bit for the province and state of Maine. Among those assembled were nany aged men who still felt sufficient interest in agriculture to be hele. He saw many young men who were very largely the info of the institution, and who would soon be its very life. Farming was the highest occupation except those of the minister of the gospei and the teacher of the youth of the ecuntry. One way to make young men remain on the farmis and to induce others to take up farming was to prove to the propole that it was a paying business. Many young men left fatters could not give them farms on which they expressing the willingness of the govern-ment to do all possible to advance the inwere satisfied to settle, and they were not in a position to purchase farms for them selves.
