are some allowances in this area now, and that they relate especially to where municipal governments have very serious responsibilities. They must spend money to do these things in order to protect their citizens. The government of Canada has recognized this and has allowed forgiveness in a number of areas. Federal sales tax also has been removed from larger trucks and most types of construction equipment. Consequently, municipal purchases of most garbage-handling equipment, and virtually all major road construction equipment, are currently exempt from federal sales tax. Certified public hospitals are not required to pay federal sales tax on any of their purchases, and libraries and schools are exempt from federal sales tax on most of their purchases. In addition, municipalities are also exempt from payment of the 10-cent per gallon special excise tax on gasoline.

Whatever else comes out of this debate, and whatever conclusions are reached, it cannot be argued that the federal government has not already gone a very long way to try to understand the problems of municipalities and the burdens on municipal taxpayers. Even though the government has its obligations, it has tried to collect revenues in order to meet its commitments and responsibilities under the constitution and has made a real effort to co-operate with municipalities in essential areas.

The primary justification for providing federal sales tax exemptions for municipalities arises from a desire to provide indirect financial assistance to local governments. Municipalities fall under the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces and it is always difficult for the federal government to come directly to their financial assistance. Indirect financial help through sales tax exemptions is one way of achieving this result. I suspect that this amount of money is very significant to them, and I should like to go into some detail of the dollars and cents involved.

I might also point out that the federal government has taken important initiatives which are of indirect financial assistance to municipalities. For example, a decision by the federal government in 1973 to include the school-purpose portion of municipal property taxes in the formula for calculating federal equalization payments results in an annual payment of approximately $225 million to the provinces. This money is passed to the provinces unconditionally and would be of indirect benefit to the municipalities. Another important federal program which indirectly would ease the burden on municipalities is the funding by the federal government of 50 per cent of the cost of certain secondary education programs. Fifty cents out of every dollar spent on post-secondary education, of course, for some time was applied to the provinces from moneys garnered by the federal government.

The hon. member for Vegreville will also be aware that the federal government provides significant funding for the operation of hospitals and the financing of medicare programs. These contributions are of significant indirect financial benefit to the municipalities. This cannot be done directly under the constitution.

Each year, municipalities press vigorously for further sales tax exemptions. In this regard, some of the exemptions they now have are opposed by private contractors who claim that they face unfair competition from municipalities using tax-exempt equipment. Their concern was especially evident prior to the government's decision to remove federal sales tax from most construction and transportation equipment. I am sure some hon. members remember that battle royal.

The matter of equity for those small contractors is one of concern in a constituency like mine. A great many new Canadians work for those small firms—not the big wealthy operations—who count on being able to have access to and tender for municipal contracts. They would certainly be at a disadvantage if the motion before us were successful.

It is also worth noting that the federal government does not itself have an exemption under the Excise Tax Act with respect to any of its purchases. Also, the provinces, which are much more closely related to the municipalities than is the federal government, are much less generous than is the federal government in providing exemptions from provincial sales taxes for municipal purchases.

A matter which is perhaps more significant is that the present objective of the federal government and several of the provinces is to move to a system of reciprocal taxation for accommodating taxes in the area of intergovernmental taxation. That is a pretty complicated phrase. Let me try to explain it. Under this system, the federal government would pay provincial sales taxes on all taxable purchases from a given province and the provincial government would pay federal taxes on their taxable purchases. Any move to enlarge the list of exemptions from federal sales taxes on municipal purchases would, therefore, be contrary to that general objective toward which we are now working.

Finally, it should be emphasized that many municipal purchases are currently exempt from federal sales tax. The major categories of goods purchased by municipalities which are presently subject to federal sales tax include construction materials, taxed at the reduced rate of 5 per cent, automobiles, office furniture and equipment. If additional sales tax relief were to be provided to the municipalities, this would result in significant loss of revenue which would have to be made up from tax increases in other areas. Therefore, it would be a matter of giving with one hand and taking back with the other.

Let me say that as a member of parliament I am frustrated when constituents complain to me about their municipal taxes since I, as a federal representative, have no direct control over the level of municipal taxation. The federal government provides hundreds of millions of dollars worth of grants to assist provinces and municipalities, but finds that officials of lower levels of government do not feel as great a responsibility with respect to the spending of funds as members at the federal level. Officials at lower levels are not directly responsible for the raising of money; hence they do not feel such a great responsibility in spending it. By being able to acquire grants and other assistance from the federal government, they have ready access to money for which they have not had to impose direct taxes on the public.

Although the hon. member's proposal has merit, it would be difficult to argue that the federal government has not been generous. It has recognized need and backed that recognition with indirect payments made in a number of ways to relieve the burden of costs for equipment and materials which must be borne by municipalities. As well, the government's responsibility in spending is restricted to the spending of those moneys over which under the constitution it has direct powers, these being moneys with respect to the collection and spending of which the government is answerable to the electorate.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my intervention in the debate on the excellent motion proposed by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) will be brief. Speaking as a former municipal official, I am aware how frustrated municipal governments are and what problems they encounter in their attempts to raise money through taxation. The municipal government is government closest to the people and also the first to bear the brunt of taxpayers' criticism. The provincial government is somewhat more remote from the taxpayer. We, in these hallowed halls of the so-called highest level of government, are even further removed. We can impose taxes and the people can yell, but because we are so far removed from them there is little they can do.

I served on a municipal council for 31 years. For 26 years I served as reeve of a small municipality. I also served for many years on provincial organizations such as the Ontario mayors and reeves association and, latterly, on the association of municipalities of Ontario. Time and again, when resolutions would come before that association it was resolved that the request supported by the municipal organization requesting the discontinuance of federal sales tax on municipal purchases should be forwarded to the federal government.

I note the comments of my colleague from Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott). The savings she mentioned would come to a staggering amount in a city the size of Ottawa. She suggested, I think, that if the motion were adopted it would enable the city of Ottawa to save close to half a million dollars in one month alone. The money which could be saved in a large metropolitan centre like Toronto is so large as to be difficult to visualize.

I also note the remarks of the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming). In addition to the items he mentioned, municipalities must buy equipment such as road machinery, fire trucks, and so on. Therefore, without question, adoption of the proposal would bring the municipalities great relief. I suggest that the point the hon. member raised is almost an argument for going the whole way. The government allows some exemptions now. I ask, why make the municipalities the bookkeepers and collectors of additional taxes levied with respect to pencils, paper and various other items municipalities use items which form a small proportion of the total value of the materials purchased? I know that the representatives of many municipalities feel as I do.

Some years ago there were 951 municipalities in Ontario. That number was reduced with the creation of new forms of government such as regional municipalities and the amalgamation of small municipalities. Today I believe there are in excess of 700 municipalities in Ontario. I feel that the federal government should say, in this particular case, "Why should we tax little brother, our municipal government, or our little grandson," as the case may be, "and extract the last pound of flesh. We do not want to tax in that manner. Therefore, the Department of National Revenue, excise division, will provide the municipalities with the necessary relief."

I say, why not be magnanimous, why not go the whole way and not collect such taxes from municipal governments? Our municipal governments are having a tough time raising money, most of which comes from real estate taxes. True, some people in the municipalities may have fair-sized homes, but their incomes are not necessarily in keeping with the size of their houses. If this motion were to pass and municipal councils could thereby save money, I am sure that they would channel these savings in the proper direction. For all these reasons, I hope the government will approve this motion.

Mr. J. Larry Condon (Middlesex-London-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) proposes in his motion that the federal government should exempt all purchases made by municipal governments from federal sales tax. As an old municipal politician, I know the value of tax exemptions. As was made clear, the federal government is at present doing a great deal in this field. The hon. member on my side of the House spoke of many ways in which the federal government helps municipalities. I find it strange that the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) should complain bitterly about the federal government's power to collect taxes from municipalities, since his party in Ontario has, with the formation of regional governments in some cases, increased tax loads three or fourfold over their original level in the individual or smaller municipalities.

Mr. Alexander: Nonsense.

Mr. Condon: The hon. member has failed to recognize that.

Mr. Alexander: Nonsense. You don't know what you are talking about.

Mr. Condon: I remember attending a convention of small municipalities in Parry Sound some six or seven years ago. The announcement was made that Huntsville was to be included in the regional area.

● (1730)

The people in those municipalities seemed to be happy about it. They obviously did not know what was going to happen in the long run. They were happy because they thought they would have a broader tax base. They certainly did not realize that with a broader tax base you need a bigger bureaucracy and are farther away from the little people.

Mr. Darling: Parry Sound hasn't got it.

Mr. Condon: Neither has Strathroy. It is a difficult position we find ourselves in here because of the constitutional problem. The provinces, of course, have great sway over the municipalities, a lot more than the federal government.

If we are going to look at a new and revitalized constitution, we realize that we have to take care of the inequities, not only in the regions but also in the provinces and municipalities. It is time that the small municipalities and the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Reeves or the Canadian Federation of Mayors were involved in this dialogue. If we are going to look at a new and revitalized constitution to bring us up to date in the seventies, these people in the municipalities have to be involved. As the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) mentioned, they are the grass roots people, the ones who realize the problems of the local areas. An individual member has cognizance of the local problems, but sometimes we are a little too far removed from the people paying the taxes.

It has been proven in the past that when the government gets away from the people, it loses contact. If the constitutionalists get together, I am afraid they will not get the input from the people who will make this country work and make it run properly.

They have ideas at the municipal level. At one time I was a member of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Reeves and also of the small municipalities organization. I thought the talk at those conventions and the ideas that came from the small municipalities and the middle and larger municipalities has a more common sense base than we sometimes see federally or provincially. The mayors of those municipalities know the problems of taxation. They have been pushed in a corner over the past 50 or 60 years because of their lack of tax base.

As I mentioned previously, I certainly agree with this motion of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). We should support tax relief for the municipalities at all times because it is a double taxation. We are taxing them and they are taxing the people. We get money on one side from the federal tax and retax through the municipality. Because of their short and small tax base, they do not have the opportunity to have the taxing power they should possess. This could be done through constitutional change, but it is a two-way street. The provinces have to realize, maybe even more than the federal government, how much they have usurped the municipalities chance of taxation. This is for many reasons, maybe because bigger was better at some time in the past. Anyway they seemed to believe that. The municipalities know it is not true.

The municipalities are restricted so much in their taxing policy that their hands are tied. They are tied to the ordinary cost of increase on a current basis. Also, they are tied because of the major grants that come in. The municipalities have to come up with 20 per cent when somebody gives them 80 per cent. The tax dollar is a dollar that is spent federally, provincially, or municipally.

Another problem in the tax base is education. The municipalities are just a collecting agency for that. Indeed they are a collecting agency for which work they get no remuneration. If it were not going too far, I would say that maybe the school boards should collect their own taxes. However, I am afraid that would just add another bureaucracy.

Mr. Darling: Your council would like that.

Mr. Condon: I am sure the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka would agree wholeheartedly. It was very difficult when I was mayor. You worked like a son-of-a-gun to try to keep your mill rate down to a 1 or 2 per cent increase, and the school board would hop in with a 20 per cent increase.

What jurisdiction would the school boards have if there were a change in the Constitution? Should there not be some power for the boards which represent the same people? This is one of the problems we will have to face when it comes time to look at the constitution.

When looking at the Constitution in the future, the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Reeves should be represented. They are the people who know the problems of the municipalities. There are very few people in Ottawa and Toronto who know those problems. I saw some of the problems the people from Toronto had when they tried to jam regional government down our throat in the London area. Because they were so far away, they had a problem finding the town hall. But they came from Toronto to tell us how to run our cities and towns.

Although I strayed off the matter of excise tax, I hope that some of these proposals of the hon. member for Vegreville will be followed through. I hope there will be a complete review of the tax structure for all of Canada in any planned constitutional change, which I hope we will have very soon.

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I want to enter this debate to make a very few comments. I want first to compliment the mover of the motion. It is a good motion, it has merit, and certainly should be debated in this House.

The municipality I come from certainly has some problems in raising the amount of revenue to answer all the demands that people living in the municipality place upon it, largely because it is a very fast growing municipality. At one time everyone thought that growth was a good economic thing. However, most municipalities are now finding that it is very costly.

I want to make a couple of comments on one or two points of which we should not lose track. First, there is a very fundamental point in terms of taxation. Whatever level of government is providing a service should be the level of government that is taxing for that service.

I would be very concerned if, over the years, the federal government became nothing more than a taxing organization and transferred most of the taxes it collected to the provinces which, presumably, in turn transferred a portion to the municipalities. That is a trend that has taken place over the past five or ten years. It has not been very healthy in our system of government whereby more and more or our federal tax revenues are transferred to the provinces and more of the provincial revenues are transferred to the municipalities.

I agree with the previous speaker in making the comment that as we enter into the national unity debate, particularly from a constitutional point of view, we should look at this point. In other words, we should redefine not only what might be the federal powers and those of the various provinces, but most definitely we should talk about what the powers of the municipalities should be as well. There are certainly responsibilities as seen by municipalities that might be as well or better handled by the provincial government, the same as there might be responsibilities carried out by the provincial government that should be vested with the federal government.

Most of the conversation we hear now about the Constitution deals with how much power the federal government should give to the various provinces. It should be on the record that there is a case to be analysed for three levels of government and to sort out clearly which ones have responsibility for which functions, and in turn look at the financing of them. That would be a much healthier situation than we seem to have at the present time where we are looking more and more at the federal government as a broad taxing organization, hoping that the taxation so raised is transferred to the provinces and passed in turn to the municipalities.

The whole question of accountability should surely be considered. If we go further in terms of exempting certain bodies from taxes, from increasing revenue passing from one level of government to the other, it seems to me it makes it almost impossible for the taxpayer to hold the various levels of government accountable for the taxation policies they have been following.

It seems to me another argument could be set out too, that is, whether an across-the-board exempting of federal sales tax is really effective in helping a municipality, or whether a municipality would be further ahead if it argued successfully for the federal government to take on as a share of the cost of some programs. Coming from a municipality which probably has one of the highest growth rates in Canada, I think one of the best things the federal government has done to aid that municipality for some time was under the federal housing action program whereby the government recognized the high cost faced by a municipality such as Brampton where such a large number of new homes are needed each year, and made available $1,000 per housing unit in accordance with criteria set out under the program. This seems to me to be a more useful approach than an across-the-board exemption from federal sales tax, because it speaks directly to a specific concern.

I also want to raise a concern which has been voiced by a number of municipal people about a program which, at the present time, is a very costly one to municipalities, that is, the arrangement for dealing with children who are in conflict with the law. Many times, when this situation arises, the court will determine whether these children should be looked after by the Children's Aid Society or whether they should be placed in private homes or homes run by private organizations. Of course the court makes the best determination it can, but a very different financial obligation depends on the decision. In one case the municipality gets a substantial amount of grant; in the other case the entire cost of the court decision falls upon the municipality. It seems to me we should be looking at some of these specifics and discussing how such a problem as that should be best handled by the sharing of the cost, rather than an across-the-board exemption of federal sales tax to municipalities.

When I was listening to my hon. friend from York West, I was impressed by the long list of articles municipalities can purchase free of tax. I was not aware that the tax exemption of municipalities was as wide as it is. But in spite of the long list read by the hon. member one could add a couple of more current exemptions which are very significant. One is the removal of federal sales tax from urban transit equipment. This was done to answer a very specific need, to promote urban transportation and to reduce the cost of municipalities. That is as it should be, because it is a national concern.

In the same category is the removal of federal sales tax from insulating materials. Energy conservation is the concern of every Canadian and this is a way by which the federal government wanted to assist in promoting energy conservation; it is doing this by means of a financial incentive which shows up.

I would rather see the federal government look at some of the specific programs which are difficult for municipalities to handle, and perhaps participate in them, as opposed to giving across-the-board exemptions from federal sales tax at the municipal level. If tax exemptions are too wide you introduce the whole question of unfairness into the tax system in that some people are required to pay and others are not. One concern often expressed recently is that governments at all levels, including the municipalities, should be using private sector services a good deal more as opposed to employing people and building up a staff to handle all their problems in their entirety. If you were to exempt the municipalities across-the-board from federal sales tax it would go the opposite way to that argument.

In most cases it would be cheaper for the municipalities to do things themselves than to contract with the private sector which would be forced to pay purchase tax and which could therefore not compete on an equitable basis with the municipalities. I do not think that would sit very well with the private sector. They would have a very valid complaint if they were asked to be prepared to tender against the cost at which a municipality could carry out the service when the municipality was able to purchase whatever equipment or material it required free from sales tax. The hon. member might think about that aspect before pursuing the motion further.

I think all municipalities, in conjunction with the majority of provinces, and most certainly the federal government have worked very hard at keeping government expenses under control. Yet as I understand it, particularly in Ontario, the municipalities are obligated to budget for and collect school taxes without having any jurisdiction over what that level of taxation should be. I understand that the municipality I come from will this year issue separate tax notices to draw the attention of the people living in the municipality to which level of cost is which; people then can make their own judgment as to how prudent the municipality has been versus the education authority. I do not want to become involved in that debate except to raise the point that I think this is one of the concerns that municipalities have. It is the total tax bill that they have to present to the taxpayer that concerns them when they have some very legitimate programs that they want to proceed with and yet, of necessity, they must draw back because of increased education costs. I think this is the genesis of the pressure reflected in the motion. But the previous speaker made a good suggestion when he said that each level of jurisdiction providing services should be responsible for its own taxation. That is probably the better answer.

I just wanted to participate in the debate in order to raise two or three points which came to my mind as I was listening to the opening speeches this afternoon. I return to the point that we need to be very careful, in terms of our over-all taxation policy, to keep accountability within the jurisdiction which is providing the services. If you exempt municipalities and other bodies from federal sales tax, as has been suggested in a number of private members' bills and motions, you arrive at a situation where the federal government becomes a major taxing body whose programs consist mainly of transferring revenue to provinces. To my mind, this would not be in keeping with federal taxation law. I appreciate having had the opportunity to add a few words to this debate.

[Mr. Milne.]

Some hon. Members: Question!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Maine).

Mr. Paproski: Shame!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Wasting the time of the House!

Mr. Frank Maine (Wellington): I am not wasting the time of the House. I am talking this motion out. I think it is time we called an end to this farce we call the private members' hour and what goes on here, aided and abetted by the official opposition. They claim to be helping dispose of this matter, but what did the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) do but fill the House with hot air and righteous indignation when he said they do not want to carry on with the bill but want to get on with private members' business. You know darned well—

• (1750)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order.

Mr. Paproski: Get on to the subject.

Mr. Maine: I am getting on to the subject. I am getting on to the subject that this motion is going to be talked out. Hon. members opposite should appreciate the fact that this motion has already been debated for one hour. The motion has been brought forward and discussed, the position of the government has been stated, and several members have elaborated on this.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Then let us vote.

Mr. Maine: We sure do have a lot of hot air coming from Saskatoon-Biggar this afternoon, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: There is plenty on that side too.

Mr. Maine: You are going to have five more minutes of it because this motion is going to be talked out and that is the position of the government. It is about time we changed the rules of this House and brought them more up to date, instead of this ridiculous nonsense of wasting the time of the House on matters on which we have already decided. Let us get on with business which is much more pressing and important to this country in this day and age. It is about time the House realized that we have to get into this century and bring the rules of the House up to date, instead of the procrastination and hot air nonsense which comes from the hot air twins from Saskatoon and Edmonton.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I regret to interrupt at this time but I think the hon. member is casting a reflection upon the intent and purport of the motion, which I advanced in good faith. I was sincere in the issue which I brought forth, and it is certainly not becoming of him to suggest that the issue which I brought forth in this Chamber for debate is frivolous, empty, and meaningless. I mean this most seriously. I think it is casting a reflection upon all members of the House, and I hope he will either withdraw or get on the right track.

Mr. Paproski: Withdraw.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, as I understand the remarks of the hon. member he was reflecting not on the motives of the hon. member or on his intentions in bringing this very worthy motion forward, an issue about which there is a lot of public debate, but merely on this sterile practice which the private members' hour has become, and which I think our Committee on Procedure and Organization has recognized certainly ought to be improved.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, the member whose remarks caused the interruption on the part of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), which I think was a justifiable interruption, made the intention of the government with respect to this matter absolutely clear: he was put up purely and simply to talk out the motion.

I want to say to the hon. member, through you, Mr. Speaker, that that is a questionable practice which has carried on for much too long. There are a lot of good private members' motions, and one of them is the one advanced by the hon. member for Vegreville. This attitude, which has been now expressed openly and honestly for the first time, of talking out that which is good, if it is advanced by a member of the opposition, if it deals with a point which the government may not agree with, has now become the order of business of this House. I hope that members in this Chamber take note of this reprehensible practice on the part of the government, which serves to denigrate private members' business in this Chamber.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was going to ask the hon. member whether he would accept a question, although my friend from Grenville-Carleton has made the point. Did I understand the hon. member to say that the reason he is talking this motion out is because it was a government decision to do so?

Mr. Mazankowski: That is what he said.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. I think all hon. members who have participated have made their points very clearly. I doubt if the hon. member for Wellington is directing his remarks to the intent of the mover of the motion. As I heard it, he was making remarks about the hour for private members' business, but I hope he will address his remarks to the motion before us.

Mr. Paproski: Answer the question.

Mr. Maine: First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer the question raised by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). I was certainly not imputing any motives to him in proposing his motion. I was saying that the decision had been made as to the disposition of the motion, and that that action had been taken. As to what followed, I was referring to the action of some hon. members opposite, and that is what I meant when I said the comments were fanciful and frivolous.

Mr. Alexander: We will see the blues.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the hon. member a government puppet?

Mr. Maine: No, the hon. member is not a government puppet. The hon. member is trying to help the government succeed with its business, and that business has decided that this motion will not come to a vote in this hour. I am doing my best to help make sure that that comes to pass.

Mr. Paproski: Now we know.

Mr. Maine: It is about time you woke up if you did not know that before now. I do not know how long hon. members have been here, but if they have not learned that before now, they have been awfully slow in learning, Mr. Speaker. May I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No. Question!

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) is to be congratulated for having brought up this question in the House. It has not only stimulated our thinking but in the past hour has allowed several members to come forward with a number of good ideas and suggestions. I was particularly intrigued by the thought expressed by the new member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) that favourable consideration of this proposal might eventually find its expression in a reduced tax which would benefit the municipal taxpayers at large.

To me, Mr. Speaker, this motion raises a very interesting subject, as it does to many of us who have, to some extent, a municipal background. We know from experience that in this country taxes are levied on municipalities by the provincial government as well as the federal government. At the same time municipal governments levy taxes on provincial governments and the federal government, or payments in lieu of taxes, so that there is a give and take on either side.

Contrary to what has been said by previous speakers in this debate, it seems to me that there is no need to change our Constitution in order to bring about a better deal for municipalities. It is a well known fact—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FISHERIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND CRIMINAL CODE IN CONSEQUENCE THEREOF

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent) that Bill C-38, to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, before I called it five o'clock I indicated it was my intention not to delay the bill but to make use of this opportunity to set forth a number of the concerns and worries of the fishermen on the west coast. Many of these stem from the recently concluded Canada-United States Reciprocal Fisheries Agreement which was signed, as I recall, just following the visit of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to Washington at the end of February. That document has not been referred to the committee so far. I am not even sure it has been tabled in the House. I feel it is one of the documents we should have available to us. I would ask the minister to make sure it is tabled in the House at the earliest opportunity because it is difficult to make specific reference to it without having the document in front of us, although there are a number of problems that have arisen out of it.

The purported purpose of the agreement was summarized in a document which reached me last week from the Pacific Trollers' Association. It is worth reading because it is pertinent to their present worries. The document reads as follows:

> The bilateral agreement between Canada and U.S.A. sought to maintain fishery of both countries in accordance with existing patterns.

I see the minister nodding his head. This is what they were trying to do. It goes on to say:

> Whilst both countries recognize that each has the right to manage fisheries within its jurisdiction within the terms of its domestic laws, the agreement nevertheless clearly spelled out that in the application of domestic laws, the contracting parties shall be guided by the principles of:
>
> (a) preserving existing pattern of reciprocal fisheries; and
> (b) in the case of reciprocal salmon fisheries, recognizing the interest of the state of origin in salmon spawned in its rivers.

This is a very good summary of the convention, as I understand it, but I do think it would be useful to have the text in front of us.

● (2010)

We are not sure whether the terms of this interim agreement have been fully implemented, because the ink on this agreement was barely dry when there was a recommendation by the U.S. Pacific Regional Council which, to my understanding, undercut some of these principles. Here again I would like to cite this brief of the Pacific troller men because I think it sets forth their concerns as they see them. I am sure these are more than perceptions; these are facts which are facing fishermen today. The brief states that the fisheries plan of the United States Pacific Regional Council, which has now been promulgated into law, stipulates closures from April 15 to April 30, June 1 to June 30, and after September 15 north of Tillamookhead, and prior to the cohoe opening on July 1 mandatory use of single barbless hooks on all terminal gears. With the exception of the mandatory use of single barbless hooks such regulations which take 12 weeks out of the normal 26 weeks fishing in the area not even aimed at conservation.

What is worrying fishermen—and I am not sure this message is getting across to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc)—is that this denies one of the principles, if not both of those principles, underlined in the reciprocal agreement, that is, preserving the existing pattern of reciprocal fisheries.

Here is a unilateral action by one country, changing the terms under which fishing may be done in its waters. Granted, it is domestic law, but it is well known that Canadians fish in U.S. waters just as U.S. fishermen fish in our waters.

Second, "They should recognize the interest of the state of origin in the salmon spawned in its rivers." This new recommendation by the U.S. Pacific Regional Council is likely to affect the salmon heading for the Fraser River. In other words, the United States unilaterally has made decisions about the fish heading up to the Fraser River. The use of gear, of course, is another unilateral decision.

As I indicated, the troller men in B.C. are worried about these moves, and having heard not only from troller men but also from others in the area, I feel there is a danger of retaliation by way of a request to close Canadian waters to U.S. fishermen. We have heard of the cod war in the waters of the North Atlantic. I do not think we want to see a salmon war on the Pacific coast, but unilateral actions of this kind, which belie and undercut an agreement which was concluded in good faith between both parties, could lead to some unfortunate actions.

On April 4 of this year I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) about an aide mémoire, which I had been told was left with the State Department in Washington, concerning the application of certain domestic regulations to the fisheries on the west coast. As I understand it, that was a secret aide mémoire. There was some misunderstanding. My question appears at page 4592 of Hansard. I asked that that aide mémoire be tabled in the House. There has been no reaction from either the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. However, there is a sneaking suspicion in everyone's mind that this aide mémoire gave the U.S. authorities permission to go ahead with taking unilateral decisions affecting the fisheries off the Pacific coast. If that is not so—and I see the minister shaking his head in obvious disagreement—then I suggest that the minister table this memorandum along with the reciprocal agreement so that we may all see them.

Of great concern to fishermen on the west coast are the consequences of the implementation of what is known as the Judge Boldt decision on Indian fishing. This gives U.S. Indian fishermen special rights, and as I understand the traditional principles underlying our reciprocal arrangements, the 50-50 split between Canadian fish caught by American fishermen and American fish caught by Canadian fishermen includes those fish which are taken by treaty Indians.

There has been a follow-up on this decison, and on my way back to Ottawa from my riding over the weekend I picked up the Sunday paper and there, large as life, was an account of where this might be leading. It is causing concern to a different group of fishermen because it seems that the United States granted the Indians the right to fish beyond the 12-mile limit with gill nets out in that area where they will have the first take of the fish coming into the Straits of Juan de Fuca. Whether this fear is real or imagined, it is there. It is causing fishermen concern, and I think this has to be examined very closely.

I mentioned the danger of a fish war off the coast. That is the kind of talk which appears in this article. I do not like to see it. I feel that the whole issue of the settlement of the division of the catch has to be dealt with immediately. The reciprocal agreement is fine provided it is lived up to, but it looks as though it is being undercut at every turn, and I therefore implore the minister to make sure that his officials are either inviting their counterparts from Washington to come here and talk these matters over, or going down to Washington to make sure that matters do not get out of hand.

First and foremost—and this is a principle which has been enunciated in this House—we must restore respect for treaty provisions. We do not want to undercut those provisions. We do not want to take unilateral action which would deny the undertaking we have given, and we certainly do not want those undertakings which have been given by another country to be undercut, to our detriment.

Still in this area of bilateral concerns on the west coast I come back to the extension of the boundary. I have been given to understand that there have been two or three submissions to the government in the last three or four weeks about the boundary line out to the 200-mile limit as promulgated in the Gazette. A new approach has been made, and I believe the province of British Columbia, among others, has suggested the San Juan trench as being the line which ought to define the boundary limits between the Canadian and the U.S. fisheries. This makes a fair amount of sense. I realize there is a problem regarding the trench on the east coast, but it is a principle that was accepted in New York, Geneva, and Caracas.

It has been accepted for a long time that if there are special circumstances that need to be taken into account in the definition or delimitation of areas, then those special circumstances could prevail over the median line approach. Here you have an extension of the continental shelf out to the trench. It is a natural fishing area on the north side and on the south side where the fishermen of our two countries will know where they are. It is a navigational device as well and it will be readily known where that division lies. I am not arguing at all for the use of that approach on the eastern delimitation because I know that would deprive Canada of a great deal of her present resources.

When the parliamentary secretary makes his contribution to the debate, perhaps he will make some mention of the representations with respect to the Juan de Fuca trench. That is only part of the problem.

I am sure the minister is aware of the problems on the east coast, but I like to feel I am bringing some focus to the problems on the west coast as well. They are completely different, Mr. Speaker. It would not be out of place in the organization of the department to have an assistant deputy minister east coast and an assistant deputy minister west coast. The problems are distinct. Obviously the deputies would have to co-ordinate their activities, but I think this is something that should be considered.

Before the season opened there was a suggestion that a two-licence system be introduced on the west coast whereby a fisherman would have to choose this season whether he would fish inside the gulf or go out on the west coast of the island and fish there. It might even be narrowed down to the zone or the area. That would be followed a year later by a choice of gear. He would have to decide if he was going to be a seiner or a troller. The department decided he could not be both. This suggestion was thrown out to fishermen this year. It had been mentioned a couple of years ago, but the final decision to implement it was suddenly made public only weeks before the fishing season opened. This caused the fishermen, quite rightly, to ask for some other way of drawing up regulations.

In a brief presented to the British Columbia Progressive Conservative party caucus three or four weeks ago in Vancouver by the Fishing Vessel Owners Association of British Columbia, it was suggested that regulations by press release be eliminated. That sounds just like the House of Commons, Mr. Speaker. In this House we deplore the number of occasions when important statements that ought to be made here, where debate can follow, are made by press release or press conference. As we all know, the Prime Minister does not bother to speak in the House; he goes to another legislative chamber to make his statements. This is reflected again in the attitude of the government toward the manner of regulating whatever it is a minister is empowered to regulate. It is regulation by press release.

Fishermen seek an input in licensing and gear equality regulations, or some sort of consultative process which would enable them to express their views and get them across to demonstrate how reasonable are their views. The problems confronting fishermen today have been compounded by permitting licences on the west coast following an edict by the minister's predecessor that there be a reduction in the number of vessels. I do not think there has been a reduction, Mr.

Speaker. There seem to be more vessels fishing now than when the edict came down. What is happening is that the small fishing boats are being bought up and combined into big fishing boats in order to make them a viable proposition, so that instead of three, four or five-ton licences they get a 15-ton licence, and then they have to get a couple of sets of gear. They troll and they seine. This is causing trouble as it is over-capitalizing the industry. The minister has to sit down with the fishermen—not just with his officials on the west coast but with the fishermen—so that they can get their ideas across to him.

The business of area licensing was tossed around as something that was in prospect. Mr. Speaker, it is impractical in view of the nature of the quarry. Fishermen cannot see how they can be confined to a square area of the sea surface for fishing. Fish do no obey those regulations—they just go through them. They come up from the south and go through to the north, or go out sideways, and the fishermen must be free to pursue them, or face a bad season.

Then there is the problem of the sports fishermen. They are up in arms too. In this regulation by press release there was a suggestion that the sports fishermen were going to be licensed and that their catch was going to be reduced. The argument was that at present on the inside passage, where perhaps the major proportion of the sports fishing takes place, sportsmen are taking small fish and taking something in the order of five sevenths of the chinook taken in that area. This five sevenths notion is being used to blow up the importance of the sports fisherman with respect to the whole chinook fishery. I think this is an unfair approach to the whole operation. The commercial fishermen recognize this.

The chinook fishery is a large one and is not confined to the inside passage. With three, four, five and six-pounders being caught by sports fishermen, why is it not possible to suggest that a larger hook be used to catch a larger fish? They might not get so many, but a fisherman does not always go out just to catch fish; he goes out to enjoy himself, and if he gets fish that is a bonus. So the sports fishermen are up in arms on the west coast, as well as the commercial fishermen.

When our caucus was out on the west coast another area of sports fishing was brought to our attention, namely, the sports cannery trade. Sportsmen—if that is what they can be called—are flown in from the United States in large numbers, taken aboard a large yacht, then go out with their dorries or nets, catch fish in commercial quantities, cook them on board, put them in boxes, and then return to the United States with their fish already canned. That is not sportsmanlike. It is not sports fishing, and I am sure the minister agrees. There must be some way to control this operation. If sports fishermen had any sport in their blood whatever they would at least cast a line and troll, and then fight for what takes hold of the line. But this business of going in as a commercial venture and leaving with canned fish is a monstrous attack on our resources. I do not know if the minister can say how widespread this practice is; I gather it is of some sizeable proportions. It must be brought to an end.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

● (2030)

Another problem besetting fishermen on the west coast is the special advantages available to Indian fishermen. They, I believe, pay only $10 for a licence, whereas a white man pays $2,000. I point out that boats of Indian owners are manned with white men. The Indians fish at a tremendous advantage, paying only $10 for a licence as against $2,000 their competitors must pay. True, native peoples have treaty rights, but surely the purpose of this assistance was to enable them to employ native peoples; it was not intended that they should employ white men hired from union halls.

One could raise other matters of concern. I have not mentioned the salmon enhancement program. I suspect we shall not push forward with the salmon enhancement program until there is a reciprocal agreement. Once such a reciprocal treaty is negotiated, we shall be assured of the benefit of fish spawned in our waters naturally or under the salmon enhancement program. I do not know the present state of this program but suppose it is almost inactive.

I will not deal with the matter of pollution. My colleague who has just resumed his seat I am sure will delve into these questions. Really, the only pollution matter I raise at this time, a matter on which I shall elaborate further on another occasion because I note that my time has almost expired, is the matter of the Kitimat tanker route. I am concerned about the damage which can be done in that area.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Thank you. I am concerned about the damage which can be done in the area if, God help us, it is decided to make Kitimat into a superport.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by applauding the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) for the excellent job he has done these past three years, and for introducing the amending bill before us. I think all hon. members will agree, whether they come from the east coast, Ontario, Quebec, or British Columbia, that the minister has treated all fishermen fairly. He has acted on behalf of fishermen, not on behalf of big fishing companies or moneyed interests. He has shown that he wishes to serve the small fishermen of Canada. For that I applaud the minister, and for introducing this bill and for his good work of the last few years.

I support this bill but give notice of my intention to raise one or two points during the committee stage. I hope hon. members will hasten the progress of the bill to committee, to allow regulations to be brought in as soon as possible. I understand that the B.C. Wildlife Federation have expressed their wish for this bill to be passed as soon as possible. They have indicated to me their full, 100 per cent support of these amendments.

I ask the minister to follow the precedent established last year by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) in allowing regulations to be submitted to members in committee. Let us see the regulations when the bill is in committee. We want to study the regulations at the same time as we study the bill.

Perhaps such a course would lead to speedy consideration and passage of this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Anderson: As I recall, it was agreed to bring before the committee regulations pertaining to Bill C-83. This was done before the report stage. Unfortunately the session prorogued and the bill was never reported back. I think all committee members would consider it as a sign of the minister's trust and confidence if he were to let us see the regulations. That course, I suggest, would lead to orderly and speedy passage of the bill. The minister is present in the House, and I hope he has noted my supplication. I trust that I am not out of order, Mr. Speaker, in making these comments. To repeat, I commend the minister for bringing in this amending bill. As several members wish to speak, I shall not delay proceedings; however, I must raise one or two points of concern.

I applaud the provision giving fisheries officers the powers of peace officers. I understand fisheries officers will be given all the authority vested normally in peace officers, as set out in the Criminal Code. Such authority is to be used in certain ways. Since I represent a rural riding on Vancouver Island, I clearly understand that a fishery officer often has a difficult time dealing with poachers. If he catches one, he must summon an RCMP officer who issues the warrant, makes the arrest, and so on. Once this bill passes the fisheries officer will, for certain purposes, have all the powers of a peace officer, and for that I commend the minister. I foresee our fishery officers becoming useful instruments for the enforcing of our 200 mile limit.

Allowing fishery officers to act as peace officers in enforcing our fisheries regulations when they monitor the activities of distant water fishing fleets will lead to efficiency in manpower use. For example, consider what might happen if a fisheries officer were to board a Russian trawler operating off the west coast of Canada. He could monitor the size and type of catch and, if the licence issued by the minister has been contravened, he could in his capacity as peace officer issue the warrant, order the ship to enter harbour, or do whatever else is required in the circumstances.

Since he has the power vested in a peace officer, he need not send for the RCMP, or wait for the RCMP helicopter to put a member of that force on board ship. He has in his hands all the necessary power. I hope the minister will not take offence at my saying that there are not enough fisheries officers, at least in my part of the west coast, to do their job adequately.

I realize that the minister's department is under constraint and may not be able to hire enough staff, the work of which is measured in man-years of employment. His allocation of man-years is frozen, as is that of several other departments. But we must appoint more fisheries officers to monitor the area encompassing Thasis, Gold River, Campbell River, and all the other small communities of the region, which is several hundred square miles in area. Without adequate staff it will be impossible to monitor the area adequately and assume those additional responsibilities which fishery officers will have to bear on the west coast and east coast of Canada. I trust fishery officers will be able to carry out the additional responsibilities with which they are to be entrusted. I add that they do an excellent job in Canada; they are dedicated, sincere people. I would only ask that their job be made a little easier by additional staffing, especially in the field.

Many times we staff our offices in Ottawa, Vancouver, or Saint John, but we do not staff the field, at least not as much as the bureaucracy. I say that with all respect. I feel that sometimes they are the forgotten men of the service. Anything we can do to aid them will be a plus, not only for the government, not only for the monitoring, but for their morale. They are very proud people. They do have a high morale, but we can help them out in that area.

One provision brought in by the minister in his amendment is ticketing for minor offences. This is a very rational move. Up until now, in many cases the fishery officers had to go into court on very petty offences. Our object should be to keep them in the field. They sometimes have to travel 50, 60 or 100 miles from their normal base of operation in order to appear in court, only to find that the person being prosecuted does not appear. That time is wasted.

We now have a provision whereby the fishery officers can issue tickets for minor offences, prescribed by regulations. I hope these regulations are given to us so that the committee members can judge what is a minor offence and what is not. In any event, through this regulation a voluntary plea of guilty can be entered and a prescribed fine sent in by the offender. There is no need for the fishery officer to leave his patrol area in order to appear in court on a very minor issue.

I mentioned in my earlier remarks the matter of poaching. This is a very serious matter which the bill will attempt to remedy. Off the coast of British Columbia, it is estimated that about 5,000 salmon are poached each year.

Salmon in British Columbia is approximately a $200 million industry. Poaching accounts for about $3.5 million. With the modifications in clause 58, I hope that a poacher can not only be fined or sent to jail, but that his equipment can be confiscated. That will add some teeth. Those people who take the salmon as they are going to the creeks and rivers to spawn are a menace to our salmon conservation and should be penalized to the utmost.

I mentioned to the minister in private conversation that those who act as the middleman between the poacher and the consumer should be equally flailed by the law, whether it be by confiscation of their trucks and equipment or by an increased fine. I understand there is a clause in the amendment which increases the fine from $1,000 to $5,000. Perhaps this can be clarified in committee.

The middleman makes the greatest profit, much greater than the poacher. These people should receive substantially increased fines, imprisonment, and confiscation of their equipment, the same as the poacher. I suppose it is analogous to the pusher of marijuana or other drugs and the person who supplies the pusher. It is hard to distinguish which is doing the most damage.

Up until now we have had a maximum fine of $1,000 for the poacher. However, there are documented cases of the poacher being fined $500 even though he sold his catch for $1,000. This proves that in some instances crime does pay.

My biggest concern with regard to the poacher is not that he is illegally catching a fish, but destroying a resource which takes a long time to replenish. A great many of the 500,000 salmon that are caught are caught illegally on the way to the spawning grounds. This means there will not be young salmon returning the following spring.

If this continues year by year, with the salmon being illegally intercepted on their way to spawn, all the dreams of the Minister of Fisheries to enhance the number of salmon and to ensure that our children and grandchildren have the same pleasure and awe of nature in watching the salmon, will be for naught.

Because of greed, in order to make a dollar or $5, people are destroying a living resource unique in this world. The salmon has one of the most unique Canadian identities of any animal, bird or fish in Canada. Natives on the west coast regard it as a supernatural being because of the strength and endurance required by the salmon to reach its spawning ground; leaping over falls and travelling great distances. It is almost a miracle that the fish reaches the spawning ground. We want to ensure that the fish do spawn and that we have a return of the salmon each year.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) mentioned some of the concerns of the west coast fishermen regarding some recent developments. I am not trying to deal only with the west coast, but that is the area I know best.

As the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich mentioned, there is concern about the two licence system. In reply to a question by the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. Pearsall), the minister stated there would be a one year moratorium. The two licence system will not be introduced in 1977. He went on to say that in addition to looking at the two licence system for the inside and outside fishery, he would look at the whole question of licensing. He will look at the dual fishing question, the combination boats, the gill netters and the patrollers, at the whole question of the conversion of one type of gear to another.

One of the great benefits the minister could bring the west coast fishery is something he announced in the maritimes a few months ago. He said he would set up a fishery advisory council. I hope there will be one for each coast, and perhaps one for the freshwater fishermen in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and so on.

On the west coast there are fishermen who are union members, sports fishermen, trollers, gill netters, seiners, and the Native Brotherhood of Fishermen. There is a great deal of gear and a lot of fishing. These fishermen, including the sport fishermen, would appreciate an advisory council so that they could sit down with members of the minister's department in Vancouver, Nanaimo or wherever to discuss fisheries' policy.

Many fishermen feel the department makes decisions in isolation, and hands down decisions from on high. I realize that is an incorrect assessment. However, in order for the fishermen to feel part of the system there should be consultations every three or four months. The fishermen would feel much better if they knew what was taking place. They would feel they had at least a consultative role in the making of decisions, and I think the hon. gentleman's action would be warmly applauded.

● (2050)

As I began my remarks I stated that the minister was already well thought of by fishermen. My contribution is intended to make him even more popular. I believe the amendments he has brought forward are good for the fishermen and that they will be suported by all hon. members.

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I think Bill C-38 will find its proper forum in the standing committee and I, for one, am anxious to see that it gets there. I shall therefore be brief, though there are two things I want to say.

The amendments have been around for a long time, if my information is correct. I join with the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) in deploring the length of time it has taken to get thus far. I thought at one time the reason for the delay in first and second reading was that draft amendments were being considered by the various men and women in the provinces upon whom their enactment would have a profound effect. I thought that was the case, because when I was in British Columbia last August the field men who were responsible for the administration of this legislation had the draft amendments in their hands. In my view that was a good reason for the delay. I support that kind of consultation. I am in favour of the people in the field being given an opportunity to consider what the government has in mind. However, visiting the Atlantic provinces not long ago I was disappointed to find that the counterparts of the British Columbia field men had never heard of these amendments. This distressed me.

I do not have to champion the cause of British Columbia or of New Brunswick or of Newfoundland, but it would seem to me that if provincial public servants in British Columbia had the opportunity as long ago as August, 1976, and possibly even before that, to make some input into these amendments, surely their counterparts in all the other provinces concerned should have had an equal opportunity. Thus, when I find that this opportunity may not have been available in all the provinces—I say "may not" because it is possible that my information may be inaccurate—I am somewhat disturbed. Surely, of all pieces of legislation this is one which should be subject to the consultative process since, in many cases, it will be enforced by provincial public servants.

The minister has spoken of a meeting in the first week in June. I believe the official name of the group is the Council of Resource and Environment Ministers. The minister, in the course of his opening speech, intimated he had received correspondence from some of his provincial counterparts expressing reservations about portions of this legislation. I understand that he has been urged to put off second reading until the council to which I have referred has had an opportunity to discuss the matter with him at that meeting in June. I do not think this is a terribly important consideration if the minister would agree that the provincial representatives on that council could appear before the committee so that the committee would have the benefit of hearing an expression of the reservations which the minister's provincial counterparts might have in mind.

I understand there are two general groups in the council. There are the representatives of provinces which make use of this legislation as their main anti-pollution law. Then there are others whose provinces have their own legislation, or which operate independently of the Fisheries Act. The real issue here is whether the legislation, either factually or perceptually, encroaches on the area of authority which the provinces have traditionally considered to be theirs in terms of the environment. This certainly appears to be the feeling of a number of the Atlantic provinces, and the same may be the case in British Columbia. This is the issue with which, I fear, we must come to grips.

A great deal of the authority in the areas of water and air pollution control which historically has belonged to the provinces is now, apparently, being assumed by the federal government through the medium of the Fisheries Act. There is no question in my mind that if one reads this bill and gives it a liberal interpretation, the provinces which are concerned about encroachment on their authority have real reason to be concerned. When, for example, one sees words like "water intake", "ditch", "channel" and so on, and when the bill starts talking about municipalities as polluters, or municipalities being creatures of the provinces, I can appreciate provincial concern in this area.

If there is one field in which I do not want to see confrontation between the federal government and the provinces it is that of the environment. It is the one area in which we must work in close concert if our efforts are to be successful, and that is why I hope the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry will, at an early meeting, deal with what I consider to be the key issue raised by this bill.

I echo what was said by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson). The government has an unhappy record when it comes to legislating by regulation. I hope the committee will have an opportunity to consider the regulations, or at least their intent. I also hope we may hear from officials of the environmental protection service, if they give evidence, as to the manner in which they intend to enforce the regulations.

With respect to poachers, the minister said, virtually, that we had been licensing poachers; instead of preventing poaching, we have said to a potential poacher, "All right, if you want to go ahead and poach, this is what it will cost you if you get caught; it is a cost of doing business, the same as your boat, your flashlight, or whatever else you use."

There is no sense in the members of this House deploring what the various courts have done when dealing with poachers. We all support the independence of the judiciary. That is surely part of our history of government. We also support the independence of the legislative arm. So if we are unhappy with what has happened with regard to poaching, let us not blame the judges; let us do something about it, but let us not wait from 1970 to 1977 to do something about it.

It was pointed out quite dramatically by my colleague from British Columbia, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, that when we had a $500 fine a poacher still made $500 profit because he had $1,000 worth of fish. But let us not blame the judges for that, let us blame ourselves. My colleague from Comox-Alberni says that he does not have enough inspectors in his riding but that he does not blame the minister. Well, I do blame the minister, and his predecessors, and the sins of his predecessors must be suffered by him. If I needed more inspectors in British Columbia, I know where I could get them; I would get them from all the planners in the Department of the Environment, these people whose raison d'être is to say no. That is all they do, and the reason they say no is that if they said yes they would have no reason to exist.

When somebody in the field in the riding represented by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has a good project, he has a whole body of guys to whom man-hours are allocated here in Ottawa to say no. If the hon. member wants more inspectors in Comox-Alberni he should blame the minister for not providing them. He should tell him to move them out of planning. We have more planners than we have inspectors, so send them to Comox-Alberni, or wherever it is in the country that we have a shortage of these people.

I wish to make a few comments on the protection of the habitat, the amendments dealing with power to examine and approve plans of government and private sector development. In other words, in Bill C-38 the minister proposes to enter into a field which again I believe many provinces have considered traditionally their domain. Maybe my fears about that will be alleviated in committee. When I hear the minister say that we must have the power to examine and approve these plans, I am not too concerned about that aspect; what I am concerned about is that now we have another level of bureaucracy with which public and private developers must deal. I have no worry or concern about a potential development that does not or should not proceed on the basis of its potential damage to the environment. What I worry about is a development that should otherwise proceed but cannot in the face of another level of bureaucracy. This creates a frustration that simply does not permit that municipality or that private company to proceed with a development which otherwise would not be hazardous to the environment.

We all think developers are great, big, huge companies, or great, big, huge municipalities. Many are very small companies or very small municipalities. I say to the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, that at committee stage I will look for some assurance from the Department of Fisheries and the Environment that their concern about protecting the environment is not going to be manifested in the creation of a bureaucracy that would impede otherwise acceptable developments. Small businessmen and small municipalities tell me that their main frustration is having to deal with too many levels of government and, within each level, with too many inspectors, too many forms, too many administrative tribunals. Therefore, when this bill comes to committee—and I hope it will come very soon—I think we should examine that aspect with great care.

With respect to water pollution the minister is, I believe, moving—and likely rightly, although I think we should talk about this to some extent in committee—to the "polluter pay" principle. I think that is what he said in his remarks earlier this afternoon. That is likely a good principle. I am concerned with the identification of the polluter. If he is identifiable, then likely the principle that he should pay is a good one. The minister has said, though, that inspectors designated by the department will have more power, and again I worry about those provinces that appoint their inspectors and those that do not. Again we have a division here, two types of provinces dealing differently with this particular part of the Fisheries Act.

With regard to offshore pollution, I think the minister said that 80 per cent of such pollution comes from land. I am not terribly impressed by figures. I ask, 80 per cent of what kind of pollution? How is it measured, and in what areas? If the major source of pollution in Kitimat, for example, comes not from the hazard of moving tankers through an apparently treacherous passage, fine, I agree with the minister we should be more concerned with pollution coming from the landward side. But I do not know on what he bases his figure of 80 per cent; I hope that we get into that in committee.

One thing in the minister's remarks which concerned me was his reference to our ineffectiveness to act against polluters as compared to that of the United States. He referred to a special agency. I presume he is referring to the environmental protection agency. I ask the minister to remember that we are comparing apples and oranges. That is an independent agency. If the minister is about to move the environmental protection service out of his department and create an agency out of it, that is a different thing. I think it is not very helpful to compare the U.S. situation with our own when we are dealing in the U.S. with an independent agency and in Canada with a service in the department. I simply point that out gratuitously, Mr. Speaker, to the minister, because I do not think the comparison is particularly helpful in terms of this debate.

In summary, I look forward to this legislation moving into committee, though I am not anxious that it move with haste through committee. We sat around for a good number of years waiting for these amendments. I have a great respect for the integrity of my colleagues who serve on that committee. I think their determination is to have good, viable, enforceable legislation. Therefore I hope the minister looks forward to examination of this bill in some length and in some detail, with the benefit of the expertise of witnesses, particularly those who will help us in regard to this federal-provincial conflict which I think is very real.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, before making a few remarks on Bill C-38, I think all hon. members will join me first in extending congratulations to the minister who holds this important portfolio; he is noted for his qualifications, his tenaciousness and his determination to try and help this class of citizens, rich or poor, persevere in the practice of one of the oldest trades in the world; we now call them professional fishermen.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, fishing is regarded as an essential activity which is of prime importance for many reasons. You have only to think that more than 55,000 Canadians depend essentially on fishing for their living and 22,000 are in the fish processing and marketing industries. Furthermore, I think that the annual return of the fishing industry in the economy is over $1 billion; it should be added that exports account for half this figure.

In the Atlantic provinces as in other areas in eastern Quebec, three quarters of the towns and rural areas depend on fishing to a certain extent. It goes without saying that outside of social welfare, allowance, old age security and the like, agriculture and logging, that is the only source of livelihood for the many Canadians and fishermen living in those areas.

Mr. Speaker, I must add that on the west coast fisheries are also very useful but it must be said that the fishing industry there is of relatively little importance to the prosperous economy of British Columbia. On the other hand, on the east coast, of which I am one of the representatives, the situation is different in that fishing, whether we like it or not, is of almost incalculable importance. In fact, that is the part of Canada where the federal government must increase supervision, particularly off the shore of Halifax and St. John's, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and in the North Atlantic, rather than in western coastal waters. One can readily claim, Mr. Speaker, that fishing is not only a way of life or one occupation among others for coastal communities in Canada, but that it is, to my mind, the only means of livelihood, if not the only possible way of life for most of them. In Canada, let us recognize it, our fishing resources are being threatened and it is now more than high time our governments attend to rebuilding our fishing stocks; otherwise, we will find ourselves at some point in time without those invaluable resources.

A quick look at Bill C-38 reveals, Mr. Speaker, that it stipulates that in the future, persons may be designated as fishery officers, as meant by the act, and even classes of persons deemed qualified to act in that capacity.

Those last amendments to the Criminal Code and the one proposed in clause 20 will in effect give fishery officers the powers of peace officers.

Although in general agreement with Bill C-38's provisions, I would like to call the minister's attention to certain discrepancies. It is very well to refer to environment and conservation, but an advertisement campaign would be needed to inform the public at large, from grade school to all spheres of society. It should promote conservation, and above all the love and respect for nature and everything that contributes to the beauty of one's area, province and country.

The time is over when the sea's biological resources were considered inexhaustible. In 1968, 42 per cent of the world's fish stock was caught and for the first time in 1969, there was a reduction in year-to-year world landings. There is no doubt in my view that conservation prompted the government to introduce such a bill, because it is a fact that fishery products, as any other goods, are subject to the law of diminishing returns. For that reason calls have been heard in past years against free deep sea 'fishing, which had been the rule heretofore.

Considering the current situation of fishery resources, clearly absolute freedom in deep waters is no longer in order, especially since new production techniques have brought a revolution in various traditional forms. We need only remember that the sailor-fisherman used to be the main factor of production. Nowadays, highly sophisticated fishing ships, gear and techniques have come to the fore. It is therefore urgent that the government take regulatory measures to prevent the serious economic dangers now facing us.

Mr. Speaker, Canada has the second longest seacoast in the world. It can even be called the longest, if we also consider the Arctic of course. Moreover, the continental shelf of our country is quite large and includes important resources. It is the second largest in the world and makes up a surface equal to 40 per cent of the territory.

Off the west coast, the continental shelf is rather narrow, I agree, but in the eastern area it extends as far as 400 miles in the Grand Banks area. Its coastal waters contain important fishery reserves, particularly in the Grand Banks to the east of Newfoundland. The latter is no doubt highly essential for the coastal provinces of Canada, both socially and economically. Those are, Mr. Speaker, a few reasons why the federal government should keep on introducing measures to have an ever increasing control over our coastal waters.

It is more and more urgent that the government take serious measures to preserve the stocks and prevent Canadian fishermen from being endangered by those who traditionally fish not far from the Canadian coast and have huge fleets and vessels which, for all practical purposes, take the daily bread away from Canadian fishermen along the east and the west coasts of our country.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that Bill C-38 will meet our wishes and that all those who earn a living from that noble occupation will not have to face disappointment and at last will see better days.

[English]

Mr. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words on the bill. I will keep my remarks brief because there are other people on both sides of this House who want to make comments. It is important to tell the minister, on behalf of the east coast, that we appreciate the measures brought forward in this bill. I want to echo the words of my colleague, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson), who generally congratulated the minister on the job he is doing in his portfolio. Certainly the people in the east, and particularly in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador, are cognizant of the policy measures he has brought forward while he has been the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. That has not gone unnoticed in the province, and we appreciate what the minister is doing in the field of fisheries because more and more the Newfoundland economy must depend on that particular resource.

• (2120)

I am glad to see my member of parliament entering the Chamber because I want to make him aware of the problems on the east coast. These measures to toughen up pollution laws are very important. The fishery in Newfoundland is the backbone of the economy there and will remain so. If we are to protect that renewable resource, then certainly we must bring in measures which are tough enough to deal with the non-renewable resources as they are transported over that marine habitat. I think it is a good idea to broaden the terms of the bill to include the habitat as well as the fish. Also, the tougher measures on clean-up are certainly a welcome addition to the legislation as it exists at the present time. However, I want to draw attention to two other aspects of the bill which I think are important. One is the amendment with regard to trawler fishing.

There is an inherent conflict between the offshore fishery and the inshore fishery, and keeping seiners and trawlers outside a certain limit gives inshore fishermen breathing space to harvest their share of the resource.

From time to time the minister has given firm commitments to the inshore fishery. This amendment shows that he certainly meant what he said, and I welcome that. There are trawlers which are now interrupting the fishing of inshore fishermen in my area and, I am sure, all over the province and, indeed, throughout eastern Canada. This amendment will certainly help them and will cut down on the conflict between offshore and inshore fishermen.

Another point I want to draw attention to—and my colleague, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni also referred to it—is the amendment which would give fisheries officers the authority of peace officers as set out in the Criminal Code of Canada. Last spring the sealing operation was a topic which did not go unnoticed in the House of Commons or across this country. Unfortunately, much misinformation has been disseminated with regard to that industry, and it is going to be difficult to turn the tide. I think that those journalists who went to St. Anthony this year, who looked, and who bothered to find out the facts, wrote the truth, and I think the tide is now turning in favour of the sealing industry in the province. Newfoundlanders want to earn a living. They must have the income which comes from that particular lucrative hunt to supplement their yearly incomes, and it is entirely necessary that it be kept going. The methods used are the most humane that can be devised.

It is a myth that the seal is in danger of extinction. The quota is well within limits. There is a harvestable quota every year, and certainly there will be one next year as well. Phony conservationists such as Mr. Davies, and other organizations which took part in protesting the seal hunt, are starting to be known for what they are. Bona fide conservationists in this country, people in legitimate humane societies, are showing them up for what they are because these phonies call into question the whole of the humane movement in this country.

On the ice this year a number of people interfered with the seal hunt, and it was impossible to enforce the Criminal Code even though seal pelts were taken from sealers and thrown into the water, and even though clubs were taken and thrown away. In other words, these people were interfering with sealers in the course of carrying out their work, and it was impossible to lay any charges against them. RCMP officers were eventually on the ice, but not when they were really needed, and this amendment to make fisheries officers peace officers will be a step in the right direction in dealing with people who insist on interrupting bona fide fishermen in the course of their work. That certainly is a welcome amendment to my part of the country.

I want to make my own contribution to the Fisheries Act, in conjunction with the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). The hon. member spoke in this debate this afternoon. He referred to the amendment which we will be moving jointly. A petition which we have drawn up is now being circulated in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador, and already we have thousands of signatures to that petition. I want to put on the record what the petition says, and repeat that when this bill comes before the committee we intend to move a further amendment to the Fisheries Act to incorporate the principle of that petition in that act. The petition is as follows:

THAT greater protection be given through law to sealers by amending the Fisheries Act and regulations.

THAT all ways and means of tightening the Fisheries Act and sealing regulations to give adequate support and protection to sealers be explored.

WHEREFOR it would be an offence for any person in any vehicle or aircraft or boat to come within a defined sealing area without a permit from the Minister of Fisheries, and further that it would be an offence to take or destroy property or otherwise to interfere with a sealer or sealing ship in the course of their working during the sealing season.

That petition is going to be presented to this House very shortly. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, other members of parliament from Newfoundland, and I, have distributed this petition, and we are hoping for thousands of names so that we can let this House know exactly how important this issue is in our province. Thereafter we intend to move an amendment to the Fisheries Act so that next year proper protection can be given to those people in the legitimate pursuit of their livelihood, and so that we can take appropriate action against those phony conservationists who destroy the reputation of hard working people in a cause which is entirely questionable.

I want to conclude my remarks by congratulating once again the minister for bringing forward these amendments, and to say to him that his efforts have not gone unnoticed by the people on the east coast. They are very grateful for the policy he has brought forward, beginning with the 200-mile limit. Of course there have been other measures which the minister has brought before the House as well.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, at this stage it is very difficult to be anything but repetitive. I regret very much that I find myself in this position. However, there are some characteristics of the comments which have been made which leave room for expansion and for emphasis to be placed upon the distribution of problems throughout Canada as they have existed in the fishing industry.

I am very disappointed that there has not been an adequate force of people available as enforcement officers for the fishing regulations as they apply to salmon in the fresh waters of New Brunswick. I am sure the minister is aware of the problem which exists. It has been mentioned many times in this House. It has been mentioned by the press of New Brunswick, and it has been very clearly emphasized that it is indeed a cynical and unlawful group which persistently, habitually, and for economic gain poach salmon in the streams of New Brunswick. They have challenged the law enforcement body of the department. They have mocked that body. They have made it impossible for law enforcement to exist.

It was mentioned today that there was a 50 mile portion of stream for one man to look after in Newfoundland. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe mentioned this. There are many remote streams in many parts of the Atlantic area which are rarely if ever seen as far as supervision of the salmon population is concerned.

● (2130)

In my memory this particular stream abounded with fish. The climax has been long in coming, but evident as it approached. At one time in the Saint John River and the Miramichi River permits were given for nets. They were an integral part of the land grant along those streams, part of the livelihood, the food supply of those who first settled there. The nets were allowed to be put in place on an unlimited basis initially, a regulated basis at a later date, and were removed totally some years ago. Now they are only allowed to net salmon in the Bay of Fundy. The population in the Saint John River has been declining for a long time; it did not receive adequate attention at an early enough date.

I am sure the minister is aware that poaching in the Toiboque River became such a problem that last season the river had to be closed. This was a serious detriment to those people who depended on sports fishing for their livelihood. It is a challenge to the enforcement capability of government. It was found wanting. When the government admits its incapability by closing the stream because it cannot control it, that is indicative of laxity in the administration of existing legislation.

I hope this new legislation will give more strength to the enforcement group and that the minister will find some means to bring things under control. In the control of human society we have found reasons to take extra measures in case of emergency. We find ourselves with respect to the salmon streams of the Atlantic provinces and apparently also in the ocean on the west coast, in a position of emergency. Whatever measures should be taken must be taken. Wherever manpower can be found it must be utilized to put lawless people out of business. They rank with the rustlers of the past.

The salmon enhancement program for the Atlantic area needs additional attention, as was mentioned by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse). We have not followed the example of other jurisdictions. We impeded the progress of salmon upstream when there were hydro developments in the Atlantic area. When this was done in Scandinavia, spawning grounds were developed, and stream mouths were filled with gravel or whatever was necessary to create the spawning area that had been taken away by virtue of the construction of a dam on the stream. We have not done this. We have actually reduced the number of young salmon being hatched in our federal hatcheries.

There was a time when the hatchery next door to my home produced over a million salmon a year. The count is seriously down relative to the efforts made in the 1920's—not the 1940's, 1950's or 1960's but in the 1920's—to enlarge the salmon population of our streams. We have cut back in this regard. One hatchery has been closed, and the capacity of others has been reduced. The money voted for hatchery operations has been reduced to the point that supervisors are wondering how they will be able to operate their premises even with the reduced number of fish assigned to them. This is indicative of knowing about a problem but not putting any real effort into correcting it.

I want to thank the minister for the position he has taken in respect of the proposed Eastport refinery and the hazards to the environment had an oil refinery been built there. I hope the measures he is prepared to take will prohibit any such construction.

Earlier in the session I mentioned that a modern, up-to-date, and accurate chart of the waters of Head Harbour Passage and the adjoining areas through which the oil tankers would have to pass, is not available. I am happy to learn that a survey is now in progress which will chart those waters and give the department a strong case to present to anybody who might be concerned about construction of the refinery.

One of the problems that has arisen from the restrictive licensing which the department has introduced is that communities on the Atlantic coast find themselves with only one source of livelihood by virtue of their geography, namely, fishing. Licensing has been restrictive, quotas imposed, and the seasons shortened, and these people have found themselves with a declining standard of living.

It had been traditional in the fishing areas of Canada, as it had been in the agricultural areas, that the family of a fisherman might wish to fish, as the family of the farmer in the past had wished to farm. There is no longer any possibility that this can take place. Within the last few weeks I wrote to the minister about the plight of one of these people, asking that he be granted the licence he had requested. By virtue of a change in the boats in the area, particularly the seiners, by the addition of refrigeration, the carriers who used to service the seiners to carry their fish to market were out of a job. A 70-foot boat is a major investment. This man who had one now has nothing for it to do. A lifetime investment is tied up to the dock, and there it will remain.

This is the kind of regulation of the fishing industry about which previous members have spoken. Those working at a desk adjoining a marble corridor in Ottawa have no conception of the social impact of the denial of permission to make a living in the traditional way in which that family has lived for generations. Who in this House would sit quietly while a 70-foot boat rotted out the rest of its life tied up to a pier, because of regulations imposed upon the fishing community? There is a social responsibility on the department to conserve the stocks, but there is also a social responsibility to do it in a way whereby people who have had the habit of fishing those stocks, do not starve.

A number of fishermen along the coast of the Atlantic area have been denied more than one licence, yet for generations they might have fished lobsters in the fall, and fished handline in the summer. They might have worked in three or four of the fisheries in the area. Today, if by any chance they have failed to renew a licence for the fishery in which they had by habit participated, they find they can no longer re-establish themselves. This has created hardship. If they miss the deadline for the renewal of the licence they held—they find they no longer have a licence.

Social consideration is essential. This applies to pollution as well. Many hard remarks have been made about those who have polluted freshwater and salt water, but what some people have failed to recognize is that all the laws of the land perhaps have been adhered to, and it is only as a result of changing laws that we now call pollution, "pollution". It is only with expanding industry that the capability of a particular stream is over-stressed by added pollution.

I was rather impressed by an environmentalist in British Columbia who was a senior member of the department of the environment there. He said dogmatically that, although we are concerned about the environment, we must recognize nature can absorb a certain amount of pollution, and that if pollution is below critical levels, no measurable damage will be done to the environment, or to human beings or animals living in it. He said his department was monitoring the level of certain additives found in the waters of British Columbia. If those additives were within certain limits, the department of the environment in B.C. was not particularly worried. They worried when the level of pollution exceeded the tolerance of the environment, that is to say, the ability of any part of the environment, whether air or water, to absorb the pollution without measurably harmful effects.

We have not recognized the social responsibility shown by some who discharge pollutants into the environment. As the minister mentioned, some industries have traditionally operated at a particular location. The pollution resulting from such operations was within the tolerance limits suggested by that B.C. official as acceptable. The level of pollution was tolerable, until that pollution was supplemented with other pollution coming from some other point within that ecosystem.

Many polluters, be they small communities on river banks or small industrial concerns, have not the financial strength to finance the acquisition of anti-pollution equipment. Therefore the correction of this situation becomes a social responsibility. The more quickly the government recognizes that it must provide money to those who lack the means to install anti-pollution equipment, the more effective its environmental efforts and anti-pollution programs will be. What is more, they will be more acceptable to the general public, for if the government puts its money where its mouth is, so to speak, society will look with a keener eye at the requirements of the department.

As the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) said, the bill we are discussing has, so to speak, ruffled a few feathers in the provincial structure of this country; for that reason it is not timely. We have heard across this nation provincial governments complaining of the federal government's intrusion into their domain. This bill adds to that intrusion. We have in this country a vast duplication of services.

Perhaps, by way of example, I could mention something the mayor of Toronto said some time ago. Discussing a certain program with members of this House, the mayor mentioned a certain federal government program relating to the conduct of the city of Toronto. He said that there were moneys available to the city of Toronto under federal programs. He went on to say that the city of Toronto and its sister municipalities had negotiated with the federal government for several years with respect to the policy about which he was talking, but at the conclusion of seven years no agreement had been finalized in the field of housing.

In this country we find ourselves beset with municipal, provincial, and federal regulations, and it is almost impossible to cut through this maze of red tape. One finds that when one has cleared the hurdle of one department, one must deal with another department which says, "No, you cannot do this." There is no longer a single voice in the federal government which can answer our environmental concerns. The answering voice may be that of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) or of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc), or it may be that of the Department of Fisheries. Each may present a separate view and take a different direction. It is awfully difficult to correlate all these views. I wish all these people would sit down at a table and resolve this difficulty.

This bill is an intrusion into provincial rights. I join with the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot in saying, for goodness sake, let us bring all these people together around a table and simplify these procedures as best we can. Let us not intrude further on provincial rights concerning pollution controls. Such intrusion is becoming a habit with the department. Before the present minister was appointed to his portfolio, the provisions of the act which related to pollution in off-shore waters under the jurisdiction of Canadian pollution regulations overlapped the provisions of that act which controlled the environment of the shore. That act, in turn, overlapped the provisions of another act which controlled our land environment. All three acts overlapped, to some extent. Each act was administered separately. Mr. Speaker, we do not want this sort of thing. Let us bring all this pollution legislation under one package. Let us put the provinces in the position of being able to administer. This three or four tier interference with development is not what this country should have to endure.

I come now to the regulations which will be promulgated under this legislation. First, let me speak of a regulation of which I am sure the minister is unaware and the reason for which nobody has bothered to explain, which created great hardship. Those familiar with the fishery know that a fisherman is allowed to cure his own fish. He may put the fish in salt, or in brine, or smoke it, and so on; or, he must sell the fish to somebody else who will market it, cure it, or otherwise deal with it. Mr. Speaker, the minister has been most attentive today; perhaps he will pay close attention to what I am about to say.

Does the minister know that if I were a fisherman and filled my boat in one day with fish, I would not be permitted to hire help for cleaning and scaling that fish for treatment? I am not allowed, Sir, to hire help for cleaning and scaling that fish. Did the minister know this? Speaking of regulations, I wonder if the minister is aware of another regulation to which I shall now allude.

Not long ago an inspector of his department entered a processing plant of smallish size which was processing salt fish. The height of the ceiling over the tanks in which the fish were held was less than eight feet. The plant owner or manager was advised that he could clean his tanks but could not load them again until the height of the ceiling had been raised at least to eight feet. I made inquiries. The bacteria count was not the trouble; there was nothing about the fish to make it hazardous for human consumption. Apparently the inspector was about six foot six tall and had bumped his head on the ceiling. I can see no other explanation for his wanting the ceiling higher off the ground. Certainly ceiling height over the tanks had little to do with fish being soaked in brine. Apparently the inspector had invoked some regulatory authority. I cite this example, because this bill will provide officials with even greater regulatory powers.

Quite possibly the minister might not be aware of all the regulations. I suggest, in the case of this bill, that perhaps a codicil should be added. Any regulations made under this bill should be placed before the fisheries committee of the House of Commons for consideration and discussion before they descend with any hardship upon those who would be regulated. This would gain some publicity. I can assure hon. members that the little guy on the coast does not read the Canada Gazette which makes this official. He is only made aware of this by somebody dropping in to tell him that he is breaking regulation ZYX which was passed the day before yesterday, and something should be done about it.

● (2150)

All those who have spoken have made an important contribution. I am sure those who are interested in the fishing industry along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts will read with considerable interest the remarks of the minister, of the hon. member for South Shore, and of members from British Columbia and Newfoundland. I hope the minister will not only take careful note of those remarks but will go one step further.

The minister's predecessor created a precedent by permitting groups to come before him and the fisheries committee to present their problems and make recommendations. Those committee meetings at which organizations from British Columbia, New Brunswick and Newfoundland appeared were some of the most interesting and informative meetings that have been held under the jurisdiction of the minister in the five years it has been my privilege to be here.

Those meetings should become habit. It would benefit the direction of research, the minister, and the fishermen. It would create a better feeling between the fisherman and the minister and his officials. It would be a good will gesture to make this an annual event.

Various agricultural organizations appear before the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and his departmental officials on a regular basis, sometimes more than once a year. Why not the various fishing associations? I do not mean the industrialists who process, but the people from the shore. Why not permit them to appear before the minister so that he can understand the problems as they arise for them from day to day and year to year? We know they cannot all be resolved at once.

I hope the minister will do these two things: first, before applying the regulations place them before the committee and, second, on an annual basis have liaison with the people in the boats by allowing their delegations to appear before him and a committee of the House of Commons to consider the problems as they arise.

Mr. Jack Pearsall (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I am a man of few words. I appreciate the opportunity to speak in a debate on Bill C-38.

I have just returned from Williams Lake, British Columbia, in the heart of my constituency, where the British Columbia Wildlife Association held its 1977 convention. One of the key matters being discussed was Bill C-38. After three hectic days, they learned of the possibility of this bill being brought before the House. I assured them that my colleagues on both sides of the House would get this most important bill through the House and into committee.

I welcome the few minutes available to me to make that point. I wish to point out in particular that the British Columbia Wildlife Association were most emphatic that all British Columbia members should realize that this bill must get into committee as soon as possible. I sincerely hope it will be put to a vote this evening.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I must inform hon. members that, if the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I believe I can be very brief. I am encouraged by the support from all parties and by their excellent suggestions. I have made note of most of them.

I am quite willing to consider seriously the concerns that have been expressed, such as the matter of regulations. During the supper hour I checked to see if these could be produced easily. I was told that the absolutely final legal draft was not available, but the working drafts were. I think these will be useful to the committee members as they approach their study of the bill. Remembering the backbenchers, I thought these might be useful. I would like to try this as an experiment.

With regard to the provincial ministers, I made it clear I was going to discuss these matters, especially with the ministers of resources, in particular those concerned with environment. I am not at all opposed to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) that a representative or spokesman of the Council of Resource Ministers ought to appear before the committee.

My approach to this bill is that we should discuss and try to improve it. I am sure, with the suggestions that have been made, that this is possible. Unless there are some legal problems I will welcome the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey) and the suggestion of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) dealing with seals.

Unless members opposite want me to continue at length, I will leave this as it is. I again commend the bill to the House. I approach the committee discussion with a completely open mind. I think we can do good work putting this bill through.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Following the outburst of the government House leader during the course of today's question period, I just want to observe that parliament can work, particularly in his absence.

Mr. Goodale: Unfair.

Mr. MacFarlane: That's rude.

Mr. Paproski: You say what you like and we'll say what we like.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has the floor.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I do not want to suggest it was because of his absence that it worked. I just point out that it worked in his absence. I say very directly that an examination of the legislative program since Christmas will indicate that this parliament has dealt fairly and fully with legislation, and did so rather quickly. I was somewhat distressed at his outburst today during the course of the question period.

● (2200)

What I rose to do was to ask the parliamentary secretary whether we would be dealing with the Customs Tariff (C-55), the Excise Tax Act (C-54), and the Bretton Woods Agreements Act (C-18) in that order as announced for tomorrow.

Mr. Goodale: My understanding at the moment is that the order of business for tomorrow is as the hon. member has described it. If there is any change, he and the other House leaders will be informed at the earliest opportunity.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. To enable the House to proceed more quickly, I think it would not be asking the government leader too much to inform us as soon as possible—this evening would be best—of the matters that the government intends to introduce tomorrow because it is extremely important for the members to be informed of the intentions of the government more than one hour in advance.

We have given the proof of our co-operation today. We were informed last week that Bill C-38 would be debated today and we prepared ourselves accordingly. We can co-operate and the proof was given tonight. If the government could co-operate with us by informing us a few hours in advance of its intentions to discuss such or such a bill in the House, we could proceed more quickly and the government would have no cause to complain that legislation is sometimes delayed. That is not our fault.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to support this point of order and to request in all sincerity and all good faith that the government keep us informed of the business it will introduce the following day so that we may proceed with some efficiency in the House.

[English]

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner).]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I suggest to the hon. member that he has made his point.

Mr. Goodale: I do not intend to take up much time in replying to the point which has been made, but I think I should say that in the negotiations which go on among the House leaders every effort is made to give as much information concerning the business of the House as possible so that hon. members can prepare themselves. On Thursday of last week, following the question period, the acting government House leader gave a rather lengthy list of business with which we hoped to proceed in an orderly way throughout the course of the present week. So far, we are right on schedule with that order of business announced last Thursday, as I indicated in my answer to the House leader for the official opposition. We are making good progress, and I hope it continues.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY—POSSIBILITY OF INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY TO AVOID FUTURE HIGH LEVELS OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the debate tonight arises out of the unsatisfactory answer given to a question put by myself to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on March 16 as it appears in Hansard at page 4029. On that day I asked the Prime Minister the following:

> As we now, unfortunately, live with an unemployment figure of one million, would the Prime Minister tell us whether any steps have been taken at least to evolve an industrial strategy for Canada to ensure that in the coming years this chronic type of unemployment will not continue?

The Prime Minister startled the House by replying:

> The House has heard on different occasions statements on elements of our industrial strategy by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I think one of the reasons the country is in difficulty is that Canadians are living beyond their means.

I would point out that this is a typical response of the Prime Minister and that it demonstrates the total lack of understanding he has concerning the economic morass into which the country has slumped.

If we are to look at the single, most important reason why we have regional divisions in the country, yes, even the belief in certain areas of the country that separatism would be better than remaining within Confederation, we should look first and foremost to the economic condition that the government has allowed the country to get into. This was borne out, I point out, by the Toronto Star survey which appeared last Saturday which outlined the fact that in Quebec, for example, the number one concern is not what the Prime Minister has misrepresented it to be. The number one concern in Quebec is the economic condition of that country and the fact that people are going without jobs in that country. I say that is due to the lack of an industrial strategy on the part of this government.

That is the essence of the question. If we accept the fact that we do have an unsatisfactory economic situation in Canada today, then what is the government going to do in the next few years to develop an industrial strategy which will ensure that we will get out of the present morass? There is nothing new about this question, Mr. Speaker. For example, in September, 1970, the Economic Council of Canada, in a booklet entitled "Performance and Potential", dealing with the period from mid-1950 to mid-1970, outlined to the government, chapter by chapter, what it should do to ensure that our economy would not slip as it has. At page 76 of the report the following statement appears:

> We feel strongly that there should be an accelerated movement towards the evolving practice of planning further ahead—say, over five-year periods—by governments, business and other groups, and jointly with other countries in international organizations.

At page 79 of the report it is stated:

> It is becoming almost trite to suggest that there continues to be a requirement in Canada for greater co-ordination of policies—within governments, between governments, and between the public and private sectors.

I am simply saying that it is the government's failure to adopt this economic course which has led to the feeling of disintegration which exists in this country. In short, many people in the country are saying, "We have had enough; we want out". I think it is time the government countenanced that it has the heaviest responsibility of any body in this country for the state we are in.

Dealing again with the report of the Economic Council of Canada, at page 84 the council states:

> A major concern of this report is that the Canadian economy has fallen significantly below its potential. A quick return to potential is not feasible. But the central challenge is to begin to close the gap between actual and potential performance as soon as possible—to begin to reduce the significant human and economic costs of high unemployment—bearing in mind the need to maintain reasonable stability of prices. It is important to recognize that the present degree of slack, reflected partly in high unemployment, will tend to persist and grow until an annual rate of real growth in excess of 5 per cent is resumed.

Unfortunately conditions have deteriorated since 1970. Here are the facts, Mr. Speaker. Since 1970 we have had 65 per cent inflation. Unemployment has jumped from below 5 per cent to the present 8.3 per cent, with one million people out of work. In 1970 we had a budgetary surplus of $392 million. This year it is projected that we will have a budgetary deficit—I emphasize deficit—of $7.2 billion. Even that deficit of $7.2 billion was not understood by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) until he went to a committee of this House and was told by his officials that in truth he had in his budget speech outlined a $7.2 billion deficit.

Our current account trade deficit has gone from a surplus in 1970 of $1.1 billion to a deficit of $4.9 billion in each of the last two years, and of course, as we know, real growth in the country has continued to slump. That is why I once again put to the Prime Minister the question: what is the Prime Minister going to offer this country in the form of an indusrial strategy to ensure that, at least by the mid-1980's, we are not in a still worse position than we are in today?

As we all know, we have been borrowing heavily, both externally and in the domestic market, to cover deficits run up by governments in Canada. When I asked the Minister of Finance on May 3 in the committee when he saw us getting a balanced budget, he replied: "I don't know that I could project an early date for that".

● (2210)

Then he added:

> . . . I do not anticipate it will be easy to get that deficit down very quickly.

In short, if there were a proper industrial strategy and if there were proper direction from the federal government, I can assure you we could return to a sounder economic base, with relatively low unemployment and relatively low inflation. Nothing would ensure the continuation of Confederation and the death of separatism in this country more quickly than to give people the real growth they are entitled to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is good to see the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) in such form. I am sorry to see his form is carried away by his rhetoric when he said, at least once in his speech, that separatism is better than staying and fighting within Canada for our economic order.

Mr. Stevens: Not true.

Mr. Poulin: He said separatism is better, and I heard him say separatism is better.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We heard you say that Cape Breton is part of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Poulin: This is a man who put himself forward in his campaign as being the leader of his party. He went on to say in his destructive speech—and there was nothing constructive offered whatever—that those people of Quebec, those people "in that country"—

Mr. Goodale: Those were his words.

Mr. Poulin: Mr. Speaker, those are his words. He said, "in that country". A man who would say separatism is better, and those people in that country would have some economic means which may be better than living within Canada and fighting for our better economic well-being—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Poulin: This man has been designated by his party as being their chief financial critic. For this man to say those words in this House, during the late show and at the time of adjournment, is a shameful thing to suggest in the parliament of this country. It is shameful to suggest that "in that country" they may be economically better to go their own way. I hope I never hear it again. I hope I never hear that kind of statement made.

All of us in this parliament are going to be united in an attempt to find better economic ways and means. The hon. member for York-Simcoe would have us believe that this is a phenomenon that is particular only to Canada, not knowing the world is suffering from these same kinds of conditions. We are working hard and accomplishing much. We are not going to accomplish anything by suggesting separatism may be better under any circumstance for any people in any part of this country. I think it is a wrong thing, Mr. Speaker, to have that in any part of a speech from a parliamentarian.

Mr. Stevens: That was not said, and you know it.

Mr. Poulin: The main thrust of our economic policy in this country, through wage and price controls, is to bring under some semblance of order, rapid inflation.

Mr. Stevens: You caused the inflation.

Mr. Poulin: The program is beginning to work. We hear screams from the other side because they are sorry it is beginning to work. Finally the wheels are beginning to hold and we are making some progress.

Mr. Stevens: Where have you been?

Mr. Poulin: Rapid increases in wages and prices in this country have been one of the most destructive things to our economic growth. We all know that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary. His allotted time has expired.

CONFEDERATION—POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING THIRD ORGANIZATION CONCERNED WITH UNITY

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, thank you for interrupting the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Poulin). I want to address myself to a response I received from the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), the Acting Prime Minister, last Friday, with respect to the establishment of a third bureaucracy in regard to the whole issue of national unity.

The remarks of my distinguished colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), are very appropriate about some of the underlying causes of the feeling of separation in the province of Quebec. The gross failure of the government to deal with some of the fundamental economic issues in this country, and particularly in the area of Quebec, have been brought to our attention very, very vividly by the latest Toronto Star poll. Notwithstanding the rhetoric we hear from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and others in the government, the fact of the matter is that the underlying feeling in the province of Quebec is that they are not receiving a fair and reasonable deal under this particular government.

Considerable speculation has arisen from statements made by the Prime Minister himself in his press conference with respect to the role and function of Mr. Jean-Luc Pepin in a national unity commission. The Prime Minister referred to the possibility of Mr. Pepin fulfilling a function in some new type of national unity commission. It is to be a high profile commission. The Acting Prime Minister was unaware of any possible appointment, so I assumed from that there is absolutely no danger that there will be any further bureaucracy brought into play with respect to this particular commission. If that is the case, and if the parliamentary secretary can confirm that there is not another commission being contemplated by the government, then in a sense that is a very welcome announcement, because the Prime Minister has been creating new bureaucracies with respect to the question of national unity at breakneck speed.

I suggest that bureaucracies are substitutes for constructive proposals. An attempt is being made to submerge the whole debate into a number of agencies and sub-agencies studying the effects and consequences of separation of the province of Quebec from Canada. I suggest that this is not a matter of priority to the government, and I have been urging the Prime Minister to give us some positive, constructive proposals with respect to the problem, rather than indulging in rhetoric from one part of the country to the other. I pointed this out on an earlier occasion, but the Prime Minister has not yet made any speech on the matter of national unity in the House of Commons.

I suggest that this is the place for the Prime Minister to debate, with other elected representatives from across Canada, his proposals, if he has any, to keep the country together. I suggest that he should not be creating new bureaucracies every time he opens his mouth in an effort to recycle Jean-Luc Pepin, a defeated Liberal cabinet minister, who is all of a sudden to be elevated to the capacity of giving leadership, when we know he will be nothing more than an adjunct to the Liberal Party of Canada. I think it is disgraceful for the Prime Minister, at a time of great difficulty in our country, to contemplate bringing forward a defeated Liberal cabinet minister and to give him a function as an adjunct to the Prime Minister's office, a high profile function, at the expense of the Canadian people. We know Mr. Pepin is nothing more than a political arm of the Prime Minister and of the Liberal party.

There have been no definitions of the roles of the bureaucracies which have been created. What does the federal-provincial relations office do? On Friday we referred to a speech by Mr. Gordon Robertson who, during the life of this government under our present Prime Minister, has been in charge of the federal-provincial relations office. I got the impression that in the speech he made last week there was an attempt to get back into the dialogue, yet the content of his speech was rejected and repudiated by the Acting Prime Minister, who said Mr. Robertson did not state government policy in anything he said in those remarks. This man is clearly involved with federal-provincial relations. Apparently he has been in charge of that whole process for the last six or seven years. Now apparently he is being phased out by the creation of the Tellier bureaucracy within the Prime Minister's office and the Privy Council office, which is involved in the development of policies and studies with respect to Quebec, and now we hear that there is a possibility of a new national unity commission.

I was amused at a Canadian Press interview with Mr. Pepin which was reported in part in the Ottawa Citizen of April 30, 1977, as follows:

"Too many people think that to work for national unity you have to specialize in constitutional law."

The position as head of a high-profile national unity commission has been the one most often linked to him in recent days. But he confesses the idea worries him somewhat.

● (2220)

In an article in the Ottawa Citizen of April 30 John Gray writes that Mr. Pepin said the Prime Minister wanted him to do for national unity much the same job as he has done at the Anti-Inflation Board for the fight against inflation. I can only suggest that if that is the case we are in serious difficulty indeed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am rather intrigued by the newly discovered interest of my hon. friend and his Conservative colleagues in national unity. Their sudden recognition of the significance of issues affecting Confederation and Canadian unity is revealing in its timing. It smacks more of expediency than substance or conviction.

I am also intrigued by the new role my hon. friend has assumed in recent months in the House of Commons. I did not notice this role in his early days in the Chamber when he and I were freshmen here. The role he has assumed in recent weeks is reflected to a certain extent in his remarks tonight and on other occasions. I seems to be that of a hatchetman, either with respect to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or Mr. Pepin, or whomsoever is under discussion at any given moment. It used to be that he could be counted upon for positive and constructive contributions, but unfortunately that seems to be lacking recently.

With respect to the specific point raised during question period last Friday and repeated tonight, it should be emphasized that the notion of a so-called "third unity organization or bureaucracy" is a product of the hon. member's own question, or perhaps some misinterpretation that may have been reported in the press. There is nothing that I can find in Hansard to indicate that that is a government suggestion. Neither is there anything to be found in the transcript of the Prime Minister's news conference of April 28 to substantiate the point alleged tonight. During that news conference Mr. Pepin's position was discussed.

The Prime Minister indicated that Mr. Pepin is a distinguished Canadian who has made a tremendous contribution to the country for many years in many ways. It is obvious that the government, the Prime Minister, and I think Canadians generally, would value his continued participation in the federal arena. As the Prime Minister has indicated, some discussions have taken place, but there are no conclusions to report yet. I, for one, hope that Mr. Pepin will continue doing what he has done so well for so many years, that is, to keep on working very hard for Canada.

ENERGY—PROPOSED UPGRADING FACILITY FOR HEAVY OIL AT LLOYDMINSTER—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON FEASIBILITY REPORT

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my purpose in rising this evening is to obtain some elaboration on the question I posed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) on April 28 with respect to questions about the announcement of a consortium of 20 major oil companies to engage in the establishment of an upgrading facility for heavy oil in the Lloydminster region and the fact that an initial feasibility study had been submitted to the minister for consideration.

My purpose in questioning the minister on April 28 was to determine if his officials had an opportunity to examine the feasibility study and to report to the House what action the federal government has taken. In my view the minister was vague in his answer.

On May 9 a CP news story in the Edmonton Journal advised that new oil sands tax incentives were coming. It reported that the oil industry may soon get a look at new proposals for provincial and federal government royalties and taxes for oil sands. The news story said that the minister had made this remark in addressing the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

My purpose in posing the question was to try to ascertain what action had been taken. The minister somewhat deviated from the question by talking about a tar sands plant in the Fort McMurray region, and did not deal with the question of the heavy oil upgrading facility in any detail. As interested Canadians we are all concerned about the challenge of meeting our energy requirements. Day in and day out we see a greater importance placed upon the reserves and the heavy oil deposits in the Lloydminster region, and in the Wainwright and Kinsella areas of Alberta. The Ottawa Citizen of Wednesday, April 27, said in a headline, "Up to 16 billion barrels buried in Canadian fields. Lloydminster's vast belt of heavy crude may help to solve our energy problems." The article reads in part:

The heavy-oil deposits could make a significant contribution to Canada's energy requirements in future, but technological and marketing problems must be overcome,

A recent federal report . . . says the Lloydminster-type heavy oils are possibly Canada's best hope for expanding oil production in the next 10 to 15 years.

A headline in the Edmonton Journal of March 5, 1977, speaks of Lloydminster oil as being a key target. According to the article a heavy oil plant is being proposed. A tremendous amount of interest is being shown in this resource. I think the minister has failed to give a clear answer to the proposal advanced by the consortium of 20 companies for the establishment of a heavy oil upgrading facility. The proposal was submitted to the minister on January 31, 1977. Time is running out, Mr. Speaker. If this facility is to be in place by 1980, we need to know the ground rules, and some important issues ought to have been clarified by the end of the first quarter of 1977. That first quarter is behind us, and time marches on.

I point out that we are considering an important question. We cannot use this particular resource unless it is upgraded. The producers have indicated their interest and desire to spend risk capital on developing this important resource. They propose to establish a 100,000-barrels-a-day oil upgrading facility, modular in design to allow for future expansion. It is estimated that the facility will cost between $500 million and $700 million. It will be located in that particular area; the Hardisty terminal is close by. Further, there is every assurance that the current supply of 100,000 barrels per day of crude is available for the establishment of a viable and feasible facility.

The resources are there. We need the energy, but the major obstacle is that under existing royalty and tax structures, the project is not economically feasible, which means it is not feasible unless there is some modification. That point is the gist of the feasibility study which has been presented to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Basically, it contains two provisions. First, the government of Alberta will have to permit a processing allowance similar to that available with respect to natural gas, to be deducted from the value of the upgraded product. Second, the Government of Canada and the government of Alberta should jointly agree upon an increased capital cost allowance for the project. This is vital, since only with such a measure can the original investment and interest be paid back within seven or eight years after start up, this pay-back period being the condition to be agreed to before the project can be financed.

One may ask, what will be the ultimate cost to the taxpayers of Canada? If all the 100,000 barrels a day of heavy oil feedstock could be marketed without upgrading, the loss in taxes and royalties due to modifications made for the upgrading facility would be in the order of $546 million for Alberta and $399 million for the federal government, over 20 years. However, the proposed 100,000 barrels a day of heavy oil cannot be marketed without upgrading. In fact, more of the supply which would be directed to the upgrading facility would be diverted from other use, the result being not a loss in royalties and taxes, but a substantial gain—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member whose allotted time has expired.

• (2230)

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the presentation of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) and the fact that he did not make reference to the Quebec situation. Out of three opposition speakers on the "Late Show", he is the only one who did not mention the situation in Quebec. That is not my favourite subject. I am not obsessed by the situation in Quebec. I have not panicked yet, and I won't. I have heard so many experts on the Quebec situation in the past few days that I do not know if I am qualified to speak about it. In fact, I only reside in Quebec two or three days a week.

The province of Saskatchewan has important heavy oil resources. Currently, heavy crude petroleum represents about 70 per cent of the province's current productive capacity. Heavy crudes have been difficult to market in the past, hence the current interest in upgrading activity which would improve the marketability of the province's oil resources.

Upgrading heavy crudes removes the two main undesirable characteristics, namely, the low gravity and high sulphur. Once this is done the oil will be able to gain wider access to the domestic market. The present reliance on the seasonal demand of the asphalt market will be removed. Canadians will be provided with an additional source of crude supply to help meet the goal of self-reliance.

With these objectives and advantages in mind, there are at present at least two proposals for upgrading operations. Pacific Petroleums, with its partners, has proposed a 100,000 barrel a day facility to be located at Hardisty, Alberta. Husky Oil Limited has proposed a 50,000 barrel a day facility to be located at Lloydminster. Both proposals are in preliminary stages of discussion and examination of projected economics. Other proposals have also been raised. Preliminary economic evaluation work indicates that the economics are marginal at best based on current pricing. The cost estimates for a facility are in the order of hundreds of millions of dollars with no certainty in the present upgrading technology. Consequently the undertaking of an upgrading facility by either industry or government carries a considerable degree of risk.

The government is pleased with the initiative being taken by the various companies which are pursuing the upgrading option for development of our heavy crude oil resources. Officials are keeping in close touch with the companies on the various problems associated with this resource development. There are important questions of technology and crude oil price differentials involved, as well as fiscal arrangements, both federal and provincial, to be worked out for these multi-million dollar projects.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, but his allotted time has expired. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

SUPPORT FOR RECOMMENDATIONS IN HALL COMMISSION REPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this House commend the Hon. Emmett Hall for the work he has done and the recommendations he has made for retention of the Crowsnest Pass rates and direct the Minister of Transport, in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, to make a statement on motions as to his intentions with respect to the implementation of the recommendations of the Hall Commission and, further, to scrap the confidential report that recommends the ending of the Crowsnest Pass rates, in light of this repudiation of the inflexible, blanket user-pay concept in transportation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 such motion can be presented for debate in the House only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Paproski: Ralph Goodale said no.

SUGGESTED IMPLEMENTATION OF HALL COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS ON STATUTORY RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 similar in nature to the motion just moved. It, as well, is urgent and pressing and is in regard to the report of the Hall Commission tabled in this House yesterday which contains a recommendation that the statutory grain rates be retained and that the difference between the statutory rate and the cost of transporting grain be paid directly to the railways. If I may have the unanimous consent of the House, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That this House calls upon the government to immediately implement the recommendation of the Hall Commission on statutory rates.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such motion can be presented to the House for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Paproski: Ralph Goodale again said no.

PROPOSED FEASIBILITY STUDIES FOR NEW COAL MINES IN NOVA SCOTIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Since a privately financed international study group which included Canada's National Energy Board Chairman, Marshall Crowe, and Maurice Strong, Chairman of Petro-Canada, Canada's national oil company, who both were involved in this study, that study predicting that demand for oil in the non-communist world will probably overtake available supplies some time between 1985 and 1995, and possibly by 1981; since electricity costs in Nova Scotia, a province which is a large importer of oil, have increased about 100 per cent over a two year period; and since in April there were 14,476 active claimants on the unemployment insurance rolls in Cape Breton, and some 3,500 applications for jobs in the Cape Breton coal mines, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, along with Devco, immediately start feasibility studies for new mines in Donkin and New Victoria in Cape Breton county.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such a motion for debate. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TRANSPORT

IMPLEMENTATION OF HALL COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. In view of the tabling of the long-awaited Hall report yesterday, which will go down in history as the economic Magna Carta of western Canada, does the government intend to implement its recommendations before the calling of a general election?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the hon. member seriously expects me to report today on the government's position on a very, very lengthy piece of work. At this stage I would associate myself with at least part of the feelings of the hon. member opposite who said that Judge Hall should be commended for his very, very dedicated work to Canadians and his concerns for the west.

An hon. Member: Why didn't you support the motion?

Mr. Trudeau: Obviously, the motion was leaning toward the support of all the recommendations before we even read the report. Only members of the Tory party would want to support something before they read it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that these matters have been before Canadians and this parliament for over 40 years and the material and facts are so well known, will the government at least indicate to the country that on certain sections of this report they will move immediately? I refer specifically to the question of railway line abandonment, the government elevator policy, rationalization of our use of the grain handling system and the railway operation.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I certainly want to join the expressions of commendation to Mr. Justice Hall and the other commissioners who did a tremendous job in hearing public views from all across the west in connection with the grain handling system. I do, of course, intend to put forward recommendations with regard to the various proposals of the commission at a very early date. They will be put before the House as quickly as we possibly can. Obviously there will be a different timeframe for different recommendations because of the complexity of some of them, but it will be our intention to move very rapidly on this important report.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): To be specific, Mr. Speaker, I will direct this question to the Minister of Transport. Will the recommendations and solutions offered in the report be implemented in this session or in the fall session?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, my timeframe would see action on some of the recommendations and some of the issues involved almost certainly before the end of June.

STATUTORY FREIGHT RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON HALL RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport having to do with the very important question of statutory freight rates. In view of the recommendation which re-affirms the continuation of the statutory freight rates for the movement of grain, will the minister seize the opportunity to ensure the producers of western Canada that this very important recommendation will be accepted as government policy? It would serve to allay the fears of many producers on this very, very important historic instrument.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I have been as emphatic as anyone in maintaining the western interest in the maintenance and benefits of the Crowsnest rate. I have noted in the Hall report the very clear-cut analysis of the impact of rail freight rates on development and processing and natural advantage. The only solution that I perhaps read in this would involve a tremendous additional expenditure of taxpayers dollars which the commission itself does not quantify. Obviously, I would not associate myself with members opposite in agreeing to spending money like that without knowing how much it would be.

In addition, of course, I am impressed by the fact that according to the very argument of Mr. Justice Hall freight rates have their impact on processing. If this does appear to be a fact ignoring the real cost of transportation will tend to increase the volume of expenditure on transportation, in this particular case it means specifically that lower freight rates on materials like wheat and grain tend to encourage the shipment of the grain rather than the processing of that grain into meat, and that is what my colleague, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, meant when he said he was in favour of the west on this issue. We are in favour of developing real means for further processing in the west and not appearing to simply seize short-term political advantage out of any situation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Is the minister saying, then, that he does not agree in total with the recommendation of Mr. Justice Hall and his colleagues with respect to the statutory freight rates? Is he saying he does not agree that the difference between the statutory rate and the cost of transporting grain should be paid directly to the railways by the treasury? Am I to assume that the Minister of Transport is discarding that particular possibility out of hand?

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is completely wrong in making that assumption. He should reread my answer. What I am saying is that any embracing of a proposal which would involve the expenditure of perhaps hundreds of millions of dollars, without even knowing whether it is $300 million or $800 million, is irresponsible and only to be seen in the hands of Conservative politicians who don't care about the west.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: You can tell an election is coming up.

ADOPTION OF HALL RECOMMENDATIONS ON FREIGHT RATES TO ENCOURAGE PROCESSING IN WESTERN CANADA

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Since the minister is concerned about a timeframe I should like to put a question to him about matters over which he presently has authority to act; I suggest we could implement some of Mr. Justice Hall's recommendations within a timeframe, and that legislation is already available to him. The Hall Commission report notes that the production and processing of agricultural products should take place in the regions which have natural geographic advantages for such activities; freight rates and other related transportation policies should not destroy or hinder these natural advantages—which, by the way, is the opposite to what the minister has been doing. The commission goes on to say that in a number of areas this has not been the case up to the present. Flour milling, rapeseed pressing, livestock processing and the malting industry and a number of changes in freight rates and related policies would have the effect—

Some hon. Members: Order!

An hon. Member: You've reached your 40-minute limit!

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member have a question to ask? If so, will he put it now?

Mr. Benjamin: Yes, Mr. Speaker, and it will not be as long as the minister's answer to the hon. member for Vegreville. In the light of that statement by the Hall Commission, I should like to ask the minister whether it is the intention of himself and the government to adopt the Hall Commission recommendations with respect to these rates and the encouragement of processing industries in western Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The hon. member is quite wrong in thinking that this would not require legislation. Moreover, he has overlooked the fact that in connection with rapeseed we have introduced a program of financial assistance to the rapeseed crushing industry to avoid some of the dilemmas which arise out of the differentiation in rates between the low rate on rapeseed and the more ordinary but still low rate on oil. This involves the expenditure of money but on a temporary basis until better long-term solutions are found.

We have also acted to meet the problem of the stop-off charge in eastern Canada being lower than the stop-off charge in western Canada by supporting the difference in those stop-off charges by charging it against the treasury and paying the money annually to the flour millers. These are examples of the ways in which we have been very conscious of the need to avoid the impact of adverse freight rates and costs upon the west.

Of course, we do want also to come to grips with the overall problem. It is our objective to implement, as we have said in connection with the feed grain policy time and time again, the development of the processing of agricultural products in accordance with natural advantage. That means with equity in freight rates between various products. What hon. gentlemen opposite have been reluctant to do is to say anywhere outside of the west what they mean by equity.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

An hon. Member: Loser pay!

Some hon. Members: Sit down!

Mr. Speaker: Order!

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF BILL C-33 TO PROVIDE FOR EQUITY IN TRANSPORTATION COST BETWEEN RAW AND PROCESSED MATERIAL

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I pursue this subject with the minister. The moneys given the rapeseed crushing industry are designed to take them that much longer to go broke under his present policies. The Hall report notes that one of the first principles to be acted on with respect to transportation policy is a freight rate structure in which the processed product in its concentrated form should cost no more to transport on a per-ton-mile basis than the same product in its raw state. Since the Hall report notes that the absence of this principle has had a damaging effect on the economy of the western provinces, and since the current transportation policy bill before this House, Bill C-33, does not ensure this principle, will the minister assure the House that he will either amend the bill to enshrine this principle within it, or withdraw the bill?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the very point I was making is repeated by the hon. member. Obviously equity relationship between cost of rates on the product and on rapeseed is fundamental to fair development of these products and the processing of them according to natural advantage in Canada. The dilemma, of course, is that that would lead to putting everything that is shipped on the Crowsnest pass rates. Hon. members opposite might pretend that that would be a great thing in terms of low freight rates, but in fact it would cost the taxpayer a tremendous amount of money and I do not know what the hon. member's colleagues from other parts of the country might say about that.

In addition, it would lead to waste in the form of lowered productivity by having a transportation system which ignores costs, and therefore goods would be shipped far further before being processed than is to the advantage of this country. That is something which I will oppose in our transportation policy.

POSSIBILITY OF CONSIDERING HALL REPORT AS A PACKAGE—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I put a final supplementary question which incorporates two questions. The minister was quoted on the CBC national news last night as saying that he did not intend to concern himself with anything in the report except recommendations about which lines were to be abandoned and which were to be retained. Can the minister assure the House that the Hall Commission report will be taken as a package, as Mr. Justice Hall clearly intends, and that his recommendations regarding general transportation policy and its place in economic development will be considered in that package? Finally, in light of what is the obvious problem which the minister is having with the Hall report, can the minister say whether he will request the House leader to refer the report to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, I presume innocently, completely distorted and misstated what I said about the recommendations in the Hall Commission report. I did make the point that a certain number of comments on the Hall report were based on matters which may have come as a surprise to people appearing before the commission. The central theme of the commission's report, on the other hand, which was completely within its terms of reference, was extremely well researched, worked, debated and heard about throughout the sessions across the prairies and this section obviously has a lot more weight attached to it. I also in fact said that I did not want any of my comments about peripheral matters in the report to detract in any way from the report, which I thought was very commendable indeed.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DATE WHEN AGREEMENTS WITH QUEBEC WILL BE SIGNED

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

In an interview given to the newspaper Le Devoir, Mr. Jacques Léonard, minister of state for Quebec development, formally accused the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion of wilfully delaying the signing of agreements said to have been finalized between Quebec and Ottawa. Can the minister tell the House whether that is true and also, if the agreements have not yet been finalized, when those very important documents, according to this morning's newspaper, will be signed?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, what I would like to say about the headline I see in Le Devoir's morning edition is that I am not responsible for any delay in signing amendments which, to be more specific, would alter to quite an extent existing agreements in discussions now being held. As recently as yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I received information we had requested further to Mr. Léonard's filing certain proposals with me at the end of April. We got the information requested yesterday, and my officials and myself are now in the process of studying both the proposals and related information. I was in touch with Mr. Léonard again this morning and hope to be able to get back to him and advise him of my position with regard to his proposals some time before the end of the week.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

INQUIRY AS TO DISTRIBUTION OF MONEY ALLOTTED TO QUEBEC FOR DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary to the minister.

As the amendments to the agreements which have already been finalized involve a fairly large sum of money—the figure of $409 million has even been mentioned—would the minister tell the House whether this $409 million estimate is correct and if so whether this amount will be equitably shared by the different areas concerned by these agreements or if the province of Quebec will be allowed to concentrate all this money in the same place as was done in the past?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, since the figures mentioned by the hon. member are the figures which apparently have been given to the press by the minister, obviously I cannot question them. In fact, according to the proposal brought in by the provincial authorities, the total amount of the contributions which would be granted during the next five years, through amendments to the present agreements or possibly through a new agreement, could reach $409 or $410 million. That is the possible amount of our contribution to those programs which have been submitted to my department and it is this matter we are now considering, Mr. Speaker.

POWERS TO MODIFY AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask another supplementary question of the minister.

Since there are negotiations between Quebec and Ottawa, which is normal, does the federal government reserve to itself the power to amend any proposed agreement which relates to projects introduced by the provinces, particularly by Quebec, when difficulties have been encountered in the course of those negotiations because one of the two parties involved rejected any part of that project?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that if there are negotiations it is because both parties are willing to negotiate. In the course of those negotiations, consideration is being given to representations made to the federal government of course, and to myself in particular. Those representations originate from any place in the province, in your own region and in others, and we must try to reconcile those proposals with priorities of the provincial government and with what it is prepared to incorporate into its own program. Therefore, it is obvious that during negotiations we must discuss and try to come to a compromise between reasonable people so as to take into account distributions of undertakings and expenses in a way which will best satisfy the interests and the needs of more disadvantaged regions.

HALL RECOMMENDATION ON STOP-OFF CHARGE FOR GRAIN AND USE OF INTERIOR TERMINALS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The Hall Commission in its report recommended the elimination of the railway stop-off charge for grain in transit and also the utilization of interior terminals to supplement the storage and cleaning facilities at Thunder Bay, Churchill, Prince Rupert and Vancouver. I wonder whether the minister agrees with this recommendation, and will a decision be announced as to its acceptance before the fall?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as with many of the recommendations in the report, I will want to look at them a good deal further and also examine their costs before commenting.

● (1430)

Mr. Neil: Mr. Speaker, is the minister prepared to refer these recommendations to the Canadian Grain Commission and the Canadian Wheat Board for study?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, only after I have had a chance to examine further what the proper disposition should be.

POSSIBLE WITHDRAWAL OF BILL C-33 IN VIEW OF HALL REPORT

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. In view of the recommendations of the Hall Commission regarding railways, will the government now consider withdrawing Bill C-33 from its agenda for this session?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is no rational or logical connection between the Hall Commission report and that bill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): The Hall Commission recommends dealing with the national railways as instruments of national policy. Bill C-33 proposes to turn over rail transportation to a bunch of bureaucrats. I take it from the minister's answer that he favours the latter course.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member can take it from the minister's answer that he thinks the hon. member's observation is nonsense.

RAIL LINE ABANDONMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON HALL RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Since there are recommendations in the Hall Commission report that certain railway lines should be abandoned by June 30, 1977 and that others should be abandoned by December 31 of this year, would the minister inform the House whether this is a fait accompli, or will the Prairie Rail Authority be permitted to take a look at these proposals?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is the kind of decision I expect we will make before the end of June.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

POSSIBILITY OF PROGRAM TO IMPROVE EMPLOYABILITY OF YOUTH

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour, and it relates to the minister's recent announcement of the first phase of an affirmative action program designed to improve and enhance the employability of women in Canada. While I wholeheartedly welcome this excellent initiative, I wonder if the minister, together with his colleague the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, is contemplating a similar program designed to improve the employability of Canadian youth?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker, but we believe the application of our labour policies in the long run will have that impact.

PROPOSED RAILWAY TO TRANSPORT OIL AND GAS FROM ARCTIC—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF STUDY BY CANALOG LOGISTICS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. Given that the Hall Commission report endorsed earlier recommendations by Canalog Logistics and the Institute of Guided Ground Transport at Queens University that the transport of Arctic oil and gas by rail is feasible both from an engineering and a financial perspective, is the government now giving serious consideration to this kind of facility as a means of transportation and development in the north? I ask that particularly since the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources last week summarily dismissed this option in replying to the right hon. member for Prince Albert, and that was before Mr. Justice Hall's report was available and before the report of the National Energy Board. Is this strong endorsation by Mr. Justice Hall of an Arctic railway now being given very serious consideration by the government?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, with regard to a matter such as this I say I would not consider the Hall report to be the definitive work because certainly all the arguments on the question and all the evidence and the facts were not before the commission in the course of its deliberations. I am somewhat surprised that the hon. lady should suggest that we should go ahead and decide on a rail line along the Mackenzie without having regard to environmental considerations, which have been seen by her to have a great impact on the pipeline question.

Miss MacDonald: I said consider it.

Mr. Lang: The studies to which the hon. member referred which indicated the possible feasibility of a railway did not deny that it might require between 10 and 12 years to complete it, which might make it rather an academic exercise in terms of the very oil and gas which that study saw as being required to make it economically feasible. The fact of the matter is that that study was based on the theory that not only gas from Prudhoe Bay but, in addition, oil would be available for that railway and its economic justification. As the hon. lady may know, that oil is now going another way from Prudhoe Bay.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, in referring to the study done by Canalog Logistics Mr. Justice Hall said: "We have intensively reviewed the 13 volume study of this proposed railway and are most favourably impressed by the breadth of its investigation and the superior quality of its analysis". In order to enable hon. members of this House to participate more effectively in the debate on the motion in the name of the President of the Privy Council, will the Minister of Transport now undertake to table the complete 13 volume report prepared by Canalog Logistics rather than just the 28-page executive summary which was tabled in October of 1974?

Mr. Lang: Well, Mr. Speaker, this may be the type of work which might be more suited for deposit and access to the public in the Transport Canada library, if it can be placed there. I will certainly see if that can be done.

Miss MacDonald: Table it.

Mr. Lang: Indeed, it may already have been done. The hon. member may have checked. I can agree that the work in those 13 volumes was very fine indeed, but as I pointed out to the hon. lady, it was based on certain theories and facts which are no longer applicable in terms of the availability of oil and gas for that movement.

Miss MacDonald: Let us decide that. Give somebody else a chance to decide.

POST OFFICE

ALLEGED ILLEGALITY OF RATE INCREASE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. In light of the unanimous report of the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, tabled last week, which stated that the Post Office has improperly increased first class postal rates, thereby collecting and profiting from approximately $100 million over the past 8½ months, will the Postmaster General immediately suspend the collection of the illegal 4 cents until enabling legislation is passed?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in the committee, I do not agree with the premise of the hon. gentleman's question. As I indicated in committee, there is no finding by the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments that the collection is illegal, and there is no intention at all of discontinuing the practice.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. gentleman be willing to table the legal opinion upon which the decision to raise the postal rates by regulation rather than by parliament was based, and would he also be willing to submit it to the Supreme Court of Canada for decision?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I refer the hon. gentleman to section 13 of the Financial Administration Act.

ENERGY

SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF HOME INSULATION PROGRAM AS CONSERVATION MEASURE

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. An international study group published its findings yesterday, which state that the non-Communist world will probably run out of available supplies of oil and gas between 1985 and 1995, that it is possible that this could occur in 1981, depending on the policies of Saudi Arabia, and that the world must drastically curtail growth in the use of energy and move massively out of oil into other fuels with wartime urgency. Mr. Marshall Crowe of the National Energy Board participated in that study, and he says that the report adds immensely to one's sense of urgency. Does the Prime Minister have a sense of urgency about this situation and about the need for energy conservation, and would he direct his minister to implement an effective conservation program by extending the home insulation grants program beyond Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island to the rest of the country, keeping in mind the fact that the director of the office of energy conservation has just resigned—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is obviously making a representation that the government extend a program which has been applied in two provinces. We applied that to two provinces for a reason which is well known to the opposition, the great dependency of those two provinces on petroleum for the production of electricity. Extending the program to other provinces is being considered. The financial implications of it, of course, are very great.

POLYSAR

ALLEGATIONS OF ILLEGAL PAYMENTS TO CUSTOMERS—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, before the Minister of Finance went on his trip to London and because of certain media revelations from Amsterdam, in the Netherlands, he undertook to inquire into—and has, I understand, received—a report from CDC regarding the Polysar controversy and the identification of some of its customers. Because the Public Accounts Committee was frustrated in its attempt to receive that information on the basis that a certain Swiss law grants an exception where shareholders are making the same inquiries and because the minister in the right of Canada is the major shareholder of CDC, which in turn owns Polysar, I wonder if the minister can now tell us what is in that report. Could he also tell us when that report, if there is anything worthwhile in it, is going to be transmitted to the Public Accounts Committee?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, I asked the representatives of the Government of Canada on the board of Canada Development Corporation, the parent company of Polysar, to inquire, through the management of CDC, of Polysar with respect to these particular media allegations. I have been advised, as I advised the House, that an investigation is being carried out by Polysar management with regard to improprieties but no report has yet come from that examination. I gather that the corporation would probably have some contest with the hon. member as to the legal question involved. They have taken the viewpoint that in the light of Swiss law, representatives of the company would be subject to legal sanction in Switzerland if they revealed details about individual customers. I understand the hon. gentleman was offered this information and it was offered to the steering committee on a confidential basis but the position taken by the company is that they could not put it on the public record. When the response to the investigation is received I will of course want to examine it. I will then be glad to discuss with the hon. gentleman its possible use in the Public Accounts Committee.

ALLEGATIONS OF ILLEGAL PAYMENTS TO CUSTOMERS—POSSIBILITY OF REQUEST FOR INFORMATION FROM NETHERLANDS GOVERNMENT

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Obviously if any Canadians are implicated they are going to be those same officials from both Polysar and the CDC who are conducting the investigation. It seems rather strange that we cannot have more information, which I am sure the minister must have, than he has given to the House. In any event because those same media stories indicated that the Netherlands government was already conducting an investigation into the same matter and expected to have some of its information presented to them by the Canadian government, could the minister indicate if that information has been given to the Netherlands government or has there been any request for any such information?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know of no such request from the government of the Netherlands—certainly none that has come to the government of Canada—but it may well be that the subsidiary of the Canadian corporation has been the subject of such a request. I would remind the hon. gentleman that, contrary to his allegations about the management of Polysar, they did appoint an independent inquiry made up of a retired Court of Appeal judge and a member of the Toronto business community and that they did make an independent investigation of these particular allegations.

RAIL LINE ABANDONMENT—INQUIRY WHETHER DECISIONS BASED ON SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC GROUNDS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In recommending the abandonment of some railway branch lines, Mr. Justice Hall proposes that the agency making the decisions as to which lines should be abandoned, should be dedicated exclusively to the public service and relieved of the commercial standards of the corporations it is to suspersede. I should like to ask the minister if the government agrees that the future of the transportation system in western Canada should be decided on social and economic grounds as well as on the basis of commercial viability or user-pay, as it has been up to now?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, obviously it was the desire to take social and other factors totally into consideration which led us to set up the Hall Commission and receive from it this very commendable job of work. Those are the factors we took into consideration. The Prairie rail authority to which the hon. member has made oblique reference is a very interesting idea in terms of dealing with these questions in the future in relation to several thousand miles of line. I will certainly want to consider that very seriously and to hear representations from farmers and representatives of farm organizations before drawing conclusions on the recommendations to put before my colleagues.

RAIL LINE ABANDONMENT—SUGGESTED SUBSIDIZATION OF UNECONOMIC BRANCH LINES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the Hall Commission recommended that in the interest of promoting economic development in western Canada there should be continuing subsidies for some uneconomic branch lines, will the government now agree that it should carry the cost of such regional development of transportation, rather than shifting much of the cost to the provinces as the minister proposed just last week?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the hon. member's comments.

SOCIAL SECURITY

MEASURES TO ENSURE ELIGIBLE CITIZENS RECEIVE OLD AGE PENSION

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I should like to know if any special measures have been taken to ensure that all senior citizens receive their old age security benefits when they reach age 65?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, usually all senior citizens make application well before they reach age 65. For those who apply late, there is provision in the Act for retroactivity. Unfortunately, some senior citizens do not apply in time. For instance, I am sure all members of the House will join me in wishing a happy birthday to the hon. member for Westmount who is celebrating his 65th birthday today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Unfortunately, the hon. member has not yet sent in his application so I am writing to him today, as I do to other senior citizens when a special case is brought to my attention, pointing out all the benefits available to senior citizens—the Canada Pension Plan, the basic old age security, the guaranteed income security, the Canada Assistance Plan, New Horizons and to make sure nothing is forgotten, I am sending him family planning information as well.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

DATE OF PROCLAMATION—PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH OTHER COUNTRIES ON RECIPROCAL AGREEMENTS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I want to extend my congratulations to the hon. member on reaching the age of 65. As we are involved with the old age security bill, can the minister advise whether it is still his intention that the bill will be in effect by July 1. I think this is the indication the minister had given to us earlier. After that Mr. Speaker, I have a slight supplementary.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The plans are to the effect that the bill which was approved by parliament will be proclaimed before July 1.

Mr. Speaker: One slight supplementary.

Mr. Alexander: We are all entitled to make one mistake every now and again, sir, and I do not make too many. Given the fact that the minister has just returned from overseas where I understand he had discussions with personnel in the United Kingdom, France and the United States, can the minister advise how the reciprocal agreements are coming along and whether any will be entered into by July 1? I am speaking in particular of the United Kingdom and the United States.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, officials of my department were in Washington last week to have discussions on this subject. Meetings with British officials are scheduled for the week of July 11 and we are to have meetings with French officials in early fall. Unfortunately, I do not think we can have agreements ready for signature by the time the bill is proclaimed. With regard to the British situation, their minister has indicated interest in reaching an agreement but he pointed out that there might be some financial difficulty in Britain in meeting the commitment that could be made under such an agreement. We are going to explore the matter further.

FISHERIES

RIVER HERRING—STEPS TO DETERMINE QUANTITIES CAUGHT BY FOREIGN FLEETS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. On May 2 the captain of a Soviet fishing trawler who had been detained since April 11 for catching river herring gaspereau some 130 miles at sea in greater quantities than allowed by law, pleaded guilty in a United States district court and was fined $10,000 and placed on nine-months' suspended probation. Since the normal run of river herring or gaspereau is practically extinct at the present time in Nova Scotia, I should like to ask the minister what steps he or his officials are taking to determine the quantities of these fish caught by foreign fleets off our coast, in the hope of preserving this species which is salted and exported to the West Indies, when it is available, thereby adding to the income of our inshore fishermen?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, if violations occur for quotas which are not available to the foreign fleet, obviously they will be dealt with first in the courts. If found guilty, then they will be informed that their licence will be suspended for a given period of time. So far we have suspended licences for one year and have indicated where there are repeated violations the licence will be suspended indefinitely.

SALE OF URANIUM AND NUCLEAR REACTORS—CANADIAN POSITION ON DISPUTE BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND GERMANY

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Can he shed any further light than came forth in the communiqués issued from London and the press reports, on the development of the dispute between Germany and the United States with respect to the handling of the sale of uranium and reactors? Is Canada taking an active position in support of one side or the other, given the fact that the Canadian position has not been that far removed from that put forth by the President of the United States?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must admire the euphemism that the hon. member uses in saying our position is not that far from that of the United States. He will know, of course, that Canada has taken the lead in this matter. We put on safeguards a considerable period of time before the Americans caught up to us. Of course, our position has been one of great doubt about the utility and necessity of reactors and indeed much of our safeguards position centres around the undesirability of having reprocessing plants. Naturally, President Carter was stating the view we had already stated many times.

● (1450)

In the debate between President Carter, the German Chancellor and the French president, naturally, the Americans are on the same side as Canada. We all attempted honestly at that summit to find a way out of this difficulty. The hon. member is aware, of course, that we set up a group to establish within 60 days terms of reference for the study which would look at the problem of fuel cycling, to see if there is any way of reaching a compromise on the types of safeguards which are needed and would meet the arguments of both sides.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DATE OF STATEMENT ON ARRANGEMENTS AND SAFEGUARDS FOR SALE OF NUCLEAR TECHNOLOGY

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs? I have never been particularly impressed with arguments as to who was first in this area. Given that Canada started the atomic race in the Far East, I do not see why we should argue who was first, whether it was the United States or somebody else. The Secretary of State for External Affairs told the House before he went abroad that he would make quite a detailed report to the House on the whole range of safeguards, bilateral agreements, multinational agreements and agreements with non-proliferation signatory countries, in which Canada is involved. I think even the minister will agree, this is a highly confusing situation. Can the minister tell the House when he proposes to make that report, so that hon. members who are keenly interested in this important matter can be certain of being present.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to reaffirm my intention of doing so, and as thoroughly as possible. I cannot be specific about time. I think the hon. member knows that a Japanese delegation is in Ottawa, with whom our officials are speaking, and there are also talks going on with the European countries concerned. I think it would be inappropriate for me to make a full declaration of the type I have been speaking about during the period of those negotiations. As soon as there is some clarity as to where we are going with those countries in those negotiations, I will be glad to do it. In case the hon. lady is worried that this will not take place until the millennium, let me say that this will be done within the next two weeks. If the negotiations have not been completed in two weeks, I will make the statement in any event.

IMMIGRATION

POSSIBILITY FOR GOVERNMENT TO ADOPT SELECTION CRITERIA PROPOSED BY QUEBEC

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the minister responsible for immigration, but since he is not in the House I shall direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Since in recent days or last month Quebec Labour and Immigration Minister Jacques Couture has apparently sent to the federal Minister of Manpower and Immigration a paper containing a new approach to change the immigration criteria which already exist in Quebec, can the Prime Minister tell the House whether he has read that paper sent by Mr. Couture and whether the Department of Manpower and Immigration or the federal government intends to do something in that regard?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not read that document myself, but I am told there will certainly be a meeting between officials of the federal government and Mr. Couture, the Quebec minister, next week.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

APPOINTMENT OF MR. O'NEIL TO HEAD PUBLIC AFFAIRS PROGRAMMING—POSSIBILITY OF MORE BALANCED PROGRAMMING

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Recently the Montreal Gazette announced that the Prime Minister's former press secretary has been appointed as head of public affairs programming for the Radio-Canada television network. I ask if, in making the personal appointment, the Prime Minister instructed the CBC to make a balanced presentation of public affairs and news programs in order to avoid those situations of which government members were so critical?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may recall that the gentleman in question, Mr. O'Neil, was also president of the parliamentary press gallery.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Nobody's perfect.

Mr. Trudeau: That is possible. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar says nobody is perfect. Every time we hear him talk we realize that is a fact.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Thank you, Pierre. That remark will be worth a couple of thousand votes in the next election.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REPORT ON PRODUCTION OF METHANOL—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment and relates to the production of methanol. As methanol can be produced economically in Canada from surplus forest materials, which is a significant fact in view of reports saying that there will be gasoline rationing in the near future, and as methanol can be used alone or as a blend with gasoline, I ask the minister what action his department will take with regard to methanol production, and what will it do with the study the department obtained from Inter-Group Consulting Economists, Ltd. of Winnipeg with regard to the method of producing methanol?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, that excellent report, in the commissioning of which my department was involved, is opening the possibilities for interesting developments. The second step has been the establishment of an interdepartmental committee, consisting of officials from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and other departments including those with financial responsibility, to look at the prospects and feasibility of the proposal and to bring forward firmer recommendations. I think, from my initial assessment, the proposal offers interesting prospects for the utilization of a lot of the waste wood in our country.

Mr. McKenzie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the study stated that the building of a methanol plant would create 40,000 new job openings, I ask the minister if he is planning meetings with the private sector, with the forestry industry, in order to get a methanol production plant going?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, we have not yet reached that stage. Obviously, if we were with the other departments involved to recommend federal involvement in this area, it would be perfectly logical to involve the industry.

POST OFFICE

REASON FOR CONTINUING SALE OF PHILATELIC MATERIAL IN VIEW OF AUDITOR GENERAL'S RECOMMENDATION

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. Will the Postmaster General please explain why the Post Office continues to sell such non-postal materials as stamp album kits, souvenir stamp cases and first day covers, when the Auditor General has questioned since 1972 whether the sale of these items falls within the powers of the Postmaster General under the Post Office Act?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the Auditor General's representation relating to that point. We are selling philatelic items and have sold such items for some time. There was some question at one time if the prices solicited were sufficient, considering that we were selling stamps with those items. Besides that I see no difficulty, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Stick to the mail.

Mr. Darling: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When will the Postmaster General introduce legislation, promised since 1973, which will give the Post Office the necessary authority to sell this material and junk?

Mr. Blais: Soon, Mr. Speaker.

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON FINANCIAL GUARANTEES REQUESTED BY ARCTIC GAS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Since the Arctic Gas Company has repeatedly said before the National Energy Board that it will require financial guarantees before it can proceed with the construction of the pipeline, and has gone so far as to say, no guarantees, no pipeline; and since the minister, in answer to questions, previously said Arctic Gas has not made any formal application, I ask if that is still true, namely, that there has been no formal application? Also, has he received from Arctic Gas officials correspondence outlining the terms and conditions of the kind of guarantee they would require. If so, what has been the minister's reply to such correspondence?

● (1500)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think it is fair to say that I have not received any official request for financial assistance of that kind. Representatives of the Canadian Arctic Gas Pipeline group have indeed discussed the evidence that they gave to the National Energy Board with my officials indicating the financial concerns in relation to which they would be seeking support. The general position we have taken is that in view of the fact the board has not reported, and indeed the board may not find in favour of their particular application, it would be premature for the government to seek to make any decision with regard to financial applications, either from this particular group or any other pipeline group.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that Arctic Gas has asked for a conditional permit, the only applicant which has, and the condition is that they get financial guarantees, may I ask the minister if it is the government's intention, assuming Arctic Gas gets a conditional permit, to deal post de facto with the matter of giving a guarantee and to introduce legislation in the House, asking parliament to approve financial guarantees after the company has the permit to proceed with the construction of a pipeline?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member points out, the situation is entirely hypothetical at this point. He probably states the situation correctly, that if the government of Canada wants to give guarantees of any kind to any pipeline applicant, it would either through the estimates or some other legislation have to seek the support of parliament. As I said in response to the previous question, we have not addressed ourselves to that at this point because there is no indication at this point that this particular group is going to be successful as an applicant.

[Translation]

Mr. Lavoie: Mr. Speaker, I am raising a question of privilege because yesterday, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro), I put to the House a motion under Standing Order 43 to congratulate the hockey team the Canadiens. In answer the Chair referred to the ruling on the previous motion put by my colleague from St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). So the reason for the refusal of the motion by the hon. member for St. John's West was that it was not a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I should like to say that my speech to commend the hockey team the Canadiens was not a motion of pressing and urgent necessity, but I simply wanted to point out an event of national and international interest.

Mr. Speaker, I remember that last year I had presented that same motion. The Chair had agreed to present the motion and hon. members were unanimous in accepting it. Therefore, this is the principle I am dealing with, not because this is a precedent. I recognize that your task is rather difficult, Mr. Speaker, and you deserve all our admiration for what you do. Consequently, following your decision whether you will give me the authority to put the same motion before the House again next Thursday, since I shall be here on Thursday, I shall be pleased to do so or if you decide in favour of the point I am raising, Parliament could perhaps simply send our sincere congratulations to all the players of the hockey team the Canadiens as well as to the coach and management on behalf of our institution. I thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member can certainly understand the difficulty imposed on the Chair having to decide whether such a motion under Standing Order 43 is in order because when dealing with a motion to congratulate someone, as a winning sports team or, as it occurred before, to mark the anniversary of the funding of a very important town in Ontario, or another success, as proposed by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) there is always a difficulty on the urgency of or the need for such a motion. We always have to determine whether we can accept the motion of an hon. member which underlines the importance of an event which occurred in his riding or a motion concerning the success of an organization. Every day we face the difficulty of having to decide whether a motion which should be very precise as far as its national scope is concerned is in order under Standing Order 43. Of course, it is easier and fairer simply to let an hon. member speak for two minutes to enable him to put forward a motion under Standing Order 43 and to justify its importance before the House, without having to take a vote. The Chair must also consider the importance and the urgency of the matter, under Standing Order 43.

TABLING OF ECONOMIC REVIEW BY DEPARTMENT

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table copies, in both official languages, of the economic review by the Department of Finance, dated May, 1977.

Mr. Speaker: I understand there has been some discussion or consultation about the statement to be made by the Minister of Public Works. It is related to the position not only of some responsibilities of the Department of Public Works but also of the Department of National Revenue in so far as it affects the position of employees resident in Ottawa and working in Quebec, or vice-versa. There might be some disposition to listen to the statements by both the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of National Revenue, comment on them in rotation and then ask questions of both ministers. Is that acceptable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PUBLIC SERVICE

EQUITABLE DISTRIBUTION OF JOBS BETWEEN OTTAWA AND HULL—INCREASE IN CROWN-OWNED FACILITIES

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, since 1969 the government has been implementing a plan for the national capital region with two major objectives: the achievement of a more balanced and equitable distribution of public service jobs between Ottawa and Hull, and an increase in the level of Crown-owned facilities as opposed to leased space. Today I would like to announce recent decisions by the government in both these areas and to take the opportunity to recapitulate and clarify the government's position and expectations with regard to development and space utilization in the national capital region.

Particularly since the government's announced policy of slow growth in the public service as part of its over-all restraint program, there has been some concern shown and fears expressed about the effects of government policies on growth and development in the capital. I hope that I can provide a clear picture of our over-all planning for this area and in so doing allay some of the fears and provide a groundwork for planning by all concerned.

At present, the printing and publishing section of the Department of Supply and Services, as well as the Departments of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Labour and Environment, are located in Hull. As previously announced, we hope that by the end of the current fiscal year most of the Department of Supply and Services, Canadian International Development Agency, the Department of the Secretary of State, Canadian Radio Telecommunications Commission, and the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs will have moved, or commenced to move, as well. In addition to these relocations, the government has recently decided also to relocate the Solicitor General's department, the Canadian Transport Commission and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion from Ottawa to Hull during this same fiscal year. The Canada Labour Relations Board, Unemployment Insurance Commission, and the Department of Manpower and Immigration are scheduled to move in the 1978-79 period.

The total number of public service jobs involved in these moves is approximately 15,000. With these relocations, the main thrust of the government's relocation policy within the national capital region will have been completed. Except for a number of small units which will be moved to fill up smaller blocks of space in the new buildings, there are no further plans for permanent relocation of government units to office space in Hull for the foreseeable future.

As to the second major objective of the government's national capital region plan, that of increasing the level of Crown-owned facilities as opposed to leased space, there has been considerable revision of our projects for development and construction in light of the government's program of over-all restraint and the related plan for slow growth in the public service over the next few years. I should emphasize that "slow growth" means just that—in the current fiscal year, authorized man-years will be increased by only 0.6 per cent over the 1976-77 level. The continuation of our move toward Crown-owned space and the projected slow growth rate will mean that the government will be returning, on a phased basis, some 4 million square feet of commercially-leased office space to the market over the period to the end of the 1980-81 fiscal year.

Fortunately, the office vacancy rate in the national capital traditionally has been, and is now, substantially lower than in almost any other major Canadian city. Therefore, it appears likely that the building owners, through aggressive application of their entrepreneurial skills, will be able successfully to cope with the admittedly substantial volume of space being released by the federal government.

My departmental officials have been co-operating with the Building Owners and Managers Association—BOMA—to ensure that they have the full, timely information necessary for them to react. Further, we have been informed that the Commercial and Industrial Development Corporation is preparing to mount a vigorous campaign to increase private sector demand for commercial and office accommodation. In addition, the chairman of the National Capital Commission has announced that the NCC intends carefully to study the question of commercial and industrial development with a view to providing whatever assistance it can to encourage greater private sector activity in the national capital. The efforts of these agencies are beginning to show tangible results; recently we were approached by two owners to release space in advance of our original plan, to permit them to accommodate private sector demands.

One of our main concerns in attempting to alleviate the impact of these necessary inventory adjustments has been for the smaller shop and restaurant owners, which both support the occupants of the buildings we lease and, to some extent, rely upon their trade to stay in business. Accordingly, we are negotiating with the building owners, through BOMA, and with the downtown merchants, in an attempt to arrive at an arrangement which will permit us evenly to spread the effects across our rental inventory. If we are successful in securing the full co-operation of building owners, it should be possible to ensure that no specific area is critically damaged or required to absorb an inequitable share of the burden.

In order further to ease the transition, the government is taking advantage of this period of consolidation to demolish over 2 million square feet of old, inefficient space in temporary or obsolescent buildings throughout the city of Ottawa over the next two years. I should point out that even after these inventory adjustments the government will continue lease or lease-purchase arrangements for 7.7 million square feet of office space in the national capital region: 2.3 million square feet on the Quebec side, and 5.4 million square feet on the Ontario side. Incidentally, some concern has been expressed recently about the impact of income tax deductions on residents of Ontario working in Quebec. This is a concern, of course, not only for federal civil servants residing in Ontario whose departments are relocated in Hull, but also for some employees in the private sector. I am happy to report that my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, will describe a solution to this problem in a separate announcement.

I am pleased to confirm, also, that the agreement signed in 1975 by representatives of the Outaouais Regional Community Transit Commission, the Ottawa-Carleton Regional Transit Commission and the NCC is currently being reviewed. Negotiations between the parties are expected to lead to a similar agreement providing passengers with a choice of interchangeable services to and from both sides of the Ottawa River, augmented as necessary to meet the demand.

Although the restraint program has restricted Crown construction in the Ottawa area, the government is concerned that the core of the city of Ottawa continue to be vital and thriving. In particular, the government has long favoured the development of the Rideau Centre, a proposed major complex on an 8 1/2-acre tract of federal land on the east side of the Rideau Canal. The development of this area has had wide support and it is felt would make a substantial contribution to the revitalization of the whole Rideau core area. The government will shortly be publicly inviting proposals for development of the centre. The first stage will enable potential developers to express their interest and demonstrate their capacity to undertake such a venture. As originally planned, this centre would feature a major hotel, a major department store and other retail outlets and some 700,000 square feet of office space, much of which would be occupied by the federal government.

In view of the present situation, it has been decided not to include office space in the Rideau Centre development proposal call on federal land. Nevertheless, the government has decided to move ahead with the other aspects of the centre in the belief that this will have a beneficial over-all effect on the Rideau core and will be welcomed by the Ottawa business community.

I hope these comments will help to clarify the government's plans for development in the national capital region in the medium-term future. There is no question that insofar as the federal government is concerned we shall be going through a period of consolidation rather than the fairly rapid growth we have experienced over the past few years. However, over-all there will continue to be some growth in the NCR as a whole and, of course, the municipalities in the area will continue vigorously to pursue alternative courses leading to a more diversified industrial and commercial life for the region.

I am sure hon. members are also interested in the government's plans to move government units from the national capital region to other parts of the country. This is a complex issue, involving a number of difficult assessments and choices. The government has already made some announcements on its plans in this regard but is not in a position to make a comprehensive statement at the present time. It hopes to do so in the next few weeks. I wish to emphasize, however, that there will be no overlap between these moves to Hull and decentralization outside of the national capital, with the minor exception of a few smaller units already announced, involving approximately 450 jobs in all.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce that the negotiations undertaken by the Minister of Finance and myself with the province of Quebec have resulted in an agreement which enables us to reduce tax deductions from federal employees residing in Ontario but working in Quebec.

Under the agreement, the Quebec government will reduce income tax for federal employees. For others, including those working for the private sector, government agencies and Crown corporations, the federal government will reduce the federal tax deductions to obtain the same result. I am also pleased to extend that solution to private sector workers in other provinces so as to reduce the additional tax deductions when they reside in a province and work in another.

Under the regulations in effect, Quebec residents working in Ontario may ask their employer to make additional tax deductions. To do so, they must file a tax deduction application. In conclusion I might add that we are now discussing with the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) the application of tax deductions. I hope this regulation will come into effect on or about July 1.

[English]

I should like to conclude by thanking all my colleagues from Ottawa who constantly made representations to me in caucus, and I should like, also, to mention particularly hon. members on the other side of the House, especially the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro).

● (1520)

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this is an interesting day in the life of the national capital area. We are now seeing the government attempting to justify, on the backs of the Public Service of Canada, a proposal which was made to develop what I call Fort Fullerton on the other side of the Ottawa river, a decision that was reached without any forethought or consultation whatsoever.

If I may deal with the statement of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan), using his language, this is an attempt to justify a decision which was made without any planning or consultation with anyone. I refer to the development of those buildings on the other side of the Ottawa river. The buildings are there; anyone can see them if they look across the river. They stand there at great public expense, and I think it is important that the people of Canada know just how little planning, discussion and consultation went into the decision to put them there.

I am not speaking from lack of knowledge. I am speaking from information that was given to me by the government in an answer to a question which I put on the order paper on November 19, 1976. It is of interest to note that there was so little planning, so little digging and so little to look for that the government was uncharacteristically quick in answering that question on November 22, 1976. The question asked whether a task force on relocation of departments and agencies to Hull has been formed and, if so who are the members, what are the terms of reference, has it begun to function, on what date is a report expected, and will it be tabled in the House or published as a white paper? To that question the answer was no. So some time between November of last year and today's announcement somebody scurried around and found some departments which they could move to Hull. If making an announcement in this way within that short period of time is not an example of lack of co-ordination, then I do not know what is, Mr. Speaker.

As for development of the area itself, I put certain questions on the order paper on November 19. For example, No. 1,141 has never been answered, though it is being partly answered today. I asked in the fourth part of the question:

> What consultation has been undertaken with Hull to determine the best means of maximizing benefits and minimizing harmful effects on the city (b) what consultation has taken place with the city of Ottawa to minimize possible harmful effects on the city?

The minister's statement did not deal with this, which means that there has been no consultation whatever. If the statement of the Minister of Public Works marks a failure in anything—and I say this with regret and without any reprobation of the hon. member himself—it marks a failure in the efforts of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin) and the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), who within their caucus, as it is described by the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin), have tried to persuade the government to use its head and to think about what it is doing.

[Miss Bégin.]

The justification for a ministry of the public service to look after the interest of the public servants of Canada has been put forward time and time again by the hon. member for Ottawa West. In terms of consultation with the corporation of the city of Ottawa, the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton and all the municipalities around, on a matter that affects them gravely, the government has admitted today that there has been none whatsoever. This step has been taken to fill buildings on the other side of the river which were constructed without any study at all being made. They are a figment of some bureaucratic mind; they are standing there today and they must be filled. That is the situation we are in in the national capital today. In other words, it is a Ruby Goldberg day in the national capital.

Another matter which concerns me, regarding which members of the House have tried to deal, is the matter of getting co-ordination between the government's plan to decentralize the public service, on the one hand, and relocation of the public service to Hull, on the other hand. This statement, on its face, is an indication that this step has been taken separate and apart from decentralization. Relocation is not considered as part and parcel of decentralization in terms of areas affected. That is an admission of failure. It is dereliction of duty on the part of the government, not simply on the part of the Minister of Public Works who is only the fellow who has to carry the can today. This lack of co-ordination between decentralization and relocation reminds me, quite frankly, of an octopus in heat, and I think it is about time somebody said so.

Have any studies been made of this proposal for the growth and development of the national capital? None whatsoever. How can we believe the well-intentioned Minister of Public Works when he says that only 15,000 public servants will be transferred to Hull? Do you remember, Mr. Speaker, the bilingualism program in this city? It started out first as a policy involving 25,000 people. Then there was a little leak out of the government to the effect that it would be double that and, by golly, the government admitted that 53,000 would be affected. Now we are up to 65,000 positions and there is no indication that that figure is going to be lessened. If the Minister of National Revenue, who is interjecting, will be patient, what I am saying is that the disease of this government is that its figures mean nothing since there are no studies upon which those statistics are based.

Who is going to carry the freight for a policy which has been made without consultation with the city of Ottawa, the regional municipality and the municipalities around? Who but the old entrepreneurial skills of the private sector? The entrepreneurial skills of the private sector in the national capital area in a time of slow growth are going to be tested like they have never been tested before. If there is any meaning to the statement by the chairman of the National Capital Commission with respect to providing some help to develop the private sector and increase employment, then it had better become apparent quickly. There had better be some flesh put on the skeleton, instead of the pious statement which the minister made to the House today.

I laughed out loud when the minister expressed concern for the small shop and restaurant owners and stated how the government was going to rationalize the position of small shop and restaurant owners in the city of Ottawa who had developed on the basis of one particular scheme of development and who now find the rug pulled out from under them by a government which has about as much co-ordination as the octopus that I have mentioned. I am sure the hon. member for Ottawa Centre and the hon. member for Ottawa West—and I bet that if he were here, the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier would nod his head, too—have received letter after letter, as I have, from members of the business community in Ottawa asking why they are not being consulted and being told what the government is doing. I suggest it would be uncharacteristic of the government ever to consult. If they will not consult with their own public service unions, and if they will not give advance notice to them of decentralization, how could we ever expect them to consult with such forms of life, in their consideration, as smaller shop and restaurant owners in the national capital area? They even admit in the statement that damage is going to occur. They say on page 3 of the statement that there is going to be something less than critical damage. Well, that is a comfort. They are going to do their best to deal with that. In the statement there is no rationalization of transportation problems.

● (1530)

I am delighted to see the government has announced, for the fifth time—twice in the 1972 election, twice in the 1974 election, and today—that we are going to proceed with the Rideau Centre. That is a wonderful thing. But I want to warn the proponents of the Rideau Centre that, like bilingualism and the designation of bilingual jobs which has escalated, the promise with respect to the Rideau Centre is de-escalating. We were going to start with a big project, and now it is going down and down. I wager there will be a sixth announcement in the future concerning the development of the Rideau Centre in Ottawa.

Referring to the whole business of relocation, I remind the government the only place within the national capital area is in the city of Hull, and the official plans for the townships of Nepean, Goulbourn, Osgoode and Rideau, and the whole aspect of the regional government plan in this area asks for government installations in those areas as part of relocation projects. Why the government continues to place more and more square footage of office space in one area of the national capital, and denies that kind of development to the other areas, I leave that to hon. members to speculate about. That demand is there. That is a demand that ought to be remembered, and not forgotten, as it has been forgotten by this government.

The statement of the Minister of Public Works is a dreadful one for the national capital area. We have come to this point without consultation with the public service unions, the municipalities involved, and without any meaningful plans to assist the private sectors. Lip service is given to that in this statement. This point has been reached without any meaningful plans with respect to transportation, and without settling the matter of sewage treatment on one side of the Ottawa River. Making these announcements is further indication of lack of co-ordination which has afflicted this ministry since 1969.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make my comments more as a representative from Canada looking at this problem, rather than someone speaking for the municipal council of Ottawa.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: We are dealing with something a little bigger than just what happens in the city of Ottawa. There are a number of things in this statement that I approve of, but there is one thing of which I very much disapprove. It is not so much contained in the statement, as the way the minister has been treating parliament and the committee which was set up to deal with this matter.

I appreciate there is an urgency to deal with these matters. We have a committee set up to study the National Capital Commission. We have some very able people on that committee, and the committee did a great deal of work. It is contemptuous of the minister and the people involved to make this announcement without having convened that committee and discussed the matter with them and made them aware of the situation. There were many different points of view expressed by the people on that committee. I did not agree with every one of them. It is typical of the way parliament and its committees are being treated by the ministry. This behaviour serves very badly a relatively good cause. I am referring to the manner in which the minister has brought this information into the House.

Let me say something about consultation. My hon. friend who preceded me said that the business community of Ottawa should have been consulted. I am sure the business community of Ottawa made known their points of view. If they had been consulted and listened to, there would be nothing in Hull. It is parliament which makes the decisions, not the business community of Ottawa. I should like to talk about the business community of Ottawa and the kind of decisions they have made for this city in the past.

I am delighted the National Capital Commission owns the land which will be the future site of the Rideau Centre. Those 8½ acres will not be built on, if the National Capital Commission has anything to say about it, in a way that will overshadow the parliament buildings. Those acres will not be built on in a way which will allow for the maximum amount of assessment regardless of the consequences to Parliament Hill. Unfortunately, the policy of the city of Ottawa in the past has been virtually to laugh at the attitude of the National Capital Commission in regard to height restriction: the greater the height, the greater the assessment, so let them go as high as they like, not matter what it does to Parliament Hill! That is what is important about having public lands to prevent this type of thing taking place.

To build in Hull and to move some 15,000 public servants there will create a number of problems. The Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin) has taken steps to correct some of those problems. While it deals with some long-standing grievances, it does create new problems. What happens when 15,000 people pour out of Ottawa to work in Hull and return to Ottawa in the evening? Just because they are working in Hull, I do not think they will make their residence in Hull. Perhaps Hull does not want them. Over the years Ottawa has been getting the industrial and commercial assessments in many cases, and Hull has been the bedroom town with all that is involved in terms of a tax base. Some of that is going to be redressed by this move. It is long overdue that we should redress this imbalance.

My hon. friend who spoke on behalf of the Conservative party worries about the fact there has been no planning. He is right. There was probably no planning involved here. It was only Mackenzie King type of planning—if you have a trade-off, you make a deal. If you look at the history of the conflict between the regional municipalities of Ottawa and Hull and the National Capital Commission, you realize that a rare choice has been made here. At some point I would like to question the minister to find out what Mr. Coolican's attitude has been to this kind of trade-off. It is quite apparent that the city of Ottawa was given something they wanted in return for lessening their objections about development in Hull. They have been given the Rideau Centre. It is a typical Canadian compromise, "Here is something for you, so do not get too noisy about what we are doing over there because you stand to gain something as well". There should be a better way of doing it than that, but that is apparently what has been done.

There is a real problem which the minister has not dealt with. I appreciate at this particular time that we are very much concerned about the relationship between the other provinces of Canada and the province of Quebec. It is almost to the point where it is dominating everything we are attempting to do these days. I am sure this real concern will be voiced by those who come from the less developed and less prosperous areas of Canada. Our preoccupation with this problem will lead to neglect in solving the other problems.

● (1540)

In his statement, the minister touched very briefly on the fact that he is going to make some announcement in the future about the decentralization of government agencies into other parts of Canada, but it is not very reassuring for him to come in with this kind of statement, to leave the other matter hanging in the air and to be so vague about what he intends to do about decentralization generally. This can only increase the concern other parts of Canada have as to whether the minister is going to deal as expeditiously with their problems as he is in trying to deal with the more central problem here in Ottawa-Hull. I think it terribly important that perhaps even today the minister should state in unequivocal language that this is not going to be the case, and should reassure other parts of Canada that the much needed assessment of employment in those parts will not be overlooked in view of the concern about the central capital area.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, while agreeing with my colleague, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), about the lack of foresight and co-ordination in the transfers announced today, I wish to thank the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin) for her co-operation because she sent me the text of her statement prior to its delivery this afternoon. I thank the minister for her courtesy.

[English]

Speaking now of those public servants who today are working in Hull but who are living in Ottawa, I feel it is worth mentioning that it has taken a long time to get the message across the floor—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not know if there has been some impression created that there would be several rounds of speeches, but the procedure under which we are operating calls for a statement by a minister—in this case statements by two ministers—which I respected. In terms of the time allocation to those who wished to respond, I attempted to guard for those who were responding to those statements the same time which was occupied by the two ministers who spoke. Our Standing Orders then allow a period for questions, but not a period for other statements, responses or speeches to be made. I have recognized the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) as the first questioner, if he has any questions to put to the minister.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, it was my understanding that my colleague, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), was addressing himself to the transfer and the public works aspects of the move, but that I would be addressing myself to the other aspect mentioned by the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Begin). It was to that end that I was making my remarks, and I was certainly keeping myself within the timeframe the minister used in making her remarks, as did my colleague in respect of the timeframe used by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan).

Mr. Speaker: If that were the case, it would have been much easier. In fact, hon. members who have spoken until now have used equivalent time to that occupied by both ministers. However, in case there is any confusion—it is a rather extraordinary occurrence—I should reflect in favour of the hon. member and allow him a brief comment, as certainly the statement by the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Begin) was brief. That may, of course, have a restrictive effect on questioning. But in any case, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich may continue.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): As I was saying, it has taken some time for the message to get across the floor, because this situation has existed for some time. Here, again, I echo the comments of my colleague about the matter of failure to consult. However, I am really delighted that the minister and her colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald), have at long last managed to persuade the taxing authorities in the province of Quebec that some sort of accommodation on this tax problem could be made in order to relieve the burden suffered by public servants who, without being consulted and being in danger of losing their jobs if they refused to move, found that their place of work was transferred into a higher tax area.

The formula is a complicated one, at least as it was laid out in the minister's statement, but if I understand it correctly, the formula consists of an undertaking by the provincial authorities in Quebec to reduce the amount of their provincial tax so that the burden of taxation would be no heavier than it was before the move. Nothing, however, is mentioned about retroactivity or the immediate refund, on application, of over deductions which have been made.

What puzzles me is that the provincial authority has undertaken to act in the case of employees in federal departments, whereas the federal government will have to act to reduce the tax deductions on others. I quite understand in the case of the private sector, but not in the case of Crown corporations, government boards and agencies. Does this mean that public servants alone were the target of the Quebec provincial tax collectors, whether those tax collectors were of the former Liberal government or of the current separatist government? This unusual situation requires careful analysis and I reserve the right to come back to the relevant ministers for clarification.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think hon. members ought to be provided a short period of time in which to direct questions to either of the hon. ministers.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. In his statement he said there will be no overlap between these moves to Hull and decentralization outside the national capital, with the minor exception of a few smaller units already announced involving approximately 450 jobs in all. So that I may understand, does this mean that, in effect, there will be no further moves of positions outside the national capital region—and that includes both sides of the river—until such time as the relocation of government offices to Hull has been completed?

Mr. Buchanan: That is correct, Mr. Speaker. If my memory is correct, I believe the cheque redemption centre of the Department of Supply and Services in Matane, plus the three taxation data centres in Surrey, Shawinigan and St. John's, are the ones which employ the 450 employees to whom I made reference, and that will occur during the same period. Other than that there will be no decentralization prior to the completion of the relocation to Hull. Any further decentralization will be subsequent to that.

Public Service

Mr. Poulin: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. Just as a preliminary comment, I must say that I am disappointed that this announcement has been made with respect to further relocations to Hull, in view of the fact that last October it was estimated that there was 2.5 million square feet of vacant office space and now we find that 4 million square feet are being returned to the private sector. Will there be additional square feet of presently occupied private sector office space vacated by the federal government when those plans which the minister hopes to be announcing in there weeks with respect to decentralization have taken effect? Will decentralization result in further vacancies of private sector office space in the city of Ottawa?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I am not quite clear in this regard. The question is similar to the one previously posed. Is the hon. member asking if in the years 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985 there will be additional decentralization?

Mr. Poulin: In his statement the minister indicated that some 4 million square feet will be returned to the private sector, and he indicated certain branches, government boards, bureaux and departments which will be relocated in Hull. My question is, will decentralization result in the vacating of additional space to those 4 million square feet referred to?

Mr. Buchanan: No, Mr. Speaker. The vacancies for the small decentralization to which I made reference are included in that figure.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister why he did not reconstitute the joint committee on the national capital and put this proposal to that committee, since it spent so much time examining this very problem.

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, part of the problem is that we are simply carrying out this previously announced program, as I mentioned at the beginning. The increase in Crown-owned facilities was announced by one of my predecessors. I believe it was the late Arthur Laing who, back in 1969, indicated that this was the intent of the federal government. In the intervening years difficulties have been created, in particular, excess space which was created by the slowdown in the rate of growth of the public service.

An hon. Member: What?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): What did you say?

Mr. Buchanan: Otherwise, this is something which would have been absorbed without the creation of the significant vacancy to which my hon. colleagues on this side of the House just made reference. Really, it is simply the logical continuation. The buildings have been very evident: there for all to see. They have been building for many years across the river and this is simply carrying through to completion the undertakings given by the late Arthur Laing in 1969 and 1970 when he made statements about adjusting the balance between the amount of leased space and the amount of Crown-owned space in the national capital region.

Public Service

● (1550)

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, has the minister been in touch with the Ottawa regional group, has he explained what he is going to do, and has he had any comment from them on this proposal? In other words, does it meet with the approval of the municipalities in Ottawa and the Ottawa regional group?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, there has been consultation on this at the official level. I have had meetings which involved the mayor of the city of Ottawa, and I was chatting with him concerning this announcement earlier today. We have had several meetings prior to today to lay to rest the incorrect allegations of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. There have been ongoing discussions. There obviously has not been great happiness on their part at seeing the quantum of space that we are letting go back to the private sector, but it involves the expiry of our leases on these spaces. There has been some concern about that and about the impact on the city of Ottawa.

We hope that over the timespan involved, a significant portion of this will be absorbed by the private sector. In addition, I understand that certain buildings amongst those we are vacating are comparable to some of our own buildings which are on the list for demolition. We anticipate that these buildings in the private sector will be demolished as well. I would not suggest they are jumping up and down for joy at the results, but on the other hand I think there is acceptance of this as a program that has been in train for several years and that this is the outcome. The intensity or the extent of the vacancy will be severely increased by the diminution of 4, 5 or 6 per cent in the rate of growth in the public service in this area back to something like 0.6 per cent.

During his preliminary remarks the hon. member made reference to the question of decentralization. This deals also with a question from the hon. member for Ottawa Centre. The government's commitment in the medium and longer term to the importance of decentralization remains, but it is our intention that in the short term there will be none while the community goes through—any "additional", I should say—this process of absorbing the fairly significant amounts of space which will be going back to the private sector.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Bearing in mind the length of the statements, it would appear to me from those members who have been seeking the floor for some time that the questioning would be equitably distributed by recognizing these other hon. members: the hon. member for Richmond, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, and the hon. member for Hull. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in addition to his colleague the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge, seeks to round that out, I would have no objection.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the minister said a moment ago that he would continue to decentralize government services in the capital or in Hull. I agree with the principle of decentralization, but I am concerned about one thing: the minister said it was very difficult to decide where some government services should be sent. It is very difficult to know where they will be sent. Are these criteria determined in advance and are they available to members of Parliament and the public?

[English]

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, basically I think one of the policies is to try to decentralize generally to the smaller and slower growth regions of our country, but I am trespassing to a degree on the preserve of two of my colleagues. It is the responsibility of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to deal with decentralization in the first phase, and then it will revert to the President of the Treasury Board. This question would be more appropriately addressed to either of those ministers.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, could the minister tell us whether he will inform hon. members on which basic criteria he bases himself to diversify or move one portion of the services provided by a department in a given sector, so that they can be better informed?

[English]

Mr. Buchanan: I will be happy to draw the comments and representations of the hon. member to the attention of my colleagues.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to ask the minister about the annual rate of growth of the public service, from 186,000 in 1961, to 320,000 now. It has almost doubled in 15 years. However, since I was commenting on the remarks of the Minister of National Revenue—

[Translation]

I wonder if she could explain the second paragraph of the statement, particularly the distinction between civil servants of federal departments and other employees, and between the provincial responsibility regarding tax reductions on one hand and, on the other the federal responsibility regarding deductions at source?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I understood the allusion of my colleague from the opposition when he welcomed in a much more positive way this agreement with Quebec.

This agreement is the result of negotiations. I think that the whole House will welcome the result for all the employees living in one province and working in another, particularly for Ontarians working in Quebec, whether they work in the private sector, the public sector or else for Crown agencies or for the public service. The net result is the same for everyone and those persons will not be taxed according to the present legislation, that is depending on the province where they work, but according to the amount of taxes they should be paying after one year.

I feel that one should not expect more from negotiations than what is universally hoped for. In an agreement concerning civil servants, we have obtained that the minimum cost of energy and administrative changes be assumed by Quebec. We have decided to assume the other part of responsibilities, namely, those concerning Crown corporations.

Moreover, the hon. member mentioned retroactive pay and reimbursement. I feel that there is no question of that. We are now in the second half of May. We have just signed this agreement which hopefully will become operative on July 1. Unfortunately, there will be no retroactive pay for the past six months. This is the lesser of two evils, a price we had to pay to reach a settlement which will benefit everyone in future years.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): What about the previous years?

Miss Bégin: They already are entitled to a reimbursement for the previous years.

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I have two questions I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works whom I thank for his announcement since, as you know, we have waited since 1917 for some of the manna that was pouring over Ottawa, the official capital of Canada. I think that Hull has been recognized since 1922 as part of the national capital area. Even the Tory government, which preceded the Liberal government, did recognize that legislation in 1958.

As for the other hon. members from the area who are getting impatient, I would ask them to be as patient as we have been on the Hull side. My first question, since reference was made to consultation, Mr. Speaker, is the following: Is it not true that the major consultations took place at the Confederation of Tomorrow conference in Toronto in 1969? I am wondering if the wishes expressed at that conference were not that the national capital area should be officially recognized as the capital of Canada. So, has there been some consultation in that regard?

Following the answer to that question, I would like to direct another question to the minister, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister intend to make his cabinet colleagues aware of the need to amend section 16 of the Constitution so that the capital of Canada be at last the national capital area, and that we do away with those useless, pointless, fanatical and sectarian complications we are always running into when something is going on in Hull while basically it should be in Ottawa, since we all live in the national capital area. So I wonder if the minister will make his colleagues aware of that.

● (1600)

[English]

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, I understand there has been considerable consultation over a period of years relating to this matter with which I am not as familiar as the hon. member, his length of service in this House being longer than mine. He is familiar with the source of the plan and when it was decided to put it into effect. I am certain that his suggestion that the plan flowed from the Conference of Tomorrow is correct. As for his representation concerning article 16, I will be happy to draw it to the attention of my colleagues.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, answering the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge, the minister said that the buildings were erected with this philosophy: If the buildings are built, we will fill them. In other words, it was suggested that the public service would grow. At some stage the government must have changed this plan. In order that members may assess better studies and consultations carried on with respect to changes in plans, the curtailment of growth of the public service and its requirements for buildings, would the minister table those documents which preceded the decision which the minister says was made in 1969 by the late Hon. Arthur Laing? Also, would he table the studies which could help us to follow the course the government intends to follow during and after 1977? That is my first question.

Second, is the minister in a position to indicate what the situation is with respect to the holidays of public servants who live in Ontario but work in Hull? Are public servants who live in Ontario and work in Hull to celebrate the holidays of the province of Quebec, or those of the province of Ontario?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Or both?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Or both? Are they to be given the option of expressing a preference?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, if I may answer the hon. member's questions in reverse order, I will check with my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, as to what the treatment will be with respect to holidays of those who work in Quebec but live in Ontario. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich raised the question of growth in the public service. Significant diminution of the rate of growth in the public service has only taken place since the 1975-76 fiscal year. That diminution in growth continued in the 1976-77 and the 1977-78 fiscal years.

Frankly, if we had continued with rates of growth in effect as late as 1974-75, the buildings we erected would in large measure have been occupied by the increasing numbers of public servants.

I can remember, as a new cabinet member, expressing my horror at seeing some figures regarding the rate of growth and the amount of space which would be required. I saw these figures late in 1974 and stated, "I guess you are saying that every three years we are going to require the equivalent of two Place Bell Canada's simply to accommodate growth." The response to that question was "Yes." A major factor which has altered the situation is the dramatic cut which has occurred in the rate of growth of the public service. As soon as I became Minister of Public Works and was made aware of the results which would flow from curtailing this growth, I raised the possibility of stopping, or mothballing projects already started, such as Terrace de la Chaudière, phase 4 across the river in Hull, and 240 Sparks Street.

Mr. Paproski: You will take these projects out of mothballs next year, just in time for the election.

Mr. Buchanan: However, each and everyone of these structures was at the point where it was neither reasonable nor practicable to stop construction.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a short question to the Minister of Public Works. I am sure he knows that some of us feel it is a crying shame that the view of the Peace Tower has been blocked in so many directions. Since I can still see it from my room in Parkwood Hills, six miles away, I say woe betide the developer who puts a high-rise building between my window and the Peace Tower. Is the Minister of Public Works prepared to do all he can to preserve the view of the parliament buildings and of the Peace Tower and to prevent the obliteration of that view from other directions?

Mr. Buchanan: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am happy to give that assurance to the hon. member. I, too, stand on my balcony and admire the view of the Peace Tower from three or four miles away. We both share that pleasure. I want the hon. member to continue to enjoy it.

Mr. Friesen: The minister has only to stand on tiptoe and he can see the tower from anywhere in Ottawa.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 514, 1476, 1847, 1850, 1913, 1933, 2017, 2034, 2184, 2236, 2266, 2269, 2281, 2318 and 2360.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AMARANTH, RED DYE NO. 2

Question No. 1,847—Mr. Yewchuk:

By category and brand, to which prepared foods on sale in Canada is it permitted for a manufacturer to add Amaranth (Red Dye No. 2)?

[Mr. Buchanan.]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Amaranth may be added to the following categories of foods: (1) Apple, or rhubarb, and (naming the fruit) jam; bread; butter; cheese; chocolate drink; concentrated fruit juice; (naming the flavour) dairy drink; fig marmalade with pectin; ice cream mix; ice milk mix; icing sugar; (naming the fruit) jam with pectin; (naming the fruit) jelly with pectin; liqueurs and alcoholic cordials; (naming the flavour) milk; pickles and relishes; pineapple marmalade with pectin; sherbet; smoked fish, lobster paste and fish roe (caviar); tomato catsup. (2) Unstandardized foods such as gelatin desserts, gravy mixes; cake mixes. The Food and Drug Regulations do not require manufacturers of food products to inform the Health Protection Branch of the presence of this colour in their products.

TARTRAZINE, YELLOW NO. 5

Question No. 1,850—Mr. Yewchuk:

By category and brand, to which prepared foods on sale in Canada is it permitted for a manufacturer to add Tartrazine (Yellow No. 5)?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Tartrazine is permitted to be added to the following categories of foods: (1) Apple, or rhubarb, and (naming the fruit) jam; bread; butter; cheese; chocolate drink; concentrated fruit juice: (naming the flavour) dairy drink; fig marmalade with pectin; ice cream mix; ice milk mix; icing sugar; (naming the fruit) jam with pectin; (naming the fruit) jelly with pectin; liqueurs and alcoholic cordials; (naming the flavour) milk; pickles and relishes; pineapple marmalade with pectin, sherbet; smoked fish, lobster paste and fish roe (caviar); tomato catsup. (2) Unstandardized foods such as gelatin desserts, gravy mixes, cake mixes. The Food and Drug Regulations do not require manufacturers of food products to inform the Health Protection Branch of the presence of this colour in their products.

GRANTS UNDER INDIAN AND ESKIMO PROGRAMME

Question No. 1,913—Mr. Laprise:

For the fiscal year (a) 1974-75 (b) 1975-76, has the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development made any grants under the Indian and Eskimo Affairs Programme to natives who have (i) signed (ii) not signed the James Bay Agreement and, if so, in each case, in what amount?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): (a)(i) Nil; (ii) Nil. (b)(i) Nil; (ii) Nil.

HANSEN'S DISEASE

Question No. 1,933—Mr. Epp:

1. What was the number of immigrants coming into Canada with Hansen's disease (Leprosy) in (a) 1970 (b) 1971 (c) 1972 (d) 1973 (e) 1974 (f) 1975 (g) 1976 and, in each case (i) what number were illegal immigrants (ii) what was the respective country of origin?

2. What number of Canadians, in the past five years, have returned to Canada with confirmed cases of Hansen's disease?

3. Is the "Scratch Test" given to all members of a family of immigrants after it is determined that a member of that family has Hansen's disease?

4. How soon after their arrival in Canada do immigrants have access to "compulsory medical benefits" if they have an illness such as Hansen's disease?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. No immigrants have been admitted advertently into Canada with a documented diagnosis of Leprosy, between 1970 and 1976. Applicants are examined and entry is refused if Leprosy is diagnosed. There is no record available of the health status of illegal immigrants.

2. The federal government has no readily available information on the number of Canadians who have returned to Canada with a documented diagnosis of Hansen's Disease. Requests for such information should be directed to provincial health authorities.

3. Lepromin intradermal test (MITSUDA) has no diagnostic value and is only useful in classifying the disease between the two distinct major clinical types: lepromatous and tuberculoid.

4. In general, new residents to a province can obtain medical care benefits on the first day of the third month from the date on which residence is assumed in that province. However, all provinces provide first day coverage on arrival to bona fide residents who have no immediate opportunity to acquire coverage, whether they are affected by Hansen's or any other disease. This applies to the following groups in all provinces except British Columbia, where it applies to new residents in group (a) only: (a) newborns, non-Canadian spouses (of Canadian residents) assuming residence in Canada for the first time, members of the Canadian Armed Forces and the R.C.M.P., and prisoners. (b) Landed immigrants, repatriated and returning Canadians.

RCMP PERSONNEL RECEIVING PENSIONS

Question No. 2,017—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. How many retired Royal Canadian Mounted Police personnel are receiving pensions, including their basic pensions and any supplement or supplements added thereto, of amounts within each of the following brackets (a) less than $20.00 per month (b) $20.00 to $29.99 per month (c) $30.00 to $39.99 per month (d) $40.00 to $49.99 per month (e) $50.00 to $59.99 per month (f) $60.00 to $69.99 per month (g) $70.00 to $79.99 per month (h) $80.00 to $89.99 per month (i) $90.00 to $99.99 per month (j) $100.00 to $149.99 per month (k) $150.00 to $199.99 per month (l) $200.00 to $249.99 per month (m) $250.00 to $299.99 per month (n) $300.00 to $399.99 per month (o) $400.00 per month and over?

2. How many widows of RCMP personnel or of retired RCMP personnel are receiving pensions, including their basic pensions and any supplement or supplements added thereto, of amounts within each of the brackets indicated in the above question?

3. What is the number of retired RCMP personnel and also the number of widows of RCMP personnel or of retired RCMP personnel presently residing in each province?

4. In respect of how many orphans of RCMP personnel are pensions being paid and what is the average amount thereof?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): 1 and 2.

BEEF CONSUMED IN PENITENTIARIES

Question No. 2,034—Mr. Ellis:

Is the beef consumed in penitentiaries (a) Canadian (b) imported?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): The purchases of beef for the Canadian Penitentiary Service are made by Supply and Services Canada to Canadian Government Specification 32-GP-44c, Type 1, Grade B, which permits only Canadian beef.

CBC—CAPTIONS TO NEWS FOR CANADIANS WITH HEARING DEFICIENCIES

Question No. 2,184—Mr. Fairweather:

1. Has CBC considered adding captions to the news, public affairs and other programmes in order that Canadians with hearing deficiencies might enjoy such programmes?

2. (a) What would be the cost of adding such captions to the National News (b) would the cost be comparable for public affairs and entertainment programmes?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. Yes, but the suggestion has not been implemented because of potential distraction and annoyance to the majority of viewers and the consequent loss of audience, and the time required to make captions for news programs that are often changed as they are broadcast in different time zones, as well as the costs involved.

2. (a) No firm costs are available, but the capital cost would be approximately $50,000 for a character generator, and operating costs would be approximately $150,000 a year. (b) There would be no extra capital cost but the operating costs would be increased.

[Mr. Fox.]

CBC DOCUMENTARY SERIES "CARCAJOU ET LE PÉRIL BLANC"

Question No. 2,236—Mr. Laprise:

With reference to the documentary series Carcajou et le péril blanc prepared by and shown on Radio-Canada (a) who paid for the study (b) how many programmes does the series comprise (c) have any programmes been censured and, if so (i) how many (ii) by whom (iii) for what reason?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: (a) The CBC did not pay for the study for the series "Carcajou et le péril blanc", shown on its French TV network. This project was submitted to the Corporation by les Ateliers Audiovisuels of Montreal, and the study was made by Rémi Savard, ethnologist, and Arthur Lamothe, film-maker. (b) Seven one hour episodes. (c) The CBC had an option on an eighth episode, which it did not take up, because it did not conform to CBC program policies. This last documentary dealt with a complex issue that is controversial and did not offer the diversity of points of view or the further opinions and evidence which such a subject calls for.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—EQUIPMENT, PERSONAL ARMOUR

Question No. 2,266—Mr. McKinnon:

Is the Department of National Defence buying $198,242 worth of personal armour and, if so (a) in what quantity (b) under which of the four roles of the forces is it expected that the armour will be used?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Yes. (a) 22 personal armour Explosive Ordnance Disposal Suits are being purchased. (b) The equipment is required to provide protection to Canadian Forces personnel involved in neutralization of homemade bombs and explosives devices. The armour will be used under the role of surveillance and protection of Canada's sovereign territory and specifically to provide aid to civil law enforcement agencies on request.

FEDERAL PENAL INSTITUTIONS

Question No. 2,269—Mr. Patterson:

Which five constituencies contain the greatest number of federal penal institutions and, how many are in each constituency?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Kingston and the Islands, Ontario, 6 institutions; Duvernay, Québec, 5 institutions; Fraser Valley-East, British Columbia, 4 institutions; Hastings-Frontenac, Ontario, 4 institutions; Terrebonne, Québec, 3 institutions.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—EQUIPMENT, HANDCUFFS

Question No. 2,281—Mr. McKinnon:

Has the Department of National Defence ordered handcuffs from William Scully Limited and, if so (a) is the value of the order $12,499 (b) how many pairs are being purchased (c) what stocks of handcuffs are currently held by the Department of National Defence (d) for what reason is it necessary to add to the stocks currently held?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Yes, through the Department of Supply and Services. (a) Yes. (b) 915 pairs. (c) 1,585 pairs in use, seven in stock. (d) To bring stocks to the approved level and to meet maintenance needs for a 27 month period.

CBC—PART-TIME AND FREE-LANCE PERSONNEL

Question No. 2,318—Mr. O'Sullivan:

1. What have been the total amounts spent by CBC on fees for services rendered by (a) part-time employees (b) free-lance personnel in the years (i) 1974-75 (ii) 1975-76 (iii) 1976-77?

2. What is the estimated total cost of such services for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1978?

3. What amount, each year, was paid to persons not resident in Canada?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1.

		($000's)
		1974-75	1975-76	1976-77
	(a)	4,823	6,828	7,646
	(b)	30,366	37,164	39,025
2.	Part-time	$ 8,300,000
	Free-lance	$42,500,000
3.		($000's)
		1974-75	1975-76	1976-77
		530	711	796

NOTE: 1976-77 amounts are estimated on the basis of known results for 11 months to February 28, 1977.

CBC—CLAIM OF JOHN TURNER AGAINST CORPORATION

Question No. 2,360—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Was a statement of claim filed on Monday, July 21, 1975 in the Ontario Supreme Court, Toronto, Ontario by Mr. John Turner against the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation seeking $100,000 in damages plus legal costs and, if so, has a settlement been reached?

2. If a settlement has been reached (a) was it in or out of the Supreme Court of Ontario (b) what were its terms (c) on what date did it take place?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. A Statement of Claim and Writ were served on July 14, 1975. A settlement has been reached.

2. (a) Out of court. (b) A broadcast apology on three radio broadcasts on July 2, 1976; payment of costs by CBC; Mr. Turner discontinued the Ontario legal action as well as two other actions commenced in the Federal Court of Canada and the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. (c) The terms of settlement were agreed to on June 30, 1976.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF (NO. 2)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-55, to amend the Customs Tariff (No. 2), be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to give effect to the amendments to the Customs Tariff which were proposed in the budget of March 31, 1977. The amendments fall into three broad categories: first, those required to continue in force for another year the temporary tariff reductions which would otherwise have expired on June 30, 1977; second, those designed to implement certain concessions for products of interest to the developing countries which we have agreed to make in the context of the discussions in Geneva on multilateral trade negotiations; and third, a number of miscellaneous amendments, including the withdrawal of the British preferential tariff rate on certain machinery imported from Britain and Ireland.

First let me deal with the question of temporary reductions. The principal provisions of the bill, in clause 3 and schedule II, provide for the extension until June 30, 1978, of a large number of temporary tariff reductions on consumer goods which were originally introduced as an anti-inflation measure in the budget of February 19, 1973. The value of imports affected is about $1.4 billion in terms of 1976 trade. About $400 million of this is in the food sector. Other products covered by the package include drugs and pharmaceuticals, kitchen and dinnerware, hand tools, photographic equipment and sporting goods.

The coverage of the package as of July 1, 1977, will differ in three respects from that now in effect. First, the reduced rates of duty on lighting fixtures are being allowed to expire on June 30 because of the difficulties domestic manufacturers have had in competing against imports. Second, the duty on refined sugar is being increased by one-fifth of a cent per pound to provide refiners with the net amount of protection recommended by the Tariff Board when it reviewed the tariffs on sugar several years ago. I should point out, however, that the new rates of duty on refined sugar are still below those which were in effect prior to the 1973 budget. All we are doing is restoring them to the levels which were in effect between February, 1973, and November, 1974. Third, tariff reductions on several tropical products which were previously part of the temporary measure are being continued in force on a permanent basis pursuant to the provisions in the bill relating to concessions for developing countries.

With respect to concessions to developing countries, the second category, the proposed tariff reductions on products of special interest to developing countries have been discussed with these countries in the "tropical products group" which was set up in the framework of the multilateral trade negotiations. This group was established to see if something could be done on a priority basis, before the end of the negotiations as a whole, to improve the export earnings and balance of trade of the developing countries.

The Canadian concessions are of two kinds. First, we have added a number of products to the list of goods that are eligible for the general preferential tariff, which applies only to imports from developing countries. Second, we have also reduced or removed the permanent most favoured nation tariff on a number of "tropical products" which are produced mainly in developing countries. The concessions which are being implemented through changes in the general preferential tariff are provided for in clause 2 and schedule I of the bill, while those being implemented on a most favoured nation basis are provided for in clause 4 and schedule III. These proposed changes will affect about $100 million of imports from developing countries.

The third category, as I indicated, is with regard to some miscellaneous tariff charges. As I have indicated, the most important amendment in the miscellaneous group—clauses 5 and 6 and schedules IV and V—is the proposal to make certain machinery and related equipment from Britain and Ireland subject to the 15 per cent most favoured nation rate rather than the 2½ per cent British preferential rate. This amendment flows from the study of the tariffs on machinery from Britain and Ireland which I announced in the budget of 1976.

This study was initiated as a result of representations from Canadian manufacturers that imports of British machinery at the preferential rate were adversely affecting production in Canada. Canada, of course, is no longer required to accord preferential tariff treatment to imports from Britain and Ireland since they withdrew preferences on our exports when they joined the European Economic Community.

On the basis of our review to date, we concluded that the Canadian manufacturers of the nine categories of machinery which are being added to the provisions of tariff item 42701-1 had made a case for withdrawal of the preferential rate at this time. When machinery in these categories is not available from Canadian sources, the duty can be remitted under the machinery program. The Department of Finance will continue to monitor the situation with respect to imports of other kinds of machinery from Britain and Ireland. The bill also provides authority for an increase of 2½ percentage points in the duties on polypropylene resin and on certain products made from this resin. Canadian production of the resin will come onstream in the near future.

The schedule of miscellaneous amendments also provides for continuation of duty-free entry on a temporary basis for various petroleum products and for aircraft. Other amendments are designed to resolve certain problems which have come to light. A number of these are of a relieving nature; for example, the provisions which will accord free entry to cameras and other equipment for the production of films. On the other hand, the $7,500 value limit on individual articles which may be brought back by Canadians duty and tax free after a period of residence abroad is designed to prevent abuse of existing duty and tax free provisions.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a general review of the items involved. In committee of the whole I will, of course, be glad to deal with any specific questions.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the non-items arising out of a very bland budget. We received some amendments to Customs Tariffs in the past which were really much more noticeable or had a much higher profile from a policy point of view. For example, in schedule II there is an extension of two years of a three-year program of tropical fruits and certain things. I was very struck by the first item in 705-2, the admission of frogs legs free into Canada.

It may be that some people consider that a Customs Tariff is a very dry-bones subject and has no humour in it. I do not want to take too much time on this particular bill. I have already mentioned frogs legs in schedule I on page 5. The same schedule, on page 6, refers to fruits, dried, desiccated, evaporated or dehydrated; namely, breadfruit, guavas, litchis, mangoes, mangosteens, pineapples and soursop. What is soursop? I am sure even the minister does not know that one. Item 10525-5 takes you through mangosteens, soursop and mangoes, including mango chutney, which is a particular delicacy for my colleague, the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse). He really loves mango chutney and will be quite happy with that.

On these particular points I would like to know from the minister if, as a result of the three years special tariff on these tropical fruits and part of the extension of freedom of the Canadian market to developing countries outside of the general preferential tariff, there has been any movement of goods into the country. Do items such as these, where we now have free entry, mean anything? Is there a meaningful movement into the country—of a particularly sophisticated kind, I will admit—of such items as 13300-2, caviar being prepared from sturgeon roe, being admitted free? There are others.

One I find most intriguing is item 52306-1, page 8, schedule I. I wonder why this particular item is now being admitted free. This has to with industrial shop towels, hemmed but not bleached or dyed except for identification markings. It lists the various sizes. Are there not, within the Canadian textile industry, ample facilities to produce these industrial shop towels at a price where foreign imports could not be used to drive down prices, that is, costs in the industrial field; or is it in response to representations from any particular country or countries that this is something they would like to sell us in reasonable quantities in exchange for their purchase of other Canadian goods? I think we should have an explanation.

I do not want to belabour this bill. A good deal was said about the principles of it as we debated the tax changes and tariff changes during the budget debate. Several of my colleagues are going to question certain parts as their particular areas may be most severely affected by some of these proposals. I was a little surprised that the minister did not speak about what he felt was the progress on the present GATT talks at Geneva out of the Tokyo round. I was disappointed he did not tell us what progress the government had made in responding to the serious representations made by members on this side of the House as well as by some of the provincial premiers whose full intention it is to insist upon consultation with the provinces with respect to tariff changes. It seems to me that not only do they have a point, but that they have an indisputable case. There is no question but that the premiers have full jurisdiction with regard to development within their own provinces, and unilateral action on the part of the government of Canada in the course of these negotiations, without disclosing what is being acquired and what is being given away, is simply not good enough. A province might very well find that its industrial policy had been thoroughly undermined.

I have mentioned before the implementation of certain features of the Kennedy round having to do with the heavy chemical producing industry across the country. That industry was hard pressed, to start with, as a result of the Kennedy round negotiations. Indeed, it seemed to me that in many instances the concessions made in the field of industrial chemicals were regarded as among the throw-away items. The changes which were to be implemented were to be placed on a five-year basis. But less than two years after the conclusion of the Kennedy round the then minister of finance, Mr. Benson, suddenly telescoped all the remaining reductions into one year. The result was, of course, disastrous for the chemical industry.

I, for one, and my colleagues from Alberta as well, will be very reluctant to accept any concessions made at the GATT negotiations which will further seriously affect the developing industrial chemical industry in Alberta. I suppose that in toto it is the biggest such complex in the country. The problems it faces are already tough enough, in the face of world competition. There is the distance from markets, for example. A considerable element of transportation cost is involved before getting to offshore.

The situation is tough. These firms are finding it hard to meet competition in the domestic market on the basis that a world-scale plant produces 8 per cent to 10 per cent, so perhaps a little more of that plant's capacity will satisfy the Canadian market. So I want to know, as do my colleagues, to what degree is there consultation? By this I mean active consultation, not a telephone call the night before a decision is taken. I mean actual participation on the negotiating teams of representatives of industry and the provincial governments.

In this respect I think we should seek to emulate our United States counterparts who, incidentally, are very successful in these tariff negotiations. They take their people into their confidence and are quite open about what they want to do. Somehow or other, we seem to believe in playing our cards very close to the vest; we think everything ought to be kept under the shell, obliging our own people to guess where the pea is hidden.

I see the minister making notes in readiness to reply. Several of my hon. friends have brief comments to make. We do not believe there should be a very extensive debate over this bill, and if the minister is forthcoming in his answers I do not doubt we shall make good progress with this measure. Subject to my commitments on the estimates committee which is dealing with the Department of National Revenue this evening, I hope we can progress rapidly in dealing with Bill C-54.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise simply to say that we are quite prepared to have the bill go into committee of the whole forthwith.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to debate this bill. We very seldom have an opportunity to talk in this House on the important subject of Customs Tariffs, but it is a very important subject to Canadian industry. This is an opportunity which usually comes to us after a budget. We get these changes in Customs Tariffs usually involving the lowering of tariffs or else keeping the status quo. Very seldom, if ever, are any of the tariffs raised in the rush by the government to get into a free trade situation as quickly as possible.

Today, many segments of industry in Canada are facing hard times. I think particularly of small manufacturing businesses and related enterprises. I think, for example, of firms manufacturing recreational vehicles, motor homes and mobile homes. Times are hard for the boat manufacturers, the electronics industry, the textile industry and the shoe manufacturing industry. Only recently we were hearing noises from the manufacturers of parts for automobiles. Then, as always, there is the case of farm products. These industries are finding it increasingly hard to compete with imports, and the tariff structure, or lack of it, is one factor which makes it difficult for them to do so.

The manufacture of recreational vehicles and mobile homes is quite extensive in my riding. It is important to large numbers of my constituents. Representations have been made to the minister over the past few months with regard to the tariff imposed on the component parts used in the manufacture of these vehicles. The tariff was lowered to 15 per cent a few years ago, but the charge on most of the parts which are not manufactured in Canada and would have to be imported is between 17½ per cent and 20 per cent. This means that if a recreational vehicle is manufactured in the United States, for instance, and shipped into Canada, the component parts in that vehicle are charged at only 15 per cent. However, if a manufacturer in Canada goes to the United States and buys the parts there, he is obliged to pay between 17½ per cent and 20 per cent, which is really not fair trade. It makes it difficult for the Canadian manufacturer to compete. The whole tariff field is complex and difficult to understand.

● (1630)

Quite often when tariff changes are made there is a chain of reaction against manufacturers or industry in Canada. Unfortunately, manufacturers of recreational homes are considering moving from Canada to the United States, as are other industries today. This is a situation we should not allow to happen. There is very high unemployment in Canada and we are looking for ways and means of employing people, yet the situation is such that industries are caused to move from Canada because it is more profitable for them to export their products back to Canada from some other country.

We cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker. If we are to do something to assist major industry and business in Canada, we must take a good, hard look at the situation and make sure that we do not inhibit manufacturers from producing their goods in Canada. We need employment. We cannot export people along with our manufacturers, yet we make it very easy for manufacturers simply to pick up and move out, make a profit in another country and send their products back here.

The electronics industry is in the same situation today as textiles and farm products. Although this is not the entire fault of tariffs, quite a lot of the blame is. Most of the problem has to do with trade and trading and bringing imports into Canada, and this is where the tariff structure comes in. People in the electronics industry talk about fair trade, just as do the people who produce farm products, and they see very many areas where we do not have fair trade. Our exports have to meet trade barriers, while we make it very easy to import into Canada.

Let me now come to my favourite topic, farm products. Bill C-55 deals with many farm products and continues temporary tariff reductions which were made previously. These reductions apply to products such as asparagus, beets, carrots and tomato juice—products that we should encourage Canadians to grow. Quite a few people in Canada argue that if we can get these products cheaper somewhere else, then let us import them and not worry about the Canadian farmer. But that is not the way to build this nation; we cannot build the nation with that kind of philosophy.

These same people are telling us to make sure that we do not pave any more farmland. I agree with them, because in time we are going to need all the farmland we can get. That is why we must ensure that our farmers get the chance to make a decent living. I have quite often heard Liberal governments say we should stabilize farming, that we should have stabilization programs, but in the long run I do not believe that stabilization programs are necessarily the best way to preserve agriculture. What we also need is proper protection in our tariff structure.

A couple of weeks ago the report of the Tariff Board respecting fresh and processed fruits and vegetables was laid on the table. I do not know when we will have a chance to discuss the report in the House, if ever. Seldom do we get the opportunity to discuss anything to do with tariffs in this House. We have the GATT round and the Kennedy round, and pretty well such decisions are made by the bureaucracy and approved by cabinet. Such matters are not really discussed in the House of Commons where the opposition has a chance to say something.

The Tariff Board report on fruits and vegetables is a very good one and certainly does not go along the lines of the action taken by the Minister of Finance over the last few years of reducing tariffs on farm products. The fruits and vegetables industry has done a terrific job of informing the Tariff Board about what is going on, and I certainly hope the board's recommendations will quickly be acted upon. However, we do not know what route is going to be taken to make these recommendations law and to incorporate them in the tariff provisions, if that is what is going to be done by cabinet. As I say, we do not get an opportunity to discuss the matter, which in my opinion is undesirable.

I will not take up any more time of the House except to say that, so far as the general over-all philosophy of free and fair trade is concerned, I think there should be a more complete review of the whole tariff structure so that we do not find certain tariffs penalizing producers or manufacturers in Canada. I have a few questions I should like to ask, but I will save them for when we get into committee of the whole.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I have a few comments to make on Bill C-55. At the outset I should like to echo the words of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) who underlined the importance of tariff negotiations so far as Alberta is concerned, particularly with regard to agricultural and petrochemical products. These are very important to the industrial capacity of the province of Alberta, a fact which I should like to impress upon the minister. I would like to deal today with three industries which are of grave importance to the prairies and western Canada. They are the pork industry, the beef industry and the rapeseed industry. I would like to deal with them in that order as far as tariffs are concerned.

On February 20, 1973, the tariff on canned pork was substantially reduced. This bill calls for a continuation of that reduction. This is despite the fact that the hog industry in western Canada is on the verge of collapse. The industry is in trouble, and low tariff rates have only served to aggravate the problem. In 1971, Alberta produced 2,015,000 hogs. By 1975, this figure had been slashed almost in half to a total production of only 1,242,000 hogs. Many pork packing plants across Alberta have been shut down and the remaining operations are running at 35 per cent to 50 per cent of their capacity.

Tariff rates have not been the sole, nor even the major reason, for the decline of the hog industry in western Canada. Most of these problems relate to the problem of freight rates whereby it is cheaper to ship 800 pounds of barley to eastern Canada to raise one hog than it is to raise a hog in western Canada and ship the meat out to eastern markets. It would be a favour to western markets if the tariff was increased to an adequate proportion in order to eliminate some of the import-export anomalies we see.

In 1975, $77 million worth of pork was imported into Canada. By 1976, this had increased to $144 million worth of pork shipped into this country. At the same time, we are only exporting some $93 million. You can see the effect this is having. We have doubled our imports of pork products into Canada within one year, and our exports have remained virtually the same or have dropped slightly.

I would like to deal for a moment with the continuation of low tariffs on vegetable oils. The highlights of this plight of the industry in the west is that the oilseed crushing industry is not going ahead at the pace it should be. I know of one or two plants in western Canada which are ready to start building if they could get the proper concessions as far as tariffs and freight rates are concerned. Without getting into the problem of freight rates, because I know that does not come under the jurisdiction of this bill, I would like to put before the House the supposition that if we cannot get the proper freight rate structure for the oilseed crushing plants in western Canada, maybe the answer is in a proper tariff structure.

At present it is cheaper for eastern Canada to import their vegetable oils for use in the kitchens than it is to bring in western crushed oilseed. This, of course, is because of the freight rate structure. If we could get a proper tariff structure on the importation of vegetable oils, this would provide the distinct advantage which is needed until the minister stops procrastinating on the freight rate structure and allows us to bring rapeseed oil and rapeseed meal into eastern Canada at the rate at which we are now shipping uncrushed rapeseed.

My last representation has to do with western Canada's beef industry. The item I want to refer to is the ad valorem duty which is being charged by the United States. It ranges from 7.5 per cent to 10 per cent on all boxed beef which is going into the United States. As a producer of beef in western Canada, I have to take that steer or heifer to a packing plant, have it slaughtered and put into a boxed condition ready to be shipped to the United States market directly into a store or a restaurant. I am being charged 7.5 per cent to 10 per cent ad valorem duty by the American government to send that boxed beef to the United States.

At the same time, a producer in the United States doing the same thing is allowed to bring his beef into Canada at a mere three cents per pound, which is a standard rate Canadians and Americans pay at the border for any carcass beef that crosses. This is a direct discrimination against the western beef farmer in processing his product in the packing plant. This is something we should look at very closely.

I am not advocating we should put on a 7.5 per cent to 10 per cent ad valorem duty here in Canada to offset what they are doing to the beef industry in the United States. I am advocating we should be entering into negotiations with the United States government to eliminate that discriminatory factor and allow it to cross the border at the three-cent tariff which is applied to American beef coming into Canada. All we are asking for is the same treatment. This has been going on for at least ten years, if not longer. In order to create more jobs in the packing industry in western Canada, it is absolutely essential, as we move more and more to the boxed beef trade for the restaurant market, to get the same treatment. Over a third of our meals are now eaten in restaurants, which is increasing rapidly to the point where in the next three or four years half of our meals will be eaten outside the home.

I would like to ask the minister one question in the area of small business. I cannot understand why a tariff is charged on machinery coming into this country which we are not capable of producing. To give an example of this, an industry in my riding is setting up a plant to produce plastic boxes for stores. They required a printing press to print on those plastic boxes. They were unable to find a printing press in Canada and found out that such a printing press could not be produced. Thus, they had to go outside Canada to buy the press. It cost some $300,000, and they were charged a 15 per cent tariff. That is a substantial amount of money to a small business which is scratching to get started and is faced with a sum of money like that which has to be paid to the federal government. That is unfair and is something we should look at. If we are not capable of producing that machinery in Canada, then there should be no tariff on its crossing the border.

In conclusion, it is a good practice to have no tariff on tropical produce. It is more sensible to allow that produce in free, than shipping hundreds of thousands of dollars of Canadian taxpayers' money to those countries in order to help them out with their balance of trade payments.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, to begin with, I would like to compliment the minister on one inclusion in the tariff. I am referring to item No. 46218-1 which is a tariff item that relates to the film animation industry. This is a relatively new industry in Canada. It is encouraging to see they will be able to bring related machinery into the country duty-free in at least two areas, except for the third item which is the most favoured nation column. I want to thank the minister for that. It is necessary this new industry be supported in that way and I compliment the government for recognizing this need.

Having said that, I want to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker). The policy of the government is contradictory in this area because, on the one hand, the government has created a tariff classification in order to help new industry, but on the other hand industry which is already established in Canada is having a hard time making a go of it.

● (1650)

I refer specifically to the leisure craft industry which produces campers and trailers. In my riding of Surrey-White Rock there is a large leisure vehicle industry, and because of rising taxes at all levels of government, rising labour costs and rising material costs, the industry cannot make it any longer in Canada. It is moving to the state of Washington. It is going to continue manufacturing leisure vehicles there. Canada can be serviced from the state of Washington better than if the industry is operating within Canada. Something must be rotten in the state of Denmark when a wholly-owned Canadian industry which was born in Canada and which has been operating in Canada for a couple of decades has to move to the United States to service Canada. It is time we took a new look at our taxation structure in order to help industries which are trying to make a go of it.

I would like to bring to the attention of the minister just one item. I raised this the last time there was a budget debate. It relates to marksmen, whether they are target shooters, skeet shooters, or whatever. The Canadian industry has stopped making components for ammunition; that is, shells, cartridges and shot. All those items are no longer manufactured in Canada. All you can get is the completely assembled bullet, shell, or whatever it is called, which is manufactured in Quebec. There are many people in British Columbia who are members of gun clubs and who do not want to pay the high, assembled price of those components.

Over and over again in schedule IV of the tariff we find the phrase "those items not made in Canada". I would like to ask the minister why it is not possible for this item to be declared duty-free so that people who see assembling these bullets as part of their hobby can be accommodated. Why can they not bring the component parts from the United States or from other countries and assemble them themselves? Why should they have to pay up to 12 times as much for the assembled item, when they could get it in its component parts and have the pleasure of assembling the bullets themselves, as well as saving all that money?

I know the minister will argue that this is a revenue-producing item, but if that is the case, why not for all these items? Why pick on this one item? I would like to have a clear answer from the minister as to why the tariff is on this one simple item which is important to target shooters and skeet shooters. These people purchase in large volume, and this tariff makes it very difficult for them to practice their hobby as much as they would wish. Why has the minister not included that in the tariff arrangements for this year? That is one item about which I would like to have a clear and concise answer from the minister.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few comments to show that governments sometimes admit they make mistakes, and sometimes they even take action to correct them. On December 13, 1976, during a debate on scientific research relating to a bill on government organization with regard to scientific activities, I made reference to tariff item 69605-1 which is a tariff item dealing with scientific apparatus including scientific preparations used in teaching, in research and in medical diagnoses, these items being equipment and chemicals of various types.

Over the past five years there has been a severe erosion in Canada in the area of scientific research and medical research—all kinds of research, as a matter of fact—because of a policy of this government which suggests that very much research is not really necessary in this country because we can simply import it and thereby get it at a lower cost. The tariff item to which I am referring was changed a couple of years ago. These items were free of tariff originally, but for some strange reason somebody in the government got the idea that a tariff should be applied. The result of that was to increase the hardship for research people in Canada because the cost of research went up by 6 per cent to 10 per cent. Following many vigorous representations by researchers from across the country and by hon. members from this side of the House I am pleased to note that the government has now seen the folly of its ways and has again proposed in this bill to abolish the tariff on these items.

I wanted to make these few comments in order to show the House of Commons, the country and the world that members of the opposition are not afraid to say something complimentary about the government when it is deserved. I must emphasize, however, that I am speaking strictly about one specific tariff item. There are many others on which action could have been taken which has not been taken. The government should be severely castigated for this. However, on this particular item I think the correct action has been taken.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Before I recognize the hon. minister, I wish to inform hon. members that if the minister speaks, he will close the debate.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) that a soursop is a sour-tasting fruit found in the Caribbean. The substantial question which the hon. member for Edmonton West raised was with regard to provincial consultation on the current so-called Tokyo round of negotiations. I point out to him that there has been extensive consultation among the Canadian tariffs and trade committee and industry across Canada, and that provincial governments in particular have been invited to submit their considerations which should be brought forward in the forthcoming tariff negotiations. Only some provincial governments have responded to that invitation.

Mr. Speaker, I see that you are looking restlessly at the clock, and perhaps I will be able to continue my remarks at eight o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of the adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard)—Agriculture—Brucellosis-Possibility of returning to vaccination program; the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt)—Environmental Affairs—Drilling in Beaufort Sea—Possibility of complaints from other countries about risk of oil spill and co-operation on clean-up.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills and notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

MEASURE TO PERMIT OBJECTIONS BY CITIZENS TO CHANGE OF RAIL LINE

Mr. Alan Martin (Scarborough West) moved that Bill C-207, to amend the Railway Act, as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Martin moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have very few words to say at this time, but I should like to take the opportunity of expressing my thanks to members on all sides of the House—the opposition, of course, included—and to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) for his support of a bill that I think through debate on second reading and in committee has been determined as being in the public interest. I might say that although the bill arose from problems in my own riding in connection with the expansion of the marshalling yard facility, I think it has been obvious from discussion of the bill that this kind of situation can probably affect all other ridings in the country.

The effect of the bill is to require that a public announcement will be made, when such expansion is contemplated, four weeks in advance of when it is proposed, and it will be made at no time when there are residences, commercial or public buildings within 1,000 feet of the proposed site of construction. This will give those affected an opportunity to present any objections they may have of the proposed plans to the Canadian Transport Commission, which may in turn require that the railway submit detailed plans, and it may choose to hold public hearings if that seems to be in the public interest.

The only other comment I should like to make at this time is that as a backbencher in this parliament it is encouraging to me, and I hope to other backbenchers, to see that members of parliament can indeed from time to time, with the co-operation of other members of the House, bring forward legislation that hopefully can have some useful effect across the country.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. This bill has been discussed in great detail both in committee and in the House and there has been all-party support for the proposal. My only objection—and I raised this when it was raised in the House on November 23, 1976—is that the bill does not go far enough. We felt then that the bill should also cover the selection of piggyback terminals and other large railway projects. There have been complaints in the Winnipeg area about Canadian National Railways' complete disregard for citizens and residential areas when they locate, without any proper consultation and complete disregard for objections from the city or area residents. However, as this bill progresses we hope it can cover other areas such as locating piggyback terminals. I should like to congratulate the hon. member on his bill and trust it will receive speedy passage.

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am again pleased to be able to participate in this discussion on Bill C-207 to amend section 119 of the Railway Act. As I indicated in my comments during second reading on November 23, 1976, and again on April 25, 1977, when this bill was carefully examined by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, this is a bill which addresses itself to increasing public information and awareness by requiring railroad companies to provide four weeks' public notice of plans to change or expand railway tracks in residential areas. This is an important step in making the railways more responsible and considerate of the public they serve. In this respect, I am sure that all hon. members recognize the need for adoption of this legislation.

During detailed study of this bill in committee I moved an amendment which was unanimously adopted by the committee. The amendment in no sense changed the major thrust of this private member's bill. Rather, it broadened the scope of the bill to include not only residences but also commercial and public buildings located within a distance of 1,000 feet of the planned railway facilities. The amendment also provided for the Canadian Transport Commission to exercise practical discretion in administering the act.

The railways are not required to advise local citizens when existing facilities are to be deviated, changed, expanded or otherwise, when those fall within the scope of section 119. The value of Bill C-207 to the Railway Act is reflected by the unanimous and positive reception which the bill received on second reading and in committee. I urge that this bill again receive the unanimous support of all hon. members. I should like to thank all hon. members who participated in the debate on this legislation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I just overheard that it was agreed to call it six o'clock. Is it agreed that I see the clock as reading 6 p.m.?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock p.m. and the hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 5.10 p.m. the House took recess.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF (NO. 2)

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-55, to amend the Customs Tariff (No. 2), be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I say a few words, in reply to comments made this afternoon. I began to say this afternoon, subsequent to the comment made by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) with respect to consultation, that my predecessor over two years ago invited the provinces to make submissions with regard to Canada's position at the Tokyo Round of tariff negotiations, and a few provinces have responded to that by indicating their positions. Many more have not. I would have to say that I would welcome provincial participation on this question. Indeed, I would welcome the participation of the provinces at a meeting of finance ministers, at which we could collectively address ourselves to some of the issues involved. Last, but not least, I would welcome the provinces giving some priority to considering what they would be prepared to pay in terms of trade-offs in order to get tariff reductions abroad, and to considering their objectives for developing Canadian industry.

In this particular round of tariff negotiations the provincial position is going to be relevant, because this time it will not simply be a matter of changing the Canadian tariff. Some provincial policies themselves will be the subject matter of criticism. Non-tariff barriers of various kinds to trade are up for negotiation at this time.

Since I have been Minister of Finance, I have noted one of the areas of difficulty has been not so much the policies of the federal government as the policies of various provincial governments which have been active in excluding foreign imports from Canada. I think, of course, of the policies of some liquor control boards, policies of other provincial entities with regard to government procurement, the policies of marketing boards, and so on. I think that kind of national discussion would be extremely valuable, not only for the purposes of obtaining some indication of provincial priorities, but also for the purpose of learning what they are prepared to give up in terms of provincial protection in order to secure better markets for Canadian goods abroad.

Consultation with the private sector has been actively under way for over two years in the Canadian Tariffs and Trade Committee. That process of consultation will continue in the next six months as the Tokyo round of negotiations again gains momentum.

The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker) spoke of the difficulties some Canadian manufacturers are experiencing in competing in the Canadian market, and said that one or more of them—this point was echoed by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen)—had moved their operation to the United States and were selling back to the Canadian market. That, really, is the crux of one of the major economic problems we face in Canada. Unless we can keep our costs down in this country, unless we can remain competitive on the world market, not just in the business of recreational homes to which the two hon. members referred, but in many other Canadian secondary manufacturing enterprises, our businessmen will want the future expansion of their businesses to take place outside this country. For that reason the government has put particular stress on the importance of restraining the increase of costs in this country and, particularly, restraining the increase in the rate of inflation.

The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary also referred to fresh fruits and vegetables, and referred positively to the report on fresh fruit and vegetables made by the Tariff Board and tabled recently by myself. The second part of that report on processed vegetables will be available in the early summer, and the two parts of that report will have an important role to play in forming the Canadian position with respect to negotiations at the Tokyo round, particularly negotiations with the United States.

• (2010)

Both the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary and the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) demonstrated the problems that the negotiators face, in the sense that at one time they were talking about better protection for Canadians and the next moment about better access to the American market. This is the basic problem that this country, indeed any country, faces in tariff negotiations.

What are you prepared to give up in the way of protection in Canadian industry for the purpose of getting better access to foreign markets? What are you prepared to trade off? That is the really critical question.

The hon. member for Wetaskiwin referred to the better market access he would seek for Alberta petrochemicals. That is a laudable objective if it can be achieved. He also talked about the importance of protecting certain Canadian agricultural markets in this country from penetration, particularly by United States exports. In this sense you have the contradiction that is involved in these negotiations for any country, of wanting better access for those products in which you think you have a comparative advantage as opposed to having to give up protection of a certain Canadian industry.

On the question of vegetable oils, and indeed the question of further processing on the Great Plains, I would make a reference to the discussion which occurred in the question period with respect to the freight rate system and the impact of this on manufacturing in western Canada. It is a fair comment to make that indeed the crushers of rapeseed are faced with a difficult market in western Canada.

The problem is compounded by the fact that the freight rate system favours the shipment of either rapeseed, in the case of rapeseed crushers, or barley or other feed grains out of the Great Plains to be used not only in eastern Canada, but indeed for rapesseed to be processed in the Japanese market rather than having the processing occur in western Canada. There again is another trade-off you have to face between a lower freight rate for the raw product as opposed to the freight rate you have to pay for the more refined goods.

On the ad valorem beef tariff in the United States, the imbalance between the United States and the Canadian tariff, I recognize the imbalance. That is the kind of objective we should have in mind in going to the American negotiators, pointing out in this particular case we would be seeking reciprocal treatment in this regard, which I understand is the position the hon. member took. That is a very fair position. That is the kind of proposal we would have in a specific negotiation with the United States.

Finally, with regard to the machinery being imported by a small business, the present structure of the tariff system does make provision for the kind of situation to which the hon. member refers. There is a special provision with respect to machinery imports. If indeed it can be established that the piece of machinery being imported into Canada is not of a class or kind made in Canada and is not available from Canadian producers, that particular firm is able, under the machinery program, to make an application to get a remission of the duty. The hon. member did not mention any particular time frame within which the import had been made. If he would like to pursue with me a particular case of particular import, it may well be that under the machinery program they would be entitled to have back the duty which they have paid.

The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock made reference to the problem which he raised during the customs tariff bill debate last year, that is, with regard to the import of the elements by people who, as a matter of hobby, fill their own ammunition. As a result of the kind of representation he and others have made about importing things for hobbies in Canada, we have decided to make a reference to the Tariff Board to get their recommendation as to the appropriate treatment of imports of that kind for hobbies, and their being competitive with some of the products produced in Canada. That particular question is going to be given full consideration by the Tariff Board.

That covers some of the major items raised by hon. members. As we go through from clause to clause and look at the schedules, I will be glad to elaborate further.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Ethier in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for his limited reference to my remarks on the Tariff Board report. However, he failed to tell us what input parliament will have in dealing with this report. What discussion will opposition members be able to have? Will this be dealt with through cabinet? Does it have to go to the GATT round in Geneva? There is quite a large area there on which I would certainly like an answer.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Chairman. What we have said in making the Tariff Board report public is that we would like to have reaction from the public. In particular, we would like reaction from those provincial governments such as Ontario and British Columbia which have made specific representation with regard to the tariff and other arrangements concerning fresh fruits and vegetables.

It would be very valuable within the context of this House to follow the practice that was followed about 1967 at the time the Kennedy round was under discussion and to have a discussion on the issues involved in the Kennedy round, in particular some of the trade-offs I was talking about, some of the things we have to pay in terms of tariff concessions in order to get concessions from others. Therefore, as the position becomes formulated with regard to the Canadian position abroad on the Kennedy round, I would be quite happy if we could find an appropriate order of reference to have this matter discussed in committee. Essentially, they are questions of detail, and discussion would be more appropriate there than in the House as a whole.

On the other hand, if the hon. member would like to make his views known, either personally or in writing, to me with regard to the fresh fruits and vegetables report, I would be delighted to have it in that form as well.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister about the function of the Tariff Board and the input that it might have in connection with the proposals in the bill before us. It became evident in committee that there is a great delay in the preparation of a report and the presentation or consideration of that report by the ministry. To begin with, perhaps the minister can tell us what the problem is with the delay that seems to be experienced, and also what kind of input there is from the Tariff Board itself to the ministry.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I would have to concede that one of the first questions I raised when I became the minister was a question as to the relative lapse of time involved in some of these Tariff Board hearings. I think it can be said that a greater sense of urgency has been communicated to the new chairman of the board. Miss McDougall has set some very much tighter time schedules for the production of the Board reports. A good example has been the production of the fresh fruits and vegetables report on which she has now delivered the first part, and we will be expecting the second part in the early summer. I have to correct myself, Mr. Chairman. We are not anticipating it, now, until the early fall. That is a good example, however, of the manner in which the Board's recommendation will become a basis for a policy decision by the department.

The Board has made recommendations with regard to fresh fruits and vegetables and described the way in which the tariff system is operating. We have sought public response to the Board's observations. Based on both the Board's observations and the public response, we shall go on to formulate the position to be taken in the Kennedy Round.

I give another example. The report of the Board on leisure craft has been available to the government for some time and specific items related to it are already in the government's portfolio for negotiation in the Tokyo Round. I have to say that to a great extent we have obviously been holding off in terms of making changes since many of our objectives in the negotiating round are objectives with regard to which we would prefer to withhold action until we find out the kind of return we can get. In other words, we do not want to give anything away at this point if by conceding it in the course of negotiations we can get better access for Canadian goods abroad.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Chairman, I have a news clipping from one of the Ottawa papers quoting the minister as saying that the next round of tariff negotiations will be "all too real". The gist of the article is that we are likely to find ourselves having to give a good deal away.

Bearing in mind the fact that many industries and producers in Canada believe that this country is a saint in a world of sinners as far as tariffs and trade are concerned, I should like to ask the minister this: do we intend to take a hard stand so that we are not the first to give things away as in the past? Will we be conceding tariff levels which are of importance to the electronics industry, for example, or mobile home manufacturers, or producers of farm products, to improve the position, say, of natural resources or CANDU reactors? Or will the minister go in with a hard line, such as I understand the United States intends to adopt, so that we may be able to put our unemployed to work in the manufacturing industry or in small business?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I really should not be commenting in detail on the United States position, but I would have to say, on the basis of discussions with President Carter at the London summit meeting, that he was not going into the Tokyo Round with a hard line.

An hon. Member: What about the U.S. Senate?

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Well, the President has the authority under the existing legislation, and he does not intend to seek greater protectionism. I believe this is evident from his action with regard to the request made to him by the American shoe industry. An important reality, and one which we have to bear in mind, is this: at that London summit meeting, for example, we were the only country with access to a market of less than 100 million. The Americans, with a market of 220 million, are obviously in a position of much more "heft" when it comes to what they can press for and hope to get.

Having said that, I must add that on the basis of our experience in the last Kennedy Round we can expect to get better access to foreign markets. Our negotiators have proved to be very skillful. For example, we have proposed in certain of the sectors in which we have a comparative advantage, for instance, base metals and forest products, that current high tariff levels on more highly processed products in these areas where there are quota restrictions should be lifted so as to allow better access for Canadian exports. Indeed, we are looking to get better access for Canadian manufactured goods as well. But let us not be under any illusions that we shall not, in the next decade, be operating in a very tough competitive world.

We can expect no easy free rides in the negotiations. Nor can we expect to prevent others from penetrating our markets. The fact of the matter is that even with the relatively high levels of tariff in Canada in some areas, certain products from abroad have been able to sail right in over the top of the tariff wall. One example is textiles. We could, of course, say to our people, "We are going to pay more for everything around here; we are going to put the tariff walls very much higher and exclude foreign goods." The result would be restricted access for Canadian exports and a lower standard of living for everyone. It is a tough choice.

I understand the concern expressed by the hon. member but I do not think we can turn the clock back and go for higher tariff protection. In the first place, I am not sure Canadians are prepared to pay for it, and in the second place I am quite certain other countries will not permit us to get away with that kind of claim while expecting concessions from them in the negotiations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for his earlier answers. I would like to ask him about the Tariff Board again. I have a question concerning report No. 152 of the committee. It was conceded that the report was signed by the Tariff Board on March 2, 1977, although no attention appears to have been paid to it in the budget. It then came out that it was not until April 26 or thereabouts that the report was received from the printer and therefore the minister could not have had it in his possession until after the budget was presented on March 31. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman what is the purpose of these reports which the minister receives from the Board, and when might some use be expected to be made of some of them.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I have answered that question by pointing out that the principal use of these reports will be in formulating the Canadian position in the Tokyo Round of negotiations. It would obviously be foolish to take up such a report, particularly if we are going to concede some points, before we get into the actual negotiation. For instance, in the case of the luxury craft we now have a good indication as to the structure of the industry and the kind of tariff treatment the Board thinks desirable. This is a report which we have in our portfolio for negotiation. That is why we have invited the views of the industry in Canada with regard to the Tariff Board's recommendations, and on the basis of this advice we shall formulate the Canadian position at the Tokyo Round.

Mr. Clarke: Perhaps I could refer to report No. 149 on the pleasure craft, commissioned, I believe, in 1971. It took a long time to prepare. I cannot see the date. Anyway, it was received by the minister in April, 1976, some 11 months before his March 31 budget. That document was five years in production and it was in the hands of the department 11 months before the budget brought down in March of this year. According to the Chairman of the Tariff Board the minister has not included any of the pleasure craft recommendations in the current budget.

• (2030)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is right, Mr. Chairman. As I said, that is again a matter for negotiation in the Tokyo round.

Mr. Clarke: I know the minister gets a lot of representations from different groups with special interests, and in the debate on a similar bill last year I raised the matter of other interests which had been brought to the attention of the minister by myself and others. In this case it was the collection of vintage cars. I know there have been many representations made to the minister on this matter. It is argued that vintage cars are really no different from original works of art which are allowed into the country free of tariff, as are other things like antiques of a certain age. The minister has not seen fit to relieve vintage car hobbyists in Canada, even though they are trying to preserve in Canada some of Canada's history.

It has been a tradition in tariff setting in Canada that when there was a goods not of like kind produced in Canada, tariffs would not be prohibitive. It is a fact that many vintage car parts, particularly tires, are of a class or kind not made in Canada; at least they are not available in Canada. I would ask the minister what further consideration is going to be given this group of Canadians.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member said that we have done nothing about this. I would bring to his attention tariff item 69315-1 in which we have reduced the age of antiques, not just vintage cars, of all kinds, from 100 years to 50 years. As I indicated in my budget speech, we have also referred the various representations, which the hon. member has mentioned, in connection with antiques to the Tariff Board for their recommendation.

Mr. Clarke: I was not aware, Mr. Chairman, that there were any automobiles approaching 100 years of age and I confess that bringing the limit down to 50 will certainly be a step in the right direction. Has the minister any thought of reducing it to something more realistic, such as 30 years of age for cars?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is the kind of question which the Tariff Board will be considering.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Chairman, the questions that I should like to direct to the minister are primarily in the field of agriculture. He may feel that I am directing them to the wrong minister, but in view of the fact that in an earlier debate on the same subject not too many years ago I asked the Minister of Agriculture whether he had been consulted about changes in duties and reduction of protection for agricultural products and he said no, and I asked the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether he had estimated or in any way calculated the benefits to Canada, or the disadvantages to Canada, resulting from reduction in tariffs on agricultural items and had it been part of his input into the duty structure as it related to change in that budget, and he said no, I therefore assumed that the government must have made some calculation as to the impact upon the total Canadian economy of a reduction of protection for Canadian products.

I should like to ask the minister whether reductions in duty on agricultural items have been related to their effectiveness on imports into Canada, and has there been any tabulation of the comparable effect of duty in markets to which we might ship, or the comparable effect of duty in places where similar items are produced and imports are regulated by protection? Has there been any calculation to determine whether or not Canada is being fair to itself in this change in duty structure?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I find the question a little obscure in the sense of asking have we calculated the impact in other markets to which we ship. I would have to say with regard to our own tariff that probably the best evidence of the fact that Canadian producers have not suffered unduly is that, on the whole, there have not been extensive representations against these particular temporary tariff reductions which, as I have said, have now been in place for close to four years. There have been a number of cases where there were representations in the past and we had taken action for the purpose of restoring the duty. A good example of that is the action that we took earlier this year with regard to pork.

In general terms it is difficult to make a precise calculation of the kind of saving to the consumer resulting from the reduction of the tariff. On the other hand, one can say at the same time very clearly that if the customer does not have passed on to him the additional cost of a number of points of duty, then it is going to cost him less.

Mr. McCain: So in other words, Mr. Chairman, the answer is no, there has been no study of the relative effect of duty on agricultural products brought into Canada versus the effect of duty levied on agricultural products which might go to other markets, such as the European Economic community or to the United States, which is a recipient of some of our exports. I guess the answer is no, there has been no study to determine the effectiveness of our duty versus the effectiveness of duties in other jurisdictions, and this is what I had suspected from the beginning.

I should like to ask the minister why he feels there should be restrictions on the importation of textiles, for instance, which will have exactly the impact, so far as food is concerned, which the minister has denounced. A relative impact on clothing will be felt, as there would be a relative impact on food if agricultural products had had greater protection. Why does the minister feel that textiles and some other items in Canada deserve increased protection, either by an increment in the effective duty or by the restriction of imports by quota, as is the case in the textile industry? Why should these industries be isolated and agriculture left out?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, the principal reason is that there had been a dramatic increase in textile imports into Canada, to the point where imported textiles had come to assume about 55 per cent of the Canadian market. We are talking of an industry that employs 200,000 people. We recognize that there will have to be a substantial adjustment for both firms and work force in adjusting to the current terms of trade whereby particularly more advanced developing countries can now sell effectively into our market even over the existing tariff structure. However, the feeling was that the situation had reached crisis point in that particular industry and that we should give them temporary protection until the adjustments can be made.

The Canadian textile industry has already been through one adjustment when it reduced non-competitive capacity in the 1960's and early 1970's. It is now faced with very much the same thing again. It is important for the employees involved, on a temporary basis, to protect their present jobs as far as possible, and then make the effort to give them adjustment assistance to move into other areas of the economy, a task upon which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is now engaged.

Mr. McCain: I think the minister is improving the case for agriculture as he goes along. There is a distinct parallel between the textile industry and certain facts of the agricultural industry. I would ask him to take a sincere and deep look as Minister of Finance at some of the alarming alterations in trade patterns as a result of some of our negotiations in the international world of trade. Take, for instance, the apple industry. Does the minister have any idea of the change in the pattern of the apple trade over the last 25 years, part of which results from international negotiations or the establishment of unnatural barriers in markets to which we had at one time exported substantial quantities of apples and which are now closed to us?

[Mr. McCain.]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, indeed that is recognized. One of the substantial markets was certainly that of the United Kingdom. We have lost our advantage with regard to many agricultural products in that market because of the United Kingdom's accession to the European Economic Community. That is not a matter of negotiation we could have prevented by withholding in some way. The United Kingdom was in a position to make its own decision to join the EEC. It was entitled to do so under GATT, and it did do so. That is a kind of change in international events for which one cannot provide protection. One has to seek to provide adjustment assistance. It is fair to say in many of the agricultural programs a parallel type of adjustment assistance has been provided.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Chairman, I agree the items I will refer to have been the extreme reflectors of the pattern, but they have at the same time reflected upon important segments of the field of agriculture. Is the minister aware, for instance, that in the ten year period from 1966 to 1975 apple imports increased from 54 million pounds in 1966 to 148 million pounds, or almost threefold? Is the minister aware of the source of the pressure upon Canadian apple production?

I submit the aid which has been given to the textile industry is not drawn from the public treasury, nor does agriculture appreciate the fact that as a result of some of the positions in which it finds itself it must draw from the public treasury if it is to remain viable at all in certain products which are native to this country. In past years there were fair and equitable trade agreements, and we have been major exporters and able to supply all of our own requirements. The apple is the extreme case as a result of these things. When you go from 54 million pounds to 148 million pounds of imports in a ten year period, you find it very serious to accept. If you look at the export picture in that same commodity for a comparable period of time, you will find our exports declined by something like 31 million pounds. This puts us in a very unfavourable net position. If I were to take this back 25 years, the figures would be even more alarming.

Is it not reasonable for the Canadian apple producer to ask for treatment comparable to that of the cheese producer or the textile producer of Canada, so that he might have a chance to flourish within an area of his own country?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, the Tariff Board report we have been discussing this evening recommends apples should continue to come in duty free.

Mr. McCain: That has been the very generous position which has been adopted over the years by the apple industry; but it was also assuming, when it made this recommendation, that it would not lose equal trading opportunities in jurisdictions to which it had exported over the years, and these have been lost. Therefore there is demand upon the public treasury for support in the apple industry.

Let us go to a crop which is not as major in significance. Is the minister aware that in the same ten year period there has been almost a threefold increase in the import of cherries as far as Canada is concerned?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I would have to check to see if the hon. member's figures are correct.

Mr. McCain: Is the minister aware that the increase in importing pears has been in the region of 45 per cent in the same ten year period?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, with regard to cherries and with regard to pears, the Tariff Board has made precise recommendations, on which the hon. gentleman might like to comment.

Mr. McCain: You have them in front of you.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): You have the Tariff Board report.

Mr. McCain: When you look at onions, in that same ten year period the importation changed from 63 million to 96 million which was an increase of over 50 per cent and a physical increase of 33 million in round figures. Mr. Chairman, I should point out I am referring to pounds throughout.

Is the minister aware that in the tomato industry imports have gone up 48 million pounds in the same ten year period? Is the minister aware that, as a result of the position considered as a crop which Canadian farmers should drop because the effective tariff structure is such that it can neither be grown nor processed effectively in Canada at this point in time and may be wiped from the scene?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman these are commodities which have been dealt with by the Tariff Board report. One of the purposes of having that report is to get a judicial balance, and we have got it. This is one of the questions now being discussed with the agricultural industry. A most helpful thing at this particular point would be, if the hon. gentleman disagrees with the Tariff Board report in this regard, for him to indicate the ways in which we could do so. If he feels these particular interests need help, then I think the most useful thing he can do is to express the kind of help needed and comment on the statement which has been made respecting fresh fruit and vegetables.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Chairman, I should point out for the minister's information that I have been a regular attendant at the Canadian Horticultural Council for approximately 30 years. I am familiar with the demands they have made and the treatment they have received. Notwithstanding what the tariff report may say, I would like to draw another crop to the minister's attention. Before doing so, I should say the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the Minister of Agriculture, and the government itself should not seek the crutches of various boards as the government tries to justify its position in an intolerable situation created by trade policies which are not related to the needs of Canadian industry in any way, shape or form. Certain aspects have absolutely been demoralized in our trade structure and our agricultural production. If you take a look at the figure for tomatoes 25 years back compared to today, they would starkly point out to the minister that fresh and processed tomatoes, both in relation to our capacity to produce and in relation to our nation consuming that product, are an industry which is no longer significant as an agricultural crop. We are relying on foreign sources to produce what we can produce in our own gardens at home. This is not good government policy, whether you want to use the Tariff Boards as a crutch or an excuse for the things which have been visited upon agriculture. The minister has not studied the matter, as he revealed in his first answer to me.

In the ten year period imports of broccoli went up from nine million pounds to 34 million pounds. That is an increase of more than 350 per cent in the importation of broccoli in a ten year period. If one were to take a look at strawberries, as I mentioned earlier, that item has disappeared as a Canadian agricultural product relative to Canadian consumption. I believe these figures are somewhat rounded. I did not bring one piece of paper which I should have brought with me. The importation of fresh and frozen strawberries has risen from five million pounds in 1952 to approximately 55 million in 1976. That is an elevenfold increase in imports of one product.

I support the minister as he protects the textile industry. I supported him when he took belated action with respect to pork. It was belated, but it was a step in the right direction. But I cannot support a policy under which producers in Canada should suffer because of a lack of protection, where we find the doors closed in traditional markets and we open our doors to rather non-traditional sources of meat. These things have been said in the Standing Committee on Agriculture as strongly as possible. If the minister would read the resolutions and recommendations as they have been presented by the Horticultural Council over the last 30 years, he would find that that council predicted exactly what has happened.

I would like to ask one other question of the minister. How many agricultural jobs have been lost and how many jobs in the processing industry have been lost as a result of these changes which have taken place, and in relation to the percentage of crops we now produce along with the percentage of crop which we ourselves can consume and which other countries can consume? How many jobs have been lost in Canada? We protected the textile industry. We should have protected agriculture on a broader base. Has the minister made any study whatsoever as to the impact on employment of reduced agricultural products in the broad scope of things agricultural over the last 25 years when we have had a cheap food policy and an open door policy for trade?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt about the fact that there has been a substantial drop in employment in agriculture, just as there has been a substantial drop in employment in the textile industry. The hon. gentleman says we have protected the textile industry.

Mr. McCain: As you should have.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): He forgets the fact that by a series of steps taken in the late sixties and early seventies we made a very substantial restructuring of that industry as a result of which a significant number of plants were closed and people were moved into other areas of employment in the economy. It seems to me that was the sensible way to manage things, and that is the way it was managed at the time.

Going back to the hon. member's comment when he said we should not have a Tariff Board—

Mr. McCain: I did not say you should not have; I said you should not use it as a crutch.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Accepting the recommendations of the Tariff Board, considering them, asking for public consultation on them, and on the basis of all that deciding on our negotiating position—is that using the Board as a crutch? It seems to me that if the Board has, as it has, devoted many hours to taking testimony from many interests in this regard, it is entitled to be listened to by the government. The Board is listened to by the government. It makes sense to have the Board part of the process, and this has been recognized by governments for many years.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Chairman, I agree basically with what the minister said, but he did not go far enough. As far as he went he was correct. It is the function of the Tariff Board to make recommendations to the government, but it is the responsibility of the government to make decisions after having faced the economic realities of this nation as a whole.

The minister has expressed concern in various dissertations which he has given both inside the House and outside with respect to the impact of an unfavourable balance of trade. Has the minister taken a serious look at what an element of protection for agriculture could do to change the imbalance of trade which we are presently experiencing? With the exception of grains for the moment, because we must agree that grains are at an unusual peak in value, has the minister taken a look at the balance of trade as it relates to food, and particularly food which we can produce in this country, and its impact upon the total economy of the nation? Has there been any precise study in that field?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, very obviously the Tariff Board has focused on that, and that is quite a precise study. I think it is fair to observe that for very many months of the year in Canada the Canadian producer is not in a position to supply the Canadian market with fresh fruits and vegetables. Very obviously these are the commodities which, given almost any circumstances, we will be importing into this country.

Mr. McCain: I did not mention bananas, lemons or grapefruit. I mentioned crops.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I think the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte has taken his allotted time, and I see other people seeking the floor.

Mr. McCain: I just have one more question, Mr. Chairman.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member will be allowed one more question.

Mr. McCain: You have been very generous, Mr. Chairman, and I appreciate it.

Does the minister know that the importation of agricultural products from 1960-64, on a five year average, to 1975, went from roughly $780 million to roughly $2.8 billion, a $2 billion increase in imports of food into this country?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I do know that there has been a substantial improvement in our standard of living generally, and the hon. member will find a similar escalation in that regard through the same period. I suppose the question is whether Canadians should be entitled to import lettuce or fresh tomatoes in the winter time, and we think they are.

Mr. McCain: Take a look at these things.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Chairman, I would like to comment briefly on the apple situation which is a good example of what happens when we negotiate with other countries such as the United States to take tariffs off over a period of years. It was agreed to take it off over a period of years, but the then minister of finance decided that he was going to take it off completely in Canada, so within one year he took the tariff off. He asked the United States to take theirs off as well, but because of the agreement they refused to do so. So there we were in Canada trading with no tariff on the commodity coming into Canada, and we had to pay one. However, over those years there was a constant increase of imports of apples into Canada, and as the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte said, starting out on an equal basis of probably one million boxes going out of Canada and one million boxes coming in, now, ten years later, it costs us three times as much. We have free trade in apples. The farmer in his orchard is not protected, but many industries on which he depends are protected.

For instance, the Minister of Agriculture put a complete barrier in front of farmers going down into the United States to bring back sprays. Farmers are trying to compete when the industries on which they depend are working in a climate of protection, and it is getting more and more difficult. I am quite aware that the industry did not ask for a tariff and that therefore the Tariff Board did not say that there should be a tariff put on our apples; however, I am also aware of the stabilization that is needed today in the apple industry because of this situation. I am also aware that it is difficult to market this commodity because of imports coming into Canada. Three times the previous amount of this commodity is now being imported into Canada.

I would like to comment on the cherry situation. The minister asked the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte if he would like to comment on it. I am very aware of what is in the Tariff Board report with regard to cherries. On Sunday I was down in the fruit markets of Ottawa. I saw a sign in a window which said "Cherries, 89 cents". I thought that we really are going to get cheap cherries this year. I took a closer look and found that the price was 89 cents per half pound. Cherries from the United States are selling in Ottawa at $1.68 to $1.79 per pound. We would sure like to get that kind of market for our Canadian cherries. Those prices will not change very much until just about the time Canadian cherries come on the market. By that time 85 per cent of the cherry production of the United States will have been sold. The remaining 15 per cent is then sold at a much lower price. It is the tail end that they are getting rid of, and it is with that that the Canadian producer has to compete. It is a very short market season for cherries. We grow a good product and we are using the type of farm land that people are saying today should be frozen, should not be paved over or have houses built on it.

In this tariff report there is also a report on the surcharge concept that the farmers producing commodities such as cherries and peaches need and are requesting. One of the disappointing features of the report is that the Tariff Board only recommended that it be triggered at 85 per cent of the three-year average. It is doubtful that on a monthly basis 85 per cent of the three-year average will be enough to give the necessary protection for that short period when United States producers will ship into Canada at a lesser price than they are getting today.

We will be into the Canadian peach season within 40 or 50 days and growers are going to need help of this kind this year. If the report is going to gather dust for a while it is not going to be of any use to producers this year. I should like to request that the minister look at the surcharge provisions that have been used before by the government and that are recommended for use now, and put them into effect for this year's crop.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, in a previous customs tariff debate I made reference to western crops of flax and the 50 cents per bushel duty on flax going into the United States while there is no duty on flax coming into Canada. Flax is a cash crop for western Canadian producers and it is a useful crop. Last fall about 2 million bushels were exported to the United States. I am not sure why, because the price tends to be the same in both countries. It is a small volume crop compared to wheat, and this sort of thing happens. The flax growing area of the United States is the Dakotas so perhaps that is why it moved back and forth across the border. There is no particular reason, however, why the United States should impose a 50 cents per bushel duty when we do not impose any. It would be desirable to have the United States remove the duty so that there could be a free flow back and forth. If this cannot be done it would seem logical that we should have the same duty.

Reports from the negotiations in Tokyo seem quite pessimistic and little progress seems to have been made. It is disconcerting that according to a report in the Globe and Mail, little progress has been made in agriculture which includes such sub-groups as dairy, meat, grain and other products. Some agricultural producers feel that they have been used as a trade-off and that their interests have been subordinated to manufacturing or resource industries. Does the minister feel this is happening at Tokyo now, or has there been a change in emphasis?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, in general terms I would have to say that the Tokyo Round discussions on agriculture have not made very much progress up to this point. This is principally because of the stalemate between the United States and the EEC on agricultural products and the manner in which they would be negotiated in the Tokyo Round. There was some indication at the London summit meetings that this impasse might now be broken and there was some prospect of having early negotiations in substance in the Tokyo Round. It is quite true there has been less progress on agriculture, than, for example, on manufactured products or the preparatory work done concerning some of the other questions which will be negotiated in this round.

On the matter of flax, I think the hon. member makes a good case, just as a good case was made by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin with regard to boxed beef as to an imbalance between the Canadian and United States tariffs. If one looks at that particular sector there could be powerful argument with the Americans about reciprocity. The difficulty with picking one element out of a complicated structure like tariffs is that you cannot be sure where else in the schedule of tariffs they may seek reciprocity which may have a very substantial impact on Canadian producers.

This is the kind of trade-off that will occur. I cannot say whether flax or boxed beef is on the list for negotiation, but very obviously the MTN, the Tokyo Round, is the basis for trying to get reciprocity on these items.

Mr. Ritchie: In our negotiations in Tokyo, on the agricultural products do we tend to be on the side of the Americans in dealing with the EEC, or do we have our own stance?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, it depends on what the product is. If it is one in which we are seeking substantial access to the American market, obviously we will be looking at it on a bilateral basis. Equally obviously, if there is a product that the Americans are interested in and where they can use their much greater weight because of the size of their market to penetrate the EEC, it makes sense for us to let the American lineman run interference for the Canadian back fielder. On the MFN quality, the generalization for other contracting parties of a negotiated rate or quota arrangement between the United States and the EEC, we can get the benefit of the lower rate without having to pay anything for it. It really depends on the commodity and what the prospects are for selling it. Obviously we are going to have important bilateral trade with the Americans, and equally we are going to be looking forward to the possibility of their making some penetration of the European market, of which we will get the benefit through the MFN clause. There will be some third commodities for which, obviously we will have to carry the ball ourselves.

Mr. Ritchie: On the question of countervailing duties there is a suggestion that Canada continue to press for injury to domestic industry as a key criterion, contrary to the practice of the United States. I should like to ask the minister what the difference is in our approach to these countervailing duties and how is this working out?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I am reminded that fresh regulations have just been issued with regard to countervailing duties. The hon. gentleman is correct in saying that the Canadian practice required the identification of injury, whereas the American practice had been mandatory. The new regulations we have put forward make provision for interim duties, pending the ultimate finding of injury. In other words, in a practical sense we are moving closer to the American position, but there is still this difference between the two positions.

● (2110)

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, may I ask one more question concerning the United States treasury and the court case involving Zenith Radio Corporation? According to what I read in newspapers, the consequences of that case, which is still before the courts, could be serious. Do the minister and his officials regard that as a serious case, with wide-ranging tariff and trade implications?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I would have to say yes, but cannot give a detailed explanation why.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Chairman, I hope I am not out of order; I was attending a committee meeting when the Minister of Finance made his summary comments winding up the second reading debate. I wonder if he dealt with the question of the component parts of shells used for target practice. What are his plans in this regard and, if he does not plan to allow this item in tariff free, will he explain his reasons for his decision?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I dealt with the question and indicated that this is one item with respect to which we have sought the advice of the Board. We want to know how to treat hobby items of this kind. The question is now under consideration by the Tariff Board which is looking at how the matter is to be treated.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Chairman, can the minister indicate when he will have an answer or decision from the Tariff Board and announce it in the House?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I cannot give an indication of an early response. The Board will be considering the question, but I am afraid I do not know what the timetable is.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Halliday: Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the minister? I hope my question will be in order. It concerns the importation from the United States of fabrics which, if made in Canada, would naturally be subject to tariff. I am talking about a double knit fabric which is normally made in Canada. If there is a backing on it, it is used for upholstery purposes. I understand such a material with backing is not made in Canada, and that a tariff is imposed on such imported double knit fabric which, with a special backing, is used only for upholstery. Have I correctly described the effect of our present regulations?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I cannot give a specific answer this evening with regard to the application of that tariff item. Certainly I could inquire and enlighten the hon. gentleman. Collectively, the trio in the committee of which I am a member cannot respond to that specific question.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Chairman, I return to the Tokyo Round, which the minister discussed a few moments ago and about which the hon. member for Dauphin questioned him. I, and I am sure my comments apply to others, have received letters from manufacturers in my constituency and the surrounding area concerning the Tokyo Round. The tenor of such letters makes it clear that manufacturers do not know what is happening. They have made submissions to the minister but there has been no feedback. They are operating in the dark, not knowing if they can expand operations and put in another production line, or if the negotiations will lead to a drop in tariffs, with possibly unfortunate consequences for certain products. I understand that Mr. Gray is shortly to return from Geneva. What is the government doing to let industry know what is happening in tariffs? Is the minister planning to hold meetings, or to hold further discussions, or to issue press releases concerning the progress of negotiations? We need to know what is happening in this area.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, the Canadian Trade and Tariffs Committee was specifically set up for this purpose. It has received submissions from Canadian industry and, indeed, has met with representatives of Canadian firms who have sought such meetings, as, indeed, Rod Gray has on his fairly frequent return visits to Canada. The hon. member suggested that there is an element of uncertainty with regard to certain products as a result of negotiations. I think, inevitably, there will be a certain amount of uncertainty until the negotiations are finalized. For reasons of which I am sure the hon. gentleman is aware, the discussions have stood still for a time. There is now some prospect, after the meeting of two weeks ago, that they will be moving forward somewhat more quickly. However, until the final deal is made there will be that element of uncertainty. The Tariffs and Trade Committee intends to try to resolve such difficulties as best it can in addition to being an effective communications medium.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, may I refer the minister to the report by the Tariff Board, known as Reference No. 150, which deals with computers and related telecommunications equipment? Let me give the minister some background. I hope the minister can bring the committee up to date on the government's current position with respect to the tariff structure affecting computers and related telecommunications equipment.

It is interesting to note that Hon. E. J. Benson on December 10, 1971, requested the Tariff Board to prepare this report, which was finally signed on March 3, 1977, by a board the composition of which was somewhat different from that to which Mr. Benson had originally addressed his request some five years and three months earlier. I raise this matter because some in the computer field have told me that their industry has changed. Some of the people previously active in it and who were witnesses have died, retired or resigned. The Board's delay in reporting is most strange. A minister of finance requested this report several years ago; now, two ministers of finance later, so to speak, the Board has finally handed down its report.

This report says substantially this "Guess what? What you said back in 1971 concerning the computer industry was quite right." My question is this: since we will have waited five years and five months by the time the report will be tabled in the House, let me now ask the minister what does the government intend to do to relieve the computer industry from the senseless customs duty which, as the Tariff Board seems to agree, that industry has been forced to pay over the years?

Let me refer to the letter Mr. Benson sent on December 10, 1971, to the then chairman of the Tariff Board, Mr. L. C. Audette, Q.C. He said that he received representations concerning the effect of the customs tariff on the production and use of computers and related equipment, and went on to say:

> It has also been alleged that the duty on such equipment, especially that which is not available in Canada, is having an adverse effect on the ability of the Canadian business community to take advantage of computer services and techniques and discourages the processing of data in Canada.

Five years and some months later, the Tariff Board handed down its report. At page 325 of its report the Board begins to make that part of its recommendation which says that the tariff on the items alluded to should be changed or reduced. The Board stated on page 325 of the report:

> Given the pattern that characterizes the Canadian computing equipment industry, the Board has carefully weighed the available evidence and concludes that the tariff has had very little effect in restricting imports, supporting a viable Canadian-owned indusry, or in influencing production location decisions . . .

The report goes on to say:

> The Board has found no evidence to support the need for a general level of tariff protection on all finished computer products.

When we questioned the Chairman of the Tariff Board as to what recommendations made in the past the Minister of Finance has implemented, we were left with the strong impression that there has been little interplay between the activities of the Minister of Finance and those of the Tariff Board. In short, although it takes years to prepare these reports, they are conveniently filed away and little reference is made to them. This is most unfortunate.

• (2120)

If we look, we find that 34 different people or companies actually made submissions to the Tariff Board as to why the tariffs on computer and related equipment should be changed. It is most unfortunate that the Minister of Finance seems to be so casual toward Tariff Board reports after they have been prepared.

I notice tonight the minister stated that the government is entitled, and I think I have his words correctly, to listen when the Tariff Board speaks. That is the point, Mr. Chairman. I understand that technically the minister can amend what we have before us tonight and can give effect to the Tariff Board recommendations here tonight as far as the computer industry is concerned. My first question is, is he willing to do that, bearing in mind it took the Tariff Board five years and three months to sign a report that was transmitted to him a month later?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I think one of the important points to make in this regard and one of the reasons for tabling it in parliament is so that industry will have an opportunity to comment. As the hon. member knows, the document was tabled several weeks ago. We will be looking forward to comment.

Will I be prepared to take the tariffs off this evening? For the very reasons I indicated before the hon. member came into the House, I would have some hesitation in doing that. We are going into an international negotiation in which we will have to give up some things in order to get other things. If we are going to reduce the Canadian tariff for somebody else's benefit, we should try to get something for it.

Far from being casual about it, we have, for example with regard to pleasure craft and other representations, kept any possible changes as one of the matters on which we would be prepared to negotiate in the multilateral trade negotiations rather than giving them away unilaterally before the negotiations are completed.

Mr. Stevens: Following on the minister's reply, will he now indicate what steps he will actually take? We now have in hand a Tariff Board report which recommends a reduction in tariffs on computers. What is the next step? It was tabled not a few weeks ago as the minister indicated, but within the last ten days. What happens now? Is there any formal exchange between here and Geneva where the report is drawn to the attention of those people, with or without a recommendation of the minister?

Second, what process is the minister going to follow to ensure that those who are affected by the report and know of it have an opportunity to make their feelings known? I ask this because I have checked with some of these companies. To date, most of them do not even know that the report has been tabled in the House.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I have to say that the Tariff Board gave publicity to the fact that it produced the report. If companies which took the trouble to make submissions in this regard have not been following the issue that closely, then I suppose I should ask the Tariff Board to go back to those who made a submission and bring this to their attention. The Board has, however, publicized the fact that it has reported. As I indicated, we are seeking public response to it at this time. Obviously the government will have to make a judgment on what to do in this regard, in particular on how to treat it in the MTN negotiations.

The next step, in answer to the specific question, is to get the public response to the Board's findings and evaluate this response to see to what extent the government should either, in its conclusion, change those findings, or be prepared to accept as the Board has recommended.

Mr. Stevens: Following on the minister's comments, Mr. Chairman, will he indicate specifically how he is going to seek the public response? Is it going to be to all individual companies that are listed here, something over 100 of them? Is the onus on them to come to the minister? Is so, how long does he plan to wait until he feels they have had a fair opportunity to respond before we can hear what his views are on the Tariff Board's recommendation?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I think it is not unreasonable, having given it some publicity, that we should be able to assume that within this industry there will be some knowledge of the report and that the people who want to respond will be coming forward. Any interested person can come forward and make representations in this regard. Publicity is obviously the sensible way to bring this to their attention.

It is fair enough to give those interested a matter of weeks, perhaps a matter of several months, to formulate their response. We in turn are going to be hardening our own position on the negotiations as the year goes on. It would obviously be advisable if they responded as quickly as they could.

Mr. Stevens: The minister refers to publicity having been given to the tabling of this report by the Tariff Board. I ask this advisedly. Will the minister now advise precisely what was the nature of the publicity the Tariff Board gave to the report?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, there was a press release and a notice of where copies of the report could be acquired.

Mr. Stevens: Is the minister aware that the total number of copies available was 40, in spite of the fact that at one time almost 200 concerns were interested in what the Tariff Board might have to say?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I think I will have to check on the accuracy of that. I would certainly be prepared to question it.

Mr. Stevens: If I understand it correctly, the minister intends to wait a few months until, as he says, he hardens his attitude.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Position.

Mr. Stevens: What exactly then is the process? I take it this may or may not be dealt with at Geneva, depending on how his process hardens. Is that correct?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes.

Mr. Stevens: May I get to the more general question of what is being changed in Bill C-55. Will the minister give us an indication as to how he decides, notwithstanding the Geneva negotiations, to change certain items but not to change other items? For example, I notice that peanut butter in this bill is now going to be free of any tariff whatsoever.

In Bill C-15, which was given first reading October 22, 1976, peanut butter was subject to a tariff of two cents in so far as the British preferential tariff was concerned, two cents in so far as the most favoured nation was concerned, and seven cents on the general tariff. That is all per pound.

What caused the minister in the case of peanut butter to say we will change the tariff as of now, whereas in so far as the computer industry, the small boats industry and what not are concerned, this is something to be dealt with only in Geneva?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I dealt with this earlier today. This was an item dealt with at Geneva. As I indicated in my statement earlier today, as part of the multilateral trade negotiations it was agreed that a range of products of specific interest to the developing countries would be dealt with on an early basis and would not be held up until the end of the negotiations under the MTN. This peanut butter item happens to be one of them, as indeed are quite a number of products, many of them related to products agricultural or other products of a tropical origin.

Mr. Stevens: The minister clarified the situation with regard to peanut butter. Is the list available of what has been left open for tariff reductions with no particular reference to the Geneva negotiations?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, if I can just correct the hon. member, I said it was decided at the Geneva negotiations and the list is in the bill.

Mr. Stevens: May I assume from the minister's response that the entire list is in the bill and the bill includes nothing that is not in the document he is referring to as being exempted by the Geneva negotiations?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Again I dealt with this on second reading, pointing out the different categories of items being dealt with in the bill. There are three. The hon. member might like to examine the record in this regard. This is the list of items agreed on at the multilateral trade negotiations between the contracting parties and has been included in the bill. There will be further negotiations. It may indeed be that further negotiations might provide a further list of items for the benefit of the developing countries. At the moment this is what has been agreed upon and is included in our law.

Mr. Stevens: That is just the point. What has been agreed upon? The minister's official is nodding his head in the negative. The minister is saying that what is in the bill has been agreed upon. What I am trying to relate is not what the minister said on second reading, but what is in the bill now before us. What specifically has been included in the exemption that the minister referred to with regard to the Geneva negotiations? Is it the entire bill, every item in there or is it certain items and not other items?

● (2130)

When the last tariff bill was before us I directed the minister's attention to item No. 8717-1 dealing with onions. I pointed out that there seemed to be an unfair tariff arrangement between the United States and ourselves in that the duty on Canadian onions going into the United States was one and three-quarter cents per pound while the duty on onions coming into this country, as we can see in the bill before us tonight, was 1½ cents. As that time the minister stated he was unaware of the U.S. duty position. Can he now give us this information? Has he checked it out? If there is this relatively unfair duty arrangement as far as the two countries are concerned can he tell us why we have been going along with a relatively favourable duty position as far as onions are concerned?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, fresh fruits and vegetables are the subject of the Tariff Board reference. As I indicated in response to earlier questions it is a matter which is now open for comment by interested parties in Canada. It is obviously a question which will be included in the negotiations. Whether we shall be able to get reciprocity of treatment is something which will have to await the outcome of the negotiations.

I think it should be said, in general terms, that there is a longer period of the year in which it is to our advantage to import onions in comparison to the period of time in which we would be in a position to export from Canadian production. This is one of the factors to be taken into account in the temporary tariff reductions.

Mr. Stevens: More specifically, though, could the minister tell us whether his research has disclosed that the American duty is in fact higher than ours on produce going into the United States?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, that answer will take just a moment. Yes.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Chairman, there is an interesting item on page 29, Schedule III, at the bottom of the page. It has to do with ivory carvings. I refer to the schedule which appears to apply to the developing countries. Would the minister explain what is happening in this connection? Is the tariff going down on this item?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The tariff is being reduced. Ivory carvings are included in a group of handicrafts which are among the exports of certain developing countries. When imported into Canada they will be given the same treatment as other items under the MFN rate.

Mr. Whittaker: I find it very strange that at this time Canada should be reducing tariffs on ivory carvings. We all know that the United States has placed a ban on imports of ivory and bone carvings done by our Eskimos. It applies to all artifacts made from bone, even though in most instances they are made from fossil and are very old. It makes it difficult for our Eskimo people to trade or sell their products; their market is pretty well confined to Canada. This seems to me to be another example of people who practice a fine art finding other countries banning their products while at the same time Canada is reducing tariffs on similar items coming into Canada.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Perhaps I might remind the hon. member that this applies to just a specific group of countries, that is, the developing countries. It is part of a policy followed by Canada and other OECD nations under which we have agreed that in order to further the economic development of the developing world we should open our markets to their products. Ivory carvings reflect in a real way the cultural differences which exist in African countries and it does not follow we should in some way exclude them because a third party is excluding a product made by Canadian sculptors.

I must say I regret the exclusion of Canadian handicrafts and believe it to be a rather foolish practice. However, it does not seem to me we should take revenge on developing countries just because certain Canadian exports happen to be handled in this way. If this involved perfectly standard goods where there was no difference in utility, quality or style from one to the other, there might be some validity to the argument. But ivory carvings are obviously a reflection of a culture, and in that sense one who is interested in Eskimo carvings might not necessarily be interested in these ivory carvings. When you get right down to it, I suppose it is really a case of whether you wish to help the developing countries or not.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to introduce a discordant note, but perhaps the minister could give us the timetable he has in mind as to the changeover in the customs tariff to the metric system. We are already dealing with kilograms while at the same time referring to ounces and pounds. It is my understanding that in September we are to adopt the linear metre in Canada. I think that somewhere here I could undoubtedly find some reference to the inch, the foot, and the yard. Perhaps the minister could tell us when it is planned to convert into the metric system.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No specific date has yet been determined. I think we may be looking as far ahead as two years from now.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Chairman, I have had a chance to look at item 69315-1 concerning articles produced more than 50 years prior to a certain date. I should like to ask whether the word "articles" does, in fact, include automobiles, and whether the word "goods" used on page 36 of Schedule IV, the first word in tariff item 70320-1, also includes automobiles?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The answer to both questions is yes.

Mr. Clarke: May I also inquire whether any provision has been made in connection with parts and tires for these automobiles? I asked earlier about the "class or kind" wording and I note that the wording used on page 34 in reference to aircraft engines is "when of types or sizes not made in Canada". Further down on the same page, referring to parts for metric conversion, I see the wording "parts when of types or sizes not made in Canada". I am not sure what the difference between "class or kind" and "types or sizes" is. What about parts for these old cars which are now able to come in free?

● (2140)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Such parts if recently manufactured would not, of course, be antique and would have to be dealt with in the normal way under the tariff.

Mr. Clarke: I see that argument, but what about the idea of class or kind and types or sizes not made in Canada? Will that not apply to parts for these old automobiles?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It will depend on the type of tariff item they come in under. It may or may not have that kind of qualification.

Mr. Clarke: Another item which has been brought to my attention is 70320-1, having to do with goods acquired by a former resident of Canada returning to Canada. I suppose my question hangs on the interpretation of the word "acquire" which appears in the phrase "was acquired after March 31, 1977". It may be strange, but I have two constituents who both find themselves in the position of taking a year's leave from Canada. Obviously this was planned for some months; you do not plan this kind of thing in no time at all. Both had gone on the basis of the existing tariff and had acquired boats or yachts, one from England and the other from Korea. In any event, these vessels were acquired, they think—at least, the money was paid and the contract signed—prior to March 31. They are now very concerned because they have not yet taken delivery but the acquisition has been made. Will these vessels be subject to duty on the excess value over $7,500, or will they be admitted under the old tariff?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am being asked to give a judgment in a particular case. I think it would be wiser to have the full facts, and if the hon. member would write me a letter I would be prepared to get an opinion from National Revenue in this regard. In general terms, Mr. Chairman, acquisition assumes the taking of possession, but there may be facts which could support another interpretation.

Mr. Clarke: I thank the minister for that answer. On my advice these individuals have written to the department for an answer, but I thought this was the opportune time to ask about the meaning of the word "acquired".

One final item I wish to speak to is item 69605-1. I have an idea that this item was the subject of debate in the last go-around on the Customs Tariff. It deals with scientific apparatus. My question is this: is this item the answer to the incredible paper work burden that was to have been placed on universities and other charitable organizations which found themselves needing to import scientific apparatus?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is quite right. This was the subject matter of debate in the last budget and we think this now meets that concern.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Chairman, earlier I asked the minister whether he had made any studies of the effectiveness of duties on imported agricultural products relative to the effectiveness of duties in markets to which our agricultural products are shipped. Let me give the minister one example and then ask him a question. Unfortunately I have one sheet of figures missing but I think my figures are roughly correct.

The tariff on peaches entering Canada was reduced from 18 per cent to 6.5 per cent over the last 25 years. Has the specific duty on a per pound basis remained constant? I believe the duty on canned peaches, for example, exported to the United States in dollars and cents terms has varied from 48 cents a case to $1.62 a case in the last 25 years. In view of the fact that the ad valorem duties applied by our major trading partner have become more effective in dollars and cents while ours have remained constant in dollars and cents but have declined in effectiveness, would the minister undertake a study to determine the impact upon agricultural production in Canada? We are using specific duties while markets to which we export are, in the main, using ad valorem or percentage rates on our products.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, as to whether a specific study will be undertaken, I think I can only go as far as saying that I will consider it. I point out that the Board has sought to deal with this problem, so far as peaches are concerned, under item 9211-1, which states that the MFN rate is three cents but not less than 12½ per cent. So we have, if you like, placed a floor of an ad valorem rate underneath a specific duty.

Mr. McCain: In view of the fact that in 1950 Canada imported roughly 17½ million pounds of peaches, while in 1975 we imported more than 101 million pounds of peaches, an increment of almost sixfold, and in view of the impact that this has on agriculture, would the minister treat this and other agricultural items as, for instance, penknives, pencils, and dozens of other miscellaneous items which do not create a major employment opportunity but are protected by duty, and give them comparable treatment? The minister has referred to negotiations which are going to take place in the Geneva talks. Would he approach former customers, present customers, and customers who have actually closed the doors on us, and determine whether or not we can have an equal trading opportunity? I do not believe that agriculture is asking for anything more than an equal trading opportunity.

I think we are justified in asking for this and should have to pay a price. When we discuss duties with the United States we should tell the United States we would like an equal trading opportunity for products which we can produce, since we buy from them tens of millions of dollars worth of oranges, grapefruit, lemons, grapes, seed potatoes, and so on down the list. These are items which we cannot ship to them. I suggest our balance of trade in food items with the United States would be no more than fair were we to ask that duties be identical in effectiveness. They are reasonable, fair minded people, and I think this is a reasonable approach.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would agree that it is, Mr. Chairman. We should, as I said earlier, seek to get reciprocity in these products, particularly where you have the example of the duty being higher than ours. With regard to the specific duty referred to, subject to confirmation I would say that would have been one which was bound under GATT as a result of the GATT negotiations in the late 1960's. In effect, we took the tariff system which existed then and at the same time bound those rates. We were not in a position to change them because they were international undertakings. As I said in my first response, the Tariff Board in its recommendation has sought to put agricultural products with ad valorem floors on the same basis as manufactured products.

• (2150)

Mr. McCain: We need the same basis as on those items we trade with the United States. We need comparable protection. Our farmers deserve it, as well as the manufacturers of pencils or the manufacturers of clothing.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Paproski: How do you like that for co-operation from the opposition? You had better thank us.

Excise Tax

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has said, I had better thank them. I would have said that without his urging, in any event. In light of the hour I wonder if we could call it ten o'clock rather than going on to the next item?

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, if the minister has a statement with regard to Bill C-54, perhaps he could put it on the record and then it would be available to the members of the House. I think it would take the minister approximately four minutes to put his statement on the record.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-54, to amend the Excise Tax Act (No. 2), be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in the budget of May 25, 1976, I announced the government's intention to extend the air transportation tax to apply to an additional 2.3 million travellers who use Canadian airports annually. Although these air travellers make much the same use of Canadian facilities as taxable Canadian travellers, they do not currently pay the Canadian air transportation tax because they purchase their tickets outside Canada. Now, as a consequence of the amendments proposed in Bill C-54, they will be taxed in a manner which closely parallels that which applies to Canadians.

When first I announced the government's intention to extend this tax, I indicated that implementation would be preceded by consultation with interested parties to identify potential problems and difficulties. This process of consultation has now largely been completed, and it is proposed that the extension be made effective on November 1 of this year. This delay in coming into force will provide a necessary opportunity for the air carriers to make required alterations to their systems and procedures to implement the tax. As indicated in the ways and means motion, the tax will be extended to apply to any amount paid outside Canada for air transportation involving a departure from a Canadian airport for a destination outside Canada. This will ensure that all users of Canadian air facilities contribute in an equitable way to the upkeep of these facilities.

This bill also contains measures to change the current 12 per cent federal sales tax on gasoline and diesel fuel to an equivalent specific levy. The change is proposed in order to correct administrative and compliance difficulties which have existed for a number of years. The Excise Tax Act currently imposes a 12 per cent sales tax on the sale price of gasoline sold by manufacturers, and deems an importer of gasoline to be the manufacturer. Because of the nature of the petroleum industry, however, gasoline and diesel fuel are sold by manufacturers at a number of different levels of trade and at widely varying prices. The value for tax thus ranges from a very low level on inter-refinery sales to a relatively high level on sales to consumers through manufacturer's retail outlets.

In order to maintain a reasonable degree of equity and neutrality, Revenue Canada has allowed manufacturers to account for tax on all sales of gasoline and diesel fuel on the basis of weighted-average price determined periodically by Revenue Canada. The status of the resulting determined value is, however, uncertain under the law. I have therefore decided that, in recognition of the rather unique circumstances of this homogeneous product, and for greater certainty under the law, the statute should be amended to provide a series of specific levies to apply to the different grades of gasoline. The specific levies indicated in the motion and again in this bill are at the same rates which were put into effect by Revenue Canada on March 2, 1977.

The remainder of the bill deals with a series of relatively minor technical amendments designed to correct loopholes in existing provisions of the statute or to extend sales tax relief to certain users of products where a strong case for tax relief exists. In particular, the bill provides for the extension of the period within which a person may apply to recover tax by way of refund, deduction, or other payment, from two years to four years in the general refund provisions of the Excise Tax Act. This extension will apply to applications other than those which have expired on or before March 31, 1977.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, this bill seeks to implement the proposals contained in the ways and means motions of March 31 and April 18, 1977. With the exception of the extension of the air transportation tax, the proposed amendments are all relatively minor in nature, the emphasis being placed on correcting anomalies rather than making significant modifications in the scope or application of the federal sales tax. I would remind honourable members, however, that in conjunction with the budget, my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Miss Bégin), announced that the small manufacturer's regulation would be altered in such a way as to raise the exemption from sales tax which it provides from $3,000 to $10,000 of sales and to provide an exemption from sales tax on the products of certain Canadian craftsmen.

Hon. members will want to discuss the provisions of the bill in detail, and I will be glad to do so at committee stage.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Goodale). Will Bill C-54 be the first item of business on Friday of this week, since Wednesday and Thursday are going to be opposition days?

Mr. Goodale: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we will continue with Bill C-54. My understanding at the moment, if we are successful in completing that during the day on Friday, is that we will proceed with the item of business previously announced, which is the Bretton Woods legislation.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE—BRUCELLOSIS—POSSIBILITY OF RETURNING TO VACCINATION PROGRAM

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, on April 4, 1977, as reported in Hansard at page 4594, I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) about the situation regarding brucellosis and if he intended to return to vaccination. He said at that time that there has been a decrease in the number of affected cattle. Having looked up the statistics, I disagree with him, and I believe I can prove to him that some of the statistics he received were not up to date.

• (2200)

I am interested in the subject of vaccination for brucellosis. I ran a medical clinic, and we treated one of the early cases of undulant fever in a human being. That is a disease which can be contracted by human beings. They can be very sick or they can be chronically ill and still be working. It affects the bone. I remember one young veterinarian who contracted the disease. He had pain in his hip, and after we did a blood test the final diagnosis was that he had undulant fever with osteomyelitis. As I have said, in human beings it can cause very severe illness, and it can even be fatal. Of course some do not become so ill.

Back in 1953 brucellosis was running rampant, and many cows lost their calves through abortion. To overcome this, compulsory vaccination was adopted. That was commenced in 1956. This was carried out by the Health of Animals Branch of the Department of Agriculture without cost to the farmers. Reactors were shipped. Doubtfuls were re-tested. The stables were all disinfected and cleaned.

By 1964 the point was reached where some areas were able to be certified. This was in areas where only 5 per cent of the herds reacted and not more than one per cent of the animals were infected. With this very low incidence the disease appeared to be on the way out. Then the Brucellosis Act was introduced in 1965, and that terminated compulsory vaccination. Both the provincial governments and the federal government were involved in that act. From that date on fewer calves were vaccinated. In other words, vaccination of calves was discouraged because of the markets in some areas where calves were being shipped. Some calves were sold as cows and some of them would occasionally react, so some countries did not want to buy them. From that date on fewer calves were vaccinated.

From 1969 to 1973 it appeared that the disease was remaining under control, and there was a false sense of security. In 1969, for instance, 211 herds were affected. In 1972, 209 herds were affected. Both levels of government were in favour of the eradication program which de-emphasized vaccination. During this period of time compensation paid for the animals which were destroyed was rightfully increased when they had to be shipped.

The federal government kept supplying the vaccine, and some of the good dairy farmers kept vaccinating, but of course they then had to pay for the vaccine. In 1953 when this plan was started, we were vaccinating 400,000 calves per year, and the Health of Animals Branch was paying the cost of this. However, all at once outbreaks started to recur, and here in eastern Ontario we probably had the first outbreak. Then there were other minor outbreaks. These were more insolated cases occurring in western Ontario. So at the end of 1973, 48 herds were removed. In 1973 there were 1,038 reactors. It is interesting to note that in 1974 there were 337 herds under quarantine, an increase of over eight times in the space of one year. The reactors, from January 1 to September 30 of that year, were 3,168, a ten times increase. Therefore the evidence shows that we have a return of a disaster that we thought we had conquered. Instead of that, from January to March of this year there have been 50 newly infected herds found. Multiply that by six and you get 300 new herds per year.

I would point out to the minister that this sort of thing has happened in the field of human medicine. We stopped vaccination and had to go back to it. I believe that we have to return to vaccination in Ontario and the rest of Canada. There has been a division of opinion between the Ontario government and the federal government. The Ontario government believes we should return to vaccination but the federal government does not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I have just stated that we have had this large increase and it must be met by different means than we have now.

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) it is a special pleasure tonight to reply to the hon. member on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan).

I am pleased to have this opportunity to elaborate on the brucellosis eradication program which is being conducted in Canada by Agriculture Canada.

The hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) suggested in his question of April 4, 1977, that a renewed emphasis on the calfhood vaccination program might now be in order, given the increased number of herds under quarantine recently for brucellosis. The hon. member will be glad to know that a meeting has been scheduled for June 16 in Winnipeg at which this issue will be fully explored by government and industry representatives. Nevertheless, I would like to stress the fact that brucellosis will never be completely eliminated from the Canadian cattle population by the use of a vaccination program only. Not only may the presence of the vaccination mask the disease in the herd, but the vaccination itself is only effective in about 65 per cent of animals vaccinated. However, the department does recognize that a vaccination program may be justified in certain instances, and for this reason has continued to supply vaccine free of charge to veterinarians.

The national test and slaughter program was begun in 1957 at which time the infection rate of the Canadian herd was at 4.5 per cent. This has now been reduced to approximately two tenths of 1 per cent—an evident success. In addition, the brucellosis milk ring testing program and the market cattle testing program will play a part in the eradication of this disease in Canada. Furthermore, additional measures were implemented this year, such as the registration of livestock dealers' premises and mandatory testing of cattle sold at farm auctions. In 1976-77 a total of 2.2 million blood samples were drawn from farm animals. This is significantly greater than any year in the past.

It is correct that there has been an increase in the number of herds in quarantine in the hon. member's riding in recent months. This is a direct result of the general area test of every herd which was begun in November, 1976. Herds under quarantine often include only suspicious or one or two reactors or are awaiting 30-day or 90-day, or disinfection clearance. It is hoped that with the co-operation of all concerned this disease can be eradicated from all regions of Canada, including the hon. member's area, where a full thrust toward eradication is now in process.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS—DRILLING IN BEAUFORT SEA—POSSIBILITY OF COMPLAINTS FROM OTHER COUNTRIES ABOUT RISK OF OIL SPILL AND CO-OPERATION ON CLEAN-UP

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, the reason I ask that this matter be dealt with this evening is because of the minister's answer to a question I asked on May 10. My question arose to a large extent from information contained in the Berger Report. At that time the minister said that he had not had a chance to read the report. I assume that he has now read the report and can provide complete answers on the issues raised.

In the time that I have been in this House, Mr. Speaker, I believe there have been two events that may or may not change the course of history in Canada. One was the air controllers' issue, and the second, the filing of the Berger Report which has made a valiant effort to tell us something about ourselves.

Basically I asked the minister to deal with four matters raised in the report. One was the possibility of a circumpolar conference. The other was the response to the proposal concerning a national wilderness park, to be located on the north slope in the Yukon, which would be the counterpart of the park on the Alaska side. The other question asked for a response with regard to the provision of a whale sanctuary, which seems to be necessary. Lastly, there was a question concerning the provision of a bird sanctuary in the Mackenzie Delta.

It is useful to examine some of the things the report says, and to consider some of the intensive studies which have resulted from some of the proposals in the report. I hope the parliamentary secretary can enlighten the House as to what specifically the government is doing to move forward the implementation of those particular recommendations so vital and important to the north.

The Berger Report makes some interesting observations on Beaufort Sea drilling. The most interesting of those observations concern the problems of production which would arise after, presumably, the oil or gas is found; because at that point the risks become even greater than they are at present when drilling is under way. Examining this question, Mr. Justice Berger assessed the evidence concerning the risks confronting not only Canada, but adjacent countries as well. I will quote that part of the report couched in the form of the preliminary letter to the minister. Mr. Justice Berger wrote:

Therefore, I urge the Government of Canada to ensure that improvements in technology for prevention of spills and development of effective technology for containment and cleanup of spills precede further advance of industry in the Beaufort Sea. I further urge that advances in knowledge of the environmental consequences of oil spills should likewise keep ahead of offshore development. Here I am referring not only to impacts on mammals, birds and fish in the Beaufort Sea area but also to the possibility that accumulation of oil in the Arctic Ocean could affect climate. In this I am referring to the possibility that oil spills from offshore petroleum development by all the circumpolar powers could diminish the albedo (the reflective capacity of ice), causing a decrease in the sea ice cover and hence changes in climate. Canada should propose that research be undertaken jointly by the circumpolar powers into the risks and consequences of oil and gas exploration, development and transportation activities around the Arctic Ocean.

Surely all members of the House will support such a constructive proposal. Canada, the first nation to drill in the Beaufort Sea, should be the host nation for a conference of circumpolar powers. Through such a conference we could (a), obtain reliable evidence with respect to the potential of the albedo effect and (b), share our technology with others for the clean up of the oil spill which will inevitably occur in that environmentally sensitive area.

The minister indicated that so far as he could recall he had received representations only from the United States. I know the United States is most concerned about the risk of damage to its own environment, which is why that country is not drilling in the naval reserves off the coast of Alaska. They are concerned because they know they do not have the necessary technology, and they want Canada to guarantee that our drilling will not destroy their environment. Surely, at the very least, we should provide that guarantee to the United States. As well, we should provide the forum for an international conference which can assess the risks we are taking.

I am speaking not only of the risk of damage to the climate of the Arctic Ocean and the North American continent, but of the possible risk of damaging the climate of planet earth itself. I know that sounds a bit like science fiction. But let me say that reputable scientists are most concerned, because if we spill enough oil in the Arctic and if we change the reflective capacity of the ice, we could change the climate of the planet. That is too high a risk to take.

[Mr. Leggatt.]

I am hoping the minister will have some positive response at least in terms of the initial proposal of an international conference made by Mr. Justice Berger. Also, I hope the minister will give us some idea of how long it will be before we see legislation which sets up a national wilderness park, something Alaska has already done and is in the process of improving.

We have legislation which says once and for all that we are going to protect the whales in the Beaufort Sea. Fortunately, we are not now drilling in that area so we can do it. We have legislation for a bird sanctuary in the Mackenzie Delta. All of these things are absolutely vital if we are going to do what Mr. Justice Thomas Berger asked us to do, which is to look at ourselves, ask ourselves what kind of people we are, and then move in a civilized and constructive way in developing our north consistent with a civilized ethic.

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I will try to respond as fully as I can in the very brief time available. As I am sure the hon. member is aware, the time allotted for my response is less than half that which he had to set down his concern on the question of the circumpolar conference. I know that the minister is well aware from the hon. member's question of several days ago of his representation. I am sure he will give it every consideration.

Because my time is brief, I want to deal directly with the American-Canadian situation.

As had been agreed with the United States in 1976, discussions took place with United States officials earlier this year in order to provide them with full information on Beaufort Sea drilling operations in 1976 and plans for 1977. The United States subsequently reiterated its concerns regarding possible effects on United States interests of such drilling operations. These concerns are being taken into account.

On the question of compensation in case of damages to the United States resulting from an oil spill, arrangements were established last year to provide remedies for potential United States claims resulting from Canadian operations in the Beaufort Sea should they proceed. As a part of ongoing discussions, consultations are taking place this year with a view to making available to potential United States claimants, on the basis of reciprocity, the legal remedies related to compensation for pollution damage available to Canadians under the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act.

In addition, we are in the process of finalizing a joint Canada-United States oil spill contingency plan, which is now considered to be operational.

The Berger Report is a comprehensive and in depth study of the Canadian north. It took more than two years of intensive work to prepare. My minister obviously wants to give himself and his officials a reasonable chance to review it and also to consider related reports, some not yet available, on this general question, before making known his views.

I appreciate that the NDP has often been credited as being a party that is a little ahead. There is nothing wrong with taking an early and aggressive stand on a report as important as the Berger Report, but surely the minister and his officials must have a reasonable amount of time to digest that report and other related items before reaching the important conclusions proposed by the hon. member opposite.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO ENSURE CONTINUED OPERATION OF YWCA IN WHITEHORSE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that seven years ago CMHC funded the YWCA of Yukon in Whitehorse, in light of the fact that they have been given notice of the appointment of a receiver on May 24, 1977, and realizing the critical nature of the roles of the YWCA in the lives of the people of the Yukon at a time when the aluminum industry development is certain and with a strong possibility of a pipeline, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale):

That this House direct the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) to immediately launch a full investigation into all aspects of this issue with the view to provide adequate funds to ensure the continued viability and operation of the YWCA of Yukon.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation pursuant to Standing Order 43 of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE PAYMENT EQUAL TO SPOUSES' ALLOWANCE TO PERSONS OF SINGLE STATUS BETWEEN 60 AND 65—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the difficulty still being faced by about 200 spouses every month who, before they reach 65, become widows and lose their allowance and in view of similar difficulties faced by other persons of single status between 60 and 65, I once again ask the House under the provisions of Standing Order 43 for consent to present a motion. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That this House urges the government to introduce without delay an amendment to the Old Age Security Act to provide for the equivalent of the spouse's allowance to be paid as well to widows, spinsters, widowers and bachelors between the ages of 60 and 65, provided they are out of the labour market.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation for debate of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

POSSIBILITY OF OPENING AND ADJOURNING SESSIONS AT FIXED DATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion on a very important matter.

Considering that once more this session is running the risk of being extended into the middle of summer; that it would be greatly advantageous for all Canadians if sessions of Parliament were held at fixed periods of time; and that most parliamentarians, if not all, approve this idea, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That the House instruct the Committee on Procedure and Organization to hold a meeting as soon as possible to consider the advisability of holding sessions of Parliament at fixed periods of time in the future and also to set dates for holidays and other statutory holidays to allow parliamentarians to be with their families during holidays and thus have a better organized life.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Pursuant to provisions of Standing Order 43, the presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.
