Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): This subsection provides:

In respect of all contracts, the board shall, wherever practicable, invite tenders either by means of advertisements in the public press or otherwise.

That is an excellent provision to prevent patronage in the giving of munitions contracts, provided always, of course, that all those capable of carrying out such contracts are allowed to tender, and that no obstacles are placed in their way. Let me illustrate by referring to a matter I shall discuss at greater length on the minister's estimates.

On the fourteenth of March of last year I placed some questions on the order paper and a return was brought down dated Friday, June 24. The last two parts of my question were:

6. Whether any official of the Department of National Defence has refused to supply tender forms to any coal dealer in connection with the purchase of coal during the period from April 1, 1930, to date.

7. If so, what coal dealer was refused, and the reasons for the refusal.

The answer that was brought down in the return, sessional paper 309, was that no dealer was refused tender forms. I have in my hand two affidavits. I have the originals and copies, which I shall be very glad to give to the minister, but I shall not bother him with them at the moment. One is an affidavit from a coal dealer in the city of Ottawa, and the other an affidavit from his secretary. The coal dealer states in his affidavit that he sent his secretary to the director of contracts of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What year was it, may I ask?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): June 28, 1937. She went to the director of contracts, was refused an application form. The employer then himself went to the office of the deputy minister of national defence and was also refused a tender form. The secretary was told when she went to the director of contracts that the department did not know this particular gentleman, although he has been in the coal business in this city for a number of years. I have no personal knowledge of these facts, but I shall be glad to give to the minister copies of the affidavits and he can check them. On paper this clause looks fine, and I think the minister is quite sincere in what he has here; but if those capable of fulfilling a contract cannot get tender forms, the whole value of the section is destroyed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the hon. member be good enough to give me details of those two cases?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I will give the minister the affidavits.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am not opposing the principle of what my hon. friend suggests, but let me make one or two observations. I think he has had the same experience I have had in the department, that cases arise in the experience of all in authority in respect of which tenders, although desirable, are not practicable. For instance there may be secret designs. Another point is that under section 7 the taxation provisions apply only where tenders cannot be called for —in other words that peculiar type of contract which generally causes all the trouble, where it is not feasible to ask for public tenders, and you have to do it some other way, on the basis of an upset price, or unit price, or the cost plus system. It is under that limitation that all the taxation provisions enacted in section 7 of this legislation, apply. I should like very much if it were practicable to call for public tenders for everything; that is the ideal situation. But, especially in regard to difficult and intricate pieces of work, or where secret designs and processes are involved, the functioning authority will often find it impossible to proceed by tender, and that might lead to trouble.

Mr. STIRLING: I should be in general agreement with the minister if we were dealing with the ordinary requirements of government. But here we are dealing with the requirements of the defence of the country, which puts the matter on an entirely different plane. The minister referred to section 7; I do not know whether the chairman will permit me to link the two, but I shall do so if I may, because when we come to section 7 I am going to raise the question whether it would not be a good thing to apply this control of profits theory to all contracts. If it is adopted for one type of contract, I do not see why it should not apply also to the other type. I do not know how far I may go now on section 7, but I can hardly accept the minister's answer referring to clause 7 when I do not agree with that clause. Perhaps this may stand until we reach section 7, or may we discuss 7 now?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have no objection.

Mr. POWER: I might point out that this bill is to some extent based on the war purchasing commission which was in existence during the war. Section 7 of P.C. 1033 of May 1915, the order in council appointing the war purchasing commission and defining its duties, reads:

> In respect of all contracts to be made by the commission or to be entered into on its behalf, the following regulations shall obtain as far as practicable.

I think that is where we got the phraseology (a) tenders shall be called for; (b) purchases shall be made and contracts given at the lowest price. I think this bill was drafted on the war purchasing commission regulations.

Mr. STIRLING: If I may amplify that a little further, I visualize that this board is going to card index Canadian industry. That being the case, they will be possessed of all the information necessary in regard to all the various branches of endeavour which will be used in the defence of Canada. Therefore it will be perfectly easy for the board to acquaint itself with manufacturers who are able to tender. That being so, I do not know that I would stress public advertisement except for the reason that it gives the public information. But the board would have no difficulty in getting in touch with every concern that is capable of tendering for these requirements.

Coming to the tenders themselves, the further clauses of this subsection instruct the board as to what it may do with regard to the lowest tender. There are occasions when it is not desirable to accept the lowest tender. They may not be very frequent, but provision must be made for them. I have known instances in my own experience in which it was well known that the person who put in the lowest tender could not possibly carry out the work at the price stipulated. In this case the board has the right to state in its recommendation to the Minister of Finance its reasons for setting aside the lowest tender. The board is taking very considerable responsibility, and I see no reason why, if we are going to place implicit confidence in this new and extraordinary board, it should not also have the power to recommend that the lowest tender be set aside.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It has the power mentioned, to state why the lowest tender has not been recommended.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In respect to contracts where you call for tenders wherever practicable, in view of public opinion in these days would it not be wise to insert some provision limiting the amount of profit which may accrue under a contract, instead of just leaving it wide open?

Mr. POWER: That comes under section 7.

Subsection 4 agreed to.

On section 4, subsection 5—Duty of board where tender is not invited.

Mr. MacNICOL: With respect to the first part of the subsection:

In respect of any contract for which the board has decided that it is impracticable to invite tenders, it shall be the duty of the board—

[Mr. Power.]

I should like some explanation as to the word "impracticable." I remember what the minister said on March 10, that sixty per cent of the purchases in his department during the last three years were made after tenders had been called for, and they amounted to approximately $7,785,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is, of those contracts available for tender.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes; that is what I say. If sixty per cent amounted to that sum, the remaiing forty per cent bought without tenders would amount to about $5,516,000. This clause applies to munitions purchased without tender. I have been wondering as to the full significance of the words "fair and reasonable" as far as the government is concerned and "unfair or unreasonable" as far as the contractors, subcontractors or suppliers are concerned. In connection with many types of munitions or equipment bought by the department there must be from 25 to 250 or perhaps more subcontracts, because so many different items enter into the construction of any type of machine, and perhaps more particularly in connection with war machines. It would appear to me that it would be a very difficult job running down all those subcontractors in order to ascertain whether or not they were making unreasonable profits. If section 7 applies to the whole matter I will accept it at once.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It does.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have been wondering why you say "fair and reasonable" and "unfair or unreasonable" if the five per cent applies.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I correct an impression which perhaps my hon. friend formed from my remarks the other day. When I referred to the sixty and forty per cent, that dealt with contracts called by tender. The sixty per cent referred to contracts called by public tender and the forty per cent to contracts called by invited tender from selected lists. In addition to these two classes referred to the other day, as my hon. friend will find from my remarks in Hansard, there was a third type of contract which for the last two years has been referred to the interdepartmental committee; that is, contracts which in the opinion of the department could not be made the subject of either public or invited tenders. It is to that particular type of contract that subsection 5 applies. The element of fair and reasonable profit I think is governed pretty drastically by the taxation provisions of section 7, in both the positive and the negative way; in the first place what is a fair and reasonable cost to the government, and in the second place an unfair or unreasonable profit to a contractor, subcontractor, manufacturer, supplier or other person. I think my hon. friend will find that these general enunciations of principle are very carefully safeguarded by the taxation provisions of section 7.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would not the two types of contracts be the same; that is, the contract secured through public or advertised tender and the contract obtained after competing against half a dozen selected tenderers?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, but this does not refer to them. It is competitive bidding in both cases, but in this case it is not. This is where it is impossible to have competitive bidding; therefore you need a peculiar type of contract, either cost plus or unit price, and that is where the element of establishing the principle of fair and reasonable profit comes in, there and there only.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That is what I had in mind, where you do not advertise for tenders but have two or three contractors who are invited to tender without advertising. In view of public opinion at the present time is it not only fair that some limit should be put on the amount of profit that might accrue under those contracts?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That comes under section 7 again.

Subsection 5 agreed to.

Subsection 6 agreed to.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Contract to be approved by governor in council.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That does not cover it; that is not what I mean. You have competitive bidding, but what I am talking about is where you pick out four or five contractors. There is no provision here which controls the profits they may make.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): All contracts except those mentioned are subject to section 7. In other words all competitive contracts are referred to; otherwise contracts, other than those in connection with which competitive bids are possible, are covered by section 7.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is that true of the selected lists as well?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): All selected lists are supposed to be subject to the general principle of competitive bidding, just the same as bids asked for by public tender.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then there is no limit on the profits that may be made under contracts of that type?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The general supposition, whether it is right or wrong, is that wherever competitive bids are called for, whether from six or seven contractors or from the general public, the public interest is safeguarded.

Mr. COLDWELL: But there is no limitation under this act?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. STIRLING: That brings up the point to which I was referring just now. Suppose you have only two tenders. Those of us who have had anything to do with the letting of contracts for public works have known cases in which tender No. 2 was a dummy bid. I see no reason why, if the government is adopting the principle contained in section 7, it should not be made to apply also to contracts let by tender.

Mr. POWER: I imagine that is what the board was created for, to see that there were no dummy bids and no flim-flamming. I do not know how you could avoid it otherwise. I do not think we could establish a minimum number. In all probability my hon. friend will know of certain articles which can be produced by only two people in this country, but the board is charged with the duty of seeing to it that the article is secured or the contract executed at a fair and reasonable cost to the government of Canada. If two people are in agreement, or a dummy bid is sent in, then the board only has to say, "We will not buy from you," or "We will buy outside," or "We will find some other means of getting it." That is exactly why we want a board of this kind, which will be free from all suspicion and able to go to anyone who appears to be trying either to deceive or to take advantage of the government, and say, "If we cannot get proper bids we will obtain the article in some other way."

Mr. COLDWELL: That is to say, then, that this clause really only covers—

The CHAIRMAN: In order to keep the record clear I think we should consider sections 5 and 6 before we discuss section 7.

Mr. COLDWELL: The point I was going to make was really in connection with the two sections. This section, I take it—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): To which section is my hon. friend referring?

Mr. COLDWELL: Section 4.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 4 has been passed. We are now on section 5.

Mr. BROOKS: Subsection 4 of section 4 says, "The board shall recommend" and section 5 says, "All proposed contracts shall be submitted by the board to the Minister of Finance."

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is asking his question in relation to what section?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My hon. friend is quite correct in that respect; he is connecting the interpretation of section 5 with a preceding section, as I understand it.

Mr. BROOKS: Yes. I was asking to whom the board would make its recommendation. In section 4 it is provided that they may make a recommendation, and then section 5 provides that these contracts are to be submitted by the board to the Minister of Finance. Do they make their recommendations to the Minister of Finance, or do they simply submit these contracts to the minister for recommendation to the governor in council?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Under section 4 the board shall recommend the acceptance of the lowest tender submitted, and then under section 5 all proposed contracts shall be submitted by the board to the Minister of Finance. The recommendation does not go to the Minister of National Defence, but rather to the Minister of Finance who, in turn, is responsible for submission to council for approval or otherwise.

Mr. BROOKS: The formal recommendation goes to the Minister of Finance in every case.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Board to supervise carrying out contracts.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I see by this section it is the duty of the board to supervise the performance of all contracts. Whose duty was it before this time? Under the Department of National Defence was it the duty of the master general of the ordnance to supervise contracts?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Generally speaking it was under the supervision of the director of contracts, but in some cases the director of technical engineering services would have jurisdiction for the actual carrying out of the details of a contract. It might be that in connection with the air service some other official had some power of supervision. In the present instance, generally speaking the board is charged with the supervision of all contracts.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Does this section take away the power of supervision of those various branches? Is that not another instance of interference between this board and the Department of National Defence? I believe it is an instance of lifting responsibility to supervise from the department to the board. The board will have a pretty big job on its hands.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is a big job.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It does seem to me that "to supervise" is hardly the correct expression. I think the duty of doing that job should be left with the various branches of the department, and that the heads of those branches should have the last say.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not think in the actual performance of duties there will be very much change. The officers of the branches would do the practical work of supervision. But they shall report to the board, and authority and responsibility will rest with the board. The director of engineering services will, just the same as to-day, carry out the supervision; but the final authority for supervision and the final responsibility will rest with the new board.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): As it stands now it is the duty of the board to supervise. Will they not think it is their duty to set up a supervisory department to take care of these contracts?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Why not amend the bill to take care of that situation? Certainly you do not want interference from the board, nor do you want to build up a supervisory department. It seems to me there should be an amendment to take care of the supervision.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is already taken care of in other sections of the bill. An officer of the Department of National Defence could be seconded to the board.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister consider as a substitution for the word "supervise" the words "ensure the proper performance" or "effective performance"? I believe the word "supervise" is conflicting.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I would have no objection to that. Probably it would be an improvement.

Mr. STIRLING: Would it not be a good idea to refer to the actual examination or supervision in section 8 of the bill, and place supervision among those duties imposed on the board? Then it would be quite clear that the technical officers of the various branches of the department would be used for the purpose of inspection.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I see no objection to that. Perhaps my colleague would move the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Kootenay East, namely to delete the words "supervise the" in line thirty and insert in lieu thereof the words "to ensure the proper." Then the section would read "It shall be the duty of the board to ensure the proper performance of all contracts," and so on.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Is not that duplicated in the latter part of the same section?

Mr. POWER: Yes, I think the hon. member for Nanaimo is quite right. They are going to supervise in order to assure the performance, or to assure that the contracts are performed in accordance with their respective terms.

Mr. STEVENS: It is obviously bad legislation to say in a statute that it shall be the duty—and the language is very clear and definite—to supervise, when we know that the supervising authority will be the officer of the department—where it ought to be. All the board should be asked to do is to ensure that the contract is properly discharged or performed, whichever term you may use. But I do not think the word "supervise" should be permitted to remain. Otherwise a conflict of interest would develop.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Let the section stand for the moment.

Mr. STIRLING: Would it be better to leave out the last part of the section, so that the section would read:

It shall be the duty of the board to ensure the proper performance of all contracts, which may have been entered into pursuant to the provisions of this part.

Mr. POWER: My colleague the Postmaster General points out that he thinks the word "supervise" was inserted to give an assurance with respect to the question of time, or to see to it that the contract is carried out on time. I believe that is the idea.

Mr. STEVENS: I agree with the object, but—

Mr. POWER: Perhaps the language is not quite clear.

Mr. STEVENS: The clause should stand for redrafting.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): May I suggest the words "It shall be the duty of the board to accept the responsibility for the supervision of".

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We will take all these suggestions into consideration; in the meantime I would suggest that the section stand.

Section 6 stands.

On section 7—Maximum net profit.

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe section 7 is one of the most important sections in the bill. It deals with the supervision of profits, and lays down certain methods by which profits shall be controlled. I agree with those who have already said the limitation of profits should apply to all those engaged in fulfilling government contracts. I do not think it is sufficient to say that the tender method will regulate profits sufficiently. Already in Great Britain there has been some criticism of contracts which have been let not only by selection but also by tender. During the great war we know how scandalous were some of the profits made by firms which secured contracts by tender.

The other day in introducing the bill the Minister of National Defence spoke of the minority report of the senate committee of the United States. I think it is worth while drawing to the attention of the minister and the house something in the majority report which bears directly—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I spoke of both.

Mr. COLDWELL: —on this particular section. The minister says he referred to both; I will clear that up. I realize that in a sentence the minister referred to the majority report, but he quoted directly and substantially from the minority report. His reference to the majority report was brief. I wish to draw the attention of the house to the considered opinion of that committee in regard to the type of proposal contained in this section of the bill. It said:

1. Major accounting factors, such as costs and valuations, are extremely difficult to determine. To a large extent the government must rely upon industry for information. In the pressure of wartime, these accounting items are inevitably determined on a basis advantageous to industry.

2. There are always many loopholes in profit-limitation schemes designed to apply uniformly to our immense and complicated industrial structure.

3. No matter how effective a scheme may be on paper, it will be tremendously weakened by the administrative difficulties inherent in a wartime situation characterized by the necessity for speed and the vast volume of work which must be done.

The same thing applies to a peace-time program which has to be instituted quickly, perhaps because of certain international developments. I quote further from the senate report:

4. Because of the necessity for flexibility, the character of war regulation is largely determined by negotiation between government officials and industry. Industry inevitably has the upper hand in these negotiations because of its superior information and the existence of a seller's market in war.

Those are some of the reasons why some of us, the members of this group particularly, have been insistent that as much of this work as possible should be undertaken by the government itself. I do not believe that this clause, well drawn as it may be —there are one or two grave defects in it, in my opinion—will remedy the disease which it seeks to cure. Consequently I wished to draw to the attention of the minister and the committee what has been said after very careful inquiry in another country. We may have something more to say regarding the profit referred to in subsection (b). I want to emphasize the arguments which we have placed before the committee, that the limitation of profits by bills of this type in connection with contracts of the sort contemplated is more or less ineffective. Moreover, may I emphasize also that the experience of the last few years has shown that less than forty per cent of the contracts will be subject to the provisions of this section.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister explain why the government has not seen fit to apply the limitation of profits to all contracts? Where contracts are let without tender the board has almost inquisitorial powers to go into the financial details of the company concerned. After a contract has been let by public tender it may develop that the profits are larger than had been anticipated. Why should not the government take the power to apply these inquisitorial examinations to such a company? Why should it not take the same action with regard to that company as it provides shall be taken under section 7 for contracts in this category?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The answer obviously is that competition is generally supposed to safeguard the public interest. The criticism we have heard in recent weeks with regard to a certain contract was with reference to the fact that public tenders were not called for. Whether they were feasible, of course, is a matter of argument. I think it is a fairly safe assumption that where the competition is not too narrow or too restricted, the public interest is generally safeguarded, unless there is collusion in regard to the tendering. My only suggestion is that possibly we might work out a system whereby when you resort to a selected list, as was referred to by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) the other day, you would insist upon a certain minimum number of tenderers. If that number was not available or forthcoming, then other principles might have to be applied. I do think the principle of this legislation is sound. Where tenders are possible, I think they should be resorted to. I think the public interest is safeguarded in that way. Where public tenders are not possible, it is incumbent upon the board to explain to the governor in council and to the Minister of Finance why in their judgment they were not possible. Where you have the type of contract which in the last two and a half years we found necessary to refer to the interdepartmental committee for advice, then the principle of very drastic profit control by way of taxation would be applied. If the committee feels otherwise about it, I shall be prepared to give the matter further consideration. However, I do say that we should give to this our best judgment. In my opinion the public interest, which we are all seeking to advance, is safeguarded in this legislation by the principle of competition, provided it is fair and not collusive or restricted competition.

Mr. STEVENS: I hesitate to say what I am going to say for fear it may be misunderstood, yet I think it ought to be said. I am voicing now entirely my own opinion, and I doubt if there are many others who will share it. I say this after giving the full consideration to what we are doing that has been suggested by the minister. I should like to preface my remarks by saying that it is highly desirable that we should limit profits; and there is no thought in my mind to depart from that objective which, after all, is one of the main objectives of this bill. However,

I should like to point out the danger, if the profit is really limited, of the efforts which may be made to discover some way of circumventing the discovery of what is the actual cost. In other words, genuine operators, unless they act for purely patriotic purposes, might hesitate to take a contract with a five per cent profit, particularly where they had to expend a considerable amount of capital in additional equipment in order to carry out the contract. I think it will be necessary, Mr. Chairman, to refer to section 7 as a whole.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, I think we shall have to discuss the section as a whole, because it is all interrelated.

Mr. STEVENS: Perhaps the chairman might consent to our discussing the first three parts of the section as a whole. Paragraph (a) of subsection 3 reads:

(a) The average amount of capital of a person employed in the performance of a contract shall be determined by the board and shall be based upon the actual cost (less depreciation at a rate deemed reasonable by the board) of the physical assets including plant, machinery, equipment and working capital of such person—

Let us pause there. I am not sufficiently technically qualified to call to mind immediately an appropriate illustration, but I submit that contracts might be let where perhaps only a comparatively small portion of a plant already in existence would be used in manufacturing the articles covered by the contract.

Mr. McLARTY: The bill provides for five per cent profit on the capital required in the production.

Mr. STEVENS: Who is going to determine what is the proportion?

Mr. McLARTY: The board.

Mr. STEVENS: Of course that is in the bill, but I am trying to point out that the task we are giving the board is an impossible one. I do not think anyone can say what proportion of a plant, what proportion of working capital, what proportion of the overhead charges of taxes and rentals, would enter into the performance of a specific contract which might not involve the use of more than ten per cent of the plant. That is almost an impossible thing to do. Inasmuch as it is provided by subsection 1 that profits shall be limited to five per cent, that limitation is subject to the determination of what proportion of the fixed plant and equipment and so forth is used, and of the proportionate depreciation of the plant that is to be calculated. I think under these circumstances a clever operator could, if he wished, very easily evade the five per cent provision.

Then there are some forms of contract or some classes of material where there ought to be a much wider profit than in other classes. In a large construction contract I suppose five per cent might be all right, or in manufacturing an article that could be turned over very quickly.

Mr. McLARTY: This applies only to contracts over $5,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite so, but during the last war there were many contracts for boots and shoes and clothing for uniforms, and if I might be permitted to give an illustration, in the province of Quebec a splendid firm was given a contract for the manufacturing of khaki cloth. They had had no previous experience in a contract of the kind, and I think they honestly gave the best price they thought was applicable to that class of work. But when they had completed their contract they found, and it is in the records of this parliament, that they had made a profit of seventy-two per cent. They were amazed. What was the reason for such a large profit? In the ordinary running of their looms they would run a certain web of cloth, or whatever the term is, for perhaps a few hundred bolts, and then they would have to change the loom, but on this khaki cloth contract the loom ran for month after month without having to be changed, and to their amazement they found at the end of the year they had made this huge profit. That is only indicative of the difficulty you may have in this sort of thing. I repeat that with some classes of materials five per cent may be too much, and in other classes it may be altogether too little.

Some contracts call for definite changes in plant and in capital expenditure, which would be a loss unless the business is a continuing one. There is an attrition there that is not and cannot be provided for, because to call such a loss depreciation does not cover it all. Therefore it is possible that the rigid fixation of five per cent may be too limited to apply to all contracts.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What principle would my hon. friend suggest?

Mr. STEVENS: I confess it is difficult, but I make this suggestion, that in place of this long recital in subsection 3 we might adopt the principles applicable in the calculation of income tax, where for a great many years—and it is done not only in Canada but in other countries—certain principles of accountancy are laid down which ensure a fair interpretation of what profits really are. We might incorporate in this bill, if it is possible to do so, a declaration of the principles applied by the income tax branch in the calculation of income tax, or perhaps in the calculation of the sales tax.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I interrupt, to help my hon. friend in his argument? The income tax department is dealing with the whole range of the business of an individual or corporation, but here we are dealing with a limited portion of the business of an individual or corporation.

Mr. STEVENS: That is true, and that is one of the difficulties I see in this proposal. But I do think that the principles that are applied by the income tax branch might very well be applied in this case. While I support the principle of the limiting of profits, I think we should give this clause very careful consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We want every possible suggestion we can get. There is nothing final about this clause. I do feel that as drafted it might be too drastic when taken together with the provisions of various other sections, section 7, for example; but on the other hand, I believe it is the general desire to be drastic. The only danger is that you might possibly drive your best industrial concerns away from taking orders of this kind; I frankly admit that.

Mr. MacNICOL: I want to ask one or two questions with respect to this clause, and I hope that this time the minister will accept my intentions as sincere.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Always.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have been wondering what would happen when you fix a definite rate of profit and provide that it is to be collected on the capital. I have in mind two plants, one capitalized at $500,000, which turns out a million shells. Five per cent on that capital would be $25,000. Another plant, not so well equipped, and not so well managed, is capitalized at $1,000,000, and it also turns out a million shells. Its profit would be $50,000. Would not that put a premium on inefficiency? After all, when a war is on, the main thing is to have your material delivered quickly where it is required. There was a time towards the end of the great war, as perhaps the minister knows, when Great Britain sent word to the munitions board in Canada, "To h—— with profits; we want the shells." Shells at that time were $6.

Mr. McLARTY: I wonder if I might ask the hon. member a question. In the use of the word "capital" as applied under this section, I believe he is thinking of the authorized or paid-up capital of a company as distinguished from capital engaged in the manufacture of arms or munitions.

Mr. MacNICOL: Wholly engaged.

Mr. McLARTY: Might I suggest to him that it is not the authorized or paid-up capital in this case, but the capital which is actually employed in the carrying out of the contract. In other words the authorized or paid-up capital has nothing to do with this section.

Mr. MacNICOL: Just a moment. I know a little about manufacturing. My hon. friend may know the legal point of view, but I know something of the practical point of view. Take a plant that is engaged in making shells and nothing else, and it is capitalized at half a million. Is not that the capital you have in mind in this clause, where the whole capital is engaged in the making of the shells?

Mr. McLARTY: There is a limitation on the capital employed in section 7 (3) (a), and the mere fact that on paper the company's authorized or paid-up capital is a certain amount does not mean that for the purposes of this bill that is definitely to be taken as the capital required and employed in the carrying out of any contract authorized under the act. May I suggest to my hon. friend this, and I am doing it simply to be helpful, not critical at all. The word "capital" generally is rather a loose term; for we speak of authorized capital and of paid-up capital. But the capital which is referred to under this section is the definite amount of capital which, as described in the section, is referable only to the amount that is employed—and that eliminates goodwill—in connection with the carrying out of a particular contract.

Mr. MacNICOL: I tried to point out to the minister that the whole plant is engaged in making shells.

Mr. McLARTY: True, but the capital might not all be employed; or, on the other hand, it might not come within the definition provided by this section. But you see the limitation is five per cent on the actual capital employed.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is going to be very hard to administer that if the whole plant is engaged in making shells. The minister knows very well that towards the end of the war, plants were set up to make shells; the whole of a plant was thus engaged. Right after the war every machine in the plant was scrapped and broken up and melted. What is the capital if it is not the whole plant?

Mr. McLARTY: If for example the capital consists of an asset which is capitalized as goodwill, then for the purpose of this act it is not considered as capital. That is the only point I am making.

Mr. MacNICOL: The factories set up at the end of the war had no goodwill. They were built on contracts. Say they invested half a million dollars in building and equipping a plant and spent their whole time turning out shells. That is the whole of the capital, is it not, if the whole of the plant is engaged in that work? I started by saying that you could take two plants: one, well managed and well equipped, capitalized at half a million dollars; another not so well managed nor so well equipped, and having, perhaps, not so many machines, and capitalized at a million dollars, and they each turn out the same number of shells. What I am trying to think out is, will this encourage production in times of necessity when it becomes a matter of urgency to produce the most material in the quickest possible time, or will it retard production?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If my hon. friend is trying to be cooperative as far as possible—and I am sure he is—is he suggesting that the basis on which the profit is founded is incorrect or unfair, or that the amount itself is possibly too rigid?

Mr. MacNICOL: I was just wondering whether it would retard production. Or would the setting by the government of a price per shell, a price they themselves determine as fair, with liberty to produce to the limit, increase production—for instance, if they said to the owners of a plant, "We will give you $3 a shell; go ahead and turn out as many as you can"? Or would production be more surely increased by carrying on under this clause?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I may be wrong, but I gather from my hon. friend's remarks that he rather thinks this five per cent is too drastic.

Mr. MacNICOL: No. I passed no comment. I was thinking only of production.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The question of production would depend very largely on the equity or inequity of the present proposal.

Mr. MacNICOL: On what would be turned out.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The production and the capacity for production would largely depend on the equity or inequity of the proposed system if that system were in operation, although if an emergency arose overnight I am of opinion that this present system would not arise. You would have to apply new measures immediately. Essentially this is a measure for peace-time production. Perhaps I might clarify this by submitting a note I had on this particular paragraph.

With regard to the selection of a base on which the five per cent profit should be allowed, the guiding principle is, as my colleague has just pointed out, that it should be based on the actual physical plant and the machinery actually playing a part in the manufacture or production of the article contracted for. It was determined that the base upon which this contract should be calculated should not contain anything in the nature of artificial, inflated, watered or unreal capital. With this guiding principle in mind, this bill provides that the calculation of capital employed shall be based upon the actual cost less depreciation of the physical assets, including plant, machinery, equipment and working capital.

Another problem arises, that of the proper valuation of these physical assets where the actual cash cost to the company is not determinable. If, for example, a company's assets were acquired through the issue of shares, then it might become a matter of some difficulty to arrive at the proper cash value of those assets. It was felt that a reasonable criterion of such cash value would be any previous recent sales of those same assets which might in turn have involved cash payments. Accordingly it is provided—I quote from one of the sections—

> Where such assets were acquired for a consideration other than cash, the board shall determine their fair cash value at the time of acquisition having regard to any sale or sales of such assets within five years of their acquisition by such person and, in the event of no such sale or sales, to any other circumstances which in the opinion of the board may indicate their fair cash value.

These are the general principles underlying the subsection.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the minister any thought in mind in reference to what he said about a reasonable rate of depreciation?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Just "less depreciation," to be fixed by the board, I would imagine, in every particular case. It may be seen on page 5 of the bill.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In that connection would there not be a little difficulty about determining what might be a legitimate sale and what might not be? It might be sold to a holding company, for example, on a distress sale.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is one of the board's chief duties.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I feel that we should do everything we possibly can in this bill to convince the public that there is to be no profiteering in munitions. That is the point. Now, as to contracts which are to be made with two selected contractors, or half a dozen —and you might have a case involving just two contractors—as I said before, there is no provision for the limiting of profits. To my mind there is a reason why a limitation should be provided for, and I am perfectly certain that where you get two contractors to tender on munitions of this kind they will be quite willing to limit their profits to a reasonable figure. In order that the public may be satisfied with what is being done in connection with setting up this purchasing board, it is important that some clause be inserted for the limitation of profits where two or three or four selected contractors are asked to tender, because there may be things upon which they will tender with the making of which they are not familiar, and therefore they must make their price fairly high in order to take care of the risks involved in the contract. I think it is only reasonable that something along the line of my suggestion should be inserted in the contract.

Mr. LAWSON: Arising out of that question, I have been waiting for an opportunity to ask one which is puzzling me. The modifying words throughout this section 7 seems to be "to which this section applies."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. LAWSON: "A contract to which this section applies." Where is there anything to indicate to which this section does apply?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In subsection 9, I think.

Mr. LAWSON: Of this same section?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. It is on page 6:

> For the purpose of this section the word "contract" shall include contracts entered into under the authority of this part and subcontracts in connection therewith, but shall not include (a) contracts awarded as a result of competitive tender or subcontracts in connection therewith, and (b) contracts or subcontracts to the extent that such contracts or subcontracts are performed outside of Canada.

Mr. LAWSON: "Contracts awarded as the result of competitive tender." That could be a contract then from a selected list?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. LAWSON: Likewise it could be a contract let after public advertisement?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

[Mr. I. A. Mackenzie.]

Mr. LAWSON: I am afraid I gathered a wrong impression. I thought you were providing for no limitation of profit on contracts obtained as a result of public advertisement, and were applying the limitation where the contractor should be from a selected list.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, the principle of competitive bidding is presumed to exist both where you have public advertisement for tenders from everyone and where tenders are invited from a selected list. That was the point raised by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross). The only point of controversy that I see in the situation would be where you have say only two tenders and where there might be, as suggested by someone, I think the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), the possibility of collusion. It occurs to me that it might be practicable to safeguard that by insisting on tenders from four or five or possibly more tenderers.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Last Friday the minister pointed out that contracts subject to tender had been let sixty per cent by public advertisement and only forty per cent from a selected list. Speaking thereto later, my colleague pointed out that therefore this five per cent profit limitation will apply only to the sixty per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, that is not correct.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): And will not apply to the forty per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It will apply to the sixty per cent and the forty per cent; the public tender list plus the selected list. I was making a comparison between the percentages let by public tender and from a selected list. It would correspond largely with those outside the sixty per cent and outside the forty per cent, that were let by the department for the last two years, and reviewed by the interdepartmental committee, at a unit price or upset price or mostly on a cost plus basis.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What percentage of the contracts let by the Department of National Defence, say in the last year, would come under this profits tax?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I cannot give the percentage at the moment, but I can give the total value. The total value of contracts since the interdepartmental committee has functioned is about $9,700,000. I cannot for the moment compare it by way of percentage with the totals in the other two categories which I included the other day in the sixty per cent and forty per cent respectively. Is that clear?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes.

Mr. KINLEY: Does the minister not think that these profit clauses will operate to the advantage of an incorporated company as against the private individual in business? Paragraph (b) says:

> The net profit of a person in respect of a contract shall be the aggregate amount received by such person under the contract, less such actual expenses and disbursements, allowances for depreciation and overhead charges as shall be determined by the board to be properly chargeable to the contract, but no interest on borrowed capital shall be deducted.

In the case of an incorporated company there is a board of directors whose members are entitled to salaries, and the man who takes the contract, probably the president of the company, is entitled to his salary, whereas the individual in business who takes a contract, if he is not actually engaged in the work, it seems to me would not be entitled to salary; so that these clauses are all to the advantage of the incorporated company as against the private individual in business. Take, for example, shipbuilders in Nova Scotia; some are companies, some are private individuals. In the case of a company there is the president, who would draw his salary. How about a private individual who builds a ship? All he is entitled to is five per cent profit and nothing more, and he must live in the meantime. The income tax law recognizes the salary of the officers as part of the company's expenses, but if you are a private individual in business you just take your profits. If there is no profit and you take anything out of your business, it is regarded as a reduction in capital. The man we should be careful to protect in this country is the man who takes his responsibility, who is not looking for the privilege of limited liability. I suggest that this section should be looked into very carefully with a view to seeing that the private individual in business is protected, because he is becoming much too rare. We need him to-day; there should be more personal responsibility in business.

Mr. McLARTY: If the hon. member will refer to section 2, subsection (e), the definition of "person," he will see that—

> "Person" includes any body corporate and politic and any association or other body, and the heirs, executors, administrators and curators or other legal representatives of such person, according to the law of that part of Canada to which the context extends.

Mr. KINLEY: That is the general law.

Mr. McLARTY: I was dealing with the specific definition of "person," because the hon. member was drawing a distinction between a corporate body and an individual, and I understand his impression to be that in some way we are prejudicing the position of an individual or partnership as compared with an incorporated body. He said that the incorporated body might pay large salaries. One thing that is essential in this bill and important that the committee should understand is that only the actual capital employed is considered. I do not care what the company is or whether its capital is authorized or paid up, the limitation prescribed in this bill is that they shall not receive in the way of profit more than five per cent on the capital actually engaged in the performance of the contract. The capital of a company might be a million dollars or two million dollars, its authorized capital might be still more, but the purpose and intent of this bill is that the capital on which the profit shall be calculated is not what you might call watered stock; the capital to which the five per cent shall apply is definitely limited to the amount actually used in the performance of the contract. For that reason I suggest that the question as to the salary paid by a particular company is not important.

Mr. KINLEY: I do not want to discuss corporate law with a legal gentleman, but I think it is admitted that a company is a "person" under the law. A private individual in business is also a person. But he has not the privilege of limited liability as has an incorporated company. He is the man that should be encouraged in business, the man who accepts his responsibilities. The hon. gentleman knows that the profit on a contract is what remains over and above the expenses. With a private individual there is no such expense as salary of the president or directors.

Mr. McLARTY: I must correct my hon. friend. Under this act the five per cent is not a profit based on the contract price. It is five per cent on the capital employed in carrying out the contract.

Mr. STEVENS: After deducting all charges.

Mr. McLARTY: After deducting certain charges, of course; but it is not a five per cent profit based on the amount of the contract. It is on the capital employed.

Mr. KINLEY: What I want to convey to the hon. gentleman is this, and it is set out in connection with the income tax. When the president of a company puts in his income tax return, as an industrialist, he states the salary he receives from that company. Then, if he has received any dividend from the company, that goes into the income tax also. But if I am a private individual in business I must pay income tax on my profit; and if there is no profit the money I take out of the business in order to live is considered a reduction of capital.

Mr. McLARTY: I do not want to be in any way unfair to my hon. friend, but I would point out that in relation to this section the salary a particular company pays would have little bearing upon the amount of the tax under section 7. I do not want to embarrass my hon. friend; I only want to try to make it clear.

Mr. KINLEY: I am not embarrassed at all, but I think I know something about companies. This act says:

> The net profit of a person in respect of a contract shall be the aggregate amount received by such person under the contract, less such actual expenses and disbursements, allowances for depreciation and overhead charges as shall be determined by the board—

I say the set-up as between an incorporated company and a private individual in business is altogether different. This will work to the advantage of the incorporated company, and I believe the private individual should be protected in the framing of these sections.

Mr. FRASER: In view of the fact that we are discussing section 7, since I am not an experienced financier but only a dirt farmer from up country I must admit that I am a little mystified by paragraph (b) of subsection 3 of section 7, which concludes with these words: "but no interest on borrowed capital shall be deducted." I think the committee is entitled to have this point cleared up, and perhaps what I have in mind can be best illustrated if I do as some other hon. members have done and endeavour to employ some picture language.

For the sake of argument we will say we have an incorporated company engaged in the agricultural implement business, with $5,000,000 in plant and $2,000,000 in working capital, regardless of whether it is supplied by an issue of common stock or a bond issue; it is capital engaged, fixed and otherwise, in the performance of a commercial business. This company decides, either as a result of being approached by the Department of National Defence or as a result of submitting tenders, that it will build a million dollars' worth of tractors for the government. They set aside, we will say for the sake of argument, $200,000 of their fixed assets in plant and employ those fixed assets in the production of a million dollars' worth of tractors. But, continuing the illustration, they find that at this particular time of year they are using their capital to carry stocks of agricultural implements and credit, and they find it necessary to go to the bank and borrow half a million dollars with which to purchase the supplies necessary for the production of a million dollars' worth of tanks.

I have had some experience with banks, and this company, in order to borrow that money, has to hypothecate its total assets, fixed and movable and its accounts receivable, with the family heirlooms thrown in. The banks require that, as was said a few moments ago in another connection, because they clearly realize that the human element enters into all operations; so the banks fortify themselves against fire losses, against the death of key employees and against all other contingencies that may arise in the ramifications of commercial business. At any rate, this company goes to the bank and borrows half a million dollars on the usual hypothecation, and using the credit of the company, to prosecute the production of a million dollars' worth of tanks for the Department of National Defence. Contrary to the impression suggested the other day on behalf of some hon. members of the house, they do this patriotically, believing it their duty to get into the munitions game and produce this equipment as part of the defence system of Canada and the British empire, as my hon. friend from Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) said this afternoon.

The bank says, "All right. We will lend you half a million dollars in addition to the working capital you are using in your commercial business. Our rate is six per cent." I should like to know from the minister, or anybody else who is in the know, if this company is to be penalized one per cent for their patriotic desire to do business with the government; because this paragraph distinctly says that no interest on borrowed capital shall be deducted. The company borrows half a million dollars, and on that money, if the capital is employed for twelve months, interest is paid at the rate of six per cent compounded monthly. At the end of the year, after using that capital borrowed on the credit of our company, we find ourselves in the position of having to lose one per cent compounded monthly, which we charge to the loss side of our profit and loss account.

Mr. KINLEY: That only means you cannot figure it in twice.

Mr. FRASER: You cannot deduct it.

Mr. KINLEY: I think it is capital employed.

Mr. FRASER: But it is borrowed capital employed.

Mr. KINLEY: So you cannot figure it twice.

Mr. FRASER: I am not figuring it twice. My hon. friend and the Postmaster General have tried to clarify this section, and I am doing my humble best to do the same thing. In addition to the capital employed in the manufacture of agricultural implements by this firm, to carry its credit, pay its wages and continue its operations, they have set aside $200,000 of their fixed assets, on which the government of Canada allow them five per cent or $10,000 a year. But in order to prosecute the production of a million dollars' worth of tanks, in addition to their binders, reapers, mowers and plows, the company has to go to the chartered banks and borrow money—and I understand that this is what the banks are for—in order to carry on this government contract. But, as I said a moment ago, the company pays six per cent compounded monthly, and at the end of the year it is told—

Mr. KINLEY: How much do you pay?

Mr. FRASER: I pay six per cent on my borrowed capital which I am using to carry out this contract; that is, six per cent compounded monthly.

An hon. MEMBER: Too much.

Mr. FRASER: If I borrow it in Regina I have to pay seven per cent compounded monthly, but I am talking about Ontario or Quebec, where I pay six per cent. Then when I submit my accounts to the accounting branch of the Department of National Defence at the end of the year they pay me five per cent. So for my patriotic duty I forfeit one per cent on the borrowed capital, compounded monthly, for the pleasure of building these tanks. If I am right, then all I suggest is that paragraph (b) should be clarified—at least for one member of the committee.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: I think there is something to be said for the point raised by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley). I cannot agree with the interpretation of the section given by the Postmaster General (Mr. McLarty). Let me give an illustration. We will suppose that I own a plant, and that the capital invested in the performance of a contract amounts to a million dollars. We will suppose I make $100,000 profit. If I am an individual I have to turn back to the government, in taxes, $50,000, because I am allowed only the five per cent maximum as profits. But if a company, then that $100,000 is the gross profit, not the net profit. Out of that $100,000 they are allowed to pay perhaps $50,000 as directors' fees. Therefore the net profit would be considered as $50,000, and they would be permitted to retain the $100,000 they make. On the other hand, in the case of the individual the $50,000 would be taken away, because he had not divided it in fees and in other ways.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With reference to the point raised by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Fraser), may I say that we appreciate and welcome suggestions and criticisms. But the viewpoint that was adopted in regard to the particular provision that we should not make any deduction for interest on borrowed capital was as follows: The provision is not unfair inasmuch as moneys raised by the corporation, through the issue of its bonds, will doubtless have been invested in plant equipment, machinery, and so on, and as such, such capital is owned by the company and, accordingly, is properly included in the total of capital employed by the corporation in performing the contract. In short, the corporation will be entitled to receive profits up to five per cent on the physical capital which, though owned by the company, is in fact the security against which bonds were issued. In view, then, of the fact that this capital may be included in the base upon which five per cent may be allowed, it follows that no allowance should be made elsewhere for interest paid on funds borrowed from third parties. That was the viewpoint which led to the insertion of this clause.

Mr. FRASER: I appreciate very much the explanation given by the minister with respect to that particular clause, and I accept it as being absolutely correct, so far as the details of the explanation the hon. gentleman has given are concerned. His explanation I submit covers only money borrowed on a bond issue invested in physical, fixed assets, or working capital. But I wish to point out again that the money mentioned in and covered by the explanation of the minister may be employed in the commercial end of the business, or in some other end of it. And they set aside, may I repeat, for the prosecution of the contract $200,000 of the fixed assets of the company covered by the very bond issue mentioned by the minister, on which they are paid five per cent and on which they do not and are not rightly permitted to deduct the interest charged on the bond issue. I concur in that, and agree with it. But I go a step farther. I would suggest that at least fifty per cent of the industrial companies in Canada in the position I have mentioned would have to resort to bank credit to prosecute their business. The point I am trying to bring out is that the company, in addition to the $200,000 covered by the explanation of the minister, find that they have to go to the bank and borrow a half a million dollars in order to buy material, pay labour, and pay for fuel, overhead and so on, to manufacture tanks, guns, or whatever it may be, for the Department of National Defence. They pay on that half million dollars five per cent compounded monthly. If it is five per cent compounded twelve times a year it figures out to about five and three-eighths per cent at the end of the year. So if they pay the banks the exact rate of interest as covered and limited by the bill they still contribute three-eighths of one per cent, plus the operation of their business, to the provision of munitions for the Dominion of Canada.

I submit if my interpretation is correct that the Department of National Defence is defeating the purpose of the bill, because you cannot get people, in my humble opinion, to be sufficiently philanthropic, with the interests of their shareholders foremost in mind, to lose money simply to have the opportunity of building tanks or munitions of war. I submit with due respect, and I hope with a clear understanding and proper interpretation of the note the minister has read, that he has not yet answered my point.

Mr. LAWSON: If the minister has taken due note of the hon. member's suggestion—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have.

Mr. LAWSON: —I presume he will give consideration to it. I should like to come back to what I was speaking about some time ago. After giving serious consideration to section 7 it does seem to me, with respect to the limitation of profits, that in the final analysis it will apply only to contracts under $5,000. Now, let me see if I can make myself clear.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Over.

Mr. LAWSON: Over. In section 2 of the bill we say that a contract shall mean, among other things, any contract which involves an expenditure by the department of a sum in excess of $5,000. In other words, it is not a contract under this bill at all, according to that, unless it exceeds $5,000. Let us start with that. In subsection 4, of section 4 I read that in respect of all contracts the board shall, wherever practicable, invite tenders either by means of advertisements in the public press or otherwise. So now in respect of all contracts in excess of $5,000, unless there is some very special reason, the board will invite tenders. Now I come to section 7, and I find that it applies to "those contracts to which this section applies." And then when I go to subsection 9 I find that we eliminate all the contracts which have been awarded as a result of competitive tender. What have we got left?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Just those where tenders are not practicable, over $5,000.

Mr. LAWSON: All you have left, then, are those tenders or contracts over $5,000 in respect of which tenders have not been called.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. LAWSON: Let us go back to subsection 4, where it is stated that in respect of all contracts the board shall, wherever practicable, invite tenders. Surely then this whole bill, so far as the limitation of profits in respect of defence contracts is concerned, will apply to only a very few contracts, and in very rare cases.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Where tenders are not practicable.

Mr. LAWSON: Yes, where tenders are not called for.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not practicable.

Mr. LAWSON: You might think, after hearing the minister the other day, that we were really doing something big.

Mr. POWER: You never understood him, right from the start. That has been your trouble.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was $10,000,000 in the last two years.

Mr. LAWSON: Without tenders?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall have the percentages worked out to-morrow.

Mr. LAWSON: Without tenders?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Reviewed by the interdepartmental committee in the last two years.

Mr. LAWSON: In view of the acrimonious debates we have had this session in connection with contracts awarded without tender, I was rather hopeful that such contracts would be a great deal less in future years.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The ingenuity of the point raised by my hon. friend does not alter in the slightest the explanation that I gave. First of all, there are two kinds of competitive tenders. This applies only where competitive tenders are not possible, either by public advertising or from selected lists. The board would be compelled to deal with the matter when they ruled that tenders were not practicable. This could be computed from a comparison between the amount of contracts awarded in the last two years through the interdepartmental committee and the total amount of contracts awarded by public tender or from selected lists.

Mr. LAWSON: If we are agreed on that, then there is a great deal in the point raised by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley). Let me give a concrete illustration. If I may say so, I think the Postmaster General (Mr. McLarty) was wrong in his interpretation. Let us take a corporation in connection with which the board, in pursuance of the powers conferred upon it by section 7, has fixed the actual capital used at $1,000,000. Let us assume the whole plant is being used to carry out a munitions contract. Let us assume that in the ordinary course of that business the general manager is paid $50,000 a year by the corporation, and the assistant general manager $25,000 a year by the corporation. That $50,000 and $25,000 and the other executive salaries enter into the cost of production.

Mr. McLARTY: My hon. friend assumes that the amount of capital to be employed is fixed at $1,000,000. The amount of profit or the amount of payment in connection with the contract is definitely fixed by his first assumption.

Mr. LAWSON: No.

Mr. McLARTY: The capital employed.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is confusing law and accountancy.

Mr. LAWSON: If the Postmaster General will just follow me for a minute, let us assume a corporation gets a munitions contract for $1,200,000. Let us forget all about capital for the time being. This contract is to make certain munitions and the whole plant is being used.

Mr. McLARTY: That contract is of course not the result of a tender?

Mr. LAWSON: If it were the result of a tender this legislation would not apply. We are dealing with cases where there are no tenders. They have a contract for $1,200,000. They go ahead with the contract, and when they finish, the government auditor comes along, or some auditor under the board, and tells them they have made more than five per cent on the amount of the capital invested by the company. They say they have not, and they ask the board to tell them how much capital there is. The board looks into it and tells them the capital used is $1,000,000. The corporation then asks what it cost them to make the goods. That is the first thing that must be determined before we can get net profit, gross profit or anything else. Executive salaries enter into the cost. If the corporation shows costs of $1,150,000, including $100,000 of executive salaries, they would be subject to no penalties under the legislation because all the profit left would be a net profit of only $50,000 on a $1,200,000 contract. But if that contract had been let to an indivdual, he would not be permitted to pay himself an executive salary and count it in the determination of the cost. My hon. friend is right when he says there is a distinct handicap placed upon an individual manufacturer, while the corporation is favoured.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Are there any further suggestions to be offered? If not, it was my intention to let this section stand for further consideration and proceed with the non-contentious sections.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I think the general feeling throughout the country, judging by the press reports, especially when the minister made his announcement last Friday, was that this legislation was to apply to all contracts except those let by public tender. We now find that it is not concerned with contracts which are let from selected lists, as there is considered to be an element of competition there. I think that is debatable. For instance, two contractors might be asked to submit tenders. Quite apart from the use of the word "collusion," they might be following some trade practice when they submitted figures which were very close together. They might have agreements as to contracts whereby one would take one contract and the other another. This could be done without doing anything of a criminal nature. The company given the contract might make a very substantial profit, but it would not come under the five per cent profit tax imposed by this bill. If the minister is going to let the section stand I would ask him to consider seriously taking out paragraph (a) in subsection 9 of section 7, which reads:

Contracts awarded as a result of competitive tender or subcontracts in connection therewith.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think you will find a section in the bill under which the board is authorized to keep complete lists of those available for various contracts.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I ask the minister to consider taking out that paragraph of that subsection and adding a clause which would make this profits tax apply, not only to contracts given without tender but to contracts given from selected lists.

Mr. STIRLING: I wanted to make a remark with regard to subsection 4, which contains a most unusual reference to the income tax division. I should like to know if there is any other such reference to the sacred secrets of the income tax department in any other phase of our public or private life? In the old country they have had more experience in connection with income tax, and they consider it one of the most dreadful things imaginable to suggest releasing any information contained in income tax returns.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have never seen it in any other legislation, but it is just another drastic provision in this legislation to provide for the getting of complete information to ensure that the provisions respecting taxation will be enforced.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The board might request the officers of the income tax branch to furnish the amount of capital and so on.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That will be considered.

Section 7 stands.

On section 8, paragraph (a)—Inquiry as to requirements.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does this not limit the minister's activities?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I hope so.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does it not almost eliminate them?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It does not curtail the authority or responsibility of the minister in respect to following up contracts, or in the actual awarding of them.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraph (b) agreed to.

[Mr. T. C. Douglas.]

On section 8, paragraph (c)—Surveying industrial plants.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does this empower the board to send out someone to survey a plant as the department did?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That work is done very largely now.

Mr. MacNICOL: Because if it is, the surveys may extend to Jericho.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraphs (d) to (h) inclusive agreed to.

On section 8, paragraph (i)—General.

Mr. STIRLING: Is the minister going to consider inserting here a clause to cover the board's appealing to the department to furnish technical officers? The same question arose with regard to section 6, which stood.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My hon. friend raised that point earlier in the evening, and we allowed section 6 to stand.

Mr. STIRLING: Yes, and the same suggestion was made with reference to section 8, which lays down what the board can do in the carrying out of its powers. I think instructions should be given to the board for the carrying out of the inspection of the contract.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is, in addition to recasting section 6, have a new paragraph inserted in section 8?

Mr. STIRLING: That is worth considering, I think.

Mr. McLARTY: Would not paragraph (i) cover it if you reworded section 6 along the lines suggested?

Mr. STIRLING: I leave it to the minister, but I should have thought it would be a good thing to say in section 8 that the board shall have the duty of carrying out the inspection and can seek the assistance of technical officers in doing so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We will consider that, and if necessary reopen the section.

Paragraph (i) agreed to.

Section agreed to.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Appointment or transfer of civil servants.

Mr. MacNICOL: With reference to subsection 2, which refers to "a civil servant who, at the time of his appointment," does that mean a civil servant who has been transferred to the board from some other department?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: How are all the other employees of the board to be selected?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is one clause dealing with the technical officers.

Mr. MacNICOL: I mean the large staff of accountants, investigators, and so forth.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Except for the technical officers, they will be seconded from the department or transferred from other departments, or, I presume, appointed by the civil service commission.

Section agreed to.

On section 11 — Appointment technical officers.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What technical officers would be employed by the board? Would not the board have the advantage of having available any of the officers of the department?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Oh, yes; and those officers with experience under the director of contracts would, I presume, be very valuable under the supervision of the board, but it might be necessary for the board on occasion to engage temporarily a technical officer outside. They might enter into a contract and suddenly need advice from a professional man, a lawyer or an accountant, and this section gives them the necessary authority.

Mr. LANDERYOU: It was the technical men I was more particularly interested in.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This is for exactly the same purpose.

Section agreed to.

Sections 12 to 16 inclusive agreed to.

On section 17—Governor in council may borrow for capital expenditures.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Is the minister himself satisfied with the policy that is to be pursued of raising money for purposes of national defence as indicated by this clause? Is he in favour of this method?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I must be.

Mr. STEVENS: This is, of course, a very important clause, and involves a radical departure from the usual procedure. I am not quite settled in my own mind as to whether it is a wise clause. The general idea of amortizing expenditures for defence may be novel and attractive and interesting from the point of view of inducing those who are opposed to this class of expenditure to swallow the pill a little less painfully. But when it comes down to real administration I have very grave doubts of its value. Surely we ought to keep away from a statutory provision by which special borrowing can be done for one class of government activities. I do not like it at all. The first thing we know we shall have so many statutes—we have too many now—dealing with similar things affecting different branches of government that the result will be chaos. I sometimes think we ought to have a complete revision of all our statutes, eliminating a great many, and codifying the others. I do not want to block the passing of this legislation, but I definitely question the wisdom, from an administrative and legislative standpoint, of this provision.

Mr. MacNEIL: Will the minister explain how this section will operate and how the appropriations will be presented to parliament?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Section 17 empowers the government to borrow money up to the amount designated as chargeable to capital account in the annual appropriations of the department. It will be recalled that the estimates recently tabled provided under national defence for ordinary expenditures of $34,000,000 odd and for capital expenditure of $29,000,000 odd.

The present section further provides for borrowing power during the current year up to this limited amount, something just over $29,000,000. Subsection 2 of section 17 makes formal provision for making the principal raised by way of loan, and the interest charged thereon, a charge on the consolidated revenue fund.

Section 18, provides for the amortization of the amount borrowed for expenditure on defence. It is provided that the capital sum shall be repaid in ten equal annual instalments out of appropriations provided by parliament for the department, and that the interest payable shall be at the rate of three per cent. There is also a formal provision that the sums required to be paid shall be paid at such times and in such proportions as the treasury board may from time to time direct.

In regard to the principle followed in separating the items in the defence estimates to be financed by capital expenditure from those to be financed in the ordinary way, the principle is based largely on the question of durable value. The amounts required for the replacement of current supplies belong largely to ordinary account. Fortifications, guns, or something else to be acquired whose lifetime would be from ten to twenty years would be financed from capital expenditure, repayable over a period of ten years.

Mr. LANDERYOU: There is provision for retirement of the expenditure, provision for a sinking fund. I understood the minister to say that this principle of repayment within ten years of the money we have borrowed would have to be set aside in the event of war, and drastic financial provisions would have to be made overnight. Just what drastic provisions would be substituted for this?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That, of course, will be a matter for the administration which is in charge when the emergency arises. There is no question that if a national emergency of any magnitude should arise, any government would be confronted with the necessity of providing large sums in a short space of time.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Why is it that this principle of amortizing over a period of ten years the amount to be borrowed is not followed in connection with public works or other expenditures? Why should we depart in this particular case from what has been a recognized principle? I do not see any object in doing it, because it is only taking money from one pocket and putting it into another. It may make the expenditure for the year a little smaller, but the money is to be spent just the same as it would be on a public building.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It seems an unusual procedure that one department should enter into this type of arrangement. It appears to me the procedure to be followed should be that the Minister of Finance would pay the money out of the consolidated revenue fund and, if required, float such bonds and loans as were necessary to repay it. It is unusual to tag what is really a financial bill on the end of a defence purchasing bill. Has the minister any reason for following that procedure? Is it customary?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I believe this is the first time we have done it in Canada.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Was there any particular reason for doing it? I was wondering why it was done. I am not protesting, because I do not understand the minister's reason for doing it.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Could the minister explain the purpose of having this provision in the bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Considering the lateness of the hour I shall take due note of these profound questions and answer them when the committee sits again.

Section 17 stands.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current) presented the first report of the special committee on electoral matters, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

SENATE BILL—FIRST READING

Bill No. 43, for the relief of Stefano Guilio Luciano Roncari—Mr. Walsh.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO ADJOURNMENT AT SIX O'CLOCK ON ST. PATRICK'S DAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Has the government considered adjourning at six o'clock this evening in order that Irish members of the house and their friends may celebrate St. Patrick's day?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): We will all celebrate this great day by doing some more work to hasten the business of the session.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ATTITUDE OF MR. DE VALERA, AND CANADIAN DEPARTMENTAL ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) with the view that the estimates of his department might be cut down. As Mr. De Valera has now decided to fight alongside of Great Britain, do we LOW need to spend as much on national defence?

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): I greatly appreciate that splendid Hibernian contribution to national defence.

FOREIGN POLICY

INQUIRY AS TO MINISTERIAL STATEMENT RESPECTING RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Will the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) be in a position at the first of the week to give the house any information on the foreign situation, in view of its great importance to the people of Canada?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The government will take notice of the question of my hon. friend, and I have no doubt the Prime Minister will satisfy his legitimate curiosity.

PENITENTIARIES

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION WITH POWERS OF ADMINISTRATION AND CONTROL—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 34, an act respecting penitentiaries.

He said: The senate have approved this bill, adding two amendments. The first is to section 5, by adding a subsection 2 reading:

(2) Nothing in this act shall be deemed to extend or apply to the exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy, or to the remission service of the Department of Justice, or to alter or affect or to authorize any altering or affecting of that direct control of that service by the minister which now exists.

I have no objection to accepting the amendment, which however I did not think necessary. It has never been the intention in any way by this bill to affect the present situation in regard to the prerogative of mercy. I took the trouble to say that anything along that line will have to be considered and be the subject of further legislation if it is deemed advisable.

The second amendment is to section 11, which gives to the commission the power to appoint the guards, trade instructors and subordinate officers. The senate have added these words: "upon the recommendation of the warden." By the old statute those guards were appointed by the superintendent upon the recommendation of the warden. My purpose was rather to give full control to the commission, but the senate have thought fit to add the words "upon the recommendation of the warden , and I am quite willing to accept the amendment.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, some time ago I tabled an explanatory tabular statement of the tariff changes, of which I think every hon. member has a copy. If hon. gentlemen will now turn to page 21 of that statement they will find printed opposite each item the answers to a number of questions which I feel sure they otherwise would ask. This information is printed for the purpose of expediting the consideration of each item. I have, of course, further information in connection with each item; but as far as comparative rates are concerned, they are fully set out in the tabular statement commencing on page 21 with respect to schedule 1. I believe we are now on the second item; one item was carried.

Customs tariff—7. Meats, fresh, n.o.p.:

ex (a) Edible offal of beef and veal, 4 cents per pound;

ex (c) Pork, 1¼ cents per pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—9. Poultry and game, n.o.p., 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—10. Meats, prepared or preserved, other than canned:

(a) Bacon, hams, shoulders and other pork, 1¾ cents per pound;

(b) N.o.p., 3 cents per pound.

Mr. THOMPSON: I notice this item provides for meats, prepared or preserved, other than canned. I have always felt it a great mistake that we did not have some protection against canned meats. We are paying 1½ cents per pound to get our cattle into the United States while our quota lasts, and it lasted only three weeks during the first quarter of the year. After the quota is filled we must pay 3 cents per pound or practically $30 per head, while at the same time we admit free from the United States and the Argentine between eight and ten million pounds of meat each year, which is the equivalent of about thirty thousand cattle. In other words these countries are sending practically thirty thousand head of cattle into Canada annually free of duty while we must pay from 1½ cents to 3 cents per pound on the cattle we ship to the United States. I have always thought it was very unfair that we did not have some protection against the importation of canned meats from countries which impose such high duties on our live stock.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend's remarks do not pertain strictly to this item, which deals with bacon, hams, shoulders and other pork, prepared or preserved, other than canned. In connection with that class of commodity the balance of trade is very much in our favour, and the object of the item now under consideration is merely a binding that Canada will not, during the continuance of the treaty, increase the rate against the United States. Perhaps the committee would be interested in the figures of our imports from the United States. Last year the total was less than $300,000, while our exports to the United States were $551,000 in connection with the same items.

Mr. THOMPSON: Could the minister give us the imports from the Argentine, which enjoys the same privileges we extend to the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not the figures before me, but my officer tells me there would be no imports from the Argentine under this item, which has to do with pork and pork products.

Mr. HYNDMAN: Would the minister give us the corresponding United States duties in connection with the items we have considered so far?

Mr. DUNNING: The United States tariff item does not exactly correspond with the one now under discussion; there is a slight variation in the content of the item, but broadly speaking it is similar. Prior to the first agreement their rate against us was 3¼ cents per pound. Under the new agreement the rate will be 2 cents per pound.

Mr. HYNDMAN: And on the three preceding items?

Mr. DUNNING: Under item 6, before the 1938 agreement the rate was 2 cents per pound; under the 1938 agreement the rate is one cent. Under item 7, before the new agreement the rate was 6 cents; under the new agreement it is 3 cents. The United States tariff is 6 cents per pound. There is no change in that tariff on item 9 in the new agreement.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—16. Eggs in the shell: 5 cents per dozen.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—42. Salt, in bulk, n.o.p.: 4 cents per 100 pounds.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Thompson.]

Customs tariff—45. Milk foods, n.o.p.: prepared cereal foods, in packages not exceeding twenty-five pounds weight each: 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—46. Prepared cereal foods, n.o.p.: 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 47. Lima beans, dried: one cent per pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 47. Soya beans, n.o.p.: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—52. Barley, n.o.p.: 15 cents per bushel.

Mr. PERLEY: I think we are giving the United States a little advantage under this item. There is a reduction of 7½ cents a bushel on barley coming into Canada, whereas, under the corresponding item, 722, in the United States tariff, a reduction of five cents only is given us. When we consider the value of barley for feeding purposes, I think we have given a little greater concession than we have received. The United States imported last year something like $11,000,000 worth, from which it appears that there is a good market there for our barley. We went a little too far in reducing our duty as compared with theirs.

Mr. DUNNING: In negotiating the treaty we had in mind, as regards this item, the points made by my hon. friend. Of course, the fact is that we have never imported as much as a thousand bushels from the United States in any of the last three years. In 1936 we imported 231 bushels; in 1937, 251 bushels; and in 1938, 417 bushels. The United States on the other hand imported from us in 1936, 1,806,000 bushels; in 1937, 13,300,000 bushels; and in 1938, 2,871,000 bushels. As pointed out by the hon. member, the rates under the new agreement will be matched; that is to say, the rate is 15 cents a bushel on barley going to the United States and 15 cents on barley coming from that country. On the whole, having regard to the history of the trade, the five cent reduction on our barley going into United States means very much more to our farm population than the reduction to 15 cents on United States barley entering Canada.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—55. Indian corn, n.o.p.: 10 cents per bushel.

Mr. PERLEY: I have a more serious complaint in regard to this item. The duty is reduced from 20 cents to 10 cents. Will the minister give amounts of importations of Indian corn, particularly from the United States, and other countries as well?

Mr. DUNNING: The imports from the United States in each of the last three years have been:

	Bushels

Curiously enough our exports to the United States in the same years were:

	Bushels
1935-36	40,000
1937-38	304,000

In other words, in 1938 we exported to the United States approximately double the quantity we received in that year. The conditions vary from year to year owing largely to the size of the crop in South Africa. It was necessary a few years ago, in the interests of Canadian users of corn, to ask the government of South Africa to agree for a time to the dropping of their preference in order that the great body of users of corn in Canada might be able to get it at a reasonable price, for the reason that South Africa was in that year unable to supply corn. This solution, not merely under this item but in connection with other corn items, follows negotiations with South Africa and represents a fitting together of the interests of South Africa and of Canadian users of corn in relation to the duty on United States corn, about as effectively as I think can be done.

Mr. PERLEY: What was the duty on corn going into the United States?

Mr. DUNNNG: Twenty-five cents a bushel, with a special rate from Cuba only of ten cents, which does not concern us.

Mr. PERLEY: This is an important item. I am pleased to note that the exports of corn from Canada have been increasing; it is evidence of the fact that we can produce corn in Canada as well as they can in the United States. That has been demonstrated on our experimental farms. Anything that would replace our barley—and corn has been doing this to a certain extent for feed purposes—is detrimental. On a former occasion, as hon. members who were in the house from 1930 to 1935 will recall, the then member for Souris, Mr. Willis, placed on the record in detail the experiments that had been carried on in Canada in connection with the feeding value of corn and barley. He showed the experiments that had been done at Indian Head and other demonstration stations, proving conclusively that barley, and particularly a mixture of barley, wheat and oats, had a great food value and compared very favourably with corn. The point I wish to make is that if we can produce corn in Canada, as no doubt we can, in the light of the figures given by the minister, and knowing what we can do in regard to barley, we should be careful to see that the Canadian market is not lost to the Canadian producer, for either barley or corn. In view of the rate which the minister has given of 25 cents a bushel going into the United States, and considering our reduction from 20 cents to 10 cents a bushel, I think the exchange is rather unfair. The United States producer has the advantage over the Canadian.

Mr. MARTIN: I would not want to let this item pass, particularly in view of some of the observations of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), who I see has done vicarious duty to-day.

Mr. PERLEY: What was that?

Mr. MARTIN: I said I would not want to let the item pass in view of the observations of the hon. gentleman, who has vicariously done his duty to-day in a very admirable manner. This item, involving a reduction of the tariff on corn from 20 cents to 10 cents, should be considered in the light of other provisions in the treaty which will be discussed later, where the duty is increased from zero to 10 cents on corn for starch and distillation purposes. Of course the hon. member for Qu'Appelle knows that this matter is of considerable importance to southwestern Ontario, which produces eighty-five per cent of the corn produced in Canada. The ten cents that is now provided for in the treaty, together with the imposition of a tariff on corn which up to now has not existed, should satisfy the worry and concern of my hon. friend. That there is no doubt as to the capabilities of the corn growers of southwestern Ontario to produce all that is necessary for the corn consumptive needs of this country. It has been done in the past and it can easily be done again. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance one question. The ten cent imposition on corn for distillation and starch purposes—it does not come under this item—will apply only to non-empire importations?

Mr. DUNNING: Correct.

Mr. MARTIN: Has any request been made by South Africa to have its exports included in the ten per cent imposition on corn for distillation and starch purposes?

Mr. DEACHMAN: Mr. Chairman, I should like to suggest to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) that he make some concession, however slight it may be, to the intelligence of the farmers of Ontario. If they want to feed barley, they will feed it. If they want to sell it to the United States, they will sell it. If they want to buy corn for feed purposes, let them buy it. I think we can trust to their decision in the matter without any advice from the hon. member for Qu'Appelle or even from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) or the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley). I should like to see a more generous latitude allowed in connection with some of these things. Although the farmer may not conform to some of our ideas, when it comes to running his own farm under the conditions which exist he is, to use a familiar phrase, master of his own fate. He will decide these questions just as intelligently himself as when he receives the advice of members of parliament, who may be here in this chamber regardless of whether or not they are farmers. The only thing we need to do for the farmer is to give him freedom. The only thing which he needs is the thing which we deny him. The more generous measure of freedom he gets, the better and happier he will be. The greater measure of freedom that is given him, the less trouble this government will have in connection with unemployment, loss of revenue on the national railroad and other problems which we are trying to solve by getting in the way of the only thing that will solve them, the wisdom and common sense of the producers of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. THOMPSON: I do not think that legislation to permit the importation of corn for feed purposes will benefit the farmers of this country, neither do I think it is wise or in their interests to lower the duty from 20 cents to 10 cents per bushel. I have been in the live stock business and I know that there is no feed that will make a fine quality of bacon more rapidly than wheat, barley and oats. Such bacon is much superior to corn fed bacon. Our great difficulty has been to sell our wheat. In 1932 we obtained from Great Britain a quota of 180,000,000 pounds of bacon, which we have never been able to fill. If the farmers of the west would mix their wheat, barley and oats together and produce more of the bacon the British market is wanting, they would be able to use a considerable portion of their wheat. I do not think it is in the interests of our farmers to encourage the importation of corn for feed purposes.

Mr. PERLEY: The hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) appeals to hon. members to use their intelligence with respect to this matter. I may say that I was thinking somewhat of the tastes of the animals we produce in western Canada, those good steers which the farmers in his district go out west to buy to bring down here to feed. These animals have a taste for western barley, and when farmers go out west to get these cattle, I think it would be advisable that they bring back a carload or so of barley to feed. These cattle prefer western barley even to Ontario corn.

Mr. REID: I suppose it would be very difficult to make changes in the tariff to suit every province, but I think I speak for the other British Columbia members when I say that this reduction in the tariff on corn is welcomed in British Columbia by the dairymen and poultrymen. I do not know how many times I have had to rise in my place to contradict the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) when he has spoken about barley for feed. He quoted Mr. Willis, but he is no authority, especially on poultry. He need not come out to British Columbia to preach feeding barley to poultry. There are two reasons why that is not feasible. First, the freight rate from Manitoba to British Columbia is too high. Second, barley is not as palatable poultry feed as is corn. If you throw down corn and barley to poultry, the barley is the last grain they will pick up. Any poultryman who knows his business at all would never substitute barley for corn. I am pleased that the tariff is being changed to equalize the importations of all varieties of corn. It was a sore point to people in British Columbia that corn for distillation or starch purposes should enter free when corn for poultry feed was charged a duty. It is unfortunate that one small section of Ontario should attempt to be a guide for the rest of this country, even if they do beat us out as far as numbers are concerned. Coming from British Columbia, I welcome this reduction in the tariff.

Mr. STEVENS: It would be most unfortunate if the observations of my hon. friend should go without correction. He probably is not aware that the appreciation which he has just expressed of the reduction in the tariff has been directed to a tariff which does not affect the poultry feeders of British Columbia It is chiefly South African corn that comes into British Columbia. This has been so ever since the Ottawa agreements, which the hon. member condemned so much. The corn which is fed in Ontario does not go to British Columbia, and I do not think it ever did to any extent.

Mr. MARTIN: It should.

Mr. STEVENS: Not necessarily. As everyone knows, there is a market for it here. The corn used out our way which the chickens have been relishing so much is imported from South Africa. Some corn is brought in from the Argentine and a small quantity from Manchuria.

Mr. ILSLEY: Quite a lot from the Argentine.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite a lot from the United States.

Mr. STEVENS: South Africa is the chief source of supply for corn for British Columbia.

Mr. REID: There have been years when the United States had not enough corn to supply our requirements. Those who are in the business of manufacturing poultry feeds tell me that the Argentine corn is a much better corn for making cracked corn and corn meal than is South African corn. I want to contradict the hon. member with regard to price. Before I left to attend the session, corn in British Columbia was selling at around $38 per ton, as compared with $21 for wheat. Upon making inquiry I was told that this price was due to the long haul for corn coming from South Africa. The Cloverdale Cooperative Association, who handle the greater part of the business in my district, inform me that corn from the United States can be brought into British Columbia more cheaply than corn from any other point.

Mr. HAYHURST: I was going to suggest to the hon. member that if we had a good road from Alberta to the Fraser valley, Alberta wheat could be taken down the Fraser valley much more cheaply than you can import corn, and the hens would pick up our wheat in preference to corn any time. But the main thing is to get means of transportation in our own country. The hon. member for New Westminster is always advocating a reduction in freight rates, but if we had a good road there, they would carry the grain by truck.

Mr. REID: Then we would get cheaper freight rates.

Mr. DUNNING: I dislike to hold up my own items, but the economic argument that has been made is so fallacious that I cannot forbear referring to it. No one will seriously suggest that wheat in bulk can be taken on the long haul from Alberta to the Fraser valley cheaper by truck than it can be hauled over the railroads. That is completely wide of the mark.

Mr. HAYHURST: A great many garage men in southern Alberta would like that road built to-day, and then they would deliver the wheat at Chilliwack and other internal points in British Columbia cheaper than the railroads are doing it now.

Mr. CLARK (Essex): Mr. Chairman, I should like to put on Hansard a copy of a resolution sent to me by the president of the Essex county farm bureau.

Mr. MARTIN: What is his name?

Mr. CLARK (Essex): John Lickman, and a good Conservative, too. I received the following letter from him dated at Essex, April 8, 1938:

> The enclosed resolution was unanimously passed at a meeting of corn growers and dealers held in Essex Wednesday night.
> Copies have been forwarded to Hon. W. D. Euler, Hon. J. G. Gardiner, Hon. Chas. Dunning,, and Hon. J. L. Ilsley.
> I would very much appreciate your assistance in order that the resolution may be given full consideration by the government.

The resolution reads as follows:

> Whereas the present tariff structure between Canada, United States, and the British Empire is about to be adjusted, and whereas it is understood that the United States is making strong representations to have United States corn given free entry into Canada;
> And whereas the present tariff of twenty cents a bushel against corn from all sources except South Africa is acknowledged to be a very high protection considering the size of the industry to be protected, and the comparative size of the corn consuming industry;
> And whereas the cereal and corn starch industries enjoy the privilege of duty free corn as raw material and at the same time a very high protection on their finished product;
> And whereas a considerable percentage of the total volume of corn imported free of duty by these industries is sold as offal for feed in a protected market, thus giving those industries a very unfair advantage;
> And whereas the present situation with a tariff operative only when the Union of South Africa has no corn for export, has not been satisfactory in that the situation is very unstable and has made market conditions difficult to predict;
> And whereas this uncertain situation has a disturbing effect on all grain markets throughout Canada;
> And whereas if United States corn were given entirely free entry, a very valuable market in eastern Canada for western Canadian feed grain would be largely lost to cheap American corn, in years when United States has a large crop;
> And whereas the distilling industry is known to be very profitable and could well afford to pay a slightly larger duty on the corn they have to import;

Therefore be it resolved that the government be asked to place a stable duty of 10 cents a bushel against all corn entering Canada for all purposes and from all sources.

That is signed by the president of the Essex county farm bureau, a representative of the elevator association. I might add that the Essex county farm bureau is a representative organization, non-political, and one of the members of that organization, at the last Conservative convention held in Kingsville a short time ago, was a proposed Conservative candidate to contest the next federal election.

Mr. BARBER: I am pleased to note that some hon. gentlemen opposite are still advocating protection. Referring to the corn question, I am sure the poultry-raisers in the Fraser valley appreciate anything that is done to decrease the cost of feed, but looking over this agreement I think they will decide any reductions made are not sufficient to compensate them for the reduction in the duty from 10 to 5 cents a dozen on eggs coming from the south.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not know anything about the political complexion of the gentleman who prepared the resolution presented by the hon. member for Essex South, and I care nothing about it. But it is quite evident that the association gave a very broad-gauge study to the corn question, and that is all to their credit because that is the corn-producing section of Canada. The reasoning they have expressed was the reasoning which guided the government in reaching the conclusion it did on corn.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—56. Oats, 8 cents per bushel.

Mr. TUSTIN: Would the minister tell us what is the duty on oats coming in from the United States, and also give the imports and exports?

Mr. DUNNING: Under the new agreement the rate is 8 cents per bushel, formerly 16 cents.

Mr. MOORE: What does the 8 cent rate represent ad valorem?

Mr. DUNNING: In 1936-37 the intermediate Canadian rate of nine cents a bushel was equivalent to 32 per cent on imports from the United States, and in 1937-38, it was equivalent to 26 per cent. The fluctuation in the price of the article from year to year changes, of course, the ad valorem incidence. That was under a nine cent rate; the new rate is eight cents.

Mr. MOORE: What would be the ad valorem rate at to-day's price?

[Mr. S. M. Clark.]

Mr. DUNNING: I could not say; I do not know what to-day's price is.

Mr. PERLEY: Thirteen cents.

Mr. DONNELLY: What are the imports and exports of oats as between Canada and the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: From the United States, and here again drought conditions have caused fluctuations in various years, we imported in 1936, 941,000 bushels; in 1937, 341,000 bushels; in 1938, 8,359,000 bushels. We exported to the United States in 1936, 787,000 bushels; 1937, 287,000 bushels; 1938, 526,000 bushels.

Mr. MOORE: I am told that the ad valorem rate on oats is well over 50 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: At the present time?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Suppose it is; it is not of very much use to the farmer in Canada at any time, and it would be to the advantage of the farmer in Canada if you cut the duty off altogether, both ways.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before this item carries perhaps I should make a brief observation with regard to the reduction in the tariff on that old familiar item in which the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore) used to take a keen interest, namely, cut flowers. I dealt with this at some length in the debate on the resolution, and I have no desire to hold up the committee, but I should like to point out that a reduction in the duty from 40 per cent to 25 per cent, a difference of 15 per cent, will make, I firmly believe, a considerable difference so far as the prosperity of the cut flower growers is concerned. True, the disposition of the growers to await the results of the workings of the agreement is a reasonable one, and is, I think, the only sensible view to take.

Mr. DUNNING: I have found them very reasonable.

Mr. GRAYDON: However, as representing the constituency in Canada where cut flower growing is perhaps most prevalent, I feel I should not let this opportunity pass without protesting against the reduction of 15 per cent in the duty. The reduction under the budget of 1930 left the duty at 40 per cent. Of course a countervailing provision with regard to the United States tariff was incorporated at that time. In the agreement of 1936 the duty was taken off entirely, but it was put on again in the budget of the same year. It is noteworthy that the budget of 1936 raised the duty again to 40 per cent. I should like to say this to the minister, not by way of carping criticism but as a suggestion: In 1930 and in 1936, the same government and the same minister decided that it was necessary to have a duty of 40 per cent. I submit that nothing has happened in the meantime to improve the industry to such a degree that the reduction now proposed should be put into effect.

Mr. DUNNING: May I say at once that whatever decision I may have made nine or ten years ago on a particular item, particularly one so difficult as this, and which brought me a lot of good-humoured chaffing from hon. members opposite, not only in the house but during the subsequent election, I do appreciate the importance of this industry. After all, the industry produced last year two million dollars' worth of goods. It is, within limits, a legitimate industry. There are certain limits beyond which in a climate such as this it is obviously not economical, but within the limits in which it is now being operated by Canadians who are interested in it I believe it to be worth while, as I did then.

Last year our total importations from the United States were of the value of $152,000, while our total production was, as I said, approximately $2,000,000; and we exported to the United States $21,000 worth. That was against a duty entering the United States of 40 per cent. Under the new treaty the rate is 25 per cent each way, and I am frankly hoping, although one cannot be certain in connection with such a product, that the tremendously larger size of the United States market and its proximity to a considerable part of our industry will enable our growers to profit through the reduction in the United States rate at least as greatly and I hope more so than the United States grower will profit by the reduction of our rate to 25 per cent. After all there is a tremendous market in the United States immediately adjacent to our border, and our industry is close to the border. It is true that the facilities for producing this class of goods are much greater in the United States than they are here, and it is a very difficult matter upon which to arrive at definite and positive conclusions. As my hon. friend points out, the industry is anxiously awaiting the working out of the new rate of 25 per cent each way.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—82. ex (e) Nut trees, including grafted stock, and buds and scions for grafting nut trees, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—83. Potatoes, as hereunder defined:

(a) In their natural state:
August 1 to June 14, inclusive, free.
June 15 to July 31, inclusive, 37½ cents per 100 pounds.

(c) Sweet potatoes and yams, in their natural state, free.

Mr. STEVENS: It is a good day to discuss potatoes.

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Chairman, this is an item which I am afraid will fall rather heavily on production in British Columbia. I understand that the production of that province is in the neighbourhood of 40,000 tons, of which rather more than half is consumed in the coast markets, and the balance, with the exception of some 100 or 150 cars which find their way eastward across the mountains, is consumed in British Columbia, a market in which our growers have received a reasonable price consequent upon a tariff of $15 a ton on potatoes coming in from the south. Now they appear to think that the inroads which will be made by potatoes from the south will be very considerable. Federal assistance in various forms which is given to producers in the south has so far had the tendency, in almost all the commodities to which it applies, to increase the acreage, and California potatoes, for instance, are at the top of their peak. There will definitely be a tendency for these potatoes to come into the British Columbia and Alberta and Saskatchewan markets, which of course will not be an assistance to the British Columbia producers.

There have been a great many resolutions on the subject, and I am not going to bother the minister at this time with sheets of them. I know representations have been made by the British Columbia coast marketing board to the Minister of National Defence, and representations no doubt were made by him to the government. But in this regard I want to put two short resolutions on Hansard. One is from the British Columbia coast vegetable marketing board:

Whereas the time limit for potatoes entering Canada on payment of duty is from June 15 to July 31 of each year;

And whereas this time limit will be of no value to the growers of early potatoes in the coast area of British Columbia;

Be it therefore resolved that recommendations be made that this time limit shall be from the 25th dav of May to the 15th day of July in each year.

They want the period drawn forward. In British Columbia there are what might almost be called two early crops. The period mentioned in the agreement is rather too late for the first and too early for the second, and the producers consider that they will be in grave difficulty consequent on the long free period. All through their resolutions and statements one finds the idea that in their opinion this should have been looked upon as a matter in which the countervailing principle should be adopted.

[Mr. Dunning.]

The second resolution I want to read is as follows:

Whereas the Canada-United States treaty signed at Washington on November 17, 1938, appears very detrimental to the potato growers of British Columbia;

And whereas potatoes being shipped into Canada are duty free except for the period from June 15 to July 31 while potatoes from Canada entering the United States must pay duty of from $7.50 to $12 a ton;

And whereas this discriminates very unfairly against British Columbia growers;

Therefore be it resolved that the executive of this association protest most vigorously against this discrimination and request that arrangements between the two countries should be reciprocal, and if no protection can be given the duty should be countervailing; and further demand that regulations regarding grading and freedom from disease be strictly enforced on all importations.

So that the growers of potatoes in British Columbia are afraid that this is going to be a serious blow to them, and they do not see that the government of Canada has made any provision whatsoever to take care of dumping, which they look upon as almost inevitable.

They further draw attention to the fact that the United Kingdom, in its arrangements with the United States, has taken precautions should such a difficulty arise. Here I should like to read a quotation from the journal of the ministry of agriculture of the United Kingdom, of December, 1938:

A comprehensive trade agreement between the United States and the United Kingdom was signed on November 17, 1938. The surrender of advantages at present enjoyed by agriculture in the United Kingdom is not of a very serious nature. Among the general provisions of the agreement there are clauses that enable action to be taken to impose additional duties if any scheduled products are dumped or are subsidized upon exportation, and there are other clauses which provide freedom of action for the institution of quantitative regulation of or other measures operating under government authority which are designed to control production, market supply, quality or price of the domestic article.

Can the minister give any hope to these growers that in the event of dumping, since the duty has been entirely removed with the exception of a period of six weeks when in their opinion it will not help them, there is anything the Canadian government can do to relieve the situation?

Mr. DUNNING: The ordinary dumping provisions of the Canadian customs law will of course apply in the case of any dumping from anywhere. I am not aware of there being anything in the British law which protects the grower there with respect to dumping, or in the United States either for that matter.

The potato question generally illustrates what a difficult country Canada is to govern. In the maritimes, particularly in Prince Edward Island and I think in New Brunswick, potatoes are one of the principal money crops. The production of potatoes for export is a means of livelihood for a very large proportion of the people of those two provinces, not to speak of parts of Nova Scotia and certain sections of Ontario and Quebec. In working out this very difficult matter, and trying to get the maximum advantage for those who must export, we endeavoured to see to it that the productive months in Canada should be safeguarded to the utmost extent. I have before me a careful review of the imports of potatoes into Canada from the United States during the last eight years. During that period the average of the imports would be in the neighbourhood of 160,000 hundredweight annually. An average of 78 per cent of the potatoes imported came in during the months of June and July, running as high in some years as 87 per cent of the total. My hon. friend can assure the people for whom he speaks that their concern in this matter was in the minds of those who were negotiating for Canada and in the mind of the government; every effort was made to reduce to the minimum the danger to them without surrendering the tremendous advantage to the potato growers, who rely on potatoes as their chief source of livelihood, of getting a larger market in the United States for their product.

Mr. CLARK (Essex): Knowing that the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) is always fair in any of his representations, let me point out that there is one thing that he did not mention. I believe that the new regulation prohibiting the import of No. 2 potatoes will greatly help his district as well as other early potato-growing districts. I understand that approximately seventy per cent of our imports were No. 2 potatoes, so that this new regulation, one might say, will give an added protection, although not appearing in the tariff, of 50 cents a hundredweight.

Mr. STIRLING: I did refer to that in the second resolution that I read.

Mr. NEILL: I must support the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) in his remarks. I have had numbers of resolutions similar to those to which he has alluded; the spirit of them is practically the same. The growers in British Columbia fear that they will suffer owing to the conditions mentioned by the hon. member for Yale. In addition to the production mentioned from California there is a very fertile belt in the state of Washington, I think, the Yakima valley. There they can grow potatoes in abundance under very favourable conditions; they can put them on a truck and run them into the Vancouver market at minimum expense, and it pays them to dump their potatoes at almost any price in order to maintain their home market where they make the great bulk of their sales. The hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Clark) referred to the fact that now the potatoes imported will have to be above No. 2 grade. But that is only a question of running them over a sieve before they are sacked, a very simple matter—I do not think that will prevent the influx.

The potato growers I represent have asked for a countervailing duty or else the operation of the dumping clause. I fully appreciate the remarks of the Minister of Finance when he says that this is a hard country to govern, and conditions which may be very favourable and desirable for those in the eastern part of Canada work unfavourably to us in the west. I suppose it is a matter of the greatest good to the greatest number.

I have heard the argument put forward in response to the objections of our potato growers that we are getting great benefit from the increased sale of seed potatoes to the United States. That again is a matter which concerns the east; for us in the west our sales to the United States of seed potatoes are comparatively unimportant. We do not get any great advantage from that. I thought at one time I read something in the treaty of a provision that under certain conditions, possibly at the end of a year, if it were found that any particular item worked unfairly to any particular section of the public, the minister could initiate negotiations with the other country to attempt to make an adjustment. I hope there is something of the kind, although perhaps it is more for cases in which it is found that the arrangement works too favourably to some other third country rather than directly against our interests.

I do hope the minister will explore every possible avenue along those lines, because I am afraid this is going to affect our potato industry pretty seriously. Possibly that will not be the case this year, because there is a shortage in the United States; but in years to come, with this opportunity of bringing their surplus to Vancouver, I am pretty certain there will be a very heavy importation.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I align myself with the hon. member for Yale and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni in what they have said about the British Columbia situation.

Mr. DUNNING: That makes a formidable triumvirate.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I have also received many requests and resolutions, which lead me to ask how the minister arrived at these dates, and whether they are in any sense movable.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Then were they arrived at after due consideration of the situation in the west as well as in the east? Obviously to fix one date to cover both east and west would be scarcely fair. I think you will find that the seasons in the west are warmer than they are in the east; and if a rigid date is set to cover the whole country it is bound to work against the western provinces beyond a certain meridian line. I believe that is worth considering and taking into account when these questions are being discussed.

Mr. DUNNING: It was considered.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There is a fairly large reduction under this item. On the one hand potatoes coming in during a certain period are on the free list, while from June 15 to July 31 the duty is 37½ cents per hundred pounds.

When these treaties were negotiated it was stated all over the country that they were designed to further world appeasement, and most of the people understood that we had to do everything that was done; we had to reduce all these duties, we had to take off the excise tax and we had to make these further treaties with the other thirty-eight countries involved in order that Great Britain might be able to consummate its treaty with the United States. Speaking in the house on the resolution I said:

> In his statements the Prime Minister has said that we have gone no farther in making these sweeping reductions in our tariffs and in making the sacrifice of our preference in the British market than has been absolutely necessary to bring about the consummation of the treaties—

That was in the evening. Continuing on the following day I said:

> But what hon. members of this house and the people of Canada should know before they can properly judge the merits or demerits of the new treaty is just what sacrifices we were asked to make or it was necessary for us to make.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order; we heard that before.

The CHAIRMAN: I want to remind the hon. member that we are on the item of potatoes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I will come to that in a moment; I am going to ask a question about it, but I must lead up to it. The Prime Minister replied as follows:

> Before my friend continues may I relieve his mind at once by saying that all concessions that were granted were requested and were necessary in order to enable the agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States to be concluded. But with respect to concessions made, there were as far as we were concerned compensations effected in the agreements which we have either with the United Kingdom or with the United States.

The question I wish to ask on this item is simply this: Were we requested by the government of Great Britain to make this reduction? Were we requested to put potatoes on the free list for a certain length of time, or were we requested to make any change at all?

Mr. DUNNING: No, Mr. Chairman; this item had nothing whatever to do with Great Britain. The negotiations with respect to potatoes were carried on in what we believed to be the interests of Canada, and I am quite sure that the interests of Canada will be well served by the arrangements which have been made both ways; that is, considering the concessions we get in the United States market for our products and this comparatively minor concession which was given to them in order to make possible what was very much more important and valuable to us.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Then this reduction was not requested by Great Britain?

Mr. DUNNING: No. That had nothing at all to do with it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Therefore the reduction on this particular item had nothing to do with the making of these treaties from the point of view of world appeasement. That is my point.

Mr. DUNNING: I would not accept that statement, Mr. Chairman. I am inclined to think that any mutual lowering of duties does have its weight in promoting goodwill.

Mr. LENNARD: Notwithstanding the argument of the hon. member for Essex South, I say this reduction will seriously affect the potato growers of Ontario. The reduction in duty which will apply from June 15 to July 31 in itself will affect the growers of central Ontario, because it means that these potatoes from the southern states—and from the northern states as well, because they are several weeks earlier than we are—will be brought in prior to June 15 in such quantities that the market will be practically glutted, so that potatoes will sell at such low prices that our growers will not get the profit they should receive.

Mr. CLARK (Essex): The hon. member for Wentworth forgets that at that time of the year new potatoes do not keep for any length of time. I am sure that by the time the earliest potatoes in western Ontario are ready for the market the United States potatoes will be gone.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps my hon. friend from Wentworth did not hear the information I gave a few moments ago, when I said that in dealing with this matter we very carefully worked out the monthly importations into Canada over a period of years. We found that over a period of eight years an average of 78 per cent of the total importations came in during the two months which are covered by the duty I have mentioned. Indeed in some years the proportion went as high as 87 per cent, and it never dropped below 70 per cent. So it does not look as though there could be very much interference with the marketing of early potatoes produced in Canada.

Mr. LENNARD: My point was that a specified date when the duty will apply will mean that an effort will be made to increase importations just prior to that date. While I am on the subject I should like to direct the attention of the hon. member for Essex South to a question which I asked in this house several weeks ago, and which was ruled out of order. I stated that it had been brought to my attention that Texas beets, cabbages and carrots—I am not on the item now, but I might as well mention this in passing—

Mr. DUNNING: We will come to cabbages, carrots, beets and so on in a moment.

The CHAIRMAN: I would ask the hon. member to wait until we get to the appropriate item.

Mr. LENNARD: My point is that subsidized shipments of United States vegetables are being carried at a cheaper rate than our vegetables shipped from corresponding Canadian points.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is out of order. He will have full opportunity to discuss that question under item 87.

Mr. HYNDMAN: What is the United States duty against us?

Mr. DUNNING: It depends on the quality and the time. From March to November inclusive it is 37½ cents. Formerly it was 75 cents. From the first of December to the last day of the following February it is 60 cents per one hundred pounds.

Mr. BROOKS: Under the regulations are grade 1 potatoes the only ones allowed to come from the United States into Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: The Minister of Agriculture is not here, but that is my understanding.

Mr. O'NEILL: The potato growers of British Columbia definitely fear that they will be injured by this agreement. I have received numerous resolutions from them to that effect. When will there be an opportunity to review this treaty and to straighten out any injustices that may appear from time to time as the agreement operates? To-day the potato growers fear this agreement, but they may find after it is in operation that they are not so badly injured as they now think they will be. If they do find however that their interests are affected to a greater extent than they had feared, will there be an opportunity to review the treaty?

Mr. DUNNING: The treaty lasts for three years. Under its provisions there are certain bases set out for mutual consideration. The reason mentioned by the hon. member is not one that is included in the treaty. I would say to him however that our relations with the United States are very friendly and we have reason to believe that fair consideration would be given any representations we might make as to any grave injustice. We on our part would have to be prepared to give similar consideration to any representations made by them on the ground of serious injustice to any classes of their people. I do not therefore expect that there are likely to be approaches of that kind made by either country. I sincerely trust that my hon. friend will find that the people are not as adversely affected as they at present fear they may be. That has always been my experience in matters of this kind; there is a great deal more fear prior to the event than is subsequently justified.

Mr. STIRLING: In these negotiations, was notice taken of the regional application of the dates?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, but it is virtually impossible to work it out. Succeeding governments have tried to work it out, with very little success.

Mr. LOCKHART: This is about the first item in connection with which we might ask the minister to make a brief statement indicating why the reduced limits and the seasonal limits were placed on a number of items which will follow one after another. The in-season periods have been reduced and set dates established. Can the minister give any general indication as to why that was found necessary? It more or less affects the next fifteen or twenty items. He might make a statement with regard to the in-season periods and the set limitations of time.

Mr. DUNNING: The considerations vary of course with the items. They do necessarily. An effort was made to see to it that the period of flush production of our own industry should be injured as little as possible, while at the same time making available to Canadian consumers of the commodity, in other than flush seasons of Canadian production, vegetables at reasonable prices. Perhaps however I had better discuss them as I come to them, because that is an old and fruitful subject of discussion in this house. As I say, succeeding governments have endeavoured to meet it in various ways. As hon. members who tease me occasionally know, I have made several efforts to meet this situation, with more or less success; and the principle now applied has worked rather more successfully than any other that has been applied. There will always be a demand for enlargement of the period from some producers somewhere, and there will always be a demand from consumers for the reduction of that period in order that they may be able to buy the vegetables as cheaply as possible. What has been worked out represents the best compromise between these various interests which it has been possible to arrange. However, I will deal with each one separately as we come to it.

Mr. BARBER: Perhaps the minister would tell us now how this period of forty-five days was arrived at, taking into consideration the different parts of Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: I gave information with respect to imports into Canada. Unfortunately it is not possible to find out accurately over a period what quantities of potatoes come in at a particular port of entry destined for consumption within a particular area. We had of necessity to take account of total importations, and as I pointed out, when we found that seventy-eight per cent of the total importations over a period of eight years came in during the months of June and July, it was obvious that that was the period that required to be attended to. Does my hon. friend follow me?

Mr. BARBER: Yes, but there is a point to be noted there. The trouble with the in-season period, and particularly with potatoes, a commodity that can be stored, is that there should be a protective period prior to the actual date, because hundreds of tons can be stored.

Mr. DUNNING: Not very well. I am advised that that is not so as regards early potatoes.

Mr. BARBER: They can be stored for three or four weeks. With cold storage they can be stored a much longer time.

Mr. DUNNING: It costs money.

Mr. BARBER: The question is, why was this not made ninety days instead of forty-five. Who would object?

Mr. DUNNING: There were other parties to these negotiations. We were not making the whole agreement.

Mr. BARBER: But apparently we did not get very much.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is not stating the fact.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—84. Onions, in their natural state:
(a) Onion sets and shallots, 30 per cent;
*(b) Onions, n.o.p., 30 per cent, (½ cent per pound).

Mr. LOCKHART: Why was there no change in this item?

Mr. DUNNING: I am not clear as to the question. I can usually answer intelligently as to why there is a change, but I find it difficult to say why there is no change.

Mr. LOCKHART: On all other items there has been a definite change, different reductions on different items.

Mr. DUNNING: Now I understand the question.

Mr. LOCKHART: It would appear that this item remains the same, and I was just wondering why.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend will find many items in the schedule where no change takes place. They are here because we undertook that there should be no increase during the period of the treaty.

Mr. MARSHALL: Is there not a change with respect to the half cent per pound?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no change at all on onions.

Mr. MARSHALL: I thought it was three-quarters of a cent per pound previously.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no change.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): There will be a change in the 3 per cent tax.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, my hon. friend is right; there is a decrease from three-fifths of a cent to one-half cent.

Mr. MARSHALL: Is it not a reduction from three-quarters of a cent to one-half?

Mr. DUNNING: No, from three-fifths of a cent to one-half cent.

Mr. GRAYDON: Having in mind the fact that onions appear to be the only vegetable where no change has been made with respect to the ad valorem duty—

Mr. DUNNING: Is an onion a vegetable? Let us settle that first.

Mr. GRAYDON: Having in mind also that we have a famous onion grower in the county of Elgin in western Ontario, would it be reasonable to suggest that perhaps the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is extending his policy of appeasement from international matters to domestic affairs?

Mr. CLARK (Essex): I hope the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) does not discount the fact that a lot of onions are grown in my constituency, and possibly I would have some representations to make.

Mr. McGREGOR: I realize that this trade agreement has been agreed to, and that although we may talk here for days and weeks, it will make no difference. I submit that the growers of vegetables as a whole have suffered more than any other class of the people, and I believe that statement will be borne out by what happens in the near future. Roughly speaking, the duties on vegetables have been reduced from 30 per cent in 1935 to 10 per cent at the present time. I believe it would save a lot of questions if the minister would place on the record the imports and exports of the different items from No. 83 to No. 96 inclusive, as well as the rates of duty that apply on these commodities entering the United States.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall do that as we reach each item, if it is the wish of the committee.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 85. *Mushrooms, fresh, 10 per cent; (2 cents per lb.).

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): This item is reduced to 10 per cent. I should like to know if the reduced rate is to apply to France. The mushroom growers are having a little difficulty at present because of the depreciated franc, and this would seem to be an added reduction in the duty.

Mr. DUNNING: If France can ship fresh mushrooms to Canada, she will benefit under this item.

Item agreed to.

*(a) Asparagus, 10 per cent; (4 cents per pound: 10 weeks).

Mr. GRAYDON: Under this item we will be discussing various vegetables. I dealt with this item when speaking to the resolution and I have no intention of repeating my remarks at this time. However, I should like to make this serious suggestion to the minister. One of the complaints, among others, of the vegetable growers of Ontario is that there is likely to be a conflict between the early and late growers of vegetables. No doubt the minister is well versed on this matter, because I believe he has received representations from many sources. Would it be possible to split the periods during which the added values are to be applied? Could these periods be split so that protection would be given, not only to the early grower but to the late grower as well, and avoid any conflict or confusion in the industry? I consider this a constructive suggestion; I believe it would alleviate some of the conditions which now affect this industry.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend will have noticed that the split period is introduced here for the first time in connection with some of these commodities. I can state frankly that this is experimental. We felt that experience had demonstrated that with respect to certain storage items the split period would be more beneficial to the home grower. This principle has not been applied to any of the non-storage items. While the treaty is settled and we cannot say that this or that can be done after it is passed, I am quite prepared to watch things this year with the idea of discussing with the United States the splitting of other periods if experience demonstrates the wisdom of so doing. I should not like to be arbitrary about this. I once came to this house with a plan in connection with fruits and vegetables and the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) and others who were here at that time will remember that it seemed a grand scheme until it got before the house. Subsequently I was compelled to do what no minister of finance likes to do, that is, to ask the house to accept an amendment of my own proposals. Ministers of finance have to do that sometimes, but they do not enjoy it. I think I can say that the new scheme I proposed did not work out any better than the previous one was expected to.

Mr. STIRLING: It surely did.

Mr. DUNNING: I am glad to have that much support, at any rate, because, as my hon. friend knows, I was the subject of a lot of abuse. From that time in 1930, when I endeavoured to deal with the problem in that manner, until to-day, the governments which have been in office have I believe made fair efforts to work this out—I may disagree with them as far as some of the rates are concerned —and I believe we more closely approached the interests of the growers with every step we took. But I do suggest that we must go very carefully. As I said to the hon. member for Peel, if the benefits of the split periods now applied to some commodities become apparently beneficial to others we will consider it one of the things that we should talk about, at any rate, to the United States. I shall be very glad to watch things and do everything possible to avoid harmful results.

Mr. GRAYDON: In other words, the door is not definitely closed so far as further negotiations are concerned?

Mr. DUNNING: So far as the treaty is concerned, yes, the door is closed. This is a treaty and we cannot say that we are going to change this or change that. However, this is one of the matters which I think lends itself to possible future negotiation. It would not constitute a change in the rate or in the period; it would merely be a question of the desirability of splitting the period. It is something which might be done on occasion with possible advantage to both countries.

Mr. WOOD: It is refreshing to hear the minister make such an excellent defence of this treaty and state his intention to apply the tariff in a practical way. I happen to come from a constituency where there is a considerable amount of vegetable growing. When the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Lennard) complain of many of these tariff items it is no doubt because many of their vegetable growers are producing on land that at one time was valued at several thousand dollars an acre. But the advent of the motor truck has pushed the growing of vegetables back into the more remote districts, so that vegetables are grown to-day on land that is worth only fifty dollars an acre. I remember hearing an old sage make the remark that there was no land under the sun that was used for growing food that was worth more than fifty dollars an acre. When you attempt to make the growing of fruits and vegetables profitable on land of such high value as it is in the fruit-growing sections of the constituency of the hon. member for Wentworth, you are trying to do something that is fundamentally unsound. It is asking the tariff to make corrections that are impossible. There are certain fundamental facts and laws of nature that cannot be corrected by tariffs, and I sometimes think that vegetable growers, particularly those producing on very expensive land, expect too much.

I believe a review of the production of vegetables would show that the production in Ontario is very much larger than it was a few years ago, and that is largely due to the fact that more vegetables are grown in the remote districts where it is more economical to produce. That is the reason for the difficulties of many of the organized vegetable growers,—the competition they have to meet from the more remote districts. In the community in which I live the land is excellent. It lies in the valley of the Grand river and the soil is very fertile. Our farmers are good farmers. They keep a lot of cattle, so that no difficulty is found in increasing the fertility of ten acres of land. On that ten acres of land they will possibly grow more vegetables than all the gardeners around the city of Brantford, where the land is inferior and they have not the ordinary manure to make the land as productive as a farmer can who has a stable full of cattle.

I think some hon. gentlemen opposite are expecting the tariff to do the impossible. They are trying to hold up the value of the land in Wentworth and grow food on it, but if they are going to have a tariff to protect food grown on that high-valued land, it will mean an increased cost to the consumer.

Mr. CLARK (Essex): I disagree somewhat with my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Wood). In the first place the tariff as applied to vegetables is not added to the cost of the vegetables. The tariff is to prevent dumping; it is for protection only.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Where? Speak for yourself.

Mr. CLARK (Essex): It is in Ontario. Now that these items are under discussion, I should like to express my appreciation of the excellent timing which the Minister of National Revenue, with the assistance of the Minister of Agriculture, did in the application of the seasonal duties. A protection of a thousand per cent would not help if it were not timed correctly. Proper timing is essential in the application of these duties. I think the hon. member for Peel will agree with me up to that point.

Mr. GRAYDON: He will, up to that point.

Mr. CLARK (Essex): The Minister of National Revenue is to be complimented on the wonderful job he has done in the past three years.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am directly opposed to the argument of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood). In many instances we do agree, but in this particular instance we are somewhat apart. First of all he entirely disregards climatic conditions. There are certain parts of Ontario particularly, close to large bodies of water, where the temperature and the climatic conditions are more adapted to the growing of fruits and vegetables than other parts, and when he makes a statement that we are in the more valuable parts, as he puts it, of Ontario, are vainly attempting to compete in the growing of vegetables, he is entirely away from the point. If his argument were sound it would apply equally to our milk business, and to other branches of farming. I am sure the hon. member for Brant would be the last to suggest that the county of Peel should turn to some other enterprise than farming; for when he wants to purchase a good Holstein cow he comes to the county of Peel, and has done so more than once. That is perhaps the best recommendation a man can give; for actions speak louder than words.

Supporting the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Clark) I would say that too many people have the idea that a high tariff on vegetables at certain periods of the year raises the price to the consumer. Nothing could be further from the fact. All you have to do is to go into the fruit and vegetable markets of this country to find out what a low price our fruit and vegetable men are getting for their products at all seasons of the year. The tariff is merely for the purpose of protecting our market so that our people can sell at all. It is to stop the dumping of surplus United States products on our markets which would compete unfairly with our own production. If those who object to these tariffs would only study the situation, they would find that the tariff on fruits and vegetables has not raised prices in any way whatsoever to the consumer in Canada.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): In reply to the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) like many other members of the house he sets the boundaries of Canada within a very small distance of King and Yonge streets. Anybody who says that the tariff on fruits and vegetables does not raise the price is wrong. There may be sections of Canada where the tariff does not make a great difference because of heavy production—

Mr. SPENCE: Do you call ten per cent a high tariff on vegetables? Would that make any real difference in the price?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): When you add the cost of bringing the vegetables into my part of the country it does make a difference. I am not thinking of one particular section of the dominion only; but when a member stands up and says that the tariff does not raise the price to the consumer, I say he is wrong, because in many parts of Canada it does raise the price to the consumer, and very substantially in the part from which I come.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I know this is the seventeenth of March, but after all, the item we are on is asparagus. Now that both views have been so eloquently expressed I wonder if we might just deal with the subject of the item.

Mr. SPENCE: We had better take them all together.

Mr. DUNNING: I would willingly take them together, but one of the hon. members opposite asked that I would put on Hansard in connection with each of them the imports for last year. Perhaps I may be permitted to do so now with respect to asparagus. Giving round figures, $96,000 worth of asparagus was imported last year.

Mr. LANDERYOU: How much did the unemployed eat?

Mr. SPENCE: I must say that I endorse what the hon. member for Peel has said. I also endorse what the hon. member for York East (Mr. McGregor) has said, that this is law to-day, it is passed, and we are losing a lot of time discussing it. I do not see how we can remedy it, but anyone knows that ten per cent on a very cheap commodity bought in the United States does not raise the price here at all. We used to have a duty of 30 per cent, but even that was insignificant and did not give much protection, particularly to vegetable growers. They are the hardest hit of the lot. They have got practically nothing for the last three or four years; they are pushed around every place.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): My hon. friend must admit it is not ten per cent part of the time.

Mr. SPENCE: For ten weeks the duty is put on a certain commodity, say asparagus. Is that what it means? It is a seasonal tariff?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. SPENCE: Reference has been made to fruits or vegetables coming in at different times in different parts of the country. Take Leamington, for instance, around Windsor, and in that district, the vegetables come in practically two weeks sooner than they do elsewhere. It is a pity that there cannot be some kind of zoning system for applying this seasonal tariff, because the provision will be practically of no use to the people of the district in which the hon. member for York East lives. It may give some protection to the people in the Niagara peninsula, about half what they should get, because in Windsor and vicinity the stuff comes in sooner. A great deal depends upon the time you put on your seasonal tariff. However, I cannot see how you can help the growers at all. You have the law; the conditions are laid down, including the number of weeks in which the seasonal tariff can apply, and you cannot extend that period. But perhaps you can change the dates so as to make the provision more suitable to the different areas affected, having in mind the fact in some parts this stuff comes in earlier than in others. But somebody is going to suffer no matter how you adjust a thing of this kind. The only hope is for the Minister of Finance to have the biggest heart possible to help these poor devils, because the vegetable people will absolutely starve this year. They have been in that position for three years.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried?

Mr. SPENCE: What is carried? What is the idea?

Mr. LENNARD: To prevent repetition and not unnecessarily take up the time of the committee I would just say that I disagree absolutely with the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) and agree with the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). That is that. I should like, however, on item 87 to repeat that it has been brought to my attention that fresh vegetables from Texas are being subsidized by the United States railways. The United States railway rate on fresh vegetables from Texas has been established on a package weight basis of 34 pounds, although the actual weight is around 60 pounds. That means that the Canadian National Railways is carrying these products from Chicago to Toronto and Montreal on the United States rate. In other words, our nationally-owned railway is carrying Texas products at a rate three-fourths less than the rate on Canadian products from Windsor to Montreal, and it really means that through this set-up the Canadian National Railways is subsidizing Texas products. That alone is a very serious handicap to our growers, and if it is allowed to continue it means that this duty signifies nothing at all.

Mr. DUNNING: I am pleased that the hon. member for Wentworth has put that last point on Hansard, because it will enable an examination of it to be made. I need not tell my hon. friend that usually there are two sides to a question, and also that his information may not be complete. We shall be very glad to make a note of the point and to look into it.

Mr. WOOD: The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Lennard) and the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) seemed inclined to read into my remarks a lack of sympathy with these seasonal tariffs. I do not think anything they said has exploded my contention that the opposition has always come from that particular district which contains the owners of this high-priced land. I know the constituency from which the hon. member for Wentworth comes. It would be discourteous on my part to mention the name of any man, but I will just mention one example. The hon. member for Wentworth has in his riding a man who grew last year 35 acres of early potatoes, had them all harvested and marketed on the 25th of June, and then went for a tour down through the southern states and had a mighty good time on the proceeds of his sales; and he made some money as well. I am not objecting to that; it is quite all right, but this particular man came to me and objected very strongly because of certain importations of pears and other commodities. It often happens that most of the objection comes from those who may be the least deserving, people who are living on land valued at two or three thousand dollars an acre. The same consideration applies in the constituency of the hon. member for Peel; there are many people in his riding who are in exactly the same position. I want to correct any intimation which may appear on Hansard that I am opposed to seasonal tariffs. By no means. I am interested in a practicable and sensible solution of the question of the administration of this arrangement. But very often we are inclined to see difficulties elsewhere when the fault is our own. When we get into any trouble we analyse everybody but ourselves. We say that the economic system, or the government, or something else is wrong, instead of attempting to analyse our difficulties and trying to solve them. Perhaps that is our greatest trouble.

Mr. DUNNING: Can we now carry asparagus?

Mr. LOCKHART: I gather in a general way that these in-season periods have been established to the best of the ability of the minister? The periods are established and cannot be changed, except possibly by a consideration of splitting a little later on; but the dates are definitely set?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. My hon. friend is wrong in only one particular. Duration is established in the treaty,—not dates; the duration of the period in which the special provisions apply as set in the treaty, but not specific dates.

Mr. LOCKHART: Seasonal changes might be taken care of?

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly. That is part of the point of my answer to the hon. member for Peel, that there is that much possible flexibility.

Mr. LOCKHART: That is applicable all down the line?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. McGREGOR: Do I understand that the minister will put on Hansard the corresponding United States duty for all the items?

Mr. DUNNING: The United States duty on asparagus is 50 per cent ad valorem; no fixed value. The arrangement of our duty involves during the period in which it applies a very much higher duty than the United States duty. During the remainder of the year the Canadian duty against the United States product is much lower than the United States duty.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:

*(b) beans, green, 10 per cent; (1½ cents per pound: 14 weeks.)

Mr. DUNNING: Importations, $282,000; United States duty, 3½ cents a pound.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister expressed gratification just now that the hon. member had placed on record certain references to payments by the United States federal authorities in assistance to producers. May I add to that a short quotation from the Northwest Daily Produce News of Seattle, dated July 20, 1938.

During the ten months' period from July, 1937, to May, 1938, surplus farm products purchased by the government equalled 29,900 cars, the cost of which was $21,287,000 and in addition freight was paid to the extent of $5,438,000, it has been announced by the agricultural adjustment administration.

Mr. DUNNING: Is that for export, or for transport within the United States?

Mr. STIRLING: I understand that they divide their states into two categories, those which they look upon as their normal market for the growing states, and others that are not the normal market. But I cannot tell the minister whether these figures include assistance to exports or not. But here are some of the purchases:

Products were purchased in forty-five states. Distribution was made to an average of more than 2,000,000 needy families a month through state welfare agencies. The largest amounts bought during the ten-month period were: rice, 70,550,000 pounds; dry peas and beans, 59,000,000 pounds; dried prunes, 45,100,000 pounds; fresh apples, 5,600,000 bushels; dried apples, 14,450,000 pounds; oranges and grapefruit, 1,720,000 boxes; cabbage, 10,170,000 pounds; cottonseed oil, 9,780,000 pounds; butter, 8,320,000 pounds; eggs, 8,100,000 dozen; fluid milk, 8,100,000 quarts; dry skim milk, 8,650,000 pounds.

This gives an indication of the assistance that the federal authorities are giving to the producers of these different commodities, the result of which already has been increased production, against which we are fighting. As the minister knows, this whole matter is one to which I have had to pay very close attention over the years. He referred to his efforts in 1930 to please the people whom I represent, and others. Unfortunately, having arrived at a compromise, he has departed from that compromise in the 1938 agreement, for which those whom I represent are sincerely sorry. The Liberal government has accepted in principle the application of values for duty, and as I said in my speech on the second reading, those whom I represent regret that those periods have been cut down.

Does the government intend to continue to use the zoning method of application? Hitherto the country has been divided into three zones—I think I am right?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: The reference the minister made just now to zoning within a province would merely be a modification, if that were possible?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think it is possible.

Mr. STIRLING: Perhaps not in the opinion of the government. But I wanted to get an assurance from the minister that zoning is still a part of the probable plan.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes.

Mr. STIRLING: He has dealt already with the other point I meant to refer to, namely, the splitting of other periods.

Mr. McNIVEN: Will the minister indicate the area of the zones to which reference has just been made?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are three—the maritime provinces being one, Ontario and Quebec another, and the rest of Canada the third.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Would the minister consider splitting the third?

Mr. ILSLEY: Consideration has been given to it a great many times, but so far we cannot see our way clear to do it.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(c) brussels sprouts, 10 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Imports are not separately recorded. The United States duty is 50 per cent.

Item agreed to.

*(d) cabbage, 10 per cent; (⅘ cent per pound: 26 weeks).

Mr. DUNNING: Imports, $358,000; United States duty, 1½ cents a pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
*(e) carrots, 10 per cent; (⅘ cent per pound: 26 weeks).

Mr. DUNNING: Imports, $356,000; United States duty, 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

*beets, n.o.p., 10 per cent; (1 cent per pound: 26 weeks).

Mr. DUNNING: Imports, $55,000; United States duty, 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Mr. TUSTIN: Are there any exports of these vegetables?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, I can give the exports. Our total exports of all these alphabetically listed items last year was $38,000; the year before, $43,000. They are not separately recorded.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
*(f) cauliflower, 10 per cent; (1½ cents per pound: 20 weeks).

Mr. DUNNING: Imports, $147,000; United States duty, 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
eggplant, free.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Was there a seasonal tariff on eggplant?

Mr. DUNNING: No, and there is not now.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. J. G. Ross.]

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
*(g) celery, 10 per cent; (⅘ cent per pound: 26 weeks).

Mr. DUNNING: Imports, $518,000; United States duty, one cent per pound from April to July; two cents a pound for the rest of the year.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
*(h) cucumbers, 10 per cent; (2 cents per pound: 20 weeks).

Mr. DUNNING: Imports, $65,000; United States duty, three cents a pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
*(i) lettuce, 10 per cent; (⅘ cent per pound: 18 weeks).

Mr. STIRLING: This is thought by my people to be a very substantial cut indeed. The period has been shortened from 146 days to 126. They look upon that as a very serious obstacle to overcome.

Mr. DUNNING: Canadian imports of lettuce, $828,000; United States duty, two cents a pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(j) parsley, 10 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Imports of parsley are not separately recorded.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
*(k) peas, green, 10 per cent; (2 cents per pound: 12 weeks).

Mr. DUNNING: Imports, $117,000; United States duty, July 1 to September 30, two cents a pound; remainder of the year, 3⁹⁄₁₀ cents a pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(l) rhubarb, 10 per cent; (1 cent per pound).

Mr. DUNNING: Rhubarb is not separately recorded in our statistics.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(m) spinach, 10 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Imports $164,000; United States duty, 50 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(n) tomatoes, 10 per cent; but not less than 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. CLARK (Essex): I believe the greater part of our imports of tomatoes does not come from the republic immediately to our south, and I would suggest to the Minister of Finance that it would be in the interests of our growers to place a higher duty against that country from which most of our imports come.

Mr. DUNNING: I believe some other hon. members wanted to offer a few prayers in this regard.

Mr. MAYHEW: I do not know whether it is because to-day is March 17 that we seem to be against the government, but this is a serious matter to the people adjacent to my district who have a large investment in hothouses and equipment for the growing of tomatoes under glass. They cannot compete with tomatoes grown outside at that time of year. The growers are very much disturbed about this matter; in fact they feel that their industry will be completely wiped out if they do not get some further protection. I should like the minister to take that point under advisement.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask if there is a serious influx of Mexican tomatoes into Canada at the present time?

Mr. DUNNING: Last year our imports from Mexico were greater than our imports from the United States. That is what the hon. member for Essex South was referring to, and I have had requests, which the hon. member just now supported, that a difference should be created between the general and intermediate tariffs in respect to tomatoes. I may tell my hon. friends that this is under consideration at the present time.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is nothing in the present trade agreement to prevent the government from increasing the tariff against these Mexican tomatoes, is there?

Mr. DUNNING: Not as long as Mexico is under the general tariff.

Mr. LENNARD: I would also in a word urge the minister to give serious consideration to this matter, because it means so much not only to the growers of hothouse tomatoes but also to those who grow stake tomatoes, which come in several weeks before the field crops.

Mr. DUNNING: For once the hon. member for Wentworth was second to the hon. member for Essex South. I shall bear in mind that support from Wentworth.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Mayhew) has pleaded my case in regard to tomatoes, but I want to assure the minister that it is a very serious matter in my constituency. The growers there not only have to compete against Mexico, the Imperial valley and other hot places; I understand now they have to compete against tomatoes grown by the soil-free method, which is assuming very considerable proportions in certain parts of California.

Mr. DUNNING: I should point out that the ad valorem equivalent last year on Mexican tomatoes was 72 per cent.

Mr. STIRLING: Just one word with regard to the seriousness of this situation in my constituency. For the moment I am dealing with it not so much in regard to the grower as in regard to the labour employed. It is going to be a very serious question where there is a very large acreage in tomatoes. I am not speaking only of the early tomatoes; I am speaking of the main crop. We are fearful that the labour which hitherto has found a livelihood for a short time in the summer and fall, which enabled it to provide for winter sustenance, will be seriously affected.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(o) watercress, 10 per cent; whitloof or endive, free; peppers, green, 10 per cent; radishes, 10 per cent; artichokes, horseradish and okra, free.

Mr. DUNNING: Watercress is not separately recorded.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—87. Vegetables, fresh, in their natural state:
(p) n.o.p., 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—89. Vegetables, prepared, in airtight cans or other airtight containers, the weight of the containers to be included in the weight for duty:
(a) beans, baked or otherwise prepared, 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. TUSTIN: What is the duty on canned goods entering the United States? What was it before the 1935 agreement, what was it under the last agreement, and what is it now.

Mr. DUNNING: That is with respect to canned beans?

Mr. TUSTIN: If the minister so desires he might give the information in regard to beans now.

Mr. DUNNING: It varies with different commodities.

Mr. TUSTIN: If the minister desires to give the information under the individual items it will be all right; or he can put them all together.

Mr. DUNNING: In regard to canned beans our imports last year were valued at $18,000, practically all from the United States. The United States rate is 3 cents per pound.

Mr. McNIVEN: Has the minister the rate prior to 1935?

Mr. DUNNING: It has not been changed.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—89. Vegetables, prepared, in airtight cans or other airtight containers, the weight of the containers to be included in the weight for duty:

ex (b) corn, 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. TUSTIN: I should like the same information in regard to this item.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps I should explain why that rate was not changed, because it applies to a number of other items. The principle on which the United States works in negotiating trade agreements is called the doctrine of the principal source of supply. No commodity is included in an agreement with Canada of which Canada is not the principal source of supply. It is a very logical principle to adopt, having regard to the legislation under which the United States operates with respect to trade agreement matters. For instance, in connection with canned beans, if they gave a concession to Canada, which is not the principal supplier, that concession under the most favoured nation arrangement would go automatically to whatever nation was the principal supplier, and would thus prejudice the United States in possible negotiations with that nation. I may say that while we have no such legal restriction so far as Canada is concerned we do endeavour to keep the same principle in mind when we are negotiating. It would be absurd to give a concession to one country which was a small supplier of a commodity in a trade agreement in which reciprocal advantages were exchanged. It would mean giving a minor advantage to that country and a major advantage to some third country which in the nature of things was the principal supplier of the commodity in question.

Mr. TUSTIN: Will the minister give the countervailing duties on these items going into the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: I will give them on each of these items.

[Mr. Tustin.]

Mr. TUSTIN: And the exports?

Mr. DUNNING: Our imports of canned corn last year were valued at $2,700. The exports are not separately recorded. The United States tariff on corn prepared or preserved is 35 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—89. Vegetables, prepared, in airtight cans or other airtight containers, the weight of the containers to be included in the weight for duty:

(c) peas, 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. DUNNING: The imports from the United States of canned peas amounted last year to $1,800, an increase from the previous year, when they were only $200. The United States tariff on peas prepared or preserved is two cents per pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—89. Vegetables, prepared, in airtight cans or other airtight containers, the weight of the containers to be included in the weight for duty:

(d) n.o.p., 20 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Under this item the imports last year were $16,400, almost wholly from the United States. The United States duty varies. It is an n.o.p. item and usually, on most of the items which would fall within this limit, 35 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. TUSTIN: I must protest against the reduction on canned goods in this agreement. In 1935 when there was a duty of three cents per pound on canned goods coming into the country the importations from the United States were $723,378. Under the last agreement, when it was reduced to two cents, there were in 1938 imports amounting to $1,493,377. In the face of the great increase in importations of canned goods the government have now seen fit to produce the tariff to one and a half cents per pound. Surely they must be aware of the full warehouses. I do not wish to take up the time of the committee but I must protest on behalf of the producers who are in this business. If anything can be done it should certainly be done for this line of industry.

Mr. DUNNING: I am quite sure that the figures my hon. friend gave are not those that are applicable to canned vegetables. I gave separately the importations of each of the commodities comprised within this group, and I am sure they would not total the figure he gave. I can only assume that he has included, in the figure he gave, all varieties of canned goods, whether vegetables, fruits; meats or others. I say that for purposes of a correct record.

Mr. TUSTIN: The figures I have were given me a few days ago by the bureau of statistics, and the figures I quote are for canned vegetables. I have the figures for canned fruits and meats, but they are not added to the figures I have just given.

Mr. DUNNING: There must be something wrong, because the source of our figures is also the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. I gave the figures separately and the hon. member gave the aggregate figures respecting importations of canned vegetables. Mine do not total anywhere near his.

Mr. TUSTIN: I got my figures from the bureau of statistics, and if they are not to be relied on, then—

Mr. DUNNING: I have the answer now. I gave figures dealing with these canned vegetables particularly, which are within the purview of this agreement. The figures given by my hon. friend have reference to canned vegetables that are not affected at all by the agreement. So that probably his complaint will be minimized to that extent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—90. Vegetables, prepared or preserved:

(a) dried, desiccated or dehydrated, including vegetable flour, n.o.p., 22½ per cent;

(c) vegetable extracts or juices, liquid mustards, soy and vegetable sauces of all kinds, 27½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—92. Fruits, fresh, in their natural state:

* (a) apricots, March to December, inclusive, 10 per cent; (1½ cent per pound).

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—92. Fruits, fresh, in their natural state:

*(b) cherries, 10 per cent; (3 cents per pound: 7 weeks).

Mr. BARBER: As has already been said, I do not think there is much use in spending a great deal of time on these items. It is quite apparent the government, by this agreement has dealt another blow to the fruit industry of British Columbia. On cherries the in-season protection has been reduced from 81 to 43·8 cents per case and the in-season period reduced from 8 to 7 weeks. That is not the worst part of it. I represent a district in which we produce an enormous quantity of cherries and our problem at one time was to get the people of Vancouver to buy Canadian cherries. They were paying 20 or 25 cents a pound for United States cherries through brokers. We put on a cherry carnival on the first of July each year. This date coincides with the production season. We sold cherries to Vancouver people at 8 and 9 cents a pound and they were as good cherries as those that are imported. We have built up that business until we sold as high as 40 tons on that day.

Mr. DUNNING: Excellent.

Mr. BARBER: People coming from Vancouver by motor car to attend that carnival bought our cherries by the pound or crate. Last year however the season was a little early and on the first of July we did not have the buyers. The reason was that between the middle of June and the first of July, 17 cars of cherries were dumped from across the line on the Vancouver market. That is one complaint. It is not the application of the dumping duty or the regulations as regards time, but that simply meant that producers in my district lost tons of cherries. They rotted in the gardens simply because an enormous quantity of cherries had previously come in. We did object to the 17 cars that came in because they came in at a time that should have been included in the in-season period.

Mr. DUNNING: The dates can be adjusted.

Mr. BARBER: There should be some way of keeping track of the different seasons. Some seasons are earlier than others. Can the minister give us the imports?

Mr. DUNNING: As my hon. friend will recognize, the great difficulty is as between different parts of Canada and also as between different seasons in the same part of Canada. In British Columbia they went on last year on the 14th of June. That would appear from my hon. friend's statement to have been early enough. However, it should be taken up with the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. BARBER: It was after the 12th of June that 17 cars came in. They rolled them in ahead of our date. And we had early cherries before that. Perhaps the minister will give the imports.

Mr. DUNNING: The imports of cherries last year from the United States totalled $110,000.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—92. Fruits, fresh, in their natural state:

(c) cranberries, 10 per cent, but not less than 1½ cents per pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—92. Fruits, fresh, in their natural state:

* (d) peaches, May to November, inclusive, 10 per cent; (1⅔ cents per pound: 9 weeks).

Mr. DUNNING: The imports of peaches amounted to $248,000.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—92. Fruits, fresh, in their natural state:

* (e) pears, May to January, inclusive, 10 per cent; (1 cent per pound: 15 weeks).

Mr. LOCKHART: What were the imports of pears?

Mr. DUNNING: The imports last year of fresh pears from the United States were $477,000.

Mr. LOCKHART: A great deal was heard about the deliberations that took place in connection with the negotiation of this treaty. Changes have been made in connection with commodities in which there are large importations, and I should like to know what method was taken to ascertain the views of the growers of these particular commodities. Was any effort made to ascertain the view of the Canadian producer before the treaty was actually signed?

Mr. DUNNING: In general, there is not an item affected by this agreement which was not the subject of a brief to the government, to myself usually, from associations of the classes of producers interested. With regard to pears and other similar products, we were briefed fully by the Canadian Horticultural Council. Into the docket in my office bearing the number of each of these various items go all the representations made during the year from anyone anywhere. We have been in constant touch and communication with those vitally interested in the production of the commodity with which we were dealing. That is the system. I must compliment Canadian producers of all kinds upon the effective manner in which they briefed us in connection with the commodities in which they were interested.

Mr. LOCKHART: That is the point I wanted to bring out. I wanted an expression from the minister as to whether they had dealt fully with the situation and given him all the available information.

Mr. DUNNING: I have no doubt of that at all.

Mr BARBER: I take it that the 10 per cent is to apply from May to November, and the item will be free the rest of the time?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is correct. Nothing could be done with respect to the rest of the year because of bound margins under the British and other dominion agreements.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. STIRLING: During the other months the British preference rate would apply?

Mr. DUNNING: There are fixed margins in connection with other dominions.

Mr. McNIVEN: Does the same apply to peaches?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—92. Fruits, fresh, in their natural state:

(f) plums and prunes, May to November, 10 per cent; (plums: 1 cent per lb.: 10 weeks); (prunes: 1 cent per lb.: 8 weeks).

Mr. BARBER: I have the same complaint to make with regard to the application on prunes. We grow hundreds of tons of prunes in the particular part of the country from which I come, and we have considerable difficulty in having the application made in time. Could the minister tell me what time this application was made last year on prunes?

Mr. ILSLEY: August 19.

Mr. BARBER: They tried to get it about August 10.

Mr. ILSLEY: Representations are always made by the fruit growing interests to put it on at an early date, and representations come from the importing interests to defer putting it on. It is a very difficult matter to adjust.

Mr. BARBER: Here is what happens with regard to prunes. One canner comes along and tries to beat down the growers to a half cent per pound for their fruit. He tells them that if they do not take it he will buy imported prunes. He will load up with 40 or 50 tons of prunes the day before the protection comes on and leaves the growers in an unfortunate position.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was done earlier last year than the previous year.

Mr. BARBER: The season was a great deal earlier.

Mr. McNIVEN: What were the importations of plums and prunes?

Mr. DUNNING: The importations last year of plums and prunes were $262,000.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—92. Fruits, fresh, in their natural state:

* (g) strawberries, 10 per cent; (1⅝ cents per lb.: 6 weeks).

* raspberries and loganberries, 10 per cent; (2 cents per lb.: 6 weeks).

Mr. BARBER: The in-season is reduced from eight to six weeks, while the protection has been reduced by over fifty per cent since 1935. This is a large industry. From one point in the district which I have the honour to represent they shipped 145 cars of fresh strawberries to the prairies. The prairie members did not pay any more for strawberries owing to the protection given, because they never even got a price equal to the protection. There was sufficient Canadian competition, there was sufficient British Columbia competition to keep the price down. Although the growers sold more fruit last year, their profits were a great deal less than in any other year. A few years ago a carload of strawberries arrived in Ottawa from my district. United States strawberries had been selling for from 20 to 25 cents per box, but two days before this car arrived in Ottawa the United States berries were reduced to 10 cents a box. The British Columbia berries sold for 15 cents a box right alongside the United States berries. If these Canadian berries had not been in transit the price of the United States berries would have been held up for another week or two. When people say that protection increases the price, they should study these things a little more closely.

Mr. LOCKHART: There has been a reduction of 33⅓ per cent in the in-season period. Is there any reason why this period should have been so drastically reduced to six weeks?

Mr. DUNNING: Just a matter of negotiation. We were doing the best we could.

Mr. LOCKHART: In other words, we gave them an exceptionally nice slice of the melon. The strawberry growers are going to be seriously affected through having only a six weeks in-season.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—92. Fruits, fresh, in their natural state:

(h) berries, edible, n.o.p., 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—92. Fruits, fresh, in their natural state:

(i) quinces, and nectarines, June to February, inclusive, 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—93. *Apples, fresh, in their natural state, 15 per cent; (⅜ cent per pound).

Mr. RICKARD: Is there any time limit on apples?

Mr. DUNNING: No time limit.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—94. Grapes, fresh, in their natural state, the weight of the packages to be included in the weight for duty, July to January, inclusive, one cent per pound.

Mr. STIRLING: There had been a considerable growth of acreage in grapes, and of varying varieties, in the southern part of British Columbia. Why has the duty been cut 33⅓ per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: Do you mean the period?

Mr. STIRLING: The duty. There is no period left.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a thorny subject. Our wineries use imported grapes as well as Canadian grapes. Last year the grapes imported amounted to $976,000; our own production was about $1,100,000. The ad valorem equivalent duty on grapes last year was 46 per cent.

Mr. STIRLING: Is the minister able to divide that $976,000 of imports geographically? Does he know that most of it came into Ontario and Quebec, and just where it came in?

Mr. DUNNING: There are no figures as to provincial distribution, but undoubtedly, from the nature of the industry, it came principally into Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. CHURCH: With reference to items 93 and 94, does the minister think it is fair to the producer of these fruits in Ontario to reduce the duties? Around the city of Toronto for many years there were many market gardeners engaged in this work, but now it does not pay them to till the land for apples and grapes. You might just as well ask the people of the United States to buy these fruits from South Africa instead of buying from their own domestic producers in California and Florida. I think it is too bad to destroy such a large industry around Toronto. They had the St. Lawrence market and other markets where these people came in with their produce every Saturday. You might just as well put these fruits on the free list and have complete free trade.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—95. Canteloupes and musk melons, 10 per cent; (1¼ cents per lb.: 8 weeks).

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—95a. Melons, n.o.p., 2 cents each.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—96. Fruits, fresh, in their natural state, n.o.p., 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 96. Avocados or alligator pears, free.

Provided, that, as regards such of those articles dutiable under tariff items 84, ex 85, 87, 92, 93 and 95, as are marked with an asterisk in this schedule, Canada reserves the right to fix the value for duty at a figure exceeding the invoice value by not more than the amount set forth in the parentheses following the descriptions of the several articles;

The values so fixed shall not be maintained in force in any twelve months ending March 31 for a period in excess of the number of weeks set forth in the parentheses following the descriptions of the several articles; provided, however, as regards articles dutiable under subitems (d) and (e) of tariff item 87, the number of weeks during which the value so fixed may be maintained in force may be divided into not more than two separate periods, the combined duration of which shall not exceed the number of weeks set forth in the parentheses following the descriptions of the articles;

Provided further, that Canada reserves the right, after consultation with the United States of America, to substitute, in whole or in part, for the system of protection of these fruits and vegetables by means of advances in values for duty purposes, a system of specific duties which shall not be more burdensome on imports from the United States of America than that provided for in this agreement.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—99a. Plums or prunes, dried, unpitted, when in packages weighing two pounds each, or less, the weight of such packages to be included in the weight for duty, 1 cent per pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—99b. Fruits, dried, desiccated, evaporated or dehydrated, n.o.p., 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—99d. Dates, dried, unpitted, in bulk, ½ cent per pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—99f. Figs, dried, when in packages weighing two pounds each, or less, the weight of such packages to be included in the weight for duty, ½ cent per pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—99g. Apricots, nectarines, pears and peaches, dried, desiccated, evaporated or dehydrated, 22½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—100a. Grapefruit, n.o.p., ½ cent per pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—101. Oranges, n.o.p.: December to April, inclusive, free; May to November, inclusive, 35 cents per cubic foot.

Provided that Canada reserves the right to substitute for the above item the following:

Customs tariff—101. Oranges, n.o.p.: January to July, inclusive, free; August to December, inclusive, 35 cents per cubic foot.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. STIRLING: Which of these two items is to be made use of?

Mr. DUNNING: That is a very difficult question to answer.

Mr. STIRLING: Why difficult? Because the information has not reached the minister yet?

Mr. DUNNING: No, but because one wants to defer a decision until as close as possible to the time the duty shall become effective. We left ourselves as free as possible in the matter in order to decide it in the best interests of our own country.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Before we pass this item I should like to make a few remarks on it.

Oranges is one of the items under the British empire agreement which was changed in duty to the great detriment of the Canadian people. We have heard hon. members from the other side of the house lauding the British empire agreement for the great good it did Canada, but here is one place where the consumer was again sacrificed in true Tory fashion to help certain of the industrialists in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: This is a reduction in duty.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Yes, but it has not been reduced anywhere near to where it should have been. The British empire agreement bound the duty so that it could not be changed. That is the trouble. Many other items were similarly bound, but this one item will show what the British empire agreement did for the Canadian people. The British empire agreement placed a duty of 35 cents a cubic foot on the importation of oranges. Prior to that we were importing into Canada from 2,500,000 to 3,000,000 boxes of oranges a year. But in order to sell automobile chassis, sawn lumber, newsprint and box shooks to Australia and South Africa, a bound rate of 35 cents a cubic foot was put on oranges by the former administration, and oranges from the British empire were made free. A similar thing happened with respect to the corn rate, of which we were speaking earlier this afternoon. A rate of 20 cents a bushel was put on corn to help South Africa.

Now what happened was this. First, Japan protested vigorously against the imposition of this duty of 35 cents per cubic foot. So the big stick trader from the Conservative party at that time, Mr. R. B. Bennett, backed up to count the cost to the Canadian industrialist. He found out that Japan had threatened to boycott Canadian manufactured goods or place a much higher tariff on them. Although the dictionary said that a Japanese orange was an orange, although the trade always called the Japanese orange an orange, an order in council was passed at that time, saying that a loose-skinned mandarin or tangerine was not an orange and therefore could enter Canada free. But other oranges, the same tangerines and mandarins from the United States, were still subject to the same duty of 35 cents per cubic foot.

After that duty of 35 cents per cubic foot became effective, the consumption of oranges went down in Canada to about 2,000,000 cases, a drop of about 500,000 cases. During the same period, and under the same economic conditions, the consumption of oranges in the United States went up by 7½ per cent, while our consumption dropped 12 per cent. Average importations of oranges from British empire countries into Canada during the time of the British empire agreement amounted to only 115,000 boxes. The Canadian consumer, on all the oranges that he purchased, paid $1,350,000 more on account of that 35 cents per cubic foot.

Mr. GRAYDON: No.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): He paid $1,350,000 more.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member cannot prove that.

Mr. TUSTIN: The price was not increased.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Of course the price was increased. Oranges sold into Canada are sold from the United States at exactly the same price as is paid by the United States buyer, but the Canadian buyer has to pay a tariff charge which is 35 cents per cubic foot.

Mr. BROWN: That is not necessarily so.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): But it is so in this case. What did that mean? It simply meant that in order to protect oranges from certain parts of the British empire, of which only 115,000 cases were shipped to this country, the consumers paid an additional $1,350,000, or at the rate of $12 cash per box over and above the price of the oranges which were bought from the British empire.

Mr. GRAYDON: Oh, no.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): My hon. friend says no. In 1935, after this government came into power—

Mr. MacNICOL: Everything went to pieces.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): —they made a trade treaty with the United States and they allowed four months' free entry of oranges into Canada. In the year 1936, when that treaty was initiated, there were imported into Canada from the United States more oranges, of course, during the four month period, January, February, March and April. Here is what actually took place in connection with the price of oranges in Canada. On the Montreal market, for size 252, which is the most popular size of orange purchased there, the price during the four months when the duty was off averaged 23¼ cents a dozen retail to the consumer. But during the other eight months of the same year, while the tariff of 35 cents per cubic foot was on, the price for the same size was 33 cents per dozen oranges. That applied all through the eight months period.

Mr. RICKARD: What did the apple growers get for their apples during that time?

Mr. STEVENS: Surely the hon. member must know that the flush period of production in California, where most of the oranges come from, is from the middle of December until April.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): My hon. friend is entirely wrong.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): There are two kinds of oranges grown in California, the navel orange and the Valencia. The navel orange starts to become ripe and is shipped in November and on through to January.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I am telling my hon. friend the facts. The Valencia orange starts to ripen in April, and is picked from April through to July.

Mr. STEVENS: Surely, but it is much smaller in quantity.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No, not much smaller. The large amount of fruit grown in the United States in these months is grown to-day in Florida and Texas, and a great deal of the fruit which is received in this part of Canada comes from those states.

The actual facts in connection with the price of oranges at that time are as I have given them to the committee. In other words it has cost us practically ten cents a dozen more for oranges while the duty period is on than when it is off. We still have this provision in the treaty. We cannot escape it because we cannot get certain parts of the empire to let go of the bound rate which was put in the 1932 agreement. This applies not only to oranges but also to many other fruits in our trade schedules. As a matter of fact, when this government first came into office there were some 200 bound rates. There are now around 90, and it is to the credit of the government that changes have been made to that extent. This government does not bind a rate against decrease; it binds only against increase. My hon. friend's party bound only against decreases.

Mr. PERLEY: We put more items on the free list than your government did all the time it has been in office.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): My hon. friend is entirely wrong.

Mr. PERLEY: Well, look at the record.

Mr. DUNNING: I see we are starting a discussion here which will probably continue, and I am desirous of reporting progress before six o'clock.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I will allow the item to go now.

Mr. MacNICOL: We on this side will try to help the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: I think everyone has been trying to help me this afternoon, and I appreciate it. I want to congratulate the committee on a good afternoon's work.

Mr. COLDWELL: The item of oranges is standing, is it not?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It has not been passed.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 41, for the relief of Edythe Marjorie Burke Atkinson—Mr. Heaps.

Bill No. 42, for the relief of Marie Louise Rosetti Di Rosa—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City).

DOMINION ELECTIONS

PROVISION FOR TAKING OF BALLOT ON SPECIFIC QUESTIONS OF NATIONAL IMPORTANCE

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved the second reading of Bill No. 11, respecting balloting on questions of great national importance.

[Mr. J. G. Ross.]

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: In moving the second reading of this bill, as to-day is the anniversary of a great saint and a great man, and a notable day to a great many people of the Irish race in this country, I wish to compliment you, Mr. Speaker, as the representative of another great people, the people of the glorious land of France, towards which the eyes of the whole civilized world were turned during the great war, who suffered pain, sacrifices, sorrow, anguish and great privations and the story of whose endurance, bravery, and glorious service to humanity will live in the annals of patriotism forever. The people of Ireland were a downtrodden people for a great many years. I wish to pay tribute to you, sir, for your conduct of the public business in the interests of the people of Canada.

In moving the second reading of this bill let me say that it does not in any sense involve the expenditure of money, because it is only enabling and permissive legislation. It gives power to the governor in council if he sees fit to refer any matter of national importance to the people. This house, and parliamentary institutions generally in this country, have not been treated fairly by some of the press as far as reporting the proceedings of parliament is concerned. I should like to take a couple of minutes to answer some of the criticism which has been directed against this house from outside. As far as the notice or reports given by some of the press to the proceedings here is concerned we might just as well turn the key in the door and hold the sittings in secret or in private. The press has a duty to the public, which with three or four exceptions it is not carrying out,—to give to the people the plain facts of what is being done in this house.

The ballot proposed has been the rule in the municipalities for many years. I see the respected and honoured Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) here to-night. I think he is a taxpayer in the city of Quebec.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But we are not a municipality.

Mr. CHURCH: The taxes he pays on a piece of real estate may be a rent in itself. The object of this bill is to apply the law which has been the rule in the municipalities since confederation and in the provinces to federal affairs, so that we shall have government of the people by the people and for the people and let the people rule so that they will have something to say about the disposition of their own property. This provision for a referendum was found to be in the public interest and of great benefit; it was found to prevent waste and to check overgovernment and overtaxation. It has been in operation extensively in the provinces for years. As the explanatory note says, it is enabling legislation similar to that for many years in vogue in democratic countries. It is found to be in the public interest and most useful, permitting the submission of important domestic national questions to the wisdom and judgment of the electors. The provinces have used it extensively for years through the municipalities, thus providing an opportunity for giving the public a voice in government policies. It will create a prerogative of checks and balances and make for government "of the people, by the people, and for the people." It is only enabling legislation to enable the governor in council to submit to a vote any question of national importance.

Last year I wrote a letter to the special committee on electoral matters. The following is from the record of the committee's proceedings, May 4, 1938:

The Chairman: Gentlemen, I have a letter which I would like to read to you so that you may think the matter over and dispose of it at a later date. This letter is from Mr. T. L. Church, M.P., and is addressed to the chairman and gentlemen of this committee.

I thought I would simply acknowledge receipt of the letter and read it to the committee and we can discuss it at a later date.

Mr. Pelletier: Would it be possible to have a copy of the letter?

The Chairman: It is simply a matter of adding a clause in the elections act whereby we can submit a referendum to the people on certain questions. The letter does not describe the matter in any clearer form than the bare statement.

Mr. McIntosh: Does he mean that a referendum would be held at the same time as the voting?

The Chairman: To make provision for that to be done.

Mr. Taylor: It is impossible to have a referendum under the present act?

The Chairman: There is no provision in the act now.

(At this point the committee proceeded to other business. There is no record of the letter having been read.)

You, Mr. Speaker, have been a municipal ratepayer for many years and will realize that a provision for referendum on matters affecting the liberty of the subject and the control and disposition of property is a wise thing. For example, the city of Toronto has a splendid patriotic press, all good papers; they do a great deal for the city and country. I do not wish to criticize in any way the press, far from it; I have on other occasions in my newspaper bill paid tribute to the press and what it does for the people of the country in peace and war alike. But I recall an occasion in Toronto when five of the six daily Toronto newspapers advocated very strongly the purchase by the people at $32,000,000 of an old electric railway and electric light company's franchise and physical assets which was reported by the investigator to be worth $6,000,000. Had it not been for the voice of one newspaper, the Telegram, and one or two men in the Toronto city hall—I am not saying who they were—the people of Toronto forever would have had to pay carfare at a cost of two tickets for a quarter on the streets of the city. A referendum should have been held on the proposal that the municipalities should buy and control this light and power and transportation, and some of the papers supported the purchase and nearly pulled it off over the people's heads. But an amendment to the municipal act was sent to the legislature by the city, when my hon. friend, the member for Parkdale was in the city council, providing that no franchise to any light, power or transportation company should be granted by law over the streets of municipalities in the province of Ontario without a vote of the ratepayers That amendment to the Municipal Act, which I moved, passed the legislature and is commonly called the Beck act. If that policy is good for municipalities and provinces, it is good federally. It would have been good in connection with the launching of three transcontinental railways. Some of the old newspapers were responsible for the present railway situation and bungle in this country; they said "Cox could not wait." Had the people then had a voice in that, I doubt if the railway situation in Canada would be what it is to-day. I am not criticizing the newspapers, but in the early days of this century they created—at least most of them did—this folly. There is political wisdom even in what I said the other night that you can never answer a newspaper, because it always has the last word.

The principle of this bill is to trust the people, and let them have a more important place in domestic government. What has become of the old clear-cut doctrine of representation by population, a principle recognized before confederation and a splendid doctrine that did credit to Liberalism. It was a good principle, because it gave the people a voice. I would not have a referendum on questions of defence or war or foreign affairs, that would be a great mistake. The government of the day must take the responsibility in an emergency, as Sir Robert Borden did in August 1914, and the country backed him up. The enemy might be in the country and take possession before you could open the ballot boxes. If a referendum was held, they would sail up the St. Lawrence and destroy our leading cities in eastern Canada. I would hold referendums on great domestic problems such as I have described and on over-government and over-taxation. I think the people know more about our railways than some of the members of this house. It does not indicate great wisdom when we see three or four transcontinental, double track railways, with all their branch lines as condemned by the Drayton-Acworth and Duff reports. If that proposition had been submitted to the people in 1905 and 1909 I doubt if we would have had a second or third transcontinental railway in this country; nor, I believe, would we have had the over-government and waste from which we have suffered in the past. In the Drayton-Acworth report it was stated that Canada, with a population of 10 millions, had a railway mileage equal to that of Germany with a population of 67 millions, and of France and England, with populations of 46 and 47 millions. With Canada's 42,000 miles of single track it is now too late to hold a referendum.

A further point is that a referendum would be a check on hasty legislation. It would ensure that vital and important measures dealing with domestic affairs could not be passed by parliament against the wishes of a majority of the electors. A referendum is the most effective way of making the voice of the people effective. In the second place the compulsory referendum would be the greatest possible safeguard against sudden tampering with the constitution. It would be used principally in regard to questions of constitutional change, so would not involve serious changes in the routine of government.

The representative system has completely broken down. British statesmen, though professing to serve their constituents and the will of the people, are becoming more and more independent and out of touch with them, except at elections. They can hardly object to becoming more subject to popular control. Under the referendum it is not necessary for a ministry to resign when one of its schemes is rejected. Thus able men may remain in office even though one of their proposals may be rejected. The heart of the whole policy is often contained in some single resolution or law; and if the doctrine of the mandate has any place in democratic theory, it is applicable on these pivotal occasions. The electors would have to vote for measures and principles, not for men, and this they are perfectly competent to do. At present they are asked to decide between two or three complicated policies which touch every foreign and domestic interest of the state, without a chance to exercise a critical selection between the good points and the bad. Surely they can decide on the advantages or disadvantages of a single legislative proposal. The merits of voting for men, not measures, are disproved by the steady degeneration in the type of candidates elected. The public think they have a good man when they may not. The reason why voting is so small in many referenda is that considerations of party and personal passion and prejudice are absent. Those who do not vote presumably are indifferent to what may happen, so those who are concerned are rightly allowed to decide.

Then, Mr. Speaker, this would be politically educational, and would free people of the habit of thinking in terms of parties. Measures would then be considered from the point of view of the community rather than of the interests of parties, creeds, sects and classes. The House of Commons would still deal with unimportant measures and would have to draw up each measure to be referred, settle all the details connected with it and finally present the best result that could be obtained. The adoption of the referendum plan would lessen the evils of the party system, because the certainty that party support meant party victory would vanish. A partial or trial application of the referendum system might be made. It would put more vigour into political life and would give the electorate the feeling that they really controlled their destiny. In some of the states of the union and in Switzerland it has been tried with great success. Far from being an un-English institution, it originated in England in the seventeenth century. Its position in the United States is that of substitute for the veto, which is a cardinal feature of English constitutional theory. The royal veto is now a mere survival, but the need for a sovereign veto remains. No fewer than 1,600 instances are known in America, and undoubtedly if the system had been a failure it would have been dropped. It is an ordinary part of trade union constitutions in England, and has worked well. That is, strikes are nearly always subject to it, and in those cases where it is not used the strikes very often fail because of the discord that follows lack of agreement about the policy to be adopted. In addition it keeps the legislature and individual members in touch with opinion in the country during the interval between one general election and the next.

It is not my desire to criticize the newspaper or splendid public activities of that great and most popular young Canadian, Mr. McCullagh, or of that other patriot and gentleman who was a great pioneer and who is a very much beloved citizen, Mr. Wright, both of whom are old and admired friends of mine. As I see it these two gentlemen have done a great public service, in one sense, in that they have reawakened and reconsecrated public opinion to paying more attention to the way we are governed and the need of modern reforms. After all is said and done, while the fathers of confederation are greatly respected it must not be forgotten that mistakes were made, and it is the duty of parliament to endeavour to remedy those mistakes, and to bring the conduct of public business up to date.

Our whole system of government seems to be upside down. As I see it one of the cardinal principles of our constitution is that the courts shall be subservient to the legislature. To-day the working man is at the mercy of arbitrary social conditions which are quite beyond his control. A century ago we reformed the franchise to secure the liberty of trade and commerce and industry. Later that reform was extended for the benefit of the mercantile industrial classes as against a landed family compact, and still later it was extended to wage earners and women, in order to enlist the aid of the women toward the betterment of social conditions. Our governments have done the best they could, faced with that comedy of errors called the British North America Act, a relic of the ox cart days. We are told that we have to suffer all the economic evils of to-day because of the British North America Act; because certain wise men, whose vision did not extend to the conditions of to-day, unloaded the provincial system upon us as opposed to the federal system which they have in England. Many things we enjoy to-day were unheard of in 1867. Then there were no joint stock companies, no telephones, no power development, no air lines, no radios, no old age pensions, no social insurance, no eight-hour day; nor had they the benefit of many of the great discoveries that have been made in science, physics and biology. Are we to assume that these men who lived in the past left us adequate machinery to deal with the problems these new discoveries have brought us? The authors of the British North America Act did not play bridge or squash or badminton, or go to rugby or pro hockey games, but they left us this relic, the British North America Act. As a result the unemployed have to suffer, and we cannot solve the simplest economic and social questions.

What I should like to see result from this referendum system is a restoration of government of the people, by the people and for the people. The British North America Act is blamed for our failure to solve our most pressing problems, but the constitutional parliamentary, cabinet and law reform problems are the most pressing of all. It is responsible for the failure of any effort on the part of the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities to solve the difficulties with which we are faced while the people suffer untold hardship, misery and want.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that we in this house are even blamed for our present canal system. I saw an article to that effect in the press this morning. The Rideau canal was financed and built by the British government as a back door to lake Ontario to aid the inadequate defences shown in the war of 1812. The newspapers make a great many statements that are not correct. They published garbled accounts of the debate that took place here just a week ago to-night with regard to constitutional and cabinet reform and the statute of Westminster. I suggest that some of our editors should publish what actually happens in this house and give the people the truth and facts; because we might as well be meeting in secret for all that is said about us by some of the newspapers with regard to our proceedings. And what is going on here under the constitution? In the old days our newspapers published an account of the proceedings of our democratic bodies in federal, provincial and municipal affairs. In the last two cases they still do, but not as to the proceedings here. For example, from what source do some papers principally derive their news concerning Great Britain? Do we get it from Britain direct or from Mr. Chamberlain: I venture to say that a large part of the information that we read with regard to the old land—in some papers there are many notable exceptions—does not come from England but through the papers of the United States. Many of the articles you read in the morning papers in this country have already appeared in some of the newspapers of Cleveland, New York and Washington, in United States press chains instead of direct from London.

Those who criticize the party system do so not without some cause. It has some defects, I admit. It sometimes leads members to forget the basis and functions for which political parties were formed two hundred years ago, for the greatness of the country and the welfare of its people. But when you criticize its faults, do not also forget its virtues and what it has done in the old land and in the empire for good government and for government of the people by the people and for the people. It has given the mother of parliaments the good government it has had and its modern reforms for the benefit of the masses and of the suffering millions and the free parliamentary institutions under which we live to-day, which guarantee us liberty of the press, a free pulpit, liberty of the universities and freedom in the legislatures. Surely that is something we should all be proud of. Parliamentary government may not be as efficient as we should all like to see it, but I urge upon the Minister of Justice, who is respected by the Irish as by all classes, to answer the criticisms that we have heard from within and without. The best way in which those criticisms can be answered is for us to bring about certain reforms that are badly needed. From within, let us reform our parliamentary system, our constitutional system, our cabinet system, our electoral system, and let us have the necessary law reform so as to bring all those departments of our administration up to date, making it more efficient in order to give more expeditious redress for the evils of the capitalist system—a good system if it will clean its house of errors—and allowing us to organize that system so that the workers may share in its benefits. That is so far as criticism from within is concerned. As regards criticism from without, we shall still be where we were in 1812; we shall still be completely dependent upon the motherland for our defence.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I move the second reading of the bill. I should like to see it go to the elections committee because there is the great principle of good government involved in it. I am sure it would serve many admirable purposes. It would prevent many abuses, it would be useful to the dominion as it has been to the municipalities, and to the provinces, and it would be in the interests of good government to make some answer to the criticisms that have been levelled against this house and against our parliamentary institutions. Either the Minister of Justice or the Secretary of State should, I submit, consider the question of enlarging the powers of the committee on elections in order to give them an opportunity to study the matters involved in the bill and to take into consideration the question of referendum, which has been so advantageous to the taxpayers in the provinces and in the municipalities; and also other election methods regarding the use of billboards and the radio, with a view to bringing about needed reforms in the interests of the people.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to place upon the statute book certain provisions whereby the government may take a referendum on any question of importance. May I point out in the first place that this bill will not establish a right. The government may at any time order such a referendum, provided it is authorized by an act of parliament; and this has been done before, at least in one instance to which I shall refer in a moment.

Let me say at once that so far as I am concerned I am in favour of the principle of the bill. I am in favour of having on the statute book some provisions by means of which the government may in exceptional circumstances have a referendum or take the votes of electors, properly qualified, on questions of importance. I do not however agree with the mover of the bill that some of the questions to which he has referred should have been submitted to the electors. In the first place, the government should take its responsibility wherever an emergency or a question of importance is concerned involving the general administration of the affairs of the country. In such circumstances, I submit that the government should assume its responsibility, bring down its policy to the house, and let hon. members, duly elected and properly qualified to do so, discuss that policy; and members of parliament should also assume their responsibilities in the matter. In other words, I am not carried away by the modern idea that the government is concerned only with minor matters and that as soon as any question of importance arises it should consult the people and have a referendum on any question that occurs in the ordinary course of administration. I admit that there might be exceptional circumstances in which it would seem advisable to consult the people by means of a referendum, and to that extent I agree with the bill; and instead of leaving it to the last moment it might be advisable to have on the statutes electoral machinery whereby that end would be attained.

I have looked into the political history of the country to find instances of a referendum having been held, and I can find only one occasion on which a dominion-wide plebiscite was resorted to. That was in 1898 when the Laurier government held a referendum on the question of prohibition. The government had a bill adopted by the house during the session of 1898. It was assented to on June 13, the title being "An Act Respecting the Prohibition of the Importation, Manufacture and Sale of Intoxicating Liquors." I have in my hand a copy of that bill. The act became obsolete after the referendum, or the plebiscite as it was called, and consequently it does not appear in the revised statutes of 1927. It not only authorized the government to hold that plebiscite, but it also provided the electoral machinery by means of which that could be done. Section 3 stipulated the question to be submitted, which was as follows:

> Are you in favour of the passing of an act prohibiting the importation, manufacture or sale of spirits, wine, ale, beer, cider and all other alcoholic liquors for use as beverages?

Section 4 provided for the proclamation of polling day and section 5 set out those who might vote. Section 6 reads as follows:

> For the purpose of submitting the question to the electors, obtaining an answer thereto, and ascertaining the result of the vote, the same proceedings, as nearly as may be, shall be had as in the case of a general dominion election, and the Dominion Elections Act and the North-west Territories Representation Act, and their amendments, and the Franchise Act, 1898, shall, subject to the provisions of this act, and of any regulations, orders or instructions made or given by the governor in council thereunder, apply, mutatis mutandis, to the conduct of such proceedings, and with respect to the powers to be exercised, and the duties to be performed by, and the rights, obligations, liabilities, qualifications and disqualifications of, judges, officers, electors, and all other persons, and with respect to offences and the penalties which may be incurred.

Perhaps I may be pardoned for placing these questions on Hansard, but this is an act which cannot be found readily to-day outside of the library. I thought that hon. members would like to know how the plebiscite was taken at that time. The legislation provided for the taking of the vote, how the ballots should be marked, and the returns made. Hon. members will remember that although that plebiscite gave a majority in favour of prohibition, it disclosed a great divergence of opinion throughout the country, and the government hesitated to act according to the results. Perhaps I might pause here to draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that even this way of legislating is not always the best, nor is it necessarily productive of good results. What the government did was to place the Canada Temperance Act upon the statute books at a later day, which act is still on our statutes. It provided for local referendums, if I may use that term, leaving it to each territory to decide whether they wanted to come under the act Although this act is still on our statute book, it is in force in only three parts of the country, in Manitoulin Island, in the province of Ontario; Thetford Mines in Quebec and in Lisgar and Marquette in Manitoba. I am informed that some two hundred local elections have been held since the act went into force. Certain parts of the country expressed a desire to come under the act, and later on asked that it be allowed to withdraw from its operation.

This bill proposes to enable the government to proclaim the taking of a vote or referendum on certain questions. That right is already in existence and has been exercised by a former government, which passed legislation, as I have indicated, to permit balloting on a particular question. Never to my knowledge has there been a general disposition given to a government, as is proposed to be given by this bill; there has always been in contemplation a special question upon which a referendum was to be held. I do not think this bill is sweeping enough in its provisions. It is limited in its scope by sections 4 and 5. Section 4 states that the holding of a poll and the taking of a vote under this act shall be on the day fixed for the holding of a general election. That means that this bill could not be applied in an emergency or in respect to any question of national importance which might arise during the course of a parliament. Apparently it is meant to apply to questions upon which parliament would not care or dare to take an attitude, something which the members would rather have referred to the electorate at the same time as a general election is held. Then section 5 states:

The provisions of the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, and regulations made thereunder in so far as applicable, shall apply to the taking of the vote and making returns in respect thereto.

If the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act are to apply, it would mean that seven weeks must elapse between the instituting of a referendum and the taking of a vote. I do not think I am far astray when I say that if a referendum is needed, it would be in a time of emergency and not at some fixed date every four or five years when a general election is held. Then seven weeks must intervene between the time a plebiscite is announced and the ballot is taken. I think that part of the bill might well be reconsidered. It should be redrafted and studied by the special committee on electoral matters. I suggest that that committee should consider ways of permitting the government to hold a referendum, not on a fixed date when a general election is to be held, but at any time when it might be thought necessary and advisable so to do. The committee should also try to reduce the time between the proclamation of a plebiscite and the polling date.

Under our present electoral laws the voting lists are prepared on the eve of an election. There are no standing lists kept here in Ottawa, and perhaps that is one difficulty to be faced. A period of seven weeks may be necessary in connection with a general election when every precaution must be taken, but it might be possible to shorten that period in the case of a referendum. If the referendum provided for by this bill is not to be merely a means of having certain questions decided directly by the people outside of parliament; if it is intended that this type of referendum shall be a means of reaching the people in a time of emergency, it is essential that the bill to provide the machinery by which a ballot may be taken should not be limited in its provisions as to the duration of time or the date upon which a ballot shall be taken. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am quite willing as far as I am concerned, to support the bill on its second reading, but if the bill is read a second time I shall move its reference to the special committee.

Mr. CHURCH: My bill will not affect the rights of minorities.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the minister (Mr. Rinfret) accepts the principle of this bill. While I am not prepared to speak on the bill to-night, after hearing from its sponsor I should judge that the government would be anxious to grasp this opportunity of referring some of Canada's main problems to the people. I have in mind, for instance, the railway problem. We know perfectly well that the government will not tackle this problem to-day because of the railway vote in this country. Therefore I think it would be a very fine thing if during the next election the government would submit the question to the country and secure from them the voice of the Canadian people. It is a problem that means life or death economically to this dominion, because we are going behind $1,000,000 a week on account of the national railways, and we cannot continue to do that much longer. The government is not prepared to step out and tackle this problem, and I should think it would be a very fine thing to submit it direct to the people of this country. I do not see, therefore, why the government should not accept the principle of this bill and incorporate it in the statutes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is it the idea of the hon. member that the referendum should take place at the time of the election?

Mr. BARBER: I should certainly say so.

Mr. HEAPS: What would you submit to the electors?

Mr. BARBER: That is up to the government.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not like to throw cold water on the enthusiasm of the supporters of this bill, but while I have no objection to second reading being given and the bill being referred to a committee, I am not so cheerful about this method of submitting to the people grave and important, or less important, questions at the same time that they are voting on who shall be the candidates to represent them in parliament and constitute the government of this country for the next four or five years.

The responsibility of the electors on polling day in a federal election, their choice of the candidates who shall be the government of Canada and represent them in parliament, is important and serious enough in itself; and goodness knows there are questions enough arising out of the programs of the various parties which are submitted to the electors without asking them at the same time to vote as is done in municipal elections on still further questions, even one—and it may be one or two or three, because there would be no limit. But who will compare a federal election and the selection of members of parliament with a municipal election? I do not think any member of the house will say that they are at all comparable. To my mind it would simply confuse the electors to have further questions submitted to them on polling day in a general election.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) referred to the railway problem. If there was a referendum on the railway problem at the time of a general election, the question would undoubtedly be discussed and it would only add to the confusion. The people would require the candidates to pronounce themselves on the question which was the subject of the referendum.

Mr. BARBER: I think the minister is perhaps confusing the two things. If at the time of polling there was a separate referendum or ballot, it would not necessarily be confusing to the people as it is now.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am afraid it would. I am not at all opposed to the principle of submitting some questions to the people of Canada, and in spite of the fact that it would perhaps involve a large expenditure I certainly would favour holding any such consultation of the people at some other time than on polling day in a general election. I think the electors have enough to do on polling day in selecting the candidates who shall be their representatives for the next four or five years, and with the multiplication of parties and groups which appears to go on rapidly all the time, I think there will be enough ballots submitted to the electors without adding any further questions of public policy for them to decide.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. RINFRET: I move, Mr. Speaker:

That this bill be not referred to the committee of the whole, but that it be referred to the special committee appointed to study and report on matters pertaining to elections and electoral districts in Canada.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

APPOINTMENT OF SECRETARY TO CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

Mr. ARTHUR J. LAPOINTE (Matapedia-Matane) moved the second reading of Bill No. 24, to amend the Civil Service Act. He said:

(Translation) Mr. Speaker, on the second reading of this bill which I have had the honour to introduce in the house, I do not intend to make a speech, but simply to offer a few brief observations.

As I explained when the bill was read for the first time, I am of opinion that the appointment of the secretary to the civil service commission should be made by the government and not by the commission. The position is just as important as that of a commissioner, if not more so. Indeed, it may be said that the secretary is the mainspring of the commission. Moreover, as the government habitually appoints the officers of commissions which it creates, why should it not do likewise in the case of the civil service commission? This position is equivalent, to my mind, to that of a departmental deputy minister, and deputy ministers are appointed by the government.

The secretary of the civil service commission, being the link between the commission and the public, should be acceptable not only to a section of the country but to the entire dominion. It is not a question of making a political appointment, as certain newspapers have suggested, but of making an appointment satisfactory to the Canadian people and not only to the civil service commission. The impression is daily gaining ground that there has arisen in this field what amounts to a bureaucracy, more powerful than the government itself. On the other hand, it is believed in certain quarters that the civil service commission is simply a shield and that members of parliament are responsible for appointments which in reality come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the commission. Such is the case, for example, in the appointment of a customs officer, a lighthouse keeper and a post office caretaker at Matane. Although these three appointments were made by the civil service commission, certain people have sought to spread the impression that they were political appointments for which I was responsible, when in reality I had nothing to do with them. Such is the situation.

In submitting this bill to the consideration of the house, Mr. Speaker, I have but one purpose—to improve conditions in this domain, so that the public interest may be served. I trust it will meet with the approval of the entire house.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): The bill of the hon. member is not one which in my opinion should receive the support of this house. One of the institutions to which we can look with a great deal of admiration is the British civil service from which pattern ours is formed. When all is said and done, no form of responsible government, whether parliamentary or municipal, can go on without having good and efficient heads of departments. As one who has had a great deal of experience with public servants in federal, provincial and municipal affairs, I can say that fortunately the officials we have in all departments of government at Ottawa are the backbone of the good government we have under modern conditions. As members of parliament we are here to-day and away to-morrow. The backbone of any system of government is found in the permanent public servants and heads of departments, officials who give their lives to this work at small pay. They work hard and give most efficient and honest service.

Years ago parliament created a civil service commission. That commission has been handicapped from lack of a free hand and support. When I was a member sitting on the government side of the house I took the same position as I do now, namely that we should have a proper civil service commission and that they should be absolutely in control to promote honest and efficient government and give value for the taxpayers' money. It is true that in some ways it has permitted the employment of too many officials, but that applies in all departments of government, public and private. In private service the same conditions may apply; but it can be said that our public service in Ottawa is a good service. You, Mr. Speaker, have had a great deal of parliamentary experience; you are a distinguished man in educational and legal and commercial matters. You will agree that, whether in academic, legislative or business affairs, the backbone of the business is an efficient administrative service. How are we to get efficiency if the commission cannot even appoint a secretary? I do not care whether the secretary is black or white, Jew or Gentile, English or French or Irish, as long as he is efficient, because the first thing in connection with the appointment of a secretary is to find out the qualifications of an applicant for the office, whether he has experience, training and capacity; whether he will give value for the taxpayers' money, and all that sort of thing. If we are to interfere with the civil service commission as this bill proposes, on the ground that the commission is appointed by the governor general in council, the commissioners will not have power to do anything but act as office boys through an organization, the governor general in council, which Sir Robert Borden called a political body. If you ask me, the principle of the bill will not conduce to good government, to an efficient public service, or to value for the taxpayers' money.

The bill first says that it is an act to amend the Civil Service Act.

His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada,— —amends several statutes, including the revised statutes, chapter 22; the statutes of 1929, chapter 38; the statutes of 1932, chapter 40; the statutes of 1938, chapter 7; and here is the fifth amendment since the commission was created:

[Mr. Church.]

1. Section three of the Civil Service Act, chapter twenty-two of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended by subsection two of section thirteen of chapter forty of the statutes of 1932, is further amended by adding, at the end thereof, the following subsection:

"(9) The secretary of the commission shall be appointed by the governor in council.

Under the rules of the house the hon. member must give an explanatory note, and this is the only explanation he gives for a change which, if made, will practically reduce the civil service commission to a lot of office boys. The explanatory note says:

The position of secretary to the civil service commission already exists under the civil service classification. The purpose of this bill is to provide that the appointment of the incumbent thereof shall be made by the governor in council.

If the civil service commission are not competent to choose a secretary, how are they fit to choose clerks, deputy departmental heads, and stenographers, and the experts for the board we were considering last night as well as for some fifteen or twenty other boards under the commission system? I may say to the mover of the bill that if we do not abolish some of these royal and other roving commissions, the royal commission system will abolish the House of Commons. That is what it is coming to, if we do not regulate some of these things and prevent overlapping, and see to it that those whom we appoint have a free hand to administer the system from a business and commercial aspect.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): How about the referendum?

Mr. CHURCH: If this bill passes, from the viewpoint of efficiency of the public service we might just as well abolish the civil service commission altogether if it is not to make an appointment of this kind; and unless we cease to appoint additional royal commissions we might as well abolish the House of Commons, and pronounce "earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust" upon our parliamentary institutions.

As I have said, I know a great many of the officials. Take our learned clerk of the house, the dean of the House of Commons; also the able assistant clerk of the house. We owe a great deal of the efficiency of the house to our clerk: and assistant clerk. The clerk is practically the secretary and manager of the house, although he is called the clerk of the house. I believe that on a day like the seventeenth of March the Irish should pay tribute to so good an official, although he belongs to another race. Suppose he were appointed, not for efficiency, not because he knows the rules and regulations so ably, and has written such a fine text book on parliamentary and constitutional procedure, which the other day was quoted in the British house; I say, suppose we had allowed the appointment to be made by the governor general in council, I doubt if he would ever have been here.

It is nine o'clock, Mr. Speaker. I thank the rules for that, and I now move the adojurnment of the debate.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND PERIOD OF OPERATION OF ACT, ETC.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 36, to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

He said: This bill does not affect the principle of the original act in any way. It is simply to give effect to what we attempted to do in 1937, but it was found that the limitation in the act which would end its activities in 1940 was not removed. It is also proposed now to make legislative provision for what was previously done under a vote of a certain sum of money by this house. It has been suggested by those who are checking the expenditures in connection with this branch that it would be much more satisfactory if the powers which the minister now has under regulations and under the vote itself were put in legislative form. For example power is given to purchase land. That simply means that sometimes where we undertake to build dams we have to purchase land, and have done so ever since this legislation was enacted. On other occasions where we are setting up pastures it has been necessary to purchase certain lands, particularly those associated with buildings which may be used in the establishment of pastures. That is now covered by a section of this bill rather than merely by a vote of the house of a certain sum of money for carrying on that work. The same is true with regard to the purchase of machinery and with regard to agreements with provinces and cities and municipalities.

On the occasion of moving the first reading of this bill I intimated to the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) that before further discussion took place I would attempt to have all the information asked for by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) laid on the table. That information is not all compiled; I had to send to Regina for some of it, but it will be complete at the beginning of next week and can be just as well discussed when the bill is in committee, probably more properly then than now. If that is not satisfactory to the hon. member it can be discussed fully on the estimates having to do with rehabilitation.

In view of the fact that this bill does not affect the principle of the original act, I suggest that it be permitted to go to the committee where its clauses can be fully discussed.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): The minister has stated that it is desired to extend the act so that there will be no termination of the operations under it in 1940; also that power be given to the minister to expend sums voted by this house. I suppose that later on the estimates will include a stated sum to be used for prairie farm rehabilitation.

Prior to 1934-35 there was an unparalleled climatic condition extending over a large area in the southern part of Saskatchewan and part of the other prairie provinces, which brought about distressed conditions in that area. For a number of years there were crop failures, and it looked for a time as though that part of the country might be turning into a desert. The municipalities in that area and the provincial government could not cope with the situation. An appeal was made to the federal government for assistance, which I think all will agree was granted, and the situation was met as far as possible. After careful investigation by the Minister of Agriculture at that time the situation was considered so serious that the federal government offered to assume full responsibility with respect to relief, schools, roads, et cetera, in a certain area, taking it over as a federal area. There was correspondence between the then Prime Minister Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, and the premier of the province, who happened to be the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) with respect to that proposal. I have a copy of the correspondence. But apparently the two governments could not agree and that area was never taken over by the federal authorities.

In 1935 the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act was passed, providing for the setting up of a committee, with the main purpose of reclaiming and rehabilitating the area. Many projects were undertaken, including experiments in control of soil drifting, conservation of water, and other worth while projects; the main object being to reclaim the land and rehabilitate the farmers in the area.

In 1935 there was a change of government. The act however continued. It was amended in some minor respects in 1937, but the government of the day has been carrying on that work. I believe they have been seeding large areas to grass in order to try to get it back to pasture. I agree with the main principle of the bill, and I think the government would be well advised to continue the work. The area involved has in the past made a considerable contribution to our export trade. It has had a wonderful record from the production standpoint, particularly prior to 1930, and I believe that that same area may yet regain the position it held prior to 1930 and be capable of producing as much new wealth as any area of similar size anywhere in the west. Certainly if we have a reasonable rainfall for three or four years in succession we shall soon return to that condition.

In the last two or three years those in charge of prairie farm rehabilitation have set up an organization which in regard to size of staff is out of all proportion to the work that they are doing. Salaries and expenses are beyond all reason. If you look at pages 56, 57, 58 and 59 of the auditor general's report you will see the names of the employees of this department, together with their salaries and expenses, and I believe after careful study you will agree that the statement I am making is correct.

This amendment certainly gives the minister wide power. He can undertake almost anything he wishes. As he said a moment ago, he can lease and dispose of land as he sees fit. Section 12, which is a new section, states:

> The minister may, for the purposes of the act, purchase or rent whatever machinery or equipment may be required in connection with the development, construction or operation of any project, or scheme, and may sell or otherwise dispose of such equipment upon such terms as he may deem desirable.

All this can be done without the approval of the governor in council, which is required under sections 10 and 11.

The minister stated a moment ago that he proposes to give certain information when the bill is in committee, information for which I asked and in regard to which an order was passed on March 6. This has to do with the number of engineers, supervisors and employees of all kinds engaged under the act. I believe we should have that information, as well as a good deal more that I can think of. We should have all the contracts that have been entered into, all the contracts that have been sublet, as well as the leases of land and equipment that have been entered into. It will be noted that the bill gives the minister power to lease and rent machinery, land and so on. I think we should have this information in order that we may understand how the work is being carried on. We know that in this area—and I believe this applies to almost all of Saskatchewan—there is not twenty per cent of the horse power that is required properly to carry on farming in the district. As I have previously said in this house, the minister would be well advised to consider assisting the farmers in some way in making the first payments on power equipment. I cannot think of any better way to rehabilitate the farmers and encourage them to stay on the land. That may not be possible under this act, but I suggest that any industrial organization carrying on work of this kind certainly would see to it that salaries and expenses were cut about in half. If the minister could do that, it would be a great saving to the treasury, and perhaps some provision could then be made for the assistance I have suggested.

As I said a moment ago, I approve of many of the projects that have been undertaken, particularly those having to do with water conservation. Just here I suggest to the minister that, since certain rivers and streams have been dammed—I think it is under this act that a dam is being constructed near Saskatoon—the board in Regina will have representations made to it in regard to damming the Qu'Appelle river at certain points, and those representations should be thoroughly investigated. At a point on the Qu'Appelle river near the Crooked Lakes there is a place where a dam could be constructed without great cost which would hold back a considerable body of water, and the same thing could be done at other points with beneficial results. If this were done it would also have the effect of creating breeding grounds for wild fowl and game of the kind, and I know the board in Regina will be requested to make a survey of the Qu'Appelle river in order to see if this cannot be accomplished.

The minister has stated that he will furnish all the information desired when the bill is in committee, which I think is the proper time to ask for it. That leaves me with very little more to say at this stage except this: I am surprised that the minister should be willing to accept the responsibility that will be delegated to him under sections 10, 11 and 12. Under the last section he can do many things, involving large expenditures of money, without the approval of the governor in council. I am also surprised that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), the watch dog of the treasury, should agree to allowing any member of the government to have the power that is vested in the Minister of Agriculture by this bill. I am not for a moment imputing any ulterior motive; far from it, but I do not think these provisions can be carried out without arousing a great deal of suspicion. I am afraid the minister is placing himself in a position which may bring about certain charges, perhaps none of which may have any foundation at all. I am a little surprised to see him go this far; I think it is a mistake. However, when the bill is in committee we may obtain more detailed information.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, we are considering Bill No. 36, to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I was surprised a few moments ago to hear the minister intimate that this is a comparatively unimportant bill, that it does not touch the principle of the act. The other day when the resolution was before the house the minister made a similar statement, and he used this sentence, which he more or less repeats to-day, as indicative of the main purpose of the bill:

Instead of basing our action on order in council, based on regulation, we are asking for legislative authority to do it by order in council.

In the first place, the language used is meaningless; it does not represent at all what the bill does. When I read the bill over I recognized at once that it was a serious departure. I obtained a copy of the original act and the amending act of 1937, and I invite the house to consider exactly what it is doing to-night. In presenting this view I do not wish to imply that I am objecting to the government doing anything that is possible for rehabilitation of the area in the west which was devastated, and assisting in any alleviation of the general farm conditions. What I do want the house to understand, and particularly the Liberal party, is the exent to which in this bill, as in one or two other measures that have already passed, we are departing from the normal democratic parliamentary procedure.

Let us look at the original act which the minister says we are not departing from in principle. It was passed in 1935, and I would ask the house to note that it was what might be termed an emergency measure; it was in recognition of extraordinary conditions in the west, and, very properly, steps were taken to provide for them. For the purpose of my argument, however, I wish to lay it down that it was an emergency measure. One of the main points in the bill was in section 3, which provided for the setting up of an advisory committee, and I want the house to note the constitution of that committee. I quote:

(2) One of the members of the committee shall be appointed chairman by the governor in council.

(3) The committee shall consist of the following:

(a) one representative of the Manitoba Grain Growing Farmers from the drought and soil drifting areas;

(b) one representative of the Saskatchewan grain growing farmers from the drought and soil drifting areas;

(c) one representative of the Alberta grain growing farmers from the drought and soil drifting areas;

(d) one representative of Saskatchewan livestock farmers from the drought areas;

(e) one representative of Alberta range farmers from the drought areas;

(f) one representative of Mortgage Companies of Canada;

(g) one representative of the Canadian Bankers' Association;

(h) one representative each from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian National Railways;

(i) two representatives from the dominion Department of Agriculture; and

(j) one representative of the government in each of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

It will be at once recognized that parliament at that time set up that committee as an advisory body, realizing that it was doing an unusual thing in spending money in the way it was; otherwise an appropriation would have been made in the estimates and the whole matter discussed here. But knowing that there was an emergency, and realizing that there was need to expedite expenditure, they set up this non-partisan, independent committee representing the farmers, the cattle producers, the loan companies and the governments of the west, as a committee advisory to the minister. That stood for two years. Two years ago the minister came to parliament and he had section 3, to which I have referred, repealed. In place of that, the following was done:

The governor in council may establish one or more advisory committees to be known as prairie farm rehabilitation committees. . . .

That is the plural note. The first was a strong representative advisory committee.

Mr. GARDINER: It is there yet, practically the same one.

Mr. STEVENS: If it is, then it is time parliament looked into it, because the clause that set up that committee has been repealed.

Mr. GARDINER: We have the power.

Mr. STEVENS: Now we have an illustration of exactly what I was going to lead up to a little later, a government within a government. Parliament provided for that advisory committee; the minister repealed the clause appointing the advisory committee; and now he tells us the committee is still functioning. Under what right it is functioning, what its powers are, what its authority is, I do not know. At any rate here is what was done. The section I have read was repealed in 1937 and the governor in council authorized the establishment of advisory committees—whomsoever they liked—not of the kind to which I have referred, but advisory committees. I say therefore that if that first committee provided for in 1935 is still functioning, it has no legislative or statutory right for whatever action it may take. If the Minister of Justice were here I would ask him whether any action of that committee has the sanction of law. The committee being advisory, that question might not arise. That is the first point. The second point is this—

Mr. SLAGHT: Does the hon. gentleman suggest that, the committee being advisory, that question does arise?

Mr. STEVENS: I should imagine that no legal difficulty would arise, inasmuch as they are advisory. But the point I am making is this. In the act of 1935 there was a section providing for a committee. That committee was set up and in 1937 that clause was repealed and another substituted for it. Obviously, for the purpose of orderly governmental procedure, the first committee should certainly be eliminated and replaced by what was authorized under the second act of 1937. If these committees had any legal power, any contractual power, which I do not think they have, but if they had, then the repeal of the clause appointing them would invalidate any act of theirs from a legal standpoint.

Mr. SLAGHT: But as they have not, what is it all about?

Mr. STEVENS: We might repeal the clause providing for these numerous committees and set up some other form, but still continue the numerous committees, and there would be nothing but confusion. Let me now state my second point.

The statement of the minister that there was no change in principle is one that I cannot accept. In section 8 in the original act of 1935, we have this:

> For the purposes of this act the sum of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars shall be appropriated and paid out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada during the fiscal year 1935-36 and for each fiscal year for a further period of four years a sum not exceeding one million dollars per annum as may be necessary to continue and extend the work undertaken under this act.

That was the first act. In other words, parliament in that statute provided for the expenditure of a certain sum of money. In the act of 1937 that clause was repealed and the following substituted:

> For the purposes of this act the governor in council may from time to time authorize the expenditure in each of the fiscal years 1937-38 to 1939-40, inclusive, of sums not exceeding the amount appropriated by parliament in each year for such purposes.

I am not particularly objecting to that. All that amounts to is the lifting of the limitation imposed by the previous legislation. It gives the government very much of a free hand. We now have another amendment, but it will be noted that it limits it in the matter of time to 1939-40. Then we have that section repealed, and the following substituted:

> For the purposes of this act the governor in council may from time to time authorize the expenditure of sums not exceeding the amount appropriated by parliament in each year for such purposes.

This is another point which I wish to emphasize. The original act was an emergency measure, but we now find the act made into a permanent measure.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not necessarily.

Mr. STEVENS: As far as any statute can be said to be permanent. Any statute may be repealed, but any statute that is passed without any declared limitation, or any statute which repeals a previous limitation, may be considered as being more or less permanent legislation. I want to emphasize the definite change which has taken place in the principle of the legislation. It means that what was originally an emergency measure now becomes a normal statute, similar to any other statute on the statute books. I submit that what the minister is doing by section 2 is not good parliamentary practice. In other words, it is recognized that parliament may authorize the minister or the government to do something under emergency conditions, which under normal conditions would not be sanctioned. I consider we are evading the principle of parliamentary responsibility.

Before I deal with the second section of the bill, let me refer to what the minister said both the other day and to-day. He stated that this bill was to do by legislation that which had previously been done by regulation. The inference was that we were regularizing the matter more firmly and on better grounds. But section 7 of the act still applies. This reads:

> The governor in council may make such regulations as may be necessary or expedient for the effectual execution and working of this act and the attainment of the intention and objects thereof.

In other words, the minister still has all the powers he previously had to act under regulation, plus what he is to be authorized to do by sections 10, 11 and 12, which are new. The minister suggests that he is voluntarily surrendering some right to act by regulation, but he is doing nothing of the kind. All the rights that he previously had to act under regulation are being preserved, and his rights are being extended by the addition of other sections.

Mr. GARDINER: The first one was all-inclusive.

Mr. STEVENS: It still is all-inclusive.

Mr. GARDINER: Including this.

Mr. STEVENS: It is inclusive, and these are added.

Mr. GARDINER: This was included before.

Mr. STEVENS: It was all-inclusive and it remains in that position. Then section 9 of the act reads:

> The minister shall annually lay before parliament a report of all proceedings under this act for the preceding fiscal year.

There is a matter which I think I should bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, because in your custody is the proper carrying out of the orders of parliament. It is recognized that where a statute provides for the tabling of an annual report, it must be done. That is not optional, it is compulsory. The minister may have laid the report on the table, but I am advised by the distribution office and the library that there is no such report available. I do not know if a report has been laid on the table since parliament opened; all I say is that the statute says the minister shall annually lay before parliament a report. I have made every reasonable effort to secure it, but as far as I know no report has been tabled. This has a direct bearing on the point raised by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley). If we had this report before us we could intelligently gauge the worthiness of this effort. But we have no such report; it is unobtainable. We are now asked to wait until the bill is in committee in order to get the information.

I am taking no objection to the object of the legislation, but I do take the same objection as I did to the bill to create a film board, and on other occasions. I object to parliament being divested of its control over the expenditure of money. Let me say to my good friends opposite that that is a thoroughly Gladstonian Liberal principle, one which is now accepted in all democratic countries as being perhaps the most sacred right of parliament. I am sorry the Prime Minister is not here to-night, because in theory he preaches that doctrine, and rightly and properly so.

Before I read these new sections, may I say that I do not think they are well drafted. I think they could be put into one section, with three divisions, instead of being left as three separate sections. My reason for suggesting this will be plain when I read the sections.

Mr. GARDINER: A note has just been sent to me by my deputy that the report was tabled when the house opened.

Mr. STEVENS: Then perhaps we should check up on the distribution office and the library of parliament. I sent for the report but I was advised that no such report was available in the distribution office or the library of parliament. I did not know of any other place to inquire.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I think they were distributed; I believe I got one in my mail.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not recall seeing any such report. Let us have the report tabled to-night. Let us have it before we go on with the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Page 15 of the votes and proceedings of January 13, 1939, states that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) presented to the house the report referred to.

Mr. STEVENS: All I am saying is that it is not available.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is part of the proceedings of this house.

Mr. STEVENS: The laying of a report on the table does not make it a part of the proceedings of the house. It is not printed in votes and proceedings or in any other document, nor has it been printed and distributed. The distribution office tells me that it is not there, and the library tells me the same. It is not available; that is all I have to say.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is an old parliamentarian with much experience, and he will find the report to which he refers was tabled and therefore is in the possession of the house and available to every hon. member.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not disputing that. I simply said that I sent to the distribution office and the library and could not get it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But the hon. member conveyed the impression that my colleague—

Mr. STEVENS: I accept the explanation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. STEVENS: Section 10 provides:

The minister may, subject to section four—

I would ask the house particularly to notice this:

—subject to section four of this act—

Section 4 is the section which in the original act provided that the independent non-partisan committee to which I referred "shall consider and advise the minister as to the best methods" that shall be adopted. This new section 10 is made subject to section 4, or subject to the advice of the advisory committee. It goes on:

—and with the approval of the governor in council enter into agreements with any of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta or with any city, town or other municipality within any of the said provinces, or with any person, firm, or corporation, with respect to the development, promotion, construction, operation and maintenance of any project or scheme undertaken under and by virtue of this act or which may be deemed necessary or desirable for the conservation of water.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted, I have had the return sent down to me here from the office. It is sessional paper 59, dated Friday, January 13, 1939.

Mr. STEVENS: That is a return, but that does not constitute a report tabled.

Mr. GARDINER: It is the sessional paper brought down in connection with the matter and giving a full report of the whole proceedings.

Mr. STEVENS: I take the minister's word, but I certainly could not find it.

Proceeding with my discussion of section 10, it will be noted that the minister—it now becomes the minister—may enter into these agreements, which are very broad and extensive, and the minister in his explanation the other day had this to say. Referring to the number of projects he said that the number "runs into hundreds, and I am not sure that they do not run into thousands." We passed this legislation originally as emergency legislation to deal with the rehabilitation of the drought area, soil drifting, and water conservation. That was the object of parliament at that time. But this has now grown and extended until the minister is to be empowered to enter into agreements with any municipality or any town or any person, firm or corporation, and he has told us that the number of projects already runs into hundreds and possibly thousands. This is certainly entering upon an extremely wide field, and parliament ought at least to give this legislation careful analysis and thought. Good or bad, it merits that.

I have said that section 10 is subject to section 4, and subject to the approval of the governor in council. Let us look at section 11. Here is another added power or authority. It says:

The minister may, for the purposes of the act, and with the approval of the governor in council—

We have eliminated the advisory committee in section 4, and now in this clause it is the minister and the governor in council. And what may he do? He may:

—purchase, lease or otherwise acquire, or sell, lease or otherwise dispose of, any lands or premises which may be required for or included in any project or scheme, upon such terms or conditions as he may deem desirable.

Mr. GARDINER: Which schemes were passed under clause 10.

Mr. STEVENS: All right, but the minister says that the number of projects "runs into hundreds and I am not sure that they do not run into thousands." Those are the minister's words. So now the minister is getting this authority, subject to the approval of council, of course, and I say that if parliament and the government adopt this method of administration of public affairs, obviously the minister has a very free hand. The approval of the governor in council is more or less a matter of form, as is indicated by the extent of the ramifications under the act already.

Then section 12 provides, and here there is no restriction about the governor in council; it is not subject to section 4 or to the advisory committee at all—all that is eliminated:

The minister may, for the purposes of the act, purchase or rent whatever machinery or equipment may be required in connection with the development, construction or operation of any project, or scheme, and may sell or otherwise dispose of such equipment upon such terms as he may deem desirable.

In that clause, at least, we are clothing the minister with a power which I believe cannot be found in any other statute in the revised statutes of Canada concerning any department.

Mr. DUPUIS: May I ask if it goes any further than the blank cheque legislation under my hon. friend's former government?

Mr. STEVENS: That is a fair question, if not intelligent or applicable. I would reply that the blank cheque legislation, so-called, was emergency legislation, just as this originally was. I said at the beginning, but I think my hon. friend was not in the house at the time, that I had no objection to the emergency legislation that was passed, and that I had no objection to this whole program of development and conservation as an emergency proposition. But it is now made permanent, as I pointed out a moment ago. All the emergency features are gradually being deleted by the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, the emergency is still there.

Mr. STEVENS: Then why not leave the legislation in the form in which it was?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You could not. The time for the old legislation had expired.

Mr. STEVENS: But in numerous cases—as in the legislation respecting repayment for seed, legislation respecting the soldier settlement board, and so on—the acts were extended year after year. The farm loan legislation would have expired some years before it was finally wiped out had it not been extended year after year. There is precedent after precedent for parliament extending the time for operation of an act. The time for this act has not yet expired, because under the existing legislation it runs to the close of the fiscal year 1939-40, which we have not even entered. So there is no urgency in that respect.

I know that opposition members are often charged with saying unkind things to a minister when they criticize his legislation, but I hope the minister will not take my remarks in that way, because there is nothing personal in what I am saying. It is simply a question of principle. I do not care how efficient the minister is or may be; I say it is not good legislation to clothe a minister with the powers with which he is being clothed in this bill and in the form of this legislation. That is the whole point of my remarks. I think it is a dangerous course to pursue. As I said the other day, we are handing over to bureaux and boards and commissions the responsibility for the expenditure of money over which parliament exercises little control. In this case I looked through the main estimates, and I could not find the item there. The minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I suppose it will come in the supplementary estimates—the minister nods his head—in the form of a lump sum, and will be called a statutory vote. That is the kind of thing we do right along. The estimate will come up and someone will question it; the minister will say, "This is a statutory vote, authorized under the farm rehabilitation act," and being a statutory vote it goes through in a lump sum—a vastly different thing from the ordinary procedure where the estimate comes in and is reviewed and the government is accountable direct to parliament for every dollar of expenditure.

What I have said is not with the purpose of reflecting on the minister, but I think this legislation is highly dangerous. It is a bad precedent. It is not an innovation; yet in a way it is a precedent, and it is an unwise course to pursue. We should have done far better to completely revise this legislation, if the continuance of the drought makes it necessary, and bring the whole business of western farm rehabilitation into permanent form so that parliament could review it from time to time just as it does with any other analogous activity such as the grain board or the board of transport—that is, in the regular way.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They have done so, every year since it commenced, and very fully, as the hon. member will see from the records of Hansard.

Mr. STEVENS: I would not say so. We are departing from even the emergency legislation. I object to it on these grounds.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I agree with very much that has been said. Particularly do I think it is in the interests of this house and of parliament that wide powers of this description should not be given to any one individual minister. I dislike the idea of many commissions, but I believe that in this particular case, where we have to deal with the rehabilitation of a wide area, which is not now an emergency measure, the powers might be vested in a commission; and I say so because I believe the minister himself, whether he be the present minister or if a change occurs following the election, the succeeding minister, will always be subject to the criticism that he is using this act in order to distribute political patronage. Rightly or wrongly, that is said at the present time.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): Is the hon. gentleman suggesting that an emergency does not exist to-day in the western provinces?

Mr. COLDWELL: What I actually said was that this is no longer an emergency. An emergency is something which passes quickly and the emergency is done with. In my opinion, we are faced to-day with a condition which necessitates not an emergency policy but one which will have to be continued for a considerable length of time. As the hon. member who interrupted me well knows—

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): Because there are emergent conditions.

Mr. COLDWELL: As the hon. member well knows, the area yet to be rehabilitated in western Canada is of tremendous size, and possibly undertakings which we have not yet even considered will have to be instituted before this area is fully rehabilitated. For instance, the irrigation projects which have been undertaken in the last several years have been excellent to a limited extent, but I believe that either the grassing of large areas and their virtual abandonment as arable areas will have to be undertaken, or in the alternative a much larger and wider type of irrigation will have to be undertaken. Therefore I say that this is not, in the sense in which we usually use the term, something which is passing and just a temporary emergency; it lies much deeper than that.

I do not intend to go to-night into any details of this bill. I intend more or less to fall in with the suggestion of the minister and discuss it next week. But I agree with the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) that this bill ought to be carefully considered by parliament, and that the house should understand thoroughly the wide powers which are being given the minister under the bill.

I know that this problem has been before the house a great deal during the lifetime of the present parliament, and I know that a number of hon. members who are not resident in western Canada have visited the area since they were elected to this house. That, I think, has been all to the good, because there are hon. members from all over Canada who have some understanding of this tremendous problem; and in my opinion the future welfare not only of the area affected but of the entire dominion is involved in the question of prairie rehabilitation problem. Unless we can rehabilitate the western plain which has been injured either by drought or by high winds or by soil content depletion or something of that sort, the entire dominion will suffer in time to come.

I would suggest just this, too, that while there may be justifiable criticism of the number of persons employed on this rehabilitation scheme and of the amounts which are expended in inspection and travelling and office salaries and so on, I would not associate myself with the comment—which, although it may have been so understood by some hon. members, was not, I think, so intended—that we are paying too much money to the scientists who are engaged in these projects. As a matter of fact many of the soil chemists and engineers and so on who are doing a magnificent work in connection with these projects are badly underpaid individually.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): And overworked.

Mr. COLDWELL: And overworked. I should like to see, when the minister presents his estimates, a substantial increase in the remuneration which those efficient officials are receiving.

I do not rise particularly to criticize the projects which have been undertaken. I think they run into hundreds, perhaps, as the minister indicated, into thousands; but of that we shall know more next week. Of the projects which have been undertaken, I believe every one has performed a useful service to the farmer or to the community in which it has been undertaken. I want to see this work carried out and continued; for I believe that not only will rehabilitation have to be undertaken as has been indicated, but much more will have to be done. Possibly we shall have to consider how we may best protect the interests of the people who are on some of this land and resettle them elsewhere. We have only touched the fringe of the problem. I hope too that when we do rehabilitate this region we may find places where we may dispose of the produce that will be grown there.

I do not propose to say more except to emphasize that I believe it is a mistake to confer such wide powers on the minister; it would have been better to adopt another method of supervising and carrying out this work.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Every year I have expressed commendation of the forward-looking steps which the government is taking with respect to prairie farm rehabilitation. I believe the proposals indicated in sections 10, 11 and 12 of this bill are all necessary. We in our generation must do the planning which the past generation neglected to do with respect to the Canadian west, and these sections indicate that we are preparing to do that. As to whether or not it is advisable to give all these powers to the minister, I am not prepared to make any pronouncement. The powers must be placed somewhere, the activities performed and the projects undertaken; and if the minister finds the responsibility too much for him, he will I am sure in the course of a year or two bring down legislation to confer these powers upon a commission. I have confidence in the minister to that extent. Once more I commend him for his action looking to greater activity in carrying on prairie farm rehabilitation.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I desire to say just a few words in reply to some of the suggestions made. Very careful consideration has been given to the salaries paid to officials, and the wages paid to those employed under this act, since the present government came into office, and I believe before. Before we came into office a staff had been employed under the legislation of 1935, and most of those who were in positions of authority at that time are still in the employ of the government carrying on this work. As the work grew it became necessary of course to employ others, and as the expenditure of money increased it became necessary to employ more and more people in the proper expenditure of the money made available by this house. The salaries for the different positions have been referred to the civil service commission in order that we might be assured that they have some relationship to those of persons employed in similar work in other departments. In April 1938, I think we brought down for the first time our recommendations for increases in salaries, and those recommendations have been so carefully checked that it was only within the last two or three weeks, or certainly within a month, that they have been authorized by the government through the treasury board. We had the civil service commission make the most careful inquiry into any increases in salary that were made, or increases in payments to officials who were drawing salary; and I believe all the care that could possibly be taken in that connection has been taken under the direction of the treasury board.

It was stated a few moments ago by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) that very wide powers were given in section 7 of the original act. That section reads:

> The governor in council may make such regulations as may be necessary or expedient for the effectual execution and working of this act and the attainment of the intention and objects thereof.

I cannot conceive of any wider powers being given than were given in that section. It gives to the governor in council power to make regulations, and under those regulations certain powers have been given to the minister. By this legislation council had the right to do what we are now asking parliament to do, namely, to instruct the minister to do certain things, without their having been specifically placed in the legislation at all. There is not a single thing referred to in sections 10 or 11—I am not certain about 12—that was not done under the minister while the previous government was in office; not a single thing can be done under sections 10 and 11 that I have not been doing for the last three years.

At the time the legislation was placed upon the statute book it was thought, as the hon. member for Kootenay East stated, that this might be a temporary measure. But as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has just pointed out, I think every hon. member is now convinced that the problem of the prairies was not nearly as "temporary" as in 1935 some of us hoped it might be. We have had another four years' experience with it, and everyone who has visited that section of Canada realizes what was stated a few minutes ago by the leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Blackmore), that if in the early days the government of Canada had taken more care with the settlement of that section of the country, we should not now be required to do so much of what is known as rehabilitation work. But that care not having been taken then, it is now necessary to set apart sums of money, provide for the resettlement of certain sections, and make it possible for people to continue living in areas that were settled without proper preparation for settlement.

I say, then, that the activities that will be carried out under sections 10 and 11 of this bill are exactly the same activities that we are now carrying out under regulations as provided for in section 7 of the original act. But it stands to reason that officials in the departments checking expenditures desire that some more specific statutory authority be given to the minister than merely the power given by the governor in council under regulations made under section 7 of the old act. What we are really doing is asking parliament to enact legislation giving us powers that were given previously under section 7.

For the purpose of this act there was set up an advisory committee as provided for in the original act. Two years ago, when this legislation was being amended, section 3 of the amending act provided for the setting up of more than one committee; the minister was given power to set up advisory committees—

Mr. STEVENS: And it repealed the other one.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, that was the argument used at the time. We went into that very fully and the then leader of the opposition was fearful that we would not reappoint representatives of practically the same institutions. I assured him at that time that while some of the individuals might be changed, and while we might not think it necessary to have some of the institutions mentioned represented on a committee that was being set up for the purposes set out in the bill, to all intents and purposes it would be practically the same committee. I have not the personnel before me at the moment, but an examination of it would indicate that practically every institution represented here is represented in the same manner as before, in some cases by the same persons; or is represented on the committee with a slightly different personnel and slightly different set-up. But we have other committees in advisory capacities as well, and these committees will give advice to the minister from time to time. It will be noted that the new section 10 says:

> The minister may, subject to section four of this act—

That is, subject to being advised by one of these committees.

> —and with the approval of the governor in council, enter into agreements with any of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta or with any city, town or other municipality within any of the said provinces, or with any person, firm, or corporation, with respect to the development, promotion, construction, operation and maintenance of any project or scheme undertaken under and by virtue of this act or which may be deemed necessary or desirable for the conservation of water.

In other words the act sets out exactly what we have been doing for the last four years. Each time we acted we had the advice of the Department of Justice as to whether we were within the terms of the legislation then on the statute book; and on each occasion we were advised that we were. But we feel that when we are asking the house to make this legislation more permanent than it has been in the past, by removing the date, at the same time we should ask parliament to give us specifically the powers we have had by order in council ever since the original act was passed.

Then section 11 states:

> The minister may, for the purposes of the act, and with the approval of the governor in council, purchase, lease or otherwise acquire, or sell, lease or otherwise dispose of, any lands or premises which may be required for or included in any project or scheme, upon such terms or conditions as he may deem desirable.

This leads us back to section 10, and thus brings in the provision with regard to recommendations by advisory committees. In other words, we undertake these activities as a result of their advice and recommendations. Then we proceed under the other section by order in council to do the very things we are now doing. We have simply set out in this legislation the powers which previously were given us by order in council.

In regard to the last section there is just the possibility that there may be some room for criticism. I suppose I am really breaking the rules of the house in discussing this bill clause by clause at this time, but I am doing so only because it has been dealt with in that way by other speakers. There may be some reason for asking that the approval of the governor in council should be inserted in section 12 as well, and as far as I am concerned I have no objection to that if it should be the wish of hon. members when this bill is in committee. There are such things as these to be dealt with, however. For instance, we have to buy machinery for levelling land to be used in some irrigation scheme. We have the land levelled; we are finished with the machinery, which may be of a type suitable for use by people who are on that land. We may feel that rather than move that machinery to a point a hundred miles away where we are carrying on some other project, with all the expense in connection with such movement, it would be better to dispose of that machinery to the people who are going to remain on the irrigated land. So it may be found necessary to dispose of that machinery in that way.

Mr. STEVENS: It is a dangerous procedure.

Mr. GARDINER: It may be, but it is something that has to be done if we are not to leave the machinery lying in some fence corner. So the machinery is disposed of and accounted for. The only result if the governor in council were required to consent to a transaction of the kind would be a little delay, but as far as I am concerned I have no objection to that. That is a matter that can be considered when the bill is under consideration in committee. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) says we may have to get an order in council to sell a wheel barrow, and I suppose on some occasions it might get down to that.

I do not desire to go into committee on the bill to-night, because of an undertaking I gave the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), who is not in his seat at the present time, but I would ask that it be given second reading now.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Science service—

11. Entomology, $488,511.

Mr. COLDWELL: What services are included under this item?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The different services that are covered in the records I have here are: field crop insect investigations; fruit insect investigations; insecticide investigations; forest insect investigations; investigations on insects and allied parasites of animals and man; stored product insect investigations; insect taxonomy; parasite investigations, and other investigations and activities.

Mr. COLDWELL: How many persons are employed in this branch?

Mr. GARDINER: There are 207 permanent and temporary employees.

Mr. COLDWELL: I imagine the grasshopper infestation is covered by this item. Would the minister outline what is being done this year in that regard; whether any new methods are being used, and what is the anticipated requirement this year? I ask that question because reports from the west seem to indicate that there will be a serious infestation this year.

Mr. GARDINER: With regard to the first suggestion, that something be said as to what has been done in connection with grasshoppers. I would say this; that, as suggested by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, there was a very bad outbreak of grasshoppers in the western section of the prairie area last year both in Canada and in the United States. Along the southern boundary of Saskatchewn there was a breeding of grasshoppers in very considerable numbers, and crops in the southeastern part of the province were destroyed by grasshoppers very early in the season, before the grain had headed out. Towards the end of July or the early part of August the grasshopper moves from its breeding grounds to new fields, and during that period it moves further north and west with the winds that have carried it into other sections of the province. The grasshoppers destroyed thousands of acres of crop all through central Saskatchewan and some areas of Alberta. They continued to be in outbreak form in the prairies and British Columbia during 1938. The outbreak in the prairies, owing to the peculiar weather conditions, was more intense and destructive than expected, with the result that severe losses took place in Saskatchewan, owing particularly to migrations of insects from the United States. An area of 62,000,000 acres, roughly speaking, was infested in the prairie provinces in varying degree. The grasshoppers attack all cultivated crops. The most important losses are to grain and fodder crops in the prairies and to range grasses in British Columbia.

The insects are controlled mainly by poisoned bran and sawdust bait which is scattered in infested fields. Control campaigns were successful in Manitoba, British Columbia and Alberta and northern parts of the infested areas of Saskatchewan. In southern Saskatchewan serious losses were suffered together with peculiar weather conditions. The crop losses in British Columbia were surprisingly low owing to control work. In Alberta the losses did not exceed three per cent of the field crops and were but a small percentage even in infested areas of Manitoba. The crop destruction in Saskatchewan was severe. The outbreak anticipated in 1939 will cover a greater ac age and will be of greater intensity than that of 1938, but a more thorough organization of control activities in Saskatchewan is expected to reduce greatly the losses from these insects in 1939.

Mr. COLDWELL: As regards the abandoned land in southern Saskatchewan, what steps are taken to look after that area as a breeding place for grasshoppers? Following that question, in order to save time, the minister might give an outline of the steps that have been taken in cooperation with the United States authorities, since migrations came largely from the United States last July and August, along our own southern boundary.

Mr. GARDINER: The United States government have a very large program of control in the states immediately south of the prairie section of the west. The dominion authorities have been in touch with the United States authorities. I know that the Saskatchewan authorities have been in very close touch with them, and I presume those of Alberta and Manitoba have been as well. There is the closest working arrangement between the authorities on the two sides of the line.

With regard to the grasshopper outbreak on the Canadian prairies, it is expected to be much worse in 1939 than it was in 1938 owing to a material increase in the area infested in all three provinces. The infested area in 1938 was 62,000,000 acres, and this is estimated to have increased to approximately 97,000,000 in 1939. The increase in general, however, is in area infested rather than in a spectacular increase in intensity of infestation. That probably is the best comment I can make on the question which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has raised. If there is an area of 97,000,000 acres infested, the infestation is not at all confined to the areas that have been abandoned by farmers. As a matter of fact, judging from the experience that I have had personally, I think the infestation is more likely to be around the edges of fields that are in crop, and not very far removed from them, and probably in areas that were in crop last year. Eggs will be found in the soil in those areas in greater numbers, I suggest, than in the abandoned land. The increase is due in large measure to the unusual amount of migration, both domestic and from the states to the south of us, which characterized the outbreak in 1938. The infested territory in Manitoba increased from some 1,800 square miles to a little over 10,000 square miles. That of Saskatchewan increased from 55,000 square miles to 95,000 square miles.

Mr. MacNICOL: In 1938?

Mr. GARDINER: That was the increase in infestation this year. The grasshoppers laid eggs over an area to that extent greater than the year before. While the territory involved in the outbreak in Alberta increased from 39,000 to 49,000 square miles, the greater proportion of the infested area is below the severely infested category, and though the severely infested acreage practically doubled during the year, it forms a relatively small proportion of the territory infested. With vigorous control campaigns organized by the provincial governments in each province the loss of crop is expected to be reduced to very small proportions, and with more effective control of these insects in the United States, the losses due to migrating grasshoppers is expected to be of little consequence. That is the official statement with regard to the matter. The work on the immediate areas is being done by the provinces. The work itself is not being done under the direction of this government, but we are associating all our officials in this particular branch of the department, who are making studies of these problems here and elsewhere, with the activities of the provinces, in order to make the battle against the grasshoppers as effective as possible.

Mr. COLDWELL: Have the officials any opinion with regard to the common notion among the farmers that if the soil is wet and the spring is late, the cold tends to destroy the grasshoppers' eggs or larvae and therefore ends the pest? I ask that question because I have heard it stated as a matter of fact that in certain areas where there are many grasshopper eggs there was a good deal of rain, and the farmers feel that there is not much that requires to be done because nature will take care of the situation. I should like to have something on the record with regard to that opinion.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that those who have made a study of the problem are pretty well agreed that merely a wet or cold spell does not affect the grasshopper very much. A recurrence of cold spells and then warm spells, that is, rapid changes in weather over a period, does have some effect in reducing the numbers, but a cold wet spell in the spring will not alone affect them very much. The only safe thing to do is to wage battle against them with poison.

Mr. NEEDHAM: I realize that the problem of treating grasshoppers is largely a provincial matter, but in the past, as far as I know, there has been difficulty year after year in getting the bait. I was wondering whether this government is close enough in touch with the supplying of bait and whether it could help. To be short of bait in the early stages means a tremendous loss a few weeks afterwards. That is a serious matter in the part of the country I represent.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that all the information has been compiled as to how much poison will be required, what will be required for mixing and feeding it to the grasshoppers, and so on. This information is in the hands of the provincial governments. The task of finding funds to purchase what is required is upon the provinces. I do not know at what stage they are now in their arrangements to secure the necessary supplies in order to carry on the campaign.

Mr. QUELCH: To what extent has it been found that fall cultivation will reduce the menace? This has been advocated in the past but I have never been able to see much difference between a field that was cultivated and one that was not.

Mr. GARDINER: I am informed that fall cultivation has a tendency to reduce the grasshopper movement. The turning up of the soil and the exposing of eggs to the weather and all that kind of thing has a tendency to destroy some of them.

Mr. GRAYDON: What steps were taken by the department to check the army worm movement in Ontario during the past summer?

Mr. GARDINER: There is the same activity in connection with the army worm as there is in connection with grasshopper infestation. We give the same service, and the province or the county does the actual work.

Mr. HAYHURST: I notice there is an increase of $6,180 in this item. I should like to know how many more people are employed in the branch.

Mr. GARDINER: There are statutory increases for those employed, which probably accounts for a considerable part of the increase. I understand there has been practically no increase in staff.

Mr. COLDWELL: The importance of this problem should be thoroughly understood. Could the minister give us any information as to the cost last year of endeavouring to control the grasshopper pest, and the extent of the losses sustained by the farmers?

Mr. GARDINER: We have not complete records as to the particular fight with the grasshopper now being carried on by the provinces, but a similar fight occurred from 1919 to 1923. It cost $1,700,000, and it is estimated that it saved $80,000,000 worth of crop. This will give some idea of what the result would be if there was no battle carried on.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): As an eastern member of parliament it was my privilege to make my first visit to the west this past season. Although I have heard this matter discussed on many occasions, it was the first occasion I had of seeing the destruction which the grasshopper can do. For the first time I saw the tremendous destruction that had been wrought on the wheat crops throughout the west, especially around Regina and in certain other sections of Saskatchewan. This small insect cuts off the head of the wheat just where it buds out; the head falls to the ground, and as there is no way of harvesting it, it is a complete loss.

My observations of the farming operations in western Canada lead me to the conclusion that possibly our friends in the west are trying to cultivate too many acres. If they confined their activities to a smaller acreage they might be able to control the situation much better. From my conversations with farmers I was led to understand that if the poison was put out in time and properly placed, it was quite effective. I consider it is a very worthy work that is being done, but I think the surface has hardly been scratched, having regard to what might be done. We have had to face similar difficulties in the east in connection with the potato beetle. Our potatoes are prohibited from entering the English market because of that pest. However, this has been controlled to such an extent that they are no longer considered a menace. We spray for blight and include in the spray a small amount of poison which controls the beetle situation.

Perhaps I may be permitted to suggest to our friends in the west that there is enough wheat wasted on every farm—this applies especially to those with which I came in contact—to keep two or three families in the east. Many farmers in the west apparently have launched out on an elaborate farming operation. On many of the farms I visited I noticed a lot of discarded machinery which may have cost more than the whole farm was worth. I do not know how this situation can be remedied, but my first impression was that they were endeavouring to farm on too large a scale and were spending too much money in purchasing up to date machinery. They were wasting much of the crop that should have been harvested. Could the minister tell me how many are employed in the entomology branch at Fredericton?

Mr. GARDINER: From twelve to fifteen.

Mr. PERLEY: Not long ago the minister tabled his report for the year ended March 31, 1938. On page 85 reference is made to the grasshopper situation, and I should like to quote as follows:

> In Saskatchewan and Alberta the prospect is also for less damage than in 1937, although organized control campaign will be required in both provinces,—

That would indicate that it is not expected the damage will be as great in 1938 as it was in 1937. I appreciate that it is very difficult to make any real estimate, but are we to gather from what the minister has stated that the officials of his department believe the infestation will not be any greater this year than it was last year, or that it will cover a wider area?

Mr. GARDINER: A wider area, yes.

Mr. PERLEY: Of course, we appreciate the fact that the most effective method of control is poisoning in the early stage after hatching. From the experience we had in our district in August, 1936, I do not think there can be any effective control of an infestation if the attempt at control is left to too late a stage. It all depends on control after the hatching stage. I had an interesting chat with a crop reporter from the United States side, and he informed me, from an investigation he had made of the number of eggs laid in our district, that no matter what the climatic conditions might be in the spring of 1939, we were bound to have an infestation and a hatching that would be very serious if there was no control. It looks as if we were in for another infestation in the spring.

Mr. GARDINER: I can only say that I do not think it is possible to forecast exactly what will happen in connection with grasshoppers in any year, but the best information available is that which has been gathered by persons who have been making close studies of grasshoppers over many years. The areas are all mapped out and indicated, and anyone can get the maps and study them for himself and know pretty well what the infestation is in his particular area. In the area in which I farm, which is just north of where the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) farms, we had not experienced a grasshopper infestation since I have been in that area prior to last year. The grasshoppers were not hatched in that area; they flew in. They came in during the month of August and started in systematically to destroy the crop, and the thing that astonished me was that they did not work in the same way on any two kinds of crop. They cut the wheat off about eight inches below the head. They cut the stem about half-way through, and the stem fell over and finally broke and fell to the ground. They cut the barley four inches below the head. In the oat crop they took the little tendril that holds the oats, nipping this right off just a few inches below the head. The corn they attacked down near the root. They apparently had their own way of doing everything, and they did it systematically.

While my hon. friend may think you can poison them no matter how thick they are, it is very difficult to do much after a certain stage. I thought they had not got after the grasshoppers in the southern part of my riding as strenuously as they might have done. They had had so many crop failures that perhaps they thought it was not worth while. I went into Oxbow in the midst of the infestation and the gentleman I saw there was the druggist, who had all the poison he needed in his drug store to fight the grasshoppers, and he undertook to kill the grasshoppers in his garden. He said to me that the only green things left in his garden were the lilies in the middle of the little fish pond in his back yard. He took me around to show me how successful he had been, and you could not put your finger on the ground where there was not a dead grasshopper. The ground was literally covered with them, and there was not a blade of green anywhere. The potato tops were eaten off right down to the stem. Then he showed me the lilies, and the tops were covered with grasshoppers. It is an impossibility to get enough poison to kill them off later in the season once they have flown in, but you can control them by poison in the hatching season; in other words before they reach the flying stage. But if the infestation is really bad, it is impossible to kill them all and you have to try to control the movement of them, by spreading poisoned bait. That experience has been going on ever since people have settled in western Canada, and I would suggest that if we were cultivating less acreage we would have many more grasshoppers to eat up the less acreage.

Mr. COLDWELL: There is another popular notion that a certain parasite destroys the grasshopper, as is the case with parasites of other sorts in other countries, and it is suggested that parasites might be introduced in order to destroy the grasshoppers in western Canada. Is there anything substantial in that theory?

Mr. GARDINER: A parasite has been brought in from the Argentine which the department is working on in the hope that it will assist in reducing grasshopper infestations. This work as yet is in the experimental stage.

Mr. STIRLING: Is there any danger of introducing the Australian rabbit?

Mr. HAYHURST: Have there been any experiments in poisoning grasshoppers by airplanes?

Mr. GARDINER: A commercial firm in Lethbridge has tried that. Apparently the poison can be spread very well in this way. Our officers are keeping in touch with the developments.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Having lived in western Canada right in the centre of the infested area, I should like to commend the officers of the department for the work they have done in association with the provincial departments in endeavouring to help control the grasshoppers in western Canada. A good deal of information is put out every year with regard to the grasshoppers; in every post office and bank you will find maps showing the infested areas, and informing the farmer in the fall of the year what methods of cultivation to adopt to keep down the eggs or to kill the eggs then in the ground. It is not a hopeless proposition. Some of us think that because there is a wide infestation and a great many eggs laid in the ground for next year, it may mean a tremendous loss of crop.

The minister in answer to a question a moment or two ago said that wet or cold weather did not necessarily stop the hatching of the eggs, or kill the grasshopper. However, I think the hon. member for Wood Mountain will bear me out when I say that one part of his constituency last year had about ten inches of rainfall from the first of April to the first of July, and it is a fact that no grasshoppers hatched in that area, and no damage was done by grasshoppers where the rainfall was until they flew in there late in the season. Therefore, if we get in the infested area more than the normal rainfall, it is reasonable to expect that there will be little or no damage done by grasshoppers this year. Back in 1935 we had many grasshoppers in a great many areas, and the ground was badly infested, but we had a fairly heavy rainfall in the spring of the year, and if the crop can get along to a fairly good height before the grasshoppers hatch out, they cannot live in a dense crop when they are young, and they must get out or die. The result is that if the hatching is not too early, and the crop has got to the point where the field is pretty well covered, the infestation is not very dangerous.

The hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) spoke of the tremendous size of the farms in western Canada. As a western farmer when I look at some of the fields down here I sometimes wonder why a man bothers to try to turn his outfit around in the field. We have a different kind of farming altogether. I think the farmer from eastern Canada knows better than anyone else how to handle his business, and by the same token I believe the farmer from western Canada knows better than anyone else how to handle his, and is doing it in the most efficient manner that it can be done.

The hon. member also mentioned the amount of machinery used by the western farmer. We do not waste machinery in western Canada. We do not rust it out. We handle such a large acreage that we wear it out in very much less time than is the case in the east. After all, the average farmer in eastern Canada uses a binder on, we will say, 25 to 50 acres, whereas the average farmer in western Canada uses his binder on 150 to 250 acres. Therefore a binder which has been used in eastern Canada on the ordinary farm for about sixty years is equivalent to a binder which has been used in western Canada for seven or eight years, and one can easily see that it might be thought that there was waste where there is no waste.

I want to commend the officers of the department. I have heard criticism before in this chamber about the salaries which are paid to a number of men who are employed in different parts of Canada by the Department of Agriculture. We have some of the most efficient men in that department who could possibly be got in this or any other country. I believe that the scale of pay is, on the whole, a good deal lower than it might be. There is a country to the south of us which to my knowledge has offered on different occasions, to some of the scientists working in our Department of Agriculture, a good deal more money than they received from us; yet they are still holding their jobs here on lower salaries than they could get somewhere else. I do not like to hear criticisms of the scientific men in the Department of Agriculture. The strongest criticism I can make of parliament in relation to this department is that ordinarily we do not spend half enough money in trying to do more, through the department, for the farmers.

Item agreed to.

Experimental farms—

12. Experimental farms administration, $60,020.

Mr. HYNDMAN: I should like to draw attention to the wages paid to labourers at the central experimental farm. I brought this matter up last year and asked for an increase, and I want to thank the minister. I do not know whether he was instrumental in bringing it about, but they were granted an increase of two cents an hour.

In my opinion there is discrimination between the treatment of the labourers who work in the fields and the barns at the experimental farm in Ottawa, and the carpenters. The labourers are paid around thirty cents an hour, while the carpenters, plumbers, et cetera, get eighty-five cents an hour. Last year the minister claimed that the rate of wage paid to labourers who worked on the farms and in the buildings corresponded to the wages paid farm labourers out in the country. I do not think that that is a fair comparison, because most of the labourers are farmers' sons and they have to pay their board and lodging when they come in to the city. I feel that they should get the same wage as the other labourers. I understand that at the experimental farm there are about eleven divisions, and in each division there are fourteen labourers, who are paid around thirty cents an hour, about five or six men who are paid $105 a month, three or four lady clerks; and also there are about twelve other men whose salaries run up to $6,000 a year. I do not question the efficiency of the heads of these departments, nor am I asking for a reduction of their salaries. All I am asking is that we give a little increase to these farmers' sons who are working on the fields out there, and in the buildings during the winter.

Another thing I should like to bring to the attention of the minister is that there should be some form of retirement allowance for labourers who have worked at the farm for fifteen to twenty years. I have in mind one man out there who will be sixty-five years of age next November. He has been working at the farm as a labourer for the past twenty-eight years. He started at sixteen cents an hour, receiving an increase of one cent an hour up to a maximum of nineteen cents, and now he is getting thirty-two cents, or possibly for the past year he has been receiving thirty-eight cents. He will be laid off this November. He is a married man with a family and an invalid wife; how is he going to exist for the next five years until he gets an old age pension? There should be some retirement allowance. I believe that some years ago there was a retirement allowance for men such as he, and it seems too bad that after these labourers have put in long service at the farm there is no allowance for them when they reach the age of sixty-five and have to retire.

I ask the minister to consider these two things: first, a more equitable wage for the labourers at the farm—mind you, they are farmers' sons—second, the provision of some retirement allowance for men who have spent many years at the farm and are forced to retire.

Mr. GARDINER: As it is almost closing time I will reply in a few words. Last year we raised the pay about two cents an hour, which for the whole service amounted to somewhere in the neighbourhood of $50,000 for the class of labour which has been spoken of. There is a limit to what we can do in that direction without interfering with wages in the vicinity of where our farms are. To offer a much greater increase would probably interfere to some extent with the employment of labour on farms in the surrounding area. In a place like Ottawa, where our farms are close to the cities, we are governed largely by union wages for carpenters and others, which makes it necessary to pay a similar wage for work done at the farms.

[Mr. Hyndman.]

Mr. TUSTIN: There are a couple of questions I should like to ask.

The CHAIRMAN: It is eleven o'clock.

Item agreed to.

BUTTER IN STORAGE

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. What quantity of butter was put into cold storage in Montreal during the month of February, 1939?

2. What quantity of butter was put into cold storage in Montreal during the first two weeks of March, 1939?

Mr. EULER:

1. The quantity put into cold storage is unknown, but on February 1 and March 1 the stocks on hand in Montreal were as follows:

	Creamery butter lb.	Dairy butter lb.	Total lb.
February 1, 1939	9,354,444	17,515	9,371,959
March 1, 1939 ..	7,243,298	12,000	7,255,298

Deducting March 1 figures from those of February 1 there was a net "out-of-storage" movement during the month of February of:

Creamery butter lb.	Dairy butter lb.	Total lb.

2. The quantity put into cold storage is unknown, and as stocks are only reported as at the opening of business on the first day of each month, the storage movement for the month of March will not be known until April.

EUROPEAN SITUATION

STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER RESPECTING RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the developments of the past week render it desirable that I should make a brief statement on the international situation. Many of the factors are not yet clear. When I come to take up the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, I shall seek to go fully into many questions which the happenings of last year and in particular, of the past few months, have created for Canada as for other countries.

I have been taken to task for some guarded references I made at the beginning of the month to the European situation. I pointed out on the first instant that a critical situation was still existing in the world, and that at some moment we might be called upon to consider questions larger than any we had thus far discussed. It will be realized now that these apprehensions had some foundation; so, I believe, had the feeling that the outlook was improving, to which I referred a week later. It will be observed that in stating on March 7th that I believed relief had been experienced in the foreign offices of Europe, that the situation had somewhat cleared in the few previous days, I was careful to add that I still adhered to what I had said on the previous occasion as something which, all the circumstances considered, it was proper I should have given to hon. members.

I made no claim to any exclusive sources of information, or to any ability to forecast the future. The form and place of the latest disturbance was a surprise to me, and a surprise to many governments more nearly concerned, and more minutely informed. I am sure this house will always be desirous alike of facing unwelcome realities and of avoiding giving way to panic or propaganda. I have myself no desire either to ignore the serious shock the events of the past week have given to the world's hope of peace, or to exaggerate the imminence or extent of danger, as if the world were heading for Armageddon.

We have witnessed this past week the wanton and forcible occupation by Germany of the greater part of what remained of the Czecho-Slovak republic. Following this example, whether or not with Germany's approval, Hungary has occupied the remaining fragment, small, but racially and strategically important. After Munich, it was hoped that what remained of the Czecho-Slovak republic would be immune from aggression. That hope has not been realized. There are few countries which do not regret the fate which has now overtaken that gallant and vigorous small nation. They regret still more the evidence a great country has given that it does not consider itself bound by pledges freely exchanged a few short months before, and that it looks to force as the sole basis of relations with its neighbours, and apparently with the world. The occurrences of the week cannot find any defence, as may have appeared to be the case with some of the earlier manoeuvres, as reactions against excessive terms of the treaty of Versailles, or in the principles of self-determination and racial unity.

For the present at least, so far as we know, no country in all Europe is planning by counter force to reverse the result of force in Czecho-Slovakia. It is rather a question of weighing the results and considering what further moves may lie in the future. What is now needed is to take stock, as fully as may be possible, and to be ready for developments as they take actual shape out of the fog of conjectures; to prepare for all possible contingencies.

Mr. Chamberlain, in his frank and moving speech at Birmingham, asked, Was this the end of an old adventure, or the beginning of a new, the last attack on a small state, or the beginning of an attempt to dominate the world by force? He did not attempt to answer those questions, but declared they would require consideration not only by Germany's neighbours but by others even outside of Europe, and that the government of the United Kingdom would consider them in consultation with the members of the British commonwealth, France and various other powers.

So far as Canada is concerned, the government is ready at any time to take part in such consideration, to join in consultation with the United Kingdom and with such other countries as would be appropriate. I note that in speaking at Westminster to-day, Mr. Chamberlain told the House of Commons that Great Britain "requires to give full consideration" to the tense European situation in conjunction with other powers, "before any statement can be made." This wholly conforms with the statement made by Mr. Chamberlain at Birmingham on Friday last when he said:

I am not prepared to commit this country by new and unspecified commitments operating under conditions which cannot now be foreseen.

The first necessity for Canada, as well as for Great Britain, is to sift rumour from fact, to examine whether there is a probability of further drives, and if so in what direction, and in what form.

It is essential to clarify the actual issue that may arise. It is important to know what country or countries may be concerned, and whether it is a case of agitation and propaganda, or of economic pressure, or of military force. It is equally important to know exactly what policies are being suggested to meet the situation, and what measure of support and feasibility those policies are likely to receive. With this knowledge the Canadian government will have little difficulty in proposing to this parliament any action which it believes should be taken in the contingency anticipated.

If there were a prospect of an aggressor launching an attack on Britain, with bombers raining death on London, I have no doubt what the decision of the Canadian people and parliament would be. We would regard it as an act of aggression, menacing freedom in all parts of the British commonwealth. If it were a case, on the other hand, of a dispute over trade or prestige in some far corner of the world, that would raise quite different considerations.

Canada at all times has been prepared to consult, as occasion might arise, with other freedom loving countries as to the most effective means of cooperation against aggression. The form of such cooperation and the contingency in which it may arise, are questions which this government will examine, in consultation with other governments. It will report its findings and any proposals that may result to this parliament, which has the sole and responsible authority to speak for Canada in such grave issues. I still believe in parliament as the most important of our national institutions; and in the supremacy of parliament, especially where the issue is one of peace or war. I may add that, as would be expected in the circumstances, no statement of the policy the United Kingdom government has in mind has yet been received, from London.

In spite of the shock to the world's confidence, there is no reason to despair of peace, or to cease working for peace. The world has come to be able to stand shocks, to make readjustments which a few years ago would have made open conflict inevitable.

The peoples of the different countries of the world do not want war. No government of any democratic country has any thought or intent of making war. No government of any totalitarian country can hope for passive acquiescence in acts of international lawlessness, as they come to effect a wider range of powers, nor can they anticipate victory over the limitless moral and material resources that would be arrayed against them. It is a time for preparedness, but equally for furthering to the utmost, conciliation and cooperative effort among all peoples.

I think I may say with no less sincerity than Mr. Chamberlain that there is scarcely anything I would not sacrifice for peace, but, like Mr. Chamberlain, there is one thing I must except, and that is the liberty which we enjoy and which we will never surrender. I believe this is the feeling of every Canadian who loves his country and cherishes its liberties. Acts of aggression and attempts at world domination by force are just as hateful to the people of Canada as they are to the peoples of the United Kingdom, the United States, France and all other peace loving and freedom loving democracies.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister one or two questions. May I add that I have no wish to embarrass him or the government in any way. However there was a statement in the Toronto Star which has been brought to my attention. This statement appeared on the front page of Saturday's edition:

Shortly after the instructions were sent to Sir Nevile—

I presume it refers to the British Ambassador in Germany.

—all the high commissioners of the British dominions in London were requested to call at 10 Downing street, following an extraordinary cabinet meeting, called for to-night.

This is the sentence which I would direct to the attention of the Prime Minister:

The commissioners for South Africa, Australia, New Zealand and Eire visited the dominions office.

Canada is not mentioned. I presume it is a misprint, but I should like to have the right hon. gentleman straighten it out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I saw the same news item, but I have not had any communication from the high commissioner intimating that he had been asked to attend any meeting, nor have I had any communication from him as to his having been personally at any meeting.

Mr. MANION: The Prime Minister cannot answer that, then. The other question is this—and may I say in passing that the Prime Minister made reference to what I have in mind. The following words appear in the press of Saturday, March 18, and are attributed to Mr. Chamberlain at Birmingham:

> We ourselves will naturally turn first to our partners in the British commonwealth of nations and to France to whom we are so closely bound, and I have no doubt that others, too, knowing that we are not disinterested in what goes on in southeastern Europe will wish to have our counsel and advice.

The Prime Minister did mention that statement, in a general way, but he did not attempt to quote it exactly. Have there been consultations such as are referred to in that statement?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There have been thus far no consultations such as are referred to in the statement which my hon. friend has read.

Mr. MANION: I do not know whether or not on the orders of the day I am permitted to say anything or to make anything in the way of a statement. I have no desire to do anything but help—and I say that as sincerely as I have said anything in my life. I shall, however, attempt to say a few words—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: On a point of order, if I may call it such: I have no desire to prevent the leader of the opposition from speaking, but I think I must insist that in this regard he cannot speak for all opposition groups in the house.

Mr. STEWART: He did not say so.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, nobody says so. I have no desire personally or on behalf of my group to embarrass the members of the government, but I do not think it is proper at this time for us to enter into a discussion of the European situation. However, I would urge that the Prime Minister should provide an early opportunity for the house to express itself with regard to the position of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say that I agree with the hon. member who has just spoken when he says that this should not be made the occasion for a general discussion or debate on this question. If the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) feels that he would like to make a statement to the house, not for the purpose of beginning a debate but simply to place himself on record in regard to an all important matter, may I say I think the custom has been to allow latitude of that kind to a leader of the opposition. I am sure the house would wish to allow it to him at this time. I would go a step further and say that if my hon. friend who is leading a group, or any other leader of a group, would like to make a statement at this moment, he should feel perfectly at liberty to do so. But I think it ought to be understood in each case that it is simply a statement which is being placed before the house and not something intended to provoke discussion.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, may I make it very clear to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that I have never yet attempted to speak for his party, and I do not expect I ever shall do so. I know he is quite capable of speaking for them himself. I was not intending to speak for anyone but the National Conservative party, of which I have the honour to be the head.

I listened with very great interest to the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I do not intend to discuss it in any way. I know the great difficulties of government in times like these, and it is certainly far from any thought in my mind to add in any way to those difficulties. Therefore, I shall offer no criticism and no jarring note of any kind. If there is anything that I think those in all sections of the house and in all sections of this country should remember, it is that in a time like this we should be a united people, that we should do everything we can to hold this nation together. I have never been able to see what good would be done to the empire if this country were split down the middle and divided again into the various parts that existed before confederation. I certainly believe in being tolerant of everyone's opinion, whether or not it agrees with my own.

I consider this whole question as being too serious for political manoeuvring of any kind. It should be above and beyond anything in the way of playing politics, anything in the way of attempting to gain some petty political advantage or anything of that sort. In every statement I have made I have endeavoured to show that I want to be as helpful as I can.

It seems to me that even more is at stake to-day than was at stake in September last. At that time only a fringe of Czecho-Slovakia, the Sudetenland, was at stake. To-day it strikes me that all the personal liberties and parliamentary institutions of democracy are at stake. In a sense, it is democracy and Christianity against Hitler's totalitarianism. That is the way it strikes me, at any rate. On numerous occasions Hitler has shown his antagonism to Christianity. I was startled to read yesterday that the Protestant leader Niemöller was still in a concentration camp. I thought he had been let out some time ago. He has been in that camp for nearly two years. Both Catholics and Protestants have been attacked by Hitler. Therefore, I look upon this whole question as being something very much above ordinary affairs. All our liberties are at stake, and I repeat that so far as I am concerned I am ready to help in every possible way. I will do nothing to muddy the waters and confuse the issues, or to hinder the actions of the government.

I agree with the Prime Minister that the whole world has been shocked at what has taken place. I would use much stronger language than he. Perhaps I am prone to use much stronger language than the Prime Minister. I say that this attack of Hitler's on Czecho-Slovakia, this taking over of Czecho-Slovakia, was unprovoked, unlawful and brutal. As Mr. Chamberlain pointed out, it was a violation of Hitler's word and agreement. No doubt all hon. members have read of how the secret police have taken over in this little freedom-loving country. Until recently Czecho-Slovakia had as its head one of the most outstanding statesmen of Europe, Doctor Beneš. I had the honour of meeting him and knowing him fairly well at the meetings of the League of Nations, where the representatives of Great Britain, France and many other prominent countries used to consult with him on vital questions. This country, which had been governed by one of the most broadminded, statesmanlike gentlemen, has been overrun with secret police. The people are being told they must not stay out after nine o'clock at night and that they must have nothing in the way of assembly. I was shocked, and the peoples of all freedom-loving countries of the world must have been shocked at such news as that.

I turn now to Mr. Chamberlain's language. I should like to refer briefly to what he said at Birmingham. It must be remembered that when Mr. Chamberlain uses strong language it is really much stronger than when the same language is used by the ordinary citizen. Mr. Chamberlain has always been known for his moderation, his toleration and his gentle humility. The Prime Minister probably knows him very well, and some of us on this side came to know him intimately when he was over here at the empire conference of 1932. I have put it on record publicly that I consider him the outstanding British representative at the conference, and the most gentle and considerate of men. The fact that he used the language he did at Birmingham shows how he was shocked at this brutal and barbarous attack of Hitler upon Czecho-Slovakia. Mr. Chamberlain asked what reliance could be put upon the word of Hitler. I am putting this in my own language. He said that Czecho-Slovakia had been wantonly attacked. That word "wanton" is very strong language. He said that Germany would bitterly regret the attitude which her leader had taken. This is the language of a man who, with the possible exception of the former Pope, has been the greatest peacemaker in the world. Pope Pius XI was noted as one of the greatest peacemakers the world has ever had. Mr. Chamberlain is a man who hates war from the bottom of his soul, as he has publicly stated over and over again. He is a man who believes above all in the council table in preference to the battlefield. He believes in the Kellogg-Briand pact; in the settling of international disputes by conciliation rather than by war. This is the man who humbled himself by going to Berchtesgaden, to Godesberg and to Munich, and when he used such strong language he must have been outraged to a terrific extent. I did not hear him over the radio, but I am told by those who did that his language was more severe than would appear from the press reports.

These conquerors moved into Czecho-Slovakia, a freedom-loving country in the truest sense of the word. We see the Jews who have been living peacefully in that country immediately persecuted. Such action is shocking to all of us. It is shocking to the whole world to see Jews or any other people maltreated in this way.

Mr. Sumner Welles, with the approval of President Roosevelt, has referred to this display of wanton force. His language is even stronger than that used by Mr. Chamberlain. Mr. Welles referred to "acts of wanton lawlessness and arbitrary force." He also used the language "threatening world peace and the very structure of modern civilization." We ask ourselves, in view of that strong language, what must we expect next from this madman? To my mind this man is very close to a madman. He is at least acting like one, and no one knows what we may expect next, least of all Hitler himself. He has a passion for world domination. He is mad with the lust for conquest, and he is aiming at absolute world domination.

Now, sir, this is what I am going to suggest without taking up much more of the time of the house: I think that this above all times is the time when all Canadians should stand unitedly together and should make it clear that all democratic countries stand in a solid front against the international criminality—because that is what it is—that Hitler is attempting to impose upon the world. He broke the terms of the treaty of Versailles. He fortified the Rhineland. He marched into Austria and took possession of it. He took over the Sudeten territory of Czecho-Slovakia practically by force, and now without any justification he takes over the whole of Czecho-Slovakia. I say it is time for the democracies of the world, for the United Kingdom and the dominions, France, the United States, the smaller free nations, and all others throughout the world who want to stop this mad ambition of Hitler's, to stand together and make it clear that they are standing together, morally at any rate.

I am not talking war, but it seems to me that the only way we can stop war is to show that there is a solid front amongst all the democratic, civilized, Christian peoples of the world against the attempts of this man to dominate the whole world.

There are people who say that war is inevitable, and I have had that said to me by outstanding people, but I do not believe that war is ever inevitable. As Earl Baldwin said at the time of the September crisis, if there is only a five per cent chance in favour of peace, I am in favour of peace. I believe in the democratic peoples of the world presenting a united front, not only the ones I have named but others who wish to join to bring this man Hitler to his senses. Such a solid front might possibly halt his mad career—might act as a "Stop; look, and listen" sign to him.

May I make it clear to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house and country that I am a strong peace lover. I am just as much in favour of peace as Mr. Chamberlain, or the Prime Minister or any other member of this house could possibly be. I am a peace lover from the bottom of my soul. I did have the opportunity to see, if I may be forgiven for mentioning it, the cruelties and horrors of war at first hand. I saw strong, young, healthy men turned through shell shock into nervous wrecks, crying for help; I saw mutilations and blindness; and we all know that sixty thousand of our best young Canadians lie in Europe. We all know the failure of the great war into which the world was plunged by the man who preceded Hitler in Germany, the kaiser, who was not as dangerous a man as Hitler. And yet to-day because of dictatorships, particularly the German dictatorship, armaments are greater than ever before. We know what war involves, and those of us who happen to have served are the most antagonistic to war. I think there is no body of people in all Canada so antagonistic to war as the four or five hundred thousand returned men in this country. They are the strongest of all for peace. We saw that the last war, which was to make the world safe for democracy, did not do so. Democracy is in a more precarious position to-day than it has ever been. The war to end war, as it was supposed to have been, failed to end war. Our ideals have been shattered.

On top of all that knowledge, I have three boys of my own. I am a father who loves his children and does not want to see them used for cannon fodder. I sympathize with all fathers and mothers, and so I say that I have every reason in the world to hate war from the bottom of my soul. But we must remember the self-preservation, not only of our own country, but of all democratic nations. The whole aim of my remarks to-day is not to say what we must do in war; my aim is to prevent war if at all possible, and I say that all the democracies of the world, all the peace loving nations, should stand together at this time in a stern moral protest against this man Hitler and his attempt to dominate the world. We must show a united front, and show it frankly and courageously, and if we all do that there will probably be no war. That, sir, is the prayer of us all.

As leader of the National Conservative party I offer now to join loyally and wholeheartedly with the government in making it clear to all the world that a united Canadian people—with one mind and one heart—is determined, come what may, to preserve its liberties and its nationhood. And may God assist us in our efforts!

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have no prepared statement. As I said a few moments ago, it does not seem to me perhaps quite proper that we should delay at any length now to deal with the entire European situation.

I would say, however, dealing with what was said by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), that if we had been morally united the world would not have been in the fix in which it finds itself to-day. We cannot look back to the treaty of Versailles, —the treaty of the victors—and to the history of the past fifteen years without realizing that there has been a series of blunders. We did not take seriously the principles underlying the League of Nations.

I would say that at this critical time we should utilize as far as may be the existing machinery of collective peace action. There is an enormous power in the united peace action of the leading nations of the world. Although we have heard it said that the league is practically defunct, there is yet sufficient vitality in the league, if we rally around it, to do something before it is too late. Also, although the United States is outside the league, their people are very much the same as ours in sentiment, and every effort should be made to establish the very closest cooperation with the United States.

At this time I would offer three simple practical suggestions as to what we in Canada might do. First of all, it is high time that there should be an immediate prohibition of the export of war materials to Germany. That is something practical. It is something that might interfere with the profits of some of our Canadians; in my judgment we should have done it long ago, but I urge upon the government, since it has not been done in the past, that we at once prohibit the export of war materials to Germany and to any other aggressor nation.

An hon. MEMBER: Japan.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, I include Japan. Again it seems to me that we might well consider following the action of the United States and impose a super-tax on goods from Germany or any other aggressor nation. I shall not discuss these suggestions to-day, but I pass them on to the government for consideration. We cannot hope to escape trouble in this country simply because we are far removed from the scene of action. We cannot allow profiteering or profit-making in this country while others are suffering. We must assume our share of the burden, and we can do it on those lines.

There is one other suggestion. Since I came into the house there has been handed to me—in fact only five minutes ago—a copy of the telegram which Senator Cairine R. Wilson sent from Toronto to the Prime Minister, urging that we should take a certain share of responsibility for the refugees from some of these distressed countries. This is not a matter of immigration; I might be inclined to oppose additional immigrants coming to this country at this time. But I think we have not been willing as a nation to assume sufficient responsibility for the disasters that have come upon other parts of the world. We are still in a happy position here in Canada, notwithstanding all our difficulties; the least Canadians can do is to share some of the burdens that are being borne by other nations in the care of refugees. I hope that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) may find it possible in the very near future to make a statement of the decision of the government on this matter.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I have no prepared speech at all, but perhaps a few words are in order. Certain it is that this is the time for unity; for unity politically, racially and socially. This ought to be a time not only for talking about unity but for seeking out and adopting and applying such policies as will remove the causes of disunity. I long for peace; I believe that war results from ignorance and the application of mistaken policies. Both ignorance and false policies can be removed. It is our solemn duty at this hour of great peril, first, to stand together within our own country; second, to take counsel earnestly with our neighbours; finally to seek out, discover and remove the mistaken policies and the ignorance which are driving us blindly towards war.

SUGGESTED MEETING OF LEAGUE OF NATIONS ASSEMBLY TO FORMULATE GENERAL POLICY FOR PEACE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question bearing to some extent on the statement which has just been made. I shall put it now, and perhaps it can be answered later. In view of the international situation and reported suggestion for a conference of certain democratic powers, will the government consider the advisability of proposing a meeting of the League of Nations assembly with a view to formulating a joint policy for peace and with a view to seeking cooperation with the United States for such a policy?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I shall convey the question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and he will deal with it.

WAYS AND MEANS

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On schedule 1:

Customs tariff—101. Oranges, n.o.p.:
January to July, inclusive, free.
August to December, inclusive, 35 cents per cubic foot.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I heard with great interest the remarks made the other night by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross). While I cannot go all the way with him in his pronounced views with regard to free trade, I appreciated greatly the case he outlined. While I do not believe in high tariff, I have had occasion too often to advocate in this house protection for some industry or interest in my district to take an attitude entirely against it. I prefer to deal with each case as it arises.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw was able to make out a strong case for free trade as against protection owing to the surrounding circumstances in connection with the matter to which he was alluding. In one respect the case is even worse than he represented it to be. On page 2015 of Hansard he said, speaking of the repeal of the duty on Japanese oranges:

> Although the dictionary said that a Japanese orange was an orange, although the trade always called the Japanese orange an orange, an order in council was passed at that time, saying that a loose-skinned mandarin or tangerine was not an orange and therefore could enter Canada free. But other oranges, the same tangerines and mandarins from the United States, were still subject to the same duty of 35 cents per cubic foot.

The hon. member has fallen into the same error that I did. I fully thought that those were the circumstances, that the duty was put on against oranges. Then it was discovered by a strained construction of the meaning of the word "oranges" that a tangerine was, botanically speaking, not an orange, and therefore was not liable to the duty. If that had been the case the matter would have been adjusted by a mere ruling of the Minister of National Revenue. But it was not done in that way. It was done by order in council, P.C. 2980, which I shall read, as it is only a few lines:

> At the Government House at Ottawa
> Monday, the 30th day of November, 1931.
> Present:
> His Excellency the Governor General in Council:
> His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of National Revenue and under the powers granted by section 11 of the customs tariff to make such reductions of duties on goods imported into Canada from any other country or countries as may be deemed reasonable by way of compensation for reductions on Canadian products granted by any such country or countries, and under any other power thereunto enabling, is pleased to order and it is hereby ordered that mandarins and tangerines, when grown in Japan and imported into Canada direct from that country, be admitted free of customs duty.
> sgd. "E. J. Lemaire,"
> Clerk of the Privy Council.

So the house will see that they were allowed to come in not because it was held that they were not oranges, in which case the exemption would have applied also to tangerines and mandarins of all countries; but it was confined entirely to tangerines and mandarins when grown in Japan. The order in council says that it was done under a section of the Customs Act which allows a reduction of duty when a similar reduction is made by another country. There was no similar reduction made in this instance, and therefore it was done under the words cited, "and under any other power thereunto enabling;" for it is on record that there was no reduction made by Japan in that regard or in any other regard calling for compensating action on our part. Therefore we were put in the unique position that we had pledged ourselves to give free entry and preference to oranges from the British empire, particularly Africa and Australia, and for that reason we put a duty against all foreign oranges, of which we imported large numbers. That was in May, 1931, and in November of the same year, before the duty had any effect on importations from Japan, the government of that day passed an order in council providing that if the tangerines were grown in Japan, and in Japan only, they would come in free of duty. I think the circumstances call for an explanation from somebody as to why that took place. The result was that we continued to buy our oranges from California and Japan principally, and we either paid a higher price or got an inferior orange. People who could not afford to buy oranges above a certain grade took an inferior grade.

I had some communication with an official recently about the matter. I shall not give his name because it might be supposed that I am criticising him, and I am not. He is a man of great ability, of the greatest courtesy, and went to no end of trouble to give me the information I wanted. Here is a phrase he used in connection with this matter which struck me, to use the vernacular, right in the eye. Speaking of putting Japan and Australia on the same basis in this matter, he writes:

Undoubtedly cancellation of the order in council would be resented by the Japanese government, a fact which would have to be given consideration by the government of Canada.

Surely we have not come to the situation in this day and generation that we cannot put on a small duty or a large one against the products of another country without its being resented by that country. But if that is so, it is time we knew where we are heading for.

When the Minister of Finance presents his budget, so to speak, the Canadian tariff, and is making adjustments, as I suppose he will, I hope that he will take occasion to adjust the matter I have referred to which was dealt with by order in council and impose a duty on mandarins and tangerines of Japanese origin as is done on mandarins and tangerines from any other country in the world.

Mr. RICKARD: Under the new agreement the date of application of the duty on oranges has been changed to the first of December, as compared with the first of January under the old agreement. If any change is to be made it should be the other way. The duty on oranges should extend over a longer period than it does at the present time. As an apple grower I feel that taking the duty off oranges would be detrimental to the apple growers and apple shippers of this country. We heard a good deal on Friday from the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) about the advantage of having cheap oranges in this country, but I have a letter here from an apple shipper and an apple grower in which he says:

You are quite moderate in your remarks about the competition of oranges. Your own Spy apples will give you an example. Mine is worse. In December I sent a car of choice Baldwins to the terminal market in Montreal and it arrived the week before Christmas, when forty-one carloads of oranges came in from the United States. Apples at once took a giant tumble and I lost over $1.50 a barrel over preceding prices. You will agree that that is a big tax to pay against my production. While I was there, a New York firm telegraphed the agents offering to send in other carloads of oranges at $1.88 a box f.o.b. Montreal.

I took the trouble to call up a fruit distributing house in Ottawa before I came down to the house and he tells me that 288 oranges to a case is the popular-sized orange. That costs the wholesaler $2.50 a case, which is less than one cent apiece. I contend that no apple grower in Ontario or British Columbia or anywhere else in this country can grow apples and compete with oranges sold at less than one cent apiece. I also contend that as far as the consumer is concerned, that is not a reasonable price. Even if the consumer were paying two cents apiece it would still be a cheap article of food. There is really no comparison at all between an orange and an apple. While some say there are more vitamins in an orange, some say there are more salts. I should like to see the time extended to January 1 instead of December 1. If you turn the page you will see that this is permissible. It would not at all satisfy me—for as an apple grower I contend it should be March 1 before oranges come into this country free,—but if nothing can be done about that we have to accept the agreements as they are. I believe I voice the sentiments of the apple growers of Ontario when I say they are certainly not satisfied with this. I hope the government will try to do something which will give the apple growers of Canada a fair deal.

Mr. CLEAVER: The right has been reserved on behalf of Canada to change the date under this item, and to substitute the following: "oranges, n.o.p., January to July inclusive, free." On behalf of the apple growers of my constituency I ask that pursuant to that reservation the date be changed as soon as possible.

Then there is another matter which I have been requested to bring to the attention of the committee. Oranges of inferior quality are now being brought into Canada, not in packages but simply in bulk, and offered for sale as loss leaders by chain stores at prices as low as eleven cents a dozen. This is unfair competition with our own apples, and should be regulated. All our fruits and vegetables must be properly graded and must carry an inspector's certificate before we are permitted to export them; I suggest that the same practice be required in regard to the importation of United States fruits and vegetables into Canada.

Another practice which is very detrimental to our trade is, as I am reliably informed, that truckers make a practice of purchasing left-over and surplus fruits and vegetables in New York, Buffalo, Detroit and Seattle markets at ridiculously low prices and dumping them on our market, often in such a wilted and stale condition as to render them practically unfit for consumption.

I should like to refer also to the question of processed fruit and vegetables receiving empire preference. I urge that this matter be cleaned up immediately. When we received this preference from the motherland it was never the intention that it should be used by our processors to permit them to place United States fruit and vegetables on the British market as empire products.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not like to interrupt the hon. member, but as far as I can gather, the remarks he is now making have no bearing on oranges, the item under discussion. If we start a general discussion we shall never get on with the business.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The point raised by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) is in my opinion well taken. I would ask the hon. member to confine himself to the item now before the committee.

Mr. CLEAVER: I quite agree, and I shall observe your ruling, but I thought it would save time if while I was speaking I covered that little point as well, which I have done.

Figures have been put on record as to the amount of imports into Canada of the different items discussed. I think it would be useful to hon. members if these figures could be gathered together in one summary and placed on the record in that form. I have in my hand a summary prepared by the bureau of statistics of all fruit and vegetable imports into Canada for the year 1932 to 1938. It will take some time to read it—

Mr. MacNICOL: Then the hon. member had better read it.

Mr. CLEAVER: I should like to have permission of the committee to put it on the record without reading it.

The CHAIRMAN: Only with the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. DUNNING: Do I understand it deals with all imports, or oranges only? I have the information with respect to oranges, and I have endeavoured to answer with respect to each item, as hon. members requested, in order to facilitate their understanding of the items. But personally I have no objection to the hon. member placing anything on Hansard.

Mr. CLEAVER: I thank the minister for his explanation; I have followed what took place in the committee on Friday, although unfortunately I had to be absent. The statement to which I refer is a summary of all the figures in concise form, prepared by the bureau of statistics. I ask leave of the committee to put it on the record without reading it.

Mr. MacINNIS: If a summary of this kind is to be put on the record I think it should be put on by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) so that we may know that it is in accord with the agreement. I have no objection to the summary; I think it would be useful, but it should be put on by the person best qualified to do so.

Mr. DUNNING: It is only a question of what best meets the convenience of the committee. Obviously if a summary be put on the record to-day and the discussion on some of these items goes on to another day, hon. members who desire information statistical in relation to an article under discussion towards the end of the week will be asking me where to find it in Hansard. That is why I have given the specific information with respect to each item as it was discussed.

Mr. CLEAVER: Do I understand I have permission?

The CHAIRMAN: Only with the unanimous consent of the committee. Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. CLEAVER: Then I understand I can read it?

The CHAIRMAN: Certainly.

Mr. CLEAVER:

Dominion Bureau of Statistics. External trade branch. Canada's imports and exports of fruit and vegetables. Calendar years 1932 to 1938:

Fresh fruit imports

1933	10,379,892

The CHAIRMAN: I am of the opinion that the figures that the hon. member is reading have nothing to do with the item under discussion, which is item No. 101, oranges.

Mr. CLEAVER: May I make a submission in regard to your ruling, Mr. Chairman? It is this: that any one item may have a direct bearing on the industry, and with deference I submit that when discussing oranges I have the right to discuss apples, because apples are competitive—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have given my ruling and I would ask the hon. member to abide by it.

Mr. CLEAVER: I ask a moment to explain. I do not want to have to appeal from your ruling, but I submit I am entitled to put this on the record. You listened to the hon. member who preceded me discuss apples and why this practice in regard to oranges is detrimental to the apple growers. It has a direct bearing. If there is any general item called to my attention under which I can more correctly discuss this general aspect, I shall be pleased to do it then.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps I may suggest a means by which the hon. member may make his statement and still be in order. In committee of the whole house on the bill, or at any time when the schedule itself as a whole is being submitted to the house, general statements will be in order. Personally I think the chairman's ruling is correct; when we are talking about oranges, it is oranges. We dealt with apples the other day. If we were to mix the whole matter up again the discussion would be endless. There is an opportunity for statements of the kind which the hon. member wishes to make.

Mr. CLEAVER: I thank the minister for the suggestion. I will seek an opportunity at the right time.

Mr. COLDWELL: I come from a part of the country in which we grow neither apples nor oranges. I wish to support the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) in the analysis of this item which he made the other evening. I can see no justification for taxing a fruit which some people say is in competition with certain other fruits grown in this country, but which competition I find it difficult to understand, inasmuch as the two kinds of fruit serve entirely different purposes. For numerous children it is difficult to-day to get fresh fruit, particularly oranges, and it is altogether improper that we should place a barrier against a fruit which we cannot under any circumstances grow in Canada. I have always been under the impression that a tariff is for one of two purposes, either for revenue or for protection. If this tariff were for revenue purposes, it would be in effect all the year round. I can only conclude that since it is imposed for part of the year only, it is a sort of protective tariff.

Mr. DUNNING: Entirely wrong.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister says I am entirely wrong. Well, he will have an opportunity to correct me. At any rate I submit that oranges constitute a valuable part of the daily diet, particularly for very young people. In our part of the country our children find it exceedingly difficult to get oranges at any time, and the figures produced the other evening by the hon. member for Moose Jaw did, in my opinion, prove conclusively that there is a relation between the duty and the higher price during the season when the duty is charged. I should like to see the length of time during which the duty is imposed reduced to the minimum, even down to a single day. I support the argument of the hon. member for Moose Jaw.

Mr. MAYBANK: I support the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and similar statements made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross). In my opinion, the sooner we take the tariff completely off commodities such as oranges the better, and for the very good reason that, according to practically all health authorities now, oranges are virtually a necessity. The consumption of oranges and orange juice appears to be a necessity in the raising of children. The hon. member for Durham (Mr. Rickard) has remarked that oranges are no better than apples. That may be so. I have noticed that most of the medical men seem to favour this reduction of duty. Perhaps they bear in mind the apple a day that keeps the doctor away, and that is why they are anxious to support the item as it stands. The hon. member for Durham has that much support. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that when he is bringing down his budget he go a step further and wipe out entirely the duty on oranges. A counter-suggestion is made by someone in this corner. It might appeal to the hon. member for Durham. That suggestion is that the duty on oranges be raised very high, making them practically prohibitive. Then the supply of apples will not be sufficient for the needs of people and we can force them to use turnips and thereafter put a tariff on turnips.

Mr. SLAGHT: I wish to support the position taken by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and the hon. member who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Maybank). In the district of Parry Sound, which I represent, we have in relation to the adult population, as our school statistics show, perhaps the greatest population of children of any district in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Five at a time.

Mr. SLAGHT: I am reminded that we have five of the most important children of Canada in Callander, and in our district, without any intention of treating the matter lightly, oranges throughout the summer season, when we entertain so many tourists from all parts of the world, are a staple product on the table. Although we have full sympathy with the apple growers, any measures which tend to increase the price of oranges, and prevent people from securing them at as low as eleven cents a dozen, if that be possible, I desire to oppose on behalf of my district.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I intend to stay with the item on oranges. The hon. member for Durham suggested that I might be an orange grower because I made the remarks I did the other night. Sometimes it falls to the younger members of a family to look after the interests of some of the older ones, and that is my case. Since 1932, subsequent to my father's death, it has fallen to my lot to look after the interests of some of the older members of his family, and therefore I have had to superintend the handling of some citrus groves in California. I am not getting any interest from it, myself, but I do not think it is a bad thing to have someone in this house who has a little practical knowledge when an item of this kind comes up.

On Friday evening I was contradicted by several members on the opposite side. The first contradiction was from the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), who declared that I was wrong when I said that the protection on empire oranges meant at least an added cost of $12 a box to the Canadian consumer of British empire oranges that came into Canada. When this item was put in the British empire agreement it was not put there for the purpose of revenue. Had it been put there for that purpose it would have been imposed on all oranges from empire as well as non-empire countries; and the excise tax of three per cent, the so-called import tax, which was an additional tariff of three per cent, was charged against non-empire countries but not against empire countries. I want to point out how it comes about that the added cost was at least $12 on every box coming from the British empire. In the United States I said, oranges were sold to Canadians and Americans in the same way, with the tariff added when the oranges were sold in Canada. In that country oranges are sold at auction to the highest bidder; therefore when a Canadian goes to buy oranges, he buys a carload at the auction and must then pay the tariff in order to bring them into Canada. That is the regular procedure; there is no other way of buying them. Therefore the additional amount of money collected through the tariff on oranges coming from non-empire sources can be rightly charged as a protection to British empire orange growers.

The other evening some people may have thought I was exaggerating when I gave the figure of $12 per box, in regard to 1935. Now I want to give the figures for 1938 on the same basis. On March 6 a return was brought down in this house to a question asked by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young), concerning the number of boxes of oranges imported into Canada each month during the calendar year 1938 from United States and from British empire countries, specifying the country of origin. I have gone carefully through that return. The duty is applied during the months of June, July, August, September, October, November and December, and if my memory serves me aright in 1938, due to a short orange crop in the United States, the non-duty period was extended for a short time, taking in part of May.

The figures are as follows: During the month of May, 1938, there were 907 boxes of oranges imported into Canada from the British empire, duty free. There were 269,375 boxes imported from non-empire countries, on which the duty and excise amounted to $56,506, or an average of $62 per case in additional price on the oranges coming from the British empire to the Canadian consumer.

An hon. MEMBER: How much?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It amounts to $62 per case. In June of 1938 there were 22 cases of oranges brought into Canada from the British empire. In the same month 270,398 cases were imported from the United States and other non-empire countries.

Mr. THOMPSON: Did the hon. member say $62 on a case of oranges?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON: These oranges that come in here are bought for three or four dollars a case.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Of course; and then we paid $62 in addition in order to get them here.

Mr. THOMPSON: That is $62 for an article that sells for $3 or $4?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Yes, and that comes about in this way: If there is a duty of 35 cents per cubic foot on all oranges from non-empire countries, in order to protect empire oranges, then surely that added cost to the Canadian people is the cost of bringing in the number of oranges imported from the British empire.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nonsense.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): My figures are correct; you cannot say anything else. In May the additional cost was $56,506, with 907 cases coming from the British empire. Figure it out for yourself; the additional cost for every case of oranges coming from the British empire was $62. In June of the same year 22 cases of oranges were brought in from the British empire and 270,398 cases from the United States. The total tariff and excise charged the Canadian people in that month was $208,227, or an average of $9,465 per case.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): My hon. friends do not like this. In July of last year 220 boxes came from the British empire and 225,061 boxes from other countries, with $174,315 paid in tariff and excise, or $792 per box of fruit coming from the British empire.

Mr. HEAPS: How much does an orange cost?

Mr. HOMUTH: Would the hon. member also work that out in regard to wheat?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): In August, 1938, there were 305 cases of British empire oranges and 204,474 cases of non-empire oranges imported into Canada. Tariff and excise taxes amounted to $159,487, or an average protection of $522 a case.

In September, empire oranges imported amounted to 105 cases and non-empire imported numbered 150,420 cases. Total tariff and excise amounted to $118,354, or an average protection of $1,127 a case.

Mr. MacNICOL: Who paid that?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The consumer. In October, empire oranges imported amounted to 454 cases, and non-empire imported numbered 169,342 cases. The total tariff and excise amounted to $131,521, or an average protection of $289 a case.

In November, we imported 8,511 cases of empire oranges, these coming mainly from Trinidad and Jamaica, and 190,074 cases of non-empire oranges. Total tariff and excise amounted to $131,286, or an average of $15.50 a case.

In December, we imported 14,435 cases of empire oranges and 309,732 cases of non-empire oranges. Total tariff and excise amounted to $210,926, or an average of $14.75 a case.

For the eight months in 1938 in which tariff was applied on oranges the total quantity brought in from the British empire was 24,959 cases and from non-empire sources, 1,788,858 cases. Total tariff and excise amounted to $1,190,622 to protect the 25,000 cases, or an average throughout those eight months of $47.75 a case.

The other evening the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) questioned some statements I made. I believe he was Minister of Trade and Commerce at the time the 1932 trade agreement came into effect. As such he should have known the situation in regard to oranges, one of the items dealt with in that trade agreement. He should have known that whether there is a tariff on oranges or not, from 85 to 90 per cent of the oranges imported into Canada will come from the United States of America. He should have known that it was utterly impossible to supply the needs of Canadian consumers of oranges from British empire sources. The two main countries that were to be protected were Australia and South Africa. Australia grows only 2,500,000 cases of oranges all told, and Canada eats that much in an ordinary year. South Africa grows only 3,000,000 cases a year, and during this last year, 1938, according to the returns as brought down for the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) not one case of oranges came from Australia and only 130 cases came from South Africa.

The other evening I made the statement that the oranges which were allowed in free during January, February, March and April did not necessarily come from California. The hon. member for Kootenay East said the flush production of oranges in California was from December to April. I disagreed with my hon. friend; I said he was entirely wrong, and he maintained he was not. I stated that in California navel oranges are ripened, picked and shipped during November, December and January, and Valencia oranges during April, May, June and July. The hon. member for Kootenay East questioned my statement and said that there was a much smaller quantity of Valencias than of navels; according to him the quantity of Valencias was of small importance. As Minister of Trade and Commerce at the time the treaty was made he exhibited about the same amount of knowledge concerning this business as he did the other evening in the house. As a matter of fact in the part of California, of which he was speaking, there are some 94,000 acres all told producing navel oranges, which are packed during the months I stated, and 145,000 acres producing Valencia oranges, which the hon. member said were the smaller amount. It would be well for anyone when speaking in this house to try to have the facts and to give only the facts.

In connection with this item, according to the trade treaty, there is a different period which might be used. I would say that Australia is not affected by importations of oranges in December, but might be affected by oranges imported in July, provided they shipped oranges to Canada, which they have not done for the last year. But Canada is a large country. Oranges that enter at the west coast are seldom shipped east of Winnipeg, and oranges that enter at the east coast seldom go farther west than Winnipeg. Therefore, a treaty that takes in these months may make a difference to the eastern shippers, that is the British West Indies, or South Africa, and no difference to the western shippers. In other words, it does not matter whether you have the month of July free in the east to the British West Indies or South Africa, nor does it matter whether you have the month of December free in the west so far as Australia is concerned; but the tremendous cost to the consumers of Canada should be taken into account.

But something else should also be noted. As I said the other night, this is just an instance of what was done to the people of Canada by the British empire agreements. We therein bound duties against decrease, and when you bind a duty against decrease you give to someone else the right to use the bargaining power of your tariff. This has been done in this and many other instances under the British empire agreements. In other words, we have placed our tariff where we cannot lower it in order to get concessions from another country when making a trade agreement with them. But it is quite conceivable that other countries within the British empire can use the right they have to allow us to lower that tariff in order to get concessions for themselves in trade treaties with other countries of the world. That is the worst feature that has ever been put in any trade agreement in Canada.

The trade treaty of 1932 was full of such items. There were 200 of these items, though there are now less than ninety. But when they were put there due consideration was not given to the cost, because in many instances, just as in connection with oranges, the British empire could not possibly supply from within the empire those commodities which we needed, and the net result was that there was a great rise in cost to the people of Canada for all the goods they had to buy under that treaty.

I know the Minister of Finance has endeavoured to get this period lengthened.

Mr. DUNNING: It is lengthened one month under this agreement.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member for Moose Jaw has read me a lecture upon my ignorance of this subject, and he has also advised the committee that he himself is interested in the orange-producing business in California—a delectable occupation which many persons in this rather cold climate frequently look upon as a sort of haven of refuge for their old age. The hon. member, before being so caustic in his observations regarding myself, might have taken the trouble to look up the reasons that were advanced at the time this duty was imposed in 1932. Had he done so he would have found a few facts such as those that I shall mention in the course of a brief statement.

There was no suggestion that we should impose this duty on oranges merely for the protection of oranges coming from Australia and South Africa. The point in the whole business was this. Some fifteen or twenty years ago Canada used to bring in oranges from the West Indies and from central American points as well as from other countries in competition with oranges from Florida, California and other parts of the United States. The competition at that time was exceedingly keen and the Canadian purchaser of oranges got all the advantages of a competitive market. During that period, twenty or twenty-five years prior to the imposition of the tariff in 1932, the citrus fruit growers of California attained such a high degree of exclusiveness of organization that they drove the West Indian orange growers out of this market, which was their best. Indeed, the West Indian growers were affected to such an extent that they uprooted their orchards as a complete loss in consequence of their having been denied the Canadian market.

Figures were given demonstrating this. The result was that oranges ceased to come in from the West Indies in competition with oranges from California, with the highly organized method of production there, and in consequence prices of oranges were higher during all subsequent years than they had been before. There was no competition; there was no competitive buying; the price was fixed by the citrus growers of California, who are recognized as the most highly organized and the most closely controlled industry in the United States. They seriously affected the production of oranges in Florida, which had also been a source of supply for the United States and Canada.

Having that situation in mind, recognizing that Canada has an excellent market in the West Indies for some of our products, and that there were few products that the West Indies could ship to Canada, we decided to impose this duty, which was really tantamount to a duty against California, upon the importation of oranges from the United States, in the hope and expectation that the West Indies would thereby be encouraged to replant their orange groves and restore the balance of competitive trade with the highly organized industry of California. Briefly, that is the story.

It is true that at the same time we hoped that we might develop some importations from Australia and South Africa, and we did. We brought in quite a number of shipments. The hon. member has quoted certain figures, but they relate to a condition which is subsequent to the change made in the tariff in the 1935-36 agreement. I say 1935-36, because the agreement came into effect on January 1, 1936. Prior to that time the rate was thirty-five cents a cubic foot the year round, and it was then amended, being free, for the months of January to April, but otherwise thirty-five cents a cubic foot. I have not the statistics before me, but I venture to say they will show there was considerable importation of oranges during those years prior to 1936; and had we maintained a tariff at that standard to give time for the development of the trade, we should undoubtedly have restored that very happy condition of external competition which we had aimed at in the imposition of this duty.

The hon. member takes an extravagant method of showing the effect of protection. He takes the total revenue collected on the importation of oranges from the United States and divides it by the importations from empire countries since the trade agreement of 1935. Then, by this method of arithmetical calculation, he says we are giving a protection of $40, $50, $60, $70, and I think it went up to $700 in one instance, per case to empire growers. Of course the argument is ludicrous and absurd in the extreme. It is an old trick in oratory and rhetoric to carry a thing to an absurd point in order to invite attention to the argument being presented.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I know my hon. friend does not want to misinterpret what I said. I did not say it was giving that protection to fruit of British empire origin; I said it was costing the consumers of Canada that much to protect British empire growers.

Mr. STEVENS: Unfortunately the hon. gentleman did not confine himself to that statement. He repeatedly said, "This is what you are paying for protection to the empire grower," quoting the figure per case. Of course that is absurd. He himself recognizes that fact now, and it would be abhorrent to him if such a statement were allowed to pass unchallenged; so, with that exceptional degree of intelligence which he possesses, he very properly hastens to correct any such impression.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Oh, no.

Mr. STEVENS: The suggestion he has advanced is not the case at all, of course; it was not with that idea in view that this duty was imposed.

Mr. YOUNG: But that is the result.

Mr. STEVENS: No; it was for the purpose of increasing external competition.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. gentleman does not mean that.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to add another word. The argument has been most dogmatically advanced that the consumer has been called upon to pay the entire difference between the price without duty and the price after the collection of duty. I have not had time to make a study of the matter, but I am not as ignorant in these matters as my hon. friend represents me to be, in spite of the fact that at the time I was Minister of Trade and Commerce, which in some way or another seemed in his opinion to be a warrant that I was completely ignorant. My hon. friend the present minister is not in his seat, but he will have to settle that question himself with the hon. member. I have studied this question with great care, and for some years after this duty was imposed I watched the situation with interest in order to guard against the very thing set forth by my hon. friend. Speaking now from memory, after having checked prices in retail stores, for several of those years I know the price of oranges was lower than it had been previously.

Again I am subject to correction, because I am speaking wholly from memory, but if I am not mistaken there was an exceedingly bad winter in California not so very long ago, during which period a substantial portion of the orange crop was destroyed, and I believe my hon. friend was focusing his attention mainly on the year or season following that destruction. Of course no one can guard against such occurrences. There will be seasons when the ravages of nature will cause advances in prices; but if we take them year by year I think it can be shown that prices of oranges in Canada did not increase to any great extent as a result of this treaty. Furthermore, I think it will be shown that there was a substantial importation of oranges from empire countries.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, if I had been minister I would have been watching the situation with very great care particularly during the last year or two. If as a result of our imposition of this tariff the West Indies have made no reasonable effort to restore the production of oranges—which takes a number of years, as my hon. friend, who is a grower of oranges in California, will know better than I do—if they have not taken steps to replace the orchards that were destroyed by the citrus fruit union of California a few years previously, then I think the time would come to review whether or not we should abandon this duty, which was imposed for the very purpose of restoring that production. I am not in a position to say what the present situation is; perhaps the minister has the information. I will say this, however. We are warranted in maintaining this duty until we are satisfied that such a condition obtains. After all, in these matters we are justified in taking a fairly long view. In fact this idea of determining a fiscal policy on what may happen to-day or yesterday or during any season when serious damage is done by nature is an exceedingly unwise course. I suggest that the proper course to pursue is to mark out one's objective and adhere to it until there are valid reasons for changing one's course.

I had no notion of speaking on this item, and would not have done so except for the fact that statements were made which I thought were not strictly relevant to the argument but which rather led the minds of hon. members away from the real facts. There was also, of course, the suggestion that I was so densely ignorant that I did not know my business, so I thought it might be proper to make at least a feeble attempt to justify some modicum of intelligence and a little knowledge of the matter, although not, of course, the knowledge my hon. friend has. I want to pay him this tribute; as a grower in California he certainly is entitled to instruct this house in all that pertains to the interests of the California growers.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): My hon. friend says I am a grower of oranges in California. I am a grower of wheat in Saskatchewan. I said that it fell to my lot to have to look after some interests of some of the older members of my family in California.

Mr. STEVENS: It is a pretty happy lot, too.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I do not say it is not. In any event, I have to visit California once in a while. I was glad to hear my hon. friend was trying to build up this industry in the West Indies. As he says, it takes about fifteen years to bring these trees into full bearing. The hon. gentleman said the trees were uprooted because of competition in Canada, but I understood there was an open market at that time. Surely, however, we do not have to wait for fifteen years in order to get rid of the load that was placed on the people of Canada by my hon. friend's party.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps I might be allowed to say one word in regard to oranges, purely with the idea of expediting the passage of this item. It is often said, and indeed I have said it myself, that no subject can be raised in the House of Commons without finding somewhere among its 245 members expert knowledge of that particular subject; but frankly, I did not expect to find quite the wide range of expert knowledge which has been demonstrated from all quarters of the house with respect to a commodity which is not produced in Canada at all. But I simply desire to say this, with respect to the item now before us: It results in a month longer period of free importation.

Mr. SPENCE: The free period is now seven months, is it not?

Mr. DUNNING: No. It is four months now, and under the new agreement it will be five. It is one month longer than was in existence prior to January 1 last. In addition the treaty contemplates giving us the option to adopt two months more.

Mr. SENN: Three months more than now?

Mr. DUNNING: Three months more than prior to January 1. The new period under the treaty is now in effect. The reason why the period exists is no doubt well known to hon. members. It exists by virtue of certain other treaties with other members of the British commonwealth of nations to which this country is a party. Therefore any change in what is contemplated directly in this treaty must be the result of consultation between those countries which are parties to other treaties with Canada, affecting the item. As to whether or not we shall adopt the alternative for which the treaty provides, depends upon developments in that connection. I think I should say to all hon. members that the points of view expressed from different parts of Canada will be in my mind when the matter of changing the period is up for consideration, or for consultation as the case may be, with other members of the British commonwealth of nations.

I have only one observation to make of a kind which may be regarded as somewhat controversial. If I could make a guess at one of the major motives of the government which preceded this one in putting a duty on oranges, I think it would be fair to say that one of those major motives was to get revenue. I doubt if the hon. member for Kootenay East, the former Minister of Trade and Commerce, will deny that statement, because it is quite obvious that considerable revenue does come from this tax.

Mr. STEVENS: Leave off the word "major" and I shall agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. DUNNING: "One" of the major?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. STIRLING: Could the minister indicate when that decision will be arrived at?

Mr. DUNNING: No, I cannot do that. Some other countries of the empire which are concerned have indicated their unwillingness to consider any concession. Again I should like to impress upon the committee a fact which is frequently forgotten, namely, that there is not a treaty in existence between Canada and any other country which does not have within it features distinctly helpful to Canada. One could not say with respect to any particular item, and to any country, "Well, we are going arbitrarily to alter that item," without expecting that other country to take the same attiude with respect to an item it regards as being of advantage to itself. Indeed, at times we may have to face the question as to whether or not a treaty shall continue in operation, if it is too strongly insisted that something be done which would be of interest to a particular class of Canadian people.

I am not intimating that we have reached any decision with respect to oranges. I see the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) casting a cold and fishlike eye in my direction—all of which means, I know, that I have not said a word yet about mandarins and tangerines. May I assure him I have taken careful note of and shall give full consideration to the point he made in that regard. In the meantime he might have a little conversation with his neighbour about the matter.

Mr. STEVENS: We have already had one.

Mr. RICKARD: I am not opposed to the people of Canada getting cheap oranges, but I am opposed to their coming in here at about a cent each. There is no comparison between oranges at a cent each and cheap oranges. I contend that if they were two cents each the people of Canada would still be getting cheap oranges.

Mr. SPENCE: They are very small at a cent each.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni is, I am sure, under a misapprehension about one point. He seems to feel that mandarins and tangerines are free from Japan and dutiable from other countries. I thought that was his argument. The fact is that is not so; they are free from all countries which enjoy the most favoured nation treatment, and they have been since January 1, 1936.

Mr. NEILL: But since the order in council was passed in November, 1931, until the other day, it was not so. The order in council uses the expression "it is hereby ordered that mandarins and tangerines when grown in Japan," and so on. It confined the privilege to Japan, only, and it remained that way from 1931 until 1935.

Mr. DUNNING: Not until the other day.

Mr. STEVENS: That order in council was passed before the duty was placed on oranges in 1931.

Mr. NEILL: No, the duty was placed on oranges in June, 1931.

Mr. DUNNING: The United States became a most favoured nation by virtue of the 1935 agreement. And because of that this order in council applied thereafter to them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to associate myself with those who have urged that we enable the Canadian consumer to obtain oranges at the very lowest possible rate. At the present time there are large numbers of people in Canada who are suffering from inadequate incomes, and it happens generally that they are the people who are raising families and who, consequently, need oranges as cheaply as they can get them. It seems to me any measure we can take which will help those people would certainly be a good thing for Canada, and especially when we remember that there is a great need for oranges particularly for young people and for others who are not as well as they might be. May I, therefore, associate myself with the hon. member for Moose Jaw and other hon. members who have urged a lower rate on oranges.

Mr. PERLEY: For fear I may not have many opportunities later on to associate myself with the hon. member for Moose Jaw—

Mr. DUNNING: One of you must be wrong.

Mr. PERLEY: I cannot do it often; in fact, he almost made it impossible on this occasion, because of some of the absurd arguments he urged. On this occasion, however, I join with him and other hon. members, notably the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), in expressing the belief that the cheaper oranges are made, the better. Especially is that so when we realize that oranges are an important food commodity not only for children but for adults. I am glad the minister has expressed the opinion that there may be a possibility of even extending the time for free entry.

Customs tariff—101a. Lemons, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 105b, ex 105c. Olives, ripe, in brine: 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—106. Fruits, prepared, in airtight cans or other airtight containers, the weight of the containers to be included in the weight for duty:

(a) peaches, 3½ cents per pound; apricots and pears, three cents per pound.

Mr. LOCKHART: The minister was, I believe, going to place some figures on record.

Mr. DUNNING: In the year 1938 total importations of peaches and apricots from the United States were valued at $15,900, and importations of pears at $2,500.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—106. Fruits, prepared, in airtight cans or other airtight containers, the weight of the containers to be included in the weight for duty:

(b) pineapples, 3 cents per pound.

Mr. DUNNING: Imports from the United States in 1938 were $24,900.

Mr. MARSHALL: I notice the British preferential tariff on peaches, apricots and pears is two cents per pound. Does that rate extend to New Zealand and Australia?

Mr. DUNNING: By agreement the Australian rate is lower than the British preferential, it being one-half cent per pound on peaches and free on the other fruits. The New Zealand duty is the straight British preferential rate.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. COLDWELL: I suppose this is a straight revenue item because we raise no pineapples in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: The British preferential is involved in the difference between the British preferential rate and the United States treaty rate. The British preferential rate is one cent.

Mr. COLDWELL: Why not make the British empire product free? Why not start from nothing instead of one cent?

Mr. DUNNING: They are free from Australia, so we do start from nothing.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—106. Fruits, prepared, in airtight cans or other airtight containers, the weight of the containers to be included in the weight for duty:

(c) n.o.p., 3 cents per pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—108. Honey, in the comb or otherwise, and imitations thereof: 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. PERLEY: I think we got a little the worst of the deal in this item. I notice the reduction is from 2½ cents per pound to 1½ cents per pound, which is a 40 per cent reduction. The reduction granted by the United States is from 2 cents to 1½ cents, which is a 25 per cent reduction. I notice that the United States imported from all countries $15,080 worth, of which $1,385 worth came from Canada. Could the minister give us the exports from Canada for 1936, 1937 and 1938, and, if possible, the exports to Great Britain?

Mr. DUNNING: With respect to the first point raised by my hon. friend, I may say that the full extent of the president's power was exercised, as between two treaties, one with Guatemala and the United States, and the other between Canada and the United States. As the hon. member will have noted, the rates now agree. Our total exports for 1936 amounted to $151,000; for 1937, $225,000, and for 1938, $246,000. Last year we exported to Great Britain a total of $205,300 worth.

Mr. PERLEY: The production of honey has become a main industry in western Canada. I believe last year a large shipment of western honey went to Great Britain via Churchill. Perhaps it would be a little too much to ask the minister to give us any details with respect to that particular shipment?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot, I am sorry.

Customs tariff—ex 114. Nuts, shelled, n.o.p., but not including shelled almonds, peanuts or walnuts: two cents per pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—115. Mackerel, herring, salmon and all other fish, n.o.p., fresh, salted, pickled, smoked, dried or boneless: ½ cent per pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—116. Halibut, fresh, pickled or salted: one cent per pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—117, ex. 133. Fish livers, fresh, salted or in preservative medium: free.

Mr. NEILL: What is the duty on fish livers entering the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: Inedible fish livers are admitted free into the United States, but edible fish livers are dutiable as portions of fish. Under the new agreement the rate on cod livers is reduced to 1⅞ cents, while halibut livers remain unchanged at 2½ cents per pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 123a. Shrimps in sealed containers: 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—124. Oysters, shelled, in bulk: 5 cents per gallon.

Mr. MASSEY: Has the minister any idea of the domestic consumption of Canadian oysters compared with exports out of Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: Canadian production in 1937 was valued at $174,000.

Mr. MASSEY: I believe my question should have been asked on the next item.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—128. Oysters in the shell: 15 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: I gave my hon. friend the production in Canada in 1937. In the same year we imported to the value of $8,300. Our exports are not separately reported. Apparently exports are reported under the total shellfish item, so that I cannot give my hon. friend the information for which he asked. I had hoped to be able to deduct the exports from the production and arrive at the consumption in that way.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—141. Sugar candy and confectionery, n.o.p., including sweetened gums, candied pop corn, candied nuts, flavouring powders, custard powders, jelly powders, sweetmeats, sweetened breads, cakes, pies, puddings and all other confections containing sugar, the weight of the wrappings and cartons to be included in the weight for duty: ½ cent per pound and 30 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—143a. Cigarettes, the weight of the paper covering to be included in the weight for duty: $3 per pound and 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 152. Fruit juices, n.o.p., not including lime, orange, lemon or passion fruit juices: 15 per cent.

Mr. LENNARD: What is passion fruit?

Mr. DUNNING: I am not acquainted with it. We had plenty of experts on oranges, and perhaps we have one on the passion fruit.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): It is grown in all tropical and sub-tropical countries. The granadilla has a flower which is peculiarly formed with certain related figures such as three, five and twelve. Because of its shape it has been called the passion flower.

Mr. DUNNING: I knew we could find experts in the house on anything, including passion fruit.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 152. Fruit syrups, n.o.p.: 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 156. Whiskey (subject to the provisos attached to tariff items 156 and 156a): $6 per gallon of the strength of proof.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 167. Barley malt, whole, crushed or ground, upon entry for warehouse subjects to excise regulations: ⅜ cent per pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—169. Books, viz.: Novels or works of fiction, or literature of a similar character, unbound or paper bound or in sheets, but not to include Christmas annuals, or publications commonly known as juvenile and toy books: 10 per cent.

Mr. HAYHURST: There are a number of items here which are more or less related. There is a tax upon certain bindings coming into Canada. My remarks apply perhaps more to item 605a, which deals with morocco leathers. The duty on the raw materials used for binding is such that libraries find it cheaper to ship the books out of Canada unbound, to the United States, we will say, and the libraries would like the duties upon morocco leathers, cloths and other substances which go into the binding of books, reduced or remitted in some way so that these books could be bound in Canada. That would help create work in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not sure I quite understood my hon. friend. He has spoken of shipping unbound books out of Canada, and then of binding books in Canada.

Mr. HAYHURST: Yes. I understand that the materials for these bindings are manufactured outside Canada, and there is a tax on those materials. The libraries would like to have the tax remitted, so that the books could be bound in Canada, thus aiding Canadian industry. Perhaps this refers more directly to item 605a, but the item before the committee is more or less bound up with the binding of books.

Mr. DUNNING: So far as my hon. friend's remarks relate to item 605a, I can give him the information now. Item 605a, covering morocco leathers, is a bound item; that is to say, under the British empire agreements we cannot reduce the intermediate tariff on morocco leathers.

With respect to the general question of drawbacks, if there is one thing which plagues tariff administration in any country it is applications by particular trades or industries to be allowed drawbacks on particular importations used for particular purposes. It is very difficult in administrative practice for my colleague the Minister of National Revenue; in consequence of the difficulties which have arisen in the administration of drawbacks generally I referred to the tariff board just a few weeks ago the whole question of studying the effect and incidence of all the existing drawbacks, and I have no doubt at all that those interested in the item to which my hon. friend refers will be active with respect to their view of that question during its hearing before the tariff board.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff— ex 169, ex 171, ex 184. Books, periodicals and pamphlets, or parts thereof, printed, bound, unbound, or in sheets (not to include blank account books, copy books, or books to be written or drawn upon), in any other than the English language: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 169, 184a, 184b, 184c, 184d. Periodical publications, unbound or paper bound, printed and issued at regular intervals, not less frequently than four times a year, and bearing dates of issue: free.

Mr. MacNICOL: This is one of ten items in the whole treaty to which I wish to refer, and I shall do so briefly. The reason why I say that is that I know it is hopeless for us to say anything because, in any event, anything we may say cannot change anything.

A week ago Saturday when I was home in Toronto I had occasion to call on one of the large printing houses which does a big business, and I found that it was very much concerned over this item and others associated with it, pertaining to books, printing and so forth. This printer told me that prior to 1935 he had purchased from the United States six large machines costing him a very great deal of money, and that prior to 1935 all these machines were busy. At that time he was printing a large number of periodicals. But since the change in the tariff in 1935 two of these large machines are idle, and two others are for sale, and he anticipates increased difficulty as a result of the items in this treaty. One of these machines is operating only half-time, and the other only one third of the time. The printer told me that the cut in the tariff in 1935 reduced the number of his operators by fifty, men and women, youths and girls; it meant a loss to his business of $400,000 a year, and as far as he knew it meant a reduction of 200 in employees in the whole trade in Toronto.

What strikes me as peculiar is this: While our whole foreign trade imports dropped last year $131,000,000, our importations under item ex 169 increased by $908,000. That just means, of course, that much less printing for Canadian printers. While we can do nothing about this item by discussing it in this chamber, I did feel that I had to say a word on behalf of our printers and their employees who have been thrown out of work.

Mr. MASSEY: While I heartily endorse what the hon. member for Davenport has said, there is another element in connection with this item which should not pass without something being said about it. I am quite sure that the minister realizes, as does his colleague the Minister of National Revenue, that since the change in this item in 1935 this country has been virtually flooded with a type of periodical which cannot be called elevating, to phrase it mildly.

Mr. DUNNING: Prior to that they were printed in Canada.

Mr. MASSEY: Some of them; but there are now, I understand, some one thousand titles listed by many of those who deal in periodicals. I do not pose as an authority on this type of periodical, but I should like to ask one or two questions of the minister.

First, how are these magazines censored? Perhaps "censored" is an ugly word. On what basis are they admitted into Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: From a censorship point of view?

Mr. MASSEY: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: I will ask my colleague to answer that.

Mr. ILSLEY: We have discussed this matter pretty often in the house and outside. There is a branch of the Department of National Revenue, customs division, which is charged with the duty of examining periodicals with a view to determining whether they are treasonable, seditious, indecent or immoral. If the officials decide that they are, then they are prohibited from entering Canada, and collectors are notified accordingly.

Mr. MASSEY: I think the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) as well as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) will realize that the menace of certain types of publications is far greater perhaps than we have yet shown in our recognition of the existence of those magazines. It seems to me that not only is the question raised by the hon. member for Davenport an important one under this item, but the matter of salacious publications is most important, and obviously a most efficient way of dealing with it is by the imposition of a duty against these magazines which would put them out of the reach of those who now wish to purchase them. Accordingly I wondered whether the Minister of Finance had given any consideration to what it might be possible to do in this connection, or is the item so completely bound that it cannot possibly be changed?

Mr. DUNNING: I remember well the discussions in this house years ago on the same question. I took the ground then, and I take it still, that no tariff can be a protector of the morals of people in connection with literature. I think the result when a tariff was put on fully bore out my contention in that respect, because the offending magazines were simply printed in Canada; and I believe I am right in saying that it was more difficult to control from the point of view of decency what shall be printed when the printing takes place within Canada than it is to control the entry of such literature into the country. As a matter of fact, only the Minister of National Revenue has control over importations.

I do not know any branch of the Canadian government service which has censorship privileges with respect to indecent publications within Canada except that I believe there is some measure of control under the postal regulations. But I think the Postmaster General (Mr. McLarty) will also say that it is a very difficult matter, as many of these publications do not go by post. The Postmaster General says that only a very small fraction do. The Minister of National Revenue tells me that over 20,000 imported magazines were seized last year by the branch of his department concerned; and I believe we can say that the branch of government concerned is dealing with that very difficult task in a way which would commend itself to those interested, although there are constant protests against the severity of its rulings. That has always been so under all governments; it has been a difficult, thorny question. It was hoped by many in this house that the imposition of a tariff would have the effect of exercising control; in fact, it was one of the arguments used in my early years in the house. But I never believed it would have that effect, and I am quite sure that the event proved that there could be no effective control in that manner.

Mr. MASSEY: Is it not true that possibly some seventy-five per cent of the importations of such periodicals come in under about twenty-five titles? A small number of magazines enter Canada in large quantities?

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no.

Mr. MacNICOL: About seventy-five, I think. Some seventy-eight were printed in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sure twenty-five is too small a number.

Mr. MASSEY: I was not able to get the detailed figures.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What would be the United States tariff on our goods similar to this item going in there?

Mr. DUNNING: Goods corresponding to this item are free.

Mr. LENNARD: In support of what was said by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey), I might draw to the minister's attention the fact that some of these magazines and periodicals which come into Canada have been banned in certain states of the United States. Strange as it may seem, I understand that certain magazines which are being shipped into Canada are not allowed to circulate in Chicago and several other western cities. I do not know the names of the periodicals, but I was given that information on fairly good authority. It might be well to have the matter investigated. I think that rule has been put into force only during recent months.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the proper place for the discussion of this question of prohibition of periodicals is under the estimates of the Department of National Revenue. That is where this discussion takes place every year. I shall be glad to answer questions then.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 174. Tourist literature issued by national or state governments or departments thereof, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, municipal and automobile associations, and similar organizations: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 178, ex 178a. Advertising and printed matter, whether imported by mail or otherwise, when in individual packages valued at not more than $1 each and when not imported for sale or in a manner designed to evade payment of customs duties: free.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Would it not be possible for a firm here to send to the United States a mailing list and have these articles come in free and be distributed in that way?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is possible unless it is an evasion. The hon. member will note that the concluding words of the item are

. . . when not imported for sale or in a manner designed to evade payment of customs duties.

The question of when the supplying of a mailing list is an evasion and when it is not is difficult to determine. It is covered by recent rulings and regulations of the department. I have not them here, but I can supply them to the hon. member if he would like to have them.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Take, for instance, the distribution of calendars, some worth twenty-five or thirty or forty cents each; would that be an evasion? A mailing list could be sent to the other side and the stuff come in for advertising purposes. That would be no evasion that I could see.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not want to go into that question without having the rulings and regulations before me, because the question is exceedingly difficult. But there comes a time when we say it is an evasion of this item. The item was not intended for the purpose suggested at all; it was intended to let United States organizations like hotels and railway companies send their literature into Canada without its being dutiable. They permit a great deal of our literature of that kind to enter the United States free.

Mr. DUNNING: It is all free.

[Mr. Lennard.]

Mr. ILSLEY: And this was designed to give them the same privilege in this country. When a Canadian firm asked if they could do what the hon. member suggests, the question was whether they were not changing the whole intention of the item and making it apply to a different purpose altogether, and we made a ruling on it which I had better supply to my hon. friend instead of trying to state it to him from memory.

Mr. STIRLING: If evasion is proved, what duty will be paid?

Mr. DUNNING: Twelve and a half cents.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Under the item as it stands it would not be an evasion if a firm sent a mailing list to the United States and had a calendar made, to be sent to each individual on the list. It would be perfectly open and above board.

Mr. DUNNING: I suggest that if a person publishing a calendar intended to advertise a Canadian concern, having that concern's name on it, and sent the mailing list to the United States, having the calendar mailed from there, it would be obviously an evasion. It is a calendar advertising a Canadian concern, and an effort is made to ship it in from the United States under this item instead of under the item that is properly applicable.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): No doubt the minister has had several letters with regard to this industry in Toronto. It is a new industry that has gradually grown. There are two firms there engaged in the production of post-cards. The industry was started in 1931, but the competition is becoming serious. With the removal of the excise tax and the lowering of the tariff, it has now reached the point where a great many of these cards can come in and be sold over the counter for five cents, whereas before they sold at from six cents to ten cents. There is also a considerable number of over-runs and discards which can be brought in cheaply. The industry is worthwhile, and there will be no extra cost to the consumer so far as the tariff is concerned, but the tariff does protect Canadian producers. There are a great many classes employed in this production—the artists, the engravers and the general workmen. I simply wanted to bring these facts to the attention of the minister.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND PERIOD OF OPERATION OF ACT, ETC.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 36, to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Appropriations.

Mr. QUELCH: I should like to make a few observations on this bill. I realize that a great deal of valuable work has been done under this act; nevertheless because of its limitations I think it is unable to deal adequately with the problems of the permanent drought area, and in referring to that area I have in mind that part of Alberta east of a line drawn north and south of the town of Hanna. In that area, in order to deal with the problem in such a way that a farmer might be able to enjoy a reasonable standard of living, I believe we are still faced with one of two alternatives, either to make a greatly increased acreage of land available to the farmer in order that he may go into ranching, or to develop irrigation projects.

The first of these alternatives has been undertaken to a certain extent already by the special areas board of Alberta. For instance, in the Berry Creek area the aim has been to allow three thousand acres per family, with a definite limitation upon the amount of stock that can be carried per quarter section. I believe the limit is three head per quarter section or one head per fifty acres, because it is realized that in that area it takes about fifty acres of land to maintain one head of stock. Under this act a great deal of crested wheat grass seed has been distributed, and once that is established no doubt the number of head of stock per quarter section may be increased. Farmers, however, have been greatly handicapped by lack of finances with which to buy stock to build up their herds. This is especially so, following the unfortunate occurrence of a year ago when, owing to lack of feed, the federal government in conjunction with the provinces framed certain regulations under which the farmers were forced to reduce their stock in order to obtain relief feed. Now they find themselves in the unfortunate position of not having the money with which to buy stock to build up their herds. So, as I have already stated, I believe a great deal of the drought area in Alberta—and possibly this applies to Saskatchewan as well—eventually will have to be turned back to grazing unless large irrigation projects are instituted.

A certain amount of the land in the drought area of Alberta is especially suitable for irrigation purposes. Many schemes have been surveyed and endorsed by engineers. Perhaps the best known scheme is the North Saskatchewan project, generally referred to as the William Pearce project. Under that scheme a million and a half acres would be irrigated, one million in Saskatchewan and half a million in Alberta. When the estimates were first prepared I think the cost was figured to be approximately $70 an acre to irrigate land in Saskatchewan; but according to certain well known engineers that figure can be considerably reduced to-day. I think it is estimated that it can be cut approximately in half. While the major project may be considered too expensive or not feasible, there are a number of modified schemes based upon the William Pearce project, such as, for instance, the Sullivan Lake project. Under that scheme half a million acres in Alberta would be irrigated, at a cost of approximately $23,000,000. In this instance also this figure probably could be cut considerably, on account of the fact that dirt can be moved very much more cheaply to-day than was the case when the original survey was made, and the further fact that at the present time this land is largely owned by the government, so there would be no necessity for buying very much land. These projects, however, are entirely beyond the financial resources of the province, and if they are to be put into operation they will have to be financed by the federal government. At the present time, as I understand it, this act is not so constituted that large irrigation projects can be financed, but I am hoping that, as time goes on, a change may be made which would allow these larger projects to be carried on.

If these schemes are put into operation without building up excessive charges against the land, I think they may become highly satisfactory, judging from past history. In Alberta to-day many of the larger irrigation projects are operating successfully; the farmers are making a fairly decent living and are able to pay the maintenance costs. It is useless, however, to expect a project of this kind to be able to repay the capital charges, and if irrigation projects are to be put into operation in the future with any hope of success, we shall have to construct them without placing a charge against the land.

I should now like to say just a few words with regard to the methods of administration adopted under this act, because I do feel that in some ways the administration of this act in Alberta has been somewhat unfortunate. In my province there is a definite feeling that in the matter of expenditures there has been a great deal of discrimination against Alberta compared with Saskatchewan. Of course I realize that the area in Saskatchewan is very much larger than the area in Alberta, and this may partly account for this feeling. Apart from that, however, there are other reasons why people feel that Alberta has been discriminated against. I might mention one instance, the Bartman dam which was built in my constituency. The contract for this dam was awarded the Poole Construction Company, with headquarters in Regina, which put in a tender amounting to something like $19,332. The special areas board of Alberta put in a tender totalling about $150 less.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Poole's home is in Edmonton.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes; the firm have offices in Edmonton, but their headquarters are in Regina.

Mr. GARDINER: And Mr. Poole lives in Edmonton.

Mr. QUELCH: Nevertheless the headquarters of the company are still registered as being in Regina. In any event the contract was let to the Poole Construction Company. If it had been awarded to the special areas board, the work would have started far earlier than it did. The Poole Construction Company had to bring in their material and their outfit; a great deal of time was wasted, with the result that the spillway of the dam was not completed in time. When spring came, the water, instead of running down the spillway, ran over the top, and the dam was washed out. If that dam had been constructed by the special areas board, I believe this would not have happened, because only six miles below the Bartman dam the special areas board built what is known as the Helmer dam. Not only did that dam withstand the natural flow of water, it also withstood the force of the water which broke down the Bartman dam. Of course the Helmer dam is a smaller dam; nevertheless it was saved. Moreover, if that contract had been awarded to the special areas board, far more of the money would have been spent locally instead of going out of the district, as it did when it was paid to the Poole Construction Company. That, I think, was unnecessary. I suppose there was some reason for awarding that contract to this company, but their tender was higher than that of the special areas board, which was on the spot and which possessed a great deal of experience in building dams of this kind. So I think it was strange that the special areas board did not obtain the contract.

Now that we are in committee I should like to ask the minister if he could give us any information as to whether or not any action is being taken along the line of investigating the Sullivan Lake project, and also whether any action is being contemplated or taken regarding the extension of the Medicine Hat irrigation project. The minister knows the project to which I am referring; it is the one concerning which he was interviewed by a committee last month.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know whether it is possible for me to cover all the matters referred to by the hon. member, but perhaps I can recall most of his references and can deal with them pretty much in the order in which they were mentioned.

In the first place I quite agree it has been found necessary to change the situation which had existed prior to 1932 in that section of the country lying east of Hanna in Alberta. At that time most of that territory was occupied by homesteaders, or persons who had homesteaded land and purchased pre-emptions. Since that time much of the area has been evacuated by those who originally settled it. Much of the land is light. It is not very well suited to grain growing of any kind, and is probably best suited to the production of live stock. However, the reference which was made a few minutes ago to the effect that it requires fifty acres of land to maintain one head of live stock indicates that it is not really very good live stock land. When an eastern farmer hears one referring to the fact that fifty acres of land are required to pasture one head of live stock, I am sure he wonders just what kind of country it is. That in itself indicates that it is not very productive, even of grass.

Therefore there were problems there when practically the whole of that country was settled by homesteaders. That was one of the mistakes which was made in settling the area in the first place. The Pearce scheme, which has been spoken of as a means of taking care of some of the difficulties which exist in the area from Hanna eastward to Saskatoon, is a scheme which has been discussed widely in both eastern and western Canada. I recall having seen about two years ago in some of the eastern papers strongly written editorials and news items to the effect that this was one more instance where the government was not taking the action it should take because this scheme was not being put under way. I may add that some of the same papers to-day are accusing the government of spending too great sums of money in trying to deal with some of the problems we are attempting to deal with in connection with that area.

The Pearce scheme is one which was outlined many years ago by a gentleman named Pearce who had made explorations across that country. It necessitated first the filling of a storage known as Sullivan lake just to the north and a little to the west of Hanna, Alberta, and making use of that for the irrigation of about 425,000 acres of land in the immediate vicinity of Sullivan Lake. The idea was then to carry the waters farther down into Saskatchewan, using the storages at Tramping lake, and elsewhere between there and Saskatoon, to irrigate certain areas of land. I might point out that if the scheme had been undertaken and completed, there could have been irrigated in the whole section of the country only about a million and a half acres, as indicated by the hon. member a moment ago, whereas in that section of the country we are talking about there are probably 30,000,000 acres of land occupied by settlers. So that one can see that if one were going to irrigate only about a million and a half acres in an area where probably 30,000,000 acres are occupied by farmers, even the considerable expenditure of money that is talked about is not going to help many of them.

I believe much of the land which would have been brought under irrigation by the original scheme has since been found not to be very well suited to irrigation. Some of it is too light, and therefore permits the water to get away before it is of much use. Then, some of it is more or less affected by alkali which makes it difficult to irrigate to advantage. But a considerable part of the land could be irrigated, and about 425,000 acres of it is in the vicinity of Hanna and Sullivan Lake.

I have been asked whether anything is being done to explore the possibilities of the scheme, and I can say only that we have engineers on the job making investigations with regard to costs and possibilities in connection with the development of a storage in Sullivan lake. I understand it would be necessary first to build a dam in the river near Red Deer; after the dam was built, it would be necessary to pump the water up to the prairie level, which is an extremely expensive undertaking; then run it in ditches from that point until it reaches the river at another point; then syphon it under the river, bring it up to the river again on the other side, take it down to Sullivan lake and fill that lake, making it a storage which can be used for irrigation purposes round Sullivan lake.

Mr. QUELCH: I understand, if a dam were built just below the mouth of the Raven river, on the Red Deer river, it would need to be only fifty feet high, and then the water would come down by gravity, without any pumping.

Mr. GARDINER: If you build a dam fifty feet high, take the water out of the river and run it down by gravity, it takes the water down along the river banks. I understand the nature of the soil is such that it will not hold water running in ditches along the level. In all probability you would find most of the water running back into the river before you got down to Sullivan lake.

The only practical scheme is one of pumping the water up to the level, taking it in ditches and then taking it back into Sullivan lake. That is an expensive undertaking and one which at the moment the department would not feel like recommending to the government. It is not an undertaking the department would recommend at the present time to the consideration of the house, as one which, with the amount of money available and the amount the house is prepared to vote for that kind of undertaking, we might want to undertake.

There are many other undertakings of a similar nature which, taken together, will, I believe, take care of more people with the expenditure of the same amount of money. But the investigations are not yet completed. The final report is not yet in, and I am only giving to the committee the benefit of the information which at present is before the department in relation to that particular project. I might say that one can quite understand what the expenditure would be in order to irrigate about a million acres in addition to this half million, when water has to be moved hundreds of miles from that location in order to have it where the additional land is to be irrigated.

Something has been said about its costing just about half as much to move earth now as it did some years ago. Well, I have had something to do with moving earth in Saskatchewan since about 1922, when I was minister of highways in that province. I find it costs just about as much to move earth to-day, even with more efficient machinery, as it did back in 1922 or at an even earlier date. I believe hon. members will agree with me when I say that more efficient machinery either for the movement of dirt or for the making of farm implements or machinery of war has not resulted in lesser costs for the completed process or articles. I believe if we check back over the whole list of articles being produced to-day we shall find that the theory that present-day equipment reduces costs has not worked out in actual practice. If we consider the cost of replacing machinery from time to time, it is costing just about as much to move earth to-day as it did back in the days when they were building the railways across western Canada in the first instance. I am not at all carried away with the idea that we can move this dirt to-day at half what it cost a few years go. It still costs a great deal of money to move earth to carry out projects of the type mentioned.

The estimate with regard to the Pearce scheme, made I think in 1922 by the then Department of the Interior, was that it would cost about $54 an acre to irrigate lands in the vicinity of Sullivan Lake. That is the 425,000 acres of which we were speaking a moment ago. It was also estimated that it would cost $78 an acre to irrigate those lands which were located in Saskatchewan. The question which arises in my mind, and in the minds of many others, is whether it is advisable for this government to start to spend sums of that kind in order to develop irrigation projects at this particular time. There may come a time when it will be advisable to do that, but I do not think that time has arrived as yet.

With regard to the suggestion that there may have been discrimination as between Alberta and other provinces in the expenditure of money, I can only say that as far as expenditures upon water conservation are concerned the amount spent in Alberta compares favourably with what was spent in Saskatchewan or Manitoba, that is in proportion to the areas. In connection with regrassing and reseeding lands, and work of that type, the same thing is true. Alberta has had a fair share of the money which has been expended for these different purposes. In 1937 we undertook to enlarge the activities carried on under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and endeavoured to establish community pastures here and there throughout the drought areas or the open prairie country. The advisory committee met on two or three occasions, and finally a resolution was adopted setting out a certain policy for the development of the land reclamation activities to be carried on under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. In line with those activities we have been attempting to take certain lands east of Hanna, somewhat similar to those described a few moments ago by the hon. member, out of cultivation and put them back into grass which could be used by farmers who are on better land roundabout.

We were able to enter into negotiations with the government of Saskatchewan by which they agreed to the policies which were then laid down and adopted by the federal Department of Agriculture. We carried on negotiations with the government of Alberta, but they were not prepared to turn over lands in what were known as the special areas in the province and which had been administered by the special areas board since I think about 1922. They were not prepared to turn over those lands to the government on the same terms as lands were being turned over in Saskatchewan. As they desired to carry on activities within those areas themselves, we suggested that we were prepared to enter into agreements under which lands outside that area would be leased to us for twenty-one years. Under these leases we would be prepared to go on and do the same sort of work we were doing in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Tanner, a member of the government of Alberta, came to Ottawa, and a mutual agreement was drawn up which we felt stated the understanding as to what might be done in the areas outside the special areas. Since then, however, we have had no communication from the government of Alberta stating that they were prepared to proceed with the plan. As we were not able to arrive at definite conclusions during the summer of 1937, about $250,000 which had been voted to be expended under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act was never taken out of the treasury. In other words, we held the money throughout a whole year while endeavouring to enter into some arrangements with the government of Alberta which would make possible the expenditure of that money. I think any money which was not expended would have to be charged up to Alberta when making a calculation as to what money was available to Alberta in that particular year.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What part of the agreement was not satisfactory to Alberta?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know. They have not told me. Since the agreement which was drawn up while Mr. Tanner was in Ottawa, was sent to the Alberta government, I have had no further communication from them.

Mr. QUELCH: Is it not true that the advisory committee met in June when it was understood that the administration of these areas would be left in the hands of the provincial government? Then, later on in the year the Saskatchewan government submitted a different kind of plan which the federal government adopted. Alberta was never allowed to submit its plan. Saskatchewan submitted a plan which the federal government adopted, but the federal government did not permit Alberta to submit a similar plan.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member is speaking of 1936?

Mr. QUELCH: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: In 1936, to go back of 1937, negotiations were started early in the spring. The committee was called together and our plans for the work were discussed. Later on the advisory committee met in Regina and discussed a possible program. None of the provinces, however, was prepared to go on with that particular plan. We worked along until about August, but at that time there were no works of the type of which I have been speaking which were ready to be proceeded with. In August the committee was again called together in order to arrive at a working plan, which was laid down, I think on August 2. From there on we proceeded to organize this pasture scheme in Saskatchewan and attempted to organize it in Alberta and Manitoba. We did organize one large pasture in Manitoba to take care of shipments of live stock from the drought areas in the other provinces to the market in Winnipeg and elsewhere late in the season. The other matters of which I have spoken were dealt with partly in 1936 and continued in 1937.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Was not one of the objections that of turning lands over to the federal government?

Mr. GARDINER: That was in connection with the special areas of which I spoke a moment ago. They objected to turning lands in the special areas over to the federal government because they had an organization set up to administer them. We said that we were prepared to go on with the water conservation work, with the building of dams, dug-outs and so on, that we were ready to assist in regrassing lands and helping in every way possible with their own activities. But where lands were turned over to us we would not undertake the moving of settlers or the placing of settlers upon other land. We took the position that if they desired to hold the lands in that province under their own control, then they could see to it that persons were moved from one section of the province to the other on to lands controlled by the province. There had not been any understanding reached up to that time with regard to the pasture areas either inside the special areas or outside.

There was one special case, in connection with the Bartman dam, where tenders were called for a year ago, and as was stated, the lowest bidder was the special areas board of the provincial government. The second lowest bidder was the Poole Construction Company, with offices at Edmonton and Regina. The position taken by the department at that time was that it was not fair to call for tenders and allow governments to tender against private individuals in connection with any undertaking of the federal government. We had, of course, entered into scores of contracts with the provincial government, but we had not called for tenders. We had passed many projects for dams, community dug-outs and community water conservation projects of different kinds, which were carried through by the special areas board of Alberta, but in those instances we did not call for tenders. We simply give them the work, and they see that it is carried out on a day labour basis by persons living within the community. When we have called for tenders we have not permitted the provincial government to tender. In the particular instance mentioned, that of the Bartman dam, they did tender, but we gave the work to the lowest private bidder, the Poole Construction Company.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Why was it thought advisable to have this work done by tender?

Mr. GARDINER: Dams of a certain size, costing $10,000 or $15,000, are usually done by tender. We do not like to have it done by day labour, so we let it go to contract.

Mr. SENN: Would the minister state why it was thought unwise to allow the government to tender, or why it was thought unwise to award them the contract when they were the lowest bidder?

Mr. GARDINER: We are giving a considerable amount of cash money to the province for projects of this kind, and we did not think it was fair in asking for tenders to allow the government to tender against private concerns. It was a case either of not calling for tenders and giving the work to the provincial government or of eliminating governments from making tenders, and that policy has been carried out both in Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. SENN: Did I understand the minister to say that under this act the federal department pay all the expenditures on these dams?

Mr. GARDINER: We pay the cost of dams of this particular type, but with dams of a smaller size for individuals or for a few individuals we pay two-thirds of the cost and the other one-third is paid by the individual, the municipality or someone else.

Mr. PERLEY: Is there anything paid to the individual for the work he does on his own dam?

Mr. GARDINER: It depends on how the work is done. The amount paid by the federal government is supposed to cover the individual farmer for the work he does in connection with the dam that is built, but in many instances the individual farmer makes other arrangements and probably hires someone else to do that work.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Is there any provision in these private contracts that those employed must be residents of Alberta, or is any preference given to those living in the area?

Mr. GARDINER: In instances where the work is carried on by the special areas board, the board uses its own judgment. My information is that most of those who work on these jobs are obtained in the community. That is true also of contractors who go in to do certain works. We put in a special clause providing that they shall take their employees so far as possible from the district immediately surrounding.

Mr. SENN: In a great many government contracts with private firms there is a fair wage clause inserted. Would the minister state just what is the determining factor in respect of the rate of wages for men, teams, tractors, and so forth?

Mr. GARDINER: That is covered by the agreement. They set up a condition similar to that set up in all government contracts, and where there is union labour available, where the term "labouring man" can be applied, the wages are such as are determined by the Department of Labour here for labour; but in a farming community the wage that is set is the prevailing wage in that community, usually the wage paid by municipal bodies in getting similar work done. We do not attempt to set a scale of wages that outbids the municipality or provincial government in getting similar work done in that community.

Mr. SENN: Is there any supervision over the wages paid by a private contractor?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, there is a definite clause in all the contracts, just as in other government contracts, and there is supervision over the employment of labour.

[Mr. Senn.]

Mr. PERLEY: The minister's statement this evening has concerned Alberta more particularly. Perhaps it would not be out of order for the minister to make a statement with respect to the agreements made in Saskatchewan, and to state what projects are under way at the present time and not completed. The minister might give us the number of contracts that have been let in Saskatchewan during the last year. I should like that information apart from such projects as the Moose Jaw water supply project. Would the minister also state how far the government is assisting in the Moose Jaw water supply contract?

Mr. GARDINER: Before leaving the questions asked by the hon. member for Acadia, there was one other matter, the Medicine Hat irrigation proposal. There is west of Medicine Hat the Canada Land and Irrigation Company's land, where an irrigation project was undertaken many years ago while the lands were still owned, controlled and operated from Ottawa. An agreement was entered into at that time under which a British company was going to settle a considerable area, after having placed water upon the land. Financial difficulties arose, and after the company had spent something in the neighbourhood of $13,000,000 in developing an irrigation project in that area, the company found itself unable to extend its operations. If my memory serves me correctly, the amount of land in that district which was irrigated is in the neighbourhood of 45,000 acres. There are people living on those 45,000 acres, and two or three years ago we spent about $80,000, in assisting these people in obtaining water from the Bow river, some one hundred miles distant. We assisted them by taking care of some of the works which were installed in the earlier years, and which were in a deteriorated condition and would have become useless in a very short time. We had a little difficulty later because a certain community in Alberta desired water from these same ditches and we were not able to make arrangements under which that water could be supplied. We took the position at the time that if we ever again had to deal with the Canadian Land and Irrigation Company we would want an undertaking from them, in connection with the supply of water to others outside the community that they had organized, which would be satisfactory to the government.

A short time ago a delegation from Alberta suggested that we enter into an arrangement which would require an agreement of some kind with this company. The first proposal was that we spend $3,500,000 to assist in widening the ditches that supplied that area, the province of Alberta, this company and ourselves thus making it possible to irrigate other areas of land that would be available for re-settlement. I stated at that time that it was impossible for the government to consider spending $3,500,000, which was the total vote for this purpose, on this area of 60,000,000 acres of land, in order to take care of, at the outside, 2,000 families in the neighbourhood of Medicine Hat; that if that project were ever to be considered it would have to be at some time when many of our other activities had been completed. As a resut of that decision a smaller project was proposed which would involve the turning over of part of the lands of the Canada Land and Irrigation Company to the dominion government for the settlement of persons who were being taken off some of these submarginal lands. That is the proposal which at the moment has not been given final consideration, and I can give no further information concerning it now.

Mr. BLACKMORE: To what extent has any other province gone in the development of anything corresponding to the special areas board which Alberta has developed? My reason for asking this question is that we feel that as a province we have gone a long way in dealing with a problem which was "wished" upon us; it was not our making, as the minister recognized the other night. The settlement of those areas was carried out by the dominion government without our control. We have spent a great deal of money and gone to a great deal of trouble to develop a special areas board and deal with the problem. If the minister can show us that any other province has gone as far as Alberta has in that matter, it would make us feel a little better.

Mr. GARDINER: I have not gone over the record, so I have not the information before me concerning the special areas board in Alberta. They have done good work in persuading people to move from these areas, but I do not think they have spent any considerable amount of money in doing so. It is now some sixteen years since the activities were started, and the only year I can recall is the last year before we began to assist them. I think the total expenditure that year was about $16,000. What it was in preceding years I am not prepared to say, but they were not spending any considerable amount of money in the last year or two before we joined in the activities, I suppose largely on account of the difficult conditions existing under which they could not obtain money. I do not suppose the federal government would ever have come into the picture in any of the western provinces had it not been for the great difficulty of the years following 1931 and 1932. It was those difficulties that caused the federal government to undertake some activities in that area.

I may say in direct answer to the question of the hon. member I do not know that any other province spent any considerable sums in doing the same thing. The province of Saskatchewan spent considerable sums in 1920, 1921, and 1922, the year that Alberta began to encourage people to move away from that area, in moving people out of the section immediately north of Maple Creek, which is just across the boundary line from these special areas, and also moving people from farther north into far north country; but after a few years, when moisture was again falling on those lands, they found that many of those people came back and re-settled on the land they had left. That is, from 1922 on people returned, and my memory is that a very large percentage, I think well over half, of the people, some of whom were assisted, and some of whom went of their own free will from that area, came back and re-settled there. With that experience in mind it has been the desire of the department and the government to take on this occasion action which will make it unlikely that people will come back and re-settle on these lands, because we know that if they do so it will result in greater and greater expenditures of money over the years in providing relief and that kind of thing which we have had to do in the last few years.

So, while I do not know that any other government has taken the same course as Alberta, and I do not think any other government did set up a board and attempt to operate in that way, the government of Saskatchewan passed legislation, which I think they term the Reclamation Act, and they have a special arrangement with the municipal bodies in that province under which the municipal bodies take over land by tax sale and otherwise to be kept out of cultivation. Those lands are turned over to us free of charges, and our reason for asking that the provincial government turn these lands over to us is in order that they may be kept out of cultivation when we have once spent money in order to get them out of cultivation. We think those lands should then be placed under the control of the body that spent the money, and put in a position where it is not likely that they will come back into cultivation.

It is for that reason that we are rather anxious to have the other provinces enter into some agreement.

Mr. QUELCH: In June, 1936, an agreement was arrived at whereby these community pastures would be fenced by the federal government and left under the administration of the provincial government. Then, apparently in September the Saskatchewan government found that they were not agreeable to go ahead with that proposal and submitted another one to the federal government. But the Alberta government had agreed to abide by the original arrangement and were willing to go ahead with it. Then the federal government turned round and told Alberta it would have to accept the same agreement as Saskatchewan. I do not think that was fair; the Alberta government were quite prepared to go ahead under the original agreement reached in June, 1936; but just because Saskatchewan submitted another agreement which was more acceptable to the federal government, the latter turned round and presented an ultimatum to Alberta requiring them to accept a new agreement.

Mr. GARDINER: I am just looking up my record to see if I am right in saying that that agreement was entered into in 1936.

Mr. QUELCH: It was in June, 1936.

Mr. GARDINER: It was in June, but I cannot recall at the moment whether it was in 1936 or 1937. In any event an agreement was not required at that time. A meeting of the advisory committee was held; the whole matter was discussed, and we decided then that we might be able to proceed in a certain way. We tried to carry on in that way from June until August and found it impossible to get anywhere.

Mr. QUELCH: Why did the government find it impossible to get anywhere? Alberta was all prepared; they had the land all ready and had started to move the settlers.

Mr. GARDINER: The main reason it was impossible to get anywhere was that the arrangement made at that time was to the effect that the mortgage companies, the railway companies, the Hudson's Bay Company and the land companies generally represented on that committee were quite willing to turn over lands on certain conditions to be put into pastures which were to be fenced by the federal government, but we found that there was great difficulty in the provinces dealing with the persons who owned the land when they did not have the money to deal with them, and get the lands evacuated to be put into pasture.

Mr. QUELCH: Is it not a fact that Alberta had already acquired the lands by tax sale?

Mr. GARDINER: No; there is one area that Alberta wants to deal with on which there are two or three hundred families. But there are many areas that have not been cleared at all. Some of those that have been cleared by tax sale, to the extent that the individual has gone, have not yet been placed in a position where any one else can claim title to them, and immediately the government comes along with a sum of money, the hon. member for Acadia will agree that there are always individuals who come back into the picture with some idea that they can collect. Our difficulty was this—and it did not make any difference what province we were in—that sometimes a dozen or more individuals would not enter into the agreement until they actually saw the money. The province would get options from them, discuss the matter with them and would then come back to the federal government and declare that they were ready to deal with these people if the federal government could supply them with the money; but by the time we got into a position to supply the money the individual had raised the price or had taken some other attitude which we were not prepared to meet, with the result that we were not getting anywhere with the activities of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act in relation to these projects.

Mr. LANDERYOU: There are some large areas that have been completely taken over for taxes.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, but some of these are not of that nature where you would want to have a community pasture, and the Alberta government are not desirous of having a community pasture in such places. The plan followed is to allow certain families to use the surrounding lands for live stock purposes. With that condition prevailing, by August we came to the conclusion that we would not get anywhere in trying to carry out the plans we had under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act unless, when the time came for negotiation, we could associate ourselves directly with the persons concerned. So that the operating arrangement now made is for the province to evacuate all the land they can by tax sale. They obtain any understandings they can with companies and individuals and then make a proposal to us; and if they have sufficiently eliminated difficulties from their proposal to make it possible for it to be carried out, then we undertake to proceed further, to negotiate directly with the individuals and to make whatever arrangements are necessary to get the whole project cleared up and under way.

Mr. LEADER: It is not my wish to interrupt this unusually friendly discussion between the minister and hon. members from Alberta, but I should like to make one or two observations. Listening to the great problem of resettling our friends in western Canada who have suffered from drought conditions, I have been thinking that we in Manitoba have not suffered to anything like the same extent; in fact, there are in Manitoba areas that have not suffered at all from crop failure.

I heard the minister say that this project will cost so many hundreds of thousands of dollars, and I believe I heard the sum of $3,500,000 mentioned to-night. I cannot help thinking that we might save a good deal of this expenditure and still not interfere too much with nature. My own province is perhaps specially endowed in having just what the minister requires in his business of resettling the farmers in question. I was interested in what he had to say with regard to community pastures. I believe we have one at Carberry, and it has served a useful purpose. In my own constituency, in that part of the country referred to as the interlake country, there are vast areas of land suitable for the raising of live stock. In fact, some of that land is suitable for cultivation. It is good land, but there are many stones, and for that reason it would be difficult to clear up large areas. That is not particularly disadvantageous for the reason that we are wondering what we are going to do with the surplus wheat and barley products we now have. But that land would be suitable for live stock, and an opportunity exists there for the settling of thousands of families.

I wish the minister would consider my suggestion and make an investigation to see whether we have not in Manitoba suitable land that could be procured by the government or by some other body at a very low price, with a view to bringing in these people from Alberta and parts of Saskatchewan where they find it difficult to make a living. We would welcome them, and I am sure that, if they are at all industrious, they could make a good home in my province. In growing live stock they would be close to the market at Winnipeg, and that is an inducement. I suggest that this suggestion is worthy of consideration. My concluding remark is that the minister might take into consideration the fact that in Manitoba we have these areas that can be procured at a low price per acre, and the land would be well worth the money.

Mr. GARDINER: The rate at which we require the provincial government to turn the land over is nothing at all. They give it to us. We are now getting from the provincial government, without charge, in so far as the lands are under their control, all the lands that we are fencing in Saskatchewan.

Mr. LEADER: I was thinking of the huge expenditures which the government is called upon to meet in rehabilitating those lands so that the farmers can make a living. Those lands might be dear at any price.

Mr. GARDINER: I have the cost of all these pastures that have been set up to date. There are some thirty of the larger sized pastures, and they are costing less than $1 an acre for their establishment. That is, the whole cost to the government of procuring any lands that have to be obtained—lands which may have belonged to individuals and on which there were buildings—the cost of managing the pasture, the cost of fencing and the cost of placing water on the lands, amounts, generally speaking, to somewhere round $1 or a little more than $1 an acre. So that the total cost of projects of that kind is not high.

I have driven over a considerable part of Manitoba not only in recent years but over the last thirty-seven years, and I know that the part of the province which lies west of Verdun and south of Verdun, and also in the vicinity of Elkhorn, and the land even further south towards the United States boundary, is quite similar to the land in Alberta and Saskatchewan about which I have been speaking. If anything, it is of less value as land. The only difference between that area and some of the areas further west is that they get a little more rain there.

Mr. LEADER: I have reference to the land in the interlake country, between lake Manitoba and lake Winnipeg, north of Portage la Prairie. I have gone through that district in the driest years in the west, and I have seen grass three and a half feet high, acres upon acres of it, with scarcely any settlers—one here and another three or four miles away, and so on.

Mr. GARDINER: There is something very much different between the interlake country in Manitoba and the country we are discussing. One difference is that they have a more bountiful rainfall. The prairie farm rehabilitation moneys are not for expenditure upon lands where the rainfall is sufficient. If we were to undertake that sort of work probably we should have to extend our operations from one end of Canada to the other. The activities under this measure are in relation to lands where the rainfall is comparatively light.

It is hardly correct to say that all lands being fenced into pastures are like the lands referred to a moment ago by the hon. member for Acadia. For example, there is an area in the southern end of Saskatchewan where buffalo grass grows naturally. There is all the difference in the world between buffalo grass and the grass up between the two lakes in Manitoba. Buffalo grass, in the short grass country, will finish cattle. They do not require any grain; they are finished on the grass, and even short grass in that country is very much more valuable as feed than long grass in some other areas.

In addition to that, may I say that while in 1937 that part of the country looked like summer fallow, though it had never been broken up, in 1938 one could cut the grass on that same land with a binder. I make that statement in order to indicate to hon. members that in a country of that kind there are possibilities that have to be dealt with having regard to the surrounding conditions. What we are attempting in that area is to take that large pasture I just mentioned, which contains 130,000 acres and which was almost bare in 1937, not out of cultivation because it never was cultivated, but out of ranching. It was pastured down in the dry years so as to be almost useless even for ranching purposes. We are making of it what we call a reserve pasture. We will never permit anyone to settle on it; we will never permit it to be leased again for ranching purposes. We will maintain it as open prairie country upon which we can run live stock in years when we have difficulties in regard to feed, thus removing the necessity of shipping cattle to the central part of Manitoba or bringing seed all the way from Three Rivers in Quebec. That is our objective in connection with a pasture of that kind. The people are not going to move out of that country; the land is too good. When it does rain there they get good crops, and even if they have to go for three or four years without crops they are going to continue to live there in the hope that they may get three or four of those bountiful crops to which they have been accustomed in the past. We think it is very much better for the government so to organize that country that they can stay there and make a living without being government charges during years when they are without rain.

Mr. PERLEY: Where is that pasture?

Mr. GARDINER: It is the one in the vicinity of Valmarie. It has not been completed as yet.

Mr. FAIR: Does the government supervise the construction of dams by contractors?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; we have engineers supervising the work of building dams by contractors.

Mr. FAIR: In connection with the construction of the Bartman dam, could the minister tell us the amount of damage done by that wash-out and whether the Poole Construction Company made it good?

Mr. GARDINER: The dam had to be rebuilt, and it cost almost as much to rebuild it as it cost to put it up in the first place. As the hon. member for Acadia said, the dam washed out and had to be replaced.

Mr. FAIR: So the government had to pay twice for that dam?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. LANDERYOU: How many contracts were entered into in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan under the act last year, and just how many of these contracts were made with private companies and how many with government departments?

Mr. GARDINER: That is for 1938-39? I have the figures all the way back to 1935, if that would be satisfactory. These figures are as of February 28, 1939. In Manitoba there were 3,436 applications approved and awaiting approval; in Saskatchewan, 5,529, and in Alberta, only 712. Of these applications 2,838 have been approved in Manitoba, 4,275 in Saskatchewan and 634 in Alberta, which is a larger proportion, naturally, because the number was smaller and we would be able to get over those projects much more quickly. These are dug-outs to which I am referring, and of those approved 2,565 have been completed in Manitoba; 2,355 in Saskatchewan, and 258 in Alberta. The completion, of course, depends upon the activity of the farmers themselves rather than upon the activity of the government. We have passed 634 applications in Alberta, but only 258 have been completed. I should have said that in some instances the activity has been on the part of municipal bodies, in all three provinces.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Could the minister give the amount of money involved as well?

Mr. GARDINER: I had better go back to the beginning, then. Dug-outs in Manitoba over the whole period involved the sum of $223,155; in Saskatchewan, $211,950, and in Alberta, $20,124, or a total of $455,229.

I now come to stock-watering dams, in regard to which the figures are as follows:

	Manitoba	Saskatchewan	Alberta
Applications	364	3,600	1,409
Approved	263	1,823	697
Completed	164	1,686	526
Cost	$13,776	$128,136	$45,762

It will be noted that in regard to stock-watering dams there were very many more applications from Alberta than from Manitoba, and that in the case of Alberta and Saskatchewan approximately half the applications have been approved.

I now come to irrigation projects, for which the figures are as follows:

	Manitoba	Saskatchewan	Alberta
Applications	19	1,398	714
Approved	16	403	218
Completed	4	358	163
Cost	$340	$48,688	$24,287

It will be noted that these are very small irrigation projects, and that the amount spent in Alberta was about half the amount spent in Saskatchewan for the same purpose.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Those would be individual projects on farms?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. PERLEY: What period does this cover?

Mr. GARDINER: From the beginning down to February 28 of this year.

I now come to community and neighbour projects during the same period. The difference between these and the others is that these are for the use of more than one family:

Province	Applications	Approved	Completed	Cost
Manitoba—
Dug-outs	0	0	0	0
Stock-water dams	13	5	5	$13,425
Irrigation	0	0	0	0
Saskatchewan—
Dug-outs of the community type	126	102	93	55,800
Stock-watering dams	112	62	47	43,945
Irrigation of the community type	5	2	2	2,080
Alberta—
Dug-outs of the community type	7	6	4	2,788
Stock-watering dams	43	38	30	16,680
Irrigation	27	13	10	8,340

In connection with irrigation it will be noted that the costs are much higher than in any of the others.

The next classification deals with applications approved and awaiting approval.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What is the amount of money involved in contracts given to the provinces themselves and in contracts given to private contractors in each of the provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think I have the information in that form.

Mr. DONNELLY: What is the total amount spent on the smaller projects?

Mr. GARDINER: The total amount spent on dug-outs is $455,229; on stock-watering dams, $187,674; on small irrigation projects, $73,315, making a grand total of $716,218.

Mr. PERLEY: Some time ago I asked the minister to make a statement with regard to the agreement with Saskatchewan, and the projects under way and not completed in that province?

Mr. GARDINER: Although I have not a copy of the agreement with Saskatchewan before me, it is to the effect that they will turn over any lands of which the province has control and upon which it has asked the federal government to establish projects. Those lands will be turned over to the government of Canada free of any charge to it, on the understanding that we shall proceed to develop pasture projects on those particular lands.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister give particulars with respect to those pastures. Some time ago I asked for information, and a return was tabled showing that the cost of fencing was $3.61 a mile. A few moments ago the minister made reference to Valmarie pasture. I have before me a sessional paper which gives me certain information, and I thought I heard the minister say that there are over 100,000 acres in that pasture.

Mr. GARDINER: There is more than one, but one of them is 130,000 acres.

Mr. PERLEY: In the one at Valmarie there are 80,000 acres, and sixty-one miles of fencing. What is likely to be the total cost of that pasture?

Mr. GARDINER: To answer first the question asked with regard to the pastures which have been set up in Saskatchewan, I would place on record certain information which I have before me. The first completed pasture is in the rural municipality of Brokenshell, No. 68. The pastures are numbered one and two. The first one has thirty-nine miles of fencing, and the second one has twenty-two miles. The acreage in the first is 20,960 and in the second, 8,160. This, as I understand the matter, will eventually develop into one and the same pasture. They start in two different parts of the project, with the idea that eventually other land will be evacuated. The total cost of the first one is $14,062.81. It will be noticed that this is considerably less than $1 an acre. The total cost of the second one, in which the acreage is 8,160 is $8,368.63. Where there are smaller acreages, costs of fencing are naturally higher.

Mr. PERLEY: Does that include fencing?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. In proportion it takes a longer fence to fence a small area than it does to fence a larger area. The second one is at Battle River and Cut Knife, in the northwest part of the province. There are 44½ miles of fencing; the acreage is 18,560 and the total cost, $24,015.07. For Battle Creek grazing area, special area A, in the south end of the province, there are 38½ miles of fencing, an acreage of 38,200 and a total cost of $15,258.47. In the rural municipality of Coalfields, No. 4, east of the town of Estevan, pasture No. 1 has 31½ miles of fencing. There are 9,300 acres in the pasture, and the cost is $11,224.74.

In rural municipality No. 314, at Dundurn, in pasture No. 1 there are thirty-six miles of fencing, 19,840 acres and the cost is $16,868.93. Next are rural municipalities Nos. 5 and 6, at Estevan and Cambria. One of those is about the town of Estevan, and the other is immediately west. In pasture No. 1 there are seventeen miles of fencing; there is an acreage of 6,880, and the cost of construction is placed at $9,248.16.

In rural municipality No. 71, at Excel, there are pastures Nos. 1 and 2, the first of which has twenty-two miles of fencing and the second eighteen miles. The first consists of 9,440 acres and cost $6,965.09; the second has 6,080 acres and cost $5,949.15.

In rural municipality No. 39, at the Gap, there are pastures Nos. 1 and 2, the first with eighteen miles of fencing and the second with twenty-eight miles. In the first there is an acreage of 5,440 acres, and in the second, 6,240 acres. The cost of the first is placed at $10,689.23 and the second at $9,815.14.

In rural municipality No. 289, at Hillsburgh, in pasture No. 2, there are 31½ miles of fencing, an acreage of 12,640 and a cost of $16,818.89.

In rural municipality No. 352, at Heat's Hill, in pasture No. 1, there are 34½ miles of fencing; the acreage is 16,000 and the cost of construction, $15,050.78.

Mr. PERLEY: I might facilitate matters by telling the minister that I have a return. All I am asking is the lump sum.. There are thirty odd pastures with about 473,000 acres, and 922 miles of fencing.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not wish to deny the hon. member any information he wishes. I was going to give all of it to him.

Mr. PERLEY: Could the minister give us information for the Simpson pasture?

Mr. GARDINER: The whole acreage is 473,360, and the total cost $400,883.97, or somewhat less than $1 an acre for the whole undertaking. There will be some variation.

Mr. PERLEY: Can the minister give just the Simpson pasture?

Mr. GARDINER: In what municipality is that? It is not listed here as the Simpson pasture.

Mr. PERLEY: It was a separate return brought down early in the session.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Is there any fee being put up in connection with these pastures?

Mr. GARDINER: These pastures are organized in this way. First, the municipality approaches the provincial government and asks to have a certain area organized into a pasture. The provincial government undertakes to have the lands evacuated by any persons who are living within the area. They usually succeed up to a point where only one or two are left. We then investigate the pasture to see whether it is possible to get those people who remain moved out on to lands immediately adjacent. We then put a fence round the lands and make them available to the people who are living roundabout. They pay a fee for putting their live stock into the pasture, and these fees are supposed to cover all costs of maintenance including the maintaining of the fences and the paying of the pasture manager. We assist as a government in raising the standard of the live stock within that pasture.

Mr. SENN: Is there any limit to what any one farmer can put into the pasture?

Mr. GARDINER: The government inspector decides how many cattle the pasture will carry. The grass is investigated by a man having the technical skill necessary to determine how many cattle or how many cattle and horses can be carried. We then take in the farmers in the first mile round the pasture, then those in the second mile, and so on until we get a sufficient number of farmers having approximately two-thirds of the stock the pasture will carry. The farmers are then asked to form themselves into a community pasture association and appoint a committee to operate the pasture. We allow them to divide up the acreage and determine how much live stock in relation to the acreage shall be put in. We set up certain regulations which apply to the pasture. Hon. members may want to know the reason for placing the limit at two-thirds. In all probability after these men have gained a little experience they will want to add to their own herds or admit other farmers to the pasture. We leave it to them to determine what shall be done within certain limits, but we do not permit them to put in more cattle than the lands will properly carry.

Mr. POULIOT: How much has been spent under this act up to the present time, and what are the proposed disbursements for this year?

Mr. GARDINER: For the pastures?

Mr. POULIOT: For everything.

Mr. GARDINER: The amount set up for the pastures up to the present time is the amount I gave a moment ago. Most of these pastures are in Saskatchewan, although there are two or three in Manitoba. The total area of the pastures is 473,360 acres and the disbursement is $400,883.97.

Mr. POULIOT: Would that include the fences?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, everything.

Mr. POULIOT: I have just a word to say at this point. This legislation seems to be adopting an entirely new policy. The dominion government is dealing not only with provinces, but with municipalities and even with private individuals. I take this opportunity to insist upon some works being carried out in the province of Quebec as well as in the western provinces. For instance, near the city of Rivière du Loup there is a very important dam, lake Morin dam, which could be used for irrigation purposes, just as is done in the west.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Are they suffering from drought there?

Mr. POULIOT: I do not see why Rivière du Loup should not have the same advantages as any city, town or municipality in any of the prairie provinces. We are not jealous of the prairie provinces, but we do not want them to pull the blanket too much to their side. There are good people in the province of Quebec; there are good people in the province of Ontario, there are good people in the maritime provinces, and we want our share. The farmers in some parts of Quebec are in distress. I live in one of the finest constituencies in Canada, but there have been forest fires in my constituency and there are settlers who are almost starving. Irrigation is sorely needed, and I should like this policy to be applied to Témiscouata constituency just the same as it is applied to the three prairie provinces. The western people are our brothers. We are good Samaritans and are ready to give them help, but on the other hand we do not think we should unclothe ourselves for them. The farmers and settlers in my constituency are in distress, and I want them to have at least as much as their western brothers.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank my hon. friend for saying that. He knows my request is fair.

For the enlightenment of members of the committee I should like to describe a most absurd division of land which was made some years ago in my constituency by the provincial government. In order to make this distribution they used maps which contained no elevations. There were no hills and valleys, and the lands were divided like pieces of cake without taking into consideration the ups and downs of the country. Some of the settlers at St. Jean de la Lande parish, which the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) knows very well, have been placed on the side of a steep hill and are apparently supposed to cultivate rocks. It is no easier to cultivate rocks than it is to try to cultivate under drought conditions. These men were induced to go there by former immigration agents who were employees of the railway company. They were well paid and in order to justify their positions they had to attempt to show that a conquest was being made of the soil. These settlers are just like the goats on the side of a mountain.

Many of these people are suffering. I have received many letters, some of which I sent to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), some to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), and some to other members of the cabinet. When one of these men is very ill and is sent to the hospital for an operation, his family cannot get relief. I have had to write letters in order that a family might be given enough to subsist while a father or mother was in the hospital for an operation. These people are suffering and they need help. The government has done something for our western brothers, and I want something to be done for the settlers and farmers of Témiscouata constituency. We have suffered from the cutting of trees on a very large scale; there have also been forest fires at times, and by reason of the disappearance of timber, irrigation is badly needed to keep a certain amount of moisture in the soil in order that we may not have poor crops, one every second year or one every three years. We need crops regularly, a good average crop.

In many old parishes in my constituency there are good, sound, progressive farmers who have suffered from the drought, although perhaps not so much so as farmers in certain sections of the west, but they have suffered from the drought nevertheless, because of the trees having been cut. Hon. members are familiar with the comparsion between the straw roof and the tin roof. On a tin roof the water runs away fast, but a straw roof holds the water from running away fast. The water runs off a straw roof little by little, and it is the same with the land. The trees are a protection and hold the moisture longer in the land.

I want a fair and square deal for the farmers and settlers of Témiscouata constituency and of the province of Quebec at large. What would happen if we all died of hunger in the east? It would then be for the west to support us, and the western provinces would be very much embarrassed to do for us what we do for them. They should keep that in mind when they come here making requests, and when they make a request they should be fair enough to cut their request in two and let us have fifty per cent for necessary works in the east. We would be satisfied with that fifty per cent. I want to tell that to my hon. friends from the west.

I should also like to say to the Minister of Agriculture, who has been powerful enough to succeed in having the government change its policy, that I hope he will not forget the eastern provinces. I remember that complaints were made against the Minister of Labour for not receiving the mayor and council of Toronto. He would not deal with any city because it was outside the constitution for him to do so. The constitution has not been amended since; it is still the same constitution, and yet the Minister of Agriculture can deal directly with the municipalities, although the Minister of Labour says that he cannot. I should like a policy that is uniform, and when one member of the cabinet can deal with municipalities I should like his colleagues to have the same power. I wonder if it is really within the constitution or outside the constitution. I would not recommend anything unconstitutional, but when a thing is done for one part of the country it should be constitutional to do it for the whole country. That is my humble understanding.

May I place on record what I want. In the first place I want the lake Morin dam developed at Rivière du Loup. I did not have the opportunity to discuss it with the minister, but the Minister of Labour is thoroughly familiar with the project, as are the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), and I do not not know whether I have not spoken to my chief about it also. That is one thing, and a very important thing, because the city of Rivière du Loup has her own municipal plant, dating back to long before the time of Sir Adam Beck. Moreover, the dam would serve other purposes—

Mr. WALSH: Mr. Chairman, I know that my hon. step-godfather will not mind my intrusion, but may I ask just which clause we are discussing at the present moment, and what relation the hon. gentleman's remarks have to the clause before the committee?

Mr. POULIOT: I have adopted the hon. gentleman to keep him silent when I am speaking. I do not expect him to make interruptions because I have adopted him. But the more he interrupts me in the house when I am standing up for the rights of my electors, the bigger majority I shall have, because I receive letters from my constituents and when they see I am interrupted by the hon. gentleman they say, "Cheerio, you are doing good work. Continue."

Mr. WALSH: Mr. Chairman, we do not mind how many votes the hon. gentleman gets, but I hardly think the construction of a dam in Témiscouata constituency and other details the hon. gentleman is giving us have any reference to the clause under discussion at the present time. I think we should keep the discussion in order. His remarks might come in appropriately later.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order—

Mr. POULIOT: May I speak to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, before you give your decision?

The CHAIRMAN: Certainly.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. Speaking on the point of order, and just as a matter of explanation and for the enlightenment of one hon. member who apparently did not understand what I have been discussing, we are now discussing the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. It provides for a certain amount of expenditure, quite a large expenditure, $450,000, the minister has said, for certain farm property in the west. That is the question before the committee. But my contention is that this legislation is not wide enough, that it should include also the eastern provinces, where the need for such improvements is just as great as in the west, and therefore I put the whole matter before the committee. My idea is that the whole of Canada should be included within the scope of this bill, which should not be sectional but be for the benefit of the whole country. Moreover, I was pointing out the enormous change that has taken place in the policy of the government, with the minister now dealing directly with the municipalities.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the hon. member still on the point of order?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN: I would ask the hon. member to make his remarks on the point of order as brief as possible.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir. My contention in the first place was that the legislation is too narrow, and I want it broadened. My second point was that there has been an enormous change in the policy of the government by virtue of which the minister now intends to deal directly with municipalities, and not only with municipalities but also with individuals.

Mr. GARDINER: We have not reached that clause yet.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I will submit my first point only.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh), I am of the opinion that his point is well taken, for the reason that we are discussing Bill No. 36, an act to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. The hon. member for Témiscouata has been speaking of his own constituency. I am not aware that it is prairie country, and therefore I rule that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I shall have to deny my pet from Mount Royal.

Mr. LANDERYOU: May I ask if the minister has entered directly into contacts with municipalities and individuals as mentioned by the hon. member for Témiscouata?

Mr. GARDINER: There are undertakings on the part of municipalities to operate some of the pastures, and there are undertakings on the part of individuals in some instances. We hire men to do the work, just the same as we hire anyone else to do other work.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Are contracts entered into directly by the government with the municipalities?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; arrangements are made by the government with municipalities all over Canada to do many things. We shall probably have some undertakings in connection with many of the cities and towns of the province of Quebec this year, as we always have had in connection with works carried on there.

Mr. LANDERYOU: How many of these individual associations have been formed to deal with these large areas?

Mr. GARDINER: There are thirty pastures now set up, and there will be thirty individual organizations to deal with them.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): When this land is being turned over from the provinces to the dominion under this plan, who retains the mineral rights on that land—the province or the dominion?

Mr. GARDINER: The province simply turns over to the government the right to operate the land as a pasture; we get the land the same as a person purchasing it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Does the province retain the mineral rights?

Mr. GARDINER: We would have no objection to that.

Mr. SENN: The minister was explaining how these different associations were set up, who determines the number of cattle that could be placed on a pasture by each member of the association, and how the amount of fees paid for each head of cattle was determined. I should like to have him finish that explanation, because I was under the impression that the fees are not very large, perhaps only large enough to pay the actual running expenses of the pasture; so it seemed to me that farmers were getting very cheap pasture, and it might pay them better to have cattle pastured in these government pastures than to keep them on their own places.

Mr. GARDINER: The pastures are more or less tributary to a man's farm; they are community pastures in the same sense as the common land in the older countries. The pasture equipment is not only fences but corrals and everything necessary for the proper keeping of several hundred head of cattle. The breeding sires are put in the pasture under the care of the manager of the pasture, and the whole breeding policy of that area is under his direction. The fees are made sufficient to cover not only the payment of the manager and the cost of other services, but to take care of maintenance and repairs to fencing and buildings and that kind of thing. In the first year the fees collected were slightly under the amount expended for those purposes—I have not the exact figure—and it will take two or three years of running experience to know exactly what the fees should be. But it is intended that the fees shall as nearly as possible cover the actual outlay. The whole policy and intent are to enable the farmers living in the surrounding sub-marginal lands, lands not of the highest type, to run live stock on these pasture lands which could not be occupied successively by individuals, and by having the right to run stock on those lands the farmers on adjoining lands should be able to maintain themselves and keep off relief. The intention is to do exactly what has been suggested by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn), that is to make it less costly for the individual to maintain himself because of this common land being there.

Mr. SENN: I was not finding any particular fault with the plan except that there might be one or two members of that association who own a large number of cattle, and naturally they will get more advantage from the land than a man who may be just as needy but has not so many cattle. Some provision whereby one or two or a few farmers may not monopolize the whole pasture seems to me desirable.

Mr. GARDINER: That is taken care of in the regulations and the set-up of the committee. In the first place we do not form pastures for ranchers. These pastures are formed for people who are farming from a half section to a section of land in the neighbourhood of the pasture. They may have ten or twenty or thirty cattle each. They themselves take care of the matter referred to; they see that no one has too large a number of cattle. We also have regulations which govern them in that respect.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Do the regulations provide that cattle of the same breed shall be kept in the community pastures?

Mr. GARDINER: The intention is to confine the breeds more or less to the three chief beef varieties, the Black Angus, the Shorthorn and the Hereford. That will be controlled by the association; they will determine which breed they desire to have, and all in the association will have to have the same breed, or breeds of the same type.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) asked a question, and if the minister answered it I did not catch the answer. What is the total amount spent under this act for each fiscal year since the act was passed in 1935?

Mr. GARDINER: Let me first answer part of the question asked by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley). I have not been able to locate which of the pastures is called the Simpson pasture. It is not listed under that heading here. However, I have the Valmarie pasture. The acreage of the pasture associated with the irrigation plan at Valmarie, that is the one pasture which is now under construction, is 79,840 acres; miles of fencing, sixty-one; estimated cost, $72,966. The construction costs up to date are $31,-173.14, but 30½ miles of fencing has been done, or about half. The water development is partly done. The work was stopped on December 22, 1938 and will go on again this spring. The pasture work is about half completed.

Mr. PERLEY: In connection with the thirty odd community pastures involving nearly one thousand miles of fencing, how were the posts and wire secured? Did they get any of the posts in the northern part of Saskatchewan, or were they brought from British Columbia?

Mr. GARDINER: Tenders were called for; there had to be at least three tenders for any one pasture. These tenders were made by hardware merchants or dealers who sell these supplies. The same thing is true in regard to posts; the posts were purchased by tender and shipped to the railway point nearest to the pasture. The work itself was done under a foreman by the farmers in the locality; the fences were actually built by the farmers who are going to use that pasture and pay for its maintenance and everything connected with it.

Mr. PERLEY: Have they a contract with the Northern Wood Preserving Company of Prince Albert for getting out posts, and how many posts did they get from that company?

Mr. GARDINER: The Northern Wood Preserving Company has just established a plant in Prince Albert this last year. Prior to this time our posts were obtained largely from British Columbia; we had to ship cedar posts all the way from British Columbia, and have them tarred before they were put in the ground. Last year we tried to get some posts in the northern part of Saskatchewan and blue-stoned them. We have carried on experiments at the Swift Current farm which indicate that blue-stoned poplar posts will last about twenty years and give good service. We obtained blue-stone posts last year from the northern part of the province for a considerable portion of our supplies. I do not know exactly the percentage, but in the pastures spoken of in some of the eastern papers recently, the one in the southwestern part of the province, it was said to have been built with rough posts simply taken out of the bluffs here and there. In the first place, I would point out that there are no bluffs to take posts out of; and every second post was said to be a cedar post brought from British Columbia and tarred to the ground. Every second post was a blue-stone poplar post shipped from the northern end of Saskatchewan for fencing.

Again, the fence was not a three-wire fence, but a four-wire fence. The farmers there do not usually build a four-wire fence. So that this fence was of a higher cost of construction. The farmers in that area usually go to the Cypress hills, cut their own pickets, take them down and do their fencing there, but this fence was built with posts shipped in, because we do not want to have to replace them every four or five years. We want to have these pasture fences remain at least during the lifetime of the leases. We have leased some of the lands for twenty or twenty-five years, and the fences we put up to-day will probably stand for fifty years. The Northern Wood Preserving Company put in a plant last year at Prince Albert, and they can creosote jack pine and poplar posts in that establishment. We have given them a contract to supply 400,000 posts next summer. No posts have been supplied from that plant to date. They are being supplied for the work next summer; we expect to get them at a very much lower cost than those we have had shipped in from long distances, and at the same time employment will be provided for people in the vicinity.

Mr. PERLEY: What persons constitute the Northern Wood Preserving Company?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know who the company are; but the manager, and I assume the man who is interested in it, is Mr. R. D. Pretty, who at one time ran a creosoting plant at Swift Current and, earlier than that, at Calgary. Lately he has been running one at Fort William or Port Arthur, I am not sure which, and he is also opening up this plant in the north.

Mr. PERLEY: Was this Mr. Pretty associated with the Canadian Pacific Railway at one time?

Mr. GARDINER: Years ago he was an engineer, or had some connection with the Canadian Pacific. I am informed that at one time he was in charge of the horticultural work of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What are the total amounts spent under the act in each fiscal year?

Mr. GARDINER: They are:

1935-36	$ 411,542 79
1936-37	959,818 78
1938-39 (to February 28)	2,945,728 50

Mr. PERLEY: A return brought down on February 14 states that nineteen dams, large projects, were built during 1938. Can the minister tell us where they were and whether they were completed before freeze-up in the fall of 1938, or has any work been done on them during the winter?

Mr. GARDINER: Just for 1938?

Mr. PERLEY: Yes. It was for the year 1938. I wanted to know whether they were completed before freeze-up or whether any work has been done on them this winter?

Mr. GARDINER: It would be impossible to do work on earth dams in the winter. Once there is frost in the soil it is impossible to do anything, so that no work can be done on dams after a week following the freeze-up; the dam would not be there in the spring.

Mr. PERLEY: These are said to be large projects, nineteen of them. Can the minister give the location in each case?

Mr. GARDINER: These are the dams under construction as at February 28, 1939. The first on the list is the Big Arm storage irrigation. The storage capacity is 5,200 acre feet, the irrigable area being from 5,000 to 8,000 acres. The estimated cost of construction is $8,348.53.

Caron water storage: storage capacity is 43,500 acre feet. There is no irrigable area estimated in connection with this project at the moment. The total cost will be $100,000. This is the one west of Moose Jaw, from which Moose Jaw will eventually probably take water for the city.

Cypress Lake storage: storage capacity is 70,000 acre feet, the irrigable area being 20,000 acres. The cost is $304,696.13, and the project is ninety per cent completed.

Downie lake irrigation: storage capacity is 10,000 acre feet; irrigable area, 5,100 acres. The cost is $61,461.65, and the project is ninety-five per cent completed.

Financial assistance for the eastern irrigation district, that is the Rolling Hills area, south of the Brooks irrigation project in Alberta: I have not the figures for storage capacity, but the irrigable area is 25,000 acres.

Mr. PERLEY: The return that I refer to had to do with Saskatchewan.

Mr. GARDINER: This is what the hon. member asked for, and I assume it is what he received.

Mr. PERLEY: I asked for a statement with regard to nineteen dams undertaken in Saskatchewan, during 1938—all in that province, nineteen large projects.

Mr. GARDINER: I will give the rest of these, because many of those that the hon. member asked for are included in this list and when they are counted he will probably find that all he has reference to are in the list. This includes Alberta as well.

Eastend extension irrigation: irrigable area, 2,896 acres. The cost is $30,661.45. The project is ninety-five per cent completed.

Glen Ewen dam storage: 250 acre feet. The estimated cost is $9,471.40.

Kisbey Flats irrigation: 5,000 acres. The total cost is $23,121.50.

Pipestone lake storage: 1,600 acre feet. The cost is $7,523.25.

Oxbow-Souris river storage dam: 600 acre feet; cost of construction, $16,130.

Souris-Estevan irrigation: 2,600 acre feet; estimated cost, $52,903.86. That is a flood irrigation project.

South Saskatchewan river storage: 2,760 acre feet. The cost is $243,106.25.

West Valmarie irrigation, 2,000 acre feet, irrigable area 3,416 acres, estimated cost $43,987.50.

Weyburn rural municipality underground storage, $3,333.33, which is only part of the cost of those works; the provincial government undertook to pay part of the cost as well.

In Alberta there is the Leavitt irrigation district, 7,000 acre feet, $46,304.80. All the preliminary arrangements have been made, but I do not think the work has actually started.

There is the Red Deer river test borings, which is the project I spoke of earlier in my remarks to-night, costing $5,000.

Then there are the St. Mary's, Waterton and Belly rivers irrigation projects, investigational work, $3,000.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): How many of these are actually under construction?

Mr. GARDINER: Quite a number. In some instances the contracts have just been let, among them the contract for the work at Leavitt. Our difficulty is to get the lands which are to be flooded.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister has not the total, without counting them up?

Mr. GARDINER: No, I have not.

Mr. DONNELLY: Has the minister any information with regard to the proposed Vanguard dam?

Mr. GARDINER: The works at Vanguard have been all surveyed, but the contract in connection with that dam has not been let as yet, and at the moment I am not in a position to state whether or not it will be let this year.

Mr. WEIR: Could the minister give the committee any information with respect to a proposal to build a dam on the Souris river at or near the town of Wawanesa. I understand this matter has been under consideration but is somewhat involved because of dams already built higher up on the Souris river both in Saskatchewan and in the United States. This river enters the United States and then comes back into Canada. The people in that vicinity are particularly concerned because these dams higher up in the river have cut off their normal water supply, and they are anxious that something should be done to get more water down the river to fill up their own water-holes and give them a normal flow of water, or that their water supply be protected in some other way. This is really giving them some concern, and it is a matter of some importance in that area. If the minister has any advice on the matter immediately at hand, I should be glad to hear it.

Mr. GARDINER: If we get our estimates through the house we are proposing to spend this year $500 for the purpose of carrying on further investigational work in connection with a dam at Wawanesa. The Souris river has its source in the province of Saskatchewan; then it runs into the state of North Dakota and then comes back into Manitoba. As a result there is some difficulty between the two provinces and the state of North Dakota on account of the fact that there has never been an international agreement in connection with the Souris river. Most of the streams, such as the Milk river, which is further west, and Frenchman's river, are covered by international agreements, but none has been negotiated with regard to the Souris river. There is sufficient storage capacity in the loop in the United States to take up all the water that flows into North Dakota from Saskatchewan. In other words, if our United States friends so desired, and an arrangement were not entered into, they could keep all the water that accumulates in the province of Saskatchewan and flows into the United States.

At the present time negotiations are under way, through the international joint commission, looking to an agreement between the United States and Canada in regard to the Souris river. I do not anticipate that there will be any great difficulty, since there has been none in the past. The two countries have been quite reasonable about these matters, and in all probability that will be the case in this instance, but at the moment the matter is in the negotiation stage.

Mr. LOCKHART: Did the minister give us the details in connection with the Govenlock pasture? I did not hear them if he did. Could I have the details?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. I had not reached the Govenlock pasture when the hon. member for Qu'Appelle thought he would not like any more of the list read. In our list this is known as the Nashlyn grazing area, special area A. It has fifty-seven miles of fencing; its acreage is 62,240, and the entire cost of construction was $28,237.59, which is considerably less than fifty cents an acre for the setting up of the pasture. This is the pasture to which I was referring a few moments ago when I said the fence was not a three-wire but a four-wire fence and when I said the posts were not pickets but cedar posts tarred up to the top of the ground, alternately with poplar posts that have been blue-stoned and thus made so that, according to our experience, they will last for at least twenty years.

In regard to an article which appeared in an eastern paper recently, I might just say that no barbed wire has been left lying round the place; it has been all rolled up and put away. Any barbed wire which was not used was wire which it would not pay anyone to use in building a new fence. If you have what is known as black barbed wire, not galvanized, that has been in a fence for some time, of course that wire will not stand stretching on a new fence, but it can be used in the cross-fencing of the pasture, and in this case any of this wire available will be so used ultimately. The outside fences have to be sufficiently strong to keep the stock which is put in by the farmers from getting out and damaging the crops. Again, anyone who has handled barbed wire knows that if you take it off a fence and allow it to lie round loose it kinks up, and when you start to stretch that wire with the kinks in it the wire ultimately breaks, if not while you are stretching it, then perhaps the first day after you leave it. In putting up a fence of this kind round an area containing 62,640 acres, we have not taken any chances by using wire of that kind. The cost of maintenance and of riding the fence would be so great, if we undertook to do anything of that kind, that the ultimate cost would be very much higher than the cost of using new wire in the first place and using the older wire for cross-fencing. That cross-fencing has not been done as yet, but the wire is available.

Mr. LOCKHART: In connection with that area the number of acres given me was 106,960. In the return brought down it was stated that in all instances permission was obtained from the leaseholders before the original fences were destroyed. Is the minister quite clear that no fences were destroyed without the permission of the leaseholders?

Mr. GARDINER: That is our report. Of course I have to depend upon our officials who are out there, and that is true as far as our information goes. The pasture to which I have just referred is known as the Nashlyn grazing area, special area A. It is nearer Nashlyn than Govenlock. Then the quarantine reserve, special area A, in L.I.D. 22 has sixty-five miles of fencing. The first one I read had fifty-seven acres; it is part of the same project. There are 44,720 acres in that area. The cost of that was $15,603.75, which is about a third of a dollar an acre as the cost of fencing. There will be one of these others which forms part of it, too, but the costs are approximately the same in all.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before saying what I had in mind, may I commend the minister, as I have done on several occasions, for his interest and consistent work in developing the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. But in the light of what has been said to-night I feel there are one or two observations which really ought to be made, so as to keep us all working together in Canada as a big family.

There are points of view in the west which probably easterners would not understand, unless they were given reasons. For a few moments I should like to set forth some of those points. The minister seemed to have the idea that the provinces could not be trusted to keep the land from being settled again, after the dominion had developed pastures. I would say, in passing, that the main difference between Alberta and the dominion over matters connected with the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act seems to be that the province does not feel it ought to give up control of its lands simply because the dominion develops under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I believe the reason for that difference needs to be set forth.

From what the minister said a few minutes ago I gathered he had a sort of apprehension that if the provinces had control of those lands they would be tempted to allow people to go back in upon them to settle, whereas if the dominion had control there would be less danger of that unfortunate occurrence. Was that the minister's idea?

Mr. GARDINER: The idea was not that the province could not be trusted to do it. The position is that the province has no money with which to carry out these operations at the present time—at least the provinces say they have not. All three provinces make that statement.

Before the present government took office the federal authorities undertook to carry on activities for the rehabilitation of that area. Since the present government has taken office we have carried on and enlarged upon the activities established by the previous government. But we have felt that since we are putting up the money, and the money is given to us in trust by the taxpayers of Canada to reestablish that country—and it is not a matter of not trusting the province—having spent the money of the people of Canada it is our obligation to take the people off that land, to reestablish the country and to see that the policy is carried out.

While we might trust the government of Alberta to do just exactly what we might expect them to do, we do not know, of course, what government is going to be in Alberta or in any other province in the future. For that reason we feel that if anyone is going to undo the work it should be the government which spent the money in the first place—not necessarily the government in office at the moment, but the government which represents all the people of Canada and which collected money from all the taxpayers of Canada in order that it should carry on the work. We feel that the government representing all the people should accept the obligation of either keeping that land out of cultivation or in the future putting it back into cultivation. So far as the present government is concerned, we think it should never go back into cultivation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad the minister has made that point clear, because I must say I did get the wrong impression from what he said earlier. I was going to make several observations which, under the present circumstances, I do not now propose to make.

With respect to the matter the minister has recently laid before us, may I say it is well that the people of Canada should understand that the west has a very real case which makes them feel, when they get their eyes thoroughly opened, that there is another side to what the minister has just said.

In the first place it was developed last year by an eminent authority in Ottawa that the three prairie provinces have, through tariffs, paid in the neighbourhood of $47,000,000 a year into the dominion treasury. That has been going on for a long time. The result is that when $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 are set aside for expenditures in connection with a proposition like prairie farm rehabilitation, we are likely to think of that $47,000,000 instead of the $3,000,000. After all is said and done, that is a matter which ought to be borne constantly in mind. I am sure the minister, coming from the west, will appreciate that point of view.

The remarks of the hon. member for Témiscouata show the importance of keeping these facts before our minds. In the west we are paying a large amount of money through the tariff. We are not getting any direct return from that expenditure, as are the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. We are not wishing to complain, but we do want hon. members to see our point of view. For a few moments may I indicate to hon. members some of the disadvantages from which we have suffered, and about which the hon. member for Témiscouata would no doubt like to hear. These are disadvantages which we have not been able to avoid.

The land settlement policies which for years were followed by dominion governments, and which on one or two occasions have been referred to in the house, have placed the three prairie provinces, and particularly Alberta and Saskatchewan, under a handicap which I believe is hardly realized by the rest of the dominion. In order to appreciate the situation we should remember that at least two great projects were paid for with land. One of these was the Hudson's Bay Company project. When the Hudson's Bay Company were persuaded to give up their holdings in the west they were allowed one-twentieth of the land surveyed in the townships from the United States boundary to the North Saskatchewan. One-twentieth was taken out here, there and all over the prairie provinces, and, in most instances, out of the choicest lands. When the time came for settlement people had to settle all round those pieces of land. This meant that the population was widely scattered. The extent to which Alberta alone is suffering to-day from that situation is remarkable. Before concluding my observations on this subject I shall say one or two things to indicate the extent of that suffering.

When the Canadian Pacific railway was built, the company were promised 25,000,000 acres, with mineral rights. According to figures I have they received about 18,000,000 acres. All hon. members have to do is to think of the colossal extent of 18,000,000 acres, and to remember that this land was selected all over the country and, to a large extent, from the choicest areas, to realize how settlement in the western provinces was spread out.

We say: What bearing has that on the situation? It has a tremendous bearing, and we will see shortly why. In addition, the Canadian Pacific Railway acquired perpetual exemption from taxation on their main line properties and on mineral rights for twenty years. The effect on the western provinces and on the communities in those provinces was serious. It put them under the handicap which started them to go into debt. Fifty-five million acres of prairie land were pledged to one organization or another. Even some other railway projects were supported with land. Unfortunately that land was given largely by Alberta and Saskatchewan. It is estimated that Alberta alone gave 13,120,000 acres. The whole cost, or practically all of it, fell on Alberta and Saskatchewan. Those provinces paid for not only the railroad in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, but for the railroad in western Ontario and British Columbia. I think this is a matter which should be kept steadily in mind by hon. members.

I will say that since I have come down here I have found hon. members disposed to be very sympathetic to the west, which is entirely as it ought to be, but we should still like to be understood a little more. I notice to-night that certain statements have been made that since we are asking for certain things, we should be willing to divide up. All we are asking for is the right to live. But we find ourselves placed in a position where it is impossible to carry on. The impossibility of our situation has been developed through the years by conditions like the one I have just mentioned. This spreading out of our settlement has affected our economy. Let me point out that the telephones in Alberta—

The CHAIRMAN: I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), but in my opinion he is out of order. We are dealing with a bill to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, and so far the hon. member has not touched upon that bill. I ask him to confine his remarks to Bill No. 36.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not blame you, Mr. Chairman, for thinking I have been off the subject. It will be only a minute or two until I am right on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN: I ask the hon. member to get on the subject immediately.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I can jump right into the middle just as well as I can start at the beginning, but I rather like to start at the beginning. The minister has raised the question of the province not being able to pay any money. The province cannot pay any money for the development of these projects on lands which the dominion government's policy allowed to be settled entirely without the say of the province. The minister pointed this out as the reason why the dominion should control the administration of the lands in question. I think it is quite clear now how this has a bearing on the subject. There are large areas in Alberta and Saskatchewan which were wished upon those provinces right over their heads. They are grappling with these situations. They have been placed under handicaps which are manifestly unjust and unfair. The dominion says that they will come in to help, but the provinces must give up the land. Just as soon as we got control of our lands we began to look after them. We did not obtain control of our lands until 1930, but immediately we did so we made stipulations which prevented the settlement of the country in such a way as to put us under a handicap. Having said that, I shall go on to say what I was going to say a minute ago. Because of the spreading out of our settlement Alberta has had to pay twenty per cent more for its telephone service than is paid in Ontario. For highways it costs us 500 per cent more per thousand than it does in Ontario.

The CHAIRMAN: I ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to Bill No. 36.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I cannot see how it can be said that these remarks do not have a bearing upon the matter before us. I am going to bow to your ruling, but certainly the matter before us is one of money. The province of Alberta maintains that when the dominion comes in and undertakes to help it out of a difficulty into which the dominion put it, the dominion should not claim the lands.

Mr. VIEN: The telephone is not in the picture.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Surely it is, because the dominion allowed the Canadian Pacific Railway to select the best areas of the land.

Mr. VIEN: I mean in this particular bill.

Mr. BLACKMORE: When the dominion allowed the Canadian Pacific and the Hudson's Bay Company to select large areas of the choicest land, settlers coming in were forced to go on sub-marginal lands. The province of Alberta then had to undertake to keep those people on those lands. The province now finds it necessary to get help in taking care of those people. They feel they should have this as a just right. There is the connection of the whole thing with the question under discussion. I shall say no more about it because I have gone far enough to indicate that this matter is all bound up in our thinking. The province of Alberta is under a tremendous burden, but there is no province in the dominion to-day that is making a more determined effort to manage its affairs and its economy. We know what we are doing, but many people do not know. They say silly and unjustifiable things, but they do not convince us. We know, we are right there.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. For the last time I am going to ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to Bill No. 26.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I hope no hon. member asks me a question which I shall have to answer. I am going to say this again. We feel that money should be spent in Alberta as far as these lands are concerned. When these lands are rehabilitated, the men who go on them will be buying commodities upon which duty will be paid; they will be buying goods upon which the sales tax will be paid, and both the duty and the sales tax will go directly into the dominion treasury. The result is that the dominion is bound to get as much value out of these settlers as is any province. Why should the dominion hesitate to spend money to prepare the lands so that people can live there? We do not want to be stubborn or uncooperative. I think the minister will bear me out when I say that, generally speaking, the ministers from Alberta have been as cooperative as any group of ministers from any other province in the dominion. There are certain things to which they hold steadily, and this is one. They feel and we feel that if in the future there are obligations which result from the fact that the dominion owns certain lands in a province and the province has responsibilities in connection with those lands, then there will be discord which will be altogether undesirable. We would much rather keep control within the province. That is not saying that the dominion should not come in and spend money in the province.

After all, provincial lands are dominion lands just as well as they are provincial lands. The situation cannot possibly be otherwise. I just want to lay that down for the committee so that hon. members can see our point of view. We feel that there should not be any halting because of this requirement that the dominion should have control of provincial lands. I have not the details before me because I have been working along other lines, but there is a tendency on the part of the dominion to take control of land where water is put on by irrigation works. We feel that is not necessary. We feel the dominion should leave control of the lands with the province. After all, the province must provide the schools; it must provide the health and other services which are distinctly provincial. All of these things cost money.

Mr. GARDINER: As soon as anyone is living on the land he pays taxes to the province.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is why we hold to the point that has been held, that we ought to have control of these lands. When the dominion spends money, it is simply collecting Alberta money and putting it back into the province.

Mr. DONNELLY: Does the hon. member think Alberta residents should be treated differently from residents of Saskatchewan or Manitoba?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Of course not.

Mr. DONNELLY: Then what is the hon. member debating?

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is natural for a person to speak concerning his own province. The reason I mention my province is that there has been considerable discussion of it to-night. But I admit that Saskatchewan is in just as great need as Alberta, and has just as great a case; in fact I am not sure but that Saskatchewan's is not a more urgent case, but the Saskatchewan members have not said much about it.

Mr. COLDWELL: We have not had a chance to-night.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is very good. Let me remind the hon. member that I mentioned, in connection with those lands, that Alberta and Saskatchewan supply all the land, so I think he will agree that I am concerned about Saskatchewan. I mention the three western provinces when I said that we were paying $47,000,000, so I think the hon. member's observation was perhaps not justified.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is the position of the South Saskatchewan river scheme at the present time? Since the hon. member for Lethbridge was thinking perhaps that he was speaking for Saskatchewan, I should like to say that we do not agree that we "cheerfully" pay for millions of dollars in connection with the tariff. While I may be out of order, I want to dissociate myself from that remark of his.

Mr. GARDINER: I gave the expenditure on the Saskatchewan river scheme a few moments ago. The total cost when complete is estimated at about $400,000, and there has been about $60,000 expended up to the present, most of which has been spent on the ditch between the river and Caron, on storage facilities at Caron, and putting in some piping in the Saskatchewan river. The work is all under way.

Mr. PERLEY: Did not the city of Moose Jaw undertake to reimburse the government for some part of that cost?

Mr. GARDINER: It will undertake any construction necessary to take the water from that storage to Moose Jaw, eighteen miles away, but we have no undertaking in connection with that at all.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is a large job like that done by contract?

Mr. GARDINER: Tenders were called for, and the work is being done by contract.

Mr. LOCKHART: Would the minister be good enough to ask the officials of his department to communicate with those charged with the responsibility and ascertain if the fences on certain property taken over were not destroyed before the property was taken over? The leaseholders held their leases until January 30, 1939, but I am informed that away back in the previous summer their fences were destroyed and their cattle turned loose.

Mr. GARDINER: There are two sections for which I did not read the details of pastures. There was L.I.D. 21 and 22, special area A, forty-two miles of fencing, acreage 48,080, and estimated cost, $42,636. There is another one of sixty-one miles, with an acreage of 79,840, and estimated cost of $72,966. Those two are not yet completed. I understand that there are one or two farmers in there with whom final arrangements have not yet been made, but negotiations are going on and will be concluded.

Mr. LOCKHART: Perhaps the minister did not understand my question. The lands that were taken over were held under lease until January 30, 1939, and some men engaged by the department destroyed the fences away back in the previous summer, causing great inconvenience to the men who held the leases, which were good until January 30, 1939. The return I have says, "by permission of the leaseholders," but I have definite information that their permission was not obtained, and still the fences were destroyed. Would the minister be good enough to ascertain if that information in the return was not wrong.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand there were two instances in which complaint of that kind was made, but a thorough investigation was made and our information is that there was no truth in the complaints.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar says that I said that we "cheerfully" paid the cost of the tariff. If I did, I wish to take those words back.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Agreement with the provinces, cities, et cetera.

Mr. STEVENS: I pointed out the other evening the extraordinary character of the last of these three subsections, and without labouring the point I am going to make a suggestion to the minister and offer one or two reasons in support of it.

In the first place it is obvious that we are clear away from the emergency character of the original legislation. I think the minister will agree with that because to-night he has indicated that many thousands of acres of land, hundreds of thousands of acres, I think I am safe in saying, have been acquired in the name of the dominion and fenced; and, to use his own language, these fences are being constructed to last at least twenty years. Now there is a definite, permanent work.

Going through the report that was tabled, I find in harmony with what the minister has been saying to-night a lengthy recital of most important projects of one kind and another. Therefore this is no longer emergency legislation. Let us get that clear in our minds.

I am going to suggest to the minister that section 2 be amended in this way. I suggest that these three subsections be eliminated and that instead we have paragraphs A, B and C; and A would read, "The minister may, for the purpose of this act, and subject to section four, and with the approval of the governor in council, enter into agreements," and so forth.

Then, instead of having subsection 11, put in B, leaving out the words "The minister may, for the purposes of the act," because that would be repetition, and saying, "B. Purchase, lease or otherwise acquire," and so forth.

Then when you come to the next subsection 12, eliminate the first line and make it read, "C. Purchase or rent whatever machinery," and so forth.

This simply means that the powers granted here will be subject to the act, subject to section 4, and subject also to the approval of the governor in council. It will put all of these powers in the third subsection on exactly the same basis, and I submit that this would improve the legislation. The exact re-drafting would have to be attended to, but I think I have outlined my suggestion with sufficient clarity for the minister to see its importance.

Mr. GARDINER: I see no difficulty at all in connection with clauses 10 and 11. The meaning is exactly the same. The only difficulty perhaps would be with clause 12, and I think we could have a re-drafting that probably would serve our purpose just as well and probably avoid some of the reasons for criticism that were made the other night.

The committee will understand that in carrying out one of these irrigation projects requiring an expenditure of some $50,000 or $60,000, when the work is completed you have some machinery partly worn out on which the freight to the next job, which may be one hundred miles away, would be considerable, whereas the machinery can be disposed of on the ground because it is going to be required there for further work. To go through all the process of getting an order in council when you are clearing that up, and the consequent delays, might make the best and most profitable disposition of that limited amount of property impossible. We want to have some way of dealing with the matter that would be workable.

Mr. STEVENS: If the minister will permit a further suggestion, we have, as a regular process in government circles of dealing with just this sort of thing, the salvage department. The minister will not take amiss what I am going to say. Let us just take his illustration. Here is an irrigation project finished up; there are a couple of tractors, maybe a truck or two, power scrapers and so on. Many of these projects run into large sums of money, $70,000, $80,000, $100,000 or more; they are quite substantial works. That machinery is valuable. If the matter were wide open, there would be a temptation to let some of that machinery go locally at sacrifice prices. We have the salvage branch, and the governor in council has power under the original act to make regulations. It keeps the whole thing working in an orderly way in harmony with good practice in government circles. If that course is departed from, whether by the present minister or future ministers, they are going to be clothed with an authority which I do not think exists in any other department, or if it does it should not. It is bad legislation, and I say that not in any criticism of the present minister. I urge him to accept the suggestion I made.

Mr. GARDINER: The proposal which I have I think conforms fairly well with the practice referred to, which was discussed here generally in connection with another bill the other night. It would make section 12 read this way:

(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of any other act or law, the minister may sell any single unit of such machinery or equipment upon such terms as he may deem advisable, and the proceeds thereof shall be paid to the receiver general; provided that the sale of any such unit shall, if its initial cost exceeded five hundred dollars, require the approval of the governor in council.

That is, if the initial cost exceeded $500 he has to have an order in council. One can quite understand that a great deal of equipment purchased for less than $500 is used for maybe a few months in the summer, and if it is worn out, the sale price would be very small.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister not agree that he is definitely departing from one of the fixed rules of government, that all purchases over $5,000 must be made after public tender? He is suggesting that purchases up to $5,000 may be made without even reference to council.

Mr. GARDINER: That is the regular procedure.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the minister is letting himself in for a great deal of trouble in taking this position. I have no desire to hold this legislation up and I shall not say more, but it is not because I do not feel the grave importance of this legislation.

Mr. PERLEY: I should very much like to see the minister accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens). I do not agree that the cost of moving machinery would be so great. Nowadays, with modern facilities, trucks and so forth, I have seen them moving road building machinery where they just hitch it behind a tractor or load it on trucks; they move threshing machines around in that way. So I think the argument that the cost of moving the machinery might be so great that it would be better to sell it at a sacrifice is not a good argument.

Mr. GARDINER: I have not any particular objection, but I might point out what it really means. I am now asking this committee, which is composed of the elected representatives of the people, for permission to do this particular thing, sell certain odds and ends that are around, as a departmental matter. The practice in all departments of government is and always has been under every government that items costing up to $5,000 do not go to council, they are dealt with by the minister. This is following the same practice. To follow the suggestion of the hon. member would simply mean that instead of getting permission of this committee of the house, I go to this advisory committee that I picked myself which meets in Regina, and ask them to give me permission to sell this equipment. Knowing they are all business men representing institutions like the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the mortgage companies and the banks, men who are used to this kind of thing, I know I shall only have to make the suggestion to get the permission. But instead of asking them for that permission I ask this house, and I think it is much better that I should get permission from the elected representatives of the people than from that group of men whom I really appointed.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister is not asking this house for permission to do any individual thing; he is asking for a free hand.

Mr. GARDINER: That is exactly what I have to do with the committee. "The minister may, subject to section 4 of this act," which means I get the permission of the committee to do certain things, "and with the approval of the governor in council, enter into agreements with any of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta." Then you apply that also to paragraphs 11 and 12. In order to do that, all that is required is that I go to this meeting in Regina which will probably be held in April and say, "Now these things are lying round at the end of each job; they have to be disposed of; I would like the advice of the committee to do it in this way," and I have no doubt I would get advice from them to proceed and do it in that businesslike way. But I am asking the house to put that in the form of a resolution giving me that permission rather than asking the committee.

Mr. PERLEY: How many members of the original committee that was set up are now on the committee?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know that I have the list, but I think I can name them. The Canadian Pacific Railway is represented; the Canadian National Railways; The Banking Association of Canada—

Mr. PERLEY: By the same men?

Mr. GARDINER: By whatever men they appointed; they appointed them themselves, and they are pretty much the same men unless the men have been moved. Doctor E. S. Archibald is chairman; that is the same chairman as we had before. John Vallance is an appointee put on since this government came into office, but he fills a position that required representation, the water development branch. W. L. Jacobson is the secretary; he was the secretary before this government came in. O. S. Longman is the representative of Alberta; he was the representative before. J. Ellis is the representative of Manitoba; he was the representative before. F. H. Auld is the representative of Saskatchewan; he was the representative before. R. W. Hanan of La Fleche, Saskatchewan, is the representative of the provincial municipal association; I do not think he was on before; he was appointed by the provincial municipal association. Mr. Paul Farnals of Halkirk, Alberta, was appointed by the provincial municipal association. Mr. James Arthur Ross of Melita, Manitoba, was appointed by the Manitoba provincial municipal association. Mr. W. G.

Yule, of Regina, Saskatchewan, was appointed by the Canadian Bankers' Association. Mr. J. D. Guild, of Winnipeg, Manitoba, was appointed by the Canadian National Railways, and I believe was previously a representative. Mr. A. Newman, of Calgary, Alberta, was appointed by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and he had been a representative of that company. Mr. F. J. Freer of Winnipeg, Manitoba, represents the Mortgage Loans Association, and Mr. A. E. Joslyn of Winnipeg, Manitoba, represents the Hudson's Bay Company. They are practically the same men.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Section 4 of the amendment of 1937 provides that the advisory committees shall consider and advise the minister as to the best methods to be adopted for the rehabilitation of the drought and drifting areas. In the same statute amending the original act section 3 was changed—

Mr. STEVENS: Repealed.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes. A new section comprising two parts was substituted. It was provided in the first place that the governor in council might establish one or more advisory committees to be known as prairie farm rehabilitation committees, the members of which were to hold office during pleasure; and in the second place it was provided that one of the members should be appointed chairman by the minister. From then on the plural is used. The minister has read the names of only one committee. Does he propose setting up other committees?

Mr. GARDINER: There are three committees. There is one advisory committee to be known as the water development committee, which deals with water development as distinct from land utilization. That is composed of the following: Mr. J. Vallance, of Regina, Saskatchewan, who is at the head of the water development; Mr. W. L. Jacobson, of Regina, Saskatchewan, secretary of the whole set-up; Mr. B. Russell, of Regina, Saskatchewan, consulting engineer; Mr. L. C. Charlesworth, of Edmonton, Alberta; Mr. C. J. McGavin, of Regina, Saskatchewan, and Mr. B. B. Hogarth of Winnipeg, Manitoba.

Then we come to the advisory committee of departmental officials located at Ottawa, comprising the deputy minister of agriculture; Doctor E. S. Archibald, who is head of the experimental farms; and Mr. R. A. Olmsted, legal adviser of the department.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Under section 12 in the amending section, would it be wise to specify that the machinery purchased ought to be obtained by tender and the machinery sold disposed of at auction? Perhaps we should insert the words "by tender" after the word "purchase," and the words "by auction" after the word "sell." This bill may involve the purchasing of large amounts of machinery, and after some of these projects are completed a considerable amount of second-hand equipment will probably be sold.

Mr. GARDINER: The proposed amendment will accomplish what the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I hope it will.

Mr. MICHAUD: Section 12 will now read:

(1) The minister may, for the purposes of this act, purchase or rent whatever machinery or equipment may be required in connection with the development, construction or operation of any project or scheme; provided that the purchase of any single unit of machinery or equipment of a value greater than five thousand dollars shall require the approval of the governor in council.

(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of any other act or law, the minister may sell any single unit of such machinery or equipment upon such terms as he may deem advisable, and the proceeds thereof shall be paid to the Receiver General; provided that the sale of any such unit shall, if its initial cost exceeded five hundred dollars require the approval of the governor in council.

I move this amendment.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Will there be any obstacles in the way of selling the machinery at auction?

Mr. GARDINER: It is something that only a few individuals in the community may require and it would not be practicable, but if it were it would be carried out in that way. In most instances it would not be practicable.

BANKING AND COMMERCE—CHANGE IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Taylor (Nanaimo) be substituted for that of Mr. Fournier (Hull) on the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. THOMPSON (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to draw your attention to an error in yesterday's Hansard. When the orders of the day were called yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) rose in his place and read a carefully prepared statement to the house, at the conclusion of which he stated that one page had been omitted from his notes. He then retired from the chamber and the house proceeded with ordinary routine business. Returning to the chamber in about three-quarters of an hour the Prime Minister read his entire statement, including the page which had been omitted. I find on looking up Hansard this morning that the Prime Minister's original statement, together with certain remarks that were made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Manion) have been omitted from Hansard. My question is: On what authority is this being done?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I say first to my hon. friend that I had nothing whatever to do with the matter myself. The arrangement of Hansard is in the hands of the Hansard staff. Where on previous occasions there have been obvious omissions or transpositions of some kind, in the arrangement of Hansard those omissions or transpositions are usually dealt with as the editor of a paper would deal with any matter of the kind in presenting it in its final form. I inquired last night as to what Hansard proposed to do, whether it was proposed to insert verbatim et literatim the little interjections with regard to a page being missed out of my statement and the whole repeated as reread. I was informed that Hansard proposed to have the matter printed as if the page had not been omitted, and simply give the full account as was originally intended and as subsequently read. I understood that Hansard—I may be wrong—before taking that step had intended to speak to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) to see if he would have any objection, but the leader of the opposition not being here in the evening, I am informed the matter was then referred to the chief whip of the Conservative party. That is what I am informed. The chief whip, I was told, said he thought it would be quite right to have Hansard printed without indicating the brief exchange concerning the omission of a page that had taken place. I believe that was the courtesy which was extended by hon. gentlemen opposite—I may be wrong. But certainly I should think in any circumstances it was quite a proper thing for Hansard to have done. If I had altered any sentence or remark in the second reading of the statement as read on the first occasion or had in any way sought to deceive the house about what was purely an omission occasioned by a failure on the part of a stenographer to copy one of the concluding pages, I think there would have been something to the point which my hon. friend has raised. But for the purpose of the intelligent reading of Hansard as a matter of record I think it was much better to have repetition avoided and the complete statement put in the form in which it was.

I may say to my hon. friend that when I came back into the house with the complete statement the hon. leader of the opposition indicated to me across the floor of the house that it might be best to read it from the beginning in its entirety so that all members would have the complete context, and I did that. I thought at the time my hon. friend was seeking to assure me that that would be the best way of proceeding, if I was to have the statement in its entirety as it appeared. I am giving my hon. friend the situation as I understand it. If there has been any fault in the matter, I hope it will be put on my shoulders as leader of the house. If Hansard were to come to me and ask me what I thought was correct in the matter of reporting the proceedings of the house in a case of that kind, I would say it was much better to have Hansard state the situation as hon. members would wish to see it stated, rather than in any way unnecessarily to burden Hansard with something that did not affect the proceedings.

Mr. THOMPSON: I had no idea that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) and the Conservative whip (Mr. Casselman) had agreed to this. I simply saw in Hansard that it had been omitted. During this session there have been several omissions from Hansard, and I wish to protest against omissions being made from Hansard by any person, or Hansard having authority to make these changes.

Mr. SPEAKER: If, as the hon. member suggests, there were omissions before the occurrence of yesterday, he should have drawn the attention of the house to them, and they would have been dealt with accordingly.

Mr. A. C. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) I think it is incumbent upon me to say something. I understand the right hon. gentleman to say that I did concur in the deletion from Hansard. It is quite true that Mr. Young, the editor of debates, communicated with me last night and asked me if I would acquiesce in such a change. I told him that at that time I would not acquiesce, that I had no authority to assume to myself any responsibilities that are covered by the rules of the house. In order that there should be no misunderstanding, I took the matter up with the editor of debates before the opening of the house to-day, believing that he might have misunderstood me. In conversation with me he stated positively that I did not acquiesce in any change.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I apologize then to my hon. friend and to the entire house. I can only say that I made inquiry last night of my secretary who reported the circumstances to me exactly as I have given them to the house. I have not had a word with him since, and I let the matter drop at that stage. As a matter of fact what I suggested to my secretary was that he should see the Speaker and ask him about it. His reply to me was that the whip of the Conservative party had already indicated he thought that that would be a perfectly correct procedure. If the house thinks that Hansard ought to be reprinted with the correction to which my hon. friend has drawn attention, I am perfectly agreeable. I must confess that I cannot see where there has been any attempt to invade any privilege either of the house or of its individual members.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I did nod across to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) yesterday and I concurred with him in the suggestion that he read the whole statement from the beginning in view of the fact that he had read part of it and then stated he had forgotten a page which he brought in later. I wanted to hear the whole statement read continuously. I had no intention of bringing up this matter, but since it has been brought up I do not think that this is a question of the details concerned. I admit perhaps that there has been no change made in the ideas or substance of the statement in any shape or form; there is no suggestion of that. The Prime Minister says that he did not have it done, and he mentions that the editor of Hansard or someone on his behalf endeavoured to get in touch with me. My secretary told me this morning that that is correct. I went home from this house yesterday afternoon with quite a cold, and I decided that the telephone should not bother me all evening; I gave instructions that it should not be answered. I think it rang at least a dozen times, which is probably eleven times too many. I would not answer it and I refused to let anybody else in the house answer it. I wanted to go to bed to rest.

The point I should like to make is this. There is no question of a change in the context because I understand there was none except that the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) does mention that I said a few words. If I recall, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) said a few words. We both did, and they were both cut out. Not that my remarks were probably of any importance anyway, but I do deny to the editor of Hansard or to anybody else the right to remove anything said by me without my consent. I was twitted across the floor of the house the other night for having changed a word in Hansard. Incidentally I have searched that since, and my secretary, who is really to blame if anybody was, as he checks over Hansard, as to my remarks, and we find there was no change. However, to-day two or three pages have been cut out of Hansard by the editor of Hansard apparently without the consent of the Speaker and of both sides of the house. That seems to me to be a most extraordinary proceeding. Therefore, I wish to say this: I do not think the editor of Hansard has any right at any time to cut out two or three pages of Hansard without any excuse whatsoever unless he gets the consent probably of the leaders of all parties and the Speaker as well. I think it is too serious a matter to have the editor of Hansard have the power in his hands to do any such thing.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Since I was one of the members concerned, I may say I was in the Hansard room just after the discussion had closed down here. The editor then was rather in a quandary as to how he was going to manage the report. A very important statement with regard to foreign policy was being split up and sandwiched in between apples and oranges, and all that kind of thing. What the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) had said he said again; what I had said, I said again a little later in the debate. I stated to the editor of Hansard that it seemed to me it would be an excellent thing not to repeat all that kind of thing and simply put it down as it stood. It seemed to me that in an important matter of this kind the various little interjections which were made under these peculiar circumstances did not warrant the marring of Hansard, which would go out not only all over Canada but perhaps over the entire world. I think it should be left as it is.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to add to the discussion, but I think probably the purpose which my hon. friend had in mind in raising the question will have been amply served by having the pages of Hansard covered with the fact that I did not have a complete statement when I came into the house, because one page had not been copied at the time; and that I was not aware of that when I started to read the statement which I had left to others to have transcribed.

Mr. MANION: I rise to a point of order. The right hon. Prime Minister has no right to impute the motives which he did to my hon. friend, the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson). He said the object which the hon. member had in mind was served by having this spread on Hansard. I think that is imputing a motive which he has absolutely no right to do.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I must say to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition that I cannot see any motive at all in raising the question, unless it was to make clear that the Prime Minister had read a statement and had in so doing omitted a page which he thought had been included, and that Hansard had not recorded the fact that he went back to get the page and then was permitted by the house to read the whole statement over again. That is all I wished to imply. My hon. friend may have had another purpose in view in raising the question. May I say that Hansard is not here to answer for itself, but I will take full responsibility, as I must, for the action of Hansard in this matter. I do think that Hansard exercised a reasonable editorial right in presenting yesterday's discussion in the form in which it appeared to-day.

Mr. THOMPSON: I want to say that I had no idea of doing what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has rather imputed I was doing. My idea in bringing this matter before the house was this: Several times in this house the same thing has occurred—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. THOMPSON: —and on reading Hansard I want to say that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) made certain statements in this house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. THOMPSON: —and they were deleted—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. THOMPSON: They did not appear in Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I ask the hon. member to resume his seat. I do not think he is fair in his remark that it has happened on many occasions before. If there were such occasions they should have been brought promptly to the attention of the house.

Mr. THOMPSON: They were.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF PRESENTATION OF REPORT OF ROWELL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) asked me on March 13 when I expected to receive the so-called Rowell commission report. I replied that the last time I had had word with the chairman of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations was at the beginning of the year so that I might advise parliament when parliament met, and that I was then informed that the commission hoped to have their report ready about Easter. I added that I was sorry I was unable to say whether they were still of that opinion. The following day, that is, on March 14, I wrote the chairman of the commission and drew his attention to the question of the leader of the opposition, and I have received from him the following reply:

Royal commission on dominion-provincial relations

Ottawa, March 15, 1939.

The Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, M.P., Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister,

I have your letter of March 14 inquiring when the commission's report will be ready.

When we last met I mentioned that the commission hoped to have the report completed about Easter. Additional work and time, however, have been necessary on the public finance statistics and other basic studies, and it does not now appear possible that the report will be finished before July. We are making every effort to expedite the work, and if an earlier date of completion can be achieved, we shall be able to transmit the report to you somewhat sooner.

I am,
Dear Mr. Prime Minister,
Sincerely yours,
Jos. Sirois, Chairman.

EUROPEAN SITUATION

SUGGESTED MEETING OF LEAGUE OF NATIONS ASSEMBLY TO FORMULATE GENERAL POLICY FOR PEACE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I answer a question put yesterday by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). He asked:

In view of the international situation and reported suggestion for a conference of certain democratic powers, will the government consider the advisability of proposing a meeting of the League of Nations assembly with a view to formulating a joint policy for peace and with a view to seeking cooperation with the United States for such a policy?

The answer I would make to that question is as follows. In view of the fact that consultations have already been initiated by the countries immediately concerned, under the procedure they have considered appropriate for the stage that developments have reached, it is not considered advisable that the Canadian government put forward the suggested proposal.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION AS TO IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I would ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) or the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) whether in connection with the Canada-United States trade treaty a statement has been prepared of the imports into Canada, during say the last fiscal or calendar year, under the various items which appear in that treaty, and if so, could not such a statement be laid upon the table of the house? Perhaps that has already been done, but as I have been absent I should like to know.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the tabular statement which is in the hands of all members does not contain the precise information to which my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) refers. On pages 21 and forward in the tabular statement there are four columns showing the rate of duty under the new agreement, the effective rate under the 1935 agreement, the rate on United States goods prior to the 1935 agreement, and the British preferential tariff rate. In preparing the document, which includes other information as well relating to the other schedule of the treaty, I had to decide whether it would be possible, in view of the four columns of figures which I have already mentioned, to add information respecting the imports of each article. I must confess that in that connection I was rather embarrassed because one column would not give adequate information, and the imports vary so considerably as between the years that in order to inform the house properly there ought to be given at least three or four years' imports, possibly more than that. I preferred therefore in connection with the volume of imports to follow the practice of previous years, which has been adhered to on this occasion also, of giving the information as requested on any item. I have and can give in committee, on any particular item of which there is proper import record, information as to the volume of imports in any one of several previous years. If my hon. friend will refer to his copy of the tabular statement I think he will find that it contains other information that will be useful in committee.

Mr. CAHAN: If I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to add a word, it would be of very great assistance to members in studying the items of this trade treaty if the information which has been omitted might be now given, because I find it an almost endless task to read through the trade returns in an endeavour to find from them what have been the imports under particular items, as the classification varies. I thought if the minister had such information at hand it would assist us very much if it could be published.

Mr. DUNNING: I am doubtful about it, because one year would certainly not, as my hon. friend will agree, present a fair or reasonable picture from either point of view.

Mr. CAHAN: But if you gave it for two or three years?

Mr. DUNNING: It would be a complicated statement.

Mr. CAHAN: If a new schedule were printed it would be easy to incorporate the returns of imports for different years.

TARIFF BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON REFERENCE RESPECTING VEGETABLE OILS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) if he has any knowledge as to when he expects to receive a report from the tariff board on the reference respecting vegetable oils.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I hope my hon. friend will allow that question to stand. He can understand that, owing to the very much regretted death of the chairman of the tariff board, it will take a little time for me to assure myself as to just how things stand with regard to various tariff board reports. I frankly confess I have not had time even to commence doing so as yet.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

QUESTION OF PREPARING NATIONAL REGISTER FOR DEFENCE, ECONOMIC OR OTHER PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government when I may expect an order for a proper return asked for on January 12, again on February 3, and again on March 10 relating to a most important matter, that of a national register for defence or economic or industrial or labour purposes, and whether a census or national register will be compiled of Canada's industrial power, economic power, food power, man power, military and defence power, and the unemployed. I should like to find out from the various ministers concerned—defence, labour and agriculture—where this return is, because the defence of the realm is important. My question was:

1. Have any steps been taken by the government to secure a national register for Canada for defence or economic or industrial or labour purposes?

2. If so, what are they?

3. Will a census or modern doomsday book, or national register be ordered or compiled of: (a) industrial power (b) economic power; (c) food power; (d) man power; (e) military and defence power, and (f) unemployed?

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, so far as the Department of National Defence is concerned, the information was forwarded to the appropriate department, but as the return concerned at least three departments of government it would be tabled by the Secretary of State.

Mr. CHURCH: Can the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) tell us when we may expect his part of the return on food power? Where is this return so far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned?

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I shall inquire into the matter and see if I cannot expedite the tabling of the return.

WAYS AND MEANS

EUROPEAN SITUATION—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF GOVERNMENT'S STATEMENT OF POLICY

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker; although I do not wish to delay the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), there is a matter which, with your permission, I should like to bring before the house for three or four minutes, and this is the only day this week on which it can be mentioned. I ask the government to clarify the statement which was made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) yesterday on foreign affairs and Canada's position. I agree with a great deal of what he said, and also with what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) so well said. We should also, I say, have in this country a maximum of unity on these matters of national security and defence, and a minimum of criticism, because, as Adam Smith said, and do not forget that, security is better than opulence. At the same time I wish to point out that, although this is the forty-eighth day of the session, no action has been taken, the house does not know and the country cannot read between the lines and find out what is Canada's policy on this great question of life and death which confronts civilization to-day. Where is Canada, and what is she doing? It seems to me that Canada's policy is that "the pen is mightier than the sword"; but that is not so with Hitler and the other dictators. This land is much coveted by them because of its great natural resources and raw materials. I think the time has come when all the facts should be told and the country should be taken into the confidence of the government. I do not think we could do better than to follow the precedent in respect to publicity of facts set in England by Mr. Chamberlain, when, in his recent speech at the last dinner of the parliamentary press gallery in London, he said:

> If the people are not allowed to know the facts; if they are only allowed to know what their rulers choose them to know, then that people are in danger of being led to embark upon a course which may presently lead them into disaster.

Speaking later in the House of Commons, he defined the country's commitments, gave the exact details and answered dozens of questions. I have examined day by day the London newspapers, particularly the Times, and I find that there was a very elaborate debate in the House of Commons the other day on this matter; almost every day the question is up there. One question which was then asked was, "Where is Canada?" Well, as I have said, we are at the forty-eighth day of the session, and parliament and the country are entitled to know, and we do not know as yet, where we are with regard to our security or defence on land, on the sea, or in the air. We have practically no defences except those supplied by the mother country as was the case in 1812. I believe that my honoured leader, who served so ably and faithfully in the war, gave a very fair statement as far as it goes, and I agree with him that we must not introduce politics into this matter or try to keep the country in the dark. Our silence is playing of politics. How is it that by leave of the radio commission this subject of defence of the realm and foreign affairs can be debated every Sunday and every day almost on the radio, yet this house is denied the right of knowing the facts which concern the security of Canada at this time? We do not know where we are. Italy and Japan our old allies have been driven since 1922 into the arms of Germany and very foolishly so; to-day Britain is "going it alone" with France. We should certainly know something more about what is going on.

I do not wish to embarrass the Prime Minister. Far from it; I should like to support him; and I believe the country, irrespective of class or creed or politics or anything else, will support him if he will do something. We do not know whether in Canada we are secure or not. Are we to wait until the enemy sails up the St. Lawrence? We know they can be here in a few hours if they come west instead of east, and they can by an air attack destroy every public utility in Montreal, Ottawa, Quebec, and Toronto in a few hours. The maritimes and Quebec will be the first to suffer. We know what a lack of defence policy and silence led to in 1914. The late Lord Roberts went up and down Great Britain and came to this country and told the people of the grave danger ahead, but his speeches were called pernicious and dangerous, even up to three days before the outbreak of war, because he predicted it and he had not a single statesman except Lord Milner with him. Are we going to repeat that in 1939 by our silence and lack of preparation before it is too late.

I am not going to take up any more time, because I should like to see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) get on with his work, but I believe that the time has come when we should have some action and an announcement from the government, or a day set aside soon so that the matter may be discussed.

[Mr. Church.]

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I might say to my hon. friend that it seems to me the more appropriate time to discuss the matter to which he has just referred would be on the estimates of the Department of National Defence or on the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. Those estimates will be presented as soon as we have made the desired progress with the measures which have been before the house up to the present time.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On schedule I.

Customs tariff—234. Perfumery, including toilet preparations, non-alcoholic, viz., hair oils, tooth and other powders and washes, pomatums, pastes and all other perfumed preparations, n.o.p., used for the hair, mouth or skin: 30 per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: When the committee rose last evening I was about to ask if the n.o.p. in this item referred to the whole line of perfumes, or if there is some other item in the tariff which applies only to perfumes?

Mr. DUNNING: There are several items, but within this item are comprised creams, solid and liquid of all kinds; brilliantine, oily or liquid; face powders, talcum powders, sachet powders, lipstick, compacts, bath salts, lotions, and toilet water, non-alcoholic.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—236. Surgical dressings, antiseptic or aseptic, including absorbent cotton, lint, lamb's wool, tow, jute, oakum, woven fabric of cotton weighing not more than seven and one-half pounds per one hundred square yards, whether imported singly or in combination one with another, but not stitched or otherwise manufactured; surgical trusses and suspensory bandages of all kinds; sanitary napkins, and abdominal supports: 20 per cent.

Mr. COLDWELL: This is a matter of surgical dressings, and I should like to put in a plea against the charging of duties on goods of this description which are used in the case of sickness, and on equipment used for the relief of people who are invalids. It seems to me that, having made some concessions with regard to people who are suffering from blindness, we should be well advised to consider the granting of the lowest possible prices to those who in the event of sickness have to pay for supplies. Here we find that on "surgical dressings, antiseptic or aseptic, including absorbent cotton, lint, lamb's wool, tow, jute, oakum," and so on, the rate of duty under the new agreement is twenty per cent. I am of the opinion that, if we are not to move in the direction of the elimination of tariffs, there are at least certain things on which no duty should be charged. Surgical supplies which are essential in the case of sickness, or other articles which minister to the comfort of people who are invalids—I have in mind things like wheel chairs—might well be considered when the minister brings down his budget. I am raising the matter now so that perhaps some consideration may be given to supplies for use of invalids.

Mr. DUNNING: The duty on this class of articles has been reduced from thirty-five per cent in 1935 to twenty per cent under the new agreement. I shall take note of what the hon. member has said and give it consideration, although the reduction already effected is very substantial.

Mr. McCANN: And it is ten per cent under the British tariff.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. I should have remarked that under the British preference there is only a ten per cent rate.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—237. (c) Synthetic resins, n.o.p., in liquid, powder, granular, or lump form; or in tubes, cylinders, strips, sheets, plates, blocks, bars, rods, angles, channels, tees or other shapes or sections, not further manufactured than moulded, extruded or pressed, when for use in Canadian manufactures: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—238a. Manufactures of pyroxylin plastics, or of which pyroxylin plastic is the component of chief value, n.o.p.: 27½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—238b. Cellulose nitrate or pyroxylin plastics, in tubes, cylinders, balls, strips, sheets, plates, blocks, bars, rods, angles, channels, tees or other shapes or sections, not further manufactured than moulded or pressed, when for use in Canadian manufactures: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—238c. Moulding compositions of cellulose acetate or other derivatives of cellulose, in powder or granular form: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—239. Lamp black, carbon black, ivory black and bone black: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—242. Dry red lead; orange mineral; antimony oxide, titanium oxide, and zinc oxide such as zinc white and lithopone; white pigments containing not less than 14 per cent by weight of titanium dioxide: 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—243. Dry white lead, 20 per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are the reductions in items 243 and 244 to compensate the paint manufacturers for the reduction on paints which is referred to in a further item?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not like the word "compensation,"—

Mr. MacNICOL: It is a good word.

Mr. DUNNING: —but we did take into account that when a reduction was effected on a manufacturer's finished product, the materials entering into that finished product should be carefully scrutinized. That was done in this particular case.

Mr. MacNICOL: In the case of 243, is any of it manufactured in Canada, or is it all imported?

Mr. DUNNING: Our production in Canada in 1936 was 4,321,900 pounds by weight, valued at $284,100. The imports have been very small indeed. We imported from the United States last year, $1,958 worth and exported to the United States $2,300 worth.

Mr. SENN: Is any class of this goods coming from Great Britain?

Mr. DUNNING: From Great Britain we imported $1,155 worth and exported to Great Britain $8,700.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—244. White lead ground in oil, 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—246. Oxides, fireproofs, rough stuff, fillers, laundry blueing, and colours, dry, n.o.p.: 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—247. Liquid fillers, anti-corrosive and anti-fouling paints, and ground and liquid paints, n.o.p.: 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 247a. Artists' and school children's colours; fitted boxes containing the same: 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—248. Paints and colours, ground in spirits, and all spirit varnishes and lacquers: 85 cents per gallon.

Mr. MacNICOL: What are our imports?

Mr. DUNNING: Last year our imports were $53,500 from the United States and $5,400 from the United Kingdom. In the same year the exports were $14,700 to the United Kingdom and $109 to the United States.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—249. Varnishes, lacquers, japans, japan driers, liquid driers, and oil finish, n.o.p.: 15 cents per gallon, and 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—252. Shoe blacking; shoemakers' ink; shoe, harness and leather dressing, and knife or other polish or composition, n.o.p.: 22½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—256. Printing ink, 17½ per cent.

Mr. SENN: What are the figures under this item? This is an important item in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend understands that this is neither a reduction nor a change. It merely binds us not to increase the rate of duty during the currency of the agreement. The imports from the United States last year were $149,200. The exports are not separately recorded; apparently they are very small.

Mr. SENN: What is the extent of the Canadian business?

Mr. DUNNING: The last figure we have is for 1936. The production was $2,387,300.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is that the latest figure?

Mr. DUNNING: It is the latest available.

Mr. MacNICOL: It would be interesting to know what it was last year. I am sure that after the annual reduction of $400,000 worth of business in one magazine printing office as a result of the 1935 treaty the reduction in ink production must be appreciable.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend will be interested to note that Canadian production rose between 1935 and 1936.

Mr. MacNICOL: Exactly, because under the Bennett tariff, magazines were being printed in Canada. It was not until the treaty was passed in 1936 that the reduction began.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member forgets that the last agreement with the United States came into force on the first of January, 1936.

[Mr. Senn.]

Mr. MacNICOL: And the fiscal year ended March 31, 1936.

Mr. DUNNING: That does not make any difference.

Mr. SENN: There is what is known as the powdered ink industry. Is that included in this item?

Mr. DUNNING: What my hon. friend refers to as powdered ink must be included in this, because it is described as inks, printing, mimeographing and lithographing. It must be merged in the quantities I gave.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—261. Turpentine, spirits of, free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—272. Refined petroleum jellies and oils, for toilet, medicinal, edible, or similar purposes: 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—274. Petroleum coke: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 281. Firebrick containing not less than ninety per cent of silica; magnesite firebrick or chrome firebrick; other firebrick valued at not less than one hundred dollars per one thousand, rectangular shaped, the dimensions of each not to exceed one hundred and twenty-five cubic inches, but not including firebrick made substantially of silicon carbide and/or fused alumina, for use exclusively in the construction or repair of a furnace, kiln or other equipment of a manufacturing establishment: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—281a. Firebrick, n.o.p., of a class or kind not made in Canada, for use exclusively in the construction or repair of a furnace, kiln, or other equipment of a manufacturing establishment: 12½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—281b. Firebrick, n.o.p.: 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—282. Building brick and paving brick: 15 per cent.

Mr. GRAYDON: What are the importations?

Mr. DUNNING: Our imports of building brick from the United States last year totalled $20,900. Of paving brick, the figure was $17,000 last year.

Mr. MacNICOL: That would be a special kind of brick?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, a special brick. I should mention by way of information that we also exported $20,900.

Mr. MacNICOL: Of building brick?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, of which $17,800 went to the United States.

Mr. LOCKHART: I wonder if the minister would mind giving the production of firebrick in Canada? The item carried a moment ago.

Mr. DUNNING: There are two firebrick items. The last production figures we have from the bureau of statistics are in every instance for 1936. The production figures are nearly always two years behind in our official publications. There are several items here—firebrick from domestic clays, of which we produced in that year $118,900; firebrick and stove linings from imported clays, $390,200; fire clay bricks and shapes from domestic clays, $65,200.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Why should firebrick of a class or kind not made in Canada have a duty of 12½ per cent while firebrick under item ex 281 is free?

Mr. DUNNING: Neither of those items is made in Canada.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—282a. Manufactures of clay or cement, n.o.p.: 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—284. Drain pipes, sewer pipes and earthenware fittings therefor, chimney linings or vents, chimney tops and inverted blocks, glazed or unglazed, n.o.p.; earthenware tiles, n.o.p.: 30 per cent.

Mr. BARBER: Would the minister give the imports?

Mr. DUNNING: Imports of tiles and earthenware—that is part of the item—from the United States, $15,500; and drain pipes and sewer pipes from the United States, $12,700. The United Kingdom in the one case ships us much more of that material than the United States.

Mr. BARBER: Do we export any?

Mr. DUNNING: They are not separately recorded. They are under a general classification—products of clay.

Mr. LOCKHART: What is the amount of imports of tile from the United Kingdom? It is quite a large amount, I believe.

Mr. DUNNING: Last year, $68,800.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—288a. Chemical stoneware composed of a non-absorbent vitrified body specially compounded to resist acids or other corrosive reagents: 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—288b. Hand forms of porcelain, when imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture of rubber gloves in their own factories: 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—289. Baths, bathtubs, basins, closets, lavatories, urinals, sinks and laundry tubs of earthenware, stone, cement, clay or other material, n.o.p.: 27½ per cent.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): What amount of this item is imported?

Mr. DUNNING: Imports last year from the United States, $65,800; from the United Kingdom; $86,100. Our total imports come from those two sources.

Mr. BROWN: What is the rate of duty on those items going into the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: If they are uncoloured, 30 per cent, and if coloured or painted, 35 per cent.

Mr. SENN: Is there any change in the United States rate?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. McNIVEN: The articles covered by this item are required and used in the construction of houses, and the very high cost of them works against the success of the minister's housing scheme. For example, in a house built in Regina the unit cost was $102, and for a similar house built in St. Catharines the cost was $69.

Mr. SENN: That is the freight.

Mr. McNIVEN: Freight—it is a fright! These are essentials in the construction of small houses. The cost is very high in all parts of Canada, and there is a common and popular opinion that the manufacture of these commodities is a monopoly. They have a protection of 27½ per cent. I would ask the minister to give serious consideration to further substantial reductions in this item when he brings down his budget, in order that the cost of house building may be brought more within the ability of the average man.

Mr. DUNNING: The major source of supply of these articles outside of Canada is Great Britain. Under the agreement with Great Britain the rate is 15 per cent. What we are doing at present is reducing an aggregate rate of 38⅓ per cent to 27½ per cent, which is a fairly substantial reduction. However I shall be glad to bear in mind my hon. friend's remarks.

Mr. MacNICOL: Should not the minister take the trouble to point out to the hon. member for Regina (Mr. McNiven) that the articles he was talking about are not covered by this item at all? Baths and plumbers' supplies ordinarily entering into the construction of small houses are not covered by this item. This is a special item not otherwise provided for— porcelain, etc., a high-class article not used in ordinary homes at all.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, I should have mentioned that this item does not cover the ordinary bathtub made of iron and coated with enamel. This is the earthenware article, not the one which is most frequently used in small homes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—296c. Magnesium carbonate, imported for use in the compounding or manufacture of rubber products: 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—296d. Feldspar, ground but not further manufactured: 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—312 and 312a. Asbestos in any form other than crude, and all manufactures thereof, n.o.p.: 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—315. Carbons or carbon electrodes over three inches in circumference or outside measurement and not exceeding 35 inches in circumference or outside measurement; carbons of a class or kind not produced in Canada, when imported for use in the manufacture of dry batteries and dry cells: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—320. Plate glass, not bevelled, in sheets or panes not exceeding 7 square feet each, n.o.p.: 20 per cent.

Mr. BROWN: What is the rate of duty on that item going into the United States, and what are the imports from the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: Of plate glass in small sheets—my hon. friend understands that there is a difference between the small sheets and the larger sheets entering both countries—we imported last year $455,000 worth. The rate of duty entering the United States is 12½ cents per square foot up to 19¾ cents per square foot. It is dependent on the size.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—326.

(i) Demijohns or carboys, bottles, flasks, phials, jars and balls, of glass, not cut, n.o.p.; lamp chimneys of glass, n.o.p.; decanters and machine-made tumblers of glass, not cut nor decorated, n.o.p.: 27½ per cent.

(ii) Opal glassware, glass tableware, cut glassware and illuminating glassware, n.o.p.: 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—326a. Manufactures of glass, n.o.p.: 17½ per cent.

Brass scrap and brass in blocks, ingots or pigs; copper in bars or rods, not less than 6 feet in length, unmanufactured, n.o.p.; copper in strips, sheets or plates, not polished, planished or coated; brass or copper tubing, in length not less than 6 feet, and not polished, bent or otherwise manufactured: 10 per cent.

Mr. BROWN: What is the duty on that item going into the United States, and what were the imports from the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: Our imports from the United States of all these items combined amounted for the last fiscal year to $433,049. The rate entering the United States—it is differently described from ours—is 4 cents a pound on the copper content plus the regular duty on some of the forms. On brass bars and sheets, it is 4 cents a pound on the copper content plus 4 cents a pound gross. The United States tariff set-up on this item is quite different from ours.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—350. Wire of all metals and kinds, n.o.p.: 30 per cent.

Mr. BROWN: Will the minister give the same information as to this item?

Mr. DUNNING: Imports of wire of all metals and kinds, n.o.p., $211,449, from the United States. The United States duty depends on the kind of metal in the wire, but on their n.o.p. item which most nearly corresponds to this, the duty is 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—351. Wire, single or several, covered with any material, including cable so covered, n.o.p.: 27½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—352. Brass and copper nails, tacks, rivets and burrs or washers; bells and gongs, n.o.p.; and manufactures of brass or copper, n.o.p.: 25 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: It is all one item, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 353. Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—354. Manufactures of aluminum, n.o.p.: 27½ per cent.

Mr. BROWN: Could I have information with respect to the duty and the imports?

Mr. DUNNING: Of aluminum manufactures n.o.p., we imported $748,000 worth from the United States last year. We exported $67,000 worth to the United States. The United States tariff, where an article is wholly or in chief value of aluminum is 45 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—354a. Kitchen or household hollow-ware of aluminum, n.o.p.: 27½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—357. Britannia metal, nickel silver, Nevada and German silver, manufactures of, not plated, n.o.p.: 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—377a. Blooms, cogged ingots, slabs, billets, n.o.p., sheet bars, of iron or steel, by whatever process made, n.o.p.: $4 per ton.

Mr. BROWN: I should like information from the minister as to the rate of duty into the United States and the value of imports.

Mr. DUNNING: Last year imports from the United States were valued at $362,000. Our exports were mainly to the United Kingdom, and were valued at nearly $3,482,000. Only an infinitesimal quantity went to the United States. The United States rate of duty is in fact a variety of rates, mostly specific, on steel billets, according to the value thereof. These rates range from a quarter of a cent per pound on billets valued at not over 1½ cents per pound to 20 per cent on billets valued at over 16 cents per pound. It is difficult to compare each specific item.

Mr. BROWN: It works out so that there is a higher rate.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—377f. Bars or rods, of iron or steel, hot rolled, viz.: Rounds over 4⅞ inches in diameter and squares over 4 inches: $6 per ton.

Mr. BROWN: Would the minister give the same information with respect to that item?

Mr. DUNNING: Our imports from the United States were valued at $13,600. The United States tariff would be the same as on the previous item, because it merges with that item in the United States tariff.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—378. Bars and rods, of iron or steel; billets, of iron or steel, weighing less than 60 pounds per lineal yard:

(a) Not further processed than hot rolled, n.o.p.: $7 per ton.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is not very much in the iron and steel items on which the minister can be congratulated, but I do think I can congratulate him upon not having this item changed.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—390. Castings, of iron, malleable, n.o.p.: 22½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—390a. Castings, of iron, non-malleable, n.o.p.: 22½ per cent.

Mr. LENNARD: I should like to have information with respect to imports from the United States on items 390, 390a and 390b.

Mr. DUNNING: On item 390 imports from the United States last year were valued at $158,000, and exports to the United States were valued at $123,000. The United States tariff rates are 10 per cent. On item 390a imports from the United States are valued at $219,400, and the exports are part of the figures I have already given in connection with item 390. The United States tariff rate is 10 per cent. With respect to item 390b, imports from the United States last year were valued at $142,600, and the exports are included in the total I have previously mentioned. The United States duty is 45 per cent, if annealed. Otherwise they vary, according to the content of the alloy.

Mr. SENN: There is a reduction in these three items from the rate prior to 1934, and the one effective under the 1935 agreement. Has the minister figures to show where there has been any increase in importations, owing to the reduction under the 1935 agreement?

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry that in connection with these items I have not figures farther back than 1937. If the hon. member is interested, however, I shall be glad to supply him with the figures, apart altogether from the deliberations of the committee.

Mr. SENN: I imagine these are largely used in connection with the manufacture of farm implements.

Mr. DUNNING: No; automobiles, principally.

Mr. SENN: In any case there is no doubt that there must have been an increase in the importations?

Mr. DUNNING: I should say very likely, yes. But farm implements are under separate items.

Mr. HARRIS: In connection with these particular items, as the minister probably knows, there was a very substantial decrease in the importations following the 1930 emergency tariff, put through by a previous administration. In line with the suggestion made this afternoon by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) I have drawn up a schedule showing the effect on individual items since 1930, and coming right down to date—to January 1, 1939. I reiterate what I said on a previous occasion in regard to this point, which was referred to in the question asked this afternoon by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. Apart from the fact that it has not been done in the past, I feel that in connection with a very important measure such as this —and I am sticking to items 390, 390a and 390b—we should have more information than we have.

The minister and the committee know that when we are dealing with commodities as outlined in table 1 of schedule II we have at hand at once the dollar value effected by a particular item. And on the Canadian side of the picture the same applies with respect to table 2 of schedule I. Hon. members do not know, prior to the consideration of an item—unless they carry out a good deal of research—the particulars with respect to it. It is quite a task to get that information, and requires considerable time. The minister has the benefit of it. We should have it. Those of us who delve through the records to find the information encounter all sorts of difficulties. If we had the information we could give proper and adequate consideration to the items before the committee.

It took six clerks about four weeks in my office to do this work. Now that I have it I find I have not got it in the same sequence as has the Minister of Finance. However I have an idea from which I can make general observations. The statistics which the very efficient commissioners of ours dealt with when they were in Washington were United States statistics and are for the calendar year. They had to bring them into relation with our statistics which are for the fiscal year ending March 31. I have no doubt they had great difficulty, and it is almost impossible for us to give the consideration we would like to give to these items with the meagre information that is provided.

These particular items cover castings of iron, malleable n.o.p.; castings of iron, non-malleable, n.o.p., and castings, of steel, n.o.p. When we deal with these items we enter another phase of Canadian economy which I emphasized some two years ago, again last year and again this year. There should be some correlation between those charged with negotiating trade treaties, on the one hand, and those charged with the responsibility of expanding employment for our people, on the other. If you take item 390, castings, of iron, malleable, n.o.p., and then the Purvis report and trace that one item through from 1930, as is done in this statement of employment conditions in Canadian industry, you will find that in the iron and steel industry there are 45,700 workers without employment.

Mr. DUNNING: In the malleable group?

Mr. HARRIS: I said the iron and steel group.

Mr. DUNNING: The whole thing?

Mr. HARRIS: It is not analysed as the malleable group. That is a great handicap in dealing with this matter. It is impossible from the records to trace how many fewer employees are working to-day because of these reductions. That cannot be done even from this rather large report on employment conditions. I think the minister will bear with me if I use the total figure.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes.

Mr. HARRIS: If the minister is desirous of having questions put in connection with every item, he knows we will not reach the last page before dominion day. Perhaps we may be permitted to make our remarks a little more general. Perhaps you, Mr. Chairman, in your breadth of vision and thoughtful conduct of affairs in this committee, will allow us a little more latitude. There was a total import of 16,000 hundredweight of malleable castings into this country in 1936, and there has been a substantial increase since that time. We find that the total duty paid on castings and other items in that particular schedule prior to the passing of this trade treaty, that is all items over $25,000, amounts to $368,649. We now find that under the trade treaty which came into effect on January 1 our United States brethren will be able to ship the same quantities of these items upon the payment of a total duty of $283,838. They will have to pay $84,811 less to get their goods into this country. Those who were previously employed in the production of iron castings or malleable steel products will not feel very happy about that situation.

I should like to make one general observation on the entire group. We are being asked to consider items 390, 390a and 390b. The reductions in duties amount to $3,964 on one item, $3,484 on the next and $3,564 on the next. When we apply this argument to the entire iron and steel schedule we find that in all items over $25,000 a total duty was paid last year of $7,835,075. After January 1 the same items could have entered upon the payment of $2,727,978 less in duties. I am not taking into consideration the excise tax which would make a still further substantial reduction.

I think we might say that the United States is over-industrialized as far as the production of malleable, non-malleable and steel castings is concerned. Anyone who has had the privilege of going through the plants in the Pittsburgh area will realize this. Anyone who has high hopes of the city of Hamilton becoming the Pittsburgh of Canada will feel badly about this particular situation. I should like to make this observation. The entire concession in export schedules does not balance what has happened in concessions given in iron and steel imports alone.

Mr. KINLEY: Is the hon. member taking account of the free items?

Mr. HARRIS: The concessions granted by the United States by this trade treaty in connection with iron and steel products which might flow from Canada to the United States amount to only $13,696 on items over $25,000. That is the actual dollar value of the concessions they have given us in the iron and steel group. All the concessions granted in connection with goods entering the United States have a difference in the dollar value payable of $2,411,742. The concessions given by Canada in connection with iron and steel alone have a dollar value of $2,727,978 less duty to pay, apart entirely from the excise tax. I ask hon. members to carry this picture in their minds along with the picture given in the report on employment conditions in Canadian industry. We must remember that ever since 1927, 1928, 1929 and 1930 our friends in the United States have found themselves over-industrialized, especially in the iron and steel industry. It must be patent on the face of it that any action taken that will bring more of such products into this country will automatically—I do not like to use the word "paralyze"—still further handicap those of our citizens who are employed in the iron and steel industry. It is difficult for moulders of castings, such as are covered by item 390, when they reach the age of forty or fifty, to readjust themselves and enter some agricultural pursuit. They have probably started in as apprentices in the foundry at the age of fourteen or fifteen, and it is very hard for them to find themselves out of employment in middle life. They are a type of citizen who have their modest homes established near the centres of industry and probably pretty well paid for, and it is difficult for them to pick up and go into some other vocation or pursuit.

So I say that with this information in hand there should be more correlation between the activities in connection with this treaty and those of the Minister of Labour, who is charged with the responsibility of trying to find work for these 45,000 people. He should have made strong representations that the people engaged in the iron and steel industry should not be further handicapped by throwing open our markets by these tariff reductions —small reductions, I will admit, but nevertheless reductions which affect the very labour group which is suffering the most. I say that you want a strong Minister of Labour to administer that department, and I mean every word I say. The men in the industry affected by item 390 would gladly come to Ottawa and sit around a table with the Minister of Labour and with representatives of the Minister of Finance with a view to finding ways and means of expanding work in that particular industry so as to take up the slack.

I do not want to belabour the Minister of Finance; I do not want to worry him in any way whatsoever, and I hope he will not get up to reply to me. I do not feel that he should be charged with the responsibility of putting this treaty through the house in his present state of health. In fact, I stayed away from this treaty for a day or two to restrain myself, just because of the high regard I have for the Minister of Finance. But at the same time I have a duty to discharge, and when I say that the reduction made in items like 390, which is a representative item, will further restrict the possibility of the expansion of employment in the very group that is suffering the most, I say it most sincerely and with knowledge of what I am talking about.

I reiterate what I said in my opening remarks, that this committee is not supplied with the information necessary to enable it to deal intelligently with the items that we are asked to consider. Following the collapse of 1930, we had got back by 1935 some real activity in this line of business, but the action now taken in connection with this particular group of items is just enough to cripple a growing industry in such centres as Hamilton, Belleville and Toronto, and in the outskirts of Vancouver. Anyone in business knows that it takes so very little to switch an order for castings from one firm to another. They have codes and they try to adhere to fixed prices, as is done in other sections of the iron and steel group; although I must say at once to the credit of the Steel Company of Canada and our steel industry generally that they have kept their level of prices in Hamilton, for instance, lower than the level which obtains in Buffalo. They have not, in other words, taken full advantage of the tariff protection they have, with the net result that the minister could put his hand on any one of those seven hundred odd files which he was speaking of with reference to this particular commodity and no doubt find a reference there from some of the larger steel industries to the effect that this trade treaty is not doing them very much harm because they played fair with the Canadian people and kept their price lower than the price which obtains in Buffalo. But now that you have narrowed that spread, you have got them closer to the Buffalo price, and so far as iron and steel products in the big sheets, rolls and bars are concerned, the industry is going to find it more difficult sledding. When you get down to castings such as are covered by item 390, you get down to the smaller industries, foundries and the like, all of which will find the orders they have been accustomed to receiving being bid on by other concerns, and the price cut finer. The net result will be that instead of an expansion of employment in this group where conditions are very serious we are likely to find a retraction of employment.

I will close this phase of my remarks by saying again that the schedules which have been most seriously disturbed are the very ones which affect the group in which we have the most serious situation in Canada as regards unemployment.

The other observation I shall make is this. It is far better, Mr. Chairman, to have a Canadian citizen working in the foundries of Canada or in the iron and steel industry of this country than for hon. members to sit around this house and discuss ways and means of providing unemployment relief for those unfortunate Canadians who find themselves out of work.

Mr. DUNNING: Dealing with one or two points raised by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), I think he is under one misapprehension. These items have never been subject to any change in duty since my budget of May, 1930. The previous government made no change at any time in these duties. Any change in the inflow of imports or in home production cannot have been brought about by tariff changes, because there have been none in the intervening years.

Mr. HARRIS: If I may interrupt the minister just at that point, he will have observed that I made no reference to the inflow since 1930 in these three particular items. I will give the figures of imports. In 1930 the dollar value was $189,743; for the year 1938, in the case of item 390, the figures are practically the same, namely $158,-537. I use these three items as an illustration. The minister says there is no change in the rate of duty. As he knows, in 1930 it was 27½ per cent, and it was 25 per cent in the tariff prior to January 1, 1939. Now, as I understand it, it is 22½ per cent. I make the observation again that the drop of 27½ per cent to 22½ per cent, in common with these others, and the excise tax, and the over-industrialization of the United States, restrict the possibility of expansion in this very necessary industry.

Mr. DUNNING: In any case I understood my hon. friend to say that there had been a duty change. However, that is not particularly relevant. What I did wish to say on the question of employment in this industry is that it should be noted that our exports of commodities covered by item 390 exceed our total imports. From the employment standpoint no very great injury is done to the industry when one contrasts imports with exports. I would also point out that in this whole group of items our home production, according to the latest figures I have available, is about $20,000,000, and the total imports are about $500,000. That would not appear to indicate that Canadian employment is suffering at all severely, particularly when, as I mentioned, there is an export feature in connection with it.

I have gone with some care into iron and steel because it is an old friend of mine. I had to put through in 1930 the revision of the iron and steel schedule; and, while my friends behind me will not take it as much of a compliment, the succeeding government made less changes in that schedule than they did in any other. The reason was, I think, that there is such an inter-relationship from the primary products to the highly finished consumer's article in the iron and steel schedule that it is rather difficult to start anywhere without whatever action you take having an effect all up and down the line. In other words, unless you are prepared to revise the whole schedule with very great care, the iron and steel schedule is a difficult one to touch at merely one or two places.

That is about all I can say. It is true, as my hon. friend has stated, that the iron and steel industry has not indicated to me that they regard themselves as seriously affected by the new treaty. That is undoubtedly due, in part at least, to the fact that the Canadian iron and steel industry have not, generally speaking, taken advantage in their price structure of the tariff protection they have enjoyed. It is rather hard to make a generalization of that kind exactly accurate. It might not apply and in fact does not apply on some items, but I think it is generally true; and it is for that reason, possibly, that they do not regard themselves as seriously affected.

[Mr. Harris.]

Mr. HARRIS: With regard to the question whether they consider themselves seriously affected, the minister will agree with me that as regards the major industry that is quite true. But the minor industries which depend on the large iron and steel industries for their raw material, for instance, those which have to buy their rods and plates and so on for further manufacture, are a group which in my opinion could absorb a great deal more Canadian employment than they do to-day if this had not been changed.

Mr. KINLEY: With regard to 390 and 390a, it will be noted that while the rate of duty against United States imports is 22½ per cent, the British preferential rate is 15 per cent. That is the way it should be; I am not complaining about our giving a prefernce to Great Britain; but that is the protection standard because the British are efficient in the manufacture and exportation of iron castings and if there is any danger of Canadian workmen being put out of jobs, it would not come primarily through the agreement which we are now discussing, but through the preferential tariff.

Mr. DUNNING: The United Kingdom has not been successful, even with that low tariff, in shipping us any considerable quantity. It was only $1,800 worth last year under the first item, $3,600 under the next, and $2,400 under the third. The product is too low in price to stand the expenses of transport, even with the 15 per cent duty.

Mr. KINLEY: The necessity of making a pattern controls the situation to a great degree; and there are usually heavy transportation charges.

Mr. BROWN: I was going to make this observation later on, but it may be appropriate to do so here. Some of the factories which have their parent bodies in the United States take advantage of this tariff in some cases when the duty is reduced to ten per cent on goods which are not made in Canada. These factories have stopped making their goods in Canada and are now making them in the United States, shipping them over under the ten per cent clause applicable to goods not made in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid I cannot get the application to this item of the remarks of my hon. friend.

Mr. BROWN: I am bringing that forward in connection with say, general machinery.

Mr. DUNNING: When we come to the machinery item my hon. friend will have an opportunity of discussing that.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—390c. Piston ring castings of steel, in the rough as from the moulds: free.

Mr. LENNARD: I note that the duty has been cut from 25 per cent to free. Do we not manufacture steel piston rings in Canada; and if so, why the change?

Mr. DUNNING: They are not cast in Canada, but rough castings are finished in this country.

Mr. LENNARD: There are none cast in Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: No. We are of opinion that the free entry of the rough castings should aid Canadian manufacturers of piston rings to meet the competition of rings imported in a finished condition. Finished rings for tractors are now imported free of duty as tractor parts. The idea of this item is the possible finishing in Canada of the work on the rough castings.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—409. Cream separators and complete parts therefor, including steel bowls: 12½ per cent.

Mr. THORSON: In the first place, on behalf of the dairy farmers of Canada I should like to thank the administration very much indeed for the reduction in duty on cream separators which has been made. It has had an immediate beneficial effect in the reductions in price which have taken place. Certain importers of cream separators put price reductions into effect immediately at the beginning of this year. Many were hoping, however, that cream separators would be put on the free list. They were on the free list in 1930 before the previous administration came into office. The record on cream separators is a rather interesting one. In 1932, as hon. members will recall, the tariff was raised to 25 per cent, and in the Ottawa agreement it was specified that this margin of preference should be fixed during the life of the agreement. When the agreement came to be revised, in 1937 I think it was, this fixed margin of preference was eliminated.

It then became possible for the first time to make reductions in the tariff on cream separators. The question was studied by a special committee of this house on agricultural implements, which brought in a unanimous report to the effect that cream separators should be on the free list.

Mr. SENN: Oh no.

Mr. THORSON: Yes.

Mr. SENN: No.

Mr. DUNNING: He is questioning the unanimity of the report.

Mr. THORSON: There was no dissent from the report; the matter was discussed during the session of last year, when an extensive debate on the subject took place. Those of us who are in favour of reduction in the tariff on cream separators—

Mr. MacNICOL: Are against employment in this country.

Mr. THORSON: —regret that they have not been put on the free list, and that greater progress has not been made towards the implementing of this recommendation of the special committee on farm implements. It is our hope however, that in the budget the government will go the whole way and place cream separators on the free list where they belong.

Mr. MacNICOL: I had not intended saying anything on this item, merely because I know the uselessness of discussing it. Now it has been brought up by a western member I will say a word or two. I had hoped that no western member would say anything about this or the following items, for the reason that the two eastern provinces are bled white now assisting relief measures in the west. We are gladly doing it and are trying in every way we can to help the west, but we should like to see some encouragement given by western members to the promotion of some employment in eastern Canada. Every time any member from the western group attacks industry in this country he is attacking employment and to that extent doing something to put more men out of work, and I wish to protest as vigorously as I can against this continuous onslaught of western members upon workers in eastern Canada.

Mr. THORSON: The west has paid tribute to the east long enough.

Mr. MacNICOL: And eastern Canada has been bled long enough. I wish to say something now about cream separators. The Bennett government did put a duty on cream separators and this at once stopped the importation to a large extent, because by the time that government went out the number of cream separators imported had been reduced to 12,148, for the fiscal year ending in 1935; whereas, for the fiscal year ending in 1937, as a result of the 1935 tariff, importations had risen to 20,394.

Mr. DUNNING: Is that numbers or dollars? It cannot be dollars?

Mr. MacNICOL: Not dollars; I said cream separators. In other words, there had been an increase in importations of roughly 8,000 between 1935 and 1937. The effect has been to put many men out of work.

Mr. THORSON: The whole tariff was on during that period.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes; that is what it was put on for, to give employment. The tariff had been put on by the Bennett government to provide employment.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): And was still on until the first of January.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, and I hope it stays on. Surely, with the return to prosperity, which hon. gentlemen have so often talked about—and we admit that for the first two years of their administration that was true to some extent—there should have been an increase in purchases. But now watch what will happen. The tariff on cream separators is being reduced and it cannot help affecting employment in this industry. Take the index issued by the department itself. On January 31, 1938, the index of employment in the agricultural implement industry was 75·2—I presume they mean as of 1926—and in January of this year it was 59·6. How in the name of common sense are the people in the east going to be able to put up money to rehabilitate the west unless they have an opportunity to make a dollar?

Miss MACPHAIL: You use separators in the east too.

Mr. MacNICOL: This country will be destroyed if every industry is crucified by this continuous onslaught by western members against employment in the east.

Mr. FAIR: I support the contention of the hon. member for Selkirk, and gusts of wind such as we have listened to should be ignored in the house.

Mr. MacNICOL: On a point of order, I want the hon. gentleman to withdraw that word "wind." I have spoken from experience.

I have had a lot to do with labour. If the hon. member had employed a fraction of the people that I have he might talk.

An hon. MEMBER: Withdraw the word "wind" and leave the "gusts."

Mr. MacNICOL: We are fed up with the constant attack from the west.

Mr. FAIR: In answer to statements like those which the hon. gentleman has just made, I would ask where the markets for eastern products are?

Mr. MacNICOL: Mostly in Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. FAIR: Not many days ago I gave some figures, but because at that time I had not sufficient opportunity to make a full presentation of them I shall take occasion at the proper time to return to those figures. I shall be able to show the hon. gentleman then that without the west the east would go begging as the west has done for a number of years by reason of the tariff and other things.

Mr. DUNNING: On a point of order, now that we have had two well balanced presentations, would it not be fair to suggest that we confine ourselves to cream separators?

The CHAIRMAN: The minister's point of order is well taken. I would ask all hon. members to confine themselves to the item, which is cream separators.

Mr. FAIR: I do not think that I strayed very far from the item, but perhaps it does not suit some hon. members to hear these things. The question of cream separators in the west is a vital one, and in the near future it may become of still greater importance to that part of the country, because if we are put out of business in one line we shall have to go into another, and the two central provinces, about which we hear so much, will have a chance to taste some of the conditions we in the west are up against. About two months ago the price of butter fat in the west was down to 16 cents a pound. I wonder what it was in Ontario at that time. I know it was not anywhere near that. The hon. member for Selkirk put up a very strong case for the free importation of cream separators, and I have to support him in that plea. To some hon. members who are supposed to be greatly interested in labour conditions, who make statements such as they made here today, I would suggest that:

A little learning is a dangerous thing;
Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring:

Mr. SENN: I would like first to congratulate the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) upon the influence which he has had with his party in having this duty removed. At the same time I must contradict some of the statements which he made. For instance he stated that the report brought down by the committee a year ago, asking for the complete removal of the duty on agricultural implements, was unanimous.

Mr. McINTOSH: On cream separators.

Mr. SENN: Cream separators. I say to him as a member of that committee that I at no time agreed with that suggestion; I voiced my objection while the committee was sitting and while the report was being drafted, and later voiced these same objections in the house. And not only myself but a number of other hon. members did the same, some of whom were sitting on the government benches at the time.

He has stated that this small reduction in duty has been instrumental in bringing down the price of cream separators. I agree with that statement. However I am afraid that the reduction may not be permanent. When the duty on agricultural implements was reduced it had the immediate effect of raising the prices to the farmer.

Mr. DUNNING: That will be the next item.

Mr. SENN: I am just using that as an illustration. My hon. friend made the statement that the importers immediately reduced the price when the reduction in duty became effective. I imagine there was some method in their madness in that respect. I am afraid that if this particular manufacturing industry is driven out of Canada and the dairymen of this country are left in the hands of foreign manufacturers, we may see a very different picture in the near future. It has happened in many instances before, and I am afraid it will happen again. If we are left at the mercy of foreign manufacturers we shall find ourselves in the same position as we have been in regarding agricultural implements. Being a farmer I am of course interested in the price of cream separators, but there is another consideration which with me outweighs the price I have to pay for a cream separator which I may buy perhaps every fifteen or twenty years. There is a home market created by the men employed in this and like industries, which home market I believe is the greatest asset of the Ontario and eastern farmer. Every time we drive an industry out of business by removing the protection it enjoyed, we not only injure that particular business and deprive men of employment but we are thereby injuring our home market, which is the most important market the farmer has.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): What is the duty on cream separators and their parts entering the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: Up to $50 in value, free; beyond $50 in value, 25 per cent.

Perhaps I might be permitted a word on the employment situation in this connection, to point out that at what appeared to be our maximum year of Canadian production, under the duty of 25 per cent which prevailed up to January 1 last, our maximum production appears to have involved about $791,000 worth of cream separators. I merely give that information in order that we may see matters in their proper perspective. True it is that to an individual who loses his job that is very important to him, but the relationship of a total value of production of $791,000 under the higher tariff conditions which prevailed does not make it appear that cream separators are a tremendously important factor in employment.

Miss MACPHAIL: I am sorry to say that on this occasion I am going to have to part company with the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). I hear a great deal in this house about passing the benefits of protection on to the Canadian working man. If that were done I think we should be willing to pay with a great deal more grace than we do the higher prices caused by the tariff—I am speaking agriculturally. But I do not believe that the tariff protection is passed on to the working men of Canada. By far the greater part is kept by the manufacturer. I know the Conservatives do not agree with me.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): We certainly do not.

Miss MACPHAIL: And some Liberals too, perhaps. But I think there is a good deal of proof of what I say, although I am not giving it at the moment.

With butter prices what they are—they are extremely low; all people handling butter are taking very severe losses this winter—farmers will certainly welcome any lowering in the tariff on cream separators. This is not a matter which affects only western Canada, because the farmers in Ontario and Quebec, and I suppose in the maritimes also, use cream separators, and it matters a great deal to them what the price of the separator is.

Of course it seems to me that this whole discussion of items of a treaty which is already the law is really futile. If the presentation were made before the treaty was written there would be at least some excuse for making it, but there seems not to be much now. We might just as well O.K. it at once, because it is all passed and has become law; we are just talking about it. But I simply wanted to say that the farmers in Ontario need any reduction in price of cream separators that they can get. The present prices of butter do not enable farmers to pay out much money. They have very little purchasing power to buy cream separators or anything else from present butter prices. Therefore I approve the lowering of the tariff; I believe it should result in lowering the price to the farmer. If it does not, there must be some combine or artificial grouping which prevents it.

Customs tariff—409b. Cultivators, harrows, seed drills, horse rakes, horse shoes, scufflers, manure spreaders, garden seeders, weeders, and complete parts of all the foregoing: 7½ per cent.

Mr. THOMPSON: What are the imports from the United States under this item? On several of the following items, all practically connected with farm machinery, there is no change from the trade agreement that came into force on January 1, 1936. But farm implements were reduced in 1936 from 25 per cent to 7½ per cent, and immediately that reduction was made, the price of farm machinery increased very materially. There was $30 more on a binder, and similarly with other farm machinery. Not only did we have to pay more for our farm machinery, but, as the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has said, we lost a great deal of employment in Canada through our manufacturers having to lay off their men. And the imports from the United States have increased. I am very sorry indeed, because in my own riding I have a very large farm implement manufacturing company, the Frost and Wood people of Smiths Falls, and they are vitally affected by this lowering of the tariff; also the farmers of Canada were adversely affected by an increase in the price of their machinery. May we deal with these items one by one? If so, I should like the minister to deal first with item 409b.

Mr. DUNNING: Under item 409b the total imports from the United States were valued at $640,000, and of the same items we exported from Canada about $1,200,000 worth. It may be interesting to note that of these items we exported very considerably from Canada to the United States.

Mr. THOMPSON: What was the United States rate?

Mr. DUNNING: Free. Of these items we exported about $300,000 worth to the United States.

Mr. SENN: I understand the reason these items are put in this schedule is that they are bound now for the period of the agreement; is that correct?

Mr. DUNNING: Bound against increase.

Mr. SENN: But not against reduction?

Mr. DUNNING: That is correct.

Mr. SENN: I noticed one or two items in connection with which already there has been a reduction. I believe they appear farther down on the list.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. SENN: However, the minister has just said we have exported a certain amount of goods included in this particular item.

Mr. DUNNING: Twice as much as we imported.

Mr. SENN: Yes, but it may be fairly well understood that a good deal of the exports, perhaps not of this particular item, but of agricultural implements which go out of Canada, go to foreign countries and not to the United States. Meantime, since the 1935 treaty has been in effect we have increased to a very great extent our imports from the United States on all lines of agricultural implements.

For instance, in 1935 before the former treaty came into effect, we imported about $5,000,000 worth of agricultural implements of all kinds. Immediately the treaty went into effect in 1936 we imported $8,000,000 worth—in fact, nearly $9,000,000 worth. In 1937 we imported $16,000,000 worth and in 1938, $19,000,000 worth. My contention is that if a larger amount of these goods had been manufactured in Canada we certainly would have had increased employment. It is true that during those years our employment figures have increased somewhat in Canada—that is, of the men who were employed in the manufacturing of agricultural implements. But it is also true that in the last three or four years the farmers got to the position where they had to have agricultural implements, and had to buy. Through a great many years they were unable to buy, and their implements were largely worn out. In 1937 and 1938 they were compelled to buy agricultural implements. But it must be noted as well that they have been buying them at higher prices than formerly, because immediately the treaty of 1935 came into effect there was a rise in the price of agricultural implements. That price has been continued right up to the present time.

Had I the time I should have liked to give some of the figures showing increases in prices of agricultural implements. I have taken figures with respect to representative implements, and have secured information with respect to the prices of those implements in 1930, 1935 and 1939. I have found that in 1930 the price of a thirty-tooth rake, with tongue and yoke, was $61; in 1935 the price was down to $58 and in 1939 the list price is $64. I have a whole list of prices of implements with which I could show that immediately after the tariff was put on in 1930 prices were reduced, and that when it was taken off in 1936 they increased. I have figures before me with respect to a four-horse double disc drill. In October 1930 the price was $256; in 1935, it was down to $246, a reduction of $10; despite the fact that the tariff had been raised to 25 per cent. But when the tariff was again reduced to 7½ per cent the price went up again to $263, or an increase of nearly $20.

It seems to me these figures prove conclusively that these reductions in duties have not been of any advantage to the farmer in Canada, that if we had been still manufacturing these articles under the 25 per cent duty the farmers of Canada would not be paying the prices they are now paying, and we would not be importing a large amount of these goods and thereby putting our own people out of employment. I believe it would have been a better situation for the country, all around. I am sorry these items are bound until 1940, because I feel sure that within a very short time another party will be in power which might otherwise have had the opportunity of reducing them.

Mr. GOLDING: If the hon. member for Haldimand has separated the figures with regard to importations of machinery from the United States, would he tell the committee the total amount that came in as tractors, which are not made in Canada at all?

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps I can answer that. I was going to mention that the rather large figure of $19,000,000 mentioned by the hon. member for Haldimand probably included $12,000,000 worth of tractors.

Mr. SENN: I do not think it was that much, but it was large. I think if the minister will look up the figure he will find it was something like $9,000,000. But even then there is an increase of $10,000,000 over the importations—

Mr. DUNNING: $12,000,000 worth of tractors for the last fiscal year.

Mr. SENN: I have the figures for 1937.

Mr. DUNNING: And another $3,000,000 for parts.

Mr. SENN: Very well. But even then, taking all those figures into consideration, and taking into consideration the fact that the implements belonging to the farmers were largely worn out and they had to buy, if they wished to continue their operations, there is a very large balance, still showing that there was a larger importation than formerly, under the former rates of duty.

Customs tariff—409j. Fanning mills, peavinners, corn husking machines, threshing machine separators, including weighers, wind stackers, baggers and self-feeders therefor; complete parts of all the foregoing: 7½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—409k. Windmills and complete parts thereof, not including shafting: 7½ per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I point out briefly that the firms manufacturing windmills have suffered materially as a result of the 1935 trade agreement, which is now bound in the present agreement. I notice that in the calendar year 1935, the last year during which the previous government held office, Canada imported $21,217 worth of windmills. With the cut in the duty, in the calendar year of 1937 Canada imported $54,268 worth of windmills. All I have to say in that regard is that the greater number of windmills imported provided employment in other countries when it reduced employment in this.

Mr. DUNNING: Would my hon. friend please be good enough to explain why it is that when the beneficent government of which he speaks was in office, the Canadian production of windmills in 1934 was worth only $5,000? That is the record I have here, and unless there is some mistake that is the value of the total Canadian production.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is it now?

Mr. DUNNING: The last figure I have is for 1935, when it was valued at $34,000. There is no figure for 1936 because there were fewer than three firms engaged in production, and the bureau of statistics do not issue statistics when there are less than that number.

Mr. MacNICOL: I used to know a number of substantial windmill manufacturers in this country, but I do not know how many there are to-day. Perhaps tariff tinkering up and down the years has crucified most of them.

Mr. McNEVIN: The gas engine and electric motor have replaced a great many windmills.

Mr. THOMPSON: I want to confirm what the last speaker said about the windmill business. You can get a windmill for almost a trifle from the farmers. As my hon. friend said, they are all installing gas engines and hydro power which do the work much more efficiently. The windmill business is on the decline.

Mr. PERLEY: The items from 409b to 409m cover practically all the agricultural implements. I agree with much of what has been said on both sides of the chamber. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) gave certain figures in connection with purchases of implements. As far as the west is concerned, this is an important matter. I believe I placed on Hansard this year the value of implements purchased in the western provinces. In 1938 these purchases ran into millions of dollars. I would be ready to support the lowering of these duties if it were going to mean cheaper implements. The minister referred to the benevolent government which was in power from 1930 to 1935.

Mr. DUNNING: The beneficent government.

Mr. PERLEY: The fact is that while duties were increased, prices of implements were lowered. The hon. member for Haldimand gave the particulars. The proof of the pudding is in the eating. When the duty was reduced in 1936, we were met with a major increase in price, and there have been two more increases since. When we were discussing the report presented by the implement committee, I recall that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) made a bold statement that he would read the riot act to the implement companies, that he would give them warning that if there were not a reduction in price certain things might happen. I should like to know what has happened and if the government is taking any action in connection with the companies that are importing implements.

The CHAIRMAN: I would remind the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) that we are dealing with windmills.

Mr. PERLEY: That is practically a farm machine. The same argument would apply to windmills. I should like to know what action the government has taken to see that there shall be a reduction in the price.

Mr. DUNNING: The three per cent special excise comes off by virtue of this treaty.

Mr. PERLEY: Has the government understandings with the companies that are importing implements?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Hon. members have stated that during the last regime while the tariff was held up, prices of agricultural implements, including windmills went down. If hon. members will go back to look up the record they will find that prices went down less in connection with those commodities than they did in connection with many others. They certainly did not go down to the same extent in Canada as they did in the United States.

Mr. SENN: Oh.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): My hon. friend says "oh." This is the first time in the history of these two countries that prices of agricultural implements have been comparable on both sides of the line. There is one reason why there has not been a greater drop in the price of agricultural implements. Everyone knows that because of war conditions which have existed for several years, iron and steel prices have been kept quite high. Prices of United States and Canadian implements are however, closer to-day than they have ever been before. The hon. member for Haldimand does not like the fact that this duty is bound, but that is what I like about it. If we get back to normal in the next two or three years; if prices of iron and steel come down and the nations of the world are not still in an armament race, there is a possibility that prices of agricultural implements in the United States will come down considerably, and prices in Canada will have to come down accordingly. Then the farmer who has to buy implements will get a chance to buy them at a reasonable price.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): May I remind the hon. member who has just spoken that at the time of the reduction in the tariff on agricultural implements the implement manufacturers of Canada were selling implements to the farmer cheaper than the manufacturers of any other country in the world. At the time he speaks of, prices of agricultural implements in the United States were much higher than they are now. At the present time we find that there is a comparable level in prices of implements in Canada and in the United States. At the present time these items are bound. On February 14, 1939, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made this statement as reported on page 908 of Hansard:

> Those agreements are inseparable in the sense that neither could have been effected without the other.

Later on he said, interrupting me in my speech, that all the concessions that were granted were necessary in order to enable the agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States to be concluded. But in respect of those concessions which have been granted to the United States—

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No, to the Canadian farmer.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): No. These items are bound for three years and therefore they are concessions. The general public believes that all the concessions which Canada granted were granted at the request of Great Britain in order that they might be able to consummate a treaty with the United States. The discussion this afternoon puts that thought out of my mind to a certain extent. It shows me that these concessions and these reductions in duty have been made in order to get us closer to free trade in Canada. I should like to know whether the government of Great Britain asked Canada to have these items bound, or whether it was necessary for us to bind these items and give this concession in order to enable Great Britain and the United States to make these treaties, as the Prime Minister stated to me when he interrupted me in my remarks.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to get into a general discussion, but the meaning which my hon. friend attributes to the Prime Minister is, I am quite sure, not the correct one. The Prime Minister, in his remarks to which my hon. friend makes reference, was referring to such reductions as were made in Canadian preferences in the British market.

In answer to my hon. friend's specific question, this item is here because the government considers it good business for Canada to have it here.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—409l. Traction ditching machines (not being ploughs) and complete parts thereof: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—409m. Internal combustion traction engines; traction attachments designed to be combined with automobiles in Canada for use as traction engines; complete parts of all the foregoing: free.

Mr. HARRIS: Would the minister be good enough to give us the imports from the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: Imports in 1938 of traction engines, internal combustion, amounted to $12,056,000. Imports in 1938 of traction attachments designed to be combined with automobiles, amounted to $2,800,000.

Mr. HARRIS: Perhaps the minister will agree with me that imports have increased very considerably from $3,200,000 in 1935 to the figures just given, which are in the neighbourhood of $14,000,000. This is one example where the three per cent excise tax on this volume of business represents to my mind a straight gift to the United States.

Mr. DUNNING: To the Canadian buyer.

Mr. HARRIS: To the Canadian buyer, if you will, perhaps, but I would say to the United States. The minister knows and I know that a United States manufacturer of any commodity, when he is competing with a Canadian manufacturer, will invariably absorb a great deal if not all of the three per cent excise tax. I do not want to get into an argument on that particular point, but I wish to make this general observation, that on this item the loss to the Canadian treasury in actual dollars on excise tax alone is $394,770. Why was it necessary for all these three items—there is a long string of them—to be bound for three years and relieved of the three per cent excise tax when, so far as my research goes, I can find no compensating benefit that we are getting in a lower cost or relief from taxation on our exports to the United States? Inasmuch as imports under this item amount to something like $14,000,000, it would be safe to say that we are losing almost half a million dollars in excise tax. Perhaps the minister can tell us just how much the loss in excise tax will amount to this year compared with last.

Mr. DUNNING: I think I had better defer that until the budget.

Mr. HARRIS: Perhaps the minister would indicate what benefit Canada's treasury is getting. I cannot agree with him that the whole benefit of this half a million dollars goes to the Canadian people.

Mr. NEEDHAM: I take it that this item includes complete parts for tractors and that these parts will come in free. I have a letter here complaining about this very item. It says that the roller and ball bearings are not free; that the customs officials recently showed my correspondent regulations and stopped the free entry of these parts, and that they would not even allow a declaration that the user wanted these parts for a tractor.

Mr. DUNNING: That is a matter of customs administration. Wherever an article is a standard article, such as ball bearings, there is no question that if declarations were accepted that the bearings were for a purpose that would entitle them to duty-free entry, the matter would be rather difficult of administration. My hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) can deal with the question more explicitly, but ball bearings are not necessarily a part of a tractor any more than a part of something else for which they could be used.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—410 l. Ore crushers, rock crushers, stamp mills, grinding mills, rock drills, percussion coal cutters, coal augers, rotary coal drills, n.o.p., and complete parts of all the foregoing, for use exclusively in mining metallurgical or quarrying operations: 17½ per cent.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What are the imports from the United States under this item?

Mr. DUNNING: Imports of ore crushers, rock crushers, stamp mills, n.o.p., from the United States, were $886,900; imports of percussion coal cutters, coal augers, rotary coal drills and parts, from the United States, were $6,400; and imports of rock drills and parts, from the United States, amounted to $594,000.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is that the total? I have some figures here which I received from the bureau of statistics with respect to the importation of mining machinery in various years. Last year, imports of dutiable goods amounted to $2,406,000, and $4,304,000, making a total of $6,711,000.

Mr. DUNNING: That covers very many other items.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes, but I will come to the point in a moment. We have in Canada a mining development such as is going on in no other part of the world. We have the natural resources which belong to the people of this country, and it seems to me there should be an opportunity for the Canadian people to enter into the manufacture of the machinery which is necessary to develop our mining resources. What an opportunity there is there! Yet we find this item bound at 17½ per cent for three years. Several mining men have told me that if they could get reasonable protection against dumping they would do something in the line of manufacturing some of this machinery in Canada. I wish to protest against the binding of this item for three years, because it precludes the establishment of an industry in this country for the manufacture of this machinery unless government assistance of some kind is given.

Mr. McNEVIN: In referring to what the hon. member for St. Paul's has just said, I believe that our primary industries like mining and agriculture are entitled to every concession possible in the way of getting their machinery at the lowest possible price. I am in full agreement with the binding of this item.

Mr. MARSHALL: I note that there is a rate of five per cent covering the British preferential tariff. This would lead me to conclude that there must be some imports from the United Kingdom. Would the minister give the figures, say for a three year period, covering importations from the United Kingdom?

Mr. DUNNING: I shall have to give these in three sections, because there are three different items included in the one.

Ore crushers, rock crushers, stamp mills, grinding mills, and parts, from the United Kingdom: 1936, $154,000; 1937, $155,000; 1938, $144,000.

Percussion coal cutters, coal augers, rotary coal drills, from the United Kingdom: 1936, $4,500; 1937, $5,100; 1938, $8,900.

Rock drills and parts, from the United Kingdom: 1936, $162,000; 1937, $162,000; 1938, $154,000.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—411a. Machinery, logging cars, cranes, blocks and tackle, wire rope, but not including wire rope to be used for guy ropes or in braking logs going down grade, and complete parts of all the foregoing, for use exclusively in the operation of logging, such operation to include the removal of the log from stump to skidway, log dump, or common or other carrier: 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—412a. Machinery and apparatus, n.o.p., viz: Gun and mould apparatus for making press rollers; machines and apparatus for making electrotypes and stereotypes; engraving machines and apparatus, including photo-engraving apparatus, and other plate-making apparatus, used in the manufacture of printing plates of all kinds; machines and apparatus for graining metal plates; machines and apparatus for sensitizing, grinding or polishing metal plates; machines and apparatus including cameras and camera equipment, lens, prisms, camera and printing lamps, screens, and vacuum frames for transferring by photographic processes, or direct, to plates or rolls for use in lithography, rotogravure and printing; shading apparatus; machines and apparatus for addressing and/or wrapping newspapers, magazines, periodicals, pamphlets and catalogues; machines and apparatus for embossing or stamping or producing embossed or engraved effects, bookbinding, looping, stitching, sewing, gathering, inserting, bronzing, dusting, creasing, scoring, cutting, perforating, drilling, punching, slitting, re-winding, glueing, pasting, gumming, waxing, varnishing, carbon coating, patching, numbering, ruling, jogging, sheet piling, tying, bundling, tube-making, metal mounting, eye-letting, staying or stripping, reinforcing and box-covering; complete parts, not to include saws, knives and motive power; all the foregoing when for use exclusively by, and in their capacities as printers, lithographers, bookbinders, manufacturers of stereotypes, electrotypes and printing plates or rolls, paper converters, or by manufacturers of articles made from paper or cardboard: free.

Mr. MARSHALL: What is meant by the figures under the "rate on United States goods prior to 1935 agreement"; "ten per cent" and "thirty-five per cent" are bracketed together.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend will notice that a great number of articles are embraced in this item. In 1935 the tariff item as it now stands was put together. Prior to that time some of the articles now included in it were at different rates, so we show both rates in order to give correct information.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—412b. Flat bed cylinder printing presses, to print sheets of a size 25 by 38 inches or larger, and complete parts thereof; machines designed to fold or sheet-feed paper or cardboard, and complete parts thereof: 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—412c. Typecasting and typesetting machines and parts thereof for use in printing offices: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—412d. Offset presses; lithographic presses; printing presses and typemaking accessories therefor, n.o.p.; complete parts of the foregoing, not to include saws, knives and motive power: 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—413. Machinery and apparatus, of a class or kind not made in Canada, and parts thereof, specially constructed for preparing, manufacturing, testing or finishing yarns, cordage, and fabrics made from textile fibres or from paper, imported for use exclusively by manufacturers and scholastic or charitable institutions in such processes only: 5 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—414. Typewriters and complete parts thereof: 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—414a. Dictating, transcribing and cylinder shaving machines and complete parts thereof, including cylinders and unfinished wax blanks: 12½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—414c.
(i) Bookkeeping, calculating and invoicing machines and complete parts thereof, n.o.p: 12½ per cent.
(ii) Adding machines and complete parts thereof: 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Customs tariff—415. Electric vacuum cleaners and attachments therefor: hand vacuum cleaners; and complete parts of all the foregoing, including suction hose, n.o.p.: 20 per cent.

Mr. ESLING: With reference to this item—and the same thing would apply also to many other items of electrical equipment—has any thought been given to the patent phase? When the Canadian people are invited to import this electrical apparatus, the Patent Act interferes, it seems to me, to some extent, because the importation of an article which is made in the United States, and on which a patent is registered in Canada is, it has been shown, an infringement of the Patent Act, and this applies to all articles of electrical equipment as it does to radios. People are invited to import at reduced duties, and at the same time such importers may be subject to action for infringement of patents. It is impossible to get away from that if there are patents registered in Canada on articles of machinery or electrical equipment manufactured in the United States.

Mr. DUNNING: I am advised that the patent difficulty does not arise in connection with this class of electrical equipment. That is, there is a sufficient variety available to prevent any possibility of abuse in that direction. My hon. friend of course has reference particularly to radios and radio tubes. There is difficulty in that connection. As the committee knows, the matter of radio and radio tubes is before the tariff board for inquiry with particular reference to the relationship of the patent situation to the difficulty which exists in Canada. I am sorry I cannot say anything more definite than that in reply to my hon. friend. He is, I am sure more aware than most members of the committee of the very great difficulty which surrounds this patent relationship to the tariff question. It is constantly being studied.

Mr. ESLING: I did refer to the radio patents in so far as matters of infringement are concerned; but where there is a patent the same principle applies to any piece of machinery or to any article which is patented in Canada and made in the United States, unless there be some special arrangement as between the Canadian importer and the manufacturer in the United States who holds that patent. My point is, by inviting the Canadian public to import these patented articles, is the government not at the same time inviting an action for infringement?

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid I cannot answer that, except to say that in the case of the item before us the fact that there were some $800,000 worth of imports would make it appear that the patent difficulty does not materially affect the situation. I spoke of radio tubes merely as an illustration of an extreme situation along the lines that my hon. friend is referring to, not meaning to say that it was an isolated case, although I believe there are very few cases where the alleged abuse occurs to the degree to which it has been alleged to occur in connection with radio tubes. It is not a matter on which I can speak positively at the present time.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to support the view expressed by the hon. member for Kootenay West. It is a principle which I think we in this country have to face. I had the matter up four years ago. In 1935 there was quite a discussion on it. At that time I think there were some amendments to the act. The matter has arisen on several occasions since. Unfortunately, when one mentions this subject, the tendency is for certain of our larger institutions, with which as institutions I have no quarrel, rather to take the attitude that you are attacking them. That is not the point at all. The real point is that there seems to be a confusion of the rights of the owner of a patent and the right of an individual to import.

I will illustrate the matter in this way. An article is patented; it is registered under the patent acts of the United States, Canada and other countries, under the general international arrangement. The royalty to the maker of the patented article is paid wherever the article is made. No one disputes that. I do not, and I do not think anyone does. But my point is that once the royalty is properly paid, whether in Canada, in Belgium, in Great Britain or in the United States, that is the sole right that the owner of the patent should be permitted to claim. In practice, however, this is what occurs. Usually the original inventor sells to some corporation, but we will stick to the simple illustration, taking the original inventor. He may sell his right to A in the United States, B in Canada and C in Great Britain. He sells the right to the royalty plus the right to manufacture. Then A, B and C argue that, having bought the right for the respective countries in which they operate, no one else has the right to sell the article in that market, even though he buys it in a market where the royalty has already been paid. That is an absolutely wrong principle, because obviously it means that one can impose a tariff, which might be 100 per cent or 500 per cent—that is, what is in effect a tariff—

Mr. DUNNING: Far more than a tariff.

Mr. STEVENS: It is not a tariff but the equivalent of a tariff. The article may be free, and—

Mr. DUNNING: The price differential may be 100 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. As a matter of fact, I illustrated it on a previous occasion with electric light bulbs, and as the hon. member for Kootenay West says, the same thing applies to a great many other articles.

One reason why nothing much is heard about the matter is that a great many of these articles are manufactured by concerns in the United States who establish agencies in Canada, and they control the outlet in Canada, so that the point does not arise. But the purchaser is paying the shot, nevertheless.

Mr. DUNNING: Would my hon. friend be good enough to develop the international patent agreement side of the question?

Mr. STEVENS: I must confess I am not quite competent to do that, because it is a matter for a legal mind rather than mine, but I will say this. The claim is made that where, in Canada for instance, a man secures the right to make and sell an article, that right to sell is inherent in the patent. My argument is that it is not. I believe there was a case before the exchequer court of Canada, and although I am not quite certain of this statement, I believe that court handed down a decision that the right was inherent in the patent by virtue of the statute as it stands.

My argument in 1935 was that we should so amend the patent law that while we absolutely preserved the protection to the inventor, we should not allow the right of control of sale to be attached to the patent, provided that the article that is imported has paid the royalty in the country from which it is imported.

Mr. DUNNING: What bearing has the international agreement on that question? I am not familiar with it myself.

Mr. STEVENS: I have not looked the matter up. It is a complicated question and it is a little difficult for me to explain it from memory. Speaking subject to correction by some of the lawyers present, I understand that the international agreement does not interfere with the right of any country to make its own patent laws. There is nothing to prevent the parliament of Canada from amending, in any way it likes, its statutes controlling patents, provided that we do observe the registration of the invention under our law, just as any other country observes the registration of inventions at home under their own laws. I am advised that there is nothing to prevent Canada or the United States or Germany or any other country from passing its own statutes controlling patents, in so far as the points I have mentioned are concerned, where sale and royalty are involved. For instance, we in our patent law declare that after a given number of years, if the invention is not used, the commissioner of patents may declare the patent open. That is a power which we reserve to ourselves. We fix a certain number of years and some other country may have a different period. I submit that there is nothing inherent in an invention that prevents Canada from passing its own statutory controlling law, although, as I say, I speak subject to correction.

Mr. DUNNING: My question was whether there was anything in the international agreement?

Mr. STEVENS: I think not.

Mr. DUNNING: It is an interesting point. Of course, it is not in my department.

Mr. STEVENS: I agree with the minister to this extent, that so long as our law stands as it is, the international agreement precludes our acting in this matter. But my argument in 1935 was, as it is to-day, that we should review the whole situation with a view to modifying our law in order to rectify the matter.

Before I left the department as its minister, I suggested that we should have the national research council make a complete survey, judicial if you like, of the patents held in Canada to-day. A great many patents are held that are not used, but the public do not know this. After all, the most sacred right is the preservation to the inventor of the benefits of his patent; that is the one underlying principle. But the public are entitled to have these inventions used; and if they are not used by the holder of the patent, then, under our law, if the fact is drawn to the attention of the commissioner, the patent may be declared open. Therefore there should be a careful examination by an expert body, and I believe that the national research council is the proper body. A survey would take a long time, but it should be made.

Let me add this—because I am treading on rather delicate ground. I am not for a moment advocating anything that would in any way impinge upon the right of the owner of the patent with respect to his royalty. I do not wish to call in question unduly the corporations concerned, but in so far as there is a clash between their right, so-called, and the public interest, an effort should be made to balance them.

The hon. member for Kootenay West, as we all know, has made a close study of these matters, and in bringing them up to-day I think he has done a good service. I am not at all critical of the government, because I know the difficulty and the complexity of the matter, but we should look very carefully into this phase of it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What number of refrigerators were imported under that item?

Mr. DUNNING: Imports from the United States of electrical refrigerators last year amounted to $950,000; of other refrigerators, $245,000. The number imported from the United States was: electrical, 14,894; others, 4,049. We exported a total of 7,000 refrigerators, the biggest customer being Australia, with the United Kingdom second.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The reduction of five per cent in duty and the three per cent excise tax amounts to eight per cent. In 1935 we imported 2,230 refrigerators; now the figure has gone up to over 15,000.

Mr. DUNNING: There is surely something wrong with that figure. I have the figures for the fiscal year 1936 here, and we imported in that year some 5,000.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There are some fine industries manufacturing refrigerators; they are both manufacturers and importers. This reduction in duty is not, I think, going to hurt the industries themselves, because they will simply import more parts or more refrigerators; they are agents as well. What I am worried about is that this reduction is going to throw a number of men out of employment. I do not suppose there is anything we can do about the matter, but I point out that there will be a reduction in employment in that industry.

Mr. McNEVIN: With the extension of hydro in rural Ontario, there is a great need for equipment of this kind. To my mind, if the duty were reduced another five per cent it would still be sufficiently high. Very many homes where electricity has been installed have not yet been able to purchase a refrigerator, and I consider that the needs of the consumer should be given consideration.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: I have information from some manufacturers in Canada of refrigerator parts such as shelves; they say that the reduction in the duty plus the elimination of the excise tax will oblige them to bring down their prices, and they can do that only either by cheapening the production or by doing away with labour. So I am pleased to support what the hon. member for St. Paul's has said.

Mr. HARRIS: I have the figure of imports of electrical refrigerators. For the calendar year 1935, it was $189,000. For the year 1937, on account of the reduction under the 1935 trade pact, imports rose to $893,000. In other words, the amount of imports was multiplied five times. I am in accord with the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario (Mr. McNevin). I think he will agree with me that he does not want this industry wiped out entirely; his friends in Peterborough particularly would like to manufacture some of these refrigerators. The speed with which the agreement of 1935 cut into that industry will now be accelerated under this new agreement.

Mr. DUNNING: In reply I might say that our exports have gone up in a similar ratio—

Mr. HARRIS: Not to the United States.

Mr. DUNNING: Our total production has shown a steady increase. Frankly, I expect that on an item which is becoming so important a consumers' item as refrigerators, when you have a duty of twenty-five per cent, we are going to have demands for its reduction rather than increase.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wish to support the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario, on this item. People are just beginning to realize the value of refrigeration in the home, and we should make it as easy as possible for farmers particularly and people living in the country to get this equipment; they have more need for home refrigeration than people living in the city. When the industry is on an export basis; it is an indication that the tariff is high enough. There is a case here for a reduction from the twenty-five per cent provided in the agreement.

Mr. CHURCH: This particular industry has had a very rapid expansion in the last few years. For many years it was a struggling industry; it has led to the use of a great deal of hydro-electric power. The protection formerly afforded up to 1935 was forty per cent; then by the treaty of 1935 it was reduced to thirty per cent, and is now further reduced to twenty-five per cent.

PRIVATE BILL

SECOND READING

Bill No. 43, for the relief of Stefano Guilio Luciano Roncari.—Mr. Walsh.

PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES

PROPOSED SUBSTITUTION OF DETERMINATE FOR INDETERMINATE REFORMATORY SENTENCES

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved the second reading of Bill No. 12, to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the object of the proposed bill is to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act. This Bill No. 12 is described as "An Act to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act," and starts out in this way:

His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada enacts as follows.

And then follows section 1 of the bill headed "determinate sentences only." It substitutes the old law of the determinate sentence for the indeterminate sentence.

Since the British North America Act and confederation provincial courts have imposed imprisonment for one year and three hundred and sixty-four days. For a great many years that was the law, until the passing of the indeterminate clauses.

The Prisons and Reformatories Act gave the courts jurisdiction to impose an indeterminate term in a reformatory. The bill proposes to substitute a determinate for an indeterminate sentence. The several expressions relating to "indeterminate sentences" are found in eighteen sections or subsections of the act, and the draftsman considers it inexpedient to amend each of such sections by a separate clause. This bill would revert to the old law of sentences for a definite period only. The indeterminate legislation has been condemned by many judges and magistrates as inhuman and illegal.

Canada's prisons at present are filled with youth, many first offenders, who have been unable to secure work. The lack of employment for youth and of a proper national apprenticeship system, by cause and effect is one of the main reasons for crime. Recently the appellate division of the supreme court of Ontario questioned the legality of such legislation, because the provinces had the right of providing confinement for only one year and three hundred and sixty-four days, and also condemned the legislation on grounds of public policy. The law has not acted as a deterrent, nor is it reformative. It should be repealed, because in practice it confers on officials of these institutions the right to detain those who have not influence enough to have employment awaiting them at the end of a definite period, and gives to their decisions the force of statute law.

The effect of these clauses respecting indeterminate sentences is to remove a certain amount of jurisdiction from the courts and to place it in the hands of officials of these institutions, and the parole board. Following judgment in a case Mr. Justice Middleton made some comments, and the attorney general's department circularized the county judges and magistrates advising them to retain a reasonable relationship between determinate and indeterminate sentences.

The royal commission concluded that with the probation system and a central board to administer the ticket-of-leave regulations, the statutory provision for indeterminate sentences might be repealed. On more than one occasion the attorney general for Ontario has intimated his desire to see justice done. May I say that the particular judgment to which I referred is Rex v. Bond, as delivered by the court of appeal. In giving judgment on April 16, 1937, as reported in the Ontario Reports, Mr. Justice Middleton said that the accused was charged with two offences, and pleaded guilty. On each charge the magistrate sentenced him to two years less one day, and an indeterminate term thereafter not to exceed two years, less one day.

Out of the Rex v. Bond judgment I did, when introducing the bill, quote three or four paragraphs. Judge Middleton said that the criminal code, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, chapter 36, defines various crimes and, speaking generally, fixes the maximum punishment that may be awarded, but makes, except in a few instances, no provision for the minimum. He said:

In 1916, parliament determined to adopt, so far as the province of Ontario is concerned, the system of indeterminate sentences, and, instead of making an amendment to the code dealing with the matter, passed a statute which is snugly tucked away in the dusty recesses of the Prisons and Reformatories Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, chapter 163, section 46. This section provides "Every court in the province of Ontario, before which any person is convicted for an offence against the laws of Canada, punishable by imprisonment in the common gaol for a term of three months, or for a longer time, may sentence such person to imprisonment for a term of not less than three months and for an indeterminate period thereafter of not more than two years less one day in the Ontario reformatory instead of the common gaol."

This section, it will be observed, is a departure from the fundamental idea that reformatories were for prisoners to be incarcerated for a period of less than two years.

As complementary to this section there is a provision found in section 43 of the same act:

"The lieutenant-governor of the province of Ontario may appoint a board of parole for the said province whose duty it shall be to inquire from time to time into the cases of prisoners sentenced to the Ontario reformatory. . . . And where as a result of such inquiry the board thinks proper it may permit prisoners serving indeterminate sentences to be paroled under conditions approved of by the Minister of Justice and when the terms on which such prisoners have been paroled have been complied with, the board may recommend for the consideration of the Minister of Justice the final discharge of such prisoners."

When I was speaking on Saturday last to one of the ablest crown attorneys, he told me that a great many magistrates in the province do not thoroughly understand the indeterminate sentence. He believes the judgment to which I have referred has a great deal of merit in it. I shall read two further clauses in which the learned judge said:

Many judges and magistrates when imposing an indeterminate sentence address the prisoner somewhat in these terms. . . . "If during this determinate term you prove yourself to be a good prisoner, and comply with the rules of the institution and show a disposition to be law-abiding, the parole board may, at the expiry of the definite term, allow you your liberty. It all depends upon yourself and your conduct as to how much, if any, of the indefinite term you may be called upon to serve."

Thus encouraged, the prisoner proves to be a model prisoner. He gives every indication of his reformation, and is taken at the expiry of the definite term before the board. He is hopeful of liberty and full of good resolutions, and the board announces that by reason of an earlier conviction, a fact well known to the judge who imposed the sentence, they will not allow him parole, and he must serve the indefinite term. I can imagine no situation more cruel and more likely to convert a man really desiring to reform into an enemy of society.

Indeterminate sentences had their origin in Michigan, and have been adopted in many places. Fundamentally reformatories are for up to one year and three hundred and sixty-four days definite, and by being indeterminate are made four years. The legality of the whole thing is questioned and the court of appeal makes criticisms on its usefulness.

I believe that in these days, when institutions are filled with so many young people, we must take special consideration of the circumstances. We should have law reform all along the line and a Borstal system. I have before me from the bureau of statistics some figures on criminal statistics in Canada. They are issued under the authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler). There is reference to the great increase in crime by young people since the depression began, and it mentions the increased numbers of youthful offenders in all the courts. It also refers to causes and effects. I shall not go into the blue-book tables in detail, because that course, although the figures are most relevant, may not be advisable here on account of time. I may point out briefly, however, that the high prison population is to a large extent the result of unemployment of first offenders, lack of law reform and the sending of too many youths to gaol by magistrates.

Two such youths may get into trouble and appear before the magistrate. The magistrate may fine each ten dollars and costs. One boy's father can pay; but the other boy cannot pay, and as a result there is imprisonment for debt and no way to pay the fine by instalments as I suggested in 1937. That takes place under the system of determinate and indeterminate sentences. Imprisonment for debt was supposed to have been abolished in England in 1864. It is still in vogue in Canada.

I did introduce an amendment in 1937 on behalf of those youthful offenders. My amendment was fashioned after the law in England, known as the Money Payments Procedure Act, 1935, 25 and 26 George V, chapter 46. This was modern, useful legislation, adapted to Canada, and closed many prisons in England, but the minister did not see fit to adopt it, probably on account of his belief that there would be conflict in jurisdiction between the dominion and the provinces, because we are away behind in law reform.

The annual report of the inspector of prisons of the province of Ontario agrees with the federal report in regard to the large number of these youthful offenders. I received many letters from people who have suffered because of the indeterminate and inhuman provisions of this act. One is from an offender whose name I shall not give, but whose number is 21570 at the industrial farm. He says:

> Theoretically all men who receive an indefinite sentence have an equal chance of being paroled for the indefinite period of their sentence but in practice this does not seem to work out, seventy-five per cent of those who have indefinite sentences are obliged to serve both the definite and indefinite terms.

The second man, who was sentenced by Magistrate Jones at Toronto, says that he appeared before the parole board, but they refused to take any action. Parliament has turned over to this board many of its powers and prerogatives. This was never the intention of the fathers of confederation.

I should like to quote from a letter which I received from the attorney general of Manitoba, Hon. W. J. Major, re this bill of mine. Under date of February 6, 1939, he says:

> I find, however, that you and I have approached the problem from different angles. Your quarrel appears to be with the indeterminate sentence; mine is with the determinate sentence. I have taken the position, and so expressed my views in my brief to the penitentiaries commission (copy of which I enclose) that the most reasonably effective method in dealing with the reformation of juvenile delinquents is to permit the imposition of a modified indeterminate sentence with a maximum of three years, and to omit entirely all reference to determinate sentence.
> I think after consideration you will conclude that the reason is obvious. When a juvenile is faced with a determinate sentence of two years to be subsequently followed with an indeterminate term the efforts toward reformation will not begin for some period after his incarceration, if at all. He realizes that he must serve two years, with the prospect of further detention.

He argues in favour of the indeterminate sentence, but I think it would be a hardship and inhuman and not in the public interest to put anyone into an institution under such a sentence system. It would not be in the interests of public safety, nor would it be in the interests of the public generally, or of law reform. It would require more prisons than ever, while in England they have closed up half their prisons because of the liberal interpretation they have given to the law, by wise and humane reforms, and by the institution of a national apprenticeship system and national service for youth.

I could read from other letters which I have received, but I do not think I shall say anything more this evening. However, there is one point I should like to bring up. There should also be much greater care taken in the appointment of judges and magistrates. You cannot learn to be a police magistrate in a day. Colonel Denison was a great and humane police magistrate in Toronto for thirty-eight years, and he introduced many wise and modern reforms. He did not have any assistance of outside commissions and new duplicate courts in carrying out the duties of his court. When a family or the husband and wife came to him in trouble, he would advise the wife to go home and cook her husband some good meals, and not both to get cross at the same time. He gave good advice to many youthful offenders. He was always very careful as to whom he sent to prison, not as is the case now in dealing with first offenders in trouble from distress and lack of work.

To-day a man is sent to prison simply because he has no money. One boy comes up before a court, and because he is well off he is able to pay the ten dollars he is fined. Another boy is too poor to raise the fine and he goes to gaol. There should be more care taken in making these judicial appointments and in deciding who is to be sent to these institutions. We are twenty-five years behind England in these law reforms, as the prison reports of England show. I do hope there will be a study made of this particular system. The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Woodsworth) has taken an interest in this work in Winnipeg. I do not think it would be in the interests of justice to have indeterminate sentences instead of determinate. A man would not know when he was going to get out. Perhaps that would be all right if the officials in these institutions were properly trained. Notwithstanding what the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) said the other evening, there are hundreds of these young people riding the rods. They get into trouble, and they receive determinate plus indeterminate sentences.

I am sorry that I have not been able to find a long letter which I received some years ago from the late Chief Justice R. M. Meredith at the time when the indeterminate sentence legislation had been in force for years. It was either shortly before or shortly after he retired that he wrote me this long letter in which he gave his views of the indeterminate sentence. He contended that such sentences were illegal under the British North America Act and under the code and against public policy. He was very much against them. He was out on circuit for thirty-eight years, and I believe he tried more cases than probably any other judge we ever had in the province in the supreme court. He was strongly opposed to the principle of indeterminate sentences as inhuman and unreformative. This principle has also been condemned by the court of appeal, as I have already shown.

In these days when so many young people are getting into trouble, instead of bringing about reforms and providing education we are doing the exact opposite. The result is that many men are sent to these institutions for committing the most trivial offences. There is an injustice on the families as well. I should like to quote from a report as to the number of inmates in the Toronto gaol. I did not note in the press report the date. I lost it. Governor Denning reports to the city hall:

> There were 295 inmates in the gaol last night, nearly an all-time record. Out of this total 275 were men and 20 women. All cells were occupied. Cots had to be placed in the corridors. The normal limit at the gaol is 230; that is what the gaol can accommodate. After that it is up to the governor and his staff to figure out how to "bed down" the prisoners and look after the discipline.

[Mr. Church.]

Those may not be the exact figures for to-day, and this condition may not apply all over the province. The commission which recently sat found many of our provincial institutions had been built before confederation and against all the known laws of hygiene. I think we should follow the example of England where they have closed up half the prisons, and have some modern prison reform.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the express object of this bill is to eliminate the power to impose indeterminate sentences in Ontario under the Prisons and Reformatories Act. Section 46 of that act authorizes the courts of Ontario to impose upon any person convicted for an offence punishable by imprisonment in the common gaol a term of three months' determinate and an indeterminate period thereafter of not more than two years less one day in the Ontario reformatory instead of the common gaol. Under section 43 of the act the Ontario board of parole is instituted whose duty is to inquire into the cases of prisoners sentenced to certain institutions. After such inquiry the board may permit certain prisoners serving indeterminate sentences to be paroled under conditions approved by the Minister of Justice.

The section continues:

> . . . and when the terms on which such prisoners have been paroled have been complied with, the board may recommend for the consideration of the Minister of Justice the final discharge of such prisoners.

The question of the indeterminate sentence was studied by the royal commission appointed to investigate penitentiaries and to study penal reform in general, and in their report they devote a few pages to this question. They mention that there have been some difficulties in Ontario because of a certain conflict between some of the magistrates and the board of parole, which led to the decision in the appeal court to which my hon. friend has referred. That decision is also mentioned in the report of the royal commission. I think for the better understanding of this question I might be permitted to read just a few sentences from that part of their report which the commissioners devote to this question. After commenting upon that decision of the appeal court they say, at page 247:

> Your commissioners are of the opinion that if indeterminate sentences are to be continued in the province of Ontario there should not be such conflict between the board of parole and the judges and magistrates in the province. It is clear that judges and magistrates should not sentence prisoners to the Ontario reformatory for indeterminate periods when, having regard to the prisoner's previous record and his opportunities for reform, it is clear that he is not likely to be a good subject for parole at the end of the determinate period. As has been pointed out, the success of a prisoner on parole does not depend on his behaviour in prison, but on his will and determination to conform to the laws of the country and the conventions of society and on the likelihood of his carrying out that determination under proper supervision.

The efforts of the authorities who are in charge of the reformatories in Ontario are greatly handicapped by the practice of sentencing incorrigible criminals to the reformatories, by means of imposing indeterminate sentences, for longer periods than would otherwise be justifiable under the act. Mr. Neelands drew the attention of your commission to one case in which a prisoner was sentenced to the reformatory for terms of two years less one day determinate plus two years less a day indeterminate on each of two charges which were to run consecutively, with the result that the prisoner was required to serve a term in the reformatory of eight years less four days. Your commissioners are of the opinion that this was not the intention of parliament when the legislation was enacted.

Following the judgment of the court of appeal in May, 1937, Mr. I. A. Humphries, K.C., the deputy attorney general for the province of Ontario, sent out a circular letter to all magistrates and county judges, enclosing a copy of the "Reasons for Judgment" of the court of appeal, and adding certain observations thereon. These observations may be summarized as follows:

1. The period of the indeterminate sentence should bear some relation to the period of the determinate sentence. For instance, a definite sentence of three months should not be followed by an indeterminate sentence of two years less a day;

2. Consecutive indeterminate sentences should not be given;

3. In no case should the court state to the prisoner what the action of the board of parole may be, or the considerations which may impel the board of parole to release the prisoner.

It appears that this letter has had some effect in correcting the situation that had previously existed in respect to indeterminate sentences.

Your commissioners are of the opinion that, if the recommendations of this commission are adopted in respect to the establishment of an adult probation system, and a central parole board is established to administer the Ticket-of-Leave Act, with adequate investigation and supervision in the provinces and an adequate system for the treatment of young offenders in the prisons, the present statutory provision for indeterminate sentences in Ontario might be repealed.

So this recommendation is subject to certain other improvements that would first have to be made before we would do away with the system which has prevailed in Ontario for such a long time. The commission which will be appointed will have to study the various aspects of this question, and until this is done I would not favour any amendment to the Prisons and Reformatories Act so far as the indeterminate sentence is concerned.

I may say, and my hon. friend has shown it himself, that opinion is far from being unanimous on this question. As a matter of fact, at the time my hon. friend was introducing his bill to do away with indeterminate sentences, the attorney general of Manitoba was asking the Department of Justice to change the criminal code so as to do away with determinate sentences. As my hon. friend said, he and the attorney general of Manitoba are perhaps trying to reach the same goal, but they view it from a different angle. He wants to abolish the indeterminate sentence, and Mr. Major wants to abolish the determinate sentence. I have here the letter of the attorney general of Manitoba, but I suppose it is not necessary to read it and put it on Hansard. Indeed, he rather asks my hon. friend to change his bill altogether and substitute the abolition of determinate sentences rather than the indeterminate.

With respect to the wording of the bill, I do not think it would accomplish satisfactorily the object which my hon. friend seeks to accomplish. For instance, his bill merely says that whenever the expression, "an indeterminate sentence" or "an indeterminate period" is found in any one of the sections which he mentions in his bill it should be replaced by the expression "determinate term." So, under section 43, which gives to the parole board of Ontario certain powers with respect to indeterminate sentences, if you changed indeterminate to determinate sentences, you would be clothing the parole board of Ontario with powers which are really under the Minister of Justice with regard to remission or mercy in all cases of determinate sentences.

For these reasons I believe this bill cannot be adopted at this time more particularly, and even if it had more merits than I am able to find in it, I would say that it is premature and my hon. friend should wait until such changes as are suggested by the royal commission can be studied.

Mr. CHURCH: Might I ask that the attorneys general give the matter consideration when the general bill is coming up? As I see it, there is nothing premature about it. Similar legislation is being considered in England and very largely adopted. So much depends upon the attorneys general of the provinces because, after all is said, it seems to me that the federal power has been very largely delegated to the capitals of the provinces and that it is at its lowest ebb since confederation. This parliament has control, not the attorneys general of the provinces.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I draw to the attention of the hon. member that if he speaks now he closes the debate.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am pleased to tell my hon. friend that whole question, which is intimately linked with the question of parole, will be considered and studied in relation to this particular aspect of it. My hon. friend may be assured that all his suggestions and arguments will be carefully considered.

Bill withdrawn.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROVISION AGAINST REFUSAL TO EMPLOY OR DISMISSAL FOR MEMBERSHIP IN TRADE UNIONS

The house resumed, from Friday, February 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. S. Woodsworth (Winnipeg North Centre) for the second reading of Bill No. 5, to amend the criminal code.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, when the debate on the second reading of this bill was adjourned, I was attempting to show the necessity of the federal enactment which is now proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). I was also pointing out how powerful corporations may defeat the rights of workers to organize and bargain collectively, and was using as an illustration the experience of the strike at Blubber Bay, in British Columbia.

The purpose of the bill, as explained, is to prevent employers from refusing to employ, or from dismissing employees, or conspiring with others therefor, for the reason that they are members of a trade union. It was pointed out that it was lawful for workmen or employees to form themselves into trades unions and bargain collectively; that therefore, as a matter of public policy, it should be unlawful for employers to seek by overt acts of intimidation, threats or conspiracy, to prevent their employees from belonging to such trade unions. Throughout the years organized workers have by dint of great struggle attempted to build up their rights to organize. A fundamental right of civil liberty is the right to organize, the right to bargain collectively. Their rights in this respect are not clearly defined, and under circumstances which prevail in some parts of Canada it does become readily possible for powerful corporations to invoke the law resulting in severe penalties to organized workers if they attempt to assert their rights, or where police forces are susceptible to influence, to use the law enforcement agencies to defeat their purposes in attempting to bargain collectively.

In British Columbia we have an act known as the Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration Act. I mention that because the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) last session made a special point of stating that in all the provinces adequate legislation existed to deal with the question, and therefore it should be left exclusively to the jurisdiction of the provincial authority. He also claimed that it would be inadvisable to make it a crime for employers to act in this way. May I point out that frequently, because of the lawful efforts of organized workers to assert their rights, and because of lawless efforts on the part of the employers who are not restrained under the criminal code from such activities, serious situations result such as that to which I am about to refer.

British Columbia provides, under the Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration Act, that it shall be lawful for employees to bargain collectively with their employers and to conduct such bargaining through representatives of the employees duly elected by a majority of the employees affected, and any employer or employers refusing so to bargain shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $500 for each offence. An attempt has been made in British Columbia to enforce that act, and on one occasion we had the amazing declaration made by the minister of labour of British Columbia that it would be impossible for him to enforce this act against a powerful corporation because unquestionably they would carry the matter on appeal to the privy council and make it extremely awkward for the provincial government.

The situation to which I refer specifically, the strike at Blubber Bay, was with regard to the operations of the Pacific Lime Company, a company controlling practically the only payroll on Texada island, an isolated spot. Comparatively few men were involved, but the strike assumed importance because of the proximity of other unions on the mainland at Powell River and of the miners' organizations on Vancouver island. All these organizations have been extremely interested in the strike at Blubber Bay and in the policies disclosed with regard to the attempted settlement of the strike.

Approximately 150 men are employed in quarrying operations. The company quarries limestone and has control over practically the only source of high-class lime on the Pacific coast. Working conditions for some time were unsatisfactory. The men made some attempt to organize during 1937, and several disputes ensued. Finally, in September, 1937, a definite agreement was reached between the employees and the company as a result of organization, and this agreement is the one I have in my hand. It reads in part as follows:

> This company agrees to bargain collectively with its own employees through a committee elected by the employees as a whole; it being understood that the company does not recognize any affiliation between its employees and any outside union.
> The company also agrees that no discrimination shall be shown against any employee by reason of the strike declared on July 23, 1937.

The agreement then proceeds to outline increases of pay and pay for overtime, and concludes with the sentence that:

> Either party to this agreement desiring to terminate same shall notify the other party in writing thirty days in advance of termination.

In addition to this agreement, certain practices were followed at Blubber Bay, and particularly with regard to the employment of men laid off during the slack period. During slack periods the work was rotated in a fashion; the men remained in the district, and if available were reengaged when the work increased. But after the attempt was made to organize, and even after this agreement was reached, it is, I think, now a matter of record that the company violated almost every article of the agreement made with the men. As a matter of fact, only four days after the agreement was signed they disregarded the understanding with regard to boat loading, and they also employed new men for drilling operations, although the old-time employees, men experienced in the work of drilling, were on hand. The union then formed found it necessary to threaten a strike in order to maintain satisfactory working conditions in that regard. But the company made a special point of refusing to reengage men who had been active in the union, and imported from Vancouver men who had not been in the employ of the company. May I add just at this point that the average term of employment of the employees was approximately fourteen years.

In January following this agreement the company actually called together a meeting of its employees and attempted to exercise influence to have them declare themselves against the International Wood Workers of America, an international organization with which the union was affiliated. Three members of the International Wood Workers' Association were actually at one stage excluded from the meeting by the activities of the company. Finally the men voted ten to one for the union committee, and, following the meeting, ninety-two signatures were obtained on a petition to the minister of labour of the province. The petition asked that a conciliator be sent in to deal with the various matters in dispute. On February 12, 1938, a commissioner under the Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration Act was sent in with Mr. Moriarty, as interpreter, and a meeting was held between the employers and the employees. A secret ballot was taken to determine their method of representation, making it clear that the employees should have the right to select a union of their own choice. Two slates, one named by union and the other by non-union men, were submitted to the employees. They voted eighty-seven to thirty in favour of a union committee. The conciliator, Mr. McGeogh, ruled in favour of the men and ordered the company to meet with the committee elected by the men. However, when that committee approached the company the company flatly refused to negotiate and notified the committee that in future the company would hire all men from Vancouver.

That was an exceedingly serious matter because any man who could not secure employment with the Pacific Lime Company would be virtually compelled to leave Texada island inasmuch as there were no other forms of employment available to him there. Again the organized employees applied for a conciliator under the provincial act. I emphasize the fact that the employees who were in dispute with the company followed step by step every legal process open to them under the provincial law. Before the conciliator arrived, the company again indulged in discriminatory practices, and the men went on strike on March 6, at the same time presenting their grievances to the company. Again two commissioners arrived at this point and persuaded the company to open negotiations on condition that the men returned to work. The men returned to work on March 12. The committees and officials of the company met in negotiation, but a deadlock soon took place, following which the men made application for an arbitration board as provided under the arbitration act. Even then, during the month of April, 1938, while the government of British Columbia was taking steps to set up an arbitration board, the Pacific Lime Company discharged nine of their regular employees, for no other reason apparently than that they had engaged in the organization of a union, and filled their places with men recruited from recipients of relief in the adjacent districts.

Here I pause to stress the fact that these men were recruited through the agency of the provincial police of British Columbia from the area known as the Sechelt peninsula. Men who were on relief, it is declared in affidavits, were told that if they did not accept strike-breaking duty at Blubber Bay their relief would be cut off. A number of affidavits were produced to that effect. As a result of these practices the employees again quit work and appealed to the minister of labour of British Columbia, who instructed the company to reinstate the men or face prosecution under the act. In the arbitration proceedings which followed, Mr. Harold Winch, M.L.A., represented the men before the board of arbitration and produced a letter which had been circulated among the men by their employers urging them against belonging to an affiliate of the C.I.O. Counsel for the company stated that this organization was not a Canadian union but was controlled in the United States and that its reputation was not such as to inspire the company with confidence, thereby making it clear that the company intended to deny the men the right to select a union of their own choice. There are innumerable instances of anti-union activities on the part of the company, and there was continual discrimination, which resulted in the application for the board of arbitration.

Mr. Justice McIntosh was chairman of the board, the other members being Mr. Frank Leigh, and Mr. R. D. Williams, designated by the lieutenant governor in council. The board held sessions at Blubber Bay on May 4 and 5, and on May 10 handed down a unanimous report. The Pacific Lime Company notified the department of labour of British Columbia that they would accept the award. I have here a copy of the award. Several sections were in dispute as being ultra vires of the Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration Act, a section of which requires the employer to recognize a committee elected by a majority of the employees. At the request of Mr. Pearson, provincial minister of labour, Mr. Justice McIntosh returned to Blubber Bay and dealt with these difficulties to the satisfaction of the company and the men.

One of the principal clauses of the award was that the company should reinstate the men who had been black listed, if those men were available and as opportunity should arise. The meeting following the second session of the arbitration board proceeded to work out plans for the implementing of the terms of the award. The chief point was the reinstatement of twenty-three men who had been black listed by the Pacific Lime Company. Although the company professed their willingness to accept the amended award, they definitely refused to work out a plan for the reinstatement of the twenty-three men who had been black listed. They refused to declare when they would reinstate the men, or to set a time limit, or to suggest any procedure that would be followed with a view to reinstating them. They said that they would have to consider their so-called loyal employees, that is, the men brought in, in the weeks immediately preceding, to take the place of the men who had been black listed because of trade union activities.

Mr. Justice McIntosh did not spare the company in his remarks, particularly in regard to their stand on behalf of the so-called loyal employees. He said definitely that they "should go down to the mill in the morning and dismiss those men." He emphasized that the men were brought in during the dispute and said that he would not be in the least surprised if they were dismissed, and he pressed the company to reinstate the twenty-three men round whom the dispute centred and who had been loyal to the company for terms of employment ranging up to thirty years. The company refused to make terms of reinstatement, but stated quite defiantly to the government and to the men that they would not reinstate them; and after waiting several weeks the men struck on June 2, 1938. As far as I am aware, that strike is still in progress.

Since the strike was declared the authorities in British Columbia made several earnest endeavours to settle the dispute. For several very good reasons there is still danger that certain business will be tied up if the unions in the United States handling cargoes take a sympathetic point of view. Sympathetic action on the part of affiliated trade unions would seriously disrupt business operations in British Columbia.

Mr. REID: The hon. member mentioned twenty-three men who were dismissed. Were any of the old employees retained?

Mr. MacNEIL: Yes, I believe there were; but I am referring to the men who formed themselves into a union and attempted to secure recognition of that union by the company, and who were black listed and dismissed; none of those men was reinstated. Mr. John Stanton, barrister of Vancouver, made a splendid effort to bring the company and the men together. Mr. Colin Cameron, M.L.A., Mr. Harold Winch, M.L.A., and many other individuals approached the company, and eventually Mr. Justice McIntosh again went to the company, urged the courts to adjourn the various trials, and attempted to reach some settlement. The company refused to reinstate the men. At first they promised they would reinstate six or seven or eight of them; subsequent negotiations revealed their willingness to reinstate the majority of the white men but not any of the orientals involved, who had given long and faithful service.

To every attempt made by the provincial government during or subsequently to the arbitration proceedings the company took a defiant attitude and evinced determination to crush the strike.

When the strike was called, a detachment of the provincial police was sent to Blubber Bay, and it is to the disgrace of British Columbia that this police force was used to intimidate the strikers and provoke them to disorder. The employees were men known to be industrious and law-abiding, but they were subjected to what I consider to be acts of terrorism. There was a lady in the community, whose house had been built by public subscription when her husband died in the employ of the plant and whose house was not on the company property; an attempt was made forcibly to evict her, in the presence of the police officers. Affidavits were made showing that attempts were made to suborn witnesses to give perjured evidence that money was obtained by methods of extortion, without the man being formally charged or appearing before a magistrate. There was deliberate provocation by the police, until a large number of charges of unlawful assembly resulted. Men were arrested on various pretexts. I well remember that for a whole Sunday men crazed with liquor ran wild in Blubber Bay, intimidating and in some instances actually assaulting innocent persons, and the police standing by offered no protection to those who sympathized with the strikers. I was present on one occasion when a barrister of repute made an affidavit in the presence of the attorney general of British Columbia to the effect that the magistrate sitting on one of these cases had been under the influence of liquor when dealing with the case. The whole matter was such as to undermine confidence in the administration of law and order in that section of British Columbia, and it resulted from the deliberate and determined efforts of a well entrenched company to deny a legitimate union the right to conduct its legitimate activities.

The situation became so serious that one police officer was finally charged with assault, convicted and sentenced to six months' imprisonment. The offence which he committed was that he did assault a man arrested on a charge of unlawful assembly after that man had been placed in the house used by the police detachment for their purposes. That man was seriously injured, and although sentenced on the charge of unlawful assembly was at the point of death for many months, as a result of these injuries.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Was that the municipal police?

Mr. MacNEIL: A provincial police officer, a member of the detachment especially imported to Blubber Bay on strike duty, who, I say, took no pains to conceal their desire to take the part of the company and smash the strike. A few level-headed police officers on the scene might have made it clear that they were there to protect property and maintain law and order, and might have avoided all the serious trouble which resulted. The courts were clogged with charges of assault, unlawful assembly and rioting for many months afterwards, and this caused grave concern to citizens of British Columbia interested in the maintenance of law and order. The law was brought into ridicule because of the actions of some police officers sent to Blubber Bay on strike duty.

While I cannot now go into more details of a very sad chapter in the industrial history of British Columbia, I suggest to the Minister of Justice that it is a crime for employers to do what was done in Blubber Bay. They used the power which is theirs to intimidate employees and prevent legitimate trade union activity; they found it possible to influence law enforcement in British Columbia in order to place the strikers at a disadvantage, and where you have officers susceptible to that kind of influence it is very easy to charge that any assembly, such as a picket line, is an unlawful assembly, threatening or presumed to threaten a disturbance of the peace. The law was brought into contempt in British Columbia by reason of that action with sad results, which will leave a deep impression in the minds of citizens of British Columbia for many years to come. I suggest it is now high time that we make definite provision in the criminal code of Canada declaring it to be unlawful for employers to intimidate in that fashion employees who are attempting legitimately to bargain for their rights.

On motion of Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) the debate was adjourned.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND PERIOD OF OPERATION OF ACT, ETC.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the third reading of Bill No. 36, to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): When this bill was up for second reading and during the committee stage I discussed it at some length. I shall endeavour not to traverse again the ground that I covered on those two occasions, but to state briefly some reasons why I consider this legislation to be of a retrograde character.

Over a long period of years there have been developed in the legislation of Canada certain safeguards to control the expenditure of public money. As a result of long experience certain principles have been adopted to ensure this control.

This is a bill to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, which originally was passed in 1935 as an emergency measure. The original legislation was of this nature: There had been an area in Saskatchewan and Alberta and the western section of Manitoba subjected to drought for several years; there was soil drifting, and the farmers in this district were suffering. It was found advisable for parliament to pass certain legislation enabling a study to be made of the situation. So a bill was passed authorizing the appointment of a representative committee. I read the details of that clause on the second reading. This committee was of an advisory character to advise the minister as to what measures might be taken to rehabilitate the area. That, as I say, was in 1935.

In 1937 the act was amended, broadening its character. It must be borne in mind—and I wish it had been possible for the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to have been present to-night, because I consider this is a matter of rather unusual importance—that the original measure provided for examination into the situation, and for certain emergency measures. But it limited the amount of expenditure in the act itself, and provided for other safeguards and limitations.

In the act of 1937 the original act was amended and the groundwork somewhat broadened. The 1937 bill really erects what was originally passed as an emergency measure into an important piece of permanent legislation. It may be questioned as to whether or not it is permanent. But when I point out that in his elucidation of the works which had already been undertaken and brought into operation the minister stated last night that some of it was constructed to last for at least twenty years, the permanency will be realized. I think in regard to many of the operations he would not limit it to that time.

Furthermore, thousands of acres, tens of thousands, yes, hundreds of thousands of acres of land have been and are being purchased, which erects the whole undertaking as a permanent structure. For instance, when speaking last night the minister gave certain information, some of which I shall quote. He apparently impressed the house with the significance of what the government is doing. For example, he referred to Caron water storage, at a cost of $400,000; Cypress lake storage, at a cost of $304,696.13; Downie lake irrigation project at a cost of $61,461.65; the Brooks irrigation project extending over an area of 25,000 acres, the Eastend extension at a cost of $30,661.45; the Glen Ewen dam storage at a cost of $9,471.40; the Kisbey Flats irrigation project costing $23,121.50; the Pipestone lake storage, costing $7,523.25; the Oxbow-Souris river storage dam at a cost of $16,130; the Souris-Estevan irrigation project at a cost of $52,-903.86; the South Saskatchewan river storage project at a cost of $243,106.25; the west Valmarie irrigation project at a cost of $43,-987.50; the Weyburn rural municipality underground storage project, costing $3,333,33, and the Leavitt irrigation district project, to cost $46,304.80.

These are the works with which we are dealing in this legislation. And I may say that, in addition to these, there are about 5,000 individual, smaller operations.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the hon. member mind my asking him a question? I understood a moment ago that the hon. member was going to proceed to quote from something I had said to show that hundreds of thousands of acres of land had been purchased. There is nothing in the remarks he has made which indicates that.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not think the minister expected me to quote to any great extent. However, I shall quote some of it. For instance, these pasture lands acquired by the government—

Mr. GARDINER: Those are not purchased.

Mr. STEVENS: Fenced by the government.

Mr. GARDINER: They are not purchased.

Mr. STEVENS: They are fenced.

Mr. GARDINER: They are given to the government.

Mr. STEVENS: They are taken over. The minister said last night that title in them was in the government. Are they or are they not deeded to the government?

Mr. GARDINER: The title is given to us by the provincial governments, but they are not purchased. There is no money passed.

Mr. STEVENS: None of them purchased?

Mr. GARDINER: There may be certain acreages, small acreages, purchased—but not hundreds of thousands of acres.

Mr. STEVENS: Here is what we have acquired, anyway; in other words, title has been taken by the dominion government in connection with these properties:

Name of pasture	Acres in pasture
Coldfields	6,500
Estevan-Cambria	6,400
Laurier	24,960
The Gap No. 1	5,440
The Gap No. 2	6,720
Brokenshell No. 1	20,480
Brokenshell No. 2	8,160
Excel No. 1	6,880
Excel No. 2	10,560
Rudy	7,360
Usborne	12,160
Dundurn	20,800
Montrose	11,680
Mariposa No. 1	7,320
Mariposa No. 2	14,720
Park	5,760
Total	175,900

In addition to that the minister gave some very large figures last night—

Mr. GARDINER: Over 400,000 acres.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, some 400,000 acres. That saves me the trouble of looking it up.

The only point I make is that this constitutes a permanent undertaking. It is not something which is any longer of an emergency nature. My complaint is that in this legislation before the house we are giving to the minister powers which over the years have gradually been taken away from ministerial control, not through any reflection upon ministers, but as a matter of experience and to safeguard the proper control of public expenditures.

As an illustration let me turn to the Department of Transport Stores Act, 1937. There we find this safeguard:

All transactions affecting the accounts herein provided for shall be subject to all the provisions and regulations of The Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act 1931, except as otherwise herein provided.

That is one safeguard not found in this legislation.

Then, the Public Works Construction Act was somewhat similar to the measure now under consideration. It, too, was emergency legislation. Let us remember that in connection with these undertakings for the irrigation of land, valuable areas of land are to be acquired. Under this measure, subject to the approval of the governor in council, we empower the minister to acquire lands, and so on. But in the Public Works Construction Act, section 3 we find this:

The governor in council may acquire such lands as may be necessary for the purposes of this act, and the provisions of the Expropriation Act, chapter 64 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, shall apply.

I am not saying that in every instance the Expropriation Act should apply, but I do submit it would be advisable to have the acquisition of land under this legislation subject to the Expropriation Act or, in cases where the Expropriation Act were not considered necessary, the governor in council should make special provision for it.

Another point is this: It is not obligatory upon the minister to call for tenders. On the other hand, under the Public Works Construction Act it is obligatory upon the minister to call for tenders, and the provision reads as follows:

Except as hereinafter provided the minister or department of the government entrusted with the administration, management and execution of any of the works set forth in schedule A to this act shall invite tenders for the construction and execution of such works, and contracts for all such works and undertakings shall be awarded under the direction of the governor in council.

I submit that also should be included in this bill. Another provision which should be included is to be found in the Public Works Construction Act, 1935. This reads:

All orders in council made under the provisions of this act shall be laid before the House of Commons forthwith after the making thereof if parliament is then sitting, and if not, then said orders in council or an abstract thereof disclosing their essential provisions shall be published in the next following issue of the Canada Gazette and laid before parliament in the case of all expenditures the amounts of which are not specifically set forth in schedule A to this act within the first fifteen days of the next ensuing session.

The reason for that provision in that act was similar to the reason why a similar provision should be included in this legislation. The new section 12 empowers the minister to dispose of equipment; in fact, under that section he can dispose of a great many things. I did not attempt to look up the records, but I have referred to the Public Works Act, which is chapter 166 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. This is a very old statute, and I cite it because it shows that for years parliament has carefully guarded this sort of thing. Section 39 of that act reads:

Notwithstanding anything in this act, or in any other act contained, any public work not required for public purposes may be sold or leased, under the authority of the governor in council; and the proceeds of such sale or lease shall be accounted for as public moneys: Provided that such public work shall be so sold or leased by tender or at auction after public advertisement.

And so on. The reason why I refer to that is the fact that yesterday it was suggested to the minister that these articles should be disposed of by public auction. There is a wide range of activities authorized under this bill. It is impossible for the minister personally to keep in contact with several thousand undertakings. When I say several thousand, I am not exaggerating because the report which was tabled, which is incomplete, shows that applications have been made for over 11,000, and the projects reported completed number 4,588. That was a year ago, and during 1938 several thousand more have been added. It is obviously impossible for the minister or the deputy minister to keep in touch with the various projects, and therefore it is doubly desirable that reasonable safeguards should be maintained. I am not asking for anything new, I am simply suggesting that the existing safeguards in connection with the disposal of equipment and property shall be maintained. I think that could be done by adopting in this measure the old, well tried practices of the Department of Transport, which was formerly the Department of Marine, in connection with its stores, and of the Department of Public Works and the other operating departments of the government which through long experience have found the best method of dealing with these matters.

It was not my intention to prolong the debate or delay this matter. I simply wanted to reiterate what I had expressed before, that in my opinion this legislation represents a loosening up of what has long been recognized as the necessary control by parliament over the expenditure of public money. It is a retrograde step. This legislation is making permanent that which was adopted a few years ago under an emergency, and we are doing it with an almost frivolous attitude. We have not worked out a well thought out statute to control this vast undertaking. It is a vast undertaking. It is like having a working government within the government. It has all the potentialities of a Department of Public Works being operated by the Department of Agriculture. This latter department has not the personnel or the training to deal with many of these larger undertakings. I have already referred to irrigation schemes which will run into $300,000 or $400,000. These are to be constructed under the direction of the Department of Agriculture when we have an efficient Department of Public Works which could undertake this work. The small dug-outs and the little local water storage basins could probably be constructed by the Department of Agriculture, but these larger works ought to be under the Department of Public Works, and be supervised by the laws of the country which control expenditures of this kind.

I am quite aware that I shall lay myself open to the suggestion that I am reflecting on the minister, but this has nothing to do with him at all. It is purely a non-personal matter. My objection is to the principle of the bill, to the retrograde nature of the legislation and to the at least partial abandonment of the regular safeguards which have been used for many years in this country in connection with such matters.

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, I have had some experience with legislation and with government. One thing which amazes me is the number of measures which are passed through this house empowering ministers to do within their own departments works which should necessarily come under some other department. One almost begins to wonder whether or not this session is just a prelude to a general election when what is so often referred to in the United States as the pork-barrel is opened up for the purposes of an election within a few months. Everything in connection with this bill gives to the minister power which I submit no minister should have. When expenditures such as these are undertaken, I believe that they ought to be undertaken by the department of government which knows something about construction, engineering and the carrying out of such works. We have gone into the motion picture business; we have the Department of National Defence; apparently everything that is being done is subject to the charge of patronage. Surely the time has come when the people of Canada should be sick and tired of political patronage. They are sick and tired of it. I for one want to protest against the putting through of legislation which, like this bill, is going to give the power of political patronage to a minister.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, we are being asked to approve the third reading of Bill No. 36, to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. The main part of the amendment has to do with an appropriation of $450,000, a large sum of money. The minister may make argeements with the provinces, with municipalities, cities and towns, or with any individual or corporation. That is contrary to the other labour and relief legislation of the government where the municipalities must deal with the provinces.

I think this Bill No. 36 is class legislation of the worst kind. If you are going to assist the prairie provinces on their way to recovery, then by the British North America Act in relation to concurrent jurisdiction in agriculture, there should be equality of treatment for all the other provinces because they have farm problems as well. I was very much surprised at the kind of argument that was used on the second reading of this bill. It was claimed that the prairie provinces had paid $47,000,000 through the tariff over a period of years, and now three or four million dollars a year are to be set aside to assist the prairies because of that new argument. That seems to be the principle on which the minister is going in this bill. I never knew any other minister to accept or adopt such a principle. It is based on a fallacy and unfounded. I never heard such an argument used before in all the parliaments I have sat in until this one.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, this bill is sectional, for the benefit of one part of Canada only at the expense of another. As I said in parliament last year in connection with similar legislation, I cannot understand the policy of this government as it appears in this bill. The policy is all wrong. There was a return brought down to this house for the late Mr. McCrea which showed that so far as agriculture was concerned the jurisdiction under the British North America Act was concurrent between the dominion and the provinces. It never was the intention of the fathers of confederation by the widest stretch of imagination that the principle of federal assistance to the prairies should be carried out along the lines of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, and this amendment by Bill No. 36. This is class legislation; it is not in the public interest, and somebody must pay for it. The return to which I referred showed that these millions of dollars of assistance for the prairies came from the industrial provinces of Ontario and Quebec to the extent of eighty per cent. These two provinces pay eighty per cent of all the cash taxes of Canada. Since the present minister has been in charge of this department, he seems to have turned this high court of parliament into a parliament only for the benefit of Saskatchewan at the expense of the rest of Canada.

The argument that the east is getting a subsidy through the tariff is very far-fetched indeed. Hon. gentlemen from the west say that the three prairie provinces have contributed $47,000,000 through the tariff to the east. Where is it? What did that $47,000,000 consist of? It is simply an academic argument, and I never heard it used until the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) came into the house in 1935. It is not an economic or a business argument or even a fact. It sets one section of this country against another. It sets the west against the industrial provinces of the east, against Ontario and against your province, Mr. Speaker, from which sixty-five members come to this parliament looking for similar treatment.

I will give the reasons for the principles of this bill. I stated in the house last year the reasons for the failure of agriculture on the prairies, and I quoted at that time from an article in the National Review entitled "Waste Not Want Not," which describes conditions on the prairies and in the waste agriculture places of the United States. It says:

> There is no country in the world where machinery is utilized more in everyday life than in the United States of America, and there is no country in the world where human and material waste is becoming more evident. The American used the machine to extinguish the amenities of his soil, and he reaps the whirlwind, or the dirt storm. He turned his machines on the timber, and he finds himself confronted with rising waters in the shape of floods, and falling waters in the form of droughts. If he continues on the same lines, employing his ruthless mechanisms on industrial projects without due consideration of wastage of raw materials and wastage in human power, he may conceivably awake like Rip Van Winkle in another generation and discover that all the empty gunny sacks in the countryside will not clothe and feed the miserable population.
> In the Dominion of Canada the fisheries are a declining factor, consequent on the application of a maximum of mechanical age and a minimum of human power. The prairies in the central regions are losing their fertility in an endeavour to supply wheat for exportation with a maximum of machine power and a minimum of man power; and the same sequence applies to timber or mineral productions. Over eighty per cent of Canada's exportations are basic raw materials, or primary products, and the whole population of this vast extent of the earth's surface is only in the neighbourhood of 11,000,000.
> The point which I wish to make clear is that during the last decade since machinery in the dominion has been employed in geometrical progression towards the destruction of primary natural resources for export, the country has failed to increase in man power. Not only is this the case, but the problem of unemployment is probably as acute in Canada as elsewhere. The same reasoning holds to a more or less degree when applied to other parts of the British empire from which countries, dominated by industrialism or unrelentless machine economy, derive their supplies of raw material.
> It is no solution of this question of raw materials which contends that if the imperial markets from whence Great Britain obtains her present supplies were thrown open to the world at large under a league of nations or other committee a situation would be created whereby peace would become the stabilized condition of human existence, machine economy and trade the governing factors, and war an outrage.

I contend that if the government of Canada, which has concurrent jurisdiction with the provinces in agriculture, is going to give by this bill federal assistance running into tens of millions of dollars a year to the prairie provinces, then under the British North America Act the farmers of the other provinces are entitled to the very same treatment. Agriculture, as a matter of fact, should have been at confederation a provincial responsibility, with each province looking after its own agriculture; but under sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act the dominion and the provinces have concurrent jurisdiction in agriculture. Is it to be concurrent only for Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, or is the concurrency to apply to the other provinces where they have similar problems of drought and poor crops? I say that the other provinces are not going to stand for contributing out of current revenue and out of capital all this federal assistance to one section only of Canada.

Hon. gentlemen argue that the west has contributed $47,000,000 through the tariff, and they contend that the east is subsidized through the tariff. I believe in the only principle of confederation, each for all and all for each, for each of the provinces. If you carry that argument to a legitimate conclusion—although I have never used it before, I have heard it used in a great protectionist paper, the Evening Telegram of Toronto, by a gentleman who was editor for nearly forty years and probably knew more about protection and the tariff in relation to the prairies than some members of the cabinet; I am not using it; I am giving it in answer to the argument proposed—it is not open to hon. gentlemen on my left to say that the industrial provinces have a subsidy of $47,000,000 from the west, because I can tell them this, that the greatest enemy the western farmer has is not east of the great lakes, his greatest enemy as a grain grower is the free trader on the prairies. The free traders are very largely to blame for this trouble on the prairies. They, the elevator combines, the grain exchange and others in the west are responsible largely for the farmers' difficulties because they have tried to make western agriculture a north and south industry instead of an east and west industry. Some of the worst enemies the west had were free traders in Regina and other prairie capitals and cabinet ministers who shared their opinions when they proposed free trade in grain along those lines and when they opposed inquiries into the grain industry, as, for instance, when they secured an injunction in the Maharg case, so preventing a proper inquiry into the evils suffered by the farmers on the prairies from combines and middlemen who handle grain.

[Mr. Church.]

I believe in the principle of confederation, each for all and all for each; but I believe the day is not far distant when parliament can no longer make these hand-outs under the British North America Act to the west unless they give the same treatment under the very same act under concurrent jurisdiction to the maritimes, to British Columbia, and to the industrial provinces where, in Ontario and Quebec, are hundreds of farmers in destitute circumstances.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to say just a few words, occupying probably two or three minutes, on this bill. I had not the good fortune to be in the house to hear it thoroughly discussed, because I was "knocked out" a little bit and did not have an opportunity of being here. Merely to read the bill makes anyone come to the conclusion that its powers are too wide, and it is for the purpose of protesting against such powers being given to anybody that I rise in my place. Although one or two or perhaps all of the clauses have been slightly modified, numbers 10, 11 and 12 give the minister power to enter into agreements with the provinces and perform many duties. Section 10 states:

> The minister may . . . enter into agreements with any of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta or with any city, town or other municipality within any of the said provinces, or with any person, firm or corporation.

By section 11:

> The minister may, for the purposes of the act, and with the approval of the governor in council, purchase, lease or otherwise acquire, or sell, lease or otherwise dispose of, any lands or premises which may be required . . . upon such terms or conditions as he may deem desirable.

Section 12 states:

> The minister may . . . purchase or rent whatever machinery or equipment may be required in connection with the development, construction or operation of any project, or scheme, and may sell or otherwise dispose of such equipment upon such terms as he may deem desirable.

To my mind that gives the minister power to do anything on earth, within the limitations of the money which he has at his disposal.

Mr. GARDINER: With the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. MANION: Well, only one of the sections, No. 10, states that.

Mr. GARDINER: And No. 11.

Mr. MANION: "The minister may . . . with the approval of the governor in council, enter into agreements." The others do not say so.

Mr. GARDINER: And No. 11.

Mr. MANION: Yes, that is right. I had not noticed it in section 11. But it is not in section 12.

Mr. GARDINER: It is now, with the amendments.

Mr. MANION: Even thus, to give power of that sort to any minister, to any man, is, to my mind, to give him excessive power in these days. We know what power does to some people. I am not suggesting that it might make the minister lose his head, because he is a pretty level-headed politician. At the same time, Hitler got too much power, and we know what is happening to him and what might happen to us. Lucifer was in the same class, although he got thrown out of his job. I am afraid that the minister—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Do not compare the minister with Lucifer.

Mr. MANION: I know the minister is one of those high-minded gentlemen who would not think of doing anything for political purposes or reasons of that sort. At the same time—to be serious—I believe that this bill gives him far too much power. Nobody knows better than the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) himself that this is far too much power to give to anybody. I have not any doubt, despite the cry we hear about wasting the time of parliament and idling away our time here when we should be occupied with other matters, that if we were in power and attempted to put through a bill of this sort, it would be held up, not for days, but for weeks, by our friends on the other side. I do not suppose the minister would refuse the power offered to him, but I suggest sincerely to the government that to give him the power which this bill enacts is far too much. It would be too much to give to any individual, be he ever so high-minded, sincere and desirous of dealing justly and fairly with the people of the three prairie provinces. I merely rise to put in my protest against the passing of a bill of that kind.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I am not going to hold up the passing of this bill to any extent; I desire to make just one or two further observations. On previous occasions I have said practically all that I intended to say. But, more particularly with the amendments which were put into the bill last evening, having looked them over as I read them in Hansard to-day, I cannot see that the bill is improved very much. It is no more of a safeguard upon the expenditures of public money than it was in the form in which it was originally presented to the house. As the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) has stated to-night, under this bill the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act is made permanent. What I should like to draw to the attention of the minister, and what I should like to have him undertake, is, if possible, some system of checking up on expenditures with respect to the staff, not only their salaries but their expenses as well. I refer to the men who are now employed in the city of Regina and the province of Saskatchewan. Return No. 59 which was tabled yesterday by the minister shows that at the present time there are 261 persons employed, seventy-one in Regina and 190 outside the city. The return gives the names and the salaries.

Mr. GARDINER: In the three provinces.

Mr. PERLEY: The expenses of some of them are given. I notice in the auditor general's report for the year ended March 31, 1938, that salaries paid under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act in Saskatchewan were in the neighbourhood of half a million dollars, and the expenditures of these employees ran to over $200,000. I think the minister would be well advised to have a very careful check-up in this matter, particularly of the expenses. I notice in the auditor general's report that one man had an expense account of $7,000. It will be found on page 57 of the report; the name of the man is J. I. Mutchler; he was employed as one of the field men. I think any man operating a car and running up an expense account of $7,000 should have his expenses carefully checked. I notice also that there are 123 men operating cars, and that the expenses of some of them run around $2,000 each.

I have here a letter which I received this morning. It is a report from the proprietor of a rooming house in Regina stating that one or two of the employees under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, who had been taken into the organization in December last at salaries of $125 and $150, are now on three weeks holiday with full pay. I do not think the minister should allow that sort of thing. It is evidence that there may be a little slackness in the way in which matters are controlled in the province. The bill, however, will go through, anyway, and I will not hold it up.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): One or two remarks have been made to which I should like to reply. In the first place it has been suggested by one or two of the speakers that this is a rather remarkable piece of legislation. In particular, I believe the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth), in the few observations he made, referred to it as a set-up just prior to a coming election for the purpose of giving patronage. If one looks at the legislation on which these amendments are based, one finds that the legislation was passed by the House of Commons on April 11, 1935, which was just prior to the last federal election, and passed by the government which was then in office; and in spite of the remarks of the hon. member for Waterloo South, who has very lately come into the house, I am not inclined to think the bill was passed by the government of the day for the purpose of giving out patronage in connection with the election which was then in the offing. I am quite sure that members of the house to-day are not at all in agreement with the hon. member for Waterloo South that the present intentions with respect to any legislation that may be brought into the house are for the purpose he indicated.

Bill No. 55, introduced in 1935, is in principle identical with the act which is still on the statute books. This bill deals in very much the same terms as the act which is now on the statute books. In the first place, the first section declares:

> In this act and in any regulations made thereunder, unless the context otherwise requires, "minister" means the Minister of Agriculture.

In other words, it was not the present government but the government of our predecessors that placed this particular work under the control of the Department of Agriculture, and it has remained under the control of the Minister of Agriculture from that day to the present time.

Section 3 provides that the governor in council may establish a committee. The only change in that section was made during the session of 1937 when the word "committees" was substituted for the word "committee." On that occasion the then leader of the opposition suggested that the word "advisory" should be added to the word "committees," and when the bill finally went through the house the words "advisory committees" were embodied in it. So that instead of one committee advising the minister, as we had under the legislation set up by the other government, we now have three committees advising. Well, if there is any change in policy in that respect, it is a change that gives the minister more advice than he had under the legislation of 1935.

Section 3, it is true, goes on to state how the committees shall be constituted, and as I pointed out last evening, the only difference between the committees as constituted now and the committee as constituted then, is that the farming population of the area concerned is represented by members appointed by the municipal bodies instead of by members appointed by the grain growers or other organizations of that type in that section of Canada.

Section 4 provides that the committee shall consider and advise the minister, and the section now reads:

> The advisory committees shall consider and advise the minister as to the best methods to be adopted to secure the rehabilitation of the drought and soil drifting areas in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and to develop and promote within these areas systems of farm practice, tree culture, water supply—

In the legislation of 1937, in that section, just a few words were added:

> . . . land utilization and land settlement. . . .

These activities were added to the others enumerated in the section; otherwise the legislation is exactly the same. The provision was broadened to the extent of adding the words "land utilization" in connection with the activities previously carried on, and the words "land settlement," which probably involve an enlargement of the activities under the bill.

Section 5 provided that no member of the committee should receive any pay, and that is still the condition. Section 6 provided:

> The minister may appoint such temporary technical, professional and other officers and employees as he may deem necessary and expedient for carrying out the provisions of this act. . . .

That is exactly as it was. The minister does what he did in the legislation laid down by the previous government. Section 7 is identical with section 7 of the previous legislation:

> The governor in council may make such regulations as may be necessary or expedient for the effectual execution and working of this act and the attainment of the intention and objects thereof.

The only change in the next section is that instead of fixing a definite sum to be spent each year in connection with this legislation, the present legislation provides that we spend the sums given us through the estimates that pass this house from time to time.

I do not see any particular change in the policy of this government in relation to this matter, or in the principle of this legislation, from the principle which had been adopted in the previous legislation; and in so far as these sections which are added now are concerned, all the powers that are to be exercised under these three sections were previously exercised under section 7 of the original bill. These powers were all exercised by officials of the Department of Agriculture under the previous government. Their activities were continued by the present government, and, as I said the other day, many of the officials carrying on those activities in the department are the same officials that carried them on under the former government.

The statement with regard to these sections suggesting that the minister is given exceptional powers are hardly borne out by a careful reading of the legislation. Section 7 of the old bill provided that the governor in council might make regulations, and those regulations were the only provisions that really governed the activities of the minister. Under this particular legislation it is provided that the minister may, subject to section 4 of the act, that is subject to getting advice from the advisory committees, and with the approval of the governor in council, enter into agreements. We were entering into agreements before. We were doing all the things enumerated in this particular piece of legislation under the powers contained in section 7, and it is only because it is considered wise to ask this house to have those powers conferred directly by the house rather than have to depend upon order in council legislation in order to give the powers to the minister, that this particular bill has been brought in at this time.

There was one other remark made in regard to which I might say a word, that is the statement by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) as to several thousands of undertakings; he went on to indicate that there are some 11,000 applications for undertakings in connection with which the sale of equipment would be involved. There is no government equipment used in the digging of dug-outs. These dug-outs are dug on the farms of farmers, usually with equipment provided by the farmer himself. When not constructed by farmers with their own equipment they are constructed with equipment that the farmers borrow from the municipality or some other body in the neighbourhood. Most of the other undertakings are not carried out with government equipment at all; they are carried out under contracts let by tender to contractors who use their own equipment. All the large dams are constructed in that way; all the large irrigation works are constructed in that way; all the ditch digging is done with equipment of that kind owned or controlled by contractors, and therefore not at the disposal of the government to sell.

Mr. PERLEY: Does the minister mean to say that all the dug-outs were dug with farmers' own equipment, that there was not government machinery going round, and after the farmers had taken off the surface did not government machinery come and finish the job?

Mr. GARDINER: No, the government has no machinery going round doing that work. As regards work that is completed with what are known as drag-lines, these drag-lines belong either to municipalities or to contractors who have taken a contract from the farmers or through the municipality to clean out the bottom of the dug-out. In other words, what actually happened in Manitoba in connection with many of these undertakings is that the municipalities have made arrangements for drag-lines to be brought in to take out the bottom six feet of the dug-outs. So far as Saskatchewan is concerned in some instances groups of farmers formed into agricultural associations have secured drag-lines through contractors to come and do the same thing. This equipment does not belong to the government at all, and is not equipment over which the government would have any control either to sell or do anything else with. There are very few of the undertakings in any of the provinces in connection with which the government has control over any of the equipment. And much of that is carried on not under the set-up that is generally known as the P.F.R.A. set-up; it is carried on under the regular experimental farm set-up in those provinces. Take, for example, the leveling of lands in connection with irrigation undertakings; that is carried out under the direction of the superintendent of the experimental farm at Swift Current, and the equipment purchased for the carrying out of the work is largely purchased under recommendation from those officials of the department, who are chosen not by the minister but by the civil service commission, regular officials of the Department of Agriculture carrying on the activities of the experimental farms branch.

I make those statements in order to clear up any suggestion that these thousands of undertakings are being carried on with government equipment and that this equipment is at the disposal of the minister to sell or do what he likes with. I suppose there would not be more than a dozen undertakings in Saskatchewan last year, probably not more than three or four in Alberta, and very few in Manitoba, on which equipment would be used with which the minister had anything whatever to do as to either purchase or sale.

In relation to the suggestion that under the previous government, a very careful check was kept of all the activities in connection with the department, exactly the same kind of check is being kept by the present government; more of it, because we are spending more money. And many of the same individuals, who were checking the accounts then are checking them now.

I say this in order to indicate that considerable care is being taken in connection with activities involving the expenditure of money in the department. It is only proper that these checks should be made of all expenditures of government money, whether in this department or in any other.

AGRICULTURAL PESTS

AMENDMENT OF ACT TO CHANGE TITLE AND REVISE CERTAIN OF ITS PROVISIONS

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 40, to amend the Agricultural Pests Control Act, and change the title thereof.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Definitions.

Mr. SENN: Why are these changes being made, who is asking for them, and what is the significance of the changes?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: A general suggestion that the changes be made has come from the fruit growers and others interested in this matter. For example, the change suggested in section 3 largely has to do with the use of the word "guarantee" instead of "guaranteed analysis." Owing to the wide range of products coming under this act, the different uses of those products, and the fact that many of them do not lend themselves to chemical or other analysis, different kinds of guarantee are required. Most of the products require a chemical guarantee; others require specific gravity and viscosity guarantee. A large number, and particularly those in which the active substances are unstable or for which there are no methods of chemical analysis, require a guarantee of biological effectiveness. Examples are the rotenones, pyrethrums, squills and some of the mercuric organics. It is therefore important that the interpretation of "guarantee" be left as broad as possible. The intention is to broaden it so that it can be applied properly.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has any objection been raised to the changes which are now contemplated?

Mr. GARDINER: There has been no objection raised, but there has been some discussion with the pharmaceutical associations, and there has been general agreement. One amendment was suggested, which will be brought in later.

Mr. STIRLING: Was a copy of the draft bill submitted to the various organizations, farmers' institutes and so on, across Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I understand that hundreds of copies went out to fruit growers, pharmaceutical associations and manufacturers.

Mr. GRAYDON: With the exception of the one amendment, there was general agreement with the contemplated changes?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I understand that is correct.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Application for registration of a pest control product.

Mr. GRAYDON: To revert, if I may, to section 5; what is the practical change with regard to it?

Mr. GARDINER: I would point out that subsection 1 of section 4 of the act has been rewritten to clarify and extend its application. The intention is to obtain all essential facts regarding the composition, purpose and utility of the product before registering and thereby permitting its sale. That is the intention, generally, although odd words, here and there, are changed. I do not know whether the hon. member wants a detailed answer.

Mr. SENN: To follow up the question asked by the hon. member for Peel, does this mean that there will be greater restrictions upon manufacturers than there were under the old act?

Mr. GARDINER: No, it does not; there are no greater restrictions.

Mr. SENN: What is the object, then?

Mr. GARDINER: It covers new products, and gives further information with regard to new products, rather than further restrictions. New products have been developed since the act was first passed.

Mr. RICKARD: This is in regard to poison to be used in connection with spraying materials?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Registration fees.

Mr. STIRLING: Is it only the manufacturer who pays this annual fee of $5?

Mr. GARDINER: It is only the man who registers the product who pays the fee. I understand that while previously the fee was $20, there were many who brought in some poison or some product to be used for this purpose who would not really sell $20 worth in the period of time over which the permit extended. The idea was to reduce the fee to reasonable proportions.

Mr. STIRLING: If I may judge by the explanation on the opposite page, it would seem to me that it is the manufacturer—probably in every case the manufacturer—who pays the fee.

Mr. GARDINER: It is the man who applies. He may be a manufacturer, but in other instances he may be a man who has no manufacturing plant. Probably he is an individual who has devised some mixture which serves a purpose, and he simply puts it on the market. He may be an individual who would not have a manufacturing plant.

Mr. GRAYDON: That feature does not apply to the retailer, then?

Mr. GARDINER: No, not to the retailer. There are 504 registrations under the act.

Section agreed to.

Section 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Exceptions.

Mr. GARDINER: We want to amend this section.

Mr. SENN: May we have the amendment first, because there are one or two questions I should like to ask regarding this section?

Mr. RINFRET: I move in amendment:

That section 8 of Bill 40 be amended to include a new subsection (c) to read as follows:

"(c) Any pest control product which has been prepared by a retail druggist registered under a provincial pharmacy act in Canada from an unsolicited prescription submitted by the purchaser thereof, and provided that such pest control is not purchased for resale in Canada."

Mr. GARDINER: Since the drafting of Bill No. 40, information was secured indicating that a large number of unsolicited prescriptions were filled by druggists for purchasers, and therefore the purpose of the change in section 8 is to avoid having to send such a large number of these prescriptions for countersigning by an inspector.

Further, it is believed that, since the purchaser when submitting a prescription to be filled by a druggist evidently knows what he wants, the act should not prevent him from getting it. It should be noted that the materials used by druggists in the preparation of these unsolicited prescriptions must come up to the standard established under a provincial pharmacy act.

Mr. STEVENS: Then, we are to understand that paragraph (b) as it now appears in the bill remains, in addition to the paragraph (c) now suggested?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: It seems to me, as the hon. member for Haldimand points out to me, that one contradicts the other. In paragraph (b) there is reference to any pest control product which has been manufactured from an unsolicited prescription submitted by the purchaser thereof, provided that the prescription is countersigned by an inspector and that such pest control product is not purchased for resale in Canada.

In the first place it strikes me that paragraph (b), which is substituted for paragraphs (b) (c) and (d) in the act as it now stands, is not as good as the old act, because it subjects the purchaser, who knows what he wants and submits a prescription for his own use, to the authority of an inspector. Surely we are narrowing down government control to a very, very narrow compass, when we make it obligatory upon a purchaser acting with his own intelligence on his own behalf—not for trading or sale, but for his own use—to have the prescription countersigned by an inspector. Pretty soon we shall have to have inspectors giving us authorization before we can buy breakfast foods. It strikes me the draftsman of the bill is going a long way in this matter.

Mr. GARDINER: Paragraph (b) of the bill is in these words:

(b) Any pest control product which has been manufactured from an unsolicited prescription submitted by the purchaser thereof, provided that the prescription is countersigned by an inspector and that such pest control product is not purchased for resale in Canada.

That applies largely where some particular pest infests a certain community, and it may be that a farmers' organization, an individual or a group of individuals may have some means of meeting the condition which exists in that community. The prescription is submitted, to be filled for their use in the community. It is countersigned by the inspector, and the mixture may be made available for the purpose intended. It is not for resale.

The amendment refers to:

(c) any pest control product which has been prepared by a retail druggist registered under a provincial pharmacy act in Canada from an unsolicited prescription submitted by the purchaser thereof, and provided that such pest control product is not purchased for resale in Canada.

The amendment deals rather with preparations being put up by druggists as against preparations being prepared by others.

Mr. STEVENS: How many inspectors are there now operating under the act?

Mr. GARDINER: There are forty-eight or fifty; I am not certain as to the exact number.

Mr. STEVENS: Under this act alone?

Mr. GARDINER: Under this division of the department.

Mr. STEVENS: A nice little army.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 8 as amended agreed to.

On section 9—Offences and penalties.

Mr. MASSEY: It seems to me that this section cannot mean what it says. If I am a retailer and receive some poison which is described on the package to be such and such, and if I advertise that poison in accordance with the marking on the package and the contents are found to be not in accordance with marking, then I am subject to a fine of $100, when I have advertised the product in absolutely good faith. In other words, you are penalizing the retailer.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that in most instances the product is registered by the manufacturer, and the offender is the person who registers.

Mr. MASSEY: But it does not say that here, and that is why I say the section cannot mean what it says. I think I know what is in the minister's mind, but the bill does not say that. This new section 17 is to read:

Subject to the provisions of section eighteen hereof, any person,

(a) who advertises, exposes, offers, or holds in possession for sale, or sells, in Canada—

In other words, a retailer.

—a pest control product registered under this act which does not meet the guarantee.

In other words, the retailer who advertises a product in accordance with the marking will be subject to a fine of $100, and the same applies to a retailer who holds a product for sale.

Mr. GARDINER: It says, "subject to the provisions of section 18 hereof." You would have to have section 18 in order to get at the meaning.

Mr. MASSEY: I have not that section before me.

Mr. GARDINER: It reads:

Any person accused of selling, offering, advertising, exposing or holding in his possession for sale any poison which does not comply with the requirements of this act or of any regulations hereunder, who proves that the poison respecting which action is taken was bought by him directly within one year from a manufacturer or merchant domiciled in Canada, that if contained in a package said package was not opened, and whether contained in a package or not that the state of the poison was not altered while it was in his possession, and that he had no reason to believe that the said poison did not comply with the provisions of this act, shall, upon disclosing the name and address of the person from whom the poison was purchased, the place where it was purchased and the date of the sale, be liable upon conviction for the costs of the prosecution only, and a prosecution may be brought against such last named person for violating the provisions of this act or any regulation within six months from the date of such disclosure and not later.

Mr. SENN: What recourse would a retailer have where the poison had been imported?

Mr. GARDINER: If it were purchased from outside Canada, the agent domiciled in Canada would have to take the responsibility. I do not think there is any other practical way of handling the matter.

Mr. COLDWELL: It does not seem to me to be just that the retailer should have to pay the costs when he offers the article in good faith.

Mr. GARDINER: The section I have just read has been in the act from the beginning. I think the reason for its being there is to place some responsibility upon the individual who is selling the product to make sure that he is buying it from a reputable firm.

Mr. STIRLING: Supposing a cooperative concern imports a quantity of poison; what would be its position if the poison were found to be contrary to the description?

Mr. GARDINER: If they are importing to distribute to others at a price, then they would be in the position of agents or anyone else who sells it.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Experimental farms—

13. Central experimental farm, $626,950.

Mr. MacNICOL: What revenue is received from the experimental farms?

Mr. GARDINER: The total revenue was $229,367.96.

Mr. SENN: I was not in the house the other evening when this particular item was under discussion. I notice there is an increase from eighty to ninety-one in the number of permanent employees at the central experimental farm, and I should like to know who these people are and what are their duties.

Mr. GARDINER: There was reclassification which made permanent a number of temporary employees. I understand there is actually no increase.

Item agreed to.

14. Branch farms, stations and illustration stations, $1,406,427.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister make a statement as to the work carried on at Indian Head experimental farm, with respect to rust resistant wheat?

Mr. GARDINER: There have been certain experiments carried on at the Indian Head farm for some time in connection with the growth of rust resistant wheats. The one which seems to have given the greatest satisfaction from the point of view of appearance, yield and in every other way, was grown in considerable acreage on the farm this year. I visited the farm myself during the period when the rust was most prevalent in that section of the province, and that particular wheat had no traces of rust upon it whatsoever. Even Thatcher wheat growing in that community at that time did have rust on the leaves and on the stem below, what is known as black rust, which eats into the stem. But the particular wheat I speak of was entirely clear of rust, and it showed a very heavy yield when grown on land of the farm, running to forty and forty-one bushels to the acre. It is a very fine wheat, and an attempt is being made at the present time to put it out for multiplication so that it can be distributed throughout western Canada.

Mr. PERLEY: Is that designated as 975?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, 975. It has recently been called Regent.

Mr. PERLEY: Is there going to be a general distribution of small quantities of it to farmers?

Mr. GARDINER: There is a general distribution being made now of about four bushels to different individuals who will grow it this year, and that will multiply so that it can be distributed.

Mr. PERLEY: What steps does the farmer have to take to get the four bushels?

Mr. GARDINER: They make application to the Indian Head farm or the central experimental farm for it, and it is distributed as far as it will go to the individuals who apply.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I be permitted under this item to ask the minister what progress is being made with experiments in regard to oats? I understand that some progress has been made in regard to Victory oats. It is of great interest to our eastern farmers.

Mr. GARDINER: There are two rust resistant varieties of oats, the Erbin, which is used in Ontario, and is being propagated I believe at Guelph, and the Vanguard oat, which is distributed in the western part of Canada, and in some parts of the east as well.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the minister indicate whether or not there is any distribution of these new oats among the farmers?

Mr. GARDINER: They are being propagated among the farmers. I purchased one hundred bushels of Vanguard myself this year from somewhere in Manitoba; I have forgotten the individual from whom I purchased it during the winter months. I think it can be obtained quite widely, and the Erbin oat can be obtained in the east.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is the present rate of wages paid to seasonal help on the Indian Head experimental farm?

Mr. GARDINER: The rate is twenty-seven cents an hour for seasonal labour, and from twenty-seven to thirty-three for year round labour.

Mr. COLDWELL: There has been an increase?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, very materially.

Mr. MARSHALL: Would the minister give details of the item, "Appropriation not required for 1939-40"? In answer to a question which I asked of the minister on February 16, as reported at page 1044 of Hansard, concerning the "appropriation not required for 1939-40, $76,700," in connection with a previous vote, the minister replied:

> The $76,700 is not taken out of this service. It was voted last year for buildings, and is not required this year because the buildings have been erected.

Upon investigation I find that buildings have nothing whatever to do with these particular votes, and I should like to have the break-down of this amount of $54,515, which is the appropriation not required for 1939-40, and is a credit.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know where the hon. member made his inquiries, but I am informed by the officials who handle these matters that the $76,700 was the amount voted in our supplementary estimates last year for buildings, which have been constructed. This other item of $54,515 was also voted in the supplementaries last year for buildings, but the buildings are now built and we shall not require the money this year for that purpose.

Mr. QUELCH: Can the minister state to what extent Canus wheat has proved itself drought resistant?

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that nothing substantial has been done in that direction. Some attempts have been made to get a wheat that would stand drought better than other varieties, but I am quite sure that the hon. member for Acadia will understand that it is difficult to get anything to grow under drought conditions.

Mr. HANSON: What progress has been made with respect to the experimental farm at Smithers, British Columbia?

Mr. GARDINER: The land was secured, and I understand that a considerable part of it is cleared and that the house and barns are under construction. Some experimental work was carried on last year, but the farm is not yet in full operation.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. HAYHURST: I notice from the details given on page 57 of the estimates that a number of forestry engineers and forestry assistants are employed in connection with the branch farms and stations. What is the nature of the forestry work they carry on?

Mr. GARDINER: There are forestry farms at Indian Head and at Sutherland, which is just outside the city of Saskatoon. These forestry farms are conducted for the purpose of producing nursery stock, which is distributed to farmers throughout the prairie sections of western Canada.

Mr. HAYHURST: Not any attempt at reforestation, but rather an attempt at beautification?

Mr. GARDINER: They are engaged in connection with that part of the prairie farm rehabilitation work which has to do with the planting of shelter belts and that kind of work.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the minister give us some idea of what use is being made of this particular service at the present time? Is a greater use being made of it by the individual farmer? I know, of course, that a great deal of work has been done under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and many trees planted in certain districts. In my own constituency, around Conquest, valuable work has been done which has been greatly appreciated. I am wondering just what effect the planting of shelter belts has had on the drought, and if any difference has been noticed.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, there is an open question, of course, as to the extent to which it assists in the matter of drought. I think there is grave doubt whether it has anything to do with producing more rainfall. Rainfall rather produces trees than the reverse. Valuable work is being done at Conquest under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act activities, also in the vicinity of Kindersley, which is west of Conquest, and at other points. There has been a marked increase of recent years in the planting of trees, that is trees secured from these particular places. I am not in a position to state the extent to which that is on account of the fact that people are not so well off as they were a few years ago, and they may not be using more trees but they are getting more trees at the places they can get them at least cost, that is the farms operated by the department. I understand that nurseries in these sections have encouraged the giving out of trees from the forestry farm, because they think it induces the planting of more and more trees in those vicinities, and so they do more business at times when people can afford to purchase. But the trees that go out run into the millions. I am not in a position to give the number.

Mr. MARSH: Would the minister comment on the possibility of overlapping between the federal farms and the provincial farms? I note that this is a vote for $626,000, and that it is $10,000 less than last year. Governments of all kinds are coming in for a great deal of criticism for over-taxation because of over-government.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would point out to the hon. member that we are on item 14, not item 13.

Mr. MARSH: I will ask my question on another item.

Mr. GARDINER: The answer to the first part of the question, which does refer to item 14, is that there are no farms conducted by the provinces, excepting one in Ontario at Vineland, other than those which are associated with institutions, that is schools like the Guelph agricultural college and the farm which surrounds the Kentville school, which are operated in connection with the educational activities of the provinces. Only the provinces conduct activities having to do with education, and they have farms associated with those educational institutions.

Mr. THOMPSON: How many of these stations are there in Canada; how are they divided by provinces, and how many are there in each province?

Mr. GARDINER: There is one in Prince Edward Island at Charlottetown; two in Nova Scotia, one at Kentville and one at Nappan; one in New Brunswick, at Fredericton; six in Quebec. Does the hon. member require the names?

Mr. WEIR: What are those stations for?

Mr. GARDINER: They are experimental farms and illustration stations. Referring to the fourteen branch farm stations and illustration stations, I may say there are three in Ontario; one at Ottawa, one at Harrow, and one at Kapuskasing; two in Manitoba; five in Saskatchewan—all put there, by the way, before I was minister—two in Alberta; four in British Columbia.

Mr. SENN: I notice that this is one of the largest votes in the agricultural estimates. It mentions branch farms, stations, and illustration stations, and I believe that also there are some substations which have been set up under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. What is the difference between the operations in, say a branch farm, a station, an illustration station, and a substation? There must be some system under which the operations of these different farms are carried out, indicating what their objective is.

Mr. GARDINER: The branch farms are known as experimental farms. We have one central farm at Ottawa, and the others are known as branch farms. There are twenty-five of them. They are units which are doing some work that is supposed to be suited to the particular area in which they are located. Then there are what are known as stations, and they are rented sections of a man's farm. He is paid a certain rental for the land; he is allowed to grow certain crops, and he is allowed the proceeds of the crops. He carries on demonstration work under the direction of departmental officials for the benefit of those living in that community. They are illustration stations illustrating what has been learned on experimental farms elsewhere. The substations are of a little different type, usually rented as well. Some of them are owned by the government; but as a rule they are rented, the whole farm rather than just a part being rented, and operated for the carrying on of tests in connection with controlling soil drifting and work of that kind.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): How many are there per province?

Mr. SENN: Stations and illustration stations are mentioned. Is there any difference between the two? I understood from the minister that one is rented and one is not. There are a great number of illustration stations scattered throughout Canada, and some provinces seem to be especially favoured in regard to the number of illustration stations which they have. Could the minister tell us, while he is answering, what is necessary or in what way the illustration station is established? Does some particular community ask to have such a station in its particular vicinity, or how is the location of these stations determined, and when and where are they set up?

Mr. GARDINER: They may be asked for by people in the community or the department may select areas in which they think they should be. The branch farm is usually the parent farm in any particular province or area, and these stations are all included in the list which I read. Some of the farms in that list are what are known as experimental farms and the others are stations. The experimental farms are all owned and operated by the government. The illustration stations are farms which are rented from farmers and operated with the farmer himself having charge.

Mr. SENN: Just one more question. I notice that, for instance, a year ago there were in Saskatchewan fifty-one illustration stations; in Quebec there were also fifty-one; but in Ontario there were only seventeen. There might be one or two reasons for that. One, perhaps, is that the farmers of Ontario are a little better qualified to farm than are farmers in those other places; or it may be that they are not willing to ask for assistance or for these stations.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Maybe they would not be granted.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They are so shy.

Mr. SENN: Maybe they should ask for them. But I should like to know why it is that so many more stations have been set up in some provinces than in others. It seems to me that we all need education along those lines.

Mr. GARDINER: These are the illustration stations:

British Columbia	18
Alberta	11
Saskatchewan	20
Manitoba	12
Ontario	17
Quebec	52
New Brunswick	18
Nova Scotia	15
Prince Edward Island	13

One of the chief reasons for the differences as between Ontario and some of the other provinces is that there has not been the same demand for them in Ontario. Why that is I cannot say. I suppose some members may think Ontario farmers do not require the same amount of instruction. Whatever the reason is, there is not the same demand.

Mr. SENN: Are those the figures for 1937 or 1938?

Mr. GARDINER: Those are the latest figures.

Mr. SENN: The figures in the minister's report for the year ended March 31, 1938, are much different from those he has read. There was a difference of five or six in British Columbia, and there were differences all down the line. Are these illustration stations closed from time to time and new ones opened up?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. SENN: What is the reason for closing them?

Mr. GARDINER: After an illustration station has completed its work, it is closed. For example, a station is set up in some area to demonstrate how a certain kind of land can be used. In a new section of Saskatchewan with which I am familiar, the growing of alfalfa seed has recently been developed. A few years ago there was no alfalfa seed growing there; the farmers did not think they could grow it. The natural thing is to establish an illustration station where it is found that the land is suitable for the purpose, and to indicate to the people what can be grown and in what manner. When that demonstration is completed and the people are conducting themselves as the department think they should, there is no further necessity and the expenditure is made somewhere else.

Mr. SENN: May I offer one suggestion? I do not find fault with these illustration stations; they do a great deal of good. The minister, however, might attempt one other thing by way of illustration. I suggest that somewhere in Ontario he set up an illustration station to demonstrate to the farmers how they can conduct their farms on a paying basis. If that were done, more good would be accomplished than by all the other illustrations that can be given the farmers. It is worth trying, because if we are to be taught this and that at stations, and by officials who are experts in their own line, they might be able to demonstrate to the farmers of Ontario and in different parts of the country how to conduct their farms so as to make them pay. It is a burning question in Canada to-day.

Mr. HARRIS: I believe the minister said there were eighteen stations in New Brunswick, fifteen in Nova Scotia and thirteen in Prince Edward Island. How many of these are devoting their energies along the line of fox farming?

Mr. GARDINER: Eight of them are fox farms.

Mr. HARRIS: In New Brunswick?

Mr. GARDINER: There are three in New Brunswick, three in Nova Scotia and two in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. HARRIS: The work that is being carried on in these particular stations is of a very high class and is having a beneficial effect on that particular industry. The man in charge of the experimental station just outside Summerside as well as the man in charge of the illustration station, I have reason to know, are doing wonderfully good work, and I should like on behalf of the industry to compliment the department upon having such splendid men as these in charge of that particular work. They have taken a real interest in it.

Mr. PERLEY: How many illustration farms are operated with the farmer in charge?

Mr. GARDINER: All the illustration stations.

Mr. PERLEY: In Saskatchewan?

Mr. GARDINER: Everywhere.

Mr. PERLEY: How many in Saskatchewan?

Mr. GARDINER: There are twenty illustration stations in Saskatchewan and thirty-one substations which are related to the prairie farm rehabilitation work. These are spread over the drought area. There are fifteen in Alberta and six in Manitoba.

Mr. PERLEY: As regards the substation at Regina, is the work carried on along the lines of experimenting with control of soil drifting?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. The station at Regina is for the purpose of controlling soil drifting.

Mr. PERLEY: What is the result of the experiments at the Regina station?

Mr. GARDINER: They are carrying on two activities, one having to do with soil drifting and the other with weed control. Some of the work that has been developed in connection with soil control is to leave a sort of dressing of stubble and other material on the top, but it is generally recognized in the west that what holds the soil best, in the Regina district particularly, is rain, and if it does not rain, the soil blows in spite of everything one can do.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): What rental is given the farmers from whom these stations are acquired?

Mr. GARDINER: I think the best answer to that question is to read a summary of the contract that is entered into with those who operate:

1. A rental of $5 an acre is paid where the plots do not exceed one-quarter acre each. Usually this plot area does not exceed one acre. On this class of work the supervisor puts in all the crop and harvests it.

2. Where the plots are smaller than 1/20 acre each, the operator receives $25 an acre compensation for the loss of the crop on such small areas.

3. A rental of $3 an acre is paid where the blocks of land do not exceed three acres. The total area of such stations is frequently from twelve to fourteen acres. The operator handles all of this crop.

4. A rental of $1 an acre is paid for the district experiment substations in the P.F.R.A. area in the prairie provinces. Large scale work is undertaken with strip farming, cover crops and surface tillage in connection with soil drifting control.

On some of these district experiment substations small plot experiments are also conducted.

5. Special contracts have been made in connection with special work such as with cranberries, raspberries, hops and irrigation. None of these exceed $150 each. For certain operators along the line of the Hudson Bay railway, an annual payment of $5 per acre is made while some of these operators receive no payment whatever.

For pasture experiments no rental is paid but the fertilizer is supplied free.

6. Total maximum payments to any operator in eastern Canada is confined to less than $100.

In western Canada the limit is confined to below $200 for illustration station operators, while for operators of district experimental sub-stations the limit varies, being $1 an acre up to one section of land, plus payments for small experimental plots at the rates set for illustration station compensation. The upper limit, therefore, would not exceed $800 and usually is considerably less.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Who is paid for putting the crop in; is it the farmer from whom the farm is rented? What is paid for the work done?

Mr. GARDINER: Nothing is paid to the farmer for his work. A rental is paid for the land on which the operation is carried on, but the farmer does all the work and gets the proceeds from the crop.

Mr. BROOKS: Is the farmer supplied with the seed?

Mr. GARDINER: Only where it is seed investigation work and where it is thought necessary to supply the seed because the test is of the seed.

Mr. HAYHURST: Did I understand the minister correctly to say that there are eleven illustration stations in Alberta?

Mr. GARDINER: I think that is correct, eleven of the one type and fifteen of the other.

Mr. HAYHURST: Where are the eleven stations located?

Mr. GARDINER: Iron Springs, Cheddarville, Rocky Mountain House railway station Dickson, Leslieville, Stettler, Sangudo, Chauvin, St. Paul, High Prairie, Fairview.

Mr. CHURCH: This particular item has grown by leaps and bounds since I have been in the house. Since the present minister has had control, there seems to be no thought of economy in the department. Look at this item 14, details of which are on page 57 of the estimates. I do not know where this standing army is going to end. And when one considers that the provinces have concurrent jurisdiction, why should the dominion establish a great big department like this?

Look at some of these items—it puts me in mind of the army and navy added together —Chief supervisor of illustration stations, same as last year; senior agricultural scientist, forestry engineer, eleven experimental farm superintendents, all kinds of things; forestry engineer, animal nutritionist and genetecist, fourteen more experimental farm superintendents, five senior assistant agricultural scientists, two assistant superintendents, one assistant chief supervisor, another forestry engineer, an assistant agricultural scientist—there is no deputy assistant—two tobacco specialists, we have plenty of them in the lobbies all day long; an animal nutritionist and physiologist at $2,520, twenty-one more farm assistants of all kinds and grades, supervisors, irrigation specialist—they are all specialists—eighteen farm foremen amounting to $35,000 this year, $28,860 last year, an increase of $7,000, and no doubt more votes will be obtained this year. Then clerks, grade 4, forest assistants, a graduate assistant—one more graduate, no doubt of the agricultural college, eleven head herdsmen, nine of these at $1,800, one at only $1,785, a $15 deduction. Twelve head poultrymen, head gardeners, head beekeepers, head plotmen, head gardeners, grade 3, a stenographer, five poultrymen, a greenhouseman, more clerks, beekeepers, stenographers, herdsmen, gardeners, a part time assistant to dominion animal husbandman, one only caretaker, no janitors, and temporary assistance amounting to $117,000. Then, on the next page printing and stationery, rents, supplies and materials, et cetera, and travelling expenses, make a total of $1,406,427.

Where is the money to come from to pay all this? It has to come out of the income tax and the sales tax collected from the industrial provinces. Talk about economy! I commend this to the publisher of the Globe and Mail, the friend of my friend the minister, to find out what economy there is in this. Ballots might well be sent to all the farmers in this country to find out what they think of this department which has grown by leaps and bounds. These estimates should be dealt with on the municipal system, and we could sit here and divide this million and a half dollars in half; let them get on this year with $750,000 to run this branch of the army; that would be plenty for this department. With that kind of extravagance in this department what is it going to amount to when they all add it up and where is the money to come from? In view of these treaties I should think we would need fewer officials in the Department of Agriculture owing to the changes which have been made in the agreements to which I have referred.

[Mr. Church.]

It is eleven o'clock; I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. GARDINER: It is still one minute to eleven. Before the hon. member takes his seat—

Mr. CHURCH: I have not concluded my remarks.

Mr. GARDINER: —I should like to say that there are just the same number of employees in this branch of the department that there were last year.

Mr. CHURCH: I have not finished my remarks.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member moved a motion.

Mr. CHURCH: I have the floor. Both of us cannot talk at the same time.

Mr. GARDINER: There are just the same number as last year.

The CHAIRMAN: It is eleven o'clock.

Mr. CHURCH: That sort of thing may be all right in the Saskatchewan legislature, but it does not go here.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 22, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SUBSIDIES TO FLYING CLUBS

Mr. MALLETTE:

How many flying clubs, per province, are actually recognized by the government in the granting of subsidies to help develop aviators?

Mr. HOWE: Alberta, 2; British Columbia, 1; Manitoba, 2; New Brunswick, 1; Nova Scotia, 2; Ontario, 10; Prince Edward Island, 0; Quebec, 1; Saskatchewan, 3. Total, 23.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—SALE OF SCRAP METAL

Mr. DOUGLAS Weyburn):

1. Are old box-cars and other railroad equipment being demolished in the Canadian National railways shops at Port Mann, British Columbia?

2. To whom is the scrap metal being sold?

3. Is such metal being sold directly, or indirectly through dealers, to Japan?

4. Is such metal being shipped on Japanese boats?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Not at present; forty-nine cars were demolished in 1938.

2. Scrap is sold by competitive tender.

3. No scrap is sold by the railway to Japan. The management have no information concerning disposition of scrap after it is sold by the railway.

4. See answer to question 3.

QUESTION OF EXISTENCE OF BUTTER COMBINE IN MONTREAL AND DISTRICT

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Is it true that there exists in Montreal and surrounding district a combine in restraint of the trade of butter?

2. If so, what steps does the government intend to take to put an end to such combine?

Mr. ROGERS: No complaint has been received by the government in regard to an alleged combine in Montreal and surrounding district in restraint of the trade of butter.

*BELL TELEPHONE TOLLS AND CHARGES

Mr. CHURCH:

Will the Minister of Transport order an immediate inquiry of his own volition into all the tolls and charges of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada by the board of transport commissioners for Canada with a view to securing an immediate reduction of rates and tolls in view of the earnings and reserves of the company and the economies in operation the company has effected?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am authorized by the department to say that the subject matter of this inquiry is now receiving the attention of the board of transport commissioners.

DIGBY-ANNAPOLIS-KINGS INCOME TAX RETURNS

Mr. CAHAN:

1. What was the aggregate amount of personal income taxes shown by the income tax returns of residents of the electoral district of Digby-Annapolis-Kings, in the province of Nova Scotia, for each of the calendar years 1916, 1917, and 1918?

2. How many individual returns were included in the aggregate amount of personal taxes shown for each of the said years?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Not available.

2. Not available.

Statistics not maintained in such a manner as to give information requested.

Mr. CAHAN: I would ask the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) whether these statistics are available for any lesser area than a province. Is the province divided into districts for which statistics would be available? My desire is, in making certain economic studies, to ascertain what is the income, for instance, of a large apple-growing district. I thought of asking similar questions with regard to certain other districts which have distinctive occupations.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall look into the matter and see if there is an area smaller than a province for which statistics would be available, and let the hon. gentleman know.

Mr. CAHAN: Thank you.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS

Mr. CASSELMAN:

For a copy of all orders in council passed since January 1, 1938, authorizing the issue of governor general's warrants.

THE KING V. WALKER

Mr. STEVENS:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Minister of Justice, from January, 1936, to March 17, 1939, and Mr. J. C. MacCorkindale, barrister, of Toronto, or any other persons in regard to the case of "The King v. Walker"; also any report made to the Minister of Justice or any official of the Department of Justice regarding the evidence of George E. McLay in regard to this case.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I have looked into this file, and I find that it contains nothing which is not confidential. All matters connected with the exercise of the discretion of the Minister of Justice with regard to the prerogative of mercy are according to the rules and practice of the department, confidential and have never been tabled. However, I have no objection to allowing the motion to go through with this reservation, that only documents that may be produced will be brought down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried, with the reservation stated.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the federal government, or any department thereof, and the provincial government of Nova Scotia, or any department thereof, with reference to payment of contribution towards a bonus to "Dry Salt Fish Producers," from January 1, 1937, to date.

Mr. BROOKS:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the federal government and the Nova Scotia government with reference to the resolution mentioned in the following paragraph from the speech from the throne, proroguing the Nova Scotia House of Assembly on April 14, 1938: "The resolution you have adopted regarding movement of trade and coal tonnage through the port of Halifax will be transmitted to the federal authorities."

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

QUESTION OF PREPARING NATIONAL REGISTER FOR DEFENCE, ECONOMIC OR OTHER PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) inquired about a return which was passed by this house on January 12 in reply to his question as follows:

[Mr. Stevens.]

1. Have any steps been taken by the government to secure a national register for Canada for defence or economic or industrial or labour purposes?

There were other questions to the same effect. I might say in reply that all the departments interested were communicated with by the Secretary of State's department and that a return was tabled on February 8 last containing all the information we have on this subject. Since the hon. member for Broadview has on a couple of occasions asked whether we could supply him with additional information, I must state to him to-day that all the information was tabled in the return of February 8.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, the government's reply to my inquiry as to what is the national policy for defence, for food power, economic matters and other matters referred to in my question was contained in one small paragraph. It gives no information whatever concerning economic power, man power, food power, military and defence power or a register of unemployment. The various ministers have not answered the question. We shall wait till doomsday before anything is done, or until the dictators arrive in Canada.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) if he is prepared to tell us what further legislation is likely to be brought down before the end of the session. I ask it because of his own remarks some time ago regarding the end of the session. I think it would be of interest if he could tell us, and if he is not prepared to do so to-day, perhaps he may be in a position to give an answer to-morrow.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I shall be very happy to give a reply to my hon. friend, but possibly he might allow me until Monday to make a statement, by which time I hope to be able to have exact information.

SUBVERSIVE PROPAGANDA

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO ACTIVITIES INIMICAL TO CANADIAN INSTITUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct the following question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). In view of the vast amount of propaganda being carried on in Canada designed to undermine our democratic institutions and also to foster religious and racial hatreds, much of which emanates from abroad, will the government undertake a thorough public investigation into all forms of such propaganda?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman kindly sent me a copy of the question he intended to ask, and I wish to give this answer. There is no doubt that some propaganda along the lines suggested by the hon. gentleman is being carried out in certain parts of Canada. More particularly certain scurrilous and offensive publications are doing their utmost to undermine democratic institutions. One of their methods is to abuse parliament and slander public men. They have not been interfered with, mostly because of their insignificance and to avoid giving them a publicity which they relish. In some cases it would seem that they are the tools of foreign agencies interested in their destructive work. We are keeping a pretty careful watch over their activities, and we are prepared to protect Canadian laws and institutions, if needed.

I personally believe that a public investigation, whether by a parliamentary committee or a royal commission, might become desirable as to the existence, the activities and the financial support of all associations or societies which are carrying on subversive work, inimical to the institutions of Canada, and the suggestion of my hon. friend will be duly considered as to opportunity, time and form of such possible investigation.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED GERMAN NEGOTIATIONS FOR ATLANTIC AIR BASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. J. HARTIGAN (Cape Breton South): I would ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), in view of reports to-day that Germany is negotiating with Iceland for a seaplane base in the north Atlantic, and Canada's vulnerability to attack from the air on the Atlantic seaboard, whether our air defence on the Atlantic seaboard should not be speeded up to completion without waiting for any interdepartmental committee or anything of that sort. The very latest report states that Germany is negotiating with Denmark for an aeroplane base on the Atlantic.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): I have not seen the dispatch to which my hon. friend alludes, but I can assure him that very aggressive steps will be taken during this present year for the development of airports on the Atlantic coast.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. LACOMBE

SPEECH DELIVERED BY THE HON. MEMBER FOR DORCHESTER AT MONTREAL ON MARCH 17, 1939

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Tremblay) is reported in the newspaper Le Canada of March 18, 1939, as having made the following statement at Montreal on the 17th instant at a meeting of the Mercier Liberal Association:

> The most strenuous opponents of national defence have been the Communist groups. It is they who have sent to Ottawa the largest number of protests against any increase of appropriations intended for the protection of Canada and more particularly of our west coast. The Communists do not want us to protect our own country against foreign attack, but they ask us to go to fight in Europe. Their attitude is strange, to say the least, since Soviet Russia, whose dangerous policies they approve, has the most powerful army of any country in the world.

Since the hon. member has not yet seen fit to repudiate this statement, I have reason to believe that he persists in the opinion he has thus expressed. Therefore, as it is not only my right but my duty to defend my honour as representative of Laval-Two Mountains in the House of Commons, I energetically protest against the hon. member's statement. I have always been irrevocably opposed to any increase in military appropriations, knowing that such appropriations would lead to our participation in foreign wars. My opposition remains irrevocable. Nevertheless I hate Communism from the bottom of my soul. I abhor its hideous and pernicious doctrine. I therefore refer the house and the hon. member for Dorchester—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must ask the hon. member to be as brief as possible. Only the question of privilege can be discussed at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. LACOMBE: I just wish to quote a statement which I made in the House of Commons on January 23 last. I respectfully submit that my case is not unlike that of the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) who discussed at some length a statement of Mr. Herridge.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is entitled to state his question of privilege, but I do not think he can be permitted to deliver a lengthy speech.

Mr. LACOMBE: I do not wish to make a speech; I am simply referring to a decision which you rendered yourself. This is what I said on January 23 last—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not think the hon. member is entitled to repeat his statement at this time. He will have other opportunities of stating his position.

WAYS AND MEANS

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—WITH RELATION TO DAIRYING, LIVE STOCK AND VEGETABLE OILS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is the time-honoured privilege which is accorded to representatives of the people to ask for redress of grievances and to bring before parliament matters of public importance when a motion of this kind is before the house or when the house is being asked to grant supply. I intend, therefore, to take this opportunity to bring to the attention of the house a matter which I think is of paramount importance to Canadian agriculture.

Farming in Canada is a highly diversified occupation. Many different branches of agriculture are carried on in this country. The nature of the production on Canadian farms depends largely upon a number of factors, such as climate, types of soil, proximity to markets and to consumer centres of population.

According to the classification made by the Department of Agriculture and by the bureau of statistics we have the following branches of agriculture: wheat growing, field crops, dairying, live stock, fruits and vegetables, poultry products, and several others. The ones I have mentioned are of major importance, and all of them return a considerable amount of money to the farmer.

I should like to give the house an idea of the relative importance of these different branches of agriculture, as indicated by the following figures which I took the opportunity of getting from the bureau of statistics, showing the value of these different lines of farming in the nine years from 1930 to 1938 inclusive:

Product	Value (in round figures)
Wheat	$1,557,000,000
Other field crops	2,930,000,000
All farm animal products, including wool	1,064,000,000
Dairy products	1,805,000,000
Poultry and eggs	482,000,000
Fruits and vegetables	375,000,000

I ask the house to note particularly the importance of the dairy industry and the live stock industry as indicated by the figures I have just given. Dairying stands second and live stock fourth in order of importance. The last census returns show that in Canada we have approximately 730,000 farms. More than half, probably two-thirds, of the farmers derive a considerable portion of their income from either dairying or live stock. Anything, therefore, which may have an adverse effect upon either of these two great branches of our agricultural industry should be carefully considered, and, if possible, measures should be taken to alleviate the situation.

In recent times increasing numbers of our cattle, sheep and hogs are being slaughtered and processed in the abattoirs of Canada. The price which the farmer receives for this live stock is determined, at least partly, by that which is received by the packers for the sale of the products and the by-products.

Animal fats in particular, in the form of edible and inedible lard and tallow, are one of these important by-products. It is estimated that each hog slaughtered in Canada will produce approximately fifteen pounds of lard. Each 1,000 pounds of cattle or sheep slaughtered will produce forty pounds of tallow. On this basis the average anual production of lard in this country is approximately 90,000,000 pounds and of tallow, some 100,000,000 pounds. If we add to this the annual production of creamery butter, amounting to some 270,000,000 pounds, and the annual average production of dairy butter amounting to some 100,000,000 pounds, we have altogether a total of approximately 560,000,000 pounds of edible animal fat produced in Canada annually.

The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), who, by the way, is my desk-mate, when speaking on this matter in the house in 1937, stated that the best authorities on dietetics placed the amount of fats required by human beings to maintain life in a climate like that of Canada at fifty pounds per person annually, which would mean that we require in this country each year 550,000,000 pounds of fat for human consumption. I believe that these estimates are well within the mark; they are quite conservative, so that the Canadian dairymen and live stock producers should be in a position to supply our human requirements or very nearly so.

In addition to these figures there is also a considerable amount of inedible fat produced in Canada—I refer to animal fats—which is also being displaced by the use of vegetable oils in the manufacture of soaps, grease and so on. In view of the figures I have just given, it seems to me that no one can fail to look with alarm upon the enormous annual increase in Canada's importation of vegetable oils. This importation is accompanied, of course, by a corresponding increase in the manufacture and sale of vegetable oil shortening in Canada and, as well, in the use of the inedible portion of these oils in the manufacture in Canada of certain products such as soap, lubricating greases and so on.

I should like now, if I may, to give the house a table of figures showing how these importations are increasing. It is true they are not listed as foods in the tariff item, but as a matter of fact they are refined and a very large proportion of them is used as food for human beings. The importations during the fiscal years I shall enumerate were:

Year	Pounds
1933	84,000,000
1934	116,000,000
1935	148,000,000
1936	195,000,000
1937	251,000,000
1938	255,000,000

Year	Pounds
1932	61,000,000
1933	67,000,000
1934	88,000,000

Since that time it has been impossible to obtain accurate figures showing the amount of vegetable oils produced in this country, owing to the refusal of the bureau of statistics to make public the figures of vegetable oils produced by two of the large competing companies in Canada. However, if we estimate the production last year according to the proportions of vegetable oils that were refined and used as human food in other years, it will easily amount to 145,000,000 or 150,000,000 pounds.

In addition to these vast amounts of vegetable oils which are rendered edible by processing and which are used for human food, there is a large proportion of the content of imported vegetable oils which is sold and used in the manufacture of certain commodities such as soap, and so on. It cannot be denied, I do not believe anyone will dispute the fact, that because of the use of these imported oils there is a corresponding displacement of animal fats in the markets of Canada, and of butter, lard and tallow in use in our Canadian homes, and in manufacturing as well. Prices of butter in this country are to-day relatively low, and are in many instances below the cost of production. One cause of this is the fact that for a considerable length of time we have had more than a normal surplus of butter, ranging from 10,000,000 to 15,000,000 pounds above the average of other years.

Undoubtedly a considerable quantity of vegetable oils has been used instead of butter as shortening in the processes of cooking and baking, and I believe it is also true that evidence is not lacking that a certain quantity of vegetable shortening is used as spread in place of butter. It is difficult, of course, to estimate to what extent this is carried on, but I venture to say—I do not think there is any doubt about it—that of the 150,000,000 pounds of vegetable shortening produced and sold in Canada last year, sufficient was used in place of butter to account for the abnormal surplus of butter we have on hand at the present time.

In addition to the replacement of Canadian butter by the use of vegetable oil shortening, there is a corresponding or even a greater displacement of lard and tallow which are rendered from the fat of hogs, sheep and cattle. In restaurants and bake-shops, and in many private houses particularly, because of the intensive campaign of advertising which has been carried on by those companies that are refining vegetable oils and placing them on the market, these are being used rather than Canadian products.

I can recall distinctly the agitation and the debates that took place in this house between 1922 and 1924 regarding the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine. There was at that time a keen division of opinion respecting the matter. It was necessary for a bill to be introduced each year to authorize the continued manufacture and importation of oleomargarine. It was not until 1924 that no further bill was introduced and oleomargarine no longer allowed to be produced in or imported into Canada. I think it is within the memory of many hon. members that between 1925 and 1930 there was a constant annual increase in the importation of New Zealand butter. This increase continued until the dairy industry of this country became so alarmed, and there was such an insistent demand to revoke the order in council which allowed New Zealand butter to come in under a duty of one cent a pound, that it was finally revoked, I believe, when the budget was brought down in 1930 by my hon. friend who is now Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). If importations of these small amounts of oleomargarine and New Zealand butter had the effect of injuring the dairy and live stock industries of Canada, as evidently the farmers of Canada believed they did, how can we sit quietly by at this time and watch the large importations of vegetable oils entering this country and replacing our Canadian produced animal fats, without taking any action whatever?

Fluctuations in the price of by-products manufactured from slaughtered cattle, hogs and sheep, have, as I have already stated, a direct effect upon prices paid to the producer for those animals on the hoof. Prices quoted in the live stock markets and the stockyards are based on the returns received from every part of the animal when processed; the better the market for the by-products, the more the farmer should get for the live animal.

Mr. Stanley McLean, president of Canada Packers, Limited, delivered an address before the Holstein Breeders' Association at the Royal York hotel in Toronto in 1936. He is reported in the Globe and Mail of that date to have stated that the granting of an application, made by certain interested parties, which was then before the tariff board, would probably increase the price to the farmer one-fifth of a cent a pound on cattle and one-third of a cent a pound on hogs. Subsequently a statement was made to the tariff board by those who made the application; they also stated that if their request were granted, the additional return to the farmer would be about $1 a head on every hog and at least $2 a head on every finished cattle beast sold. A conservative estimate based on these figures would indicate that Canadian farmers are losing about $6,000,000 annually in the price which they receive for their cattle and hogs owing to the increase in the use of vegetable oils and fats and shortenings in this country.

For a number of years we had a good market for Canadian lard in the British isles. We were able to export our lard at attractive prices; because of that the price of lard remained at a fairly good level until a year or two ago, when prices dropped in the British market, and we have now lost that market entirely, or nearly so. In 1936, another thing happened which had a detrimental effect upon the lard producers of this country. The government of the United States passed the Bailey amendment imposing on all fats entering that country an excise tax of three cents a pound over and above the regular rates which were in effect at that time. As a result of this action our market in the United States for our surplus fats has been practically lost, and prices of animal fats in Canada have accordingly dropped to most unprofitable levels. This excise tax was of course also applied to vegetable oils imported into the United States. In certain instances an additional processing tax of three cents a pound, and 4½ cents a pound on another group of vegetable fats entering the United States, was imposed. These taxes had the immediate effect of decreasing by about twenty per cent the amount of vegetable oils entering the United States. The effect of this was immediately felt by producers of animal fats of different kinds over there. It also resulted in a reduction of from 30,000,000 to 40,000,000 pounds in Canadian fats entering the United States, which had a very serious effect upon prices of lard and tallow in Canada.

Early in 1926 an application was made to the tariff board by a group of packing house companies not interested in the importation and processing of vegetable oils, together with the national dairy council and manufacturers of inedible animal greases, fats and oils. They applied for revision of the customs tariff on all fats and greases entering Canada except butter and cream. The hearing of this application took place on December 9, 10 and 11, 1936, over two years ago. Yet, as far as I am able to learn, no finding has been brought down. I believe the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) asked a question of the Minister of Finance yesterday, and if I understood the minister's reply correctly, no finding has yet been brought down. I cannot imagine that the tariff board has not reached a decision on this matter in two years. It is difficult to know why its finding has not been submitted to the finance minister, unless it be that perhaps he is not anxious to have it.

Mr. DUNNING: I am very anxious.

Mr. SENN: If the minister is anxious at the moment I think he should have been anxious a little earlier; for I fancy that if he had demanded it, it would probably have been brought down. I am not going to accuse him of deliberately abstaining from asking for it, but I am afraid that at least he did not press for it.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall answer my hon. friend in that regard later.

Mr. SENN: This question was dealt with on the floor of the house in 1936 by my colleague who sits to my right (Mr. Harris), and it has been discussed every year since in this house, so that the finance minister and the government cannot plead ignorance of it. They must be alive to the situation and what is going on.

The action taken by the government of the United States is in direct contrast with that of the government here. I have already told the house of the measures taken by the administration of that country to protect the interests of farmers producing animal fats in the United States. I am making this statement at this time in the hope that something may be done in the near future for farmers producing this line of goods in Canada.

It is true that there are in this country certain interests who are opposed to any action being taken. But I point out that the action which was taken by the United States government in imposing excise tax and processing tax upon the importation of vegetable oils into that country did not increase the price over there of the different brands of vegetable oil shortenings produced in that country. As a matter of fact, although these oils enter Canada entirely free of duty and with no excise tax, prices in Canada and the United States to-day for vegetable oil shortenings are practically on a par. I had a report a few days ago which quoted vegetable oil shortening in tierces in Chicago at nine cents a pound, and in Toronto at eight cents a pound. But adding the sales tax of eight per cent to the Canadian price makes them practically equal.

No matter how important foreign markets may be, the fact remains that the home market is the farmer's most valuable asset. He has to buy in a protected market. I believe that the Canadian market should as far as possible be preserved for goods manufactured in Canada. But I am equally convinced that Canadian farmers also should as far as possible enjoy the full benefit of the home market. They should not be placed in the position of having their products pushed off the home market and undersold by cheap substitutes imported free of duty from countries with low standards of living and low production costs.

Our friends on the government benches, I know, always shy away at the word "protection." They seem to have an obsession against tariffs, or at least the government seem to be afraid to impose customs duties for fear of offending some of their supporters. It is true, of course, that they leave in effect customs duties already imposed; but why should we attempt to protect the Canadian dairyman, for example, by placing and leaving in effect a duty of five cents a pound on butter, while at the same time we allow vegetable oils to come into this country absolutely free of duty in order to take the place of that butter? Why should a tariff be imposed on the importation of lard in order to protect producers of lard in this country, while at the same time we allow vegetable oils to come in absolutely free?

Yesterday we heard an hon. member on the government side compliment the Minister of Finance upon a small reduction, amounting to some 12½ per cent, in the duty on cream separators. On a separator costing $100 this would mean about $12, if the purchaser got the full benefit of the reduction. The life of a cream separator is at least ten or twelve years, which would mean that the dairyman who bought that separator would benefit to the extent of possibly $1 a year. At the same time we allow these vegetable oils to come into this country to replace butter and all kinds of animal fats. Up to the present nothing has been done about the matter, although the government has known of the situation ever since it has been in office.

I know it is useless to ask the government to impose duties for the protection of the dairymen and live stock producers of Canada, but in conclusion I should like to suggest that they might at least follow the course that has been pursued by the government of the United States and impose some processing tax or excise duty. I warn the government that the situation is bad; it is growing worse and becoming more critical as the days go by.

Hon. W. E. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the subject under discussion is one which deeply affects the business in which I am interested, that is, agriculture. I believe it is highly important that the government should give careful consideration to the remarks of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) and the sound logic of his arguments; and because of the urgency of the situation I cannot resist the temptation to express my approval of what has been said by the hon. member.

There are two features I should like to discuss, without unduly trespassing on the time of the house and without repeating what has been said so well by the hon. member, in reference to the increasing importations of vegetable oils into this country. In the first place it is vitally important that we protect the health and sustenance of our own people. In the second place we should seek to bring about national prosperity by maintaining agricultural stability. Nature has provided vegetable oils for use as foodstuffs in tropical zones, but in the cold and rigorous climate of this country it has long been recognized that animal fats provide better food for our people. So I think we should discourage the growing tendency to depend upon foreign producers of foodstuffs. If we engaged in a world war it might be very difficult to bring to this country fifty steamers, each carrying the equivalent of a trainload of vegetable oils, which we would have to do in order to maintain the importations of the last few years. Since a very large percentage of these huge shipments has been made up of edible oils, I believe this is a factor that must be seriously considered at this time.

We have seen this dangerous competition to Canadian producers growing in this dominion for many years. As the hon. member for Haldimand has said, I recall that a few years ago, when four or five million pounds of oleomargarine were being consumed in this country, many members of this house rose almost in rebellion against the importation or manufacture of this commodity. As a result the government of the day, which I believe was supported by the party sitting opposite, prohibited further importations of oleomargarine by means of increasing the tariff. To-day we find 255,000,000 pounds of vegetable oils flooding our markets, and our people becoming more and more dependent upon this type of foodstuff.

I mention that as a matter of vital importance to the consuming public of this country. I believe it is highly important that we should maintain a sound agriculture in Canada, and in my opinion the stability of this great industry can be best brought about by developing greater diversity of production. I think this would have a direct effect on the greatest problem facing Canada to-day, namely that of the employment of our people. Last year I suggested that the government, through the economics branch of the tariff board, carry on a methodical research in order to ascertain the effect of these huge importations of vegetable oils on the live stock industry of Canada. So far as I know no such research has been undertaken, in spite of the fact that our importations last year showed an increase over the year 1936 of approximately 60,000,000 pounds.

The importance of this issue has been emphasized by the hon. member for Haldimand, but I should like to remind the house once more that there are 750,000 families on farms throughout Canada, and in addition an enormous number of hired men employed on these farms. Over 500,000 of these farmers are breeders of live stock, with over $4,000,000,000 invested in lands and buildings; and it must be remembered that climatic conditions in Canada force those engaged in the production of animal fats and dairy products to house their live stock with some care and at considerable expense. We have 500 million dollars invested in live stock, over 600 million dollars invested in equipment, and the agricultural industry pays 100 million dollars annually to the wage earners of this country. It pays $54,000,000 in property taxes. I mention only these few features to remind hon. members that the farming industry has always been regarded as the backbone of Canada. Many hon. members have been in this house much longer than I, but they will remember that at least ten years ago I urged upon the government the dangers of a lopsided development of our Canadian agricultural industry. Since that time I have watched a continuous lopsided development. Yesterday we amended the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, a piece of legislation which will cost this country two or three million dollars. Last year we paid $60,000,000 as a wheat bonus to relieve this lopsided development. What has this government done? In fact they did nothing from 1921 to 1930 by way of a study of this all important problem. This government's policy has shown a tendency to develop in such a way as to threaten the very lifeblood of Canadian agriculture. I have stated in this house that the time would come when we would regret this lopsided development, when we would regret not having encouraged a greater diversification of production in this industry. I well recall what one of my friends from western Canada said to me at that time. He was a delightful gentleman who sat down here to my left, but even he was defeated at the subsequent election. He said that we did not understand wheat production, that western Canada would always be the bread-basket of the world. He felt that they were almost guaranteed dollar wheat for many years to come. Only one year afterward, every elevator in this dominion was loaded up with unsold wheat.

I have heard the idea advanced on scores of occasions that we must buy where we can buy the cheapest, that only in such countries could we hope to sell the wheat produced on the vast prairies of western Canada. Since I have been a member of this house I have seen one after the other of those countries raise their tariffs. I shall not take the time to refer to them individually, but every member within the sound of my voice will recall that those countries raised their tariffs, in many cases to a point where the duty imposed was more than the price of Canadian wheat. We might as well face the facts. Through a haphazard agricultural policy we have risked the future prosperity of Canada. We have placed ourselves at the mercy of the whims of foreign countries. We must face the chances of weather conditions throughout the world and compete with chemical substitutes which have been developed to take the place of flour made from No. 1 northern wheat, which we were told so often was impossible of substitution.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Is the hon. member suggesting that we should diversify our agricultural endeavours in western Canada?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): That is only part of the great national issue. My hon. friend probably knows better than I that there has been a rapid development in the diversification of agriculture in his own province. I ask the hon. gentleman not to raise any argument in connection with this issue, because it is too important. I challenge any hon. member within sound of my voice to show me any country whose agriculture has been maintained down through the years with the production of wheat alone. We have seen this lopsided development all along the line; all one needs to do is to look around.

Mr. LANDERYOU: If we were to increase the production of dairy products in western Canada along with pork and things of the kind, what would happen to the markets of Ontario?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Before we worry about the markets of Ontario for pork products, I suggest that we first fill the quotas provided by the empire trade agreement of 1932. I suggest some of this production would be consumed by the additional hired help that would be necessary to carry on the development of mixed farming activities. Although my farm is slightly larger at the present time, on many occasions I have kept four heads of families employed on 100 acres. As compared with that, it is possible for an ablebodied man to farm 600 acres planted in wheat alone with the type of machinery that has been developed in recent years. No other avenue of endeavour in this dominion offers more possibilities for the establishment, not only of remunerative employment, but also of happy homes. I am referring to employment because the hon. member has brought it up.

All I ask the hon. member to do is to look across the border at the state of Minnesota. Within the lifetime of the youngest member of this house, that state produced more wheat than Alberta and Manitoba combined. Thirty-five or forty years ago no doubt the prairie farmers of Minnesota felt that state would be a great wheat producing district for many long years to come. But a gradual diversification of production was brought about as a result of climatic conditions, loss of fertility of the soil, and other causes. Minnesota produces only a small amount of wheat compared with what she produced some years ago, but she now produces more dairy products than the whole of the Dominion of Canada. This is the type of diversified and intensive agriculture which has kept the farms of Europe fertile for a thousand years. As I have said, we cannot keep on forever robbing the soil of its fertility. You cannot wisely continue to encourage only one product and depend solely upon an export market for its disposition, and depend upon the whims of every government of the world.

We are considering a plan under which the treasury of Canada is to provide $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 for one section of the dominion in order to encourage the production of an article which the world seems to desire less to-day than it did a few years ago. I suggest to the government of the day that they stop, look and listen; that they notice the signs of the times. In other words, they should come up to date and encourage the type of industry which will not only provide more employment but bring about more stability in national income and exports. There is an old agricultural saying that one should not put all his eggs in one basket. That adage was never more sound than it is to-day, so far as Canadian agriculture is concerned.

To my mind the basic stability of Canadian agriculture depends upon the effects and influences of three distinctive things. It depends, first, on markets for our products; second, on productive efficiency, and third, on soil fertility. If anyone can show me that the trend of the agricultural policy of this government has assisted in any one of these phases, I will say that this government might have a chance to return to power. But nothing has been done in that direction since 1935. In fact nothing was done by the same party between 1921 and 1930 to develop Canadian agriculture on a sound and stable basis.

Mr. TOMLINSON: What did the government do between 1930 and 1935?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): When we brought in the empire trade agreements, I say to the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Tomlinson) that we did more for agriculture than was done by this government in its whole existence. The Minister of Finance shakes his head at that, thinking I am perhaps extravagant.

Mr. DUNNING: I do.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): If he will review the record of his government so far as markets are concerned, and as to policies which have helped to maintain the fertility of the soil, I think he will agree with me.

Mr. DUNNING: I am quite sure that my hon. friend is wrong about that, so far as it relates to me.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Convince a man against his will and he is of the same opinion still; I shall not pursue that any further with the Minister of Finance. But I suggest to him that before bringing down the budget of this year he consider carefully having reports from the tariff board, and consider also the advisability of giving to the farmers of this dominion similar protection to that which our industrialists enjoy. I say further to him that if he does not do that, he will not write the next budget that is brought down in this house.

For many years we had greater exports to markets overseas for our live stock products than we have now. My hon. friend shakes his head. May I remind him that we sold more live stock products in the British market in 1921 than we have sold in any year since. We sold more cheese 30 years ago by far than has been sold since, and we sold more live stock products by millions of dollars in 1921 than this country sold of wheat in that year. We have had a government now for some years with a wheat complex. May I remind the minister that the greatest market for all our Canadian agricultural produce is the home market; for every dollar the home consumer spends for Canadian wheat he spends eight dollars for live stock and dairy products. The ratio is 8 to 1. We consume in our home market from 80 to 85 per cent of our agricultural products. Contrast that with our sister dominions, Australia and New Zealand. They export about 85 per cent of their agricultural products and consume 15 per cent, while we consmue about 95 per cent and more of our live stock and dairy products and other products of intensified agriculture. The large consuming markets for our live stock products and the products of our intensified agriculture, such as poultry, fruits and vegetables, are along the seaboard, in Montreal and other large centres like Toronto.

May I remind my western friends that it costs a great deal to bring their products from the west to the east. It costs $3.33 a hundredweight to bring their butter east, while vegetable oils from overseas competing with our Canadian animal products arrive at the port of Montreal by paying 25 cents a hundred.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Is there not a surplus of butter in Ontario right now?

[Mr. W. E. Rowe.]

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Yes, we have a surplus of dairy butter. We had at the beginning of the year about 44 million pounds, and we are importing 255 million pounds of vegetable oils—167 million pounds approximately of the edible type. There has been a reduction of seventy per cent in the consumption of dairy butter for bakery purposes during the last eight years. I submit that the 44 million pounds of butter that await a market to-day might well be consumed in this country if we consumed it at the same rate as that at which we are using imported vegetable oils.

I mentioned a tariff on vegetable oils. I realize that it might be difficult to place a tariff on vegetable oils; I would suggest rather the imposition of a processing tax that would equalize the conditions between our farmers and those who produce under more favourable conditions. It is so easy in tropical zones to produce vegetable oils very cheaply, and it is unfair for any government, whether Liberal or Conservative, to maintain high tariffs for the protection of our soap makers, cake makers, biscuit manufacturers and other processors and refuse similar treatment to our farmers. Our farmers have very high expenses compared with those of farmers in tropical countries, where people scarcely need to wear clothes, let alone to house their cattle. This government should be alarmed at the increase in the importations of vegetable oils. When you stop to think that we import more vegetable oils than we produce of dairy butter, surely it is time for the government to take cognizance of the situation. I know that farmers even on the other side of the line view with amazement the inaction of the Canadian government on this issue, and I can quite understand as I read from "American Farmer" their saying "before we try to help the Canadian farmers by the United States agreement we have made with that country, they ought to be protecting their own market."

We have in Canada great possibilities, but the inaction of the government makes one doubt whether under its policies agriculture can be maintained as our great basic industry. We live in a cold climate, and in live stock production the cost of barns in old Ontario, and in some parts of western Canada, is almost as much as the farms are worth to house the stock.

I think we must consider carefully the maintenance of our home market. All who are within sound of my voice will agree that our huge importations are seriously affecting the live stock industry of this country, and threatening to affect it very seriously in the years to come.

Another means of encouraging stability in agriculture in this country is through productive efficiency. By that I mean, not the individual efficiency of the farmer but the efficiency of our country, our national efficiency. This government should lose no time in making a careful survey of agricultural conditions. Nobody knows what their policy is; in fact, they scarcely know from one day to the next what it is going to be. One day it is a bonus on something of which we now have too much; another day it is a bonus for acreage on which less is going to be produced; all this, in an endeavour to get away from that vicious word "protection." Yet they grant subsidies up to $60,000,000—which I submit is a more vicious policy than the protection applied to any industry in Canada. At the same time they remove the excise tax on products coming into this country, although they need revenue very badly. I am amazed that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has stood for that. On his right he has the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), paying $60,000,000 for the production of something which we cannot now sell. On his left he has the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), waiting to spend $100,000,000 for election purposes, and on his own desk he can read where he is going to have what will probably be a huge deficit. He will surrender twelve to eighteen million dollars of revenue by the removal of the excise tax, and at the same time watch the Minister of Public Works throw twelve million dollars into a sink-hole in Montreal for a terminal which is not required.

I am satisfied that when we have national planning based on a national survey, agricultural development will follow. We have watched the progress of the United States during the last few years.

I believe that in 1933 we imported a small quantity of palm oil, about 287,000 pounds. But after it was found that it could be made more edible, imports increased until in 1938 we brought in over 70,000,000 pounds of that product. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) has pointed out what has been its practical effect on the live stock producers of this country. Mr. J. S. McLean, of Canada Packers, Limited, has stated that it did not mean very much to those of us who are engaged in farming. He said it represented only twenty cents per hundredweight on cattle and thirty-three cents per hundredweight on hogs. Well, on our present production that would mean $8,800,000 a year. I submit that even those who are engaged in other enterprises will agree that an additional income of nearly $9,000,000 would stimulate production in other lines of business. There are many farmers throughout our districts who would spend a little more if they had a little more to spend. I know of many farmers' wives who could do with a new suit this spring; many of whom have not bought one since this government came into power. I know many of our people who would buy new equipment if they could get a share of that $9,000,000. It would certainly mean something to the general business activity of this country.

Mr. LANDERYOU: How about the Bennett buggy?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Well, even the Bennett buggy is better than to have to walk, as many people have had to do during the past two or three years. I wish to point out that such an increase in the value of what we produce has an effect on the value of farmers' holdings. When it is remembered that we have about eight and a half million cattle and three and a half million swine, it will be realized that this would mean a difference of about $23,000,000 in the value of our farm holdings. To-day $23,000,000 would mean a great deal to industry, in its effect upon farm values, especially in view of the fact that many farmers cannot borrow from the bank, even though the roofs of their barns are falling in. All one needs to do is to ride across this country in an automobile or look out of a train window in order to see, on almost every mile or two of road, farm buildings which need repair. In some places new roofs are required; in others new fences could well be built. Everywhere one can see possibilities for a general stimulation of industrial activity if the purchasing power of our farmers was increased.

The matter I have raised affects not only the present and temporary income of our farmers and the national prosperity of Canada in this year 1939; but it increases the threatened development of a lopsided agriculture policy, which places dependence, on the one hand, upon one type of export, and on the other, upon one type of imported foodstuffs, until you not only threaten the consumer by imperiling access to his foodstuffs in time of war, but threaten the vital prosperity of this dominion. There is not an hon. member within sound of my voice, no matter how much he has depended in the past upon grain growing, but will agree with me that such a situation is rapidly approaching. I quite admit that it may not come this year.

I do not say that the condition of those farms in western Canada which blew away from underneath the farmers' feet was caused entirely by this lopsided type of development, and I realize that prophecies are dangerous. But it is necessary only to read history to recognize that if that type of policy is persisted in, the grain grower who all down the years has depended upon wheat and wheat alone will find his farm again blowing away underneath his feet. The soil fertility of this dominion lies at the very basis of agricultural prosperity, and agricultural prosperity is the root of a sound national economy. We have gone on too long with this precarious type of economy, this haphazard type of policy, with little regard for the fertility of the mother soil itself. We are a young country with a history of only a few hundred years, but it is high time we planned a little for the future. In some districts the land is drying up, yet little action is taken towards water conservation or reforestation. We have seen the results of an agricultural policy which robs the soil and gives little back. And so long as this government admits each year fifty steamships, each carrying a train load of vegetable oil, most of it competing directly with live stock products in Canada, it is dealing an annual blow at a basic feature of Canadian prosperity, namely the live stock industry. It is the duty of the government to pause and turn its eyes to eastern Canada; to your old province, Mr. Speaker, and to mine. Rather than fix its attention only on vacant prairie lands with the idea of growing more wheat, let it try to work out ways and means and schemes by which those vast and fertile prairies may be safeguarded for the years that are to come.

These are some of the fundamentals upon which sound agriculture depends. The chief problem before Canada is the improvement of the conditions of her people. Our friends in the tropical areas do not even need to wear clothes, at least very few of them; and in their bare feet they can climb the trees and shake down the coconuts and have the oil run into huge pipe lines on steamers, loading very rapidly. A steamer will unload at Montreal and fifty tank carloads can be taken across the country. This is the condition which our farmers have to face—those farmers in your province, Mr. Speaker, in my province and in western Canada. Our Canadian farmers are trying to build up a system of intensified agriculture. They are putting up costly buildings on $5,000 farms. They have large herds of dairy cows worth, if they are good, $100 apiece. Those cows are producing 3½ per cent butter fat. But our friends in the tropical areas are shaking down coconuts which will produce 40 and 50 per cent butter fat. This is a problem which threatens the very life of Canadian agriculture.

We hear a great deal about unemployment, and we also hear about the theoretical employment policies of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). We have heard fine speeches from him, carefully worded phrases. We read them over and over again in the hope of finding something, but nothing is so barren, so far as any solution is concerned, as the fine theoretical speeches of the hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Rogers).

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I say that the time has come for us to give encouragement to any line of industry which will produce employment. Is there any line of endeavour which will give more employment than diversified farming? You may get machinery that will take the place of men in various branches of industry, but machinery does not handle the fork in the stable or milk dairy cows successfully, or look after hogs, sheep and cattle. The line of industry that offers the greatest opportunity for increased employment and for home-building in Canada is mixed farming with live stock as its basis, and I ask the government to consider seriously its assistance and to endeavour to find a solution for the problem with which we are faced.

Hon. CHARLES A DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I do not intend to speak at any length on the subject introduced this afternoon by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn), in connection with which we have just listened to an admirable stump speech from the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), which is always enjoyable—

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I do not like the "stump" part of it so well. You are pretty good at that yourself.

Mr. DUNNING: —except to say that it is a great pity the government which my hon. friend the member for Dufferin-Simcoe supported in 1932 did not have the benefit of the views which he has expressed to-day with respect to vegetable oils, because vegetable oils enter Canada to-day, and have done so ever since 1932, free of duty from those tropical areas from which they are garnered by the naked inhabitants to whom the hon. member has referred. And they so enter because of that very empire agreement made in 1932 to which he eloquently referred. That is all I wish to say in respect to my hon. friend's political references. There are many others who I know would desire to repay him in kind in that connection.

Vegetable oil is a problem—leave politics out of it altogether. It is a problem; there is no doubt about it. It has been before us now for some two years, and as hon. members know, a reference has been made to the tariff board in connection with the matter. Hearings were held, complicated as always by the fact that free entry, as I have said, was guaranteed under the preference created in virtue of the British empire agreements of 1932.

Mr. STEVENS: Free entry from where?

Mr. DUNNING: From British countries.

Mr. STEVENS: Not from the United States.

Mr. DUNNING: No. Something like eighty per cent of our total imports comes from British countries. At any rate, we do not face the problem unless we take into consideration the fact that the great bulk of our imports is from the United Kingdom and British colonies. I have here the figures showing our imports:

From—	Pounds
United Kingdom	75,000,000
Straits Settlements	40,250,000
Ceylon	35,500,000
China	26,500,000
Nigeria	15,000,000
United States	30,000,000

The item from China would not be affected by the British agreements of 1932. A small proportion of the whole comes from the United States. However that may be, everyone who is looking at the problem in the manner in which my hon. friend the member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), who has presented it on former occasions, looks at it, recognizes that it is a very difficult one to deal with tariffwise, as indeed the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe acknowledged.

I am advised by the tariff board that they have continuously kept up their studies of the matter. The only criticism I have of the hon. member for Haldimand is that he intimated that possibly I had discouraged the board in its efforts because I was not particularly anxious to have a solution of the question. Apart from the public grounds which should actuate a Minister of Finance, I ask, even on low political grounds, whether any hon. member thinks for a moment that I wish to give hon. gentlemen opposite another New Zealand butter issue just prior to an election. Even on low political grounds I would naturally be anxious to have a solution if one is possible. But on broader economic grounds, from the time the matter was first referred, I have been very anxious that the inquiry should be completed and a constructive report be in my hands as soon as possible. The board advise me that this inquiry has been one of the most involved technically that they have ever had to make. I am also advised, as I intimated to the hon. member for Danforth the other day, that I may expect the report in time for any action which the government may decide to take at this session of parliament. I have made inquiries since the regretted death of the chairman of the board as to whether the board's material in connection with the reference has advanced to such a stage that I may rely upon its being available for this session. I am advised that it will, and that being the case, I do not propose to debate the matter further at this stage.

I am satisfied that a careful, thorough and painstaking inquiry into a highly involved matter has been made, and I shall have to take the responsibility of advising the government as to what course should be followed when the report is in my hands, which I hope will be before very long.

Mr. T. A. THOMPSON (Lanark): I have listened with a great deal of interest to the addresses by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) and the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). They have made a fine presentation of a serious situation that confronts the dairymen of Canada at the present time. For several sessions I have called the attention of parliament to the great handicap that the dairymen and live stock men in Canada are labouring under by reason of a product made from vegetable oils imported from tropical countries, and also owing to the reduction in the tariff on butter. These two factors have contributed to the present depressed price of butter. Last year, 1938, we brought into Canada 5,500,000 pounds of butter. That came into a country which is producing more butter than it can consume. On January 1, 1939, we had almost 44,000,000 pounds of butter in cold storage, or 16,000,000 pounds more than the quantity in storage on January 1, 1938.

In Canada we manufacture some of the finest cheese sold on the British market, but our butter has not been looked upon very favourably there; in fact, it takes only fourth or fifth place. It is highly important that the farmers and dairymen of Canada should export their surplus milk in the form of cheese, and never attempt to make butter for export. Briefly, the reason is that we are competing with a country where the cattle graze outdoors the year round, where large herds are kept, where they can support a cow on every acre, not like the farms that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was telling us about last night where it takes fifty acres to graze one animal. They milk twice a day and send the milk to large factories where it is made scientifically and uniformly into butter, grass butter, the year round; whereas in Canada we have to stable our cattle for six or seven months of the year and provide fodder for them. Here also we have only small factories, and the practice is to collect the cream two or three times a week. The cream comes into the factory in all states of acidity, so that it is difficult to make butter from it to compete with that of New Zealand. The butter we make in Canada is very good if it is used within a few weeks after it is made, but put it in cold storage for three months and it is rancid. New Zealand butter stored for three months is as sweet as the day it was made. Therefore it is impossible for us to compete with that country in butter.

The value of the dairy products made in Canada in the past ten years exceeded by many thousands of dollars the entire value of our wheat production; yet in this house we hear nothing but wheat, wheat. We vote millions of dollars every year to buy seed wheat; we peg the price for wheat, and last night we heard in this house of a scheme—which is no new scheme; it has been going on for some time—to irrigate land where it requires fifty acres to graze one animal, in order to try to grow wheat on it, a product that is already a drug on the market. Why are we bolstering up wheat all the time? Moreover, wheat is grown to any great extent, in only three provinces, namely, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, while dairy farming is practised in every province. Dairying is far more important than wheat growing. The weekly cream cheque that came to farmers in the western provinces during the years when their crops were short kept hundreds of them off relief. Yet these very farmers, with scarcely any other income, were competing with butter made in a country like New Zealand, and shortenings made from vegetable oils imported from tropical countries.

The consumption of wheat in Canada is not very large. If we take the last three years, the average was four bushels per capita. If we take the average price for three years, this means that we spent annually $32,000,000 on wheat. But the amount spent annually in the past three years for meat and dairy products was $275,000,000. The per capita consumption of farm products annually for the past three years was sixty-four pounds of beef, sixty-five pounds of pork, six pounds of mutton, thirty-one pounds of butter, three and a half pounds of cheese and four bushels of wheat. Of milk and dairy products we consume 647 pounds per capita a year.

We have in Canada 750,000 farmers, the great majority of whom are either dairymen or producers of live stock. These farmers ask to be given the same measure of protection that is given to the dairymen in the republic to the south of us. Canada to-day can produce all the butter and all the animal fats that we can consume in this country. A few years ago this government in their wisdom prohibited the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in Canada. That was a great boon to the dairy farmers; it was a good law. But to-day we are faced with a far greater menace than oleomargarine ever was, a product made from these cheap vegetable oils imported free into Canada from tropical countries. In 1933 the entire importation of vegetable oils of all classes was 91,000,000 pounds. By 1938 that had increased to 255,000,000 pounds.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) stated a moment ago that the late government had taken no action in this matter. I point out to him that this menace had not in those years reached the proportions that it has to-day. In 1933, 67,000,000 pounds of shortening manufactured from vegetable oils were sold in Canada. But by 1938 that had increased to 120,000,000 pounds. And just as the sale of shortenings made from vegetable oils increased, so the sale of shortenings made from animal fats decreased.

These oils come from tropical countries, and are marked "not for food." But after they come into this country they are processed by a few of our large combines that are making immense wealth out of the sale of this product. The better part of the oil is manufactured into shortening and put on the shelves of every grocery store in the country, coming in direct competition with our butter and lard. The residue is sent to our soap factories, where it again comes in competition with animal fats from our abattoirs. In 1936 the government of the United States placed against these vegetable oils duties which totaled about six cents a pound on oils other than crude, 4½ cents a pound on crude oils and 3½ cents a pound on tallow. Before that duty was imposed, we had a market for tallow in Chicago, but ever since that time our tallow has sold in Toronto for just 3½ cents less than the Chicago price. In 1935 the price of tallow in both Toronto and Chicago was nine cents a pound; there was no duty, and the price just leveled up. Since then, however, it has been unprofitable to ship our fats to the United States.

We do not want to prohibit entirely the importation of vegetable oils. That is not the idea. We do want a tariff or restriction or processing tax placed upon it, so that prices of butter and lard may not be unduly depressed. I realize that a great deal of the oil brought in is used for medicinal purposes, for canning fish and in certain lines of manufacture. With this we have no quarrel. I am a protectionist; I believe in the principle of protection, because in the world to-day, when every country is protecting its own interests, it is foolish to talk about anything else. It is a question of regulating that protection so that it will not unjustly benefit or unjustly harm any individual or any part of the country. I am in favour of protection for the farmer. I believe the farmers are just as much entitled to protection as are our industrialists, and further I say that agriculture and industry are not enemies. They are partners in this country, and they must work together. When you create employment you create markets for agricultural products. If the men and women engaged in industry have steady employment at good wages they do not care whether they pay twenty or thirty cents a pound for butter; but to-day, with our people out of work or working only two or three days a week, butter is extremely dear at twenty cents a pound. Give our people employment; keep our industries going and you will create markets for our agriculturists. Not long ago I noticed a statement by the manager of one of our large packing houses, an organization engaged in the importation of this oil and making immense profits out of it, a gentleman who knew whereof he spoke. He said he was confident that the sale of shortening and soaps produced from vegetable oils reduced the price of every hog in Canada by $1, of every steer by $2, and of the production of every dairy cow by $2. When that was figured up, it came to something between $8,000,000 and $10,000,000 that the farmers of this country were losing in this way.

It takes a farmer six months to raise a 200 pound hog. In the first place there must be careful breeding and in the second place careful feeding to produce a 200 pound hog in that time. It can be done and is done, but the man who does it must know his business. That hog will produce only fifteen pounds of lard. It takes three years to produce a steer weighing 1,100 pounds, which will produce fifty pounds of edible tallow. But out of 100 pounds of palm olive kernels, forty-five pounds of oil can be produced at very little cost. Let us be sensible about these matters. There is no use in talking free trade, protection or anything else. Let us talk business. Is it fair that these people should be permitted to come to this cold country, where we require so much food, so much fuel and so much clothing, and where we are proud of the fact that the standard of living is so high, and to compete with us on these terms? In the United States they have protected their farmers, and those who read journals coming from that country will be aware that an agitation is being carried on by the organized farmers to have the protection increased against the importation of vegetable oils.

A moment ago the Minister of Finance said the whole matter of vegetable oils had been referred to the tariff board and that the government was awaiting the decision of that board. To my knowledge this question of vegetable oils was referred to the tariff board on December 10, 1936, and now we are at the end of March, 1939. If it takes the tariff board two years and four months to reach a decision on an important matter of this kind, while the farmers are labouring under such a disadvantage, there must be something wrong with the tariff board. Surely we should have a report in less than that length of time.

This is a matter of vital importance. I am not trying to make political capital out of it; I am speaking in the interests of the farming community to which I belong, and to which my family have belonged for four generations. I am speaking on a question that I understand. I know the requirements of the farmers of this country; I have been engaged in farming and have been connected with farmers' organizations practically all my life. This question is above politics; it is above partyism. It is a matter we are bringing up in justice to our agriculturists, in order that those engaged in dairying may be placed upon a safe foundation.

I was going to mention another matter on which I have a note here; but it might be thought I was trying to make some political capital out of it, so I will leave it out. It had to do with the duty imposed on our cattle going into the United States. We pay practically $15 a head under the quota, and when we have used up our quota we pay $30 a head. I am referring to the average steer weighing 1,000 pounds. Then we permit the free importation of 30,000 head of cattle from the United States and the Argentine in tin cans. That is what the farmer of to-day has to consider. If we are going to live in a country where protection is necessary, our agriculturists should get their fair share of that protection.

While the importation of butter into this country and the sales of shortening have depressed the price of butter to a considerable degree, there is something else which is of vital interest. I refer to the under-consumption of butter through so many of our people being on relief or perhaps working only one or two days a week. These people are not able to consume the butter they would consume if they had steady employment at good wages. That factor enters into the problem.

The one thing we need more than anything else in this country is confidence. Our people seem to be afraid. Capital is running to cover. People are putting their money into government bonds which pay two or three per cent, or they let it lie in the banks at 1½ per cent. What are they afraid of? Most of them will say they are afraid of taxation. They do not want to invest in land or in the building of a home. To-day the price of agricultural land is fifty per cent of what it was ten or twelve years ago. You cannot build a home in any town or city in Canada and sell it for what it costs you to build. You cannot rent it and make a profit after paying taxes. There is sufficient money lying in our banks to build all the homes required, provided they could be built at a profit. The government would not need to go into the building business.

I have nothing further to say, except that I plead with the government. The Minister of Finance has left his seat; but the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who I know is just as deeply interested in this question as I am, is here, and I trust he will use his influence to see that the great farming class to which he belongs gets a square deal so far as the dairy industry is concerned.

Mr. WILLIAM HAYHURST (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. gentlemen who have spoken this afternoon, and I feel I would be negligent in my duty if I did not say a few words on this subject.

Last year I received about a thousand communications from farmers in western Canada demanding that some tariff be placed upon vegetable oils. Some of the hon. members of the Conservative party are not exactly consistent. They do not seem to realize that western Canada is a large country and that the part I come from is just as vitally interested in the dairy industry as is Lanark or Dufferin-Simcoe. There are areas in western Canada which produce tremendous quantities of dairy products, and I believe at lower costs of production than apply in the east. If we all went into the business we might run these men out of business. I ask hon. members to be just in their reasoning and not attack the wheat problem when they are asking for a just price for dairy products. When we ask for 80 cents a bushel—

Mr. THOMPSON: We are not attacking it.

Mr. HAYHURST: When we ask for 80 cents a bushel, which we hope the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will give us—

Mr. HOMUTH: Has the hon. member heard any member of this group suggest at any time that the western wheat grower should not have protection?

Mr. HAYHURST: Just to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HAYHURST: We have heard it on several occasions from the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). This afternoon the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) was attacking the wheat situation. He stated that the eastern people are going to be taxed because of wheat.

Mr. THOMPSON: I said nothing about a tax on the eastern people.

Mr. HAYHURST: He said that wheat was a drug on the market and we should not produce any more.

Mr. THOMPSON: Certainly it is.

Mr. HAYHURST: What kind of argument is it when the hon. member says that butter is a drug on the market also? I say everything is a drug on the market. You have to use your judgment. It is necessary to be sure of your statements. The Minister of Finance has stated that this is a technical and highly involved matter, one difficult of solution. We believe we have a solution, but very few people want to use the solution which we have advocated in this house in connection with other matters and which would apply in the same manner to this.

The hon. member for Lanark referred to sixty acres to a cow. Evidently he does not realize that with his rehabilitation bill the Minister of Agriculture is attempting to do something to relieve the situation in the dried-out areas of western Canada. If the hon. member would travel through western Canada he would see large areas where it is necessary to have sixty acres per cow. If he comes into my district he will find that that is not necessary. I was talking to a man who lives on the plains not far from Regina and who was hauling his water five miles. I asked him why he did that, why he did not drill a well, and he told me he would have to go just as far in drilling the well. There are parts of western Canada which have had very little rainfall, but they are not like those areas in northern Ontario which are all rock and stone and lake and woodland.

Mr. MANION: We have some good farm land in northern Ontario.

Mr. HAYHURST: There is some good land there, but I am talking about the bad land. It is the same in western Canada. We have a lot of good land there. It is this land that the Minister of Agriculture is dealing with in his rehabilitation program. There are large areas in western Canada which could support many cows if there was sufficient rain.

Mr. HOMUTH: The Minister of Agriculture will give you the rain.

Mr. HAYHURST: We hear hon. members referring to different classes of goods as being a drug on the market, or every class of goods being a drug on the market. In England they have a new minister of agriculture who believes in a certain amount of economic nationalism.

Mr. HOMUTH: We will have a new one here.

Mr. HAYHURST: We will probably have a new one here unless something is done this year.

Mr. MacNICOL: No hope for that.

Mr. HAYHURST: What do they say in England on this subject? They say that the advantage to the nation of a prosperous agriculture is worth paying for. It is worth subsidizing these dairy farmers and wheat farmers. In the growth of industrialism sweated industries were closed down because of evils involved and now we all should realize that a poorly paid agriculture, with its inevitable consequences of drift from the land and inefficient use of natural resources, is bad for the community. As a matter of fact, I think every hon. member realizes that the farm is the backbone of the nation.

I did not come prepared to speak on this subject this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, but after hearing some of the arguments made by some hon. members which the Minister of Finance said were fallacious, and he applied the same term to an argument I used, I felt I had to say a word or two.

The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) quoted some figures on beef, tallow and so forth. This is a subject which has been investigated, and it has been found that if a duty of 3½ to 4½ cents per pound were put on vegetable oils it would mean an increase of $2 a head in the value of every cow and $1 for every hog raised. Now if that applies to eastern Canada it applies still more to western Canada, because there we have not very many soap factories and most of our tallow has to come east. The consequence is that tallow in the west is practically valueless and has to be destroyed, but if the tariff suggested were put on vegetable oils it would probably mean more than $2 a head increase for our cattle and $1 a head increase for our hogs.

As I said, I have received a large number of resolutions, and last year I put one on Hansard. I do not need to read it again. In 1936 over 200 million pounds of vegetable oils were imported into Canada, chiefly from tropical countries. I have here over half a dozen resolutions which show that our dairymen in western Canada are vitally interested in this subject. I have addressed several meetings, and at the last one I addressed, in Edmonton in December, before coming down here I was presented with five resolutions by dairymen asking that something be done about butter. I suggested that the best thing would be a tax on vegetable oils. The importations of vegetable oils have been increasing year after year, leading to the substitution of cheap foreign vegetable oils for our Canadian-produced animal fats, and this has become a serious menace to our 750,000 farmers in Canada.

I think that is all I need say at this time because the Minister of Finance has said that the tariff board is investigating the question and he will make a statement to the house later. We shall be pleased to hear a constructive statement on the subject which will indicate that some of the troubles of our dairy farmers are to be removed.

Mr. C. B. HOWARD (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I could hardly resist making a few remarks after listening to the speeches that were delivered by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) and the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). The hon. member for Haldimand stated that the reduction on cream separators entering Canada was a small one, but I consider a fifty per cent reduction a pretty good reduction, and if the hon. member thinks that a small one I wonder what he would consider a real reduction.

But the main reason for my rising is because of past circumstances surrounding the two hon. members that I have mentioned. Just prior to the election in 1930 the hon. member for Haldimand, representing the cattle industry, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, representing agriculture, and another gentleman who is now out of his seat, toured the eastern townships of Quebec telling the farmers in that section of the country what they were going to do about the butter situation if they got into power in 1930. The farmers in the eastern townships listened to them—there is no doubt about that—but I want to tell those three gentlemen that I hope they will make a similar trip before next election. I will not say that they would be chased out because we do not treat visitors that way in our part of the country, but our farmers certainly do not forget what happened to butter between 1930 and 1935. Dairy butter in 1932 went down to 14½ cents a pound in Montreal instead of going up, as these gentlemen predicted, to 40 cents a pound, and creamery butter went down to 16½ cents a pound against the price they predicted. The consequence was that the farmers of the eastern townships of the province of Quebec decided that either these three gentlemen did not know what they were talking about or else they fooled the people completely.

I should like now to make a few suggestions to the government which I am supporting. Talking to one of the largest industrialists in Canada in his own office the other day I questioned him as to how certain reductions that were made in the tariff on the products of his own manufacture would affect him. I put the question to the house as I put it to him, without bias and free from political consideration. I asked him, "Does the reduction in the tariff affect your industry and if so, do you think it will hurt you very much?" He replied, "We have not said one single word in criticism of the reductions on our manufactured products, because I believe that the general prosperity that will be created throughout Canada by the trade agreement will so increase the purchasing power of the Canadian people that we shall be able to sell more manufactured goods to the Canadian consumer."

Mr. LOCKHART: Would the hon. gentleman mind telling what industry that was?

Mr. HOWARD: I stated one of our largest industries. It was one of our textile industries. But as to giving the name, after fifteen years' experience in this parliament I am not giving information that might be used to the detriment of any of our manufacturers.

Mr. LOCKHART: All I asked for was the nature of the industry.

Mr. HOWARD: I think that what has happened in the eastern townships is a fair indication of what has happened in Canada generally. Before the price of butter fat in the United States dropped, due to depressed conditions, we were shipping gallons and gallons of cream into the United States market over a tariff of 56½ cents, but when the price of butter fat there dropped we had to discontinue our cream shipments from the eastern townships and immediately that cream went into butter, and the production of butter increased until our market was glutted. But in the new trade treaty this government has secured a reduction of the duty to 28½ cents—another small reduction of fifty per cent, as the hon. member for Haldimand would call it—on our cream going into the United States. With the increase in prosperity in this country within the next twelve months we shall again be shipping cream not only into the New England states but into all the territory bordering on Canada, with a consequent decrease in the amount of milk and cream going into butter production, and that will mean an increase in the price of butter.

Another situation. As a result, as was said by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson), of a lack of confidence generally not only among Canadians in all classes of life but also among the people of the United States, we have run into a condition of slackness in industry. Although out of a population of 32,000 in Sherbrooke we have in excess of 6,000 to-day drawing their weekly pay envelope from Sherbrooke manufacturers, there are still 800 people on municipal relief. Although those people on relief are prevented from starving, each of them draws but two days' pay per week, which means $5.60 to support a family of five, including two grown-up people. I ask hon. members if there is any purchasing power in that sort of thing.

Mr. BROWN: Whose fault is it?

Mr. HOWARD: Naturally they cannot purchase butter. That is barred from their tables, so naturally the consumption has diminished in that section. Let me give a couple of suggestions before I say what I wanted to say from a political standpoint.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: We are not hypocrites.

Mr. HOWARD: I will not quote from Hansard because I want to give another hon. member a few minutes to speak; but consider the situation as I see it. I suggest to the government the following as extraordinary measures. I want to say, what I think has not been said, that manufacturing industry and agriculture must go hand in hand. We want to benefit agriculture, but my proposal at the same time will indirectly benefit the manufacturing industry, and we cannot segregate the two. My suggestion is for temporary legislation. In spite of the fact that the hon. member who has just spoken and most of the other hon. members opposite were in this house from 1930 to 1935 and did not impose duties against vegetable oils; in spite of the fact that they were a high tariff party, and went through their five years without remedial action on this line, and went out of power, I recognize that we have now been three years in power, and I suggest to the government that they apply a processing tax against vegetable oils of say three cents a pound.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Make it five.

Mr. HOWARD: I do not know whether they will accept my suggestion, but I hope they will.

Another suggestion I would make is this, with a view of controlling the flow of the milk supply so that no more milk will go into butter than is required for home consumption of butter, allowing for some increased consumption following greater prosperity in this country in the next twelve months. Let us throw the remainder of that milk supply into cheese, for which we always have a market. I suggest that the government put a premium of say two cents a pound on class A cheese, and that they set up a milk control board with an administrative head in the Department of Agriculture—there is no need of going outside the department, which has the machinery to take care of it—with a representative possibly from each province, and so try to regulate the milk flow in order that we may have butter for home consumption only.

Just one word on the New Zealand and Australian situation. Remember that from 1930 to 1935 the butter situation as regards New Zealand was never definitely arranged, but while the present government has been in power we have been getting imports of butter only when the price last winter rose to 41 cents a pound.

Mr. McGREGOR: There were 5,000,000 pounds.

Mr. HOWARD: I think that is the highest price which butter has reached in the past ten years. After all, when a Liberal government can do that, it is not a bad record so far as this side of the house is concerned.

Mr. McGREGOR: Pretty good—for a Liberal government.

Mr. HOWARD: May I say that, after hearing the reference this afternoon to boat loads of vegetable oils which have come in, I wondered whether the speaker had in mind "Rowe-boats" or ships.

Mr. HOMUTH: Ships of state.

Mr. HOWARD: It looks to me as though the slippery policy of 1930 was being trotted out again for the next election.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The hon. member's party slipped out on that one, with five times less pounds.

Mr. HOWARD: I just want to say that the policy which has been advocated this afternoon from the Conservative benches is one which we do not want and which the Canadian people do not want, and this Conservative piece of "oleo-aginous" hypocrisy will not go down with the Canadian consumers.

Mr. G. E. WOOD (Brant): I should like to make some observations at this time, although I regret having to take up time which the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) was going to occupy. Probably he was going to draw our attention to some of the very fine ladies of Toronto who just a year ago were parading in persian lamb coats on Yonge street, protesting against a price of forty cents a pound for butter. Nevertheless I will not take too long. Maybe that was not to be in his speech, but I am sure he would want to mention it, so I thought I would do it for him.

I appreciate the remarks of my good neighbour the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn), and also the magnificent way in which the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) presented his case. I admit that it is rather difficult for me, as just one of the ordinary farmers, to endeavour to answer or to compete in oratory with men of experience such as those to whom I intend to reply. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) boasted of having four generations of farmers behind him. I want to say for his information that I cannot name the number of generations of agriculturists behind me, because so far as I know they always have been agriculturists. They wandered over the hills of bonnie Scotland with their herds of sheep, and I am led to believe that some of them had an income of only twenty-five dollars a year.

Mr. THOMPSON: Whose sheep were they getting away with?

Mr. WOOD: One thing I have observed is that if a man has a suspicious attitude of mind it is generally because he is guilty of the sort of thing he suspects.

Mr. MANION: That is why the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) accused us of playing politics.

Mr. WOOD: Well, I have not been in politics long enough to know, so I will leave the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) to discuss that. But I marvel at the attitude of the hon. members for Haldimand and Dufferin-Simcoe, who were waxing eloquent in regard to doing something for the farmer. I wonder whether, from the years 1930 to 1935, when they had the opportunity to do something, they were really sympathizing with us very much. I myself sold pork at $3.25 and wheat at 42 cents a bushel in 1932.

Mr. HOMUTH: What did you get for pork in 1935?

Mr. WOOD: I am sorry I cannot give that figure now. I will give certain figures later on if the hon. member will contain himself.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): He can't.

Mr. WOOD: The price of butter was much lower than it is now. In spite of all the difficulties we are up against to-day with the importation of vegetable oils, the price of butter fat in 1938 was higher than it has ever been since the Liberal government was last in office in 1930.

Mr. HOMUTH: What is it now?

Mr. WOOD: The average price of butter fat has been:

	Cents
1931	24
1932	20
1933	21
1934	22·3
1935	22·9
1936	23·7
1937	26·6
1938	27

Mr. HOMUTH: What is it now?

Mr. WOOD: We have to go back to 1934 to get anything comparable.

Mr. HOMUTH: Will the hon. member give the figures for pork?

Mr. WOOD: I am sorry I cannot. The hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) has had a greater experience than I have had in parliamentary procedure, and I wish he would not put me off the track. I hope I shall never have as varied an experience as he has had in different schools of thought.

Mr. HOMUTH: You will not be in long enough.

Mr. WOOD: Well, if I cannot be here I do not want to be anywhere else. In spite of the fact that we are importing a great quantity of oils, and our friends are very much concerned about the state of affairs among farmers—and I do not think that the farmer is getting a fair share of the national income—I believe an effort has been made by this government, which has not been paralleled by any other government, to do something to get a fair share of that income for the farmer. That has been characteristic of this government. If you go through the records you will find that when the index price of farm products is equal to that of manufactured goods, there is general prosperity. In 1937, and up until the middle of 1938, the prices of farm products were comparable to those of manufactured goods, but since then there has been a decline, and that may be responsible to some extent for the increase in unemployment.

I would draw the attention of the house, however, to some of the records given in the Canada Year Book. I refer particularly to income tax collections. Of course, it is generally conceded that the farmers do not pay income tax; they never have enough money to pay any; nevertheless, 414 farmers paid income tax in 1935, and 921 in 1937. I will not give the whole list, but I will take the next largest group, that of employees, representing the working class. In 1935 there were 149,000 who paid income tax, and in 1937, 174,000. That shows at any rate that some progress has been made in the direction of distributing the national income in such a way as to give a little larger income to those in that category.

Mr. LAWSON: What years did the hon. member give?

Mr. WOOD: I took the years 1935 and 1937. Notwithstanding all that has been said about the difficulties of the farmers, I was very happy to hear the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) say that a solution of the great problem was a back-to-the-land movement. I heartily endorse that suggestion. I believe that if sixty per cent of the people were on the land and forty per cent were in the cities, we would not have the present problem to the same extent. But owing to the system under which we operate, there has been a magnetic influence drawing boys from the farm, and it is not the boys who have come from the farms that go to the offices for relief—they all have jobs. They have displaced, however, many who ordinarily would have the work they are doing.

In spite of the unfortunate condition of affairs among our farmers, as depicted to us, and the fact that they are not receiving a large enough share of the national income, I would point out that seventy-five per cent of the people on the farms own their own homes, whereas in a larger city there is a smaller percentage of home owners. In cities of 30,000 and over, only forty-five per cent of the people own their own homes; in towns of 5,000, fifty-eight per cent; and in towns of less than 1,000, seventy-one per cent; while, as I say, seventy-five per cent of the people in the rural districts are home owners.

The hon. member for Haldimand and the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe waxed eloquent in advocating that something be done by this government for the farmers. May I point out for their information that in 1934 the total number of commercial failures in Canada was 1,690 as compared with 952 in 1937. I point out some of these facts because I know that industry cannot prosper unless our farmers are prosperous; and I have no doubt that the condition of the farmers would have been a great deal worse had there not been a change of government in 1935.

Reference has been made to the competition of our farmers with New Zealand in regard to butter. If you take the record of importations of New Zealand butter you will find that, as the hon. member for Sherbrooke pointed out, at the time we were importing butter, the price was far in excess of the ability of the average person to pay. I do not think that hon. members will agree with me, but I believe that if the price had not been allowed to reach the high figure that it did, which had the effect of stimulating butter production, with the result that more milk went into the production of butter owing to that excessive price, we would not have had the trouble we have to-day. Unfortunately a great deal of milk which should have gone into the production of cheese went into the production of butter. That was brought about by the high price of butter. The only regret I have is that the lady friends of the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) did not get out on the streets a month or two earlier and boycott butter before the price got so high; I believe that would have put dollars and dollars more into the pockets of the Canadian farmer to-day.

I am sorry I did not have an opportunity to prepare a speech like the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn), who presented some valuable information to the house. He placed upon record many interesting figures, as he always does.

Mr. DUNNING: But examine the figures carefully.

Mr. WOOD: I believe that is good advice. There is such a thing as using figures just enough to get people to believe what you want them to believe.

Unfortunately farmers have never had an affluence of money. I know myself if I want to buy something it generally means a good deal of sacrifice. Those who have been able to succeed as farmers and get their mortgages paid off have generally had to sell the bacon and eat the old sow; we let our cousins in the city eat the corn flakes, while we eat the oatmeal. There are printed in the newspapers many things in connection with the situation on the farms in Canada, and I think it might be wise if we as farmers emphasized some of the good things on the farm, the life and liberty we enjoy; that might operate as an inducement for a back to the land movement. It is a pity if we emphasize all the unfortunate things and do not emphasize some of the better things that farmers have.

Here is something that I overlooked when speaking about New Zealand. I have in my hand a copy of a publication of the commercial intelligence bureau issued by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. This is dated March 1 and gives a resumé of the debts of various countries, including Canada, Australia and New Zealand, and the figures are on the same basis of exchange. The comparable figures show that in Canada we have a per capita debt of 62 pounds 5 shillings, while Australia's debt is 128 pounds per capita and New Zealand's comes to 182 pounds sterling. I draw the attention of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) to the fact that if New Zealand can produce butter as cheaply as he states, their prosperity should be such that they would not have got themselves involved in that amount of debt. It is very difficult for me to believe that if they can produce butter so cheaply in these countries they would be carrying such a load of debt. So, while we may have to stable our cattle, at least we have only one-third of the national obligation to carry that New Zealand has. I discovered the other day in a report furnished by the bureau of statistics that the New Zealander pays $5 per capita yearly for exchange alone on interest on the money he has borrowed on bonds redeemable in London. That is a fair indication that we have many things in Canada to be grateful for in spite of what we are told in the Globe and Mail.

Mr. MacNICOL: That $5 is on how much money?

Mr. WOOD: It was $5 per capita for exchange. They paid 1,593,536 pounds sterling for exchange alone on the interest payable in London on the fifty-six per cent of their debt which is payable there.

As I said, I did not have an opportunity to go into this question as thoroughly as I should have liked.

Mr. HOMUTH: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HOMUTH: What we are concerned about in this discussion is to know whether the hon. member is in favour of the importation of vegetable oils or against it.

Mr. WOOD: I was just coming to that. I advised the hon. member that if he would contain himself I would probably satisfy him. The question of the importation of vegetable oils, as the Minister of Finance pointed out, is a very difficult one. In spite of the fact that I live on the farm, I do not hesitate to tell the house that I still live in the old-fashioned way; we kill our own pork, and to-day my wife has two or three crocks of lard, but in spite of that she buys domestic shortening because she is a good cook. She buys that domestic shortening because it fills a need. The average good housewife is very proud to put a good meal on the table for her husband, and housewives find that domestic shortening fills the need in a way that butter or lard do not. Some hon. members may look on that as a joke, but it is something that comes right into our own homes, because I do not believe our good women are going to be divorced from the use of domestic shortening. That is one of the things I think the Minister of Finance will find when he endeavours to make regulations—

Mr. DUNNING: Have all the women after me?

Mr. LAWSON: You can never divorce good women from anything.

Mr. WOOD: But I believe we are entitled to put a tax on that commodity just as we have a right to tax any commodity for the purpose of revenue. The hon. member for Haldimand was emphasizing the importance of doing something to encourage the production of more agricultural products—

Mr. WALSH: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. WOOD: I know I am making a disjointed speech, because I did not have an opportunity to prepare this, but I should like to have an opportunity of saying what I have in mind, although I admit I am doing it in a rather crude way.

Mr. HOMUTH: The questions would help the hon. member.

Mr. WOOD: It might be a good idea if we as farmers said, let us put an embargo on automobiles and go back to the horse and buggy, because we can grow hay and oats; that would stimulate the production of farm crops. That would be similar in my estimation to the arguments of some hon. members. But we do put a tax on gasoline for certain purposes, because the automobile has made necessary an expenditure on roads which we look to the gasoline tax to defray. I believe we would be just as much entitled to place a tax upon processed vegetable oils for revenue purposes, for no other reason than that I try to carry down here the same philosophy of life that I have applied in my own business. My experience in municipal affairs in the constituency I represent shows me the benefit of the policy of pay as you go. The Liberals have followed that policy practically since confederation. The Liberals are responsible for a very small part of our national debt to-day; much the larger part is a result of the expenditures of Conservative governments. We should not leave for future generations a burden that we had not the courage and back-bone to carry ourselves.

Mr. SENN: The hon. member has been kind enough to refer to me more than once. May I ask him, does he object to this imposition of a tax from the point of view of protection to the dairy farmers of Canada?

Mr. WOOD: To ask a question is so easy; one can ask a question in a few words which would take more time to answer than I have available.

Mr. SENN: I am afraid the hon. member is afraid to answer.

Mr. WOOD: I would rather the hon. member would look to his own doorstep instead of imputing motives to me. I have come to the conclusion that oftentimes freer trade is the best form of protection. Does that answer my hon. friend. The government that he supported in 1933 spent more in that year than the total exports of Canada for the year.

Mr. STEWART: We exported as big a share of the world's trade that year as ever.

Mr. WOOD: No, you did not.

Mr. STEWART: Yes, just as big a share.

Mr. WOOD: To-day Canada stands fourth in world trade; we stood sixth at the time to which my hon. friend refers. In regard to any protection the dairy farmer may obtain as a result of a tax of this kind, if it would relieve him from paying some other tax I believe it would be justified. I believe we should tax the people for services they demand; I do not think we should hand down to future generations obligations which we have not the courage to face ourselves. It may not be a popular thing to do, but the Liberals have done that all along, ever since confederation. They have had enough courage to tax the people sufficiently to meet their expenditures, and I think it will be found that there have been more surpluses under Liberal governments than under Conservative governments. I feel that we should continue to follow that policy, although sometimes it may be unpopular; I believe our first duty is to be Canadian citizens, and our second duty is to be good partisans.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): My purpose in rising, Mr. Speaker, is to bring up to date some observations it was my privilege to make on this same question in 1936. As briefly as possible I should like to put a few facts on record. The most important is one which I believe we all realize, that in this day and age the animal kingdom is being considerably encroached upon by the vegetable kingdom. Canada is in a difficult position in that regard because naturally, on account of climate and occupation, Canada produces a large quantity of animal products.

The first observation I should like to make is that in the last few years the production of vegetable oils and vegetable oil products in Africa, the Straits Settlements, India, China and Manchuria has increased almost ten times. I shall not trouble the house with many figures, but in palm oil alone the increase has been from 268,000,000 pounds in 1920 to 1,000,000,000 pounds in 1937. In like manner importations into Canada have increased since the time this party was in power. When the Empire trade agreements were negotiated, our importations amounted to 90,000,000 pounds, and since then they have increased to 255,000,000 pounds. At the time the Empire trade agreements were negotiated in 1932, these importations did not constitute a very serious factor, because the world price level of these commodities was about ten cents a pound. However, on account of the tremendous increase in production—amounting to fourteen times in the case of palm oil in Sumatra—the price level has dropped from 10·9 cents a pound to less than four cents a pound. Hon. gentlemen opposite say we did nothing about it at that time; but, as the minister knows, we were careful to put section 18 in the empire trade agreements, which provides that any commodity covered by the agreements which interfered with the economy of any country within the empire might be dealt with.

Mr. DUNNING: By consultation.

Mr. HARRIS: And action. Canada's position becomes more pronounced year by year. Our friends in the United States, which is the largest consumer of fats and oils, little by little have applied taxes and tariffs of all types and sorts against imports of oils and fats of all kinds, including fish oils, animal oils and vegetable oils. For example, first they imposed a revenue tax of two cents a pound; then, in addition, a processing tax of 4½ cents a pound in the case of cocoanut oil, which is a very large item. Then they imposed a tax of one cent a pound on palm kernel oil and a processing tax of three cents a pound. Just take palm oil alone. Back in 1932-33, when the empire agreements were negotiated, 287,594 pounds of palm oil came into Canada. In the year which closed on December 31, 1938, however, 70,360,100 pounds were imported. On the other hand, formerly only ten or fifteen per cent of the palm oil production could be used in food products, but now that figure has gone up to fifty-six per cent.

In the minute or two I have left I should like to answer a question asked by the hon. gentleman who said he was in favour of a revenue tax, and to show what has actually happened in the United States. In 1936 the United States imported 2,115,000,000 pounds of vegetable oils. When they put on their tax, it did not have the effect of stopping these importations. The vegetable oils came in just the same, except that there was a reduction of twenty per cent, as the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) has said. Importations last year dropped to 1,647,446,000 pounds. In the meantime the revenue which has poured into the exchequer of the United States as a result of the imposition of these duties amounts to well over $80,000,000 annually since 1936. We are one-tenth or one-eleventh as large as the United States, so it would appear only reasonable to expect that as a result of putting our farmers on the same basis as the United States farmers we would automatically bring to the treasury of Canada at least $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 annually, at a very conservative estimate.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend would permit me to ask a question, just for information, does the United States tax apply to the processing of all oils or only to the edible part? How do they deal with that?

Mr. HARRIS: It applies to all vegetable oils imported into that country. Of course some of these taxes are excise duties; some are processing taxes; but by and large, while some rates run as high as eight and nine cents a pound, the average would be about five cents.

Just before I resume my seat I should like to direct the minister's attention to what is happening at the present time in Washington.

This morning I received an Associated Press dispatch dated February 28, which stated that a movement was on foot, headed by the United States senator from Texas, to have the excise duty of three cents a pound, which was largely responsible for bringing $80,000,000 of revenue to the treasury of the United States, increased to five cents a pound.

The same thing is happening in Australia. Since this matter was last discussed I am informed that the government of Australia has been asked by the Queensland butter board to impose an excise duty sufficient to bring the cost of these butter substitutes up to the best price paid for the finest grade of creamery butter. Here we have two contrasting attitudes: These vegetable oils are brought to Canada in boat-loads—not rowboats but tank steamers—at less than four cents a pound, while in Australia the government is being requested to increase the duty to around nine cents. We want at least a revenue excise tax placed on vegetable oils similar to that which is imposed in the United States.

The only other point I should like to make before I resume my seat is that prior to the United States revenue bill of 1936, as amended by Senator Bailey, Canada enjoyed the full benefit of the largest fat-consuming market in the world, namely the United States. That was automatically cut off when the Bailey amendment went into effect.

Mr. DUNNING: If there are no more speakers, the motion might be carried; if not, it will have to stand over until Monday.

Motion (Mr. Dunning) agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 415.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 23, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

WAR MUNITIONS AND MATERIALS

PETITION FOR EMBARGO AGAINST SHIPMENTS TO JAPAN

Mr. VITAL MALLETTE (Jacques-Cartier): I have received a communication from the Reverend Albert Hinton, pastor of the Lilly Memorial Church, which is the United Church at Pointe Claire, and also of the United Church of Canada, at Beaurepaire, both in the county of Jacques-Cartier, province of Quebec, enclosing a petition praying that the government put into effect an embargo against the shipment of war materials to Japan. I desire to lay this petition before the house.

SUPREME COURT ACT

APPEALS TO PRIVY COUNCIL—REPRINTING OF BILL NO. 9 WITH CERTAIN MODIFICATIONS

On the order for motions:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention a matter which I think will require the unanimous consent of the house. The first clause of the first section of Bill No. 9, to amend the Supreme Court Act, is deemed by the officials of the Department of Justice to be inadequate, as it is now phrased, to cover the suggestions made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) during the discussion on a similar bill at the last session of parliament. I had endeavoured to cover those suggestions, but the officials think that the words I have used are not sufficiently clear and comprehensive. I have consulted with the clerk of the house who is of the opinion that before second reading the bill might be reprinted in due course. I thought I had better mention it to the house and ask leave to have the bill reprinted, with the modifications deemed necessary by the officials of the Department of Justice, in order to bring its items fully, definitely and concisely before the house on the second reading. There are no changes in the explanatory notes.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I am sure there will be no objection to giving unanimous consent to my hon. friend for the reprinting of this bill.

Motion agreed to.

INSURANCE COMPANIES

AMENDMENT OF FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT, 1932, AS TO INVESTMENT OF FUNDS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 53, to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

He said: The amendment is a minor one for the purpose of permitting the classes of investment under this act which by amendment last year were permitted under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AMENDMENT OF CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT, 1932, AS TO INVESTMENT OF FUNDS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 54, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

He said: The same explanation applies to this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

COLLINGWOOD, ONT., HARBOUR

Mr. BARBER:

1. Did the government undertake any work at the Collingwood (Ontario) harbour during 1938?
2. If so, what was the nature of such work?
3. What was the cost of such work?
4. Were tenders called for such work?
5. If so, was the lowest tender accepted?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes.
2. (a) Cleaning of channel and removing loose material; (b) Removal of a very large individual boulder; (c) Sweeping channel.
3. (a) $1,774; (b) $1,200; (c) $564.49.
4. (a) and (b) Yes; (c) Work performed by day labour.
5. (a) and (b) Yes.

*LIFE INSURANCE—MEASURES OF SUPERVISION

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What measures is the government taking to control the high cost of life insurance and of premiums paid by policy holders in view of the rapid strides made in preventative medicine and hygiene, thus increasing the life expectancy; and also in view of the large profits and huge reserves built up by these companies so as to protect the insured and also reduce the great cost of life insurance to the public?
2. What control is there now over investments of life insurance companies in common stocks: (a) in Canada; (b) without Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: This is a question which certainly goes beyond the rules in the nature of the question itself. I would ask for your honour's consideration.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that this question should be dropped, in view of standing order No. 44, which prohibits the making of statements of fact.

Question dropped.

JUDGE BRUNEAU, RICHELIEU, QUE.

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Since what date has Judge Bruneau, of Richelieu, Quebec, been in receipt of a pension?
2. What is the amount paid annually to the said judge?
3. Has the government been informed that the said judge has been living in Paris for many years?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. April 1, 1928.
2. $6,000.
3. Yes—pension cheques cashed in Paris.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

REAL ESTATE MORTGAGES—INTEREST RATES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What action is the government taking with regard to the high interest rates on mortgages on real estate, amounting to usury over a number of years by federal companies and British and foreign companies doing business in Canada?
2. What inspection or control does the government exercise over them: (a) by the Usury Act; (b) the Interest Act; (c) the companies or other federal acts?

Mr. DUNNING: With reference to this question, I am afraid that it infringes in two particulars the rules of the house, in that, in asking a question, it makes statements, and in addition asks for a statement of government policy. If, however, the hon. member will agree to its being passed as an order for return, subject to the reservations I am making, we might endeavour to get such information as is asked for in the second half of the question, although I am not aware of the existence of an act called the usury act. The other acts may be searched in order to give him the information, as an order for return, subject to these reservations.

Mr. CHURCH: Will the minister not allow these rate questions to be considered by the banking and commerce committee for their action?

Mr. DUNNING: Well, that is not my business.

COLDBROOK, N.S., FISH HATCHERY

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Has the dominion government during the last three years constructed a fish hatchery or rearing pond at Coldbrook, Kings county, Nova Scotia?
2. If so, from whom did they purchase the land, and what was the price paid?
3. What was the total cost of construction of buildings, and was the work performed under contract or day labour?
4. If under day labour, will a copy of the payroll be tabled?

EUROPEAN SITUATION

MEETING OF DOMINION HIGH COMMISSIONERS IN LONDON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): On Monday last, when we were discussing international affairs, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) regarding an item which appeared in a newspaper, and which he said he also had seen, with respect to Mr. Massey not having attended a meeting in London called by the dominions office. At that time the Prime Minister said he had no knowledge of the matter. Has he obtained any since with regard to it?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend that I also saw another item which stated that Mr. Massey had been at a conference at 10 Downing street. Both accounts were erroneous. Mr. Massey was asked to meet with the high commissioners of the other dominions not at 10 Downing street but in conference with the Secretary of State for the Dominions. He was present at that conference with the other high commissioners.

Mr. MANION: So the item is wrong.

UNEMPLOYMENT

QUESTION OF PROVISION FOR TWO THOUSAND TRANSIENTS NOW IN TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to call the attention of the government, in the absence of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) to a matter of emergency. It relates to two thousand transients, mostly young men, six hundred of whom are housed and have beds in the coliseum at Toronto and the rest in other hostel places in the city. Notice has been given by the province to the city that their meals, two a day, are to be cut off a week from to-morrow night, March 31. The minister said that this transient question was a matter for the province. I should like to ask the government if someone will be sent from the Department of Labour here to Toronto to negotiate with the province and the city so that these two thousand men will not be left to the city and the charity of private persons.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I will see that the request of my hon. friend is made known at once to the Department of Labour. He will doubtless get a reply in due course from that source.

WAYS AND MEANS

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On schedule I:

Customs tariff—415b. Washing machines, domestic, with or without motive power incorporated therein; complete parts of washing machines: 25 per cent.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I was speaking on this item the other evening when the committee adjourned, two or three minutes before the six o'clock hour. I would have finished had I been given the opportunity. The item was not carried. I have no wish to embarrass the minister, but I want to lay some facts before him and his tariff experts regarding the use of electricity in various forms of equipment which has grown out of the rapid expansion of the hydro-electric industry in Ontario. For example, we have item 415a—which was not carried—refrigerators, domestic or store, completely equipped or not; one is electric, the second is other than electric. The other evening the minister gave some explanation of this particular item, and I just wish to refer for three or four minutes—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would remind the hon. member that the item under consideration is 415b.

Mr. DUNNING: The same thing. It is all right.

Mr. CHURCH: The item, (a) as I understand it, is refrigerators.

Mr. DUNNING: No, washing machines.

Mr. CHURCH: We might as well not carry on at all if a member cannot ask a question of the government. It is all the same item. The government is not objecting to this. What are we here for? Regarding these refrigerators, washing machines and sewing machines, I put down a resolution, at the opening of parliament, regarding these matters, and asked what the tariff board was doing about the cost of the various items of equipment referred to it, and we heard that they had not had a sitting for very nearly a year. Then they met.

As has been said, there has been a rapid expansion of this industry. Prior to 1935 the tariff was forty per cent. Under the agreement in 1935 with the United States it came down to thirty-five per cent. Immediately imports from the United States went up, and the figures I have show that they increased from $189,000 to $893,000, or five times as much as they were before. The point I wish to raise, and I might just as well finish in one short speech what I have to say with reference to five or six of these items which relate to all kinds of electric equipment, is this. We have in Canada 42,000,000 horse-power, only one-sixth of which, or seven million, is developed, and some of that only for part of the year. This is a new and struggling industry, applying direct current for the use of all kinds of household equipment, and getting the benefit of cheap power for domestic use. Formerly a large part of the electrical equipment now manufactured in Canada came from Germany, but the industry for years made, and is making, a great effort to establish itself in this country by a little protection. It is a struggling industry, only in its infancy, and I submit that everything possible should be done to encourage it with a view to providing more employment. I realize quite well how desirable it is that housewives and people generally should be enabled to make use of electrical power at low cost for equipment and service in their homes for refrigerators, washing machines and other necessary devices. It is in the interests of the consumers that these things should be provided at reasonable cost, but at the same time I trust that the employment feature and the need of helping home industries will not be overlooked by the government. Rapid strides are being made in the extension of the use of electricity in connection with medicine, health, and all kinds of home comforts, and in other lines, and I do suggest that the government should help to put the industry on its feet and expand it. We cannot visualize the extended use of electricity in the future in the kitchen and in other parts of the house and domestic industry. I have figures which I could submit to the committee but I am afraid it would not be possible to give them at this stage. This industry is operating in Hamilton, Peterborough and other parts of Canada, and the figures which the minister gave the other evening will show its importance.

Our imports of electrical refrigerators alone from the United States, for the last year, were $950,000 and of other refrigerators $245,000. The numbers imported from the United States were 14,894, and 4,049 respectively. We exported 7,000, our largest customer being Australia with the United Kingdom second. These figures alone show what can be done in this industry not only in connection with refrigerators, but in the production of other electrical equipment as well. The electrical equipment industry is in its infancy and with proper development it could be made a fertile source of employment. The use of electricity will in the future be applied in fields of activity which at present we do not visualize, providing employment for Canadian workmen, and assisting in production and distribution and agriculture. The member for Victoria-Carleton referred to this subject the other evening. There is no doubt a demand on the part of the public to have these inventions made available at cost plus a reasonable profit, and I suggest that the minister should have someone, either in his office or in the office of the tariff board, determine a price that would allow a reasonable profit to the manufacturers and at the same time promote production at reasonable cost in Canada and thus help employment. I hope there will be no further reductions until this great industry is well established, because I am sure it could be made to provide employment for thousands of Canadians in the provinces that use commercial and domestic power extensively as well as throughout the dominion in the use of domestic electrical equipment.

Mr. McDONALD (Souris): I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the price of washing machines. In my opinion this is an item that should be referred to the tariff board. Last summer I made inquiries regarding comparative prices in the United States and Canada, and I also investigated the small combination gasoline engine and washing machine. There are only two or three companies in the United States that make these small gasoline engines, which work perfectly with washing machines. We have to import them. The duty under this item is 25 per cent, but I can state on reliable authority that a better washing machine can be bought in the United States at half the price we have to pay in Manitoba. That difference of 100 per cent is too much money. We have no objection to a certain amount of tariff protection for the benefit of Canadian workmen, but 100 per cent is altogether too much. I should be glad to have the item referred to the tariff board.

Mr. FURNISS: I do not think there is any item in the whole trade agreement that affects home life on the farm more than this one and the items immediately preceding and following it. One of the great drawbacks on the farm is the lack of proper inside help in the summer, and that is particularly true with young married people who are raising a family. They simply have not the price to pay for competent help, and the housewife has either to do the work herself or be satisfied with an inferior grade of help; the other alternative is to have appliances to lighten the labour. Electricity has been made cheaper and more available to the rural population of Ontario, but it is not only the cost of installing and paying for the electrical current that troubles the farmer; he has also to consider the price of various appliances and all the equipment by means of which he can use that electricity. I have been in many homes where the washing is done in the old way with the wash tub and board, the wringing being done by hand because modern means could not be afforded. I do not know what the farmers' wives would think if they saw these figures showing that the farmer can buy certain labour-saving machinery under a tariff protection of 7½ per cent, whereas, when the housewife wants labour-saving devices for use inside, they have to be paid for at a price covering a 25 per cent tariff. She would think she was being greatly discriminated against and would suggest it was time there were more lady members of parliament.

I do not understand why this industry needs as high a protection as it has, unless it be that it is an infant industry. If that is so I hope it will not be as long outgrowing its swaddling clothes as the other protected industries have been. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that he keep this item in mind when there are any future bargainings over the trade agreement, and that in that event he see that there is a substantial reduction in the tariff. Cheap electricity should go hand in hand with cheap electrical devices, but under this high protection electrical power is being capitalized on.

Mr. MARSHALL: I note that there is a 20 per cent British preferential tariff, and 25 per cent United States. Will the minister give the imports from Great Britain and from the United States? Perhaps he can also give us the figures covering the total quantities manufactured in Canada in 1938.

[Mr. G. W. McDonald.]

Mr. DUNNING: There were no imports from Great Britain; in fact we export washing machines to Great Britain. The imports from the United States amounted to $702,000 last year.

If I may say a word in reply to the two hon. members from Manitoba who have spoken, I would say that the record before me shows that there has been quite an increase in the imports of washing machines since the 1935 agreement, which, it will be remembered, reduced the duty from 35 per cent to 25 per cent. With the coming into full operation of this agreement the present effective rate of 28 per cent, including excise tax, will of course be reduced to 25 per cent. But I call attention to the fact that during the three years 1936 to 1938 inclusive, imports did increase from $272,000 to $702,000. They trebled in value. The number of machines imported increased five-fold during that period. I shall, however, take note of the representations that have been made suggesting that a tariff board inquiry might be desirable. I do not undertake that such a reference will be made, but the matter will be looked into from that point of view. At the present time we have quite an export business; exports have grown as rapidly as the imports. Last year we exported a total of $1,481,000 worth of washing machines, the great bulk of which went to the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand. I shall take note of the suggestions made by my hon. friends and find out what the facts are.

Mr. STEVENS: The statement of the minister that a reference in this matter might be made to the tariff board impels me to say that while I have all the sympathy in the world with the representations made by the two hon. members who have spoken on the subject, there is another side to the story to which I think I should refer. If a reference is made to the tariff board, obviously both sides will be heard.

The washing machine industry in the United States is not in a prosperous condition. As far as the story can be gathered from the financial reports of these companies —there are not many of them, but their output is very large—it is not a very attractive one. As a result some of these companies are actually dumping machines in Canada in order to keep up production and keep down the overhead ratio. That at any rate is what is claimed, and I think there is sufficient evidence to support that view. Briefly stated, the washing machine manufacturers of the United States produced in 1938 about 1,200,000 washers. Yet it is clear from their annual statements, some of which I have seen, and from information which I consider to be reliable, that the industry not only did not make any money but lost heavily. For instance the Automatic Electric Washer Company, of Newton, Iowa, producing about 30,000 machines a year, in their report showed a loss of $105,000, or approximately $3.50 per machine.

It might also be pointed out that these companies have different grades of machines. They put out a higher priced machine, which is the most profitable type, and which they seek to sell in their own market; and besides that they produce a low priced machine which they can feature in their advertisements to attract buyers. Most of these companies limit the number of low priced machines to a small percentage of their output. I understand the large General Electric Company limit the number of low priced machines to fifteen per cent of their total output. These low priced machines are used as loss leaders. It is also reported that the Easy Washing Machine Company, a well known company over there, lost something in the neighbourhood of $400,000 last year. Their annual production is about 200,000 machines. They make a range of machines selling from $49 to $150.

Another feature of this operation was referred to a moment ago, the attachments, such as electric motors and the tubs, which are usually manufactured separately. It is reported that the manufacturers of washing machine tubs lost on an average about fifty cents a tub last year, and the manufacture of the motors is also reported to have shown a loss.

The Washing Machine Company of Fairfield, Iowa, make a machine selling at $39, but they limit the production of those machines to one hundred a year; and while the company advertise machines ranging in price from $39 up to $100 or whatever the top price may be, the salesmen would be pretty severely taken to task if they placed many of those $39 machines. They are told they can show it, but to advise the purchase of a higher class machine.

Mr. DUNNING: If the company produced only one hundred, they would not be of much use for any purpose.

Mr. STEVENS: No, except for advertising—that they make a machine at that price. But the salesmen were instructed that their efficiency would be judged by the small number of that class of machine that they placed.

A further point is that certain of these machines have been shipped into Canada at an invoice price of $24.

Mr. DUNNING: Out of the hundred?

Mr. STEVENS: Well, there may have been some of that class. As near as can be ascertained, these machines cost about $34. I do not say it in any critical sense, but one of the questions which ought to be examined is whether there has not been systematic dumping of lower priced machines on the Canadian market, tending to destroy the industry here.

There is another aspect of this matter which should also be remembered. Usually these low priced machines are in the long run more costly than the higher priced machines—not those at the highest prices, but those moderately priced. A machine selling at what we might call a normal price will usually last a considerable time, being fairly well made, so that the actual annual outlay by the purchaser is comparatively small. Of course they are usually sold on time.

While I am entirely in accord with the view that we should secure for the users of this class of household utensil as low a price as we possibly can, yet in the interest of common sense and the welfare of the industrialists of Canada, which after all is very important, we must not allow ourselves to become the victims of a sort of "loss leader" dumping practice on the part of our friends south of the line. The evidence is pretty clear that the industry in that country has been in a somewhat unprofitable condition for the last few years, and because of that fact there has been a tendency to slash prices.

I think there is one thing that can be definitely said for the Canadian manufacturers of washing machines, that as far as I know—and I know some of them—they have all been putting out excellent machines, supplying the Canadian market at reasonable prices. The value of this industry, together with similar industries, is undoubtedly great, and I must repeat what has been said by some other hon. members during the last two or three weeks in discussing these resolutions as well as in connection with other matters, that after all the value of the industrial market to the farmer is important. I would suggest to my hon. friends who advanced the argument a few moments ago, that the real approach to the problem of the farmers is to secure for them a fair price for their products, which they are not getting to-day. That is my confirmed opinion. I think we will have a much healthier economic condition among the farmers of Canada if we can devise a system under which we can stabilize at a fair level the prices received by the farmers for their products, and I am now speaking particularly of live stock, dairy products and, of course, all grains.

Mr. McNEVIN: Would the hon. member inform us what method he would follow in order to attain that end?

Mr. STEVENS: I think such a dissertation now would be out of order, but I am not unmindful of the point and am quite prepared to express my views at the proper time, because I have given the question a great deal of thought. At the moment I am merely giving, shall I say, the other side of the story, which we must constantly bear in mind. It would not be fair to put the minister in a position in which in a sense he would be resisting an appeal in the interests of the farmers of Canada, which is virtually the position in which he was placed. As far as I am concerned I certainly wish to uphold the demands of agriculture for better and fairer treatment, yet nothing is gained by glossing over the other side of the picture or, merely for the sake of some momentary encomiums from that quarter, neglecting to tell what are the facts. So I suggest to the minister that when the matter goes to the tariff board—

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say it would.

Mr. STEVENS: If and when it goes to the tariff board, both sides of the story should be heard.

Mr. COLDWELL: There have been a number of items upon which I should have liked to say a word, but since this one has aroused some discussion I want to support those who have suggested that such articles as washing machines should be referred for investigation to the tariff board, or that something definite should be done by the government to reduce the duty. If an investigation of this kind be undertaken, I suggest to the minister that since we export a considerable number of these machines to Great Britain, a comparison should be made between the prices of such articles in Great Britain and in Canada. There may be very little difference, but sometimes on picking up English publications we find articles with which we are familiar in Canada advertised at prices which seem to be in line with our own prices or sometimes even a little less.

As one who occasionally passes through the United States I must say that I do not know of any group of articles upon which the differential appears to be as great as between the two sides of the line as electrical appliances and articles of this description. What the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) has said may be quite true, but I have always been struck by the tremendous difference between the prices of refrigerators, electrical appliances, washing machines and so on. Some twelve or thirteen years ago we bought a washing machine made in the United States, for which we paid something in the neighbourhood of $160. In store windows across the line I saw the very same machine for sale at less than $100. That struck me at the time as being a tremendous difference in price.

While it is true that the manufacture of such articles means work for those engaged in Canadian factories, I sometimes wonder whether we are not paying far too great a price for the work that is distributed by industries of this description. I think if an industry is uneconomic and is robbing, as it were, a large consuming public in this country, it has no right to receive special consideration.

Mr. HOMUTH: Would wheat come under that?

Mr. COLDWELL: No; wheat does not come under that, for reasons which we shall probably discuss within the course of the next few days.

To-day throughout Canada there are thousands of people who lack many simple household utensils. Very many articles have been discussed in connection with this treaty which cause me to say that we should do everything we can to bring into effect what after all is the Liberal policy, as stated over and over again in the program of the Liberal party ever since 1919; that is, to remove the protective tariff from articles which are necessary to the general welfare of the family. I am rising simply to give perhaps still another side of the picture and to suggest to the minister that he give consideration to the request of the two hon. members from Manitoba who have spoken.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I am quite certain that everyone in what is commonly called the rump, as well as those on the main street of the Liberal party, will accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) that we should do everything possible to safeguard the industrial producer and the industrial worker in the Dominion of Canada. But there is some variation of opinion as to what constitutes the best method of helping him. The items we have been discussing recently concern largely iron and steel. I am not particularly interested in this individual item, but looking at the matter from a broad national standpoint I am anxious that the iron and steel industry in Canada should prosper. I looked up the figures in order to see what we have been doing in the last few years, and I bring a message of cheer not only to the hon. member for Kootenay East but to all those on my immediate left who are particularly interested in this problem.

In 1933 our production of iron and steel products was $211,000,000. Those figures have increased year by year. The following year they were $308,000,000, and in the year the Liberals came into office and started to "ruin the industry" they were $390,000,000. The following year they were $453,000,000 and the next year $623,000,000. I do not hear a word of cheer from my friends to my left, although from time to time they have told us that the approach of the Liberal party to office always meant the retreat of industry.

Let me deal with wages, which, in my opinion is a very important factor. They moved up from $69,000,000 in 1933 to $88,000,000 and then to $110,000,000. We, the Liberals, arrived on the scene, and the figures were $126,000,000, $164,000,000—and still the cheering opposition army is silent; nothing but criticism! Then, how many men were employed? In 1933 there were 70,000; then 81,000, 95,000, 107,000; and the army of workers who marched into the iron and steel factories of Canada in 1937 numbered 127,336. Leaving out war years, that level was never touched, except in one year, 1929.

In 1929 production of iron and steel products stood at $738,000,000. We have not equalled that figure so far, but we are closely approaching it, with the $623,000,000 of 1937. In addition it must be remembered that there was, or should have been in the period of years from 1929 to 1937, at least to some extent a decline in price levels. So that if we could make the comparison on the basis of actual volume, rather than value, we would see that we have almost approached the highest limit we have ever reached in any peace year.

I should like to touch upon another item. My hon. friends are always afraid of imports. Well, in the year in which imports were shut out to the greatest extent, that is in the year 1933, when they fell to a value of $58,000,000, we were producing only to a value of $211,000,000. In 1937 we were importing goods to the value of $150,000,000 and producing them to a value of $623,000,000. So that it seems that as imports grow, so also does production; and industry moves forward as we break down the barriers, just as will the other sections of production in Canada.

The hon. member for Kootenay East referred to dumping. I think someone should offer a prize for the production of a genuine case of proved dumping. I sat and listened before the tariff board, year after year to—I forget how many cases, it must have been about two hundred—and I heard charges and counter-charges made in regard to dumping. The only cases I can recall which seemed reasonably clearly proved were ones in which Canadian manufacturers were exporting abroad at prices lower than they charged at home. No one offers to bring forward the evidence, but when you want to paint the picture of dumping it is the easiest thing in the world, if you are inclined that way, to splash on a ten-league canvas, with brushes of comets' hair. But, after all, if we are going to extend industry in Canada it must be brought about by bringing the products we produce within the capacity of the people of Canada to purchase.

I am quite interested in the statement of the hon. member for Kootenay East. Price policies and production have been clearly discussed in a recent book put out by the Brookings Institution of Washington. I ordered a few copies the other day, and out of kindness to my hon. friend, and the high regard I have for him not only because of his interest in this but in other problems, and in his to-day professed interest—I know it is real—in agriculture, I propose to make him a present of a copy of the book, in the hope that he may be converted to that point of view, and that I may have the pleasure of saving at least one brand from the burning.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I bring the committee back to the item under discussion.

Mr. DUNNING: Thank you, sir.

Mr. MacNICOL: I suggest if hon. members who deal with millions and twirl them around their tongues so easily in committee, without understanding their application, would confine their remarks to item 415b, we would get much farther ahead.

I wish to make only one observation on behalf of the worker in industry—because somebody has to say a word for him. We have heard something about the farmer, and we have had the economist tell us something which perhaps none of us knows anything about—and perhaps he knows no more—

Mr. DUNNING: That word should be expunged—accusing the hon. member of being an economist!

Mr. MacNICOL: I am always pleased to hear the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) dealing in millions. Under the 1935 treaty the duty on washing machines was reduced from 35 per cent to 25 per cent. In the calendar year 1935 Canada imported 3,380 washing machines.

Mr. DUNNING: 3,580.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am speaking of the calendar year, and I am giving the figures supplied by the washing machine industry.

In 1938, 16,914 machines were imported. Certainly there must have been a considerable reduction in employment.

Mr. DUNNING: Now, give us our own export figures, and that will demonstrate my hon. friend's point.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know they increased. We would not be able to export at all if we were not able to manufacture for our own market. We would be able to export more if we had the whole of our own market. But I wish to point out that according to the figures supplied by the washing machine industry, 309 fewer men were engaged in the industry in Canada in 1936 than in 1935.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): It has been suggested by the hon. member for Souris, and to some extent by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Furniss) that washing machines were selling in Canada at twice the price at which they were selling in the United States. The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) suggested that they were being dumped into Canada. Now, if they are being dumped into Canada one would think that they were being sold in this country at a price lower than that at which they were selling in the United States. The two views conflict. Both conditions can hardly prevail.

It has been suggested that there is such a duty on washing machines that they are being sold at an excessive price in Canada. The hon. member for Kootenay East quoted figures which indicated that companies in the United States had lost money. I believe if that point were followed out he would find that, generally speaking, the washing machine companies in Canada also lost money last year. There might be an exception here and there, but, generally speaking, the washing machine industry last year was not productive of profit. There are a considerable number of companies in Canada making washing machines, so that there is a good deal of competition in our own country. There is competition among the companies themselves, and that naturally keeps the price down. No company in Canada has what one might call a monopoly.

It has been suggested by several hon. members that this matter should be referred to the tariff board. My opinion is that at the present time we must give industry confidence. We should let them know that they are going to be allowed to carry on their business, without too much interference from governments or other authorities. I would say that this great industry is not one which should be scrutinized by any board. It should be given an opportunity to conduct its business free from interference. If that is done I am satisfied that the people will get their washing machines at a fair price.

It has been said that we want to get washing machines as cheaply as possible, and I agree with that; the women on the farms and the mothers and housewives in our cities should get these machines as cheaply as possible. But if we are going to destroy this industry, if it is put out of business and all these machines are to be brought in from a foreign country, I ask where the husbands of the housewives are going to get the money with which to buy them? I submit that we must consider the whole question of industry. Are we going to encourage industry in this country or are we going to destroy industry and create more unemployment? Our one thought should be to be fair to all, to give our housewives whether living in the city or on the farm, washing machines at a fair price; but at the same time we should protect this industry and keep our working men at work.

Mr. HOMUTH: I want to congratulate my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald), who is a neighbour of mine, upon his protectionist speech. Every time an item in this trade treaty is discussed and hon. members refer to the price they have to pay, they refer to the retail price. Member after member has risen to condemn industry. Our manufacturers have been called profiteers and hon. members complain of the high prices they have to pay for commodities. But it is not industry that is making the money out of these things. Take washing machines, for instance. If you follow the price of a washing machine from the factory until it reaches the consumer you will find that thirty, thirty-five, forty and forty-five per cent has been added to the price received by the manufacturer. Surely it would be better to spend our time in trying to work out some method of cutting down the cost of distribution in this country than to criticize industry day after day as it has been criticized. I agree with the hon. member for Brantford, when he says that industry should have some assurance that it will not be continually interfered with. Industry certainly has no such assurance now.

Mr. NEEDHAM: The minister said that exports had increased five times and that there had been a tremendous increase in the imports. Would all these exports be of Canadian manufacture, or would some be imported and then exported?

Mr. DUNNING: Our exports to the various countries of the empire are required to meet the British content regulations of the country to which they go. The imported and reexported article must comply with the British content regulations of Great Britain, Australia or New Zealand, as the case may be. In the case of this particular article, our exports comprised at least fifty per cent British content.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—415c. Clothes wringers, domestic, and complete parts of metal thereof: 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—415d. Sewing machines, with or without motive power incorporated therein; complete parts of sewing machines: 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—422a, ex 439b and ex 427a. Concrete road-paving machines, self-propelling, end loading type, with a capacity of 21 cubic feet of wet concrete or more; concrete and asphalt road finishing machines; form graders; sub-graders; combination excavating and transporting scraper units; concrete mixers, transit type; dump wagons or trailors on crawler-tracks, not self-propelled; back-filling machines and equipment, mounted on self-propelling wheels or crawling traction, semi- or full-revolving boom and scraper type; steam or air driven pile hammers or extractors; well-points; truck turntables; all the foregoing of a class or kind not made in Canada, and complete parts thereof: 10 per cent.

Mr. BROWN: What is the rate of duty on these items entering the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member is referring to road building machinery?

Mr. BROWN: Yes. Could the minister also give the Canadian imports?

Mr. DUNNING: The United States duty on most of this item is 27½ per cent. The imports to Canada last year were valued at $366,000.

Mr. BROWN: What would be the value of machinery of this type, otherwise provided for, produced in Canada? I mean all other kinds that are made in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no production of this item in Canada.

Mr. BROWN: I know that. But there are items of this type which are made in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no specific item which covers the same range of articles produced in Canada as is covered by this item. They would be distributed over possibly half a dozen different items in our tariff schedule. I regret I have not the precise information covering the Canadian production.

Mr. BROWN: Would it be safe to assume that the tariff duty is higher on the class of goods which are made in Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—424a. Hand fire extinguishers, and sprinkler heads for automatic sprinkler systems for fire protection: 30 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 425. Lawn mowers designed for use with motive power, whether or not containing the power unit: 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—427. All machinery composed wholly or in part of iron or steel, n.o.p., and complete parts thereof: 25 per cent.

Mr. HARRIS: Could the minister give us the imports and exports of items 427 and 427a, which I think go together?

Mr. DUNNING: The imports of items 427 and 427a in 1938 were valued at $21,883,000, while our exports totalled $4,003,000. I am advised that it is not possible to segregate the data covering the Canadian production of the exact types of machinery covered by the item, inasmuch as they would be included in a number of different classifications. The United States duty on machines not otherwise specified, which is the nearest corresponding item in their tariff, is 27½ per cent. That United States rate is subject to numerous specific reductions under various trade agreements.

Mr. HARRIS: This is a very large item, and the three per cent excise tax will represent a substantial amount of revenue which we will not receive. That is a point which ought to be borne in mind. In 1935—the minister will correct me if I am wrong—the imports into this country were only $7,400,000. In 1938 they were $21,883,000, representing a threefold increase in respect of machinery and parts of a class or kind not made in Canada, some of which could very well be made in this country. Recently a number of hon. members had an opportunity of looking over the plant of the John Inglis Company in Toronto. Of the machinery represented in this $20,000,000 item, at least one-half, I would say, could be manufactured in a plant of that type. I know from practical experience that it consists of large and heavy units which are used in mining and many other industries, most of the units being driers and pressers and the types of machinery which require boiler shop work—jacketed vessels, stay bolted tanks, machines built on what is known in the trade as marine construction. Prior to the building back in 1921 of the large unit of the John Inglis Company Limited it was difficult to have these heavy units of machinery made in Canada. They equipped that very expensive plant to turn and twist, as it were, steel sheets as heavy as seven-eighths thickness. The hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) will realize that that is an extremely heavy sheet to stay-bolt and roll and make into heavy machinery. Since they were unable to compete with similar plants in the United States, and since the demand in Canada during the depression was not so heavy, that plant finally went out of existence. I use that as an illustration of the type of plant which has gone out of existence or has very considerably reduced its production. The same is true of a plant at Galt, one at Montreal, and one out Welland way: they all experienced the same difficulty. But the point I want to bring out is rather in contradiction of what we heard a few moments ago from the hon. member for Huron North. In departing from the Fielding idea of a revenue tariff as I heard that minister explain it on many occasions from the government side of the house, they have reduced the duties to a very low level, as low in this case as ten per cent on goods of a class or kind not made in Canada. The result is that plants of this kind, if presented with a blueprint of a heavy type of machinery which is not produced here, are discouraged by the fact that the tariff is only ten per cent, whereas if they were in production on that kind of machine the duty would be 25 per cent. Every time you enlarge the spread between machinery of a kind that is made in Canada and machinery of a kind that is generally not made in Canada, you lose the revenue from tariffs—imposed on a principle which as I have always understood is part and parcel of the policy of the Liberal party. That is the first thing that happens. Secondly, you restrict the possibility of our manufacturers in the iron and steel industry producing that unit of machinery. By the way, industries such as the John Inglis Company did almost as much business, in dollar value, in machinery specially designed as in ordinary boiler shop work.

A word with regard to the employees. I imagine there are hon. members in this chamber who know something about the technical employees engaged on these very large units of machinery; I am thinking of processing machines which weigh twenty, thirty and forty tons. We have in Canada men who were apprenticed in the iron and steel industry on the Clyde, men who learned their trade and craftsmanship there, and men who were apprenticed in Belfast, where I believe the Brown yards employ eight or ten thousand men.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Harland & Wolff.

Mr. HARRIS: They came to Canada and found their vocation in industries of a kind which are supplanted by these imports which have jumped from $7,000,000 in 1935 to $12,000,000 in 1938. These artisans from Belfast and the Clyde, who learned their trade from the ground up, are to my mind the most efficient mechanics that civilization has yet produced.

Mr. DUNNING: Some good ones come from Yorkshire.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What about the Tyne?

Mr. HARRIS: I am thinking of a man named Spence—a good name for a Yorkshireman—who was with me for some thirty years. He was trained as a mechanic in manufacturing machines used in the textile trade, but he could not find employment in this country with industries producing textile machinery, and now, instead of applying his artisanship in the manufacturing of textile machinery of the kind or class comprised in this item, he is a night watchman in a plant which I happen to control.

I do not know where the hon. member for Huron North got the astronomical figures he cited with regard to iron and steel, but I suppose they were from the bureau of statistics. It is a handy place, and you can prove almost anything. But my information is that the number of employees normally engaged in the Canadian iron and steel industry is about 131,000. With the collapse in 1929 it dropped down to as low as 77,000. Then it came back to 99,000. At present, as hon. members will agree, it remains stagnant, and page 12 of the employment commission report covering the employment comparison, net change between September 1929 and 1936 in that particular industry, shows that there are 35,883 iron and steel workers out of employment. My hon. friend will agree with me, I am sure, that there is a great deal of work and wages in $21,000,000 worth of machinery and machine parts as represented in this particular item. A hurried mental calculation would lead one to suggest that there are involved at least $5,000,000 worth of wages. So that if our friends who are in power, and who want a tariff for revenue purposes, would adhere to their policy and discontinue widening that spread between goods of a kind made in Canada and goods of a kind not made in Canada, in my opinion a great many of our present industries who diversify their manufacture of machinery of this kind could keep their staffs busy designing and building these machines.

The committee realizes that in any industry the machinery changes every two or three years. The ordinary half-million dollar plant would have $200,000 worth of machinery, and it cannot be used for ten years because something more modern and efficient keeps coming up all the time and the old machinery has to be scrapped and modern equipment installed. These new machines are produced in the large countries such as the United States, some in England and some on the continent; so that the Canadian manufacturer may be producing a machine called by one name to-day, which is replaced by a machine called by another name to-morrow, which is doing the work far more efficiently and quickly, with the result that the manufacturer has to throw out the old machine at present made in Canada and bring in the new unit not made here. The artisans of Canada, if they had a look at the blueprints and had a chance to study them, if they were not faced with this widening of the spread, could in many instances produce the machinery here and expand employment to our own people. I hope that in that respect our friends will get back to the field of tariff for revenue.

Mr. BROWN: May I refer to an observation made by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris). I would point out that the reduction from 20 per cent to 10 per cent is just sufficient to induce the United States manufacturers who have branches here, and who are the sole manufacturers of certain machinery, to discontinue making such machinery here, so that it might be brought in under the 10 per cent tariff. In other words this reduction offers an inducement to United States manufacturers to quit manufacturing here and to manufacture in the United States.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Brown) raises an interesting point. It is true that in this basket item of machinery not otherwise provided for, which is a very large one, there is a reduction from 20 per cent to 10 per cent. I know of nothing on which Canadian industrialists in all lines make stronger representations than they do with respect to the tariff on classes of machinery, capital goods, which they require in industry and which are not made in Canada. We are constantly in receipt of protests against what the hon. member for Danforth would call a revenue duty on capital goods required in industry and not made in Canada. We have recognized the situation to the extent of the reduction embodied in the present treaty, and of course we have to take into account the very point made by the hon. member for Hamilton East. Shall we, by so doing, bring about the removal of some concerns that were manufacturing in Canada because of the differential? The information we have is that such a result is extremely unlikely to any considerable extent.

Mr. BROWN: The circumstances which I have stated actually exist at the present time; and I will go further than that. There are certain manufacturers who wish to bring in machinery under the 10 per cent provision and they are exerting pressure on the manufacturers who produce that kind of machinery to stop making it so that the machinery may be imported under the 10 per cent duty.

Mr. ILSLEY: Will the hon. gentleman give me the particulars? I am most interested.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to say a word or two in connection with item 427a. I have in mind a plant in Toronto which manufactures a good deal of the machinery that comes in under item 427a, under a duty now of 10 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: They cannot be manufacturing machinery that comes in under 427a, because 427a applies only to machinery not made in Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: But I am speaking of machinery made in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: That is 427.

Mr. MacNICOL: Under the administration of the tariff the manufacturers are told that the machinery is not made in Canada although it is. The two ministers are here and either of them can correct me. There are two machines to which I refer. One is known as the straight line portable rotor lift gravel and rock crushing machine, and the other machine, a similar one, has an additional crusher and is called a dual purpose machine. I have pictures of them. I have seen the two different machines after they were built in the Toronto plant. If the straight line machine has attached to it the dual purpose feature it comes in at 10 per cent; if it has not the dual purpose feature it is 25 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Twenty-five per cent is correct under 427.

Mr. MacNICOL: They can turn out either of these machines in ten days. All they have to do is add the additional crusher equipment to make a dual purpose machine.

But if a road builder wishes a dual purpose machine he buys it in the United States and imports it at 10 per cent duty. If he purchases a single line machine of the same order less the dual purpose part, he has to pay 25 per cent. There are two companies in Canada making those machines, one in the province of Quebec and the other in Toronto. I know the Toronto plant can, and I am told that the Quebec one also can turn these machines out very rapidly. I should like to know why the department cannot separate these machines for duty purposes. If an importer brings in a dual purpose machine, does the minister feel that the whole machine should be let in at 10 per cent? Why not separate it and collect 25 per cent on the single line part of the machine and let the dual purpose addition in at 10 per cent? This company ships machinery all over the world, including Australia and South Africa, and they could sell this line of machinery down there if they were enabled to obtain a larger part of the Canadian market. One machine weighs about 53,000 pounds, and I am told that eighty per cent of the cost is labour. That is quite an item. I do not know how we are ever going to develop the manufacture of new lines of machinery in this country unless the manufacturer is given a chance to obtain the home market. I am told that they can and do sell these machines in Canada at the same price as that at which they are sold in the United States. But I am also told—I do not know whether this is true—that a large contractor will set up one of his employees, or someone very close to him, as an agent, and that agent brings the machine into Canada at the agent's price; in that way I presume the purpose of the act is defeated. Surely the administration would not want anything like that to take place. If the manufacturers are given their home market they can not only supply all the machines required in Canada at the United States price and create a great deal of employment in Ontario, particularly Toronto, and in Quebec province—I have forgotten the name of the town there in which these machines are made—but can also sell them in South Africa and Australia and elsewhere to compete with the United States prices. These men seem to think that under the n.o.p. provision the machines are held not to be manufactured in Canada, because unless ten per cent of the market requirement is made here in Canada, the machine is considered as not being manufactured in Canada. But how can they get ten per cent of the Canadian consumption if the conditions prevail which I have just outlined, an agent being set up to bring the machines in at an agent's price? I cannot help feeling that this is a condition which is of concern to any department interested in increasing industry in this country.

It appears to me from the way tariffs are made in Canada that we have no one particularly looking after industry, except perhaps the Minister of Finance. I should like to see him called the minister of finance and industry.

Mr. DUNNING: I have enough titles now.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then someone in the cabinet would be charged with looking after the manufacturer, helping him to give more employment. I believe twenty-three other countries have a ministry of industry, and it is high time this country had.

I saw one of these machines a week ago last Saturday. It is a large machine worth $23,000. It has been in stock for some time, and is likely to remain on the warehouse floor now that the duty has been reduced to 10 per cent. That machine has in its construction ninety-eight per cent of Canadian material, as well as all the labour. The tires on that machine, worth $1,500, were bought from a Canadian manufacturer, likewise the elevators, the motors and all the intricate parts that go into this machine are bought in Canada, whereas when a machine comes from the United States the tires, the elevators, the conveyors and all the rest are made there.

I am not finding any fault with what the two ministers are trying to do in the way of bringing down prices, but the time has come when at least one member of the cabinet should be specially charged with the development of industry in this country. I know of no other way by which industry can be developed more speedily than by giving attention to just such an item as I have now discussed. The companies manufacturing these machines can produce them in Canada and sell them at the same price as the United States machine, but they cannot get into the market and therefore cannot get the required 10 per cent. Give them a chance and they will take care of the requirements of the Canadian market in this line. As I have said, eighty per cent of the cost of the machine is labour, which is a very important item in providing industrial employment in Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was interested in the remarks of my hon. friend. The specific matter of which he complains is a ruling which apparently has been made by the Made in Canada branch of the customs division. From what he said I am not sure whether the ruling has been made or not. I should be very glad if he would let me have particulars of the instance to which he refers, and I shall make careful inquiry. The branch has to make a great many rulings, and many of them are difficult; there are two sides to the matter in dispute. But I shall be glad to go into that particular one. It rather struck me that the hon. gentleman had made a case, but there may be other facts bearing on the situation.

Mr. MacNICOL: Could not the two things be separated as I suggested?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is impossible for me to say without looking into the matter.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Does oil well drilling machinery or apparatus come under this item?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. LENNARD: I notice that the duty from the United States is 5 per cent and that the British preferential rate is 10 per cent. Will the minister explain that?

Mr. DUNNING: The British rate will come down automatically, because Great Britain is a favoured nation.

Mr. LENNARD: The 10 per cent is not correct, then?

Mr. DUNNING: Ten per cent is the present British preference rate, but the fact that we are agreeing to a 5 per cent rate from the United States means that that 5 per cent will apply to Great Britain also in future, under the most favoured nation clause.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I have been awaiting an opportunity to direct attention to an observation which I have made several times lately in connection with the tariff rate on articles imported purely for domestic consumption. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) drew attention to the spread between prices of washing machines in the United States and those in Canada. It appears to me that the Minister of National Revenue should take into consideration the fact that a tradesman, when setting his retail price, makes a profit on the duty which he has paid the government, and on the transportation charges, consequently raising the price artificially, with the result that the spread is very much greater. If the collection of duty on articles for domestic consumption could be carried on as the collection of sales tax is carried on, from the retailer, it would make a great deal of difference in the cost of these articles in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not get my hon. friend's last question.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): It was not a question; it was an observation. There is an artificial spread when the retailer collects a profit on the amount of money he pays the government in customs duty and the amount of money he pays the railways for transportation; and if the customs duty could be collected in the same way that the sales tax is collected, at the time the article is sold by the retailer, it would make a great deal of difference in the cost of the article in Canada. If there is a duty of 25 per cent on an imported article and there is a mark-up of 50 per cent in order to make a 33⅓ per cent return, on an article costing $100 that would make a difference of $12.50.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be equivalent to a considerable increase in the rate of duty.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): The government could increase the rate of duty accordingly.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, we would have to decrease it.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): No, the government could increase it if the duty was collected at the point of sale. I want that made quite clear. You collect the sales tax after you have sold the article. If you collect the duty on articles sold purely for domestic consumption costing over $50, let us say, in the same way—

Mr. ILSLEY: At what point.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): At the point of sale by the retailer, in the same way as you collect the sales tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: The sales tax is not collected at that point at all; the sales tax is collected at the factory door.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): The sales tax is collected by the retailer is it not?

Mr. ILSLEY: The sales tax is collected at the time of sale by the manufacturer, on the value of the goods at the factory door.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): That is the factory sales tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is our sales tax.

[Mr. J. S. Taylor.]

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): You have a retail sales tax as well, have you not?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

An hon. MEMBER: That is provincial.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): It may be provincial, but it is possible to collect it in that way. If the same principle were adopted for collection of these duties on articles imported purely for domestic consumption it would make a great deal of difference in the price and would enable many consumers to obtain articles they cannot now afford because of the spread that exists between United States and Canadian prices.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I think it should be made clear to the hon. member that in regard to the sales tax, the customs tariff and the excise tax, these are all pyramided, and there is an increase added as they move along. The sales tax collected at the factory door goes into the cost of the goods. The merchant takes those goods at a cost which represents the sales tax plus the invoice value of the goods and adds his mark-up. In consequence our eight per cent sales tax is reflected in an added cost amounting to probably twelve per cent, while a forty per cent duty probably runs up to a sixty or seventy per cent advance in the cost of the commodity to the consumer. So pyramid is piled on pyramid, and that is the fundamental reason why the spread between the prices of certain commodities in the United States and Canada is so great. We have to add the duty, or the manufacturer takes it in excess prices; then we must add a series of profits until we have reached such heights that a revulsion of feeling is caused. Then, when we want to bring it down, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) offers objection.

The hon. gentleman suggested this afternoon, in regard to something I said, that he found it extremely difficult to follow me when I talked in millions. A young man was once employed by the census bureau. A few days later he came to his chief and said, "I feel that I must give up this job." The chief said, "Well, the task is quite simple. Why can you not go on with it?" The young man replied, "I was never taught to count beyond seven." I think when members of parliament cannot count beyond one hundred thousand they should not represent Toronto constituencies.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member talked in hundreds of millions.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Would the hon. member continue the figures he was giving a moment ago and give the figures for 1938 as well?

Mr. DEACHMAN: That would be extremely difficult. In the first place I gave my notes to Hansard, and even if I had my notes I could not give those figures because the bureau of statistics does not yet record the figures for 1938. I venture to suggest that they will show a decrease, but I would not think the decline would be by any means as great as was the decline which followed when the friends of my distinguished friend came to office. Then industry tumbled and men found themselves out of work, despite all the protests of the leader of my hon. friends at that time that if he was elected he would solve that problem. Later on he said he would solve it or perish in the attempt, and he perished in the attempt.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, this item concerns safety razor blades, and I would suggest that they are rather sharp to be used as instruments of controversy.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—430. Nuts and bolts with or without threads, washers, rivets, of iron or steel, coated or not, n.o.p.; nut and bolt blanks, of iron or steel, per hundred pounds, 50 cents, and 17½ per cent.

Mr. HARRIS: This is another example of small industries which are very seriously affected, not only in large centres but in many small cities such as Brockville, Galt and similar places. Prior to the last agreement the duty was 75 cents per hundred pounds and 25 per cent; now it is 50 cents per hundred pounds and 17½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Has my hon. friend figured out the reduction here?

Mr. HARRIS: Well, it is quite considerable when you add the effect of the two treaties together. In all these discussions we must bear in mind the cumulative effect of the two treaties. Canada absorbed the shock of the first treaty rather gracefully. But she does not realize what a shock she will receive from the cumulative effects of the two. And this is just another example of the—

Mr. DUNNING: I must disagree with my hon. friend's conclusions there, because it is a curious fact in connection with this item of nuts, bolts, washers and so on, that our imports from the United States actually declined from 1936 to 1938. Imports in 1936 were valued at $351,000, and in 1938 they were $274,000. When I notice that our production went up from just over $2,900,000 in 1934 to $4,070,000 in 1936, I am bound to think there is not any great amount of suffering reflected in those figures.

Mr. STEWART: What are the corresponding rates on the same lines going into the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: They are six-tenths of one cent a pound on nuts, one cent a pound on bolts, and the washers go with the nuts.

Mr. STEWART: And what about rivets?

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid we have not worked out the information with respect to rivets. The United States item does not correspond with ours.

Mr. STEWART: Is the United States rate against the Canadian product higher than the Canadian rate against the United States product?

Mr. DUNNING: The comparison is very close, something like comparing half a cent, plus fifteen per cent, with six-tenths of a cent.

Mr. STEWART: Quite similar then.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—431b. Adzes, anvils, vises, cleavers, hatchets, saws, augers, bits, drills, screwdrivers, planes, spokeshaves, chisels, mallets, metal wedges, wrenches, sledges, hammers, crowbars, cantdogs, and track tools, picks, mattocks, and eyes or polls for the same: 27½ per cent.

Mr. HARRIS: The Minister of Finance was rather quick to grab at an item in connection with which there happened to be no particular increase in imports. Perhaps he would give the figures for item 431b?

Mr. DUNNING: Surely. In 1938, imports from the United States were valued at $824,000, and we exported $1,312,000 worth, mainly to Australia, the United Kingdom and New Zealand.

Mr. HARRIS: No exports to the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: There was $18,000 worth.

Mr. HARRIS: That is $800,000 in and $18,000 out.

Mr. DUNNING: To the United States.

Mr. HARRIS: Whereas in 1935, imports were valued at only $426,000. The importation has doubled in three years.

Mr. DUNNING: I am pleased to note an increase in our own production, between the two years, in practically all of these items.

Mr. STEWART: Would the minister give the same information with respect to the United States rate against adzes, and so on?

Mr. DUNNING: Forty-five per cent on practically all hand tools.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—431c. Machinists' or metal workers' precision tools and measuring instruments, viz.: Calipers, micrometers, metal protractors and squares, bevels, verniers, gauges, gauge blocks, parallels, buttons, mercury plumb bobs, dividers, trammels, scribers, centre punches, pocket speed indicators, straight edges, key seat clamps and other clamps and vises used by toolmakers for precision work, precision tools and measuring instruments, n.o.p.: 10 per cent.

Mr. HARRIS: Another example where imports from the United States have jumped from $66,000 to $256,000.

Mr. DUNNING: What item is that?

Mr. HARRIS: The group item the chairman has just read, namely 431c and 431d. I understand the minister has the figures all under one item.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not have them separately. Yes, they have increased to the extent of about $100,000 between 1937 and 1938.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—431d. Engineers', surveyors' and draftsmen's precision instruments and apparatus, viz.: alidades; altazimuth surveying instruments; aneroid barometers, engineering, military and surveying; angle prisms; boards, military sketching; box sextants; clinometers; compasses; cross staff heads; curves, adjustable, irregular, railroad and ship; curvimeters; drafting instruments of all kinds, including fitted cases containing the same; dipping needles; drafting machines; heliographs; integrators; levels, tripod and hand or pocket types; levelling rods; liners, section; meters, portable for hydraulic engineering; pantographs; planimeters; protractors; parallel rulers; parallel ruling attachments; poles, ranging; pedometers and paceometers; plane tables, military and topographic; scales, flat and triangular; slide rules; splines; straight edges, steel and wooden; tachometers; tallying machines, pocket; tee squares, steel and wooden; telemeters; theodolites; transits, tripod and hand or pocket types; triangles of all types; tripods for use with any of the foregoing instruments: 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—431f. Files and rasps: 27½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—432. Hollow-ware, of iron or steel, coated or not, n.o.p.: 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Customs tariff—432a. Kitchen and dairy hollow-ware of iron or steel, coated with tin, including cans for shipping milk or cream, not painted, japanned or decorated: 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—432b. Hollow-ware, of iron or steel, coated with vitreous enamel: 30 per cent.

Mr. HOMUTH: What is the value of imports under this item?

Mr. DUNNING: In 1938, imports from the United States were valued at $126,000, and our own production stood at about $1,400,000. Rates going into the United States on enameled hollow-ware are five cents a pound, and 15 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—432d. Manufactures of tinplate, painted, japanned, decorated or not, and manufactures of tin, n.o.p.: 25 per cent.

Mr. BROWN: What are the imports?

Mr. DUNNING: There are two items, amounting to $321,000 and $443,000 respectively, making a total of $764,000, which represents the imports into Canada from the United States in 1938. Our own production has increased enormously under this item; it runs to about $20,000,000. The duty going into the United States is at forty-five per cent on all items, except containers, which represent a big part of the total. Containers enter the United States at 22½ per cent.

Mr. HARRIS: Items 432a b, c and d give just another example of where imports have doubled on each item in the last three years.

Mr. DUNNING: Also home production has advanced in almost the same proportion, I can tell the hon. member for Danforth.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—435, ex 434, ex 434a. Locomotives and motor cars for railways, of a class or kind not made in Canada, and complete parts thereof, for use exclusively in mining, metallurgical or sawmill operations: 12½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—438a. Automobiles and motor vehicles of all kinds, n.o.p.; electric trackless trolley buses; chassis for all the foregoing: 17½ per cent.

Provided, that machines or other articles mounted on the foregoing, or attached thereto for purposes other than loading or unloading the vehicle shall be valued separately and duty assessed under the tariff items regularly applicable thereto.

Mr. MANION: I have had sent to me a statement which I assume some of the ministers have also had sent to them; therefore they will be able to speak intelligently in regard to the matter. The statement is from the Detroit Free Press of March 19, and is contained in a dispatch dated at Ottawa, March 18. Perhaps the easiest way is to read part of it. It is supposed to be a statement of fact. The gist of the statement is that of the three large automobile manufacturing companies in Canada, at least two are on the verge of closing down because of the change in duties, and the cutting off of the excise tax of three per cent. I shall read a paragraph. If the minister wishes me to stop reading it, I shall do so. It is not meant as a criticism, but it can be placed before the committee better by reading it than could be done by an attempt to synopsize it. This is a special dispatch to the Detroit Free Press, dated Ottawa, March 18. It reads:

The Canadian government, it is learned on high authority, is concentrating on the problem of preventing the largest branch plant industry operated by United States capital in Canada—the automobile industry—from being lost to the dominion and repatriated to the United States.

Of the "big three" motor car manufacturers who maintain complete plants in Canada, one alone is described in governmental circles as being content to remain in the dominion.

The other two are said to be anxious to discontinue their Canadian operations and to transfer the substantial volume of employment that they afford to their parent factories in the United States, where enlarged mass production methods would effect important savings.

Lower down it states:

The new Canada-United States trade treaty is responsible directly for the critical situation. The arrangement binds at 17½ per cent the duty payable on United States automobiles coming into Canada and removes the three per cent excise tax which has been required on motor cars imported into Canada from any country other than Great Britain in recent years.

Then the article goes on to emphasize the importance to the automobile industry of the loss of this three per cent, and gives further details of the advantages to automobile companies of importing their cars instead of manufacturing them in Canada. The article continues:

When Canadian officials discovered that the new trade treaty threatened to have this effect on one of the country's most important industries, they formulated representations to Washington.

I am just trying to give the gist of this article. Lower down it says:

The proposal was made, accordingly, that three companies should be approached to write President Roosevelt in support of the Canadian application for a change in the treaty.

Conferences, however, speedily made it apparent that the United States automobile manufacturers were not favourably inclined.

And again:

The suggestion most commonly heard is that the Minister of National Revenue, J. L. Ilsley, takes advantage of a section of the Customs Act which empowers him to declare special duties on commodities that are being "dumped" on the Canadian market.

This is a fairly long article and I think I have read enough to give the gist. It was sent to me by one of the automobile workers' associations. The hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Brown) has had the same thing sent to him and, I believe, will have something to say about it later on because it directly affects his constituency. I was asked, however, to bring it up, and in view of the importance of this matter perhaps either the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) or the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) will be able to tell us the facts. I should like to hear what they have to say in regard to it.

Mr. MOORE: Before the minister answers the leader of the opposition, may I say that for the past several days I have been receiving hundreds of communications from people in my riding in reference to this matter. I shall not attempt to read them all; as they are all to the same effect, I shall read one only. I take it that these have been sent by employees of General Motors in Oshawa, and this particular one reads:

I view with much concern the insecurity of employment in the Canadian automotive industry and therefore urge you to use your influence to bring about an investigation in the industry in regards to same especially the effect of recent tariff adjustments.

With regard to what the leader of the opposition has said, it is common information that the tariff board has been investigating the automobile industry for some years. May I ask if the present tariff was based on the findings of the tariff board?

Mr. MARTIN: I believe I represent a district which manufactures more automobiles than any other district in Canada. Before the minister replies to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) and the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore), may I say that the newspaper article to which the leader of the opposition referred was also sent to me. I have received other communications of apprehension from men engaged in the automobile industry. These have come to me from people who live in the areas where different branches of the automobile industry are located, as well as from other centres in Ontario and the province of Quebec. When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) makes his statement, I am sure he will note that those of us who come from the areas concerned have been alive to this problem. We are trusting that whatever is done will be so effectuated as to guarantee the stability of this industry, not only for what it means in itself but for what it means to the thousands of men who depend upon it for a livelihood.

Mr. LOCKHART: I have received communications which indicate that unemployment in this industry is still on the increase. I agree with the statement of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) that Windsor is a large automotive centre, but I represent a constituency in which this industry plays a large part. I imagine that the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Brown) has also received communications similar to those which have reached me. I just want to associate myself with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) and other hon. members who have spoken in this connection.

Mr. DUNNING: I was wanting to answer the questions that have been asked, but apparently hon. members are associating themselves for the purpose of getting some statement from me. I was trying to answer the specific questions asked by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) and the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore), and I had no intention of closing off the debate on this item. I have not seen the newspaper article referred to by the leader of the opposition, and I thank him for reading it. In so far as it intimates that the government of Canada has made representations to the government of the United States since the signing of the treaty, it is entirely incorrect.

Mr. MANION: The minister means with reference to automobiles, because this government has made representations with regard to cattle.

Mr. DUNNING: The article referred specifically to automobiles, and there is no foundation in fact for that statement. Another allegation was made that because of the provisions in the treaty two of the three large automobile manufacturers were considering withdrawing from Canada. I have no information which would lead me to believe that there is any truth in that statement.

In reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Ontario, I may say that there has been no report by the tariff board. As my hon. friend knows, the reference with respect to automobiles has been a continuing one and the treaty was negotiated with the United States without the aid, if I may put it in that way, of a final report from the tariff board.

Mr. COLDWELL: Just before the item carries, in view of the discussion I think some of us might express a word from a slightly different point of view, because there are other points of view in the house than those which have been placed before the minister.

While we have every sympathy with the men who are engaged in this industry, we cannot be blind to the fact that it has grown up behind what has been in the past a fairly substantial protective tariff; and if the plea were made by the companies more genuinely from the point of view of safeguarding the interests of the men employed in this industry there would be much more sympathy with it.

I have in mind this fact, that in the automobile industry men have worked under conditions which have to a large degree undermined their health; that while rates of wages have looked high when considered on an hourly or daily basis, the yearly wage in the automobile industry has not been, over the years, relatively high; and I have observed in this industry, in the city of Regina where my home is, that when times grew slack men congregated day after day round the doors of the automobile plant hoping for work and were often employed for just a few hours.

It seems to me that if an industry which can pile up dividends, surpluses, reserves and so on to the extent that this industry has done, receives protection from the Dominion of Canada or from any other country, it ought also to be made to assume responsibilities with regard to its working force. I want to place that point of view before the committee, because I have every sympathy with the men whose jobs are in jeopardy; but at the same time I want to make it abundantly clear that over a period of years the people of Canada have paid for automobiles prices far in excess of what should have been paid; and moreover the industry, while it has paid, as I have said, a relatively high hourly or daily wage, has not assumed responsibility for the care and safeguarding of the men whom it has employed.

Hence, when I hear a plea made in this chamber, as it has been this afternoon, apparently wholly from the point of view of those who are likely to lose their jobs in the industry, I come back to the thought that there are other considerations which ought to be reviewed when we are considering protective tariffs, if we are asked to maintain them for this industry.

Mr. MOORE: May I say just a word in reference to what has been said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar? He has spoken of the high protection accorded to the motor car industry of Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: In past years.

Mr. MOORE: In past years. I venture to say that for some years Canada has had the second lowest protective rate of any producing country in the world. It must be remembered also that we have a free item, a free import from the United Kingdom, and no other motor-car producing country has a free item.

If the hon. member will think back for just a moment or two, he will recall that it is not only tariff rates which affect employment in and the productivity of an industry; it is changes in rates; and I venture to say that in the last ten or fifteen years there have been not less than a hundred changes made in the tariff rates on the materials and the parts used in the automotive industry of this country. The hon. member will also remember, I hope, that when the United Kingdom was a free trade country, or so called, about 1915, it imposed a tariff rate of some thirty per cent—if I am not wrong—against the motor-cars of the United States, or under its general tariff, giving us a preference of one-third off. The British government did that for a specific purpose. The United Kingdom was not given to protective tariffs at that time; it was not a protective country; it did not believe in the principle of protection. It gave protection to the motor-car industry because of its impregnation of life into other industries, because of its encouragement in the production of alloy steels, and I hope I can have the backing of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) when I say, more particularly because no country to-day can defend itself without the modern armament which comes from the production of flexible power. There are two things to be considered—and again with deference to the superior knowledge of the Minister of National Defence—in connection with modern armaments. One is the aeroplane, and the aeroplane has developed out of the motor-car engine. The other is the tank, and the tank has developed out of the tractor. And we make no tractors in this country.

Mr. MacNICOL: We should.

Mr. MOORE: I quite agree that we should. We make no tractors in this country, and we are not encouraging the manufacture in this country of motor-car engines as we should be doing if we wish some day to have a self-respecting position so far as self-defence is concerned.

I wonder if the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who has a very great regard for workers in this country, is quite right in his reference to wages. I had occasion some two or three years ago to look up the annual wage drawings of the men in the motor-car industry, and as I recall it, sir, they were about the third or the fourth best-paid employees in Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: What year was that?

Mr. MOORE: I should say three or four years ago. We have been dropping back. There was a time when we in this country made twice as many motor-cars as the United Kingdom, and I am speaking offhand when I say that the situation is reversed.

I did not intend to speak on this subject, but I will say this, that the conditions of men in the motor-car industry are terrible. It is not only the men that are on relief; it is the men, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said, that are employed only half-time.

So far as the general argument on the treaty is concerned. I do not propose to enter into it now, but I will say this, that the motor-car industry will be glad to have less than the average rate which has been conceded to agriculture under the agreement. I have gone over it rather carefully, and I find that there are far greater duties in favour of the live stock industry, —I think forty-five per cent under this agreement placed on beef and veal from the United States. There is some sixty or seventy per cent on importations from the Argentine, which is a good customer for some of our manufactured products.

The other day I heard the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) speaking eloquently about the protection which should be given the dairy industry. The motor-car industry will be glad to have just one-half of the consideration which is given to the dairy industry in this country.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I will support that too.

Mr. MOORE: When the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar speaks of the disparity in prices, I would just have him remember that it is an illusion to think that the duty is high on durable goods because you pay it in a bulk sum. You swallow your protection on agricultural production three times a day throughout the year.

Mr. DONNELLY: Some of our protectionist friends on both sides of the house have joined together in favour of the retention of the excise tax on automobiles. I wish to associate myself with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in the effort to have the tax taken away. I was very much surprised indeed, when there was any suggestion on the part of the government of touching either the duty or the excise tax on automobiles, that there was not a roar from the automobile industry. I can remember what happened in 1926. I saw them come here with their labourers, parading in front of the buildings and carrying placards reading, "I have fought for Canada, I have bled for Canada, and now I have to leave Canada because we are going to be thrown out of work." When they were told that the government would stand by the reduction in the duty they went back home, and what did they do? They made their factories bigger and increased the manufacture of automobiles so that production was greater than it had ever been before.

An hon. MEMBER: Export trade.

Mr. DONNELLY: Yes, but a good deal of it was home trade as well, and the home trade was better immediately after that was done than it had been for many years before.

Mr. STEWART: Will the hon. gentleman tell the committee what budget changes were made subsequently that gave relief?

Mr. DONNELLY: The duty remained, and all I know is that when I went to buy an automobile I paid anywhere from $50 or $75 to $100 less. I can see that by the removal of the excise tax people will be able to buy cars still cheaper.

An hon. MEMBER: They will pay for it in increased taxation.

Mr. DONNELLY: If we pay for it in some other form I am not concerned with that. The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore) referred to the fact that farmers had a great deal of protection. Well, so far as the wheat growers of western Canada are concerned, they have no protection in any shape or form. There is a duty on wheat, but that does not do us a particle of good. The duty on wheat, cattle, barley, oats and rye could be removed, and its removal would not mean anything to us. The duty is not a bit of good to us. It is all eye-wash, window-dressing, something to talk about to show that you are protecting the farmer. But such protection is of no use to us. We have to pay duties on the commodities we buy, and we do not get a bit of good from the duty on wheat. You put a duty on vegetables, machinery and other commodities that we use, and we pay.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Are you getting a guaranteed price for your wheat in the west?

[Mr. Donnelly.]

Mr. DONNELLY: We are getting a guaranteed price, yes. And why should we not? We have been contributing for years to the manufacturing concerns, so why should we not get a guaranteed price? I shall discuss that later on, but at the moment I am talking about automobiles and the hon. member will not divert me. Reference was also made to assistance given to dairymen. If you are going to use the dairymen in the way you have used the automobile people, then I suggest that the dairymen should get their cream separators free of duty, because the automobile people get their raw products free.

There is a suggestion that some automobile manufacturers may move out of the country. If any of them have moved or if they intend to move, it is not because they are not getting enough protection; it is because of the regulations and the manner in which the duty is collected. If I live in the west I pay duty not only on the automobile at the factory door, but on the freight as well. If I live in British Columbia I pay duty on about $150 more than I would pay for the car at the factory door because it costs that much more by reason of the freight. That is the first injustice to which the western consumer is subject. We pay duty on the car and on the freight to destination at a point south of the line out there, which is unfair to us and makes the duty that much higher.

Another point is this. These manufacturers hire an importing agent. The agent crosses the line and makes regulations and certain arrangements whereby the cars are bought, not at the retail price but wholesale, which is twenty-five, thirty and sometimes even as much as forty per cent less than the retail price on the other side; and when they bring the car to this country, if it costs $1,000 they pay duty not on $1,000 but on $650 or $700. Therefore they get a reduction and are able then quite easily to compete with manufacturers of cars in this country.

I maintain that the duty on cars should be collected at the factory door—wherever it may be in the United States—and we should impose that duty on the retail price, not on the wholesale price. The duty could be adjusted so as to be reasonable. But the way in which the duty is collected on automobiles to-day has made it possible for some of the automobile people to cross the line and manufacture in the United States instead of in Canada. That is the trouble; it is not the duty but the manner in which the duty is collected. The regulations should be changed.

Mr. ILSLEY: Before the discussion takes too wide a range, I should like to refer to some remarks made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) and two or three other members. The leader of the opposition referred to a dispatch to the Detroit Free Press. I have not seen that dispatch; but as I understood it, it was suggested by the writer that concern was being felt that two or three of the so-called big automobile manufacturing companies might transfer operations from Canada to the United States. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has referred to it, and I want to confirm what he has said. I have never heard it suggested that anything of that kind was likely to occur. I have never heard the fear expressed that it might occur. The fear has been expressed that a limited range of cars with small Canadian content might possibly be manufactured on the other side of the line instead of on this side. Whether that fear is justified I am not able to say with certainty; but the suggestion that has been made to me as Minister of National Revenue—and that is probably the reason why my name is mentioned in that regard—is that the law respecting valuations for duty purposes is not being properly applied by the Department of National Revenue. All that I can say in that regard is that these representations are receiving the consideration of the Department of National Revenue at the present time. I do not think there is anything more I can add.

Mr. MANION: The discussion has taken a much wider range than I had contemplated. Being of a peaceful disposition, I assure the committee that the last thought in the world that entered my mind was to stir up any contention. I really was looking for information, and I have got some; more, I must confess, from my hon. friend to my right and some other hon. gentlemen than from the ministers perhaps, because apparently the article was not sent to them. There have been resolutions—

Mr. MacNICOL: One from the city council of Windsor.

Mr. MANION: Yes, one, a very strong one, from the city council of Windsor, and various others. I assume they have been sent to the minister and other hon. members. Perhaps I had better put the one from the Windsor city council on record. It reads:

Whereas the 1938 trade treaty entered into between Canada and the United States of America provides, among other things, for the removal of the 3 per cent excise tax on imported automobiles, which removal far offsets the concession granted to manufacturers handling less than 10,000 units annually when the Canadian content in certain instances was reduced from 50 per cent to 40 per cent;

And whereas the removal of the excise tax aforesaid was included in a treaty which is binding for a period of three years, and such removal was not requested by any Canadian automobile manufacturer but by several small manufacturers who do not operate in Canada;

And whereas the removal of the said excise tax has resulted in the Willys-Overland Corporation withdrawing its decision to locate a plant in Canada, and, in addition, the Packard Motor Company of Canada and Hudson-Essex Motors of Canada are closing down their Canadian plants and arranging to import all the automobile units which were previously manufactured in Canada, with a consequent loss of income to Canadian workmen and an increased burden on the already overburdened taxpayer who must provide unemployment relief;

And whereas the removal of the said excise tax may enable the three major automobile industries in Canada to import finished automobiles cheaper than they are able to manufacture them, thus causing further drastic reductions in the amount of employment available for Canadian workmen;

Now therefore be and it is hereby resolved that this council file immediately with the Prime Minister of Canada, the Minister of Finance (Canada), and the Minister of National Revenue a vigorous protest against the government's action in removing the 3 per cent excise tax on imported automobiles, thus drastically reducing the available employment for Canadian workmen by making it more profitable for automobile manufacturers to import the finished product than to process the automobile in Canada;

And further that a delegation be authorized to attend before the Minister of National Revenue for the purpose of setting forth the irreparable damage which has been done to the automotive industry in Canada; pointing out that the automobile industry and allied trades account for over 70 per cent of Windsor's total employment, and that at present these people are faced with the slackest season experienced since 1935 with the possibility that an even lower level may yet be reached, and urging that every possible effort be put forth to remedy the situation immediately.

That is the resolution of the city council of Windsor. What I wanted to say on rising is that when I spoke earlier I was not particularly pleading—in fact I was not pleading at all, I was quoting the dispatch in the Detroit Free Press—I was thinking, not particularly of the industry so much as of the workmen in the industry. It has, of course, been a debatable subject for many years to those of us who have had to deal with tariffs in this parliament, whether we ever should have built up in Canada an automobile industry at all; but the fact is that under both parties we have built up the industry here, particularly in Windsor, in Hamilton and around the Niagara peninsula, and in Oshawa, whose representative spoke so eloquently a few minutes ago. We have built up this great industry with thousands of men dependent upon it for their livelihood. I do not say this with any intention of lecturing them, but I do not think the rather extreme attitude taken by some of our western friends against the protective tariff in a case like this is fair, particularly in view of what has already been pointed out—and I am supporting it; I have no criticism to offer—that this year at any rate we are giving the western wheat grower the very finest type of protection from the point of view of dollars and cents. After all, a subsidy of $48,000,000 or $50,000,000, or perhaps more, is protection of the strongest kind. I do not want to be misquoted; I repeat that I am saying nothing against it; I have said in the west and I say it here in the east; I am one who believes that we must give both the extreme east and the extreme west of this country compensation for the tariff. But I think that when the east, which is largely paying the taxes at the present time and under present conditions, is willing to contribute its very heavy share of this forty-eight or fifty million dollars to the wheat grower—

An hon. MEMBER: Without grousing.

Mr. MANION: Yes, I do not think there has been much growling from the east. To my mind it has been done in a very fine spirit. When the east is willing to do that, I do not think the antagonistic attitude of the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly)—

Mr. DONNELLY: They took it from us before; why should they not give some of it back?

Mr. MANION: —towards protection in general was altogether justified. After all, if we have kept men at work in Windsor, Oshawa and other cities, it is just as useful to Canada as to keep men at work out west. We should remember that we are working on the basis of a Canadian nation, not just the east or the west. I think some in the east as well as some in the west, but perhaps a greater proportion in the west, must learn that the east and the west must work together.

But if the statements made in this resolution are correct, the danger is that what is going to happen is that two or three big companies in Windsor or Oshawa may close down or reduce their operations so that there will be very much less employment in those cities, and yet automobiles will not be any cheaper. In other words, there will not be any cut in price at all, and thousands of men being thrown out of work will add to the troubles of this country, and of this government if you will.

In regard to the remark of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) that these industries should take care of their men, again I agree with him. I think we are coming to the time when all industries must do more than they have done in the past to ensure the year-round employment and the future of their employees. It happens rather strangely that I recall speaking to a huge meeting of industrialists in the Prince Edward hotel, in the city of Windsor on October 15, 1931, when I was a minister of the late government—I remember the date for a personal reason of my own—and advocating that very thing. I pointed out that there had been too much tendency in the past—

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member permit a question—

Mr. MANION: Will the hon. member first let me finish my sentence. I said there had been too much tendency in the past for industrialists, when conditions became bad, to take care of their plant and machinery but to let the human part of their organization, their employees, the most important part, be turned out on the street to be cared for by charity or by the state. I believe industry must correct that. A good many companies in the United States and some in Canada are to-day doing so. Industry must combine with the government of the day, whatever government it may happen to be, in caring for its employees, giving them work throughout the year so far as it can be done.

Now did my hon. friend wish to ask a question?

Mr. MARTIN: I can cover it later.

Mr. MANION: That is the main point I wanted to make. It is not a case in my mind of trying to care for the shareholder or the bondholder; I am not particularly worried about them; I am chiefly interested in maintaining employment in this country. We have built up the industry, and I believe the government might very well give serious thought to the presentations which have been made here this afternoon from various sections of the house. I do not think they are finished; I know the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Brown) has been trying a number of times to get an opportunity to speak for his section. Many sections of Canada are affected. I hope the ministers are correct in their statement, although neither of them seems very familiar with the statements made here.

Mr. DUNNING: We are familiar with what is rather more important, that is the attitude of the companies themselves.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps so. I am not criticizing, but the ministers seemed indefinite in their statement. I should be glad to see that item held over—

Mr. DUNNING: It will be in any event.

Mr. MANION: —until another day, and let the ministers make further inquiry and see if more definite information cannot be given to the committee than we have been given this afternoon.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, speaking immediately after my earlier remarks, I think would leave the impression that I for one am interested in this question only from the point of view of seeing that the automobile industry was maintained in this country.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not intend that.

Mr. MARTIN: I am grateful to the hon. member for that correction, because he will recall that several weeks ago in this house, speaking on the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), I referred specifically to the condition of unemployment in so far as it affected the workingmen employed in the automobile industry. On that occasion I pointed out, and I do so again to-day, that the automobile industry, important as it is to the economy of this country, is at the same time illustrative of some of the weaknesses of what I called then and call now our acquisitive and competitive system. Consequently, and assuming that this system is here to stay for some time in spite of what hon. gentlemen opposite may wish, this is a fact. With this in mind, I urge this house and this government to bring in at once a system of contributory unemployment insurance on a national scale, so as to take care of the unemployment in reference to that particular industry.

Mr. HEAPS: How could it?

Mr. MARTIN: I cannot get on to that point, because I have discussed it already. The automobile industry is certainly one in which that measure would definitely apply.

I think the leader of the opposition did not go perhaps as far as I would when he said that we are now faced with the fact that the automobile industry is here. Whether or not it should have been introduced into our economy is another question, the leader of the opposition observed. Looking at the facts squarely, I suggest to him and to hon. members of this committee, having in mind all the subsidiary industries that are dependent upon the automobile industry; having in mind the thousands of men directly employed in that industry and in other industries which owe their existence to it, it is a very good thing for Canada that among our secondary industries we have the automobile industry. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), who these days is confronted with the problem of giving men work, would indeed be faced with a tremendous problem if not only in my own city but in Oshawa and other places throughout this country there was no automobile industry.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My hon. friend suggests that the automobile industry is here to stay. It is here under certain privileges, and I would ask the hon. member whether the government ought not to insist that something like security of employment and decent wages should be maintained.

Mr. MARTIN: I fully agree with that. A few moments ago I repeated what I stated in this house when the resolution urging the adoption of a scheme of unemployment insurance was under discussion.

Mr. COLDWELL: Let the government take the responsibility.

Mr. MARTIN: Of course; I have said so, and I repeat it. That is one of the delights of being on this side of the house; one can freely express a dissentient view without fear of the party whip.

Mr. MANION: As long as you vote right.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member may be sure I will vote right.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Why should not the industry carry the risk?

Mr. MARTIN: I am coming to that, and it is a perfectly proper question. When this government took office in 1935 they did what I thought was the proper thing, having in mind the complex features of this industry; they referred the whole matter to the tariff board, where it remains under a continuing reference. I attended the hearings of that board for almost two and a half months in an endeavour not only to follow the briefs and presentations but also to learn something about an industry of which, as to its technical side, I had very little knowledge. No one who followed that inquiry would dare rise in his place in this house and dogmatically say either that there should be no tariff on automobiles or that there should be an excessive tariff. The man who makes that sort of extreme statement I dare say is not familiar with the problem itself. But while the tariff board has considered and continues to consider this problem, I fully agree with what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said. There is a duty upon industry to provide adequately, to the extent that industry can for its employees who inevitably, even in normal times, are not continuously engaged during the course of the year.

I do not want to appear narrow or sectional in my outlook; I trust that my conduct in this house has been otherwise. But I cannot help agreeing in a measure perhaps not with the provocation but with some of the things suggested by the leader of the opposition. Undoubtedly anyone who looks at our problem generally will be impressed with the need of continued compromise between one section and another. It is not going to do my hon. friends from the west any good to suggest to those of us who live in the east that we are unmindful of the problems of the west or that under our economy we are causing those in the west to be continually subordinated to our interests. Surely that is not the picture. Undoubtedly we have conflicting economic interests, and the task of government in this country is to reconcile and compromise those interests in the interests of all.

I might rise in my place in this house and make myself a very popular man in my own constituency and my own province by saying, "I am going to oppose the wheat bonus. I am going to oppose the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act." I could make myself a very popular member in Windsor and other parts of Ontario if I did that, but I am not going to stoop to that kind of practice. I simply make an appeal to the house, to my hon. friends from the west who have great problems, to realize that we in the east have great problems as well. Come to my own city of Windsor; go up street after street and you will find men and women living under the most difficult economic circumstances, just as difficult as those experienced by the unfortunate people in the drought areas of the west. And what is true in the urban part of my riding is equally true in the rural section. We too have our problems, and we are not going to get anywhere in this house by pitting our sectional and political interests against the interests of Canada generally.

I hope I have not spoken too strongly, but I do feel that hon. members and particularly those from the western part of this country, regardless of their political affiliations, should realize what the automobile industry means to Canada. True, as a consumer, the western farmer is placed under a difficulty to which, with a freer system of trade, he would not be subjected; but that is an inevitable circumstance in the economy of this country, as long as we are going to preserve under this confederation nine provinces, with these various sectional interests; and the sooner we realize this, the better.

The leader of the opposition has referred to the resolution which was passed by the city council of Windsor. I forwarded that resolution to the Minister of Finance, the Minister of National Revenue, the Prime Minister and others. They were already aware of it; they had read it long before it was read in this house. It was perfectly natural that before the fact became accomplished, with all the suggested rumours and the like, people living in an area in which the automobile industry predominated should find themselves somewhat concerned. That resolution represents a perfectly legitimate concern. It represents an appeal on the part of working men and on the part of others, asking not only the government—because the government is aware of the importance of the industry to Canada—but also the house to appreciate the significance of the automobile industry in the economy of our country, and particularly to those who derive their income as working men from employment in that industry.

I must say, and I say this in the house, that I first of all thank the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) for the statement he has made to-day, namely that this whole matter is receiving the consideration of the government. I want the committee to know that there could have been no more painstaking effort on the part of the Minister of Finance and on the part of the Minister of National Revenue in considering this problem, as they have done during the past two or three weeks particularly, in conference day after day with members from Essex county and other parts of Ontario and myself.

Mr. MacNICOL: You cannot do anything with the matter now; the treaty is passed and in operation.

Mr. MARTIN: If my hon. friend would learn sometimes to subjugate his political interests in the interests of objective treatment, I think he would sometimes make a greater contribution to the debates of the house.

Mr. MacNICOL: How clever; well, well!

Mr. MARTIN: Well, it may not be as clever as it was intended to be, but I hope it struck the right note.

As far as the excise tax is concerned, let us of course face realities. It is in the treaty. It applies not only to the automobile industry, but all along the line. There are other ways of providing compensation for an indispensable industry—

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What compensation?

Mr. MARTIN: I am afraid the Customs Act is a detailed one, but if my hon. friend is prepared to try to understand some of its measures and clauses, he would understand the kind of aid that can be given. I do not think it is necessary for me to advise the government on this score, because it is aware of the importance of the industry to Canada, as much as I am; but speaking for an area where the automobile industry predominates, I would urge the government with all the sincerity I can to regard this measure not as one which concerns Windsor, not as one which concerns Oshawa, not as one which concerns the province of Ontario, but as one which concerns the great majority of the people of Canada.

Second, I ask the government to realize, as I am sure it does and will realize—irrespective of any representations I make to-day—that even in normal times, and even assuming this period of economic crisis had passed, unemployment in this industry is to a great extent inevitable. As the leader of the opposition has said, unless in the very near future we provide some measure of constancy of income, some measure of security of income for men engaged in the automobile industry, and in other industries as well, the situation will in its proportions touch not alone the automobile industry, not alone secondary industry, but industry as a whole.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the hon. member any suggestion to make as to what the government should do in the existing situation?

Mr. MARTIN: I am anxious at all times to be as courteous as I can, particularly to the older members. If I said something to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) which he did not like, I should like to withdraw it at once.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not see why my hon. friend should class me as an older member?

Mr. MARTIN: At least I have put myself adequately on record.

I answer what the hon. member for Winnipeg North has asked, I have already made a suggestion, and I am afraid if I repeated it, your honour, whose generosity has been unparalleled throughout the course of my observations, might possibly stop me. I have already suggested what should be done.

Mr. HEAPS: Unemployment insurance?

Mr. MARTIN: Certainly. If there is any industry which unemployment insurance would benefit, it is the automobile industry.

Mr. HEAPS: I am figuring—

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think the hon. member is in order.

Mr. HEAPS: I am not speaking about unemployment insurance at all.

The CHAIRMAN: I was about to say that the hon. member for Essex East is out of order when he discusses, or attempts to discuss unemployment insurance under this item.

Mr. HEAPS: My question is this: In view of the fact that there is a possibility of these industries moving from Canada to the country to the south of us, is there any suggestion whereby the industry might remain in Canada?

Mr. MARTIN: In answer to the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) I referred to the provisions of the Customs Act. In my judgment there is within the terms of the present Customs Act an opportunity to obviate whatever harm may exist because of the removal of the three per cent excise. If I interpreted correctly what the Minister of National Revenue has said, that is one of the circumstances or proposals which is now being considered.

Mr. Chairman, I say in conclusion that this question is one which is not capable merely of dogmatic conclusion. Up to now the government of Canada has placed full reliance on the inquiry of the tariff board. That board, sitting with full opportunity of hearing all sides of the industry is, in my opinion, the best body to give the house and the government advice on a complex matter. I suggest to the government that the recommendations of that board, after the full and exhaustive inquiry it makes, should be given the consideration that is intended.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Carried.

Mr. MARTIN: I wish to say one more thing, in spite of what the hon. member for Melfort has said. The item is not carried yet. The suggestion is made that some industries are going to leave Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: We have heard that many times.

Mr. MARTIN: The fact is that one has already left.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Which one?

Mr. MARTIN: One has already left. The fact is, also, that unless the precautionary steps, which I believe are at least to be derived inferentially from what the Minister of National Revenue has said, are taken, other industries may have to leave. But the automobile industry has made an honest effort to include as much of the materials that go to constitute a car out of materials made in Canada, as any industry has. While some hon. members opposite may say that this government is hurting industry, in spite of the difficulty at the present time let me tell them it was under this government that the Ford Motor Company was able to make an addition to its plant costing $8,000,000. It was under this government that the Chrysler corporation was able to add to its plant by a $3,000,000 additional structure.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Conservative tariff policy.

Mr. MARTIN: That is what my hon. friend says. I say it was under this government, and there was not then the same tariff policy as prevailed when my hon. friend's party was in power.

Mr. DUNNING: I can see that this item will not carry, so it will have to stand. While the committee will continue sitting to-night, if it meets the convenience of hon. members the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) will take up schedule II.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) was ruled out of order to-day. I take the matter up because I notice item 415 was discussed on March 21. I turn over the page and find that at six o'clock the item had not passed. I understand from the hon. member for Broadview that this afternoon when he attempted to say something with respect to it he was ruled out of order. He would like to have an opportunity to speak. I know the minister had no intention of preventing the hon. member from speaking. I should like to have it understood that when we sit again the hon. member will have an opportunity to speak respecting item 415. Hansard shows that it had not passed.

Mr. DUNNING: My impression was the hon. member for Broadview went on subsequently, and did discuss it.

Mr. MANION: This afternoon he did not get a chance, and he wanted to say something about it. Is it understood he will have that opportunity?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Item stands.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

[M. Martin.]

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On schedule II.

United States tariff—1. Acetic acid containing by weight of acetic acid:

Not more than 65 per centum: ¾ cent per pound.

More than 65 per centum: one cent per pound.

Mr. HARRIS: Mr. Chairman, it is not customary to start in on a new schedule without the minister making a general statement covering the whole schedule. In the agreement as it is before us, there is a summary preceding schedule II, but surely on an important matter such as this the minister will make a general statement. We have another minister handling this part of the agreement, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), and it is only reasonable to expect from him a general statement in like manner as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) made a statement. I have never in all my experience in this house seen the committee of ways and means start on a schedule just as fast as we have started on this, by the chairman calling item 1, without any statement whatsoever from the minister. If the minister is not quite clear as to the sort of statement we expect, it might assist him if I asked a few questions.

Has the minister been in close collaboration with his colleagues on every item of this section, or did one minister give certain concessions in the Canadian market without a correlated study by the minister directly concerned with concessions received by Canada? Is there any balance-sheet based on trade over any given period, whether that trade be trade as shown in the statistics of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the year ending December, 1937, or trade as reflected in the trade statistics as we receive them from our own bureau of statistics?

The minister might also tell us what sort of balance sheet he had in his mind. He is more or less a trained man who, when he looks at a business transaction apart from political considerations, would first give some thought to what we are getting and what we are giving. I have a full realization, Mr. Chairman, of all the political and other considerations which the minister finds it necessary to carry in his mind, of the good that treaties of this kind may do when negotiated between two democratic countries like Canada and the United States, so closely associated in so many ways, and also of the cooperation that we gave to help the mother country make a trade agreement with the United States. I have all that in mind, but there is another feature, and that is the cold-blooded figures of the balance sheet. That is what we do not have, and I say to this government that they have not been entirely fair to the Canadian people.

I say to the members of this house: You do not know what you are passing in this agreement in dollars and cents. I will put it the other way: Leave out everything else, and I ask, do you know what you are passing in dollars and cents? Have you the information in front of you? Do you not agree with me, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, with all the assistants and executives he has around him, is the man who should be charged with the responsibility of letting us know what we are doing here?

Mr. EULER: Give us a chance.

Mr. HARRIS: It is true he made a speech in the house on the trade treaties in the month of January, 1939, when he apologized because he had only forty minutes and all that sort of thing. But this trade treaty is not limited to the month of January, 1939, and in all fairness to those of us who are at least trying to gather some sort of idea whether this trade treaty is fair and equitable, we should have more information.

In the very document which the Prime Minister tabled on the day these trade treaties were introduced, there was a tabular statement. That tabular statement should have been in our hands six or eight weeks before that. My second observation is this, that that tabular statement, as the minister well knows, when it comes to the concessions which the United States gives to Canada, gives the dollar value of the commodity affected. There is, on the other hand, no similar tabular statement given us by this government as to the amount of goods affected during any particular period by the concessions given by Canada. Why should those of us who are interested in this have to work out the calculation for ourselves, and then not know how the treaties were negotiated? This is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce received for Canada; these are the concessions, taken off as accurately as they could be by clerks and a couple of boys at the university of Toronto who have taken post-graduate courses in commerce and finance and have no political ends to serve. On all items over $25,000, based on the trade of Canada for the year ending March 31, 1938, we have given concessions double in dollar value what we are receiving. That is without touching excise tax; when excise tax is added, our concessions are treble what we have received.

I complain about this procedure, Mr. Chairman, that you call item No. 1, and the minister is going to slip these items through one after the other, while we who in this House of Commons are charged with responsibility to the Canadian people are not clear as to what we are doing on the hard basis of dollars and cents. The minister has made clear his sentiments about negotiating this deal on behalf of democracy and all that sort of thing, but do we know what we are entitled to know? Has the government, in following the old procedure of holding back information to the very last minute, acted quite fairly towards us? They held back the treaty until it was signed and then gave their press releases. Take this so-called tabular statement of tariff changes; why is this information held back until the matter is introduced in the house and the minister takes his place in this chamber to pass the individual items? That is not giving us a fair opportunity to study this treaty.

Our good friend the United States, as is well known, do not do business in that way. They treat these business matters on a business basis, and I think it is time—never mind the past, "it was done this way before," and all that sort of thing—we had a little more business principle injected into the procedure in this chamber, particularly when we have a problem of this kind, which it is so easy to put in the form of dollars and cents so that he who runs may read. Yet we have not the facts in that particular form.

I am sorry that I have to ask the minister all these questions. I should have liked to see him give the committee a statement and avoid the necessity of asking for this information; but in the absence of it I feel, upon my responsibility as a member of this house, that before the minister goes on with the items, I must ask him to give us some idea as to how they were negotiated, tell us why the less amount of duties payable on goods going into the United States is $2,400,000, while the less amount of duties payable on goods coming into Canada is $5,130,000 and the less amount of excise payable on goods coming into Canada will be anywhere from ten to fifteen million dollars; why on the one hand we should give away from our exchequer some fifteen million dollars, and why on the other the concessions made by the United States amount to only two and a half million dollars. At the same time he should have taken us into his confidence and told us why the Canadian people have not been given some idea of what has been going on, so that they could have made representations before the pact was signed, and would have been able to judge better the consequences of it to Canada. Before proceeding, I should appreciate it greatly if the Minister of Trade and Commerce would tell us what he has to say in that regard.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The Minister of Trade and Commerce does not think that this is the moment to make a general resumé of the whole agreement. As a matter of fact, as the committee well knows, we spent probably a week in discussing the resolution, and the general aspects of the trade agreement were pretty fully dealt with at that time. The hon. member made reference to what was done by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) when schedule I was being considered. As a matter of fact, no preliminary statement was made by the Minister of Finance. He was not in the house when the first items were passed and carried.

Mr. HARRIS: If I may interrupt, do not let us again have to refer to the fact that all of us were sorry to see the Minister of Finance so much as introducing the measure; we all had a great deal of sympathy for him, knowing he was not as well as he would like to be. As I said in my remarks yesterday, I stayed away from here for two days on account of the government placing the Minister of Finance in the position of putting this particular measure through the house.

Mr. EULER: I do not propose to take refuge behind anything that the Minister of Finance may or may not have done. I would merely repeat that in a general way the agreement has been discussed directly in this house by hon. members in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and again when the resolution was introduced.

My hon. friend speaks of the minister slipping these items through. There is no intention on the part of the minister, even if he could, to do anything of the kind. He cannot do it even though he wanted to. I should be glad enough to see the items go through quickly, especially in view of the fact that in any event no change can be made in them, but there is certainly no intention on the part of the minister to try to choke off discussion.

I reiterate that it seems to me that now, since we are in committee, we ought to discuss this item by item. My hon. friend has asked for a sort of balance sheet or a statement of debits and credits as to the amount of business affected in our imports and our exports. I think all that was pretty well dealt with; but if he is going to expect me to say that, when one particular item was negotiated with United States representatives, we would then say, "Now we are going to get so much on this item and we are going to give so much on the other item" and try to strike an absolute balance, I am sure that every intelligent man in the house—and they are all intelligent—must know that such is absolutely impossible.

Mr. HARRIS: All intelligent except me, I suppose.

Mr. EULER: No. I give my hon. friend credit for having about as much intelligence as anyone else in the house, and he knows it would be impossible for me to do anything of the sort. Trade agreements are not made in that way. I have not had so great an experience in connection with them, and perhaps he has not either; but I assure him it is not possible that a man shall sit down and say, "You give me this; I give you that"; then, "You give me this; I give you that" and so on, going through the whole schedule. That is not the procedure.

As to the amount of business affected in dollars and cents, that has been given before. But I would again say to the committee, in all fairness, we are now in committee dealing with the items one after another, and I shall be glad, as hon. members ask for the information, to give them all the information in dollars and cents and in any other way it is possible for me to give full information on each item as we discuss it. I think that is a fair attitude to take.

Mr. HARRIS: The minister is quite ready to give the figures on each and every item. If he has the figures on each and every item, of course he has the figure for all the items, that is the grand total. Could he give us the grand total before he starts in: how much trade is affected; how much less in duties there is to be paid by the Canadian people on goods shipped into the United States; and in like manner, how much less duty the United States had to pay on shipments of goods into Canada?

Mr. EULER: I cannot give the information exactly as my hon. friend wants it. I shall not press the point that the hon. member is a little out of order in asking for that information on one particular item. He is entitled to all the information that can be given on the item itself and on the other items as we come to them. I was not prepared for a question of this sort, but I have a statement with regard to the concessions to us affecting 202 items, amounting to $327,000,000. The concessions which we gave affect approximately $280,000,000. I do not know whether the hon. member wants that information, but it has been in printed form before the members of the house for weeks.

Mr. HARRIS: Will the minister concede this? Will he have his department put in tabular form, item by item, the amount of business consummated as at March 31, 1938, or, if he wants to use the Washington figures, as I understand his commissioners did when in Washington, the amount of business consummated in their fiscal year, the amount of duty payable in the past year, and the amount of duty that will be payable under the new rates, giving information with regard to both imports and exports?

Mr. EULER: I can assure my hon. friend that has never been done before. While I do not want to enter into any comparisons or recriminations, I am sure it was not done in that way in 1932 when the other agreements were made. Besides, if I conceded what my hon. friend asks, we would be here for three or four weeks getting that information in tabular form. I think we ought to go on with the discussion of the item that has been called.

Mr. HARRIS: The minister says we ought to go on with the item—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I agree with the minister that we should follow the procedure which has always been observed in committee of the whole and take the schedule item by item, beginning with the one that has been called.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): With regard to item 1, which we are discussing, I submit that before we can properly discuss even this item, which is a concession given to Canada under the agreement, there are two things that we should have before us. In the first place we have been told by the Prime Minister himself that we have made no more concessions under this agreement than we were asked to make by Great Britain. In order that we, as members of this house, can properly judge that question, we should be given the information as to what concessions Great Britain asked us to make so that this tripartite treaty might be made. We have never had that information, although I have asked for it several times. I have requested that it be tabled. We do not know what concessions Great Britain asked us to make. There are certain things that Great Britain asked us to do. That is one thing; and there is this other factor, where I think the smoke screen has been laid, that this treaty we are making is something entirely different from the trade agreement between Great Britain and the United States. Before we can discuss this item, we should know whether we have adequate concessions. We ought to have that information.

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. member for St. Paul's please discuss item 1. He is not doing so.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have been talking about item 1, and I say that before we can intelligently discuss it as part of the treaty we should have the information which I have asked for time after time.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to ask this question regarding this item and all others. Was there any consultation with business or labour or agriculture before this change was entered into? It seems to me the change is for the benefit of the United States. Did the minister do what was done at Washington? There they consulted industry, labour, business and agriculture and gave them a chance. I submit that when we are dealing with something of this great importance and magnitude, those who are affected have a right to be heard. What steps did the minister take to notify the Canadian interests I name, concerned? At Washington they had thirty days in which to file objections and three months to appear before a board. Even admitting the difference in constitution and functions between the two governments, surely in a matter of this magnitude, before such far-reaching hundreds and hundreds of changes are brought about, those who are vitally affected should be consulted.

Mr. EULER: I can answer my hon. friend very briefly. The producers of this item made representations to the government to try to obtain this concession. It is a concession of 50 per cent. The tariff is reduced from $1\frac{3}{8}$ cents to $\frac{3}{4}$ cent in one case and in the other from $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents to 1 cent. This was secured as a direct result of representations made by Canadian producers. It has been done for the benefit of the Canadian producer.

Mr. BARBER: What firms or companies asked for the reduction? Where is the main production in Canada?

Mr. EULER: I can hardly give the names of the firms. There are only one or two, located in the province of Quebec.

Mr. BARBER: None in British Columbia?

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. WALSH: What I have to say on this item has reference generally to the whole treaty. My remarks can be applied to this particular item, and I put them forward as a suggestion, and a hope that in future trade agreements we may avoid the discussion that has taken place here to-night. The question has been asked, to what extent the people interested in this particular item were consulted? Were they given an opportunity to make representations? Were they advised that this item was one which was under consideration, as happened in the United States? When the people on the United States side of the line are drawing up a treaty of this kind or entering into negotiations, as the minister well knows, every item in their part of the treaty that is going to be affected was discussed with those interested, and the people manufacturing the product in the United States, or who might be directly or indirectly affected, were consulted long before the people representing Canada were negotiating with the government of the United States. I have in my hand an extract from volume 48, part 1, Public Laws of the United States, 1933-34, with particular reference to the Tariff Act of 1930 amendment approved June 12, 1934 —it even gives the time of approval, 9.15 p.m. I read section 4:

> Before any foreign trade agreement is concluded with any foreign government or instrumentality thereof under the provisions of this act, reasonable public notice of the intention to negotiate an agreement with such government or instrumentality shall be given in order that any interested person may have an opportunity to present his views to the President, or to such agency as the President may designate, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe; and before concluding such agreement the President shall seek information and advice in respect thereto from the United States tariff commission, the Departments of State, Agriculture and Commerce and such other sources as he may deem appropriate.

So we see that the negotiators on the part of the United States are carefully circumscribed by certain provisions that prevent their industries from being injured without fair opportunity being given to make representation beforehand in proper quarters. In other words, those negotiating the treaty for the United States are better armed than those negotiating the treaty on behalf of Canada.

In particular reference to this item 1, and with reference generally to all items in this treaty, I claim and maintain that those interested in the various items in Canada were not given the same opportunity as those in the United States, and I am asking the government to give consideration to the possibility of incorporating into our law what they have in the laws of the United States, something that will give our people a better opportunity to make their views known to the government long before the terms of a treaty are negotiated and signed and come into effect. I think that is a fair and reasonable suggestion, it is a proposition that I have urged on previous occasions and one which I think should commend itself to every hon. member, as it certainly does to everyone engaged in business and industry in Canada.

Mr. MARSHALL: I should like to ask the minister a couple of simple questions in order to get this clear in my mind. With reference to the last two columns of figures, under the heading of "Value of United States imports 1937 (preliminary)," what is the meaning of the word "preliminary," and also what is that total of $3,875? Is that the total amount of imports into the United States?

Mr. EULER: Yes, it is described as imports.

Mr. MARSHALL: From all countries?

Mr. EULER: Yes, and then there is a column headed "From Canada"; one column for the total imports and the other for imports from Canada.

I should like to reply for a moment to the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh). I cannot quite grasp the point he desires to make. If he had made the argument which he has just made when we were on schedule I, concessions proposed to be made to the United States on imports into the Canadian market, possibly injuring Canadian producers, I could understand his argument. But this is a case where we are obtaining advantages for Canadian producers in the United States market. We are trying to do something for these people. This was done at the request of the Canadian producers. We tried to please them and I think we have helped. I do not see how anyone could possibly be injured as my hon. friend charges. If he said, now here is an intention to bring in this particular commodity at a lower rate of duty into Canada, I could understand it. But the shoe is on the other foot; we are making it easier for the Canadian producer to sell these goods in the United States. Surely there is not much wrong with that, unless he might say we ought to have had a still further reduction. But we got it as low as it was possible to get it.

Mr. BARBER: Were there any exports to Great Britain under this item 1? If so, what quantity? And were there any imports from Great Britain? Would the minister give the exports to and imports from the United States, and also the tariff on this product entering Canada?

Mr. EULER: I am not sure that I can remember all my hon. friend's question. There are no exports recorded to Great Britain, I am informed. The imports were about $3,600, all from the United States. There are no imports from Great Britain.

Mr. BARBER: What is the United States tariff on this item?

Mr. EULER: It is all there right before my hon. friend.

Mr. BARBER: Then what is the rate entering Canada from the United States?

Mr. EULER: The most favoured nation rate is 12½ cents a gallon, and for each degree over proof another 1¾ cents.

Mr. HARRIS: Is this vinegar edible under item 1? The item is acetic acid, not more than 65 per cent; and again, more than 65 per cent.

Mr. EULER: No, it is not edible.

Mr. HARRIS: The minister probably knows that this item was free of all duty going into the United States under the United States Tariff Act, 1931. Why did they not take all the duty off again?

Mr. EULER: No, it was not free. Under the Fordney-McCumber tariff of 1932 it was ¾ cent a pound just as it is now; under the Hawley-Smoot tariff, 1⅜ cents; under the 1935 trade agreement, 1⅜ cents; and it now becomes ¾ cent a pound.

Mr. WALSH: Can the minister say whether there was any noticeable increase in the export of this item to the United States during the first two months of the current calendar year?

Mr. EULER: I have not the figures for that.

Mr. WALSH: Would those figures be available from the bureau of statistics? I suggest that these items would go through with a good deal more facility if hon. Liberal members opposite would give a little more attention to the items and less attention to amusing themselves.

Mr. HOWARD: If the hon. member—

Mr. WALSH: If the cap fits the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard), let him sit down.

Mr. HOWARD: If the hon. member directs that remark to me, let him tell me whether he objects to this reduction in the United States duty.

Mr. WALSH: I object to the silly nonsense on the part of the hon. member for Sherbrooke and others on that side of the house.

Mr. HOWARD: I think, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member might withdraw that remark.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member knows it was unparliamentary, and I am sure he will withdraw it.

Mr. WALSH: I always withdraw anything that is unparliamentary, but I hope it will lead to better decorum.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—2. Vinyl acetate, polymerized or unpolymerized, and synthetic resins made in chief value therefrom, not specially provided for: 3 cents per pound and 15 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—10. Fir or Canada balsam, natural and uncompounded, and not containing alcohol: 5 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—11. Synthetic resins made in chief value from vinyl acetate, not specially provided for: 3 cents per pound and 15 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—16. Calcium acetate, crude: ½ cent per pound.

Mr. HARRIS: I imagine this is acetic acid using lime as a carrier. Has the minister the export figures for the two different grades of calcium acetate, the red and the gray?

Mr. EULER: No, I am not able to supply that.

Mr. HARRIS: Would the minister tell us the duty on calcium acetate coming into Canada from the United States, and what our imports were from that country, if any?

Mr. EULER: It is free coming into Canada, and imports amounted to about $18.

Mr. HARRIS: I should like to ask if the calcium acetate carries the same rate when it is used for fertilizer as it does when used in the manufacture of acetic acid.

Mr. EULER: If it is brought into Canada for the manufacture of fertilizer it comes in free.

Mr. HARRIS: What was the rate in 1931?

Mr. EULER: In 1930 it was one cent a pound.

Mr. HARRIS: I notice no figure is given for the value of United States imports. I should like to ask if the 1937 preliminary figures were supplied by the Department of Commerce at Washington.

Mr. EULER: They are not available from United States records on this item, so we had to give them from our own records. As far as our records are concerned there were no exports at all.

Mr. HARRIS: The figures as given in the Trade of Canada for the year ending March 31, 1937, show a trade amounting to 118,239 pounds.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. HARRIS: Before the item carries, I should like an answer to a bona fide question that I asked; that is, the value of United States imports. I should like to know if the figures in this tabular statement which has been supplied to the members are the figures which have been issued by the Department of Commerce at Washington in regard to United States trade.

Mr. EULER: They are, but in this instance there are no imports at all.

Mr. HARRIS: Then, taking these figures, I say again what I said on a previous occasion, that by addition and subtraction the balance of trade against Canada last year was $196,000,000.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—29. Cobalt oxide: 10 cents per pound.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is cobalt oxide controlled by a cartel?

Mr. EULER: Yes, the only Canadian producer is a member of the international cartel.

Mr. HEAPS: What use are the tariffs in those instances?

Mr. EULER: Perhaps not very much.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—52. Sperm oil, crude: 2½ cents per gallon.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—52. Shark oil and shark-liver oil, including oil produced from sharks known as dogfish, not specially provided for: 10 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. BARBER: What is the production in Canada?

Mr. EULER: In 1936 it was 176,586 gallons.

[Mr. Harris.]

Mr. HEAPS: Are we on the first or second item 52?

The CHAIRMAN: Item 52 carried.

Mr. HARRIS: Mr. Chairman, I have before me item 52, and I was endeavouring to rise in my place and address the chair in order to ask a question. Will the minister explain the operation of section 601 of the Revenue Act, which is referred to in the tabular statement with regard to this item, and tell us what other items are affected by the tax of 3 cents a pound, and what kind of tax it is?

Mr. EULER: The products that are subject to the revenue tax are:

Whale oil (except sperm oil), fish oil (except cod oil, cod liver oil, and halibut liver oil), marine animal oil, tallow, inedible animal oils, inedible animal fats, inedible animal greases, fatty acids derived from any of the foregoing, and salts of any of the foregoing; all the foregoing, whether or not refined, sulphonated, sulphated, hydrogenated, or otherwise processed, 3 cents per pound: Provided, That no whale oil (except sperm oil), fish oil, or marine animal oil of any kind (whether or not refined, sulphonated, sulphated, hydrogenated or otherwise processed), or fatty acids derived therefrom, shall be admitted to entry, after June 30, 1939, free from the tax herein provided unless such oil was produced on vessels of the United States or in the United States or its possessions, from whales, fish or marine animals and parts thereof taken and captured by vessels of the United States.

I am not sure whether that is the information my hon. friend wants.

Mr. HARRIS: That is it exactly; thank you. When they were dealing with the Revenue Act of 1932 and the Revenue Act of 1936, which was an amendment, what happened to the other items the minister has just enumerated? Were any representations made in connection with them?

Mr. EULER: We could deal only with items of which we were the chief source of supply, and that did not apply in these other instances.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—58. Distilled or essential cedar-leaf oil, not containing alcohol: 12½ per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—203. Limestone (not suitable for use as monumental or building stone), crude, or crushed but not pulverized: 2½ cents per 100 pounds.

Item agreed to.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—207. Crude feldspar: 25 cents per ton.

Item agreed to.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister give us an idea of the total production of this mineral in Canada?

Mr. EULER: In 1937, 21,330 tons (crude and ground).

Mr. HEAPS: What is the value per ton of that commodity?

Mr. EULER: There is a total value of $178,160.

Mr. HARRIS: On a point of order; I feel that the item should be read. That has been the procedure for many years. Item 207, respecting crude feldspar, should be read.

The CHAIRMAN: There are two items numbered 207, the first of which has been passed. We are now discussing the second one, respecting crude feldspar.

Mr. HARRIS: And on the item respecting crude feldspar I base my point of order. I would make this observation: Articles contained in this schedule, such as crude feldspar which appears in the list of concessions by the United States, under schedule II, represent a better opportunity for Canada to get her products into the United States. We welcome that, very much. But crude feldspar and all other items in the schedule seem to be commodities which have a minimum of Canadian labour in them; they have a minimum of highly skilled labour, whereas in schedule I, goods coming into Canada on which concessions have been given, there seem to be items which have a maximum of labour content in them.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—208(f). Untrimmed phlogopite mica from which no rectangular piece exceeding two inches in length, or one inch in width may be cut: 10 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—208(g). Phlogopite mica waste and scrap valued at not more than 5 cents per pound: 15 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—208(h). Mica, ground or pulverized: 15 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. BARBER: What is the Canadian production of this item?

Mr. EULER: In 1937 there were 93,699 pounds of mica, rough cobbed; 206,757 pounds of knife trimmed; 172,774 pounds of thumb trimmed; 72,500 pounds of splittings; 1,252,887 pounds of scrap, and all of these have a total value of $132,011.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—209. Talc, steatite or soapstone: Ground, washed, powdered, or pulverized (except toilet preparations), valued at not more than $14 per ton: 17½ per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—214. Ground feldspar: 15 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. WALSH: In connection with item 214 I notice the value of United States imports in 1937 was zero. Has that been the same value for a number of years, or is it just significant for that particular year.

Mr. EULER: Apparently there has never been any large quantity exported from Canada to the United States. In 1936 there was $301 worth. The duty has been so high that it has not been possible to export.

Mr. WALSH: Is it because of lack of machinery in this country to produce ground feldspar, or is it the duty?

Mr. EULER: We have producers of ground feldspar in Canada. But the duty of 30 per cent was apparently too high to enable it to get into the United States market.

Mr. WALSH: That is the point I wish to make. Item 207 which has been passed refers to crude feldspar, and in connection with that item quantities have been exported. We are now dealing with ground feldspar, without any exports at all. Apparently the people of the United States are willing to import the crude product, but they are not willing to import feldspar on which work has been done. Is that the correct inference, or have I gone up the wrong alley?

Mr. EULER: I think the correct inference is that the people of the United States are apparently willing to let us send in some ground feldspar, because they have reduced the rate from 30 per cent to 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—214. Ground nepheline syenite: 15 per cent ad valorem.

Provided, that, if in any calendar year after 1938 the aggregate quantity of nepheline syenite in any form, whether dutiable or free, entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption exceeds 50,000 tons, the government of the United States of America and the government of Canada shall promptly enter into consultation, with a view to reaching an agreement as to whatever measures may be deemed appropriate, and if, within 60 days after the two governments enter into consultation, a mutually satisfactory settlement has not been effected, the government of the United States of America shall have the right to increase the duty on any nepheline syenite which is subject to duty and to impose a customs duty on any nepheline syenite which is not subject to duty entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption in any calendar year in excess of an aggregate quantity of 50,000 tons of nepheline syenite in any form.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—214. Stone, not specially provided for (except marble chip or granito and Cornwall stone), ground, or crushed otherwise than merely for the purpose of facilitating shipment to the United States: 15 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—214. Dead-burned basic refractory material containing 15 per centum or more of lime and consisting chiefly of magnesia and lime: 20 per cent ad valorem.

NOTE: The existing customs classification treatment of the merchandise described in this item as provided for in paragraph 214, Tariff Act of 1930, in accordance with the ruling announced in treasury decision 45041 (60 Treasury Decisions 114) shall be continued during the effective period of this agreement.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Walsh.]

United States tariff—301. Spiegeleisen containing more than one per centum of carbon: 75 cents per ton.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—302(d). Ferromanganese containing not less than 4 per centum of carbon, on the metallic manganese contained therein: $\frac{3}{8}$ cent per lb., plus $1\frac{1}{4}$ times the lowest rate of ordinary customs duty provided for manganese ore containing in excess of 10 per centum of metallic manganese the product of any foreign country except Cuba, at the time such ferromanganese is entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption; but not more than $1\frac{5}{8}$ cents per pound.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—302(i) Ferrosilicon, containing 8 per centum or more of silicon and less than 30 per centum: one cent per pound on the silicon contained therein.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—302(k). Ferrochrome or ferrochromium containing 3 per centum or more of carbon: $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents per pound on the chromium contained therein.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—302(l). Boron carbide: $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—302 (m). Ferrotitanium, ferrovanadium, and ferrouranium: 15 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—304. Hollow bars and hollow drill steel, valued above 8 and not above 12 cents per pound: 20 per cent ad valorem.

Provided, that the duty assessed under this item shall not be less than $1\frac{5}{8}$ cents per pound.

Provided further, that no article assessed with duty under this item shall be subject to a separate additional duty under the second proviso to paragraph 304 of the Tariff Act of 1930.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—318. Woven-wire cloth: Gauze, fabric, or screen, made of wire composed of steel, brass, copper, bronze, or any other metal or alloy, not specially provided for:

With meshes not finer than thirty wires to the lineal inch in warp or filling: one cent per square foot, but not less than $12\frac{1}{2}$ nor more than 25 per cent ad valorem.

With meshes finer than thirty and not finer than ninety wires to the lineal inch in warp or filling: 5 cents per square foot, but not less than 20 nor more than 40 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—323. Axles and parts thereof, axle bars, axle blanks, and forgings for axles, of iron or steel, without reference to the stage or state of manufacture, not specially provided for, valued at not more than 6 cents per pound: $\frac{3}{10}$ cent per pound.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—327. Cast-iron fittings for cast-iron pipe: 15 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—327. Cast-iron and irons, plates, stove plates, sadirons, tailors' irons, hatters' irons, but not including electric irons, and castings and vessels wholly of cast iron, including all castings of iron or cast-iron plates which have been chiseled, drilled, machined, or otherwise advanced in condition by processes or operations subsequent to the casting process but not made up into articles or parts thereof, or finished machine parts: 10 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—327. Moulders' patterns, of whatever material composed, for the manufacture of castings: 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. HARRIS: Would the minister make a statement with respect to item 327, dealing with moulders' patterns for the manufacture of castings? Who asked for the concessions on moulders' patterns? Is this a request from the United States so that they may get our patterns into that country cheaper to make our castings for us from those patterns, or was this a request from Canadian manufacturers, Canadian foundries or Canadian producers of castings?

Mr. EULER: The request came from Canadian producers.

Mr. HARRIS: Producers of castings?

Mr. EULER: No, not of castings, but of patterns.

Mr. HARRIS: I understand the request came from Canadian producers of castings—

Mr. EULER: Of patterns.

Mr. HARRIS: Of patterns, so that patterns may be let into the United States for the manufacture of castings, at half the previous rate. This is just another example of where, through the negotiation of this treaty and the one which preceded it, an industry will be unable to take up its fair share of employment, and will be unable to take off the streets of Canada some 40,000 iron and steel workers. It is another example, where moulders' patterns, which those workers use in their handicraft or their work, will go into the United States at a lesser rate of duty. I have in my mind's eye the fact that perhaps a great number of castings will be coming back into Canada. It shows clearly to my mind that the Department of Labour, and the minister who is supposed to be charged with the responsibility of attempting to find employment for our people, have not been in close cooperation with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he found it necessary to give this particular concession.

Mr. EULER: I do not wish to argue the point, but the only comment I would make is that if these patterns were not made in Canada there would be just that many more unemployed people.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—329. Chain and chains of all kinds, made of iron or steel:
Less than ¾ and not less than ⅜ of one inch in diameter: ¾ cent per pound.
Less than ⅜ and not less than 5/16 of one inch in diameter: 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. BARBER: What would the ad valorem rate on this item be?

Mr. EULER: Thirteen or fourteen per cent.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—353. Washing machines, having as an essential feature an electrical element or device, and parts thereof; any of the foregoing, finished or unfinished, wholly or in chief value of metal, and not specially provided for: 17½ per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—353. Cooking stoves and ranges, having as an essential feature an electrical heating element, and parts thereof; any of the foregoing, finished or unfinished, wholly or in chief value of metal, and not specially provided for: 17½ per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—370. Motor boats, including yachts or pleasure boats, whether sail, steam, or motor propelled, valued at not more than $15,000 each: 15 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—374. Aluminum, aluminum scrap, and alloys (except those provided for in paragraph 302 of the Tariff Act of 1930) in which aluminum is the component material of chief value, in crude form: 3 cents per pound.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is aluminum controlled by an international cartel?

Mr. EULER: Not so far as we are aware.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I understood it was controlled by an international cartel. All I am getting at is this: It really is not any concession to Canada to have the duty on aluminum reduced?

Mr. HEAPS: What is the total production of aluminum in Canada?

Mr. EULER: There is only one producer and we have not the statistics.

Mr. HEAPS: It is a United States concern, is it not?

Mr. EULER: It is called the Aluminum Company of Canada.

Mr. HEAPS: Who controls it?

Mr. EULER: I do not know.

Mr. HEAPS: Surely the minister knows.

Mr. EULER: They claim that they are not controlled by United States interests.

Mr. HEAPS: They may claim that, but it is really United States capital.

Mr. EULER: I cannot concede that because I do not know.

Mr. HEAPS: It is commonly stated that the Mellon interests control it.

Mr. EULER: In any event they employ Canadian workmen and use Canadian materials.

Mr. HEAPS: Personally I would say it is no particular concession that we are receiving from the United States. It is simply a little cross-play between the parent company in the United States and the subsidiary company in Canada.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—378. Cadmium: 7½ cents per pound.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—389. Nickel, and alloys (except those provided for in paragraph 302 or 380 of the Tariff Act of 1930) in which nickel is the component material of chief value, in pigs or ingots, shot, cubes, grains, cathodes, or similar forms: 2½ cents per pound.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is this product controlled by an international cartel?

Mr. EULER: I am informed not. There are only two producers in Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the nickel all go out in blocks or bars, or in the raw state?

Mr. EULER: I am told that it goes out in the primary forms, in pigs or ingots.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is what I had in mind, and it is reduced at Port Colborne, is it not?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—393. Zinc-bearing ores of all kinds, except pyrites containing not more than 3 per centum zinc: 1⅛ cents per pound on the zinc contained therein.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Heaps.]

United States tariff—394. Zinc in blocks, pigs, or slabs, and zinc dust: 1⅝ cents per pound.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—401. Timber hewn, sided, or squared, otherwise than by sawing, and round timber used for spars or in building wharves; sawed lumber and timber not specially provided for; all the foregoing, if of fir, spruce, pine, hemlock, or larch: 50 cents per thousand feet, board measure.

Mr. BARBER: What is the Canadian tariff against United States lumber coming in, the comparable item with this?

Mr. EULER: On planks not further manufactured than sawn or split, the duties are free across the board; planks, sawn, split or cut, dressed on one side only, not further manufactured, free right across; planks, planed or dressed, on one or both sides, with edges jointed or tongued or grooved, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. BARBER: So it is free coming in from the United States, but Canadian lumber going into the United States must pay a 50 per cent tariff and also the $1.50 tax.

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. BARBER: That is no concession to Canada, no change there.

Mr. EULER: No change.

Mr. PERLEY: Referring to paragraph (2) of this item in the tabular statement, there is a certain amount of exports from Alberta and Saskatchewan. Western white spruce is the main production in the northern parts of those provinces. Can the minister give the exports from these two provinces separately?

Mr. EULER: The figures are not separated.

Mr. HARRIS: What are the terms of section 601 of the Revenue Act of 1932 referred to in this item as it appears in the tabular statement.

Mr. EULER: Section 601 covers:

Lumber, including sawed timber, rough, or planed or dressed on one or more sides, except flooring made of maple, birch, and beech, and except lumber and timber of northern white pine (pinus strobus), Norway pine (pinus resinosa), western white spruce, balsa, teak, cedar commercially known as Spanish cedar, lignum-vitae, lancewood, ebony, box, granadilla, mahogany, rosewood, satinwood, Japanese white oak, or Japanese maple: $1.50 per thousand feet, board measure.

Mr. HARRIS: What is the date of the document from which the minister is reading?

Mr. EULER: I am reading from the trade agreement.

Mr. HARRIS: He is not reading from the Revenue Act itself?

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. HARRIS: And sawed timber was not mentioned in the Revenue Act of 1932. I ask the minister, was it mentioned in the act of 1932.

Mr. EULER: It was included in the amendment of 1938.

Mr. HARRIS: And in the intervening six years a certain amount of sawed timber did not pay the $3 tax prior to its being reduced to $1.50, and subsequently did not pay the $1.50 tax. Is that correct?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS: So in getting the concession on sawed timber in the 1938 agreement, the government has permitted the United States to charge the $1.50 revenue tax which has not applied since 1932, and which since 1938 applies on sawed timber going into the United States. Is that a fact?

Mr. EULER: The amount involved is very, very small, I am told.

Mr. HARRIS: The question that runs through my mind all the time in connection with the negotiation of this agreement is this: Whom are we working for? Are we working for Canada or for the United States?

Mr. EULER: For Canada.

Mr. HARRIS: Well, here is an example. This item of sawed timber bore no revenue tax in 1932 under section 601 of the Revenue Act of 1932. It is amended in 1938, and we see to-day that this schedule is changed to make sure that timber going into the United States does pay $1.50. My other question is this: When does this $1.50 tax expire?

Mr. EULER: It expires in June of this year.

Mr. HARRIS: Has Canada agreed to make a further relinquishment of its guaranteed British preferences if and when in June of this year the United States repeals the import tax on Canadian lumber? I am sorry that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) is not here because he devoted a part of his speech in the debate on the address to this subject.

Mr. EULER: The answer to my hon. friend's question is yes.

Mr. HARRIS: In other words, this is another concession given to the United States by way of the back-door. The United States, in other words, will be able to get her products into the British market, products of a kind which we produce here in abundance, and our lumber industry finds its preference in the British market narrowed. Of course I know that the minister will immediately reply that its market in the United States is widened. Again I ask, whom are we working for in this agreement, for Canada or for the United States?

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend must know that unless they do take the tax off they get nothing more. If they take the tax off, there is something given by both sides.

Mr. HARRIS: I very well remember the Minister of National Defence rising in his place and saying to this house that he expected that in June, 1939, the United States would take off the $1.50 revenue tax; but he did not say at the same time, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce now tells us, that in view of that concession, if he so calls it, we in Canada get the preference narrowed that we now have in the British market for the same lumber.

Mr. EULER: We still have in the British market a preference of about $2 a thousand feet.

Mr. HARRIS: But the government has agreed to relinquish some of that.

Mr. EULER: That preference remains unless the United States throws off the $1.50 tax, which is of some value.

Mr. HARRIS: I ask the question why, then, a responsible minister of the crown, the Minister of National Revenue, would give us just a half-truth in a statement of this kind. That is all it was. He said they take off the $1.50 in June, 1939. All right; why did he not go on and say, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce says now, if they do that we are going to relinquish some of our preference in the British market?

Mr. EULER: I should be very much surprised if the Minister of National Revenue made that definite statement in that way.

Mr. HARRIS: The Minister of National Defence. The British Columbia minister.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend said in error a moment ago, the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. HARRIS: I am sorry. I apologize. I mean the Minister of National Defence, the minister who in this government represents British Columbia. British Columbia is vitally interested.

Mr. EULER: I was not here. I do not know. I should think if he stated that that tax would come off, the statement was made conditionally; that is, the two things would go together. The United States would be placed on an equality with Canadian lumber in the British market provided they took off the $1.50 tax.

Mr. GREEN: Have the government made any representations to the United States government that this revenue tax, or, as it is sometimes called, this import excise tax of $1.50 a thousand feet should be removed now or at any rate should not be renewed in June of this year, thereby bringing into effect the second stage of the lumber bargain? As the minister knows, this lumber bargain is the only part of the whole trade treaty which has not yet been concluded by both parties, and I think our government might have some effect on the United States government if they pointed out the unfairness of leaving the lumber bargain in the first stage, where it is at the present time.

In this first stage Canada has made certain concessions. I do not intend to enumerate them in detail, but roughly—I would ask the minister to correct me if I am wrong—they are that we have given up a portion of our preference in the United Kingdom and in the West Indies; we have agreed to give up a portion of our preference in Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, and we have reduced the duty on dressed lumber coming into Canada from United States by fifty per cent, as well as taking off the excise tax. I do not think it can be argued successfully that Canada has got fair compensation for those concessions in this first stage of the lumber bargain. Further than that, these concessions have been made almost exclusively by the British Columbia lumbermen. The concessions do not affect the eastern lumbermen, but they do affect, and vitally so, the lumbermen on the Pacific coast.

Then, in the second stage we have to make further concessions, and I believe that in that stage as well British Columbia is doing most of the sacrificing. But because of the unfairness of the first stage, I earnestly ask the minister to have the government press the government of the United States to bring about the second stage by removing the import excise tax of $1.50 a thousand feet. Just this week I received the current copy, March, 1939, of the British Columbia Lumberman, which is the journal of the trade. On page 35 I find an article dealing with this lumber situation. I should like to read the concluding paragraph to the minister, because I think it sums up the situation fairly. It is as follows:

> While the Americans receive the advantages in the immediate stage of the treaty, we hope that the "Good Neighbour" policy will apply both ways to the extent that we may enjoy a modest part of their domestic lumber market.

In other words, we in British Columbia are asking that the second stage be brought into force so that our lumber may get into the United States market and thereby make this deal fair to both.

Mr. EULER: I might point out if I cared to do so that my hon. friend from British Columbia seems to attach more importance so far as advantage to Canada is concerned to this second stage than did the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris).

Mr. GREEN: I come from a lumber district.

Mr. EULER: Quite so. For the information of my hon. friend I would say the best indication that the Canadian government desire the bringing into force of the second stage of this lumber item is that they are offering that inducement regarding the British market, that the United States of America will get into the British market on the same terms as Canadian lumber exporters, namely free, provided they take off the excise tax. That, I think, is the strongest proof that we are anxious that that should be brought about, perhaps more for the benefit of the British Columbia lumberman than anybody else. I should say also that the difficulty in the way is one which we did not experience in making the rest of the agreement. The agreement we made was made with the President of the United States, who had authority to reduce duties as much as fifty per cent on existing tariffs. With regard to the excise the situation is entirely different. That excise tax of $1.50 can be removed only by action of congress. That is why I say it is on an entirely different basis from the making of the other part of the agreement. But we have tried to make it acceptable to the United States congress by offering them free entry into the British market, that is on the same basis as Canadian lumber, if they will take off that $1.50 tax. What they will do I do not know. We may hope that they will do it, because I believe it will be to the advantage of British Columbia if that tax is removed.

Mr. BARBER: What concession do they get now as regards the British market?

Mr. EULER: Sixteen shillings. It works out at about $2 a thousand. We will still have that advantage, reduced from ten per cent ad valorem.

Mr. GREEN: Is it not possible for the government at the present time to make representations to Washington, just as was done in the case of cattle, with regard to the second stage of the lumber bargain? It is quite obvious that the bargain is unfair if it is left in the first stage. I ask that the government point that out to Washington and ask them to make sure that the second stage is brought about.

Mr. EULER: Well, it is a matter for congress to take action upon. There is this difference so far as the cattle quota is concerned, that the provision for what was done with regard to the cattle quota was contained in the agreement, but the excise tax of $1.50 is a matter upon which action can be taken, not by the president, but only by congress. There is the difficulty, if difficulty there be.

Mr. GREEN: The position is that we have already bound ourselves to give away these concessions, and we have said to the United States, you can take it or leave it as you like.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—402. Maple (except Japanese maple), birch and beech, flooring: 4 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—407. Casks, barrels, and hogsheads (empty), of wood, not specially provided for, but not including beer barrels or beer kegs: 7½ per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—412. Paint brush handles; broom handles and mop handles, further advanced than rough shaped, not less than three-fourths of one inch in diameter and not less than thirty-eight inches in length; tennis-racket frames valued at $1.75 or more each; toboggans; baby carriages; wheelbarrows; canoes and canoe paddles; carriages, drays, trucks, and other horse-drawn vehicles, and parts thereof, not specially provided for; and ice-hockey sticks; all the foregoing wholly or in chief value of wood: 20 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—503. Maple sugar: 3 cents per pound.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—503. Maple sirup: 2 cents per pound.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—701. Cattle, weighing less than two hundred pounds each, 1½ cents per pound.

Provided, that such cattle weighing less than two hundred pounds each entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption in any calendar year after 1938 in excess of 100,000 head shall not be entitled to a reduction in duty by virtue of this item, but the rate of duty thereon shall not exceed 2½ cents per pound.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): On this item I notice that there is no change between the 1935 treaty and the 1938 treaty in the amount of duty, but there has been a decided change in the number of head of this class of cattle which can go into the United States; also the weight per head is increased by twenty-five pounds. That is a considerable concession to the cattle raisers of Canada.

Mr. PERLEY: Could the minister give us the number of head that have been exported under this agreement since the agreement came into force?

Mr. EULER: The figure is 6,310 up to February 25.

Mr. STEVENS: That is the first division of item 701. There are three divisions.

Mr. EULER: That is the first division, yes.

Mr. PERLEY: Will the minister give the number exported during 1938?

Mr. EULER: Under the quota, 38,750 head.

Mr. PERLEY: What percentage is that of the total slaughter in the United States?

Mr. EULER: I cannot give that information.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): One quarter of one per cent. I was speaking of the first of the sections under item 701. Under the second section, we used to be allowed, under the old treaty, 20,000 head, and now we are allowed an unlimited number. Under the third section, cattle weighing 700 pounds or more, while this treaty was under discussion, before we came to the items, my hon. friends had a great deal to say about the fact that there was a global quota. At that time I said that the cattle men of Canada did know there was a global quota. Since then I have looked the matter up, and I find that in 1936 the quota was filled in November. At that time Mexico had shipped about thirteen per cent of the quota into the United States and Canada had shipped in the balance. In 1937 the quota was filled in August, and again Mexico had shipped in something over thirteen per cent and Canada the balance. My hon. friend the member for Qu'Appelle, discussing this item the other day, deplored the fact that some one he knew, who had shipped a carload of cattle, was unable to come under the quota at that time, before it was filled for the first three months; and if I remember correctly, he said that the shipper had, on that account, received something like $500 less for the carload. He did not point out at that time that this concession on all cattle shipped into the United States—the concession received by this government—meant the same amount of money, $500, on practically every carload of cattle shipped by the Canadian cattle producer.

My hon. friends have always declared that the American was a tough dealer, that he wanted an eye for an eye.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Two eyes for one, and he gets it.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Well, this is an instance which proves that my hon. friends are wrong when they say that, because after this treaty had been signed, sealed and delivered, we find that this year, under the global quota which had been in effect since 1935, there were shipped from Mexico some 45 per cent of the cattle entering the United States under that quota. Prior to the time that anyone raised that question in the house, officers of the Department of Trade and Commerce had been in touch with the United States in reference to the matter. They were alive to the fact that more cattle than usual were being shipped from Mexico under the global quota. They went to the United States, and, without any eye for eye, the United States agreed to give Canada over 86 per cent of the shipments under that global quota, which means that Canada now has under this treaty something like 40,000 head more under the quota than the total global quota of 1935. This has been a great concession to the cattle raisers in this country, and it has proved that my hon. friends are entirely wrong when they say that the United States wants an eye for an eye. They have given us a concession here and have increased that concession, after having been asked by the Canadian government to do so; and they have not asked anything in return for it.

Mr. PERLEY: The hon. member's mathematics are a little wrong. If he will take the quota of 155,000 head last year—and he says that this new agreement adds 40,000 to that—

[Mr. J. G. Ross.]

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): About 40,000 a year.

Mr. PERLEY: If he takes 86 per cent of 155,000 head he will find that his figures do not agree with those given by the minister. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) the other day, in a statement which he made to the house with respect to the new arrangement that had been made, said that our quota would now be based upon the percentage of shipments of the previous year, and he said it would make it possible for Canada to ship 142,000 head. Now the hon. member adds 40,000 to 155,000 and therefore he is a long way out.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): In reply to my hon. friend, may I point out that there are 225,000 head under the quota now and not 155,000; and 86 per cent, or a fraction over 86 per cent, amounts to 193,000 head a year, which is Canada's share under the quota now. In other words, that is almost 40,000 head more.

Mr. PERLEY: The new arrangement is based on last year's shipment?

Mr. EULER: No, it is not.

Mr. PERLEY: That is what the minister said.

Mr. EULER: No; it is based on the shipments of 1936-37. The year 1938 was not taken because it would not have been representative or so favourable to us. The United States accepted the shipments of 1936-37 in establishing the percentage of quota.

Mr. PERLEY: Will the minister give the exports under the third item since the agreement came into force to date? The first quarter is not yet completed.

Mr. EULER: I can only give the division of the quota. Canada gets 51,720 head and other countries, 8,280.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): That is not for the first quarter.

Mr. EULER: No; not for the first quarter.

Mr. PERLEY: I am asking how many have been shipped to date in the first quarter.

Mr. EULER: There have been shipped 32,911, and Mexico shipped 27,000 odd. The quota was filled early in the quarter. In the future it will be on the basis of the quota of 86 per cent plus for Canada.

Mr. CASSELMAN: It will be three-quarters of 86 per cent for the year, because the first quarter's quota is gone. For the rest of the year, therefore, the increase is not 40 per cent, as the hon. member for Moose Jaw says.

Mr. EULER: It will be from now on in any ordinary year, or any given twelve months.

Mr. HAYHURST: Is each quarter divided equally? Is the amount of cattle that may enter the United States for any three months equal?

Mr. EULER: We can always export 86 per cent of 60,000 in each quarter except the last.

Mr. MARSHALL: Has the minister given any consideration to the position of those shippers who had cattle en route to the United States market when the quota was declared closed at the end of January?

Mr. EULER: If the quota was filled there was nothing to be done until another quota period began. I suppose they could put them in bonded pasture.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Has the minister any record of any in bond now?

Mr. EULER: I am informed that there are slightly over 500 Canadian cattle.

Mr. PERLEY: What are the average weekly shipments? Has the minister any record, for instance, of the exports last week?

Mr. EULER: There would not be any, when the quota was filled in January.

Mr. PERLEY: But they could pay the three cents a pound.

Mr. EULER: I have no record of the number. It is small.

Mr. LEADER: I listened with much interest to the debate on this trade treaty, particularly that part applicable to cattle. I did not say anything in that debate, but I want to say now that the concessions granted for the entry of Canadian cattle into the United States are of great benefit to the live stock growers; there is no doubt about that. The number under the old quota was 155,799; the quota has now been increased to 225,000. My Conservative friends took objection to this quota, and said that it would work a hardship, in fact had worked a hardship, with which I agree to a certain extent. But I believe that if we must have a quota at all, that quota must be regulated. A quarterly system means a certain amount of regulation, but in my opinion is not enough. I believe I mentioned in this house two years ago that this quota should be regulated on a monthly basis. I believed then that the time was coming when the United States itself would insist on a quota, as well as Great Britain.

If we had had a monthly quota we would not have got into the trouble we did in the first quarter. As hon. members know, the quota was filled in the first month. I am in touch with the cattle men, and I know one man who had fourteen carloads of cattle just waiting until January 1 to ship them to the United States. I suppose there were hundreds who had the same idea, and the Mexicans also had the same idea, with the consequence that the quota was filled in one month, or early in February, really, but the information was given out that it was filled before the end of January. The effect was that they broke the market in the United States and broke it here in Canada, because the cattle that were in transit at the time had to be transferred to the Winnipeg and Toronto markets. A few weeks later the cattle market went up.

The same thing will be repeated at the beginning of April when the market opens up again; people will rush their cattle to market, and that quota may be filled in a month or two. I do not believe that we shall be able to fill our quota for the year. I believe it would be in the interest of the cattle men of Canada and the United States as well to regulate that quota on a monthly basis.

Mr. EULER: Does my hon. friend not think there would then be a scramble each month instead of four times a year?

Mr. LEADER: There would unless there was some regulation, but surely we can take enough interest in these matters to regulate the flow. It could be regulated much more easily on a monthly basis than quarterly.

Mr. EULER: I suppose my hon. friend means that it should be regulated from this side.

Mr. LEADER: Yes.

Mr. PERLEY: The hon. member who has just spoken said that some of us on this side objected to the quota. There is no objection to the quota; I think it is a fine thing if we are sure we get our quota. We know this government got a little excited when they found the quota was filled and went over to the United States authorities and made new arrangements. When April 1 comes around, as the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) has said, there will be a rush again to fill the quota. If the Mexicans find they are not getting as much under the new arrangement as they expected, as they did last year and the first quarter of this year, is there any possibility of the Mexican government going to the United States and making a new arrangement with them which might upset the arrangement which this government has now made?

Mr. EULER: There is no provision for Mexican cattle in this agreement. They have no rights under it.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Cattle from any place in the world.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw: They have a right to thirteen per cent.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mexico, as well as all countries, has the right.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): But our right is set at 86 per cent now.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I suggest that the minister or someone representing the government might take another trip to Washington and see if it is not possible to arrange for a larger proportion in certain quarters. This treaty, it seems to me, offers to Canadian producers an opportunity to sell more cattle when they have less available and less when the market could take more. Surely the government did not figure that we could keep up a regular orderly supply the whole year round. On account of climatic conditions in this country we have more cattle to sell at some seasons than at others. If in any one quarter we do not have enough to fill the quota we are not allowed to make up the difference in another quarter. It should be a yearly quota. In the interests of the cattle producers of this country I suggest that the government should send another trade commissioner to Washington to make a third attempt to draw up a treaty which will be in the interests of the cattle producers. The results for the first quarter, as the hon. member has suggested, have not been very satisfactory to the cattle producers.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): They certainly were.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): But the quota was filled in the first month. It was all right for the man who had them ready to sell at the beginning of January, but not so good for the man who had them ready later. I suggest that the quota should apply for the whole year. If we have more cattle to market in one quarter I think we should be allowed to apply them on the annual quota.

Mr. LEADER: Is not the main fault in the whole marketing system that we dump the product on the market in large quantities, and then next month or next year have not enough to fill the requirements of the market? That is where a monthly quota would help. Our annual quota is 86·2 per cent of 225,000 cattle weighing over 700 pounds, and it is now regulated to the extent of a quarterly quota. My point is that it would be better if it were a monthly quota.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): We had better start the orderly marketing here before we accept control from another country.

Mr. McNEVIN: If you relieve the Canadian market of 42,000 head of cattle in three months, you will take that dead load off the market and we will get a very material benefit, because the effect of that will carry right through the period.

Mr. HOMUTH: Suppose we cannot fill our quota in any one quarter; can we ship an increased number in the next quarter?

Mr. EULER: No, we cannot.

Mr. HOMUTH: Then it is not a yearly quota.

Mr. EULER: It is not cumulative; we have to fill our quota each quarter.

Mr. LEADER: I do not understand that. We have an annual quota of 86·2 per cent of 225,000.

Mr. BARBER: That is not in the treaty.

Mr. LEADER: The figures are right here.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is not a yearly quota.

Mr. LEADER: It is. The total imports are limited to 225,000, and we are allowed 86·2 per cent of that quota over the year.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps I might clear that up. If, for example, we were short in our quota in the second quarter; if we shipped only 40,000 head, for example, we would lose the difference between what we were entitled to ship and what we actually did ship. That is, we would lose that difference for that quarter, but we would be allowed to ship more in the final quarter because we would be entitled to 86·2 per cent of the global total of 225,000.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): But not more.

Mr. EULER: We could not ship more than 60,000 in any one quarter.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Then how could we get in the other 20,000 in the last quarter? The treaty says no more than 60,000 in any one quarter.

Mr. EULER: That is quite clear; there is no question about that. If you have a shortage in any one quarter you cannot make it up in the following quarter, because in no quarter can more than 60,000 cattle be sent by Mexico and Canada. That is perfectly true. I imagine that it will not be a very practical point; I believe the Canadians will fill their quota each quarter.

Mr. PERLEY: The point might arise in some quarters of the year.

Mr. EULER: It might.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I do not want to be misunderstood as far as orderly marketing is concerned. I believe with the hon. member for Portage la Prairie that we should have more orderly marketing; in fact, I think as long as ten years ago I suggested to this house that we should have an export board to control the orderly marketing of our products, and I believe that would be sound policy to-day. But I would prefer to see an orderly system of marketing controlled by this country instead of having our marketing controlled by the tariffs of another country.

In following up what the hon. member for Portage la Prairie has said I would suggest to the minister that if we are going to be placed under certain restrictions each quarter, the time is now ripe, if not long overdue, to develop some plan by which we may have an orderly supply of cattle. I would not like to leave this in the lackadaisical way suggested by the minister, that we should trust the cattlemen of Canada to see that 60,000 head are shipped each quarter. I know in many parts of this country they market their cattle only at certain seasons of the year, while at other seasons none is sold. During March, April and May the winter cattle are sold and during September, October and November the grass cattle are sold; that is, in the older parts of this country.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): And in the west in September, October and November,

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): In October, November and December in western Canada, as the hon. member for Moose Jaw says. I think we need some control in order to provide an orderly supply for this market, instead of leaving the orderly marketing to be controlled by the United States.

Mr. HAYHURST: A short time ago I asked if the number would be the same for each quarter, and now the minister says it is not cumulative. To me this means that in the last quarter we would not be able to fill the entire quota for the year.

Mr. EULER: No, you could not do that; but if, for example you sent 60,000—

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Is it 60,000 or 51,000?

Mr. EULER: The global quota is 60,000; but supposing the 60,000 is shipped in each of the first three quarters, that makes 180,000. The total for the year is 225,000, which would mean only 45,000 could be shipped in the last quarter. If you were short in some of the other quarters at least you would be allowed to make up 15,000 of that shortage in the last quarter, which otherwise you would not be able to do. That is, you could send 60,000 in the last quarter, and in that way you could ship 15,000 more because you were short in some of the other quarters, without exceeding the limit of 60,000 for that quarter.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): You might only ship 10,000 in some quarters.

Mr. EULER: You could make up 15,000 in the last quarter, at least. If you shipped 60,000 in each of the first three quarters you would have only 45,000 left for the last quarter, so you could make up your previous shortage at least to that extent.

Mr. LEADER: I think what the minister has just said has made the matter clear. We are entitled to 86·2 per cent of 225,000 and if we are a little short in one quarter we can make it up in the next or, in any event, in the last quarter.

Mr. EULER: To the extent of 15,000.

Mr. LEADER: Then, if we cannot take advantage of that 86·2 per cent, even if we have the cattle available in the last quarter, I think something slipped, and I believe another trip to Washington might straighten it out.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The hon. member says something slipped, but as far as I can see the only slip has been that we are going to get many more cattle into the United States market. My hon. friend mentioned shipping only 45,000 cattle—

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): We might only ship 10,000.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Then that would be all the cattle available for shipment at that time. If you only shipped 40,000 in each quarter you still would have a great advantage compared with what you had before. Formerly the total global quota was only 155,000, and if Canada can ship in 160,000 cattle now in the four quarters we shall be that much better off in any event. As a matter of fact, I do not think we are going to fill our quota this year. I do not think the fact that the quota for the first quarter was filled in the first month should worry us too much, because while we shipped 32,000 head during the first month, other countries shipped something like 27,000, and they cannot ship that many in the months to come. They can ship only thirteen per cent of the 60,000 head, and we have the balance of 51,000 if we want it. Therefore we have a tremendous advantage no matter how one looks at the matter.

Mr. THOMPSON: The matter seems quite clear to me. We were given a quota of 225,000 head for Canada and Mexico, but not more than 60,000 head in any three month period. We have the right to ship 86·2 per cent of 60,000 head in the three month period; then we are through until the next three months, and each three month period stands by itself. The matter is perfectly clear.

Mr. LEADER: If you are short, are you not allowed to ship in the difference?

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. LEADER: I think so.

Mr. BARBER: The treaty says that the rate under the new agreement is to apply annually to not more than 225,000 head, and to not more than 60,000 head in any quarter. There is no mention in the treaty about 86 per cent. Would the minister explain when and how this was arrived at?

Mr. EULER: I will read the clause in the trade agreement which explains how it was we were able to get a fixed quota:

> That if, after consultation with the government of the United States of America, the government of Canada requests the allocation of the quantity entitled to enter at the reduced rate of duty under this item, the government of the United States of America shall take the necessary steps to allocate the said quantity among countries of export on the basis provided for in article III of this agreement.

That is what was done. On the basis of article III of the agreement they took the years 1936 and 1937 as being normal years of export, and took that as the basis for fixing the quota which Canada could have out of the 60,000, each quarter. That worked out to 86 per cent.

Mr. BARBER: When was the United States approached in this matter?

Mr. EULER: Some time in February. The matter came up in the house, and at the time it came up—

Mr. BARBER: Since the treaty came down?

Mr. EULER: Yes. When attention was drawn to the fact that Mexico had sent in a large number of cattle, I said at the time that we hoped to make some satisfactory disposition of the matter. Then representatives of the government went to Washington. They were assured the president would issue a statement as to what our quota should be. He did that, and fixed it at 86 per cent.

Mr. HOMUTH: I want to get the explanation clear, because I think some of us have some misunderstanding. Suppose we ship 30,000 head in the next quarter; in the third quarter we ship 30,000 head. That would leave us 42,000 we have not shipped, because out of the 60,000 our quota is 51,000. In the last quarter we could ship only 86 per cent of 60,000.

Mr. EULER: Right.

Mr. HOMUTH: Ordinarily it would be about 86 per cent of 45,000. We could increase that by 86 per cent of 15,000. Therefore, so far as our gross quota is concerned, we would still have a shortage of 27,000?

Mr. EULER: Provided you were short on each of those quarters to the extent you indicated.

Mr. HOMUTH: So, unless we are able to fill the quota each quarter, we have not a cumulative yearly quota?

Mr. EULER: That is quite correct.

Mr. WARREN: I am sorry I missed the discussion on this item, because I had taken some interest in it, and had prepared some figures in connection with it. My interest was more particularly aroused after listening to the speech some time ago of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson). I do not know just what we are going to gain, or what the people of Canada are going to gain by belittling an agreement which certainly is to the advantage of the Canadian farmer. I notice that in his observations on February 21, the hon. member for Lanark is reported to have said, as it appears at page 1199 of Hansard:

> Every trade treaty this government has made with the United States has been detrimental to the interests of Canada.

Knowing the hon. member's riding to some extent—because I happen to have relatives living in Lanark county—I wondered just what the farmers of Lanark were going to gain by having this trade treaty misrepresented to them, so far as the sale of their cattle was concerned. It is foolish to imply that we would want to export all our cattle. All we want to export is our surplus; if we can get rid of that we shall be well satisfied.

In the dairy sections of Lanark county one thing the farmers are particularly interested in is the sale of veal calves. I am worrying more about the farmers in Lanark than those in Renfrew, because I have not heard any complaints from the farmers of Renfrew county respecting this treaty.

Mr. THOMPSON: You mind your own county; I will look after mine.

Mr. WARREN: I am not worrying about my farmers, because so far as this treaty is concerned they have no complaint to make. I was however, rather worried about the effect the hon. member's speech might have on my relatives in his county, so I took the trouble to look up the figures. I knew those people would be interested in the price of veal calves.

We do not want to export all our veal calves; but at certain seasons of the year, particularly the early spring, we have a considerable surplus. In the county of Lanark a great many farmers do not think they are farming at all unless they are milking twenty, thirty or forty cows. They may raise ten calves, which leaves them thirty calves to sell as veal. Let us look at some of the figures. I have before me the figures from 1933 to 1938, and I shall begin at the earlier year. We will remember that 1933 was a bad time; if I remember correctly, a Conservative government was in office. The following table will show the figures for exports of calves to all countries, and to the United States:

Calendar year	All countries	United States
1933	976	48
1934	1,302	226
1935	21,587	20,567
1936	51,783	50,541
1937	99,648	98,426
1938	49,417	48,347

It will be remembered the Liberals took office in 1935. If we take the years 1933 and 1934, the last two years the Conservative party was in office, we find that only 274 veal calves were exported to the United States, whereas if we take the years 1937 and 1938, the last two calendar years in which this government has held office, we find that 146,535 calves were exported from the surplus we did not need.

Let us look at the prices. Naturally, we have to pay duty on those export calves; I believe the rate is 1½ cents a pound. If we have a surplus on our Montreal or Toronto markets our prices go below value, and particularly in the spring of the year when the dairy farmer in counties such as Lanark has a surplus of calves on his hands. That would apply particularly in the months of April and May.

Let us look at the figures for the Toronto market. The following table will show the prices per hundredweight of veal calves on that market in the months of April and May:

Year	April	May
1934	$6 92	$6 33
1935	7 29	6 69
1936	8 68	8 20
1937	9 19	8 37
1938	9 15	8 20

Those, of course, are prices for choice veal calves. That may not seem a very great variation, but let us compare 1934 with 1938, which is I think a fair comparison, and we find in those same two months a gain for the month of April of $1.87 per hundred pounds on a two hundred pound calf. That will mean an additional revenue to the farmer of $44.80 on ten calves in April, and $37.40 on ten calves in May, or an additional revenue in the two months of $82 for the twenty calves, and many farmers would have more than twenty calves. Now, $82 may not seem like a great deal of money to some people, but it is a considerable cheque to a farmer. The farmer who can get an extra $82 for his veal calves is getting something that he is going to appreciate.

Let us take cattle. I notice that the hon. member for Lanark always talks about a thousand pound steer when he is making camparisons in connection with this treaty, but we ought to bear in mind that under the treaty we have been able to export and get off our markets by shipping them to the United States, a class of cattle that has had a detrimental effect on our domestic market—our canner cows, for example, and a great many of our inferior quality of cattle.

In 1933, under the government which the hon. member for Lanark supported, we shipped to all countries 59,158 head of cattle; to the United Kingdom, 50,317; to the United States, 5,686. The figures for the other years are as follows:

Export of Cattle (excluding calves)
Number of Head

Calendar year	All countries	United Kingdom	United States
1933	59,158	50,317	5,686
1934	63,673	53,852	6,341
1935	112,771	6,704	102,934
1936	233,631	38,495	191,149
1937	222,112	9,610	208,552
1938	129,807	27,307	98,398

Someone might ask why there was such a falling off in our exports to the United Kingdom in 1937 and such a great increase in our exports to the United States. That is easily explained. Prices were so much better in the United States that it paid the Canadian farmer to ship his cattle there rather than to the United Kingdom.

During 1933 and 1934, the years in which the hon. member for Lanark was supporting the former government, we shipped a total of 12,027 head of cattle to the United States. Compare that with the two years 1937 and 1938, when we shipped a total of 306,950 head of cattle to the United States. Surely that ought to be an answer to the hon. member's statement that every trade treaty made by this government with the United States has been detrimental to Canada.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Give us the figures for 1930. That was ten years after the hon. member's party was in power.

Mr. WARREN: I have not the figures for 1930, but I think it is fair to compare 1934 and 1935, with 1937 and 1938.

There is another feature in connection with the treaty which I wish to mention. We in Renfrew county—and I assume this is true also of the farmers of Lanark county—have found it beneficial to ship our dairy cows to the United States. The local market for dairy cows, generally speaking, is limited. The market in Montreal and Toronto is comparatively small and prices there are generally not profitable. But we have had United States buyers going through our counties in past years picking up our dairy cows, pure bred and grade stock, testing them and shipping them to the United States. That leaves the farmer in this position. The farmer who is separating his milk and sending his milk to a butter factory can find a profitable market for any cows that he cares to raise, and a farmer who has his skim milk at home will raise all his heifer calves if he knows he is going to be able to sell his surplus cows. So here we have abundant proof that our agreement with the United States has been profitable to the dairy farmer in selling his veal calves, in selling his cattle, and in selling his dairy cows.

If any further proof were needed, my mind goes back to the dreary days in 1932 and 1933, under the former government, when we could not get more than three cents a pound at certain times of the year, in the fall, for example, on the Toronto and Montreal market. You had to beg the buyers to take splendid stock, good steers, at three cents a pound, and sometimes fairly good beef went for a cent and a half or a cent and a quarter a pound.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): What was the United States market paying at that time? That is when they were killing off six million head.

[Mr. Warren.]

Mr. MacNICOL: And throwing them in the river.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): And that is the market the hon. member for Renfrew North says is a good market!

Mr. WARREN: It has proved itself good to us since this government came into office, because the United States has been taking our surplus stock up to the figures I have put on record. But it gives me a chill to think of the markets we had in those terrible years 1932 and 1933. Under this treaty you can now get $6.60 per 100 pounds for a decent steer, from seven to seven and a half and eight cents a pound if it is a good one, compared with three and three and a half cents down to a cent and a quarter and a cent and a half a pound in 1932 and 1933. Those were the black days. Although we managed to get through somehow, those were days which left many of our farmers in a situation from which they never recovered. Certainly I should hate to think that my relatives in Lanark county would be worried respecting this trade agreement, which certainly will prove, and undoubtedly up to date has proven of immense value to them as farmers.

Mr. THOMPSON: Every time that the hon. member for Renfrew North rises in his place in this chamber he takes a whack at me. I do not blame him a bit, because I spent two weeks in Renfrew North trying to lick him, and if it had not been that the election was on the fifth of April, that the roads were impassable, and the day was one of the worst that ever came, he would not be sitting in this house. I do not intend to follow his argument, because I never heard so much nonsense talked in as short a space of time. He has told us about calves and dairy cows. Mr. Chairman, you know that the tariff respecting them has not been changed; it is the same as it was since 1935, and we never filled our quota. As we have not filled our quota with calves, enlarging the quota cannot mean anything to our farmers; there was no advantage to them in having it raised, and no change has occurred under it. In the hon. member's address he talked of the days of the depression—

Mr. MANION: The world depression.

Mr. THOMPSON: —and did not give the figure of 1930—it was less than any of them. As I say, however, it is not my intention to follow my good friend. I hope that when the election comes on, I shall be able to get another crack at him, and that he will not be here afterwards.

Mr. MARSHALL: I am sorry that the government cannot give much consideration to the question of cattle which are en route to the United States market after the quota has been closed. I should like to read into the record a couple of paragraphs from a letter which I received this morning from the manager of a live stock marketing association in Alberta:

Dear Sir:

Regarding shipments of cattle to the United States of America during the first quarterly quota, when as you know that nearly half of that quota was filled by Mexican cattle, thus working a hardship on the shipper from Canada, also very costly on the shipper who had his cattle en route when this quota was filled as there was no warning—just filled.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I should like to ask the hon. member who is addressing the committee if there were not a warning given by the United States government when ten per cent of the quota was still remaining.

Mr. MARSHALL: I am just reading an extract from the letter. I have not made any comment at all on the matter.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, he did not know what he was writing about.

Mr. MARSHALL:

Don't you think some adjustment should be made to the shipper that had his cattle en route when this quota was filled in this way? It has meant between $350 to $400 a car through absolutely no fault of ours. In my case it amounts to $361. Why should we have to lose this through not proper protection of our share of the quota? In this we can hardly take this loss.

All I wish to say in this connection is that I believe the hon. member for Portage la Prairie has made many valuable suggestions to the minister, and I should like to add my voice to his in suggesting to the minister that the three month period be narrowed down to perhaps either two months or one month.

Mr. COLDWELL: Upon what date was the notice given that ten per cent still remained, and upon what date did the quota end?

Mr. EULER: The quota ended early in February—February 2, I think.

Mr. COLDWELL: On what date was the notice given that ten per cent remained?

Mr. EULER: I cannot tell the hon. member that. I do not know. I might make this observation, that the difficulty which arose in the first quarter was rather because of an abnormal condition. It was not anticipated that Mexico would send such a large quantity of cattle into the United States in that quarter, and it was for that reason that the surplus of cattle en route to the United States was so large. In order to provide against that in the future—and I think perhaps it will be provided against in this way—we are receiving early in the quarter, I believe about every four weeks, notice from the United States government as to how many cattle have been admitted; then later on, when we get nearer to the end of the quarter and the quota is nearer to the point of exhaustion, we receive notice by telegram, and that is communicated to the stock-yards and to the Commercial Intelligence Journal and by other means to the exporters in Canada so that they can govern themselves accordingly.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is it not a fact that the trouble really arose because notification that only ten per cent remained of the quota was given just a few days before the quota was filled? I have had letters similar to the one which has just been read.

Mr. EULER: I think the real reason was the unexpected supply from Mexico.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—701. Cattle, weighing seven hundred pounds or more each: Cows, imported specially for dairy purposes: 1½ cents per pound. Other, 1½ cents per pound.

Provided, that after December 31, 1938, such cattle weighing seven hundred pounds or more each (other than cows imported specially for dairy purposes) entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption in excess of 60,000 head in any quarter year shall not be entitled to a reduction in duty by virtue of this item, and such cattle (other than cows imported specially for dairy purposes) entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption in excess of 225,000 head in any calendar year shall not be entitled to a reduction in duty by virtue of this item, but the rate of duty thereon shall not exceed 3 cents per pound.

Provided further, that if, after consultation with the government of the United States of America, the government of Canada requests the allocation of the quantity entitled to enter at the reduced rate of duty under this item, the government of the United States of America shall take the necessary steps to allocate the said quantity among countries of export on the basis provided for in article III of this agreement.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—703. Swine: 1 cent per pound.

United States tariff—703. Pork, fresh or chilled, but not frozen: 1¼ cents per pound.

United States tariff—703. Bacon, hams, and shoulders, and other pork, prepared or preserved, but not cooked, boned, packed in air-tight containers, or made into sausages of any kind; 2 cents per pound.

Mr. HAYHURST: Does this item of reduction on swine from two cents to one cent per pound apply to swine of all weights?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Could the minister tell us the exports last year to the United States?

Mr. EULER: In 1937, according to United States records, the value of our swine exports was $1,525,208. It is on the tabular statement.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Has the minister any figures to give us of the exports by the United States of swine, pork and pork products to the United Kingdom market before the 1932 imperial trade agreement?

Mr. EULER: By the United States?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Yes. Their exports to the United Kingdom before the trade agreement?

Mr. EULER: No. I regret I have not that information.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): While we have a reduction in duty in these items, it will be recognized that it is not nearly as important to the Canadian swine producer as the advantages the United States producer receives in the imperial market under the Anglo-American treaty. I believe that before 1932 the United States exported to the British market a great deal more bacon than Canada did, and that their exports dropped off after that time. We had a market in the old land of only small proportions prior to the imperial trade agreement. In 1931 it was about 49,000 hundredweight. By 1937 it had reached 1,387,000 hundredweight, or over a million and a quarter.

As regards our advantages in the United States market for bacon products, they are not to be compared with the advantages that we have surrendered in the British market to the United States producer. Personally I think the market in the United States for our meats has been of uncertain value for many years. The preference that is extended to the United States producer in this line is similar to the preference extended in many other directions. It will not only give the United States producer a place in the greatest market of the world but surrender again stability in markets that we have been long endeavouring to establish.

We have had a haphazard market in the United States, a very uncertain market. Comparisons have been made, one year with another, but I think it is unfair to suggest the year 1932 for comparative purposes, because everyone knows that the United States was at that time destroying almost every line of live stock. Millions of hogs, millions of cattle, were destroyed; farm products were being destroyed all along the line down to the cotton fields of the south.

Mr. CRERAR: Not hogs in 1932.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): There was an over-supply. Our exports of live stock to the United States were insignificant even in 1930. We imported four or five million pounds of meat into this country in 1930 to feed our own people. Our exports of live stock had practically disappeared. Take the year 1921, if you want to compare different years—and I am not charging this to the government that is in power to-day, because it was the trend of development. We shipped more live stock to the markets of the world in 1921 than we have done since. Our export market for bacon had practically disappeared between 1921 and 1930, Denmark having captured that market from us in the old land. In 1921 we sold twice as many cattle to the United States as the whole global quota includes now—in cattle and calves, upwards of half a million. But the Fordney-McCumber tariff closed us out over-night and we were left for years not knowing what to do with our surplus live stock. In 1929 we had recovered the market to some extent, but the Hawley-Smoot tariff closed us out again. Now we have a temporary advantage in that uncertain market for some of these products, but we have cut the tariff in this item from two cents to one cent—

Mr. EULER: They have.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): They have, rather. Someone on the other side said that this would figure out at a fifty per cent reduction, and that is true; fifty per cent of a two cent tariff is one cent. But when one realizes that they send only $1,500,000 worth, one realizes how insignificant it is. And in order to achieve this great purpose of getting into the United States market for $1,500,000 worth of swine, with other minor advantages, we are extending to the United States, through the Anglo-American treaty, the preference in the old land.

Mr. EULER: I wish to correct one impression left by the hon. member with regard to the preference which he says we have given up in the United Kingdom market in bacon and hams. We have given up nothing whatever. Our quota remains exactly what it was. The only thing is that the quota for the United States has been increased from 400,000 hundredweight to 500,000 hundredweight. That is not at the expense of the Canadian producer but of other countries that are exporting to Great Britain, and no advantage whatever is yielded by the Canadian government in the British market. Moreover, there was no binding with regard to Canada other than the quota. The United Kingdom was at perfect liberty to make any concessions she desired to the United States, but I repeat that we have given up nothing in regard to bacon and hams. The quota is the same as it was, and any increase in quota granted the United States by the United Kingdom is at the expense of other countries and not of Canada.

Items agreed to.

United States tariff—706. Edible animal livers, kidneys, tongues, hearts, sweetbreads, tripe, and brains, fresh, chilled or frozen: 3 cents per pound, but not less than 15 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—707. Whole milk, fresh or sour, 3½ cents per gallon.

Provided, that such fresh or sour milk entered for consumption in any calendar year after 1938 in excess of 3,000,000 gallons shall not be entitled to a reduction in duty by virtue of this item, but the rate of duty thereon shall not exceed: 6½ cents per gallon.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—707. Cream, fresh or sour: 28$\frac{3}{10}$ cents per gallon.

Provided, that such fresh or sour cream entered for consumption in any calendar year after 1938 in excess of 1,500,000 gallons shall not be entitled to a reduction in duty by virtue of this item, but the rate of duty thereon shall not exceed 56$\frac{3}{10}$ cents per gallon.

Mr. PERLEY: It seems to me that the government have not done the best that was possible in connection with milk and cream. The reduction is only 6½ cents a gallon. There is an ad valorem duty of nineteen per cent. I do not think that is quite good enough. After listening to the debate that took place yesterday with regard to the effect upon the dairy industry in Canada of imports of vegetable oils, I submit that the government should have made every effort to secure a greater concession in respect to cream and milk. Consider the surplus butter we have in Canada. The government might have made an effort to secure a greater reduction and to have the quota increased. The quota on cream is 1,500,000 gallons. If that could have been doubled at a lower rate, it would have assisted materially. I repeat, the government should have made a greater effort.

Mr. EULER: It was not possible to get a lower rate. We received the maximum reduction of fifty per cent. It was not possible under the powers of the president.

Mr. PERLEY: You did not get a fifty per cent reduction on cream.

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. PERLEY: It is from 35 cents to 28$\frac{3}{10}$ cents.

Mr. EULER: Yes, but we had a reduction in the previous agreement. It is a reduction of fifty per cent from the tariff rate.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): From the tariff act of 1930.

Mr. EULER: Yes, and that was the full reduction that was possible.

Mr. STEWART: With respect to the export of cream and milk, is it not a fact that it is subject to municipal and state regulations as to production in Canada under conditions that conform with their requirements? As a matter of fact, I am informed by those who know very well that it is practically impossible to comply with the regulations, so far as the average producer is concerned, because the product must be pasteurized in one state, or there are some other regulations as to production which make it difficult for the Canadian producer to comply with the requirements. It is only one in a hundred who can do it. Is that not the reason why we have not caught up to our quota?

Mr. EULER: Probably it is. There is no question that the United States health regulations are very strict indeed. But it hardly enters into the scope of making a trade agreement to ask the United States to change their health regulations which are imposed for the purpose of preserving the health of their people.

Mr. STEWART: I am asking if that is not the reason why we have not reached anything like our quota and cannot possibly reach it under this or any other agreement.

Mr. EULER: That may be true.

Mr. HAYHURST: Under the new agreement 1,500,000 gallons of cream may be shipped annually at 28$\frac{3}{10}$ cents per gallon. How many gallons were shipped under the 1935 agreement at 35 cents a gallon?

Mr. EULER: In 1935, 480 gallons; in 1936, 44,053 gallons; in 1937, 136,034 gallons.

Mr. HAYHURST: What was the amount that could have been shipped?

Mr. EULER: A million and a half gallons.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): What percentage is that of the United States consumption?

Mr. EULER: I do not know, but I think it is very small.

Mr. STEVENS: The decimal would be too long.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Practically any county between Ottawa and Toronto could produce more than the total quota secured.

Mr. EULER: I quite admit that this is not the most important concession we received. The others that we received are so great that this may appear infinitesimal, but that is no reason for refusing it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The 18,000,000 gallons of milk or its equivalent in cream that would be taken off the market here would just about account for the surplus of butter that is troubling us. If that amount of butter were gone the market would be buoyant as it was at this time last year.

Mr. THOMPSON: Enlarging the quota is of no benefit to Canada, because the duty remains the same and the quota last year was not filled.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The statistics of two or three weeks ago indicated that there were only five or six million pounds more butter than last year in storage. That is, there were ten million, but there was an evident shortage of five million pounds last year which had to be obtained from some other source, so that there was a net surplus this year of about five million pounds.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): It would still have to be good milk.

Mr. THOMPSON: We sent last year only about 5,000 gallons of milk; we practically are not shipping any milk to the United States.

Mr. STEWART: We cannot get it in there.

Mr. THOMPSON: This 6½ cents a gallon on fresh milk—

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It is 3¼ cents a gallon.

Mr. THOMPSON: It was 6½ cents, now down to 3¼ cents. Milk will not be shipped in under that.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Well, there is an opportunity anyhow.

Mr. WALSH: Have any arrangements been made for the inspection of farms and dairies which might be interested in shipping milk or cream to the United States, so that they could meet the regulations there?

Mr. EULER: I am informed that this is being done all the time, but for more definite information I am afraid I have to refer my hon. friend to my colleague the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. STEWART: He would not tell you.

Mr. EULER: I am afraid I cannot tell that.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—734. Apples, green or ripe: 15 cents per bushel of 50 pounds.

Mr. WALSH: Is there any kind of connection between this item as it pertains to the Canada-United States treaty and to the United States-United Kingdom treaty?

Mr. EULER: This is the same as we had in the old agreement; there is no change.

Mr. WALSH: There is nothing in this item that is related in any way to the reduction as between the United States and the United Kingdom that will interfere with our apple growers?

Mr. EULER: No, I would say not.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—736. Berries, edible, in their natural condition or in brine, not specially provided for:

Blueberries: 1 cent per pound.

Other (except lingon or partridge berries): 3/4 cent per pound.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—737. Cherries: (1) in their natural state, not in airtight or watertight containers: 1 cent per pound.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—738. Cider: 3 cents per gallon.

Mr. MASSEY: What is cider?

Mr. EULER: As far as I know, it is the juice of the apple; that is the best definition I can give.

Mr. STEWART: Drink it and see what it will do.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—753. Cut flowers, fresh, dried, prepared or preserved: 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MacNICOL: In the absence of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), I might say that he would like to have seen this item reduced the full amount that the President of the United States could have given, namely, to 20 per cent.

Mr. EULER: We obtained quite a substantial reduction, from 40 per cent to 25 per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am sure if the hon. member for Peel had been here he would have asked that the duty be reduced to 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—763. Grass seeds and other forage crop seeds:

Alfalfa: 4 cents per pound.
Alsike clover: 4 cents per pound.
Red clover: 4 cents per pound.
Sweet clover: 2 cents per pound.
Timothy: 1 cent per pound.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—764. Tree and shrub seeds: 4 cents per pound.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—766. Beets, other than sugar beets: 10 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—769. Peas, green or unripe, when imported and entered for consumption during the period from July 1 to September 30, inclusive, in any year: 2 cents per pound.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—771. White or Irish seed potatoes, certified by a responsible officer or agency of a foreign government in accordance with the official rules and regulations of that government to have been grown and approved especially for use as seed, in containers marked with the foreign government's official certified seed potato tags, when entered for consumption during the period

From March 1 to November 30, inclusive, in any year: 37½ cents per 100 pounds.

From December 1 in any year to the last day of the following February, inclusive: 60 cents per 100 pounds.

Provided, that if and when the United States is no longer obligated to accord to such potatoes produced in the Republic of Cuba a preferential reduction in the rate of duty in excess of 20 per centum, the rate of duty under this item during the entire year shall be 37½ cents per 100 pounds.

Provided further, that such potatoes entered for consumption in the 12-month period beginning on September 15 in the year 1938 or any subsequent year in excess of an aggregate quantity of 1,500,000 bushels of 60 pounds each shall not be entitled to a reduction in duty by virtue of this item, but the rate of duty thereon shall not exceed 75 cents per 100 pounds.

United States tariff—771. White or Irish potatoes, other than certified seed potatoes, as defined in the preceding item, when entered for consumption during the period

From March 1 to November 30, inclusive, in any year: 37½ cents per 100 pounds.

From December 1 in any year to the last day of the following February, inclusive: 60 cents per 100 pounds.

Provided, that such potatoes entered for consumption in the twelve-month period beginning on September 15 in the year 1938 or any subsequent year in excess of an aggregate quantity of 1,000,000 bushels of 60 pounds each shall not be entitled to a reduction in duty by virtue of this item, but the rate of duty thereon shall not exceed 75 cents per 100 pounds.

Provided further, that if for any calendar year the production of white or Irish potatoes, including seed potatoes, in the United States, according to the estimate made as of September 1 by the United States Department of Agriculture, is less than 350,000,000 bushels of 60 pounds each, an additional quantity of such potatoes, other than certified seed potatoes, equal to the amount by which such estimated production is less than 350,000,00 bushels may be entered for consumption during the twelve-month period beginning on September 15 of that year at the reduced rates above specified;

And provided further, that in computing the quantities of imports specified in the two foregoing provisos white or Irish potatoes produced in the Republic of Cuba shall not be included.

Mr. STEWART: What is the rate on potatoes coming into Canada compared with the rate on potatoes going into the United States?

Mr. EULER: The rate is 37½ cents per 100 pounds from June 15 to the end of July and free for the rest of the year.

Mr. STEWART: What is the minister quoting now?

Mr. EULER: The rate against the United States; the Canadian tariff.

Mr. STEWART: What is the rate against Canadian potatoes going into the United States?

Mr. EULER: That is given here; for table potatoes it is 37½ cents per 100 pounds from March 1 to November 30 inclusive in any year. From December 1 in any year to the last day of the following February, inclusive, it is 60 cents per 100 pounds, and there is a quota of 1,000,000 bushels.

Mr. STEWART: Then I am correct in saying that the rate on potatoes going from Canada to the United States is higher than the rate on potatoes coming from the United States into Canada?

Mr. EULER: Yes, during certain parts of the year.

Mr. STEWART: What part of the year?

Mr. EULER: I just gave it. The rate is 60 cents per 100 pounds from December 1 in any year until the last day of the following February. During certain parts of the year the rates are the same.

Mr. WALSH: I assume these items are restricted to this particular description of potatoes?

Mr. EULER: There are two kinds, seed potatoes and table potatoes.

Mr. WALSH: Are there quotas under these items?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. WALSH: And are these quotas dealt with in much the same way as the quotas we discussed in the earlier part of the evening in connection with cattle? Are they quotas which must be filled within definite periods or are they annual quotas?

Mr. EULER: It is an annual quota beginning on September 15. There is a quota of 1,000,000 bushels a year in connection with table potatoes, with the exception that if the production in the United States in any year is less than 350,000,000 bushels, we get the benefit of the difference. For instance, if their production should be 340,000,000 bushels our quota would be increased by the difference, which would be 10,000,000 bushels.

Mr. WALSH: While I was in Halifax I was given to understand that the cold storage plant was pretty well filled with seed potatoes held there awaiting shipment to the United States. I was wondering if those potatoes were going to fill part of this quota and if it was the regular practice to hold them in Canada in storage, or if they were shipped through and held in storage in the United States.

Mr. EULER: No doubt they were waiting until the 37½ cent rate came into force on March 1.

Items agreed to.

United States tariff—773. Turnips and rutabagas: 12½ cents per 100 pounds.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—774. Carrots, radishes, and cauliflower, in their natural state: 25 per cent ad valorem.

United States tariff—802. Whiskey of all types or classes, not consisting in any part of distilled spirits which have not been aged in wooden containers at least four years prior to the date the whiskey is entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption: $2.50 per proof gallon.

Mr. WALSH: There has been no improvement under this item in regard to the possibility of shipping whisky into the United States. I am not interested in retaining the whisky in Canada, but I notice there is no opportunity for shipping a greater quantity into the United States market.

Mr. EULER: We have the full reduction of fifty per cent.

Mr. WALSH: Under the previous agreement, but there has been no further reduction under this agreement.

Mr. EULER: This is another case where our tariff is higher against United States whisky than their tariff is against our whisky.

Mr. WALSH: But presumably their whisky is not as good as ours; I do not know.

Mr. EULER: I do not know either.

Mr. WALSH: We used to enjoy a considerable market for our whisky in the United States, but it seem difficult to get it in there at the present time. I just hope the government did the best it could to rid this country of the greatest possible amount of whisky.

Mr. EULER: We got the best terms we could.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—1001. Flax straw: $1.50 per ton.

Item agreed to.

United States tariff—1716. Mechanically ground woodpulp, chemical wood pulp, unbleached or bleached: free.

Mr. WALSH: I understand that the United States ship little or no wood pulp into Canada, which is only natural since Canada produces such huge quantities of this commodity. But am I correct in assuming that countries enjoying favoured nation treatment have the same privilege as the United States?

Mr. EULER: I assume my hon. friend refers to the most favoured nation arrangement.

Mr. WALSH: Yes.

Mr. EULER: Any country with which the United States has a most favoured nation agreement will be entitled to the same privileges we are.

Mr. WALSH: That is shipping into the United States; but it does not work both ways. It does not give those other nations the privilege to ship to Canada.

Mr. EULER: If we have a most favoured nation agreement with another country, we cannot give to the United States what we do not give to those other countries. We give to them what we give to the United States.

Mr. WALSH: But, for instance, this would not enable a country like Finland to ship wood pulp into Canada at the same rate as we ship wood pulp to the United States, or they ship it through to us?

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. STEWART: Is it not a fact that many of these items were free prior to the 1935 agreement, and that they are just bound in this agreement?

Mr. EULER: Yes. It would appear that the hon. member for Mount Royal is referring to the other items. This schedule has to do with Canadian products going into the United States, not with products coming into Canada.

Mr. WALSH: I appreciate that, but I was afraid I would not be here when the items in the other category are called.

Mr. EULER: They have already been passed.

Item agreed to.

Mr. TUSTIN: I read in a press report from Washington the other day that this item had been taken up by the government of the United States with the intention of trying to have the quota reduced. Would the minister say whether or not there is anything in that report?

Mr. EULER: I understand a member of the United States congress has introduced a bill to that effect. However it would be in conflict with the agreement, and could not override it. I do not think there is any possibility of it being enacted.

Mr. TUSTIN: I have the clipping here. The president's letter said, "This matter is being given the most careful attention."

Mr. MacNICOL: That is an answer we get here.

Mr. EULER: We have heard governments make the same statement in another country.

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN PETITIONS TO COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

Mr. W. A. WALSH (Mount Royal) moved:

That the petition of John Roy Fumerton, presented on March 22, and the petition of Iris Ester Westerberg Duffy, presented on March 23, each praying for the passing of an act to dissolve the marriage of the petitioner, together with the respective reports of the clerk of petitions thereon, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders for such recommendations as may be deemed advisable.

LIVE STOCK PEDIGREE ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF CANADIAN NATIONAL LIVE STOCK RECORDS

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 59, to amend the Live Stock Pedigree Act, 1932.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GARDINER: This bill is simply to legalize a practice which has been carried on in connection with the pedigrees by the board which is entrusted with that responsibility, and I think it can be explained better on the second reading of the bill in committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY COMMISSION

GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL UPON ADVICE OF COMMISSION MAY PRESCRIBE STANDARDS AND ESTABLISH GRADES

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 60, to amend the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act, 1935.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Speaker, this bill is the outcome of certain representations made by the late Judge Sedgewick, the chairman of the dominion trade and industry commission. It includes certain provisions which he regarded as desirable in the public interest and which were omitted from the original bill. I may say that the bill was drafted by the late chairman himself. The purpose of the legislation is to make it possible to establish standards in respect of commodities which are not now provided for by any existing act of parliament, and also to prescribe the words by which the material content of any commodity shall be represented. A number of acts, such as the Food and Drugs Act, the Canada Grain Act, the Meat and Canned Foods Act, the Inspection and Sale Act, et cetera, provide for standards in respect of certain commodities, but there are many commodities which cannot be made subject to standards under any existing legislation. The Dominion Trade and Industry Commission have received suggestions for standards for a number of commodities. This is intended to give power to deal with such cases.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA

USE OF NAME "THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN CANADA"

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 57, respecting the United Church of Canada.

He said: This bill comes to us from the senate, and is founded upon a mutual agreement associated with reciprocal good fellowship between the official representatives of the United Church of Canada and corresponding representatives of that body of Presbyterians who decided to remain out of church union, as to the use of that official designation "The Presbyterian Church in Canada."

Inasmuch as both parties to this difference make some conscientious claims to some form of continuity, it was unanimously agreed, after friendly discussions, that that portion of the Presbyterian church which remained out of union, should have accorded to it the right by law to use the official term "The Presbyterian Church in Canada," without prejudice in any way to the rights, status, or powers of the United Church of Canada. This bill is designed to give effect to that reciprocal understanding.

I therefore take much pleasure in moving the first reading of this bill, seconded by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart).

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH

INCORPORATION OF THE TRUSTEE BOARD OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN CANADA

Motion agreed to.

SEED AND FEED

REFUSAL OF CREDIT AND LOANS BY BANKS TO SASKATCHEWAN MUNICIPALITIES

On the orders of the day :

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I wish to direct to the Minister of Finance a question based on a number of reports I have received from municipalities in Saskatchewan, and particularly a letter I have received today from the reeve and secretary of one municipality. The letter is to the effect that the municipality has been refused lines of credit and further loans from the banks on the excuse that the dominion government's guarantee for the purchase of seed and feed last spring has not been carried out. The question is: Will the minister say whether the banks are right in stating as a proper excuse for not extending loans, that the guarantee has not been carried out?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I would have preferred notice of the question because it might involve something which is not within my immediate present knowledge, but I am quite sure that the dominion has in every respect followed through with the obligation of the guarantee authorized by this house one year ago. I am quite sure there must be some misunderstanding on the part of some branch bank involving a statement of that sort. As to whether the guarantee for specific amounts has yet been executed, that is another matter, because, of course, specific amounts could not be guaranteed until they were definitely ascertained from all municipalities for every bank. But there is no doubt in the mind of any of the banks, I am quite sure, as to the obligation of the dominion with respect to its guarantee given one year ago.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

WAYS AND MEANS

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Sanderson, in the chair.

On schedule I:

Customs tariff—438a. Automobiles and motor vehicles of all kinds, n.o.p.; electric trackless trolley buses; chassis for all the foregoing, 17½ per cent.

Provided, that machines or other articles mounted on the foregoing, or attached thereto for purposes other than loading or unloading the vehicle, shall be valued separately and duty assessed under the tariff items regularly applicable thereto.

Mr. HEAPS: We had an important discussion on this item just before six o'clock yesterday. The question merits more consideration than it has so far received. We are all interested to know whether statements made in the chamber yesterday with respect to certain industries threatening to leave the country are correct or otherwise. Some hon. members have stated that one of the industries has decided to leave Canada. On the other hand the Minister of Finance said he was not aware of anything of that kind having occurred.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): My hon. friend is not reading my statement when he says that. The allegation in the newspaper article, which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) read yesterday, was that two of the large automobile manufacturers were contemplating leaving Canada, and my reply had reference to that statement. To-day I can confirm my reply, that I have no knowledge, and the government has no knowledge whatsoever, that any of the large automobile manufacturers are contemplating closing their Canadian plants.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it true, then, that any of the smaller ones are closing their factories on account of the removal of this three per cent excise duty?

Mr. DUNNING: We have no notification that any are definitely closing.

Mr. HEAPS: Well, we had better have that statement from the minister. The question is an important one. My mind goes back to 1926, when certain reductions were made in the automobile duties under the late Mr. Robb's budget. When these reductions were announced the automobile factories closed down almost entirely, and a few days later they organized a tremendous demonstration right here in Ottawa. Many thousands of employees came here and protested against the reduction. But when no action was taken by the government the factories reopened, and I believe that the following year they did more business than ever before in the history of the industry in Canada. In Oshawa, particularly was that true. Whether that was due to the reduction of the duty I cannot say, but the fact is although this tremendous protest was made, when the government took no action the matter blew over and the industry went on as actively as before.

I do not know what the position is now, whether they are just carrying on an agitation as they did in 1926, trying to induce the government to restore the three per cent excise tax. If I am not mistaken, all the protection that is being removed at the present time from the automobile industry is the three per cent excise tax. If I am wrong in that, I hope I shall be corrected immediately. Under the 17½ per cent duty the industry has been doing fairly well. Whether the three per cent excise now is of such vital importance to the industry I do not know. But it seems that whenever there is a reduction in duty affecting any particular industry we are bombarded with threats that if the duty is not restored the industry will be ruined. I do not take a great deal of stock in such arguments. There may be certain industries in respect of which even a three per cent difference in protection might have considerable effect, but I do not know whether the automobile industry is in that position. According to my knowledge, which is meagre, the disparity between prices of automobiles in Canada and the same machines in the United States is so great that I cannot see that a reduction of three per cent could make such a great difference to the manufacturers in Canada.

Mr. MARTIN: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say he is opposed to the withdrawal of the three per cent excise tax?

Mr. HEAPS: I have offered no objection, because, so far as I can see, no case has been made out by the manufacturers to show that the industry would be seriously jeopardized. If I could be shown that the three per cent excise tax makes the difference between their remaining in business or closing down, I should certainly be opposed to removal of the tax. But all we have had is a number of statements and letters in general terms, nothing specific and definite. I object to these general statements which give us no clear knowledge of the situation.

Probably no hon. member of this house has taken a greater interest in the condition of the men and women employed in the industry than I have over a period of years. In 1926, when the duties were reduced, the automobile industry was doing fairly well. It was doing fairly well in 1928, and employees who had come here to protest against the reduction in the tariff were the very ones who came about that time and protested against a reduction in wages. We all remember the strike in the automobile plants at Oshawa about 1928. At that time not half as many hon. members were prepared to take the part of the employees as supported the protest the year before.

I should like the minister to state if he can what the reduction of three per cent really means to the automobile industry. We have not had a clear statement from the manufacturers or from anyone else. This three per cent excise tax has been in effect, I believe, for six or seven years?

Mr. DUNNING: Since 1931.

Mr. HEAPS: A little over seven years. Prior to that time the manufacturers were doing fairly well. I cannot see why we should always be threatened with the closing down of an industry the moment a duty is reduced. When a duty goes up, no threats are made by manufacturers, no better conditions are provided for those employed in the industry, and no greater stability of employment results. The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) last night spoke of the condition of the employees of this industry in his city. We know it is not very good. Yet I think the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore) said their annual wages were the fourth highest in Canada. That may mean much or nothing. All we know is that the annual wages of those employed in the automobile industry are barely sufficient to give them a decent existence. To-day on account of improvement in industrial technique it takes a smaller number of days to produce the same number of automobiles than it did a few years ago. If that process continues we are bound to have a greater problem of unemployment to face as time goes on. No scheme of insurance or anything of the kind can take care of the part-time employee. I do not wish, however, to go into that aspect of the question now. But if it is possible to have a clear and concise statement from the minister as to what this three per cent really means, we should have it. We should not continually have these threats from the automobile manufacturers that unless the duty is kept up they will close their plants.

Mr. YOUNG: It was not my intention to say anything about this item until other hon. members made some observations. I congratulate this country upon having a government which is prepared to take part of the burden off the people in connection with this industry. I was a member of this house some years ago and am familiar with the occasion to which the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Heaps) referred, when the tariff on automobiles was reduced in 1926 and we had a delegation which filled the lawn in front of the parliament buildings, consisting I believe of about 5,000 people. They had banners and all that sort of thing, and they made all kinds of threats to the people of this country and particularly to hon. members of this house as to what would be done if we dared reduce the tariff on automobiles. In fact the demonstration was so noisy that one might think the whole industry was on the verge of ruin. I remember one man in front of this building who was so violent that he put his fist as close to my face as it is safe for any man to do, and said that if we did not recognize the terrible condition to which this industry was to be brought he did not know what was going to happen.

What did we do? The tariff at that time was reduced from 35 per cent to 20 per cent on cars costing up to $1,200 and to 27½ per cent on the others. What was the result? Well, what are we hearing now? We are told that if we dare to remove even this excise tax, again the industry is going to close down, or at least some companies will have to move out of Canada. On the previous occasion no companies moved out of Canada; on the contrary they enlarged their plants, sold more cars, created more employment and the industry prospered more than it had prospered at any other time. The same thing will happen to-day. If we make it easier for people to purchase cars, more cars will be purchased.

This tariff schedule provides a rate of 17½ per cent, but let us examine how that rate of duty is applied. We have three large companies manufacturing cars in this country, the Ford Motor Company, the Chrysler Corporation and General Motors. I ask this question: does any dealer in Canada who is associated with any of these companies purchase cars made in the United States? Can he purchase any cars made by these companies in the United States and bring them into Canada? The answer is that it cannot be done. In rare cases a man in Canada might sell a car to some customer who happened to be down in the United States, but that has to be done by special arrangement. Then I would ask the further question, against whom this tariff operates. Certainly it does not operate against these three major companies, which do the vast majority of the automobile business in Canada. The tariff is listed at 17½ per cent, but as it is applied at present there is an effective rate of duty to the consumers of Canada—and that is what matters—of between 28 and 29 per cent. I challenge anyone to deny that. Anyone who does so cannot know the facts.

An hon. MEMBER: Develop that.

Mr. YOUNG: It is not hard to develop. Not one automobile company in Canada will deny it. Some of the accountants employed in the automobile industry were in my office on several occasions, and they admitted this to be the case. When I purchase a car in the United States I must pay the duty of 17½ per cent on the retail price of that car. A couple of years ago I bought in this country what I thought, and still think, was a very good car. There was a radio installed in it, and while I was in the United States the radio went out of commission. I stopped at the garage of a dealer handling the same kind of car, and immediately alongside my car on the street was a United States car of exactly the same type. On many occasions we in this house have been told that the Canadian car contains a little better material, that it is a little more substantially made in order to meet Canadian conditions. We examined the two cars, which were also examined by the mechanics, and found that the materials were identical, and I believe the workmanship was just as good in the one case as in the other. But the retail price of that car in that city was $859, while the retail price of the same car in Saskatoon, where I live, was $1,260. The differential in freight as between that city in the United States and Saskatoon amounted to $100. In other words on a car which retailed in the United States at $859, after allowing for freight I was obliged to pay a difference of something over $300. That is a pretty serious matter.

Mr. MANION: What about the sales tax, as a matter of information?

Mr. YOUNG: I have forgotten the exact figures. There was a little difference, but it was very slight.

Mr. LANDERYOU: May I ask the hon. member if there will be any reduction when this schedule is passed?

Mr. YOUNG: My hon. friend does me quite an honour if he thinks I know just what the automobile companies will do. I certainly hope we will get at least some relief, and I will go further and say that unless we do get more relief than this three per cent reduction will give us, we should go much further in reducing this tariff. The hon. member for Wood Mountain said yesterday that one of the real difficulties was the way in which this tariff was applied, and I agree entirely. If we reduced this tariff very materially and applied the duty to the retail price, these companies would still be here, but they would not be permitted to charge the exorbitant differential they have been charging. I do not think any of us would object so very much to a tariff if the manufacturers of this country did not take full advantage of it. If you look into the matter, Mr. Chairman, you will find that the differential in the price just corresponds to the amount of protection they enjoy. As far as Saskatchewan, and in fact western Canada generally is concerned, I believe that unless we can lower the cost of production of our goods from every point of view we cannot continue to live in that country. We must get our production costs down. Tariffs mean nothing in the world to us in regard to the sale of our products, regardless of what they are. We have to compete against the world. We are going to ask; we are going to insist; we are going to demand, more than we have ever demanded in the past, that we be given at least some opportunity to get our implements of production on a basis as reasonable as it is possible to get them.

I want to give the house a little information which I obtained at the time the demonstration was staged in front of this building and the statement was made that if tariffs were reduced the whole industry would go to pot. I asked certain questions of one of the largest manufacturers of automobiles, which will become apparent from the replies:

Specific information requested in your letter of the sixteenth is submitted herewith—

(1) The original investment of the company—$125,000.

(2) Additional capital put in the company not taken out of profits—none.

(3) The dividends paid from year to year on original capital invested—

Year	Amount

1907	....
1908	12,500
1909	31,250

1921	2,100,000
1922	2,100,000
1923	700,000
1924	700,000
1925	1,400,000

This letter was written on March 23, 1926. In other words, a total of $12,851,238 was paid as dividends over a period of twenty years on an original capital investment of $125,000. This letter is signed by the vice president and treasurer of the company. There are the facts, over his own signature. Now I ask this question: When we are asked for more protection for the motor car industry, are we being asked to guarantee profits or dividends such as I have recited on an original investment of $125,000?

Mr. BAKER: Was that an automobile manufacturing company?

Mr. YOUNG: It is one of the big companies.

Mr. BAKER: Would the hon. member mention the name?

Mr. YOUNG: It is the Ford Motor Company. Is that a big enough company for you?

Mr. BAKER: All right—just for information.

Mr. YOUNG: Although I am not going to discuss those items, I have been reading recently something of the set-up of the companies in the textile trade. I ask myself this question, and I put it to every hon. member: Are we being asked to give protection of an undue character to all these commodities in order that dividends may be paid on completely watered stock? If that kind of thing is to be permitted to continue it will be a serious condition for this country. The producers of western Canada who are trying to live will not be permitted to live unless we have a reduction in the prices of commodities which they require in order that they may produce the commodities which they should produce.

I want to thank the government for taking off this three per cent. I want to ask them to go farther. I ask them to change the incidence of the collection of this tariff so that it will be on the retail price of the car in the United States, and so that the tariff rate will not be 17½ per cent but will be cut down to 5 or 6 or 7 per cent. That will enable the consumer in this country to get his car at a more reasonable price than he ever got it before.

I had no notion whatever of saying anything about it, but when I hear hon. gentlemen berating the government for taking off the excise tax of three per cent, and when I find that outside of the house the automobile companies and the parts industry are making the same kind of fuss—well, to my mind, what is being done outside of this house is almost blackmail. I do not blame hon. members who receive these stories; they are reflecting that attitude. But in my humble judgment this automobile industry has had all the pap-feeding which any industry should ever have had. The sooner we get down to a better basis, the better it will be for the industry itself and for the consumers of Canada.

Mr. DEACHMAN: May we return for a moment to the original situation? We entered into negotiations with the United States for mutual benefit under a trade treaty. Our negotiators went down there, and an agreement was made about this three per cent excise tax. It is now suggested that this should be changed.

There are two alternatives open to us. One is that the negotiators should be sent back there, and that they should speak to that nice, fine, mild-voiced southern gentleman, Mr. Hull, and say, "We have two or three large United States corporations operating in Canada. We have lowered the excise tax against United States importations, and we suggest to you that you permit an amendment of this agreement so that the people of Canada may continue to exploit themselves for the benefit of two of your largest motor car companies." That is all it amounts to. These are two, strong United States companies—Canadian companies let me say, with United States stockholders—and that is the suggestion.

The other alternative, a somewhat different one, was embodied in the suggestion made yesterday by the Minister of National Revenue, when he said:

> The suggestion made to me as Minister of National Revenue is that the law respecting valuations for duty purposes is not being properly applied by the Department of National Revenue.

The hon. gentleman's ears and heart are touched by the voice of pleading from the motor companies, and he thinks that something may be done.

> All that I can say in that regard is that these representations are receiving the consideration of the Department of National Revenue at the present time. I do not think there is anything more I can add.

But may I point out this to the Minister of National Revenue. There are many far more deeply convinced protectionists who have occupied for years the position which he now occupies; and if these mighty gleaners have gone over the field seeking justification for alteration of valuations, how does my less strenuous friend think he can find it under present conditions?

[Mr. Young.]

Mr. ILSLEY: Did I understand the hon. member to say that I thought some change should be made?

Mr. DEACHMAN: I will read the paragraph.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member interpolated something in the middle of it; that is scarcely fair.

Mr. DEACHMAN: My hon. friend the Minister of Finance will permit me to read the full paragraph before he suggests what has been interpolated into it.

Mr. DUNNING: But there was an interpolation.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Let me read the item:

> But the suggestion that has been made to me as Minister of National Revenue—and that is probably the reason why my name is mentioned in that regard—is that the law respecting valuations for duty purposes is not being properly applied by the Department of National Revenue. All that I can say in that regard is that these representations are receiving the consideration of the Department of National Revenue at the present time. I do not think there is anything more I can add.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Yes, that is what my hon. friend said. In other words, the suggestion is that they are making a very careful investigation to see if it may not be possible to adjust this situation.

May I say this to my hon. friend and to the House of Commons: Rather a hundred times I would have it that we should go boldly to the United States and ask for an amendment than that, having entered into negotiations with those people, who understood our system of valuation, we should then turn around and change that valuation at the request of interested parties. True, there is no limitation to genius in a corner seeking to satisfy the needs of greed. But I do say that we should hesitate, and hesitate a long time, before we face that method of settlement.

Let me turn to the next item. We had a story yesterday from the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin):

> I must say, and I say this in the house, that I first of all thank the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) for the statement he has made to-day, namely that this whole matter is receiving the consideration of the government. I want the committee to know that there could have been no more painstaking effort on the part of the Minister of Finance and on the part of the Minister of National Revenue in considering this problem, as they have done during the past two or three weeks particularly, in conference day after day with members from Essex county and other parts of Ontario and myself.

Mr. MARTIN: What is wrong with that?

Mr. DEACHMAN: Government by the house; government by party; a democracy—or what have we?

Mr. ILSLEY: Did the hon. member ever confer with me about these matters?

Mr. DEACHMAN: Yes, quite; but I did not have much of a conference, by the way.

Mr. MARTIN: Oh, oh.

Mr. DEACHMAN: But here is the situation: I point this out—my hon. friend admits it himself and I will prove it. In a speech he delivered last year to the junior chamber of commerce of Canada, in the Windsor Hotel, Montreal, he used these words:

> Another feature of political public service of the "less pleasing" type is the continuous and at times intense pressure of special interests—sectional, corporate or individual. I have often said, and now repeat, that no government can be truly efficient unless it continuously places the general interest above the particular, the national above the sectional. But it is so hard to defend the general interest, when everyone is fighting for some special interest.

So I say the minister himself admits the condition which exists. Why should anyone else attempt to deny it?

I now come to another paragraph of the hon. member for Essex East:

> In answer to the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) I referred to the provisions of the Customs Act. In my judgment there is within the terms of the present Customs Act an opportunity to obviate whatever harm may exist because of the removal of the three per cent excise.

What did the hon. member for Essex East mean by that sentence? He meant that within the four corners of the Customs Act there remains the power for the Minister of National Revenue to obviate or to nullify the change which had been made. All that I am pleading for to-day before this house is that if we are to change this, let us face the situation, let us admit that we are wrong; but do not change it now by a shifting of valuations when these valuations have remained fixed over a long period of years.

I ask this question. We have in Canada two or three large United States automobile manufacturing companies. We have gone through this list which I have before me, and it has not been suggested for one moment that we change the excise tax in regard to the other items; these were Canadian companies.

> But oft for our own the bitter tone,
> Though we love our own the best.

There is no reason except that the pressure upon this item is greater. And why the pressure? Pressure comes from power, and these gentlemen have the power.

I have before me the net earnings of the Ford Motor Company. In the year 1935 they were $2,109,000; 1936, $3,888,000; 1937, $4,375,000. The record of their accumulated surplus has been as follows: 1935, $17,167,000; 1936, $18,825,000; 1937, $20,939,000,—almost $21,000,000—of accumulated surplus. I shall watch with some calmness and detachment the attitude which the government takes on this particular question. But I am quite confident what the attitude of the people of Canada will be if the government of to-day decides that by some other way rather than in the regular way they give back to this corporation and other similar corporations that which they took from them by negotiation.

We heard the other day some remarkable things which I think ought to be touched upon. My hon. friend the member for Ontario told us that the farmers had a very high tariff and that that tariff had done wonders for them. Well, that high farm tariff began in 1930. Liberals have always claimed that tariffs, so far as protecting the farmers are concerned, are hopeless, useless and absurd. Within three years of the inauguration of these farm tariffs the prices of farm products in this dominion were cut in two. What did the government do? The government of that day, in 1933, raised the tariffs still further. But something happened later. The price of farm products in the past year has declined twenty-five per cent. I ask you what would have happened among the industrial leaders, what would have happened among labour men, if in that year's time the price of their products had been cut 25 per cent? Suppose the price of automobiles had been cut by twenty-five per cent, let alone three per cent, would not everything possible have been done by parliament to put prices back? Suppose wages of labour had been by some means cut in two; would there not have been a desperate effort to restore them to the normal level? But although we are frankly unable to face the problem of the decline in farm prices, we stlil continue to hold up by every power we have, or as Mr. Bennett used to say, we exhaust the resources of civilization, to hold up the prices of manufactured goods.

There is one other thing which my distinguished friend from Ontario mentioned. He said that we should support this particular industry for another reason—that it is based on something we shall need in the future. The Minister of National Defence is here and I put this to him: If we are going to vote money for a particular purpose in a democratic parliament, should we not vote it definitely for that purpose? If you suggest that we should maintain our automobile industry by artificial means because possibly it may be necessary to us for military reasons in later years, then by all means submit a measure such as that to the house and let us consider it seriously and bravely. But I suggest that the idea that we pay more for an automobile now with the happy idea that we will get it back years later with a tank thrown in, is as great a piece of folly as could possibly be conceived.

It is suggested that the farmers of western Canada should have no objection to this. Well, the farmers of Manitoba recently presented a brief before the dominion-provincial commission in which the estimate was made that in a normal year high tariff interests took from the farmers of western Canada the sum total of $47,000,000. And what do we pay to maintain the price of wheat? The sum of $48,000,000. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that it might be helpful to short-circuit the cheque which we send to the western farmers, pass it directly to the Canadian manufacturers, and let it go at that, thus saving the expense of the present roundabout way of doing it.

It is further suggested that having established this reciprocity treaty with the United States, we should now enter into negotiations with them over another thing—and I shall relate all this to automobiles.

Mr. DUNNING: Pretty far afield.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Not at all far afield, as you will see in a moment. It has been suggested that we enter into negotiations with the United States to permit them to increase the price of coal which they ship into this country.

Mr. DUNNING: I must rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. If we are to have a general budget debate on this item of automobiles, my hon. friend is quite in order, but so will every hon. member be who follows him and attempts to expand in the same manner as he is now doing. I suggest to him in all seriousness that coal is not automobiles.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the point of order raised by the Minister of Finance is well taken. I would ask the hon. member for Huron North to confine his remarks to the item under discussion, which is automobiles.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Speaking to the point of order, it is rather curious, Mr. Chairman; I am dealing directly here with the threat of an increased price on coal by negotiation with the United States, which necessitates in the view of some people an increase in the duty on automobiles. The Minister of Finance does not recognize that fact, but it is true. It may seem that we have wandered far afield, but it is directly and positively connected with the point I was going to discuss—

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. member that I have given my ruling, and I would ask him to abide by it.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I accept your ruling, Mr. Chairman. Here is the point at issue. Are we going to negotiate directly with the United States, or are we going to change this rate by indirect action? I plead with the government that in the consideration of this item they at least give the House of Commons an opportunity to decide upon it, that they do not by some indirect means alter the direct intention of those who made the treaty.

Mr. MacINNIS: This item seems to have engendered quite a lot of heat. I think this is the first time I have had occasion to say anything during the time the treaty has been debated or since the discussion of individual items in the schedules began. But as I sat here day after day listening to the debate I was struck by what must be the enormous difficulty of reconciling the various economic interests in this country. My friend from Essex East (Mr. Martin) nods his head in agreement. Yet he insists on maintaining a society in which you cannot help one person without doing harm to someone else.

Mr. MARTIN: Oh, I did not say that.

Mr. MacINNIS: I know that the hon. member did not, but his nod conveyed his approval of what I was saying, which had a direct bearing on that point.

Mr. MICHAUD: Moral—don't nod.

Mr. MacINNIS: A great many things have to be taken into consideration in regard to this matter. If by high protection at some particular time we develop a certain industry, we should not at one stroke take that protection away—I am not suggesting that that has been done—and leave the workers concerned without employment, until we do something else for them. That is my first point.

Mr. MARTIN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think that is the first thing we should take into consideration.

An hon. MEMBER: Make wheat farmers of them.

Mr. MacINNIS: We should try to take a reasonable view of economic conditions in the dominion. Possibly neither the farmers nor those of us who happen to represent industrial centres have all the right on our side. If we are to have a balanced economy, an economy in which the products of the countryside are exchanged for the products of the towns and cities we must of necessity industrialize parts of the country. Farmers cannot sell their surplus milk, butter and eggs to other farmers, because those other farmers are producing for themselves; they must dispose of those products in industrial centres. In the same way, industrialists must find in the agricultural districts a market for most of the things they produce. No one will insist that we can have complete free trade, or that we can have a tariff so high as to keep everything out of the country. We must have reasonable trading relations with other countries.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the item of automobiles, and not discuss the whole tariff question.

Mr. HEAPS: I protest. The hon. member is confining himself to the item under discussion.

Mr. MacINNIS: I will try to do that as far as I can. I do not think you can talk about automobile tariffs or the automobile industry without relating it to the general conditions within the country.

I have had some correspondence with representatives of employees in the automobile industry. I have a copy of a letter which was forwarded to me by the regional director of the United Automobile Workers. I should like to read it. It is addressed to C. H. Millard, in Toronto, and it is signed by Leo Grondin, chairman of Packard Shop Committee, Windsor, Ontario. It reads as follows:—

Mr. WALSH: Is that the original letter?

Mr. MacINNIS: It is a copy which Mr. Millard sent to me of Grondin's letter to him.

Mr. WALSH: There is no guarantee that the copy is an exact copy, is there?

Mr. MacINNIS: No, I cannot give any guarantee that the copy is an exact copy.

Mr. WALSH: Does the hon. member think that under the circumstances it should be read?

Mr. MacINNIS: It should or it should not?

Mr. WALSH: I think it should not be read unless the hon. member can guarantee the contents.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have been in this house for a number of years and I have never yet heard a member asked for a guarantee of anything he has read, and I know a good many who could not give any guarantees for what they have said. The letter is as follows:

Following is a report of the situation now existing in Packard Motor Company of Windsor.

The facts proving the critical situation brought about by the change in the tariff are as follows:

When a change in the Canadian content, from 50 to 40, was brought about in the latter part of 1938, the Packard Company of Canada were affected to the extent that the manufacturers decided to manufacture in Canada two jobs that had previously been imported, namely, the Super-eight and the convertible coupe.

Immediately after the announcement of the change in Canadian content, stock for these two jobs were brought into the Canadian plant in preparation for immediate production, but when the announcement of the excise tax being taken off, appeared in the papers, this stock was sent back to the American plant, and it was announced that these jobs would not be built in Canada.

Previous to the excise tax being taken off of imported automobiles, the company was seriously thinking of building or buying a larger plant, in order to increase production from 6 to possibly 30 or 40 jobs per day, which would include the new light-six which the company is putting on the market some time in July.

Now in addition to the super-eight and the convertible, they have also discontinued production of their model 120. Production on the 115, the only job now being built in Canada, will cease within the next ten days. The plans of the company after that date are rather indefinite. Rumour has it, that the plant will then close until possibly July 15, when there is a possibility that the company may start producing the new light-six. This is not definitely decided on as yet.

At six jobs per day the company employs approximately 80 men. If the increase in production had gone through, you can see what a difference it would have made in the economic situation of the border cities.

All cars discontinued in Canada are now being imported at the rate of about 20 or 25 per week.

The Packard organization have justly earned over a period of 30 years, a reputation of fair and decent treatment of their employees. Losing this company from the Canadian industry is not only an ecoonmic blow, but we will also lose an example of an amicable relationship between employer and employee that other manufacturers could well follow, with beneficial results to the industry, the employees, and the community at large.

I am not suggesting that everything stated in this letter is correct, but it is the point of view of some of the workers in that industry. I do not know what the government should do in the matter, but I think it would be advisable to find out just what the conditions are, and if anything can be done to make things a little better for the men employed in that industry without placing the burden on others who are no better able to bear it, it should be done.

I have in my hand a summary prepared by the tariff board on reference No. 91, dated, I believe, in 1936. In the board's report of which this is a summary they make a number of recommendations and also a number of statements in regard to the automobile industry. I quote paragraph 2:

(2) In section A of chapter VIII of this report the board has listed certain factors that might have to be weighed before arriving at an appraisal of the economic "value" of the automobile industry in Canada. The figures given therein would indicate that the increase in the total amount paid by dealers in Canada for automobiles and trucks and replacement parts thereof, in 1934, to the Canadian automobile industry, in excess of the amount that they would have paid if automobiles were permitted free entry into Canada, not including freight or licences, is approximately $14,000,000. As against this amount the board has also listed, in that section of the report, the disbursements that were made in 1934 in Canada for taxes—federal, provincial and municipal—for freight to transportation systems, for wages and salaries and for expense materials and services, which are directly attributable to the existence of the automobile industry in Canada.

These disbursements were from $40,000,000 to $47,000,000.

That is considerably above the $14,000,000 mentioned above.

The board, while not accepting the above comparisons as an accurate measure of the "value" of the industry to Canada, is of the opinion nevertheless that the figure would indicate that it is "good business" for Canada reasonably to encourage the maintenance and the expansion of the Canadian automotive industry.

Further on in this summary I find another paragraph which I should like to bring to the attention of the government. Paragraph 24 reads:

In section C of chapter VIII of this report, the board indicated that the selling price in Canada of copper and lead of Canadian origin, sold to automobile and automotive parts manufacturers, is substantially higher than the price at which these same metals are being sold for export by the Canadian producers.

In the reports on references 23, 25 and 40, the board drew the attention of his majesty's government in Canada to this situation, and the board is still of the opinion that the price structure in Canada indicates clearly that the Canadian producers are taking advantage of duties imposed under the customs tariff act to increase the price of such goods to the Canadian consumer.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

In view of that I submit that it is not enough for the government either to raise or to lower the tariff. It must take more control over the tariff and of industry itself and insist that when concessions are made to any industry those concessions shall be passed on to the consumers of Canada and to the employees. So that there is a great deal more to this question than we can settle in a debate in this house. I do not think that we are quite fitted for that sort of thing, although I am convinced that this is the proper place in which to bring these matters to the attention of the government. In my opinion the government should take this question into consideration, and see, as always must be done if good government is intended, that all sections of the community are given equal protection. And when I say protection I do not mean an increase in the tariff.

Mr. MARTIN: The committee will pardon me for again taking part in this debate, but hon. members will appreciate that this problem is one of immediate concern to me, representing a constituency in which the automobile industry predominates. While it concerns many other members of the house, I feel, in view of the inevitable absence of some of them, I may be permitted again to make a few observations.

I must observe in the first place that when the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) pontificates I usually enjoy it. However, when he pontificates to the extent of conveying the impression that he is making a complete and adequate statement, I not only resent it but I think it calls for an answer. I am accused of having dared to confer with the Minister of National Revenue with respect to a problem which vitally concerns not only those who have a definite financial interest in the automobile industry, but also, and more particularly, the thousands of men and women whose very livelihood depends upon the continuance in Canada of that industry. These latter are my primary concern.

The member for Huron North constantly purports to speak in the name of the consumer. Let me tell him in no uncertain terms that he is not the only one who speaks in the name of the consumer. The working man is as much a consumer as any of the constituents of the hon. member for Huron North, and if it is a crime for me to have conferred with the minister and to have brought to his attention this important question, then I am guilty of a crime and I do not believe that in doing so I was doing anything that was contrary to the spirit of parliament. In the conferences which the hon.

member for Huron North has had since he was a member of parliament, not only conferences conducted on behalf of his constituents but other conferences never disclosed in full, he too, then, was guilty of a crime. Does he mean to say that all the time he appeared before the tariff board he was doing something that was contrary to the spirit of the parliamentary method? Of course, we see the absurdity of the remark and why it was made.

Mr. DEACHMAN: On a point of order, surely it is not wrong or contrary to the spirit of democracy that I should have taken the place that a lawyer might take in a court of law. I did not make the law. The law was there, and I appeared.

Mr. MARTIN: That was not a point of order, but I allowed the hon. gentleman to go on. I pointed out inadequately last night, and I must point out more adequately to-day, that this is not a matter that concerns simply the automobile industry. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) has properly put his finger on the whole issue, and I congratulate him. It is a problem that concerns not only the automobile industry but a great many cities in Canada. It concerns my own city of Windsor in the province of Ontario. It concerns the riding from which the Minister of Labour comes; it concerns the riding from which the whip of this party comes; it concerns the cities of Toronto, Brantford, Woodstock, Oshawa, Whitby, Montreal, Quebec, Sherbrooke, Regina, Winnipeg, Vancouver, and many others that I could name. It affects thousands of working men directly employed in the automobile industry and in subsidiary and kindred industries. If this industry were seriously affected—

Mr. HOMUTH: Why don't you say something for other industries?

Mr. MARTIN: Give me time and I will express myself about other industries.

Mr. DUNNING: Not on this item.

Mr. MARTIN: Not on this item, no. To show the importance of this industry, if anything happened that would seriously prejudice its operations, it would put out of work not only thousands of men in my own city but 400 men in Sarnia, and so in every city and town I have mentioned, besides others that I have not. The interdependence of secondary industry generally and the automobile industry is very extensive; it is more extensive than in any other primary or secondary industry.

These are days when we are not only concerned about international affairs but are trying to give our people an opportunity to make a living. I say this, I hope not too emotionally, and I trust that every hon. member will consider me sincere when I make the statement that the automobile industry has helped to build my own city and it has helped to build communities around that city and in other parts of Canada.

Mr. LANDERYOU: At the expense of the west.

Mr. MARTIN: A member of the Social Credit party says, at the expense of the west. Well, I thought I had covered that last night. I am speaking now as vigorously and as sincerely as I can for humble men and women by the thousands who find themselves constantly faced with the spectre of insecurity, unemployment and insufficient means of livelihood. That is why I am primarily interested in bringing this question for the second time before the committee. As the hon. member for Vancouver East has said, this whole question in our day has to be considered differently from the way it was considered fifteen years ago; I fully agree with that. The task of government—of this government—is to afford protection to those who have large financial interest in industry, and at the same time to balance that as far as possible with some guarantee of security for those employed in industry.

Mr. MacNICOL: As the Bennett government did.

Mr. MARTIN: I am prepared to agree that if a concession of any sort is to be made to secondary industry, secondary industry itself must be prepared to make some sacrifice in taking greater care of its employees. Surely the tariff board is the logical body to consider this matter. As I said last night, after my election I attended the hearings of the tariff board for two and a half months and listened to a detailed inquiry about a matter on which one cannot speak dogmatically unless one has given extensive study to it. Hon. members who have spoken against this particular proposal have done so sincerely, I know; but I venture to suggest that none of them has taken the pains to go into the figures and to consider all the economic aspects of the problem as the tariff board has done.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the hon. member tell me exactly what the three per cent really means to the automobile industry?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, I shall come to that; I am grateful for that question.

I assume this government believes in the principle of allowing the tariff board to serve as a research medium for advising the government on these important matters. I hope I am not overstating the case when I say that in the first budget brought down in the present parliament the Minister of Finance acted upon the recommendations of the tariff board. Thereby he gave assurance to secondary industry generally, not only to the stockholders but particularly to the workers as well, that we intend to act only after careful examination of all the facts.

Mr. MacNICOL: But they are acting without it in this matter.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member for Vancouver East referred to the tariff board report. I venture to suggest that the tariff board—and I say this without knowing their view, except that I have examined the same circumstances as they have—will regard as a serious matter to this industry any curtailment of the present level of protection, not alone because they want to protect that particular industry but because they realize the dislocation that will come to our whole economic life.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Better join the Conservatives.

Mr. MacNICOL: He is talking Conservative doctrine.

Mr. MARTIN: I believe the people of this country are sick and tired of the conflict between political parties over meaningless things like tariffs. There are more fundamental issues than tariffs.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Now the hon. member is talking!

Mr. MARTIN: Anyone looking at the economy of this country and of the world to-day knows very well that a system of protection within measure for the purpose of protecting industry is indispensable. And the people will soon grow tired of politicians—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would ask the hon. member to confine himself to the item before the committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Let him finish.

Mr. MARTIN: This is an important matter to the area from which I come. There have been no threats as suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps). The mayor of my own city sits in the gallery to-day; he is here just as the Postmaster General (Mr. McLarty) and the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Clark) are here, and others all vitally concerned in this problem, from the point of view particularly of men whose livelihood depends on the course this parliament takes.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Postmaster General has not said a word yet.

Mr. MARTIN: He is able to answer for himself. I am happy to think that his knowledge will not be lost to us. There have been no threats, I assure hon. members. The fact is that one company is now about to leave. I hope no hon. member will ask that company's name; I do not want to advertise my city to its disadvantage. Three companies have left. That is the situation.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the hon. member give the names?

Mr. MARTIN: I asked hon. members not to ask for them, for the reason I mentioned.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): If these three companies have already left, it is no secret, and I think the hon. member should give the information.

Mr. MARTIN: Well, I do not intend to give it. I hope the hon. member is prepared to accept my statement.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend might state when they left.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, that is a proper question.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the hon. member say how many people were involved?

Mr. MARTIN: The working population affected was not as great as in the case of the so-called big three.

Mr. YOUNG: How much business did they do in Canada?

Mr. MARTIN: They did enough business to employ several hundred men in one case, ninety in another and five hundred in another.

Mr. MacNICOL: And they were going to increase the size of their plant.

Mr. DUNNING: When did they leave?

Mr. MARTIN: The questions are coming so fast that I cannot answer them all.

Mr. DUNNING: The question when they left is very important.

Mr. MARTIN: One of them left a few months after 1935-36. One of them left while my hon. friends opposite were in power. Another left about a year and a half ago.

Mr. HEAPS: Then it had nothing to do with this treaty.

Mr. YOUNG: Does my hon. friend suggest that this three per cent reduction in excise tax had anything to do with it?

Mr. MARTIN: It had everything to do with it. The fact is, and we might as well realize it, that a number of these companies of United States parentage would like to be able to make cars for the Canadian market outside of this country, and our job, I take it, looking at this question not from an emotional or sectional point of view, is to do all we can to see that they stay here.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the hon. member be good enough to say what he suggests might be done under item 438a to offset the damage to which he has referred?

Mr. MARTIN: That is a perfectly fair question, I answered it last night, but I will do so again. The treaty is a fait accompli; we cannot change that, but other measures to which I referred yesterday could be utilized,—

Mr. HOMUTH: Look out for Huron North (Mr. Deachman).

Mr. MARTIN: Well, I have to take that chance—to provide the compensation which is necessary. The Customs Act affords those opportunities. I do not suppose I need go into the various provisions concerned, but they are there. I hope that resorting to those measures will serve the necessary purpose.

In conclusion let me say—and I hope I shall not be accused of repetition, because I feel this keenly; it means everything, not to the stockholders, not to the presidents of these companies, but to humble men and women who have flocked from all parts of the country into the automobile manufacturing centres—let me say that this government would be remiss in its duty if it overlooked that circumstance. To do so would not only add to the insecurity and the economic plight of working men and women, but would seriously affect the economy of Canada. I have every faith that the government, alive to this problem, alive to the conditions in the Canadian economy at the moment, is not going to give in to sectional grumblings but is going to look at this problem in a large way, in the light in which the hon. member for Vancouver East presented it to-day. I do say the government should give this matter consideration, as I know it is doing, with the view of not only giving the industry the stability it requires in reference to its continuation but also of giving to the thousands of people engaged in this industry, if necessary through enabling legislation, a guarantee that in return for concessions given the protection and security of the workingmen may be safeguarded.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I am indeed disturbed because of the fact that conditions are as stated by the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Martin) in regard to the manufacture of automobiles. Why is it that the prosperity of one section of Canada must be secured at the expense of another? After all, these people should be engaged in meeting the needs and requirements of all Canada in regard to automobiles and motor vehicles of all kinds. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance just how many automobiles and other motor vehicles coming under item 438a have been purchased during each of the last five years in British Columbia, in Alberta, in Manitoba and in Saskatchewan?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not that information by provinces. I can give my hon. friend the whole Canadian consumption, of course, but I do not have it divided into provinces.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I will tell the minister why I asked for that information with regard to western Canada in particular.

Mr. DUNNING: I doubt if the statistics exist in that form.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I asked for the information in that form in order to impress upon the hon. member who just spoke the fact that I agree with him that the workers in the automobile plants of eastern Canada are consumers; but their power of consumption is limited by the amount of income they receive. I ask the hon. member and the committee this question: Just what do these workers in the industries he has mentioned purchase from western Canada? I cannot think of anything amounting to much that is produced in western Canada and purchased by the workers in these plants manufacturing automobiles. The agricultural production of the east is sufficient to meet their requirements; practically all our industries are in eastern Canada, and it is a well known fact that the west is suffering from the disequilibrium that exists as between the prices of manufactured goods produced in eastern Canada and the prices of primary products produced in western Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the hon. member give us credit for pegging the price of wheat?

Mr. DUNNING: I have here some figures which will at least partly meet the requirements of my hon. friend from Calgary. I have before me a statement of retail sales taken from the automobile statistics for Canada for 1937 as prepared by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. The answers will not precisely meet my hon. friend's questions, in that they deal with the total retail sales, which of course would include sales of imported automobiles as well as sales of Canadian made machines. Broadly speaking, however, I think if one said that in connection with these figures eighty per cent would represent Canadian production, he would not be very far out.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Do the figures include automobiles, trucks, tractors and so on?

Mr. DUNNING: These are the sales of new motor vehicles. I have not inquired as to whether trucks are classified as motor vehicles, but I am inclined to think all motor vehicles are included here. I will confirm that later. The figures are as follows:

Maritime provinces	$13,000,000
Quebec	31,000,000
Ontario	69,000,000
Manitoba and Saskatchewan	15,600,000
Alberta	9,000,000
British Columbia	11,500,000

That is an approximation of the retail value of sales of new vehicles.

Mr. SENN: For what year?

Mr. DUNNING: 1937.

Mr. BARBER: Would that include the cost of transportation?

Mr. DUNNING: The retail value, I presume, would include everything up to the time of the ultimate purchase.

Mr. LANDERYOU: On each of these purchases in western Canada we have to pay from $200 to $400 more than we would have to pay if there were no duty or tariff on these automobiles, trucks and so on.

Mr. ISNOR: You are no worse off than the maritimes.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I would not disagree with that; it may be equally true as far as the maritimes are concerned, but the point is that eastern Canada—that is Ontario and Quebec, where most of the industries are located—requires very little in the way of commodities from either western Canada or the maritimes. We always purchase at least three times as much from Ontario and Quebec as they purchase from us. I listened to the hon. member for Essex East pleading for support for the automobile industry. Why should I not plead for support from the workers of Ontario and Quebec in regard to coal and things of that nature?

Mr. MARTIN: Why not?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. LANDERYOU: That is the point.

Mr. MANION: We have a subsidy on coal now.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What is the result? We bring in $30,000,000 or $35,000,000 worth of coal from the United States.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must remind the hon. member that he should confine his remarks to this item, which deals with automobiles.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I am just making a comparison between the assistance given the manufacturers of automobiles and the assistance in connection with other commodities. There are very many men engaged in the manufacture and distribution of automobiles. They could spend many of the millions of dollars which they receive from western Canada back in western Canada, but what do they do with that money?

Mr. McCANN: Pay fifty per cent of it as a bonus on your wheat.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Oh, no. Year after year millions and millions of dollars have flowed into the east because of our tariff, and now, for the first time as far as I know, the government has bonused the farmers of western Canada. I suppose we will never hear the last of it.

Mr. MARTIN: The first time?

Mr. LANDERYOU: What I suggest to my hon. friend is that he should also recommend to the government that the purchasing power which flows into the hands of those who produce automobiles in eastern Canada should be expended to a larger degree on commodities produced in other sections of Canada. That was the point I wished to make. According to the figures given by the Minister of Finance the benefits derived by the automobile industry of eastern Canada, due to these tariffs, amount to many millions of dollars a year. If we had the figures for the last twenty or thirty years I believe in connection with that one industry alone the cost to western Canada would be shown to be many millions of dollars more than has ever been spent in subsidies on wheat.

Mr. HEAPS: I would still like to find out what the three per cent excise duty means as far as the industry is concerned.

Mr. YOUNG: It is a benefit.

Mr. HEAPS: As yet I have not heard what it means. I should like to understand this matter a little more clearly. If my understanding of the prices of cars is reasonably correct, a low priced car in the United States would sell for about $700 at the factory. Perhaps the Minister of National Revenue can elucidate that point. If the figure I have given is correct, the excise duty would be about $21 for such a car. On a car priced at about $800 or $900 it would be $27. I want to know whether $21 or $27 per car is really the difference between closing down a plant in this country and keeping it in existence. If the figures we have had up to now are to be believed, on a low priced car in this country the differential is about $200.

An hon. MEMBER: More than that.

Mr. HEAPS: I give the lower figure of $200. I want to know if $21 per car is going to mean the difference between keeping a plant open and closing it. Then, would the minister give us definite information with respect to wages in the Canadian and United States automobile industries?

Mr. MARTIN: So far as the annual income is concerned, not enough.

Mr. HEAPS: No, not the annual income; I am referring to the hourly rate of pay. In the United States, where they have a higher ratio of production and a greater mass production than we have in Canada, the unit cost of producing a car might be slightly lower than it is in Canada.

Mr. MARTIN: So the tariff board found.

Mr. HEAPS: The extent of that lower cost in the United States, I cannot say, because I have not gone into the question to the extent to which the hon. member for Essex East and other hon. members have inquired into it. But if my information is correct, that the hourly pay of men employed in the automobile industry in Canada is lower than that in the United States, then the lower rate of wages paid in Canada should more than offset any advantage the United States manufacturer has in the way of greater mass production. I do not know whether those figures are available, but if they are I should like the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Revenue to give them to the committee.

Mr. PERLEY: This is a very important item, and I have found it interesting to listen to the arguments which have been made. One of the matters with which we in western Canada are concerned is the spread between the prices of United States and Canadian cars. The figures put on record this afternoon by the hon. member for Saskatoon are startling, and surely give food for thought. The farmer wants fair protection, and we realize that labour wants protection. Everyone appreciates the value of labour employed in the east so far as a market for western Canada's products is concerned. The important point for the government to consider is how the tax or tariff applies. We want cheaper cars. To my mind the Canadian car is good enough for any Canadian but the government should see to it that under the tariff the industry should not be allowed to exploit the Canadian consumer or purchaser of cars. That is an important point which I believe the government should consider. I agree with much that has been said this afternoon in some parts of the house. However the item will no doubt pass as it now appears, and I shall not detain the committee further.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The item under discussion is not a tariff item; it is simply a matter of the remission of taxation. I am amazed to find so many hon. members urging that the tax be kept on at the rate which has been in effect for some years past. Parliament used to be called and is still called to grant supply to the crown. But only on extremely rare occasions has parliament insisted that the crown should take from its people more than the crown had asked for. That is what several hon. members have been doing to-day.

The plea is made that this is done on behalf of workers employed in the industry. There is something in the plea that the tax should be retained in order to maintain employment, and if that contention could be fully established there might be some excuse for acting on the suggestion—although I notice nothing is said about the consumer, who has to pay the tax, by hon. members who make the plea on behalf of the workers in the industry. The consumers who buy cars and who have been paying this tax are not from one section of Canada alone; they are from every section from coast to coast—every city and every town. I venture to say no news would be more welcome to the residents of the county of Essex and other parts of industrial Ontario than the announcement that cars were now to be manufactured and sold at prices commensurate with those in effect across the boundary line.

Reference has been made to the reduction in the tariff on automobiles made effective in 1926. The people in the industrial area referred to benefited most from the reduction, because they were in a better position to purchase cars than those in lesser paid industries. There is some merit perhaps in the claim for consideration on behalf of the workers, but when I find the sponsor of the automobile industry and one who opposes the remission of this tax saying that even in normal times, and assuming this period of economic crisis had passed, unemployment in the automotive industry is to a great extent inevitable, I say that the value is taken out of the argument so far as employment is concerned. If my memory is correct—and I am speaking from memory alone—I heard another opponent of the tax remission say yesterday that employment conditions in the automobile industry are terrible. If that is so, after this industry has advanced so greatly, after it has paid so much in dividends and extensions—if employment conditions in that industry are so terrible that the people of Canada generally must continue to contribute this three and a half per cent by way of a levy which was imposed in the guise of an excise tax, then it is high time to reconsider our whole attitude towards this industry.

I do not know whether these claims are correct, but I believe the leading Canadian motor car manufacturing company would not leave this country, no matter what we did in the way of taxation or tariff adjustment. Because we have it on the very best authority in the world, the authority of the man whose name is attached to the industry and whose brains and genius have built it up, that cars could be and have been manufactured in Canada more efficiently than in the United States. That was the condition at the time he made that statement. When a factory gets beyond a certain size it becomes more expensive to operate. Then, there is the further reason: Labour in Canada was slightly more dependable and capable than it was across the river in that big city in which the bulk of his manufacturing plant is located. I am satisfied that company would stay, regardless of what we did, and that fully as many men would be employed in the automobile industry in Canada, even if one or two companies did leave the country. I say that because those who remained would pick up the business.

Everyone who has studied the matter is aware that one of the troubles in the automobile industry is seasonal unemployment. The industry is trying to get away from it. At times they have been working double and even treble shifts. By lengthening out the manufacturing year, by trying to continue employment over a longer part of the year than previously, they are now improving employment conditions. I have been advised and I believe that by building additions to their plants in the way of storage facilities, and by bringing out their models earlier in the fall, at least some of the larger companies are trying to meet the unemployment problem. But if the lowest paid man in this industry in Canada is receiving seventy-five cents an hour, no matter what work he does, and those employed by the month earn approximately as much, then, having regard to the earnings of the purchasers of the automobile produced, the workers are not suffering from low wages. It is true that they do suffer from broken time—but the purchasers of those cars, too, are suffering from broken time.

Mr. HEAPS: How could they purchase cars if they are suffering from broken time?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): How does anyone purchase a car? Does the hon. member mean to tell me that the average automobile purchaser in Canada, the working men and women who have cars, have no broken time? Surely he does not want to tell me either, that they earn more than seventy-five cents an hour on an average.

Mr. HEAPS: The average workman cannot afford to buy a car.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The average worker of any kind perhaps cannot afford to buy a car, but if a man earning seventy-five cents an hour cannot afford to buy a car, how can the average farmer or fisherman or lumber worker or city or rural labourer, whether skilled or unskilled, afford to buy one?

Mr. HEAPS: They cannot.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What we should be doing in this house is by every means in our power, to bring about conditions which would permit of cars being sold at such a price that everybody who wishes to buy a car shall be able to do so, if he is willing to give labour and service in return therefor. And this is one step towards that end which I think my hon. friend from Winnipeg North should welcome, so as to enable the people in his constituency to get cars if they can afford to buy them and run them. Much has been done along this line, and everybody appreciates the action of the government in reducing the import charges on this article. More should be done, but this is a step in the right direction. A reduction which in effect amounts to from 3½ to 4 per cent should certainly be welcomed, and not be objected to as some hon. members are objecting.

Mr. STEVENS: May I ask the minister one or two questions relating directly to this item? In figuring the value for duty of a car, is not the list price of the car taken and a certain discount or allowance made, and if so, what is the present discount allowed?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am afraid I cannot give the present discount for each make of car. But the customs authorities have to ascertain the fair home market value of the car, which is the price at which the factory sells the car in the United States. Systems of sale vary. I am informed that the Ford company, for instance, in the United States, sells cars direct to dealers, and therefore the value for duty of a Ford car when imported, if such a thing should take place—it does not as a matter of fact—would be the price to the dealer in the United States. That would not be the list price, but the list price less between 20 and 25 per cent. With another company which exports quite a number of cars to this country, sales do not take place to dealers in the United States but to distributors, who in turn distribute them among the dealers. There the discount is higher than the ordinary dealer discount. It would vary with the type of car, but perhaps might run somewhere between 25 and 30 per cent. In the case of importation of that make of car by a distributor, the value for duty would be the price charged the distributor in the United States. Other companies have methods of distribution which are not as simple as the two I have mentioned. There are companies which sell cars to distributors at a dealer price and give a further discount, called an over-riding discount, at the end of the season on the cars that have been sold, but they do not allow that discount on cars unsold. In that case we say that the value for duty for an importer here must correspond to the price paid by a similar purchaser in the country of origin. These are the general principles upon which the value for duty purposes is determined.

Mr. STEVENS: I know it is very complicated, and the minister has given an excellent exposition of the different rates of discount, but may I ask this further question: Have these rates of discount remained fixed, shall I say, over a number of years?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think they vary from time to time, but there has not been much change in the situation.

Mr. STEVENS: I was speaking of the principle. The principle has not changed as far as the Canadian customs is concerned?

Mr. ILSLEY: It has not changed at all on cars.

Mr. STEVENS: One other question, and I imagine this would be for the Minister of Finance. Under the treaty we bind certain rates. Do we also undertake not to change the method of computing the duty paid value as just described by the Minister of National Revenue?

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps I should read the article of the agreement which has a bearing on that question. We do not undertake to abandon our own sovereignty in any way, and my hon. friend would not intend to imply that. Article XI of the treaty I think answers his question. It reads:

> In respect of articles the growth, produce or manufacture of the United States of America enumerated and described in schedule I, imported into Canada, and of articles the growth, produce or manufacture of Canada enumerated and described in schedule II, imported into the United States of America, on which ad valorem rates of duty, or duties based upon or regulated in any manner by value, are or may be assessed, the general principles on which dutiable value is determined in each of the importing countries on the day of the signature of this agreement shall not be altered so as to impair the value of any of the concessions provided for in this agreement.

My hon. friend knows how difficult it is to tie down the application of a general principle to a new condition which sometimes comes about, but we are not expecting any difficulty in that regard.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister say that the article which he has just read would preclude the Canadian government from making any variation or adjustment of the rates of discount in order to meet lower rates of duty?

Mr. DUNNING: Obviously not for that purpose. But in connection with the application of the general principle which has been in effect in Canada, the Minister of National Revenue, of course, has the duty imposed upon him under the statute of applying that principle, and applying it fairly to each particular case. As to whether there might be any change in that regard I could not say at all. Quite frankly in connection with the whole question of discounts there is a very great deal of difficulty, and there is of course this to be said, that in connection with many sections of our customs laws, as my hon. friend knows, parties who may consider themselves aggrieved have the right of appeal to the tariff board against the minister's decision. That again enters into the question, as covered by article XI, of the general application of the principles of customs administration.

Mr. STEVENS: Then I take it that the government feels that it is perfectly free to change the rates of discount if it so desires, right across the board, shall I say?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think the government is free to change the rates just for the sake of effecting a particular purpose desired by somebody who wants more protection, for example, but I think the government is not tied down to a particular interpretation of the act in the future if it is determined by competent authority that that interpretation is not in accordance with the law. When we agreed in the trade agreement not to vary the general principles of our customs administration, we did not agree to continue to do things demonstrated to be illegal. We agreed not to alter the structure of our act or in any way to change it. When I was speaking yesterday I said that representations had been made to the effect that in certain particulars we were acting illegally at the present time. Those representations, I said, were receiving consideration by the department. There must not be the slightest suspicion of making an alteration of an interpretation to fit a particular situation: it must be a bona fide correction of an illegal situation.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister is quite clear in his explanation, but would he just clarify this point? In what way, is it suggested, has the department been acting in an illegal manner?

Mr. ILSLEY: It has been submitted that in the case of one or more of the companies the department permitted discounts which did not appear on the invoices, I think in the country of origin—I am not just sure about that. But it has been argued that in one definite particular with regard to two importers we have violated the clear terms of the act.

Mr. STEVENS: Was that to the advantage of the importer?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: And to the detriment of the treasury?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: And now it is suggested that might be rectified?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Which would raise the rate of duty in that particular instance?

Mr. EULER: Not the rate.

Mr. ILSLEY: Raise the amount of the duty paid. That submission has been made on purely legal grounds, not on grounds of policy or anything else.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, that is "pure."

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. MANION: I was going to ask a little later a question which does not deal particularly with this item, but as this raises a general principle I can ask the question as well on this item as on any other. Perhaps I should have raised the point when the lumber item was being discussed, but the question is general rather than in reference to that particular item. We remember that a few months after the treaty of 1935 a lumber marking act was put into effect in the United States. I am not dealing particularly with that; later the provision was removed in accordance with this agreement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On the first of September last. It was in effect for only a few weeks.

Mr. DUNNING: The leader of the opposition is wrong in one particular. The act was in being, but it had not been enforced against Canada until the time my hon. friend mentions.

Mr. MANION: Well, it was in force against Canada for a few months.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): One month.

Mr. MANION: It is not with that I wish to deal particularly. I wish to ask just this question. Since the United States government at that time put into effect a lumber marking act, which was effective against Canada and was said to damage very much exports of Canadian lumber to the United States, is there anything in this agreement which will prevent the United States government from applying the same principle against automobiles, if you like? That is why I feel I can ask the question on this item. Is there anything to prevent them from carrying out the same idea in some other way against Canada? In other words, is there any understanding between the Canadian and the United States governments that in the future, in view of this agreement, there will be no possibility of the United States government circumventing the treaty by some such regulation as the lumber marking act?

Mr. DUNNING: To answer that specific question before I go on to make a few general remarks, which I have been trying to do, article IX specifies:

> Sawed lumber and timbers, telephone, trolley, electric-light, and telegraph poles of wood, and bundles of shingles, the growth, produce or manufacture of Canada, imported into the United States of America, shall not be required to be marked to indicate their origin in any case where the imported article is of the same class or kind as articles which were imported into the United States of America in substantial quantities during the five-year period immediately preceding January 1, 1937, and were not required during such period to be marked to indicate their origin.

That indicates that with respect to marking we are protected on those articles. I gather that my hon. friend intended also to ask the question in its general application.

Mr. MANION: That is exactly what I wanted.

Mr. DUNNING: In that connection I previously read article XI. I need not read the preamble. The effective part is:

. . . on which ad valorem rates of duty, or duties based upon or regulated in any manner by value, are or may be assessed, the general principles on which dutiable value is determined in each of the importing countries on the day of the signature of this agreement shall not be altered so as to impair the value of any of the concessions provided for in this agreement.

There is that general undertaking.

Mr. MANION: Yes, that is true. But I think the words were "dutiable value." After all, the lumber marking act was not a question of changing the dutiable value or anything of that sort. It was a regulation—

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. MANION: —altogether outside the customs tariff. Obviously, it was put into effect for the purpose of lessening importations of lumber from Canada. I should like to know if there is anything in this agreement whereby any other regulation, having perhaps nothing to do with the customs tariff but being akin to it, could be prevented from being put into force. I think my hon. friend understands my question.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, I understand that. Obviously, the matter was one of discussion frequently, and every effort was made to cover it with sufficient exactitude. I would call my hon. friend's attention to articles VI and VII. My officers point out that article VI relates to the United States and article VII relates to Canada. But each, of course, is designed to have the same effect. Perhaps I had better read the one relating to Canada, because it would answer the question more directly.

Articles the growth, produce or manufacture of Canada enumerated and described in schedule II annexed to this agreement shall, on their importation into the United States of America, be exempt from ordinary customs duties in excess of those set forth and provided for in the said schedule, subject to the conditions therein set out. The said articles shall also be exempt from all other duties, taxes, fees, charges, or exactions imposed on or in connection with importation, in excess of those imposed on the day of the signature of this agreement or required to be imposed thereafter under laws of the United States of America in force on the day of the signature of this agreement.

And so forth. Well, now, there is the other class of regulatory measures which might be considered to have a prohibitive effect.

Mr. MANION: Yes, and not covered by that; having to do, for instance, with public health.

Mr. DUNNING: Article X reads.

No prohibition, restriction or any form of quantitative regulation, whether or not operated in connection with an agency of centralized control, shall be imposed or maintained in Canada on the importation or sale of any article the growth, produce or manufacture of the United States of America enumerated and described in schedule I, or in the United States of America on the importation or sale of any article the growth, produce or manufacture of Canada enumerated and described in schedule II, except as otherwise expressly provided in the said schedules.

There are the exceptions with regard to quantitative regulations. There is a long detail there which I do not think would help. The important words are "prohibition," "quantitative regulation" and "restriction." The provision is pretty general in its terms, and of course applies equally to both countries.

Mr. MANION: Yes. The word "restriction" gets closer to the principle about which I have been trying to ask.

Mr. DUNNING: It does not cover marking.

Mr. MANION: At the same time I am afraid no clause that the Minister of Finance has read would cover the situation with regard to the marking act.

Mr. DUNNING: You had to have a separate section.

Mr. MANION: Is there any other section that might possibly cover such a regulation?

Mr. DUNNING: Both countries have marking acts and they are applied. But the difficulty, of course, was particularly great in connection with lumber and wood products, and it was for that reason that we secured exemption from any application or enforcement of the United States marking act during the life of the treaty. I have a few words which I should like to say—

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to interrupt the minister, but since we are dealing with that question I think we should dispose of it. I hope it would be considered a breach of the whole spirit of the agreement if such a regulation on any product of either country were put into effect as was the marking act on lumber. I consider that was a breach of the spirit of the 1935 agreement, and what I am trying to make clear in the discussion, although it is too late to put it into the agreement, is that it should be understood between the two countries that, without any reference whatever to the rate of duty or to valuation or anything of that sort, any departure from the regulations which would serve as a means whereby the United States could keep out our products would be regarded as a breach of the whole spirit of the agreement. That is what I should like to think is in the mind of the government, although apparently it is not in any provision distinctly set out.

Mr. DUNNING: We think we have covered everything that is known. My hon. friend is suggesting protection against something we do not now know of.

Mr. MANION: Such as the marking act as applied to lumber.

Mr. DUNNING: Article XV provides:

2. The government of each country will accord sympathetic consideration to, and when requested will afford adequate opportunity for consultation regarding, such representations as the other government may make with respect to the operation of customs laws and regulations, quantitative restrictions on imports or the administration thereof, the observance of customs formalities, and the application of sanitary laws and regulations for the protection of human, animal or plant health or life.

3. In the event that the government of either country makes representations to the government of the other country in respect of the application of any sanitary law or regulation for the protection of human, animal or plant health or life, and if there is disagreement with respect thereto, a committee of technical experts on which each government will be represented shall, on the request of either government, be established to consider the matter and to submit recommendations to the two governments.

The marking act, of course, is the one thing which, as a result of the immediately preceding experience, was prominent in our minds, and that is why it is specially dealt with. It must be remembered that the United States marking act applies to commodities from any country, and the United States treasury department ruled that it would have to apply to lumber. It was applied, and we immediately protested, as my hon. friend knows. Both countries are quite free to apply their marking acts, and if either of them deems any particular regulation of any kind to be against the spirit of the agreement it can invoke article XV.

[Mr. Manion.]

To come back to automobiles, the discussion has been quite nonpartisan—ninety-nine per cent so, I think. Members on all sides of the house have spoken, taking varied views.

Mr. MANION: Our party just listened.

Mr. DUNNING: No; we had one or two speeches the other day, and one to-day, from the Conservative party. That indicates that this question cuts directly across parties. It is one of those questions that are of greatest difficulty, inherent in the nature of this country itself. Every government has found difficulty with it, and I assume every government will for some time to come.

May I say at the outset that to answer specific questions, such as those asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps), would be difficult because he insists on asking about an automobile, whereas no one can answer a question with respect to an automobile unless he knows a number of other things—for instance, how many automobiles are produced in a particular year, in a particular plant. I mention that for this reason. If you had a Canadian tariff sufficiently high to enable the manufacturer of 1,000 automobiles a year to pay decent wages and a reasonably low interest on his investment, you would have a duty on a comparable car high enough to enable the so-called Big Three to make profits altogether out of reason. That is our difficulty. The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) told the committee quite properly that three small manufacturers had left Canada. He also told the committee that no one of these three left Canada in consequence of this treaty, because they were gone before the treaty was negotiated.

The annual production in Canada, which had been attained by at least two of the three concerns to which my hon. friend refers, could not possibly have enabled them to make money on their Canadian enterprise considered as a separate entity. One Ford car turned out in a plant would cost millions of dollars, but millions of Ford cars can be produced at a very few hundred dollars each. There is the nub of the problem so far as Canada is concerned.

I am under no apprehension whatever that either Ford, Chrysler or General Motors, who have made and are making between eighty and ninety per cent of the Canadian car production, will pull out of Canada, to use a common phrase. I go further and say I believe that those corporations, while they are controlled by foreign capital—

Mr. MARTIN: Two of them.

Mr. DUNNING: Two of them; the third, Ford, probably is controlled by Canadian capital.

Mr. MARTIN: No question of it.

Mr. DUNNING: But even those that are controlled by foreign capital have a sufficient sense of the value of their Canadian market, and their export markets from Canada, that they will not lightly take any arbitrary "pull-up stakes" attitude. I have reason to know that the attitude of these corporations in respect of public relations is such as to prohibit any such arbitrary action, for the best reason in the world, apart altogether from moral grounds, namely, that a great international corporation does not lightly give a slap in the face to a whole people. I believe that the three great producers of automobiles will carry on. But I say to this committee as sincerely as I can, that I can see no way of erecting a tariff structure which will be fair to Canadian consumers and at the same time will allow profitable operation of a company which is going to make only a thousand or two thousand cars a year. It just cannot be done. Economy to the consumer is brought about by the production in one plant of a great number of standardized units.

Having said that, may I say I found something to agree with in what everyone has said on this subject, and also something to disagree with. I would say to my hon. friend the member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young), one of my oldest friends in this house, that it is very easy to create misconceptions and misunderstandings by quoting such figures as he quoted respecting the original capitalization of the Ford plant in Canada and its dividend history down through the years.

Mr. GRAY: He did not bring it up to date.

Mr. DUNNING: Apart altogether from bringing it up to date. The factor which from my point of view requires to be stated is the one upon which has been erected the great bulk of our industrial development; that is the ploughing back into an industry of its earnings instead of distributing them in the form of cash dividends.

Mr. YOUNG: Does the Minister of Finance suggest even remotely that the figures I quoted are not entirely accurate?

Mr. DUNNING: Not for a moment, but I say that the mere statement of those figures is not an accurate representation of the situation, particularly when it is associated with the term "watered stock." There is such a thing as watered stock, but does anyone suggest that the ploughing back of earnings into industry for the creation of more capital goods which in turn produce more units of product is watered stock?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. YOUNG: I suggest that it is undue profit, made possible by a very high tariff.

Mr. DUNNING: As to that opinions may differ, as to the extent to which the building up of the great Ford enterprise has been on account of tariff protection and the extent to which it is a result of mechanical genius allied to mass production and mass selling methods. For my part I do not believe it would ever have been possible to produce cars as cheap as they are at the present time if Henry Ford had not ploughed back the profits into that institution and thus build up its capital structure and its physical equipment to the point they have reached to-day. Watered stock, to my mind, is stock which is issued without having any real physical value back of it. I distinguish clearly between watered stock and the practice on which some of our great industries have been built up of ploughing back legitimate earnings into further physical plant and productive equipment.

As far as this item is concerned, anyone listening to the discussions in this house, no matter in what year, must realize how difficult the question is of balancing as far as possible the interest of producers and consumers of this very important facility in Canada. The government have done the best they could, in the light of the information which they had, in the proposal which is now before the committee. That proposal is to bind the duty, that it shall not increase during the term of the agreement; and further, inasmuch as this is one of the items mentioned in the treaty, to undertake to propose to the Canadian House of Commons at a convenient opportunity after the passage of the treaty itself that the excise tax in connection with automobiles shall be repealed. The government gave to this matter grave and serious consideration. I have tried to express in a broad way the considerations which brought them to the decision which is now before the committee. I do not think I can add anything more. I believe that what are called the Big Three will continue to function in Canada to the fullest extent rendered possible by Canada's demand for motor cars and the opportunities for export from Canada, which are not by any means small. And I believe that the Canadian consumers will benefit.

On the questions addressed by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley), I am sure that no one knows better than the hon. member for Kootenay East, because of his long experience in government and particularly in connection with matters of trade and industry, how difficult it is to administer any customs law, particularly because everybody is interested in a purely selfish manner when dealing with that department. Everybody, whether importer on the one hand or producer in Canada on the other, is trying to invent some means whereby whatever is done shall be turned to their individual or corporate advantage. To state positively what could be done with respect to a particular theoretical condition is all but impossible, for every day new methods are invented to beat the customs. There is an old saying that the safe maker is never more than two jumps ahead of the burglar, and I think that is true with respect to the administration of the Department of National Revenue. Eternal vigilance is the price of safety as far as that department is concerned.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Can the minister tell us what the protection to the motor vehicle industries has cost western Canada, or Canada as a whole?

Mr. DUNNING: It is quite impossible.

Mr. LANDERYOU: That is a very important matter. I understand we ship a considerable number of automobiles to New Zealand; is that not right?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. LANDERYOU: We ship them under an agreement which allows them to send to Canada some of the goods that are produced in New Zealand, and what do we find? We ship automobiles to New Zealand at the expense of the sheep raising industry of western Canada. In exchange for those automobiles we brought into this country, wool, mutton, butter and other agricultural products at the expense of agriculture in Canada.

The minister says he cannot give us the effect of this protection on the various sections of Canada. Two or three years ago I purchased an automobile, and last year I purchased another. I live in western Canada, and I had to pay over $200 more in each case than I would have had to pay if there had been no protection. I ask myself where this $200 goes. Are we paying the workers in our factories more than is paid the workers in the factories of the United States? I find the answer is that we are not paying them more. This extra amount is going to increase the profits and reserves of these companies, and I protest against giving protection to these industries unless similar concessions are given the industries of western Canada. The situation might be different if, as the purchaser of an automobile in western Canada, I were sure that at least a fair proportion of the money I sent east would be used to purchase commodities produced in the west instead of similar commodities imported from the United States, particularly the coal that is purchased by those employed in the industry under discussion. It is true, as the leader of the opposition has said, that we have subsidized the shipment of coal—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Once again I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to automobiles.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I am trying to follow the money that we send east when we purchase automobiles or other motor vehicles. I have followed the money we send to the United States for the purchase of coal, and I suggest to the government that protection be given the coal industry of Canada. If you want to sell more automobiles in western Canada—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I am talking about automobiles.

The CHAIRMAN: No; the hon. member is discussing the question of coal, and in doing so he is out of order.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Then I will say this. The minister stated that by mass production the cost of automobiles could be brought down, and that it was difficult for a new company to start the manufacture of motor vehicles in Canada because of the mass production carried on in the United States. If you wish to increase the production and sale of automobiles in Canada the best way to do it is by increasing the purchasing power of those who may buy automobiles in this country; and I suggest that the best way to increase the purchasing power of the people of western Canada so that they may buy automobiles is to assure them of a market in eastern Canada for the coal that can be produced in the west. If more of this money that we send east for the purchase of automobiles, trucks and tractors were diverted back to the west, there would be more purchasing power in the west to help this industry.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue whether, when the excise duty is added to the cost of a car being imported into Canada, that duty is calculated on the price including the sales tax. If a car is valued at $1,000 on entering Canada, the sales tax has to be paid in addition to that. Is the excise duty added to the sales tax, or is it taken just on the cost of the car?

Mr. ILSLEY: On the duty paid value of the car, without sales tax.

Mr. ESLING: Take the case of a dealer who is called upon to fill an order at the end of the season. Rather than send east for a carload of automobiles he finds it to his advantage to order a car from across the line. Is there any justification for making that dealer pay the duty and sales tax on the freight? That is a matter which seems to be causing some controversy in the west.

Mr. ILSLEY: The duty would be reckoned on the value of the car at the point of shipment to Canada. So I assume that would include the freight from the factory in the eastern United States to the point of shipment to Canada.

Mr. PELLETIER: A few moments ago the Minister of Finance said he saw no objection to $10,000,000 in dividends being paid on an investment of $125,000. I wonder if he would clarify that statement.

Mr. DUNNING: No, Mr. Chairman; I never said any such thing, and my hon. friend well knows it.

Mr. YOUNG: I now have in my hand the letter which I received from the company to which I referred some time ago. The first question asked was with regard to the original investment in the company, and the answer was $125,000. The second question was as to the additional capital put into the company, not taken out of profits, and the answer was that there was none. Then I asked as to the dividends paid, and the answer contained the figures I have already placed upon Hansard. I should like to point out that in addition to the dividends which were paid, there must have been a tremendous amount of money turned back into the industry. I have not that figure here, but I want to make it quite clear that what I read were the dividends paid. In addition, there must have been a tremendous sum of money ploughed back into the industry. With regard to watered stock, I have in my hand the record from the Hansard office, and it was in connection with the textile industry that I made the remark concerning watered stock. If anyone wants to know anything about watered stock, he can find out from the textile industry.

Customs tariff—ex 446a. Metal shells and hinges, for use in manufacturing jewellery boxes and spectacle cases, not further finished than shaped: 12½ per cent.

Customs tariff—ex 446a. Tools of iron or steel, for use in machines, n.o.p., of a class or kind not made in Canada: 10 per cent.

Customs tariff—ex 446a. Welding rods or welding wires of rust, acid or heat resisting steel, whether or not flux-coated: 15 per cent.

Customs tariff—ex 446a. Locomotive beds or frames of steel, cast in one piece; tender frames of steel, cast in one piece; cast steel cradles for the rear ends of locomotive frames; cast steel truck frames and bolsters for engines, tenders and passenger coaches; platform castings for passenger coaches; all the foregoing, whether in the rough or semi-manufactured, for use on railway rolling stock: 7½ per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: In bringing in certain lines of tools, I understand that parts are made in Canada and other parts are imported. Under the item in reference to tools I suppose the whole tool will come in at the 10 per cent rate. I was wondering if, for duty purposes, when the tool is imported, the department could not separate the parts made in Canada from those not made in Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall take that suggestion into consideration. It is the point which was raised yesterday by the hon. member. I am expecting a communication from him setting out the particulars of the machine he was talking about yesterday.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I include this item, too?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; I wish the hon. member would.

Items agreed to.

Customs tariff—446c. Golf shafts of seamless steel, coated or not, but not chromium plated: 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—446g. Electric welding apparatus, not including motors: 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—447a. Sand cast rolls and chilled cast iron rolls, for use exclusively in rolling iron or steel, or in manufacturing paper: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—451. Buckles, clasps, eyelets, hooks and eyes, dome, snap or other fasteners of iron, steel, brass or other metal, coated or not, n.o.p. (not being jewellery): 27½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—454; ex 446a. Frames not more than ten inches in width, clasps and fasteners (not to include slide or hookless fasteners), when imported by manufacturers of purses, chatelaine bags or reticules for use exclusively in the manufacture of purses, chatelaine bags or reticules, in their own factories, under regulations prescribed by the minister; parts of the foregoing: 12½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—462. (i) Philosophical, photographic, mathematical and optical instruments, n.o.p.; speedometers, cyclometers and pedometers, n.o.p.: complete parts of all the foregoing: 17½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—462. (ii) Cameras and complete parts thereof, n.o.p.: 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—462b; ex 462. Cinematograph and motion picture cameras, 35 mm., for use by professional motion picture producers having studios in Canada equipped for motion picture production; parts of the foregoing: 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—466; ex 711; ex 756. Iron sand and iron or steel shot, not further manufactured than crushed or ground, and dry putty, for sawing, polishing, pressure blasting or tumbling purposes: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—471a. Pressed steel belt pulleys for power transmission, and finished or unfinished parts thereof, including interchangeable bushings: 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—476. Surgical and dental instruments of any material; surgical needles; X-ray apparatus; microscopes valued at not less than 50 dollars each, retail; complete parts of all the foregoing: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—500. Logs and round unmanufactured timber, handle, heading, stave and shingle bolts, n.o.p.; firewood, hop poles, fence posts and railway ties: free.

Mr. BROOKS: It seems to me that to import railway ties into Canada is like carrying coals to Newcastle. In my native province many operators are anxious to supply railway ties to the railway companies, and are producing many thousands of those ties. I have understood that both railway companies have been over-supplied for a number of years. What quantity of railway ties is imported from the United States, and are any exported from Canada to that country?

Mr. DUNNING: Importations vary. They run from $200,000 to $400,000 worth a year, from the United States. I notice that our exports to the United States vary, running from a value of $100,000 to $155,000 a year. I imagine it is probably a matter of location, in each case.

Mr. BROOKS: What is the duty against ties going into the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: To make my previous answer complete, I should say that fir ties to the value of $700,000 must be added to the item I gave, and would be included in the exports to the United States. Then, to answer the hon. member's question, may I say that they are free of duty both ways.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—502. Mexican saddle trees and stirrups of wood, tree nails; hub, last, wagon, oar and gun blocks, and all like blocks or sticks, rough hewn, or sawn only; felloes of hickory or oak, not further manufactured than rough sawn or bent to shape; staves of oak, sawn, split or cut, not further manufactured than listed or jointed; shingles of wood; spokes of hickory or oak, not further manufactured than rough turned, and not tenoned, mitred or sized, and scale board for cheese: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—503. Planks, boards, clapboards, laths, plain pickets and other timber or lumber of wood, not further manufactured than sawn or split, whether creosoted, vulcanized, or treated by any other preserving process, or not: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—504. Planks, boards and other lumber of wood, sawn, split or cut, and dressed on one side only, but not further manufactured: free.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister give the figures on importations under items 503, 504 and 505 for 1937 and 1938?

Mr. DUNNING: With respect to item 503, which deals with lumber and timber creosoted or not, I am afraid I shall have to give the information in one figure covering items 503, 504 and 505.

Mr. GREEN: Is no separate record kept with respect to dressed lumber?

Mr. DUNNING: I could give my hon. friend a list running from white ash, and going through every variety. These woods are itemized by variety, but not according to their respective tariff items. The total figure I shall now give includes lumber and timber, creosoted or not, under item 503; lumber dressed on one side only under item 540, and lumber dressed on one or both sides under item 505. Our imports under those items last year from the United States were valued at $4,300,000. Our total exports to the United States were valued at $14,178,000. Those are the figures, apart from Douglas fir.

Mr. SLAGHT: Have the exports from Ontario been separated in connection with this item?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not the figures separated by provinces.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—505. Sawn boards, planks and deals planed or dressed on one or both sides, when the edges thereof are jointed or tongued and grooved, n.o.p.: 10 per cent.

Mr. GREEN: That is the item on which the tariff has been cut in half?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has no separate figures under it?

Mr. DUNNING: I have no separate figures. I have the separate figures by varieties of lumber, but not by tariff items. They are lumped together in our statistics of imports.

Mr. STIRLING: What is the duty into the United States under item 505?

Mr. DUNNING: If under item 505 the lumber were fir, pine, spruce, hemlock, or larch, it would be fifty cents per thousand feet. Other varieties are free. Of course, as was stated last night when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) was dealing with schedule II, at the present time in both cases there is in addition the United States revenue tax of $1.50.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—505a. Hardwood flooring, tongued and/or grooved, or jointed, viz.: beech, birch, maple and oak: 17½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—506. Manufactures of wood, n.o.p.: 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 506. Shingles of cedar, creosoted, vulcanized or otherwise processed or treated: free.

Mr. GREEN: I notice that item 506 is in two parts; what are the importations under the second part dealing with creosoted shingles?

Mr. DUNNING: That is a new item created in the agreement, so that so far as the past is concerned it is not separately reported. It was part of another item.

Mr. GREEN: What was the total figure for the whole item before?

Mr. DUNNING: I wonder if the hon. member would permit us to proceed with the understanding that I shall have that information looked up. In view of the fact that it is a new item, I have not the information before me. However, I shall get it for him.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): I notice that in this item we reduced the duty from 25 per cent to 20 per cent, and that we are now reducing it from 20 per cent to free. The item deals with shingles of cedar, creosoted, vulcanized or otherwise processed or treated. I am not familiar with the term "vulcanized." It would seem to me that a considerable amount of labour is involved in these processes, and the drop in the rate from 20 per cent may mean a great deal. Would the minister give an explanation?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: The item to which my hon. friend refers is, of course, a very small factor compared with shingles generally. No class of importers in Canada is more pleased with the treaty than the shingle manufacturers, and I think they have every reason so to be.

It is represented to me that the particular type of creosoted and vulcanized shingle to which he refers quite often results from the export of Canadian shingles to the United States for this form of processing, after which they are reshipped to Canada; but that trade is quite small, and as a matter of fact this processing is commencing in Canada.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): That is just the point I wished to make, that we now ship our raw product to the United States.

Mr. DUNNING: Shingles is not a raw product.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Partly so in this case because the processing is done in the United States, and the shingles are then shipped back to Canada free. That is my point.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps the answer I can now give to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) may constitute an answer to the hon. member for Rosedale also. As I indicated a few moments ago, I cannot split the new item, but I can give the committee how much we imported under the old item, which comprised all shingles. For last year our imports amounted to $6,200 of all kinds of shingles, including these creosoted ones, and in the same year we exported to the United States $6,500,000 worth.

Mr. GREEN: I think that figure must be wrong because in the appendix to the United States press release it shows United States exports to Canada amounting to over $1,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: I think it must be mixed up with some other factors.

Mr. GREEN: The figure I mentioned is given on page 96 of the United States press release, under item 506.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, that is their omnibus item, including all manufactures of wood.

Mr. STEVENS: If the hon. member for Vancouver South will look at page 18, he will find that we exported shingles of wood to the United States to the amount of $5,567,000.

Mr. GREEN: I think the Minister of Finance is wrong. We imported quite a lot of shingles from the United States; I am sure more than $6,000 worth.

Mr. DUNNING: The United States figures are lumped together and cover two items.

Mr. GREEN: So does our item.

Mr. DUNNING: I want to be accurate. I have the figures under item 502; our total imports—and all of them came from the United States—of shingles of wood were $1,000 in 1936; $4,000 in 1937, and $6,200 in 1938. Those are the figures from our own bureau of statistics, and I am going to stand by the accuracy of our bureau.

Mr. GREEN: Would that include the creosoted shingles?

Mr. DUNNING: It includes all, because there was no division of the item until the division created by this agreement.

Mr. MARSHALL: Would the minister explain why the rate of duty under the new agreement on shingles from the United States is free, while the rate under the British preferential tariff is 17½ per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: Britain is a most favoured nation, and therefore any goods coming in under that item come in free from Britain.

Mr. GREEN: They do not make any shingles in Great Britain.

Mr. DUNNING: No, it is a theoretical item, but my hon. friend's question was quite a proper one. It is purely a paper item because shingles are not produced in Great Britain.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—507a. Single-ply, sliced or rotary-cut veneers of wood, n.o.p., not over five-sixteenths of an inch in thickness, not taped nor jointed: 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—507c. Plywood made of two or more layers of veneer or lumber of wood, glued or cemented together, but not further manufactured: 22½ per cent.

Mr. GREEN: What were the importations last year? This is one item on which it does seem Canada went a little far in making concessions.

Mr. DUNNING: The importations of plywood from the United States last year amounted to $124,000. Our exports are included with veneers; we exported $25,000 worth of veneers generally to the United States. Our big customer for that class of item is the United Kingdom with over $1,000,000 worth last year.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—509. Vulcanized fibre, kartavert, indurated fibre, and like material, and manufactures of, n.o.p.: 17½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—511b. Fishing rods: 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 518. Bagatelle and other game tables or boards: 27½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—519. House, office, cabinet or store furniture and parts thereof (not to include forgings, castings and stampings of metal, in the rough):
(i) Substantially of wood: 32½ per cent.
(ii) Other than of wood: 27½ per cent.

An hon. MEMBER: What were the imports of all woods from the United States last year, and our exports?

Mr. DUNNING: I must separate them. I will give furniture of wood first. From the United States last year we imported $819,000 worth of furniture of wood, and $471,000 worth of furniture of metal. Our total exports, distributed thinly over a number of countries, of which the United States took $30,000 worth, were furniture of wood, $205,000, and furniture of metal, $153,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do the figures the minister has just given include imports under the $100 exemption?

Mr. DUNNING: No, they do not.

Mr. MacNICOL: A great deal must come in that way too.

Item agreed to.

POST OFFICE ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROHIBIT THE SENDING THROUGH THE MAILS OF COMMUNISTIC LITERATURE

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilfrid Lacroix (Quebec-Montmorency) for the second reading of Bill No. 4, to amend the Post Office Act.

Mr. WILFRID GARIÉPY (Three Rivers): I rise to say a few words in support of this bill. It relates to liberty, and as we all know, abuse of liberty brings licence, and licence invites restraint. The spread of communism, as described by the mover of the bill, reveals an appalling situation. It is a menace to our civilization; it is a plague; it is the product of diseased minds; it is something destructive of the social order and our political and religious institutions; it conduces to revolution.

Communism is defined in the bill in a manner which is clearly understandable by any of the members of this house. Its effects are obvious. The other day the attorney general of Ontario announced, I am informed, that conditions are becoming so bad in this province that an investigation is to be started to discover the sources of this evil. I am told that in Toronto are at least forty so-called schools organized under this and that name, clubs of one kind and another, groups which behind closed doors receive instructions, all leading to the same object, always with the same results in view. The sponsors of these schools not only talk to these people but also have newspapers published in different languages, disseminating their doctrine, distilling it drop by drop and sending it throughout the country, preparing people's minds for the evil day. When it will come we do not know. But this represents a constant effort to destroy the present order and bring in a new order of things.

In my province the Duplessis government enacted a statute which has been adversely appreciated and much criticized outside our boundaries. I have studied the comments of the various newspapers in the province of Quebec, and I find that criticism is very light; approval is general, and after two years the effects of this law are good. It may be proper to mention that the premier of Quebec himself is possibly too much mentioned in connection with this law. It is true that he was the father of it; but it was unanimously adopted by the Quebec legislature; both parties supported it, and in that house there are members of different creeds and races. English, Scotch, Irish, Hebrews, all joined hands. Quebec is the only province which now has a second chamber. Its legislative council is composed of eighteen Liberals and six so-called Conservatives, or twenty-four in all. The twenty-four unanimously approved this law, notwithstanding their differences in politics, race and religion. So it is the law of the province; it represents the voice of our people. But the effect of this law is defeated when it comes to the press, because daily from Toronto there are pouring into the province of Quebec, and the rest of Canada for that matter, newspapers upholding the communist doctrine, threatening our institutions and everything which is dear to us.

What shall we do? It is evident that the postal regulations are not sufficient. They are not applied. This is not the fault of the minister or of his officials, possibly not the fault of the regulations, except that they do not go far enough. The law is not sufficiently clear. What was said by the mover of this bill warrants, to my mind, the conclusion that something should be done to give more powers under the law to the Postmaster General (Mr. McLarty). I do not want to discuss the legal opinion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). I bow to his wisdom. But statutes are always difficult to interpret. It is a privilege of lawyers to differ. Often judges do not agree. Courts are not always in agreement with each other. The Supreme Court of Canada and the privy council have often not seen eye to eye. I look at this regulation 205 of the Post Office Department, which states:

> It is forbidden to post for delivery or transmission by or through the post any obscene or immoral book, pamphlet . . . or other publication, matter or thing, of an indecent, immoral, seditious, disloyal or scurrilous character.

That is the regulation. That is as far as it goes. Does it cover the ordinary communist paper? The minister, as reported at page 1183 of Hansard said:

> In short, anything that is subversive, seditious, that advocates the use of force for the purpose of bringing about any change in the government of Canada, is already prohibited under the regulations of the Post Office Department.

Quite so. We do not need these regulations when force is advocated. That is an offence under the general law of the land, under the criminal code. But these newspapers of which I speak do not advocate force. If one takes any number by itself, its contents are not subversive of society. The papers give their poison drop by drop. It is a series of small events leading to a conclusion. It is the construction of a building. They build stone by stone, piece by piece. No one newspaper can be condemned under these regulations. The only part of the post office law under which something can be done in so far as mailable matter is concerned is section 7, paragraph (d), which reads:

> The Postmaster General may . . . make regulations declaring what shall and what shall not be deemed to be mailable matter for the purposes of this act.

"Mailable matter." This does not refer to the contents, to the ideas, to the writings themselves. It relates to the outside, because the section continues:

> . . . and for restricting within reasonable limits the weight and dimensions of letters and packets and other articles sent by post.

But the section does not stop there. Year after year, according to needs, changes have been made by means of additions, and we find, always under the same paragraph (d) of section 7, that the Postmaster General may prohibit the sending of matter of an obscene or immoral nature. That is one clause. It does not cover the case of a communist newspaper. The next is prohibitive of matter which would "tend to injuriously affect the commercial or social standing of the persons" to whom it is sent. That is another addition. If it is not expressed in explicit terms, no regulation of the postal department can cover this case. The third addition has to do with illegal lotteries; the fourth deals with devices for the purpose of obtaining money under false pretences. Those four points are included in order to give additional powers to the Postmaster General. It is clear to me that the law officer who prepared this bill, in making his notes, grasped the point, because he says:

> The purpose of this amendment is to enlarge the powers of the Postmaster General as to the making of regulations. At present, the Postmaster General may prohibit the sending of obscene or immoral publications. It is intended in this bill that he should also have the power to prohibit and prevent the sending of communistic literature.

That is the request, and I submit with all due respect that it should be granted. This is a necessary bill. It merely gives power to the Postmaster General to prohibit the sending of communistic literature. If, in the judgment of the Postmaster General or of the government, it is not necessary or judicious that there should be any regulation it need not be adopted. I say, however, that a move should be made in the direction proposed in this bill. Detection is out of the question. The bill will not entail any particular labour or expense. It merely creates an offence which in course of time may be detected.

These remarks are offered in good faith for the consideration of the house, and I trust that the bill will receive favourable consideration. We speak of national unity, we speak of the flag, we speak of our heritage, we resort to arms to defend our borders. Let us start to-day to defend the hearts and minds of our people. This communistic doctrine has no right to exist under the Canadian flag; it has no right to be protected by the institutions of our country.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I think the last speaker (Mr. Gariépy) has given us one of the strongest reasons why this bill should be defeated. He says that the law as it now stands helps to defeat the purpose of the padlock law of Quebec. I have again and again spoken in this house against that padlock act. I believe it is depriving the people of the province of Quebec of their freedom. I believe it is an invasion of the field which, under the British North America Act, has been left to this parliament, that is the field of criminal jurisdiction, and for that reason alone I would be bound to protest and to vote against the bill before the house.

To those who have been in this house for any length of time I do not need to say that I am not a communist. The group I represent have a philosophy that is somewhat different from that of either the Liberal or the Conservative party, but it certainly is not the philosophy of the communist party. At the same time I think it right that we in this country should preserve the liberties of every section of the people of Canada. If the communist party commit any overt act, of course the law should be invoked, and they should be punished. But if it is just a matter of opinion, then they have just as much right to their views as anyone else. That has been my understanding of British free speech. They should have perfect liberty to propagate their ideas so long as those ideas do not lead to subversive acts.

Surely we have gone far enough now in the history of modern communism to get away from the idea that everything done in the name of communism is necessarily wrong. Russia is a well-established country, and according to recent information Great Britain and France are likely to enter into some sort of defensive alliance with her. At any rate, you cannot sweep away a great population and an established order such as exists in Russia. They have accomplished a great deal in that great country. I do not like their authoritarian principles at all; in fact, I am inclined to think the later rulers of Russia have rather betrayed the idealistic principles advocated at the beginning of the revolution. I do not like bringing about reforms by physical revolution, but I am not dealing with that question to-night. I do say, however, that no one can lightly pass over the achievements of any one great nation.

But, further than that, we have the communist party of Canada, an existing institution, taking part in various types of activity. I do not like the communist party. They have given our Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party more trouble than any other party.

An hon. MEMBER: Almost as much as the Social Credit party.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, almost as much. I have been opposed by the communist party and so have my colleagues. We differ in our points of view. But I must recognize that we have several communist members in our city councils. In my own province of Manitoba there is a communist member of the provincial house. There is a newspaper that comes into this house—one is put in my mail box—called The Clarion. Very often I do not agree with what I find in it; but it comes in, and I do not think it can be said to be subversive in character. I understand that a representative of this communist paper has his place in our own press gallery.

So long as the communists confine themselves to advocating certain doctrines, but keeping within the law, I do not think we have any right to attempt to muzzle them. I frankly admit that from the purely political point of view I wish they were all back in Russia; it would be a great deal easier for us. But, as a matter of fact, a great many of them have not come from Russia; some are Canadian-born. They have adopted a particular philosophy; and, I repeat, so long as they keep within the law, they ought to have the full rights of citizenship.

There is one other point. Once we begin to adopt any authoritarian methods in Canada, we do not know where they will end. Already in the province of Quebec certain people in high authority have classed the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in the same group as the communists. These people have been quite misinformed; nevertheless it might readily mean that somebody might propose that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation should not rent halls in the province of Quebec, or should not circulate newspapers in the province of Quebec, or should not be permitted to do this, that or the other thing—in effect, was an illegal organization. What would be the outcome if we allowed arbitrary decisions of that kind?

It is much more in harmony with what most of us have been taught are the fundamentals of British liberty and the British constitution, if we allow people opportunities for free discussion. I for one believe that in the long run truth will win out. I believe that in the long run the doctrines of the communists will be shown to be false and ill founded, and that the truer doctrines, the better founded doctrines, will prevail.

It is an easy thing to get rid of a nuisance by shoving it to one side; it is an easy thing for the people of the province of Quebec to neglect the great social reforms, which neglect is really the basis of the communist agitation. If our social order is such that the people of Canada have opportunity for a decent living, they will not be appealed to by people who urge them to fight against that social order. I am a parliamentarian, because I believe that whatever reforms are necessary may be brought about by an intelligent electorate through constitutional means. If there is any attempt to stir up rebellion in this country, there are means by which that can be checked, but in the meantime I for one stand for full freedom of speech, and this house, if it is thoroughly British in its spirit, ought to stand for full freedom of speech.

Mr. J. S. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): As one who has come under the ban of the communist party I think I might well say a few words. The fish trap question which was before this house recently was one reason why the communists should inveigh against me. Soon after my election in Nanaimo riding the communists, having secured a place in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in British Columbia, made a determined effort to oust me from the party. Two of them declared on the night of my election that that was to be their purpose, and in a measure they achieved what they wanted. The manager of my campaign, who was a lady, Mrs. Mary E. James, took up the fight which she had started at the time of my election and was herself ousted by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation on Vancouver island, Nanaimo council. I have in my office right now a copy of a resolution which the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, Alberni-Nanaimo district council, recently passed, expunging all the material which had been stated against Mrs. Mary E. James at the time of her expulsion from the party, and exonerating her completely because of the machinations of the communist party. The man who sent the telegram to Toronto to have me removed from the floor of the convention there in 1936 is now secretary of the communist party on Vancouver island.

Therefore I know something about communists. But I warn hon. members to be British in this matter. Know the communists; learn about them, but under no circumstances fear them, because they have not the "intestinal fortitude" to interfere with the British system of justice. As long as you have parliamentarianism and the right to speak in this house and say those things which you honestly believe, you need not be afraid of communism.

Let me relate something by way of diversion and interest, which will drive the point well home. I went to England in 1937. In journeying round the country, making an effort to learn what the working man thought about conditions, I slept in sixty different beds in eighty-six days. So that was some travelling. And if I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that for bed and breakfast I paid all the way from two shillings to eighteen shillings, you will know that I took in a long line and a pretty thorough one. I found myself in London in the first week of September, and the thought struck me: This is Sunday in the first week of September, 1937; in 1907 on Sunday in the first week of September I was in London also, and following my usual custom I went down to see how the poor people lived. In 1907 I wended my way to Petticoat lane, Middlesex street, a short street off Whitechapel in the east end of London. If you can visualize a narrow street with dingy houses and costers' barrows extending all the way up on either side of the pavement you will get a fair idea of what was happening on this Sunday morning; these itinerant vendors were selling second-hand goods of every kind. Policemen went three together up the centre of the street, afraid to go singly along the sidewalks for fear they would be battered from the open doors. The street was filled with tattered and bedraggled individuals, and poverty was everywhere. It was a common saying that you would have your watch stolen from you in Whitechapel and you could buy it back from the top barrow after you had passed through Middlesex street. Everywhere you saw individuals slowly recovering from the effects of the debauch of the night before.

So, thinking I might get a real view of the change in social conditions in England in thirty years, I decided to do the same thing that Sunday in the first week of September, 1937. I went down to Middlesex street. The change amazed me. Young men and young women were well dressed and clean. The only dirty, tattered individual I saw was over fifty years of age. As I walked along the street they made a path for me. About one hundred yards up the street in a recess from the building line there was a cart, and on the cart a swarthy looking individual with shock, black hair yelling into a "mike." As I listened, the sound came imperfectly, because he did not know how to use a microphone properly, but he was talking communism. So I thought, now I will get a real slant on what is going on. The police officer on duty, the only one I could see, came down with his duty cuff on his arm and I accosted him. I said: "Officer, do you allow this kind of thing to go on?" Well, he looked down at me—he was a big fellow—and said, "I don't think he is creating any disturbance." "Well," I said, "don't the people here make any noise about this, do they not complain about the disturbance? This is Sunday morning and they ought to have some rest." "Oh," he said, "look at them, they have their windows open, they are all listening to it." "But, officer," I said, "do you know what he is saying?" Then, with a tolerant smile he turned to me and said, "Oh, yes, sir, he is preaching communism; but you know this is a free country, sir, we have free speech here." I was compelled to say, "Thank God for that." If we can do the same thing in Canada; if we can face every overt idea; if we can challenge every opinion, maintaining our own while giving every other man the right to maintain his as long as he remains within the laws of our country, Canada will progress. But if we apply the hand that stultifies the imagination and destroys free opinion and free voice, God help Canada.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had no particularly strong ambition to speak on this bill, but at the same time neither have I a very strong liking for communists. That in itself would not be sufficient to make me support the bill. I favour free speech and have always done so. I do not believe in the muzzling of people in so far as it is possible to avoid muzzling them. At the same time I cannot help remembering that the doctrine of the communists is revolutionary socialism. My hon. friends to my left are members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, of which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is the head. They are socialists, legal supporters of socialism. They believe in bringing about socialism by ballots, but the communists believe in bringing about socialism by bullets. That is their idea. Rather strangely, to me, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre admits that he supports the communists in the attitude he takes on this bill, but in my opinion the difference is that he believes in proper, evolutionary, parliamentary methods of bringing into effect the beliefs for which he stands. The communists do not believe in that. When they tell the truth, which they frequently do not, they admit that they believe in revolutionary socialism. They believe in forcing socialism upon the people of Canada and the rest of the world. That is the purpose of the third internationale. It has been said, and I think amply proved, that the third internationale has been supplying money to communists in almost every part of the world. One of the doctrines of the communist party, at any rate until quite recently, was world revolution.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I cannot work up any maudlin sentiment over the freedom of speech of a group of people who want to upset, by revolution, the parliamentary institutions of our country. Frankly, I cannot get very enthusiastic about it. I have nothing to say against Russia. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I think confuses Russia with communism. Russia is one thing; communism is another. So long as they confine communism to Russia, I have not a word to say against it, but when they endeavour to instil communistic doctrines into this country; when they try to bring about revolution in this country, as they have attempted to do, I say I am opposed to it. We had to face that group of trekkers from Vancouver, who got as far as Regina before we had to stop them. That was a group of revolutionaries if there ever was one; at least their leaders were. I do not say the men necessarily were communists, but certainly, according to all the evidence we obtained, they were led by a group of revolutionaries. What was their object? They were going to bring twenty thousand men to the city of Ottawa in order to intimidate the government. As to that we have the evidence of the mounted police, who had some of their men join that organization.

Why should we be so sympathetic towards a group like that? Further, why should we be so sympathetic towards people who do not believe in free speech themselves? If any of us were living in Russia to-day and attempted to meet as we are meeting to-night, not in parliament but in an assembly of any kind, and we dared have anything but the most fulsome praise to pour upon the rulers of Russia, what would we get? I do not think I need ask anyone in this house. We would be taken out by the Ogpu, stood up against a wall and shot. Then, why should we be so sympathetic or concerned about the free speech of people whose basic doctrine is the suppression of free speech? Not only are they against free speech; they are against religion of all kinds, Catholic as well as Protestant. What have they done in Russia? They have destroyed practically every religious edifice in the country with the exception of a few which they have turned into other kinds of temples. It is true that they are relenting somewhat now. They were also against family life at one time, although in this connection also they are relaxing a little at the present time.

After all, that is Russia again, and I do not wish to confuse Russia with communism. I am speaking not only as a citizen of this country but as an individual member of parliament, and I am not asking my supporters to follow me unless they wish to do so. Speaking as an individual member of this house, not as the leader of the Conservative party, I personally have no sympathy whatever for what, to my mind, is the rather maudlin sentiment that is growing up among people who are ordinarily good, decent Canadian citizens, that so much freedom of speech should be granted to a group who, if they had us in their own country, would not let us open our mouths. Frankly, I cannot get very greatly excited in their favour. The other day I was rather shocked, in reading the proceedings of the radio committee, to learn what Mr. Brockington, chairman of the radio commission, had stated to the committee in saying that he believed in free speech. He went on to explain what he meant by that and said that if he had his way he would allow the Liberal party to speak over the radio; he would allow the Conservative party to speak; he would allow the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation to speak—and I think he brought in the Social Credit party as well, or he might have—and then somebody, some hon. member opposite whose name I have forgotten, asked if he believed that the communists should have the same right, and he replied yes, that they should. On what grounds?

Mr. BOUCHARD: He said he was speaking personally. He did not compromise the radio commission.

Mr. MANION: Well, I do not know how he can differentiate between his position as a private citizen and his position as chairman of the radio commission.

An hon. MEMBER: How about yourself? You said you were speaking as an individual member.

Mr. MANION: All right; I cannot either, and I am willing to take the responsibility. I was simply saying that for the benefit of my followers, to assure them that they could vote as they wished. I did say I was speaking as an individual member of this house, but at the same time I cannot differentiate between myself as a private member and myself as the leader of this party, so I accept whatever responsibility attaches to the statement I made to-night, and Mr. Brockington must do likewise.

I am not particularly finding fault with him personally, but I do not believe the communist party in this country has any right to be put on the same basis as the other parties in this house. I think any of the parties having a real membership in this house should be entitled to the use of the radio, and when I say that I include the four parties represented here. I think Mr. Brockington was quite right to that extent; but when he brought in the communist party, which has no member in this house, I doubt if he had any right to suggest that they should have the same privileges over the radio as the Liberal party, which has 180 members here, or any of the other parties, which have not such a large number.

However, Mr. Speaker, the reason I rose is that I find it very difficult, in spite of my love for free speech, to do anything but support this bill. So far as I am concerned, if the bill goes to a vote I intend to vote for it. I heard one hon. gentleman mention Hyde park. I have been in Hyde park a good many times; I used to enjoy walking through the park and listening to the various speakers. But they do not always get complete freedom of speech even there. I have seen people arrested in Hyde park. There is a difference between liberty and licence, and if they go to licence they are arrested, even in Hyde park. Within the last year the daughter of a prominent member of the peerage of England—I wonder if any of the friends of the titled people of England could tell me the name—stood up in Hyde park and adopted a fascist attitude, and they mobbed her. So they do not always allow people to say what they like, even in Hyde park.

Mr. TURGEON: But that was not the authorities.

Mr. MANION: I am not more sympathetic towards fascism than I am towards communism. As a matter of fact, the authorities saved this girl from being completely manhandled; but at any rate that was the reaction of the English people, who are the greatest lovers of freedom in the world. Some of them became tired of her attitude, and they took charge of proceedings.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): And the authorities immediately stopped them.

Mr. MANION: The authorities stopped the people from beating her up; that is all. They hid her behind an iron fence so the people could not get at her; that was the way they stopped it.

The other evening the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) spoke in the house. I do not deny to him the perfect right to take whatever attitude he likes. But he said there is already in the law of Canada a clause against the sending round of seditious, disloyal or illegal literature. I believe those are the words.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Scurrilous.

Mr. MANION: While I do not think I should have brought in a bill of this sort, the bill being here, so far as I am concerned it will get my support, so far as I am able to give it, if the bill is allowed to come to a vote to-night.

Mr. WILLIAM HAYHURST (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, we have listened with a great deal of interest to what has been said. I come here to speak on behalf of this group, with the idea that we should offer freedom of thought and expression to all people. I was in Hyde park last summer and listened to some of the most violent attacks upon the Prime Minister of Great Britain that one would hear anywhere—much more violent than one would hear in Canada. It also happens that most of the people in my constituency come from Ukraine. Most of them are nationalists. As we know, even Russia to-day is not that vile hotbed of the third internationale as it has been presented here to-night. As a matter of fact, we may need their support in a few years time—and probably before that time.

I would be remiss in my duty if I did not say something about free speech. I should not like to be the Postmaster General (Mr. McLarty) who would have to censor publications and say what were communistic, what were fascist and what were not. Sometimes we have wondered what economic nationalism is, and we in this part of the house have been dubbed economic nationalists. We believe that truth can develop in a nation only as freedom of speech, freedom of utterance and writing, are allowed.

I sent to the library for the book Areopagitica, written a long time ago by Milton. It is one of the greatest classical works on freedom and those who love freedom. It happens that many of the things we think are false to-day are true to-morrow. Views change with respect to inventions. I read where a man in the south of England, when he first saw a steam engine, thought it was run by Satan himself. And so with all liberty; it does not matter whether it is liberty of thought along scientific lines, political lines, religious lines or economic lines—it does not matter what kind of liberty you may think about, it will be attacked. It may be that the very thing that is attacked and is unpopular at one time is in the next generation accepted as the truth.

Mr. MANION: Even to the extent of advocating revolution?

Mr. HAYHURST: The leader of the opposition likes to talk about revolution. Well, I do not believe there is going to be any revolution in Canada. The type of argument put forth by the leader of the opposition will cause revolution, because people are determined to have their say in affairs.

I guarantee I get more letters from communists than does any other hon. member in the house. I could show a hundred letters I received in the last three months, since I spoke in the debate on the address in reply, because my constituents thought I was a fascist. Well, if they think I am a fascist, what do hon. members think? Do they think I am a fascist?

Mr. MacNICOL: It is hard for us to say.

Mr. HAYHURST: From what hon. members have heard me say, do they think I am a fascist? Some communists think I am. I believe the communists should have their freedom of thought. They should be in a position to write to me and give me their expressions of opinion, without the Postmaster General looking into my letter box and saying, "Oh, this came from a communist organization, and therefore this man Hayhurst should not receive it"—and, of all places, in the House of Commons!

I had not expected to speak on this subject to-night, because I did not know it was coming up for consideration, but I happen to have in my hand an article about Russia reshaping her policy in Europe to-day. We hear about revolution as though there were going to be attacks by the man on the street, and the third internationale would spread its doctrines throughout the world. As a matter of fact, Russia is changing its policy to one of nationalism. I am the spokesman of the Ukrainian people, and they are nationalist in sentiment. When I advocate nationalism on behalf of the Ukrainians the communists immediately say, "You cannot get nationalism in the Ukraine, because that means taking Carpatho-Ukraine, Polish-Ukraine and part of Roumania, and adding it into a great Ukrainian state." But I say to my communist friends: "You are not to-day believing what Karl Marx preached." The doctrine preached by Karl Marx and written in London is entirely different from the type of communism practised in Russia. When Engels, getting his money in Manchester, was paying Karl Marx to write that type of literature, it was written in London under a free system of writing—a freedom condemned by the communists of that day. And we probably condemn communism to-day, but it is because the light of truth is coming upon it.

And so in Russia, when the people are taught in the language of education, liberty and understanding, their idea of communism changes. We believe that in Russia we shall have a great federalism—at least that is what I would think.

The communists and Ukrainian nationalists in my constituency will read what I say to-night. I am speaking spontaneously, and I hope they will be fair with me, because I should like to be fair with every section in my constituency. If I advocate a federalism in Russia it is only for the good of Russia, a federalism based upon Canadian federalism, the type of government where each group of people of each language has its own government. A great country like Russia could develop a type of democracy much like our own.

You cannot kill truth and reason; that is what Milton said. He who kills a man kills a reasonable creature; but he that destroys a good book kills not only a reasonable creature but kills reason itself. I quote from memory, and I may not have the exact words of Milton.

An hon. MEMBER: Almost.

Mr. HAYHURST: I will read from Areopagitica. This book was written in the seventeenth century. It is the foundation of liberty and free speech for all people of all religions. I have many Roman Catholic friends, and I admire them because I realize that their religion is a great truth, and that we must have religious truth and freedom. But this man was not a Catholic. I am not reading his views with the idea of showing that this is the Protestant spirit. We believe in tolerance to all people. It does not matter of what nationality you may be; so far as I am concerned, it does not matter whether a man was born in a manger or in a castle or in a cottage by the sea. Every person should be allowed liberty to think as he wishes and to develop his life to the best of his ability. You cannot have that if you are going to have a rigid censorship upon literature and any subject which introduces new thought, and which many people therefore would not be in a position to judge.

I shall read a few lines from Areopagitica which will strengthen the remarks which I have made in imperfect English. This is what the great master of English has said:

> Behold now this vast city, a city of refuge, the mansion-house of liberty, encompassed and surrounded with his protection; the shop of war hath not there more anvils and hammers waking, to fashion out the plates and instruments of armed Justice in defence of beleaguered Truth, than there be pens and heads there, sitting by their studious lamps, musing, searching, revolving new notions and ideas wherewith to present, as with their homage and their fealty, the approaching reformation: others as fast reading, trying all things, assenting to the force of reason and convincement. What could a man require more from a nation so pliant and so prone to seek after knowledge? What wants there to such a towardly and pregnant soil, but wise and faithful labourers, to make a knowing people, a nation of prophets, of sages, and of worthies?

I might have picked out a much better piece, but that is just one I took at random. We are trying to develop a nation of prophets, sages and worthies. I am proud of having been born in Great Britain and I realize what liberty and democracy mean. I must preach democracy to my people. I want my new Canadian friends, and they are my friends, to be good Canadian citizens and to understand what democracy is. If you pass legislation which takes away from one class or group of people their liberty, then they probably will be forced to use other weapons. That is what happened in Russia. Prior to the great war Russia was living under the iron heel of feudalism with all the great knowledge and truth that was abroad in the world. It took a bloody revolution to eliminate those in society above simply because they could not see any other way out. Would we wish to have a similar condition exist in this great Canadian democracy? No. Mr. Speaker, I probably should not talk out this measure and I shall sit down now. I do want the people to realize that I am speaking from my own sentiments, that I believe in making democracy work. To cure the ills of democracy, you must give more democracy, more truth and more knowledge to all our people.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I understand the meaning of this bill. If it is as I understand it is, I should be committing a breach of the law if I mailed to some of my preacher brothers certain of the literary works I now have in my possession. I have one book that defines communism and compares it with Christianity. I come from one of the most intelligent cities in the Dominion of Canada, and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) comes from a city alongside which is just about as intelligent. The councils of these two cities were asked if a communist could address the citizens. Port Arthur gave Mr. Tim Buck leave to do that, and the council of Fort William gave Mr. Gallagher, a fine Scotchman from the Clyde, an opportunity to address the people. I must say that perhaps these two distinguished gentlemen were somewhat disappointed when they found they had not changed the life of either city to any extent. They went on and the two cities remained as intelligent as before, being represented by intelligent individuals.

There is a member of the legislature in Winnipeg, Manitoba, who is a communist. Anything that he writes would be communistic; therefore, under the provisions of this bill he would not be permitted to pass any of his letters through the mail. As a man thinks, so is he, and as he writes, so does he express himself. Therefore his letters would be communistic literature. That is logic. I may be wrong, but I believe that if there were an opportunity to become a Christian communist it would clean up many of the things now present in the political life of Canada. I cannot help thinking of the law as it has been administered by the former Postmaster General, the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Elliott). Our present laws have enough in them to protect us against unclean literature. I do not wish to give any particular instances, but as long as the former Postmaster General is alive he will be considered a credit to the Dominion of Canada. He was a man who was above the taking of bribes for allowing anything wrong to go through the mails.

I stand for free speech just as much as anybody else. It will never hurt anyone to express themselves along any particular lines as long as they observe the laws of Canada.

I have addressed communistic gatherings and my advice to them has always been to observe the law. I visited Mr. Tim Buck when he was in Port Arthur. Perhaps that was a little risky, but I got the surprise of my life. He had been in an automobile accident, and I was wondering how many clergymen from the head of the lakes had visited him. I found him to be just as intelligent as I was. When we bowed our heads before the Great Creator, I was perhaps the one who slipped a little because I opened my eyes to peek to see if his were closed. They were closed as reverently as mine. I am going to be very careful in voting for any bill that will restrict the publications of a man of that type because I think deep down in the heart of Tim Buck there is something that is good.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is so close to nine o'clock that perhaps your honour will call it that hour.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Customs and excise divisions—
218. General administration, $972,135.

Mr. PELLETIER: Will the minister explain the decrease in this item?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): The decrease is $134,015, made up as follows:

Item	Decrease
Permanent salaries	$ 90,515
Temporary salaries	7,500
Printing and stationery	35,000
Telegrams and telephones	500
Sundries	500
Total	134,015

Mr. PELLETIER: There is a decrease of some $90,000 in salaries. Has there been a transfer of employees from this department to some other department?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. There was a transfer of sixty-nine permanent officers to the Department of Trade and Commerce. Does the hon. member want the details?

Mr. PELLETIER: No, it is not necessary. I was just wondering if, on account of slackening business, it had been necessary to dismiss a number of employees.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. McIvor.]

Customs and excise divisions—
219. Customs excise chemical laboratory, $39,635.

Mr. MARSHALL: How long has this particular branch been in operation?

Mr. ILSLEY: This laboratory?

Mr. MARSHALL: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I believe, since shortly after confederation.

Mr. MARSHALL: The reason I asked this question is that prior to the estimates of 1938-39 they were all segregated, were they not? They are now split up, are they not?

Mr. ILSLEY: This item formerly was included in the main item, and now it is taken out of the main item and shown separately.

Mr. MARSHALL: That is the point I was trying to get.

Item agreed to.

Customs and Excise division—
220. Inspection, investigation and audit services, $1,110,925.

Mr. MARSHALL: The auditor general made a report on this matter. It states, at page 47 of part I:

> An examination was made of the procedure followed in collecting and recording revenues in the customs and excise divisions at the port of Toronto, and as a result, several recommendations were made to the commissioners of customs and excise respectively, which would prove beneficial, and would provide for a fuller compliance with the requirements of the consolidated revenue and audit act.

I wonder if the minister would enlarge on that point.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is this in the last report of the auditor general?

Mr. MARSHALL: It is found in the auditor general's report for the year ended March 31, 1938.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The auditor general did make some minor recommendations, recommending some minor changes in the port of Toronto, which I am informed have all been adopted.

Item agreed to.

Customs and excise division—
221. Preventive service undervaluation unit, $65,280.

Mr. PELLETIER: Why is this service necessary as being distinct and apart from the investigation and audit services?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, there is not much reason; perhaps there is no reason except an historical one why this should be separate from the item just before it. A few years ago there was a large preventive service under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Revenue. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police took over almost wholly that preventive service, but some officers were left with the Department of National Revenue to do work which was not strictly speaking, police work; it is mostly clerical, and this item is to provide for the expenses of the remnants of the old preventive service.

Mr. PELLETIER: If that is the case, it seems to me that there might be more economy effected if these two preventive services were amalgamated. Perhaps if the inspection, investigation and audit services could take complete charge of this remnant of the former organization some economies might be effected there. Another reason is that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have been active in carrying on the prevention of undervaluation concerning matters of this type, and I suggest there might be room there for economy in that particular branch.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, about the only separation is here in the book. They are all under the chief inspector of customs and excise.

Mr. PELLETIER: There is no particular officer designated specially to take charge of this work?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. The chief inspector of customs and excise has charge of both.

Item agreed to.

Customs and excise divisions—

222. Ports, outports and preventive stations, including pay for overtime of officers, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, and temporary buildings and rentals, $7,619,100.

Mr. BROOKS: In regard to this item I have often felt that the matter of appointments was one to which the phrase, "notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act" might apply, and I could refer particularly to an appointment in my own town of Sussex, New Brunswick. However, I am not going to discuss that to-night. I should like to have an explanation from the minister of just what that phrase means, particularly in this case.

Mr. ILSLEY: In 1928 the National Revenue Act was amended in such a way as to empower the governor in council to make certain appointments notwithstanding the provisions of the Civil Service Act. That amendment was introduced and passed as a result of a recommendation of a royal commission. The reason for the recommendation was this: It was thought that the government should have some liberty of choice of experts, and the appointments were confined to the preventive service, the appraisal service, and investigators of values—just those three. Under that amendment to the National Revenue Act quite a number of officers were appointed, both before 1930 and after 1930. I cannot remember just the number that are in the service, but I think it is somewhere between fifty and sixty. Since 1934 no one has been brought into the service from outside under the powers contained in that act; the practice has been discontinued; and when we need an investigator or an appraiser or anybody of that kind we ask the civil service commission to appoint him. The matter has been handed over to the civil service commission. For promotions of these particular national revenue appointees we have to resort to an order in council, because the civil service commission does not recognize them at all.

Mr. BROOKS: That does not apply to any new appointments at the present time?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. It would not apply to any new appointments unless we resumed the practice of making appointments under the National Revenue Act—which I have no intention of doing.

Mr. COLDWELL: This item covers a number of things including out-ports, preventive stations, temporary buildings and rentals. Some of the customs stations, which would come under the Department of Public Works as well as under this department, are in my opinion a rather poor advertisement for Canada to people who cross the line and come to our side.

Mr. ILSLEY: They advertise our economy.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am thinking of the convenience of people crossing the line. I do not know much about the eastern stations, but I have seen a number of them in western Canada. When I was on the United States side of the line I saw well equipped customs stations, with toilet and other conveniences; on the Canadian side the stations were badly equipped. I could not help thinking that we presented the appearance of the poor neighbour of the United States, and I thought that on this item I would call attention to the fact that many of the customs buildings and offices, particularly on the western Canadian boundary, are a poor advertisement for Canada, especially when we compare them with the buildings on the other side of the line. None of these is in my constituency and therefore I am not asking for such public works there, but if funds are available we might profitably as a nation spend a little money on some of the customs stations that are not very attractive to people crossing the border.

Mr. MARSHALL: There is a total reduction in staff of fifty-five. Does this mean that these employees have been transferred from the Department of National Revenue to the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. ILSLEY: There were sixty-nine transfers to the Department of Trade and Commerce. What page is the hon. member looking at?

Mr. MARSHALL: I am looking at page 144 of the estimates. On page 141 the details are given.

Mr. PELLETIER: There is an increase of $70,900, and on page 141 the details are set out showing so many new collectors, and so on; but apparently these do not account for the $70,900. Could the minister give some information as to the difference between the two?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are quite a large number of decreases and a number of increases, and the net increase is $70,900. I can give the various increases.

Mr. PELLETIER: I do not want to put the minister to the trouble of giving details with regard to each position. I simply want to know how this amount is made up. I want the reason for it.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is made up of various items; it is a net increase of $70,900.

Mr. MARSHALL: All increases in salaries?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. This is the net result on balance between the number of increases and the decreases.

Mr. MARSHALL: In salaries?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, all kinds of things. The increase in temporary salaries is $69,605, and the reason for that is the employment of persons on a temporary basis on account of permanent employees leaving the service, or in consequence of death, resignation or superannuation. There is a decrease in permanent strength and an increase in temporary strength The others are small items, and that is the net increase.

Mr. MARSHALL: According to my calculations there is a net decrease of fifty-five in the staff.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the permanent staff?

Mr. MARSHALL: Yes. Were they transferred to the Department of Trade and Commerce?

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. ILSLEY: They are replaced by temporaries.

Mr. MANION: There was a policy of closing certain ports. Have any been closed in the past year and have some been opened?

Mr. ILSLEY: Nearly ninety ports, outports, preventive stations and postal collecting stations have been closed since this government came in. Leaving out the postal collecting stations, which are not very large affairs, forty-eight ports, outports and preventive stations have been closed.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The minister says there has been a decrease in the permanent strength and an increase in the temporary. What happened to those who were on the permanent staff? Were they moved to another department?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are accounted for by deaths, resignations and superannuations.

Mr. LANDERYOU: And the temporary staff have replaced them?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Was the increase on account of increase in salaries?

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps I had better give the increases and the decreases. Taking the increases first:

	Increase
Temporary salaries	$69,605
Living allowances	2,100
Overtime	10,000
Stamps and labels	25,000

These are total increases of $106,705. Against them there have been the following decreases:

	Decrease
Permanent salaries	$17,805
Printing and stationery	7,000
Postage	5,000
Express and freight	3,000
Sundries	3,000

This represents total decreases of $35,805. The balance, or net increase, is $70,900.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Is this overtime figure, $160,000, the total overtime paid to all the employees of the department?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What is the reason for having such a large amount of overtime?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a very small amount; two years ago it was over $500,000. It is not the sort of business that one can do on a basis of an eight hour day without considerable loss of economy. To do that would require a much larger staff. But we have tried to cut out a great deal of overtime. As I say, two or three years ago the overtime amounted to some $500,000, and we have brought it down to $160,000, taking on, if I remember, 150 or 160 additional staff.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I am in favour of that. I do not think we should allow the employees to work so much overtime when there are so many unemployed.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is an important change in the policy of the department.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Well, I am in favour of it.

Mr. MARSHALL: What is the explanation of the item of $4,009.61, "appropriation not required for 1939-40"? I am interested in this because a similar item runs through almost every department.

Mr. ILSLEY: It seems to me that should be 1938-39.

Mr. MARSHALL: I agree with the minister that it should be.

Mr. ILSLEY: If that is the case it is easy to see what it means; it means that we did not use quite all our vote, and shall not up to the end of this month.

Mr. LANDERYOU: How long will it be before those hired on the temporary staff are made permanent? Or is it the intention that they will be employed permanently?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a treasury board regulation which requires each unit of the service to keep a "cushion" of temporaries; it is twenty per cent in our department, in some departments I think it is ten per cent. This means that some appointees remain in the temporary class for a considerable length of time. To make them permanent would violate the rule that twenty per cent in a unit must remain as temporaries. My impression is that a good many become permanent in one or two years.

Mr. LANDERYOU: As soon as a position is open in the permanent staff, they are given the opportunity?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. They do not change their duties; they are just given permanent status.

Mr. STIRLING: What is the principle that underlies the "cushion"?

Mr. ILSLEY: The principle is, theoretically, that there should be a chance to reduce the service without hardship. It must not be admitted that a person once in the service is necessarily always there. Some occasion may arise for economy even in a government.

Mr. MANION: Has it ever arisen?

Mr. LANDERYOU: Would it not be just as easy to reduce staff if they were permanent?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it is one of the most difficult things to get a person who is permanent out of the service. If the position is abolished they have to have a pension; they are paying into the superannuation fund, and adjustments have to be made in regard to that; it is a difficult matter. "Permanent" status does give them a great deal of permanency.

Mr. LANDERYOU: It is cheaper to keep them?

Mr. STIRLING: How many outports are there, if any, that are open twenty-four hours a day?

Mr. ILSLEY: The commissioner tells me that about half of the frontier ports are open twenty-four hours a day. If the hon. gentleman wants the number it will take a few minutes to get it.

Mr. STIRLING: In British Columbia, for instance, is there more than one?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are two; Pacific highway and Douglas.

I want to answer that inquiry as to appropriations not required for 1939-40. The purpose of showing these appropriations in two columns is to show whether there is an increase or a decrease. That item of $4,009.61 is of a kind not covered by a vote this year at all. It was a special vote last year to cover payments to two individuals named. There is nothing like that this year, so it cannot be compared with anything, in other words, the appropriation is not required at all this year.

Mr. STEVENS: It has never been explained yet, although explanation has been asked for a thousand times. It does not mean a thing.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Last year there was a change made in Toronto. Originally we had a port at Toronto and an outport at West Toronto. I remember I had some correspondence with the minister in respect to the matter, and I think he had some correspondence with the board of trade and others in Toronto with respect to making West Toronto a port. At that time it was explained to us that there would be a great economy effected by arranging for two separate ports instead of the one port with an outport. I always understood that both the port of Toronto and the outport of West Toronto had given excellent service. I felt at the time that if there was dissatisfaction with the service at the outport of West Toronto we should have had a little better service, which the department could easily give. Would the minister be good enough to state just what saving has been effected by the opening of the new port of West Toronto?

Mr. ILSLEY: It seems a shame to revive the old controversy about West Toronto. The facts were that West Toronto was an outport of Toronto, and as a result of its subordinate status, so to speak, about 25,000 entries annually had to be made a second time in the books of the main Toronto office. If I remember correctly, the services of about two men were employed doing this and nothing else. There was no sense to it at all; it did not serve a single useful purpose. The simplest and easiest way to get rid of that useless work, wasted effort and needless expenditure was to make West Toronto a port instead of an outport, which was done just by a stroke of the pen. Of course we were accused of working in the interests of Montreal; of trying to spoil the statistical showing of the port of Toronto and so on, and for a month or so a great campaign was waged against us in which I am sorry to say my hon. friend joined. I want to assure him, however, that I have not heard one word of complaint in regard to what we did from that time until this. Last session I think my hon. friend put a question on the order paper in this connection, but there has been no complaint at all.

With regard to expense, the accusation was that we were going to increase expenses by $25,000 a year by making West Toronto a port. The first rumour was that we were going to name a particular person as collector there; in fact, half a dozen ulterior motives were ascribed to the minister, the commissioner and others for making this change. All I can say about expense is that not a single salary has been raised in the port of West Toronto. The expense there is the same because they are doing the same amount of work they were doing before.

Mr. MANION: This increase of $70,000 is not on account of that change?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no; there is no increase, and the two men I mentioned have been absorbed in the Toronto office. One cannot point to a particular economy. There has been some increase in the staff of the Toronto office, and all we ever said was that we would absorb these men instead of bringing in people from outside.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have great regard for the Minister of National Revenue, and I did not ascribe any ulterior motives to him when the outport of West Toronto was made a port. When he replied to me he rather suggested in his letter, I think, that I was taking that attitude, but I was not. It was entirely a question of economy. I have listened carefully to the minister's rhetoric and to his statement that we were talking about Montreal, and so on. The minister has said that he has not increased any salaries there, but the number of entries through the ports of Toronto and West Toronto is less than it was last year. In spite of that fact there is an increase in the expense, and I was wondering if the port of West Toronto had anything to do with it.

Mr. LANDERYOU: There is an amount of $50,000 provided for legal expenses. How is this money spent?

Mr. ILSLEY: To begin with, on what page is the item?

Mr. LANDERYOU: It is on page 144; the amount was $50,000 last year and it is $50,000 this year. Is that in connection with legal firms outside the department and the government?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that would be it. We have quite an amount of litigation in connection with the collection of taxes, and have to employ counsel.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The minister thinks it is better to employ outside counsel than to have his own departmental officials do the work?

Mr. ILSLEY: We do both. We have counsel in the department, but it is necessary to have local solicitors and counsel as well.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Are they paid for each case? I should like to know how this money is paid, whether these solicitors are given a fixed sum to represent the department in a certain area, or what is the practice.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are agents of the Department of Justice; their accounts are taxed by that department, but we pay them.

Mr. STIRLING: What is the policy that governs the minister and the government with regard to customs entries at airports? Considerable expansion is going on, certainly in my part of the country, with regard to these air fields, and one is continually being asked whether customs facilities will naturally follow the opening of airports.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is not a great deal of importation of goods by aeroplane. There are about four ports at which aeroplanes do land regularly, and at those ports there are customs officers at the times the planes are scheduled to land. Entries are made in the usual way.

Mr. STIRLING: But there is a great deal of casual flying.

Mr. ILSLEY: In that case the nearest port has to be notified. Then an officer goes at once by taxi and does whatever is necessary.

Mr. STIRLING: At the expense of the department?

Mr. ILSLEY: At the expense of the person accommodated.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I should like a little more information in regard to this amount for legal expenses. What is the number of cases handled in this way last year and the amount of money paid in legal expenses?

Mr. ILSLEY: These are mostly prosecutions under the Special War Revenue Act. In addition, there would be some ordinary collection cases where accounts were placed in the hands of solicitors. I have not the particulars of the cases, but quite a number of them are going on all the time in various parts of Canada.

Mr. LANDERYOU: That is for evading payment of taxes?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, not paying for one reason or another. There are cases of all kinds. Sometimes people keep two sets of books, and resort to various practices in order to evade payment of their taxes. We keep after them.

Mr. STIRLING: I should like a little more information with regard to customs entries at airports. For instance, has the department an officer stationed at the St. Hubert airport in Montreal?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: And are there many of the larger ports at which there are permanent officers?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are three others, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver.

Mr. STIRLING: There was an instance that occurred in my part of British Columbia quite recently. The dominion government is to assist the municipality in the preparation of a field at Penticton, where there is a customs office. Does the incoming plane just come down and telephone the officer to come out, or what is the practice?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is not a regular service. It would not be a regular or scheduled landing at Penticton.

Mr. STIRLING: It may become regular, but it is not yet. Thirty miles south of Penticton there is an excellent field at a place called Oliver, which certainly has been used for casual landings. The difficulty has been to arrange with the Penticton customs office. The next stage of the development will be the opening of the field at Penticton itself, where there is a customs office. I am wondering what the practice will be. There are other air fields dotted all along that piece of the southern boundary.

Mr. ILSLEY: Arrangements can be made in advance. A person coming into Canada can telegraph ahead, and an officer could meet him there. Or, if the man does not do that, and telephones to the nearest customs house the officer will get there as soon as he can.

Mr. STIRLING: The man would be told by the officer that at the man's expense the officer would take a car and go out to the field.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Income tax division—

223. General administration, including authority to create positions and make appointments within the division, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, and the said positions and staff so appointed are hereby wholly excluded from the operation of the said act, $314,775.

Mr. MANION: Would the minister give some general information as to the amounts collected and the numbers paying income tax in Canada? A short general statement would be of interest.

Mr. ILSLEY: The amount collected this fiscal year will be approximately $140,000,000.

Mr. MANION: Does that include business income tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is just income tax.

Mr. MANION: Personal?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, including corporation, as well.

Mr. MANION: Would the minister mind dividing it up?

Mr. ILSLEY: Although I have not the figures before me I shall have them in a few moments. The main divisions are corporation income tax, individual income tax and the tax on remittances to non-residents.

Mr. MANION: The minister has not the figures for those three?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, but roughly—and I will correct the information if I am much out—I should think the ratio between corporation and individual is about three to two. The corporations pay about one and a half times as much as individuals.

Mr. MANION: About $85,000,000 personal; or is it the other way about?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have the exact figures in a moment. Of course one has to take out the tax on non-residents, and that is quite a large item. Strictly speaking, it is not an income tax. It is a tax on interest, dividends and so on paid from Canadian sources to persons residing outside Canada.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is an income tax on foreigners, is it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Strictly speaking, it is not an income tax because, on balance, they may not have any income at all. Nevertheless they have to pay that five per cent.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is on Canadian earnings.

Mr. MANION: The same as Canadians do on United States income?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HOMUTH: Are the figures divided as between industry, mining and financial houses, or in some such manner as that? For instance, could the minister give us the income from the mines of Canada and that from industrial concerns?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall see about that, although I have not the information before me. We do not have it readily available, and it would take some little time to get it. I think, however, there would be no objection to giving the hon. member that information. It would take some little time, but we could separate it into mining and non-mining corporations. Is that what the hon. member wants?

Mr. HOMUTH: Yes. My idea is this—and I am quite sincere—that in the house we hear a great deal of talk about how industry is continually milking the people of western and eastern Canada. I think it would be a good idea if we could have some figures showing the division of income tax as between what industry pays and what comes out of our natural resources such as mining, lumbering and so on. Those figures would be of interest to the committee.

Mr. MANION: Could the minister first give the figures I asked for?

Mr. ILSLEY: I find my proportion was just a little out. I have not the figures for the current year, because it is not yet complete, but for the year 1937-38 I find that individuals paid $40,444,838.61 and corporations paid $69,768,605.17.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. MANION: Are the proportions about the same this year?

Mr. ILSLEY: I should think so, substantially. I was just going by my impression over a period of years.

Mr. MANION: That amounts to about $110,000,000. This year the minister expects roughly $140,000,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: But I have not put in the five per cent tax in the figures I have given. That amounts to $10,152,087.

Mr. MANION: Five per cent makes a figure over $10,000,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; there is a great deal of money invested in Canada by non-residents.

Mr. MANION: There was $120,000,000 collected last year, and this year the amount will be about $20,000,000 more?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MANION: How many individuals paid income tax? They used to be in the neighbourhood of a quarter of a million. What is the number for the last year for which the minister has the records?

Mr. ILSLEY: Before I answer the question may I say the commissioner tells me that to date payments for the present fiscal year amount to $141,000,000. It is nearly the end of the month, and there will not be much more. In 1937-38 the number of individuals was 237,064.

Mr. MANION: As the minister is giving figures, would he give the division according to amounts? I am referring to those between $2,500 and $5,000, and proceeding up through the higher brackets.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will give the figures for taxable incomes, that is, incomes above the exemptions. I shall give first the income figures and then the number of individuals. They are:

Taxable income	Number of taxpayers
Under $2,000	106,764
Between $2,000 and $3,000	56,026
Between $3,000 and $4,000	30,973

Between $8,000 and $9,000	2,290
Between $9,000 and $10,000	1,691
Between $10,000 and $15,000	4,121
Between $15,000 and $20,000	1,613

Between $40,000 and $45,000	134
Between $45,000 and $50,000	91
Over $50,000	382

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Would the minister give the amounts collected in each of these categories?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are as follows:

Taxable income	Amount collected
Under $2,000	$ 1,152,471
Between $2,000 and $3,000	1,196,682
Between $3,000 and $4,000	1,348,556

Between $45,000 and $50,000	1,095,111
Over $50,000	14,027,159
	$40,444,839

Mr. YOUNG: What is the largest income in Canada upon which a tax is paid?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not available.

Mr. YOUNG: It must be available somewhere.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, it would be in the department.

Mr. MacINNIS: Has the minister the percentages of the taxpayers and the percentages of taxes which they pay?

Mr. ILSLEY: These are the figures:

Taxable income	Percentage of total taxpayers	Percentage of total tax paid
Under $2,000	45·04	2·79
Between—
$2,000 and $3,000	23·63	2·9

Mr. MARSHALL: There has been some correspondence between the auditor general and the income tax division with respect to whether or not the auditor general has the authority to examine the personal files of taxpayers in possession of the income tax division. The matter was referred to the Department of Justice. Referring to the auditor general's report, I find this is what is stated:

> He is not permitted to see these documents for two reasons: first, because he is precluded by the provisions of said section 81, and second, because he has no power to review the findings of the minister.

Then the auditor general goes on to say:

> Consequently I cannot satisfy myself regarding the accuracy of assessments of income tax, nor ascertain on behalf of parliament that the provisions set forth in the Income War Tax Act, with regard to these assessments, have been properly applied by the income tax division.

The question I should like to direct to the minister is, if the auditor general has not the right to see these documents in order to verify the assessments, how are these statements verified?

Mr. ILSLEY: The minister has to take responsibility. That is all I can say.

Mr. HOMUTH: The figures that the minister has given us are so interesting that it is perhaps unfortunate we cannot get a better division of them; first, perhaps, a division showing the various classifications from which income tax is received—those engaged in industrial pursuits, those engaged in mining and various other activities; second, the various provinces from which the income tax is collected.

As we sit here day after day we hear continuous attacks upon industry. I venture to say that if a careful analysis of income tax payments were made it would be found that those provinces which are highly industrialized are paying the greatest proportion of taxes to the government.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): You did not pay it, you collected it.

Mr. HOMUTH: I would expect that from hon. members over there. Not only are we paying this tax, but as a result of the activities within our own provinces and the payment of provincial taxes in the various provinces in which we who are in industry have offices, we are paying a very large proportion of the tax in the western provinces in which we are doing business. It would be interesting to have a proper division of the whole tax, and then add to it the amount of money which we are paying in subsidies to western Canada, as a result of their wheat subsidy, as a result of other votes which are authorized for the minister's plans of rehabilitation, and so forth. It would give us a complete picture of just how much money is being taken from eastern Canada and distributed throughout the western provinces.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The hon. member would take in the whole of the landscape.

Mr. HOMUTH: My hon. friends would not have even landscape, if it were not for some of us in eastern Canada.

Mr. YOUNG: Some hon. members would hardly have a shirt to their backs if the west had not fed the east for twenty-five years.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I am afraid that this discussion is out of order. I would ask the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) to keep to the item before the committee.

Mr. YOUNG: The hon. member had better get it out of his head.

Mr. HOMUTH: I imagine the chairman will agree that these interruptions are out of order. The hon. member who has just spoken has certainly said long ago all he has in his head, because nothing worth while has come out of it for the past three years. As I was saying, it might be a good idea if we could get a complete picture of the taxes which are paid under all these various items, with the moneys distributed to the various provinces in connection with relief. It would show clearly where the money comes from and where it goes.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I wonder whether the minister can give us the information as to where the money comes from—

An hon. MEMBER: The twenty-five dollars a month?

Mr. HOMUTH: The east has given the hon. member's province all the money it deserves.

Mr. LANDERYOU: —which is paid in income tax by the industrialists of eastern Canada, just how much has come from western Canada in the last ten years.

Mr. HOMUTH: The west has got it back three times over.

Mr. BROOKS: Would the minister give us the amounts collected in each of the different districts in Canada? As I understand the situation, there is a central collecting office for each district.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) will obtain a publication of the bureau of statistics called Incomes Assessed for Income War Tax in Canada in 1937, he will get a great deal of the information that he is seeking.

Mr. HOMUTH: But it will not give the distribution, will it?

[Mr. Homuth.]

Mr. ILSLEY: It gives the distribution by provinces and by occupations in the various provinces. It also makes some division between corporations, but I do not think it segregates mining corporations.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is what I was wondering.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is called "natural resources."

Mr. HOMUTH: Does it segregate natural resources and industry?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, it does.

Mr. HOMUTH: And mines come under "natural resources"?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. It is very good. I think the last year of publication is 1936-37; we have not had anything since then.

Mr. BROOKS: I asked for the amounts in the different districts.

Mr. ILSLEY: How small a district does the hon. member want? There are quite a number of them.

Mr. BROOKS: I mean, from the different centres like Saint John, Halifax, Charlottetown.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are quite a number of districts here. The hon. member wants the total of individual and corporation income tax from each of these districts?

Mr. BROOKS: As I understand it, there is an office in each district for the collection of income tax for that particular district. For instance, in New Brunswick, Saint John collects, I believe, for that district. I wanted the total from each of the districts. I may be wrong in my idea, but I thought—

Mr. LANDERYOU: Could the minister give the total for each of the provinces?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have that information here. If I read it, it is going to take quite a long time.

Mr. HOMUTH: Put it on Hansard.

Mr. BROOKS: I should be glad if the minister would put it on Hansard.

Mr. ILSLEY: With the consent of the committee; but I would say that a person in New Brunswick can pay his income tax in Winnipeg, and a person in Nova Scotia can pay his income tax in Montreal if he wants to.

Mr. BROOKS: Those are exceptional cases.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am told by the commissioner that it is nevertheless segregated back to the district in which he resides.

Mr. BROOKS: Can the minister give the figures for 1937 and 1938? I want to compare the two.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will put the 1937-38 figures on Hansard.. Does the hon. gentleman, for purposes of discussion, want me to give him anything roughly right now?

Mr. BROOKS: If he can give it for the provinces it will suit me.

Mr. ILSLEY: By provinces these are the figures for 1937-38:

Prince Edward Island	$ 970,000
Nova Scotia	1,614,000
New Brunswick	1,100,000
Quebec	34,111,000
Ontario	68,170,000
Manitoba	3,008,000
Saskatchewan	537,000
Alberta	1,922,000
British Columbia	8,819,000
Yukon	26,000

Mr. BROOKS: What year?

Mr. ILSLEY: The fiscal year 1937-38.

Mr. HEAPS: I wish to say just a word in regard to income tax payments, because there have been made to-night some remarks that would better have been left unsaid. When we talk about paying income tax, there is only one method by which it can be paid, and that is by the national production; and if we have no production in Canada there will be no tax paid anywhere, either in the east or in the west. It is therefore unfair for any hon. member, no matter what part of the country he comes from, to make disparaging remarks about any section of Canada especially when the west is experiencing difficulties.

Mr. HOMUTH: So is the east.

Mr. HEAPS: The hon. member has never heard me or any other western member making disparaging remarks about the east.

Mr. HOMUTH: You are continually criticizing industry in the east.

Mr. HEAPS: As to criticizing industry—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. HEAPS: May I point out—

The CHAIRMAN: Not when the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. HEAPS: You never gave me a chance to argue the point of order. I do not like dictatorial methods from the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. My decision has been given.

Mr. HEAPS: And I have a right to appeal your decision if I wish to.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has all the privileges and rights of any other member, but when he is out of order he must obey the ruling of the chair.

Mr. HEAPS: That is perfectly true, but I wish to say that in all my experience in this chamber I have never seen a chairman interfere as much in the debates as the chairman at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. That is a reflection on the chair, and must be withdrawn without reservation.

Mr. HEAPS: I am sorry I cannot make that remark in the house, but I would certainly say it outside the house.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member must conform to the rules.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes. I am quite prepared to conform to the rules—

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask him to withdraw the reflection on the chair.

Mr. HEAPS: If there is a reflection on the chair I certainly withdraw it, and all I hope is that we shall have from the chair at least that same latitude in discussion that we have always had from previous chairmen in this house.

The CHAIRMAN: That is still a reflection and must be withdrawn.

Mr. HEAPS: If it is a reflection I withdraw it entirely. I do not want to reflect on the chair in any manner whatever, but I say with all due respect that if we are to discuss income tax we have a right to discuss the incidence of income tax, how it is paid, who pays it, and whom the money comes from.

The CHAIRMAN: But the hon. member was not doing that.

Mr. HEAPS: All I was doing was referring to some remarks made about the poverty of people who cannot pay income tax. I say it is unfair to reflect on any part of the country that is not in a position to make large payments in income tax.

It has been said that reflections have been made upon industrialists. I have never attempted to make reflections on persons who pay income tax. We may criticize the tariff here and there and that is perfectly legitimate, but that is different from making disparaging remarks about people in other parts of the country.

So far as income tax is concerned, the west never did pay much even in its brightest days in years gone by, because when the west had received an amount of money for its production, mostly from the farm, that money was transferred to the east to large corporations; and it was moneys paid to large corporations in the east who have extensive interests in the west that swelled unduly the amount of taxation shown as having been paid in Toronto or in the province of Ontario or in the province of Quebec. Take the city of Montreal in relation to income tax. There are elevators in that city, large terminals, and income tax is derived in large amounts from many of these concerns. They pay vast sums by way of income tax, but it is not on wheat and farm produce grown in and around Montreal and maintaining these elevators. Therefore, it is most unfair to say that one part of the country pays so much income tax and another part so much more. I suggest that we should try as far as possible to do away with these artificial divisions, because the economy of one part of Canada depends to a large extent upon the economy of the other; and the growth and development, with accompanying payments in income tax, in eastern Canada reflect the growth and development of western Canada. Similarly, if the farming industry in western Canada is not prosperous, if prices are low, that immediately reflects itself in the business of eastern Canada and the amount of income tax paid by eastern corporations. When conditions are bad in the east, the situation is reflected in the west.

I am one of those who prefer to try to understand the problems of the east just as I would ask the people of eastern Canada to try to understand the problems of the west. All day I have listened to interjections about the bonus paid to the wheat producer —and in this connection I realize that I am out of order this time. I will not deal with the question of wheat because I try as far as possible to keep within the rules of the house, although sometimes one has to sail pretty close to the wind on questions of the sort we have before us at the moment. All I have to say to my hon. friends, whether they come from one part of the country or the other, is that western Canada is passing through a very difficult period, and instead of casting reflections upon the people there, and making derogatory statements about them, it would be better to show them some sympathy in these difficult times.

Mr. YOUNG: I agree with what the hon. member has just said. I want to cite two classes of business which I think all hon. members will agree are not local. First, there are two transportation systems in this country. Where are the high salaries paid in connection with those systems? At the head offices, and we all know what province those head offices are in. Will any hon. member say those salaries are earned merely in that particular province, that the men at the head of those corporations receive those high salaries because the railway is in one province? The business that pays those salaries is done in all parts of Canada, and those salaries are really earned in every province of Canada. I could say the same thing in regard to life insurance companies, banks and corporations of all kinds.

Mr. HOMUTH: Compare it with the deficit of the railways.

Mr. YOUNG: If my hon. friend would keep quiet we should get along better. I could go through all these large companies and show that these large salaries paid in Quebec or Ontario are actually drawn from all parts of Canada and not only from the province where the income tax is actually paid. Is it not entirely unfair to suggest that because the taxes are paid in the east, other parts of Canada are not paying their proper share?

Moreover, if there is one tax that we can point our finger at and say that it is paid because those paying it have an income, it is the income tax. In the west we do not pay income taxes because unfortunately, owing to certain conditions which have been so often stated, we are not permitted to make the incomes that we should make. I shall soon be stopped on a point of order.

I have another thing to say to the government. I am opposed to this business of a double income tax. An arrangement should be arrived at between the federal government and the provinces whereby there would be one collection only of income tax throughout Canada. The next suggestion I have is that there should be a rebate to every part of Canada according to population, and then we shall get a just distribution of income tax, for the reason I explained a few moments ago. But it ill becomes any hon. member to try to make it appear that because income taxes are collected in certain places, the rest of this country is not paying its just proportion of the taxation of this country.

If we were having a free-for-all to-night, and if you, Mr. Chairman, were very generous, we could show definitely why it is that some parts of Canada, owing to certain laws and regulations which have prevailed over the last twenty-five years, have paid the major part of the income tax collections.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The $69,000,000 paid in Ontario and the large amount paid in Quebec are in large part a result of the contributions made to those provinces by the other sections of Canada; there is no question about that. We know, for instance, that western Canada purchased millions of dollars worth of farm machinery at high prices, and is now paying tremendous rates of interest on the payments still due; in fact, ten per cent is being charged on the overdue notes.

Mr. HOMUTH: No one contradicted that.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Then why should the hon. member cast reflections—

Mr. HOMUTH: I did not cast any reflection.

Mr. LANDERYOU: —and suggest that the east is going to pay the wheat bonus?

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order. I did nothing of the kind. What I said was that we are continually hearing of the tribute paid to industry in Ontario and Quebec, and I said that surely these tax figures show that industry is at least taking its fair share of the burden of the whole dominion.

Mr. LANDERYOU: But it is taking too great a share of the national income—

Mr. HOMUTH: And is giving it all back.

Mr. LANDERYOU: —and it is coming out of western Canada. But the members of the Conservative party in Ontario are continually stressing that they are making great contributions to the west.

Mr. MANION: Whom does the hon. member mean by the members of the Conservative party in Ontario?

Mr. LANDERYOU: Those coming from Ontario. They are continually pointing to the fact that they are making such great contributions.

Mr. HOMUTH: No, but we object to your criticism.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Shall the item carry?

Mr. YOUNG: I rise to another point of order. I think this committee should object to the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) taking the seat of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. MANION: I gave it to him. It is not a very nice seat anyway. I shall not be here long; I shall be over there.

Mr. HOMUTH: We have that all fixed.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There is no hon. member who has greater sympathy with the west than I have. We should all act as Canadians, not criticize one part of the country from another part but all try to do our share.

Now a word for the miners. Section 89 of the Income War Tax Act exempts new producing mines from profit tax for a limited period after they come into production. A number of these new mines have been developed and brought to production by older mining companies. Section 4, paragraph (n) of the Income War Tax Act amendment of 1936 provides for exemption from income tax of dividends paid to an incorporated company by a company incorporated in Canada, the profits of which have been taxed under this act. But no exemption is given to the company receiving dividends from another company where the profits of that other company have not been taxed. In other words, the older mining companies that take the risk of developing new mining projects do not get the advantage of the exemption from taxation given to the new companies during the period in which the new companies are free from taxation under section 89. It seems to me that a simple amendment to section 4, paragraph (n) would cure the matter, and I suggest that that paragraph be amended by inserting, after the word "act" in the third line thereof the following words: "or by a company to which section 89 of this act applies during the period of such application."

Mr. ILSLEY: I am familiar with the subject matter of that suggestion, and I hope the hon. member has made it or will make it in writing to the Minister of Finance, who must take the responsibility for that type of legislation. It should be discussed prior to the presentation of the budget. Possibly the Minister of Finance will see his way clear to accept the suggestion. But this is not the occasion to discuss it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Well I shall do that, and perhaps the Minister of Finance will read Hansard.

I want to bring to the attention of the committee an interesting example of the taxation paid by an industry. I have altered these figures slightly, but they are all in proportion. Here is a company which pays $1,000,000 in wages in a year. In taxes it pays $175,000 a year. That is to say, for every $100 paid to the workers it pays $17.50 in taxes, or for every $25 a week paid in wages it pays $4.37 in taxes.

Mr. ILSLEY: What taxes?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): All taxes, excluding customs and excise taxes. The dominion taxes alone paid by this concern were $146,500. I put this on record to show the very high taxes that industry has to pay, and meet the competition of other countries.

Mr. ILSLEY: The amount of its taxes might be on account of the fact that it was making very high profits.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): No, they are making very little profit. I have not the amount, but it is very low.

Mr. ILSLEY: They must have made about a million dollars profit.

Mr. HOMUTH: That amount of taxes would include municipal taxes, and provincial taxes and everything.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): And sales tax.

Mr. STIRLING: Income tax has been collected in Canada, I think, for about twenty years, and in Great Britain for something like eighty or ninety years.

Mr. ILSLEY: It has been continuously collected in Great Britain since 1842, but William Pitt the younger had an income tax in 1799.

Mr. STIRLING: Then it has been collected continuously in England for nearly one hundred years. We do not hear as much criticism to-day as we did ten or fifteen years ago, very likely from uninformed people, who objected to paying income tax unless they were perfectly certain that their neighbour, their friend and their acquaintance also paid it. Of course the tightening up process has gone on in this country until possibly there are very few evasions to-day. One of the reasons why the income tax in Great Britain has been accepted as it has, and why it is being accepted in an improved manner year after year in Canada, is because of its secrecy. To what extent does that secrecy exist. Is it absolute? Can anybody get information from the income tax branch of the minister's department for any purpose? Can provincial governments get any information, and can even the minister himself open the files of individuals and look through them?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, the minister can, but I cannot remember doing it in the case of any individual. We do give some information to the provincial government.

Mr. STIRLING: Information of what kind?

Mr. ILSLEY: The cases are limited to those covered by agreements made under statute. There is a provision in the income tax act which enables us to enter into agreements with provinces for the collection of their income tax, and to give them certain information. To be absolutely accurate I would require to have the clauses of those agreements before me, but I can tell the hon. member the substance of the provision. It is that if the provincial government represents that in its opinion fraud exists in the returns made by those giving it information in respect of its laws, for example in connection with succession duties, then we agree to allow it access, at its request, to certain income tax returns, in order to enable it to enforce its laws.

Mr. STIRLING: They do not ask certain questions which are answered; they have access to the return of the individual?

Mr. ILSLEY: If the attorney general, or in some instances the provincial secretary, or some responsible minister of the government of the province with which we have an agreement, will state that there are indications that there has been fraud, and will request access to the files, we allow them to be seen. Generally speaking that is the arrangement which exists. As I say, to put it quite accurately I should have the clauses before me.

Mr. STIRLING: For instance, can the provincial secretary of British Columbia ask for a copy of an individual return?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, we have no agreement with British Columbia.

Mr. STIRLING: Then how is it done in practice? Is an accountant sent from Victoria to Ottawa?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think we have given the government of British Columbia any information. We do not have any agreement with that province; we do not collect their income tax for them.

Mr. STIRLING: So the arrangement exists only between certain provinces and the dominion government?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, only those with which we have agreements.

Mr. MANION: Some months ago, I cannot recall exactly but my recollection is that it was last summer, a question came up that, I believe, caused a good deal of irritation. It concerned the mining fraternity and was dealt with particularly by the Northern Miner, that mining journal of northern Ontario. I believe it had to do with section 37 (b)—

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 32 (b).

Mr. MANION: I was familiar with it at the time, and I remember that they had the impression that the mining fraternity, through legislation passed last year, were going to be unfairly treated in some of their company dealings. Has that matter been entirely straightened out to the satisfaction of both the government and the mining fraternity, because there was a good deal of complaint about it at the time and then the complaint ceased. I have been curious to learn what really happened, and I wonder if the minister would make a statement in this connection.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the matter has been straightened out to the satisfaction of both the mining interests and the government.

Mr. MANION: Would the minister explain briefly?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The amendment passed at the end of last session preserved the principle that capital gains were not to be taxed, but the Northern Miner became alarmed. They thought we were introducing into our system the principle of taxation of capital gains. Capital gains are taxed in the United States; they are not taxed in Great Britain or in Canada. There are a great many legal decisions as to what constitutes capital gains and what constitutes profit or income. The amendment was designed to meet an abuse. We were not introducing any new practice; we were legalizing a practice that already existed, as to the legality of which some doubt had arisen. It was not confined to mining companies in terms; mines were not mentioned at all, but the main application was to companies engaged in prospecting.

Mr. MANION: Was it also in connection with recapitalization?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, it did have some application there. Let us say a group decide to prospect for gold, with the intention not of mining the gold but of finding whether or not the gold is there and then selling their claim to a company that will develop and operate it. If it is clear under the law that their sole source of income is the increase in the value of the property they buy, they are regarded as primarily a trading company; they are not making their income in any other way than selling at a high price what they acquire at a lower price. Under those conditions the gain is not regarded as, and is not legally, a capital gain. It is in fact the income of that syndicate, and is taxable. Then, instead of selling that property it may be possible for them to exchange it for shares and to divide the shares among themselves, or something of that kind.

Mr. MANION: They may get a million shares out of a three million share company.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, and that is all the profit they make. The practice of the income tax division had been to value the shares they divided among themselves and say that was the profit they made. This section simply said that could be done, that the minister could put a value on shares that were divided in specie among shareholders or among the members of a group, and in that way the profit or income could be ascertained. But it was specifically provided in the section that it did not render taxable anything that was not legally income. It did not make a capital gain taxable. In some instances it might be a capital gain; the line is hard to draw. But it did not change that principle at all. It simply prevented what we regarded as a division in specie of property among shareholders in such a way that the gain could not be located or ascertained, that one could not find out what to tax.

Mr. MANION: Was any change made ultimately? Did the amendment that was put into force make any change, or is the law to-day exactly where it was before the amendment was passed by the house?

Mr. ILSLEY: It may have been that before the amendment was passed the minister did not have the power to value shares. It certainly made that change; the minister now can value them. I do not know exactly what the effect was. If I remember correctly, I think the point was raised, and the question was whether there was any power to place a value on them?

Mr. MANION: At any rate it is settled at the present time to the satisfaction of both parties?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would say so, as satisfactorily as anything ever is settled. There is no complaint about the section now, that I know of.

Mr. MANION: Because it is probably carried out exactly as it was before.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is it not mostly a matter of administration? There has been no change made in the amendment, and I would understand that it is only a matter of departmental ruling and administration. There has been no change in that.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have in mind one man who had actually lost some $50,000 or $60,000, but who received an assessment notice for $3,000. Probably the minister knows about the case. It seems to me that it is a matter of administration and departmental ruling.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; the whole trouble arose over a misunderstanding of the amendment. It was feared by a great many persons that we were trying to assess capital gains. When it became apparent that we were not doing anything but what we had been doing, and that we were putting the law in such a position that there was no question as to our right to do it, that we had been taxing income in the past and were continuing to tax it, but so as to prevent distribution of shares in this way without a value being put upon them, or with a nominal value put upon them, the minister was authorized to put a fair value upon them, so that the profit could be definitely ascertained, and the taxpayer assessed. It has been carried out fairly, as it was before, and the people have ceased to be afraid.

Mr. ESLING: The minister has stated that the remittance tax comes under this item. I have spoken about that tax on one or two occasions. As hon. members know, by that remittance tax five per cent is to be paid on all remittances from dividends, royalties, interest, rentals or any other investment. But under the 1936 amendment to the act, for some reason remittance taxes on films were reduced from five per cent to two per cent.

I suppose the minister has good reasons, of which we have not been informed, for that change. But the fact remains that there seems to be a general inclination towards gratuities to the picture producing companies in the United States. One excuse offered is that the films, after having had their run in Canada, are practically useless. Another reason given is that the remittances for the rentals of these films are not profits, but are really portions of the cost of the production in the United States.

I should like hon. members to realize that the saving by reason of this exemption applies only to the large picture producers in the United States. Nobody in Canada is benefited. I take the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce for 1937, and there I find the rentals for those films. It must be remembered that the films are not brought into Canada as positives, to any great extent. A negative comes in and from that negative several prints are made in the processing plant at Montreal. The total tax paid to the government by reason of bringing in the negatives is about $90,000. But according to the Department of Trade and Commerce, during the year 1937 the films have yielded to the film agency about $8,700,000. From that sum there was deducted for wages payable to the employees of some sixty-three film agencies in Canada the sum of $1,062,900. Then there was reserved from the $8,700,000 about thirty-five per cent to cover expenses and profits of the local film agencies. The fact remains that each year there is remitted between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000 to the picture producers of other countries.

I would ask the minister if he does not think in these strenuous days, when it is so difficult to balance the budget, and there are so many demands upon the Minister of Finance, he might give serious thought to repealing that section of the act, because it means a loss of about $150,000 a year to the taxpayers of Canada. If there is any good reason under the sun for such generosity or liberality to the picture producers in the United States the public would be interested to know about it. As I have said on previous occasions, no matter how small the investment in Canada of a resident of the United States may be, he suffers a loss of five per cent.

The claim is made that these remittances are really not dividends but they are a portion of the cost of production of the picture. Well, if a person makes an investment in Canada he certainly is contributing to the cost of production of a house, or whatever the investment may be, until he has recovered his investment. I think there is ground for considerable thought on the part of the minister and the government in reconsidering this exemption on films because it benefits only the picture producers in the United States.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall bring the remarks of my hon. friend to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). I am very much interested in what he has said. He has spoken to me about the matter before, and he raised the point last year. It is not something that concerns me as Minister of National Revenue; it is a matter for the attention of the Minister of Finance. I shall be glad to discuss the matter with him and see that full consideration is given to the suggestion of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. COLDWELL: Could the minister give the total amount paid to his department last year by the gold mining interests of this country?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not segregated, but it could be obtained.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was trying to obtain some idea of the revenue received from the mining of precious metals in view of the services that we render. Perhaps at some other time I could ask this question.

Mr. MAYHEW: I am not complaining about income tax because I think it is the fairest tax we have in Canada, although I believe we think more of what we pay than of what we have left. If Ontario paid $69,000,000 she must have $200,000,000 left, which is not too bad. Could the minister tell when it is possible for a business to obtain a clearance in connection with income tax? In other words, if you are buying or selling a business how far must you go back before you can get a clearance?

Mr. ILSLEY: The matter can be settled within a reasonable time. There is no fixed time, but if a company desires to settle up with the income tax division it can do so and the matter is not reopened unless fraud is discovered. There is no clearance possible that fraud will not reopen, but apart from that I am informed there is no trouble.

Mr. MAYHEW: Could one obtain a clearance for 1937 which could not be opened up unless fraud were discovered?

Mr. ILSLEY: If a company is being wound up—

Mr. MAYHEW: Not where a company is being wound up, but where an estate has to be settled. When would one know if one was going to be clear? I understand that to-day the department is carrying on thousands of investigations which go back twenty or thirty years. Anyone who has purchased a business in the meantime may be liable to pay income tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: I suggest that the hon. member discuss the matter with the commissioner of income tax. It is a little difficult for me to discuss it without knowing the case to which he refers.

Mr. STEVENS: Could we hear a little of the interesting conversation that is going on over there? Things have been rather tiring and we should like to hear the interesting conversation on this private transaction.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sorry. I was not saying much except that it was pretty hard to give an answer to the hon. gentleman unless I knew the particular case.

Mr. STEVENS: It was an individual case, was it not, not a question of principle?

Mr. MAYHEW: It is not an individual case when thousands of investigations are going on at the present time throughout Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: It sounded like it.

Mr. O'NEILL: I believe the income tax is one of the fairest taxes that we have in Canada because it is collected from people who are best able to pay. In my opinion one of the great troubles is that too much of the wealth is in too few hands. This schedule of income taxes goes up one per cent per $1,000 until 18 per cent is reached, and then it refers one to chapter 41 for the taxes on the higher incomes. If the schedule is correct that far, why should there be any change? If it is not correct in the lower brackets, why not change the income tax set-up and have it right from the start? The increase in taxation should continue right from the start. In other words, when you reach a certain income there should be 100 per cent tax.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the item carry?

Mr. O'NEILL: Is that an unreasonable or unfair question?

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not know the hon. gentleman was asking a question; I thought he was making a suggestion. I can tell him that there are persons in Canada who, if they were situated in a certain way, would have to pay the whole of their income in taxes.

Mr. O'NEILL: What amount of income is that?

Mr. ILSLEY: Is that not a question which should be asked privately?

Mr. O'NEILL: I am sorry if I asked an unfair question or a question which should not be asked here. It seems to me that if this schedule is right at the start there is no reason why it should not continue right along from there. If the schedule is wrong at the start, it should be corrected. There should be no difference between the low paid man and the high paid man.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is any information available as to the income taxes paid by any group of taxpayers according to the size of their incomes?

Mr. ILSLEY: Will the hon. gentleman allow that question to stand?

Item stands.

Progress reported.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORT RESPECTING ORGANIZATION AND RECLASSIFICATION OF PERMANENT STAFF

The house having reverted to the order for motions.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr.

Ilsley), that the report of the civil service commission in respect of the organization and reclassification of the permanent staff of the House of Commons, together with resolution of the commissioners of internal economy, laid on the table of the house on March 20, 1939, be approved. I am told it is important that this should go through to-day.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the significance of this report? We ought to know what we are voting on.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is no increase. As a matter of fact, there is a decrease of a little more than $2,000 over last year by reason of the fact that one employee has not been replaced and another one has been retired. This is just for the purpose of adjusting the salaries and paying the proper compensation for the same amount of work. It was approved by the commissioners of internal economy, and it has to go through the house.

Motion agreed to.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, March 27, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING COMMITTEES

CIVIL SERVICE—CHANGE IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Howard be substituted for that of Mr. Deachman on the select special committee of the house appointed to inquire into the operation of the Civil Service Act, and all matters pertaining thereto.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING ORDERS—CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (Huron-Perth) presented the third report of the standing committee on standing orders, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

VALIDITY OF ALBERTA STATUTES

TABLING OF RECOMMENDATION OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE AND CERTAIN ORDERS IN COUNCIL RESPECTING FIVE ACTS

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I wish to table copy of a recommendation by the Minister of Justice and two orders in council concerning five acts of the legislature of Alberta, copies of which were received by the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) on the 23rd day of April, 1938.

CARRIAGE BY AIR

BILL TO GIVE EFFECT TO WARSAW CONVENTION OF OCTOBER 12, 1929

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 61, to give effect to a convention for the unification of certain rules relating to international carriage by air, to make provision for applying the rules contained in the said convention, subject to exceptions, adaptations and modifications, to carriage by air which is not international carriage within the meaning of the convention, and for purposes connected therewith.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. HOWE: The purpose of this bill is to give effect to the convention adopted at Warsaw, in 1929 to unify the rules for international carriage of goods and passengers by air. This convention has been adopted by Great Britain, Ireland, the United States, Mexico and practically all European countries. In view of the increase in international carriage by air it is felt that Canada should ratify this convention. The bill provides that in addition to governing international carriage by air the provisions of the Warsaw convention can by order in council be applied to carriage by air within Canada. The bill also provides for limitation of liability for loss of passengers and baggage.

Mr. CAHAN: Have copies of the Warsaw convention ever been distributed to members of the house?

Mr. HOWE: I do not know as to that, but if not, I shall be glad to see that it is done.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

INSURANCE CLAIMS—WEIGH-OVER IN TERMINAL ELEVATORS — GRAIN STANDARDS COMMITTEES — GENERAL REVISION

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 62, to amend the Canada Grain Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. EULER: This bill proposes a pretty general revision of the grain act. It involves some seventy amendments. Most of these merely provide for changes in the method of procedure or something of the kind. I could give a fuller explanation if it were desired at this time, but in view of the fact that it is proposed that the bill be referred to a committee, probably the standing committee on agriculture, I suggest it can be more fully discussed there, especially since members of the board of grain commissioners will be present, and possibly others may be heard as well.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

POWERS OF BOARD RESPECTING THE MARKETING OF WHEAT—INITIAL PAYMENT OF 60 CENTS A BUSHEL

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 63, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935.

Mr. STEVENS: Explain.

Mr. EULER: This bill provides for the repeal of that part of the wheat board act which gives power to the board to make an initial payment to the producers of wheat, and substitute therefor a paragraph which gives power to the wheat board to make an initial payment of sixty cents a bushel for No. 1 northern, basis Fort William. The participation feature remains in the act. A proper conception of the implications and merits of the bill can, I think, best be obtained in conjunction with certain other legislation which is to be introduced by my colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

Mr. MANION: Will this bill go before a committee also?

Mr. EULER: I do not know that that has been decided upon.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS

ANCIENT FORESTERS' MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. OLOF HANSON (Skeena, for Mr. Cleaver) moved the first reading of Bill No. 55 (from the senate) to change the name of Ancient Foresters' Mutual Life Insurance Company to Toronto Mutual Life Insurance Company.

Mr. LOCKHART: May we have an explanation of this?

Mr. SPEAKER: In the absence of the hon. member who sponsors it, the bill stands.

Motion stands.

SENATE BILL—FIRST READING

Bill No. 56 to incorporate the Associated Canadian Travellers—Mr. McPhee.

COMBINES AND TRUSTS—COST OF LIVING

Mr. CHURCH:

What action is the Department of Labour taking with respect to the present high cost of living in Canada to the working classes of the country with a view of reducing the same or controlling combines, trusts, and combinations in restraint of trade in Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Present activities under the Combines Investigation Act include prosecution of an alleged tobacco combine and investigations into alleged combines in fruits and vegetables and shipping containers and other products. Inquiries regarding leaf tobacco and other products are pending, and attention is being given to bread and coal. Other inquiries will be made as applications are received.

CANADIAN FEDERATION OF LABOUR

Mr. NEILL:

1. In 1937, did the Canadian Federation of Labour invite the Department of Labour to examine its records of membership?

2. If so, was such an examination made, and by whom?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): In the spring of 1937, following a conference between the acting deputy minister and other officers of the Department of Labour and the secretary-treasurer of the Canadian Federation of Labour, Mr. D. J. Sutherland of the departmental staff, on invitation of the said secretary-treasurer of the Canadian Federation of Labour, visited the head office of that organization in Ottawa and was shown certain statements of membership claimed by the organization together with certain duplicate bank deposit slips, but no examination of the records of the organization was conducted by Mr. Sutherland to establish the correctness of those statements.

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH GERMANY

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the attention of the government been called to the withdrawal from Berlin of the British and United States ambassadors?

2. Has Canada any commercial agents in Germany? If so, where, and who are they?

3. In view of question No. 1, will the government call home these commercial agents at once from Germany, so that the world will know Canada's opinion of Germany's actions?

4. Will the government give consideration to writing into the present United States-Canada treaty a clause that the favoured nations provisos shall not apply to Germany?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Yes.

2. The Canadian government trade commissioner, J. C. Macgillivray, Berlin.

3. The British and United States ambassadors have been called home to London and Washington, respectively, to report on the political situation. In both cases, the embassies are carrying on as usual, in Berlin, under a charge d'affaires. Trade Commissioners are not appointed to deal with political questions and the possibility of similar action does not arise.

4. It would not be possible to deal with such a question by an amendment to the United States-Canada trade treaty.

ST. HYACINTHE, QUE., CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

Mr. FONTAINE:

What were the revenues of the customs and excise office at Saint Hyacinthe, province of Quebec, during each of the years from 1928 to 1938, inclusive?

Mr. ILSLEY:

Fiscal year
1927-28	$895,223 67
1928-29	306,710 83
1929-30	365,641 36
1930-31	206,021 93
1931-32	299,555 18
1932-33	279,665 37

CANADIAN NATIONALS IN GERMANY—QUESTION OF RECOGNITION OF GERMAN CONQUESTS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many Canadian nationals of German extraction in December, January and February, last, asked for passports to visit Germany or to go through other European countries to go to Germany?

[Mr. McKinnon.]

2. What is the purpose of their visits abroad?

3. Will the government enforce the Foreign Enlistment Act if these are going to enlist in Germany or for German aggression?

4. Will any amendments be made to existing statute law to prevent these migrants ever returning to Canada in the future at any time?

5. Has Canada recognized or been asked to recognize the illegal conquest by force by Germany of Czecho-Slovakia, Austria, the Rhine, Hungary and other nearby nations contrary to international law and treaties?

6. Will any correspondence in relation thereto be tabled?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. In the months of December, January and February, last, 72 Canadian nationals, apparently of German extraction, were accorded passport facilities for visits abroad, including Germany. Of these 72 Canadians, 41 were men, 17 women and 14 children. Of the 41 men, 7 were under the age of 30.

2. In all but two cases the purpose of the journey was stated to be "making a visit." One applicant stated that he desired to reside permanently and another that he was travelling on business.

3. There is no indication that the hypothetical case set forth in the question has arisen. If it had arisen, the Foreign Enlistment Act would not be applicable, in the present situation.

4. No occasion has arisen for legislative action and no amendments to existing statute laws are in contemplation. If an occasion arose, it could be adequately dealt with under existing legislation.

5. As regards Austria, there has been de facto recognition of German sovereignty, on the part of Canada as of other countries. No action has been taken as regards Czecho-Slovakia.

No information has been received with regard to the conquest by Germany of the Rhine or of Hungary.

6. It is not the present intention to table correspondence in relation to these matters.

PROTESTS AGAINST CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN FOREIGN CONFLICT

Mr. GARIEPY:

1. Has the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, or the government, received from nine societies a telegram expressing absolute opposition of the population of the province of Quebec to Canada's participation in a foreign conflict, such societies being: the St. Jean Baptiste Society of Montreal, in the name of the St.

Jean Baptiste Societies of Quebec and Ontario; La Ligue d'Action Nationale; the Catholic Farmers Union; the French Canadian Young Patriots; the Canadian Confederation of Catholic Workers; the central council of the National Catholic Syndicates of Montreal; the Alliance of Catholic Professions of Montreal; the Catholic Association of French Canadian Youth (A.C.J.C.)?

2. If so, what answer has been given to that telegram?

3. Is it the intention of the government to lay both the telegram and the answer before the house for consideration?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A copy of the telegram referred to, and the reply to the same, are as follows:

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

RADIO BROADCASTING—PROGRAMS SPONSORED BY QUEBEC BREWERIES OR WINERIES

Mr. HOWE: The correspondence asked for is exceedingly voluminous. Had the hon. member been here I would have suggested that he allow this notice of motion to stand and that he visit the broadcasting corporation and select the pertinent material. I am also going to suggest that as the regulation referred to has been varied, possibly he would now wish to drop the motion.

Motion stands.

L. H. BEER

Mr. STEVENS:

For a copy of the order in council appointing the late L. H. Beer, salvage officer, together with a statement showing the duties performed by the said appointee.

Mr. STEVENS: I would suggest that this motion be dropped.

Motion dropped.

INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS, CANADIAN AND EMPIRE DEFENCE

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all telegrams, agreements, orders in council, letters, cables and other documents exchanged between the government of Great Britain and the government of Canada, with reference to international affairs, defence and empire defence, during the years 1938 and 1939, including all documents in relation thereto since the last white paper was issued by the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, the tabling of all communications between the government of Great Britain and the government of Canada with reference to international affairs and defence during the years 1938 and 1939 would of course require the consent of the government of the United Kingdom. Such consent would not be given for the publication at the present time of documents containing references to the position and attitude of other countries, and the Canadian government would not consider it reasonable to request it.

TELEPHONE RATES AND TOLLS INQUIRY

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all letters, correspondence, orders in council, telegrams, resolutions and other documents exchanged between the government of Canada or the Minister of Transport, or any officer, the board of transport commissioners, and the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, regarding an inquiry into the reduction of telephone rates and tolls in Canada, showing what action has been taken and when; what hearing there has been or witnesses examined, and including a copy of information given to the acting minister, the Honourable Mr. Ilsley by the department in the matter, as announced by the said acting minister in the house on Wednesday, March 22.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER AS TO FURTHER LEGISLATION—DISCUSSION ON EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—EASTER RECESS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) asked me last week if I would indicate to the house what further legislation would likely be brought down during the present session. I intimated to my hon. friend that I would endeavour to do so to-day.

Hon. members will have noticed that since the question was addressed to the government a number of measures have been added to the order paper, and on the order paper of to-day, under introduction of bills and government orders, will be found most of the legislation remaining to be dealt with at the present session. So far as I have been able to ascertain, the following are the only additional bills likely to be introduced:

Bills respecting: Live stock and live stock products; cheese and cheese factory improvement; agricultural products cooperative marketing; cattle and beef marketing.

A possible amendment to the Dairy Industry Act.

A bill providing for the constitution of a salt fish board.

Two minor amendments to the Meat and Canned Foods Act.

A bill respecting official secrets.

A bill making provision for the sealing of royal instruments.

Certain amendments to the criminal code.

Probably a bill concerning the office of Chief Justice of Canada.

Possible amendments to the National Revenue Act.

A bill respecting the Toronto harbour commissioners.

[Mr. Church.]

A bill to give effect to the provisions of a convention with the United States providing for emergency regulations of the level of Rainy lake and other boundary waters.

A government bill respecting interest on small loans will be introduced in the senate. Other measures from the Department of Finance include a bill to create a mortgage rediscount bank, a Canadian National railway financing and guarantee bill, and a bill to amend the Gold Clause Act.

It is necessary to mention, in addition, possible legislation in the nature of amendments to existing acts arising out of the budget; possible minor amendments to some other existing acts, and such legislation as may arise out of the recommendations of special standing committees. There are also the supplementary estimates.

I think that gives the program very completely. Something may arise of which I have not knowledge at the moment, but so far as I have been able to ascertain, the house now has before it the legislative program for the remainder of the session.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): The program certainly seems a fairly liberal one, using the word not in its political sense. I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman if he will state what day is likely to be set aside for the discussion of the international crises through which we have passed since last September. A week or two ago I believe the right hon. gentleman told one of the members from Toronto, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), that he would deal with the matter shortly, and I should be glad if he would inform the house when he is likely to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope to be able to make a statement concerning external affairs which will take in the matters to which my hon. friend has referred and, in a comprehensive way, other matters which I think hon. members will wish to discuss under that heading, some day this week. I should like to be able to promise it for Wednesday, but I think it may be Thursday, and I may even have to wait until next week. If I can possibly manage it I shall have a statement ready for Thursday of this week.

Mr. MANION: If I may be permitted, I think Wednesday would be a bad day, because I expect that a number of hon. members will wish to take part in the discussion, and on a Wednesday they would not have an opportunity to do so. The day selected should be a full day.

If I might ask one further question, has the right hon. gentleman given any thought to the question of the length of the Easter adjournment, which will take place within a week or ten days?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have given some thought to it. Frankly, if it were desired by hon. members generally to have quite a short recess, in view of the possibility of hastening the work of the session, the government would propose that we adjourn on the Thursday night before Good Friday and resume on Tuesday. Unless I receive some indication to the contrary, I will place a motion to that effect on the order paper.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the leader of the opposition tell the house what matters are particularly interesting the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey)?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

WAYS AND MEANS

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On schedule I:

Customs tariff—ex 520. Raw cotton and cotton linters not further manufactured than ginned; waste wholly of cotton unfit for use without further manufacture: free.

Mr. HARRIS: Would the minister be good enough to give the imports under this item, which I think he will agree are very heavy? Further, how much of this $22,000,000 of imports comes in from the United States, how much from Egypt, how much if any from India; and does the excise tax provision apply on the imports—

Mr. DUNNING: Let me give the figures first.

Mr. HARRIS: I thought one statement might cover the whole question.

Mr. DUNNING: In 1938 our total imports of raw cotton, not further manufactured than ginned, were valued at $17,400,000, in round figures. Of that amount $58,000 worth came from the United Kingdom, $16,900,000 worth from the United States, $378,000 worth from Egypt and $42,000 worth from British India. Also under this item we imported cotton linters, not further manufactured than ginned, to a total value of $414,000, of which $395,000 worth came from the United States.

Mr. HARRIS: That covers my first question. My second question is this: Is excise tax ordinarily applied on the imports from Egypt.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS: And an excise tax of three per cent against the very heavy importations valued at $16,900,000 from the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS: There is no excise tax on the imports from British India?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. HARRIS: The observations I wish to make at this time are somewhat similar to those which have been made. In this instance they apply more particularly to the excise tax, and to loss of revenue which will result to Canada from the passing of the legislation. We will relieve the Canadian importer from paying the three per cent excise tax on imports valued at $16,900,000. In other words, Canada has made a trade gift of a half a million dollars on this particular item.

Mr. DUNNING: To whom?

Mr. HARRIS: Both ways, but much more so to the impoverishment of the Canadian treasury. In charge of that treasury at the present time is an administration following in the footsteps of the Fielding Liberals, who for years enunciated in the house the doctrine of revenue taxation with which to run the country. To my mind this half million dollars on cotton could be considered a tax of a kind which would meet with the approval of the Fielding Liberals, who believed they must have revenue from taxation of this kind rather than give tariff protection. I admit there is an element of protection in that three per cent, and I admit what is in the mind of the minister right now, that cotton goods might eventually cost the Canadian consumer a little less—but not a great deal.

As to the other question I had in mind, I doubt very much whether I shall receive an answer to it. I say that because now we have the spectacle of the Minister of Trade and Commerce handling the section of the treaty which has to do with the concessions the United States have given us—I use the word "concessions" because the Prime Minister used it. The Minister of Finance has to answer for the so-called concessions we have given to the United States. Even though the dollar value in straight duty concessions is two to one against us, when we come to consider the free items we find that there will be far less revenue to the dominion treasury after the excise tax provision is done away with. I have studied the many answers which have been given, but still I cannot see what concessions Canada has received to offset the eventual removal of the three per cent excise tax in respect of these free items. I do not know what we are going to get back for the half million dollars we are giving with this particular concession. I know what the minister's answer will be, but I want to discharge my responsibility and to go on record as saying that this is a departure from the tariff-for-revenue policy, which was part and parcel of the 1919 platform of the Liberal party. It will make it more difficult for those who follow the Minister of Finance in years to come to balance the budget. I do not know of any provision which has been made to balance the equation with Egypt on the one hand and to assist the British empire trade from India on the other. To my mind the three per cent narrowed the preference with British India, which is really an evasion of the spirit of the 1932 trade agreement. This is another one of the trade gifts from the treasury of Canada which in the aggregate will amount to a million dollars a month.

Mr. DUNNING: My answer as to cotton is that this concession from the treasury is a concession to the Canadian consumer. Cotton is not produced in Canada. There is no element of protection whatsoever in the item as it now stands. The dropping of the three per cent on this item will therefore be considered a concession by those who use cotton.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the minister received any protests from manufacturers of clothing and other articles in connection with this particular item?

Mr. MacNICOL: Protests at the present time are wholly useless.

Mr. DUNNING: I have no recollection of any protest. I have asked if my officers have any recollection of any, and they say they have not.

Mr. HEAPS: I have had some.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no change in the item of course.

Mr. HEAPS: There is a change in item 548, then.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, we have not come to that yet.

Mr. HEAPS: They are so nearly similar, one might make a mistake.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps the hon. member would make his observations on item 548.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—532a. Handkerchiefs, wholly of cotton: 30 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—548. Clothing, wearing apparel and articles, made from woven fabrics, and all textile manufactures, wholly or partially manufactured, composed wholly or in part of vegetable fibres but not containing wool, n.o.p.; fabrics, coated or impregnated, composed wholly or in part of vegetable fibres but not containing silk, artificial silk nor wool, n.o.p.: 30 per cent.

Mr. HEAPS: Perhaps I could again put the question I put before.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not remember any protests made in connection with this item. There may have been the odd one, but there was nothing that impressed itself on my mind.

Mr. HEAPS: I received protests from both organizations and manufacturers with regard to this item.

Mr. DUNNING: In connection with what products?

Mr. HEAPS: Ladies' dresses.

Mr. DUNNING: That is number 567. We are on 548, diapers and collars and cuffs.

Mr. COLDWELL: These items deal with various types of textile goods, do they not?

Mr. DUNNING: We are now on the textile schedule of the tariff.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to protest against the tariff on textiles.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. COLDWELL: Two or three years ago a royal commission inquired into the textile industry, and the revelations then made were such as to warrant this committee examining into the whole basis of the industry in relation to the protection it receives. I submit that I speak for a large number of people who have to buy textiles. During the past few years I have had the opportunity from time to time of comparing the prices of goods of similar kind and quality on both sides of the international boundary. For instance, take overalls, something which affects nearly every workingman.

Mr. MacNICOL: He cannot buy them if he has no money in his pocket.

Mr. COLDWELL: He cannot buy them if he has no money in his pocket, but the purchasing power of the people who happen to have some money in their pockets is seriously cut down by the duties imposed on articles such as this.

Mr. DUNNING: It is difficult to generalize in connection with textiles, because each of these items really stands on its own feet. We cannot generalize with respect to the rates of duty applicable; they vary widely. If my hon. friend wishes to talk about overalls, it would facilitate the discussion if he would wait until the overall item is under consideration.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have endeavoured to facilitate the business of the committee by not rising as each item came up.

Mr. DUNNING: I have no complaint at all.

Mr. COLDWELL: I could have risen on any number of items. If the minister wishes, I can rise and say something on each item. I wanted to refer to that particular case, and I realize it is not covered by this item. We pay from $2 to $3 for a suit of overalls, and I have seen the same type and quality of garment being sold on the other side for from $1 to $1.25. As a matter of fact, I have a suit of overalls which I bought across the line for comparative purposes which cost me 69 cents for the pants and 69 cents for the smock. These are matters of concern to the people of Canada. There are those of us who feel that this industry has extracted large sums of money from the people by way of increased prices under a protective tariff. I do not want to discuss this matter at length, but I wish to protest on behalf of the people whom I represent in this parliament.

Mr. HOMUTH: Hon. members rise to discuss textiles generally, but they forget that there are many kinds of textiles. For instance, there are woollen textiles, worsted textiles, cotton textiles, rayon textiles and many other types. Because certain things were brought out by the Turgeon commission there has been a general condemnation of the textile industry. If hon. members will examine the financial statements of the woollen textile industry they will find that many of the claims made against that industry on the floor of this house have been absolutely without foundation. The fact of the matter is that during the worst years of the depression the woollen textile industry proved to be the greatest boon in the matter of employment. In spite of the protection they received, the products of this industry were purchased by the consumer of Canada at a lower price than they had in twenty-five years, a condition which was brought about by internal competition in the industry. When we are dealing with textiles we should be fair and discuss the particular category to which we wish to refer. To-day the woollen industry is suffering seriously as the result of importations. Sixty-four per cent of all woollen worsteds used last year were imported.

Mr. DUNNING: May I suggest to my hon. friend that he follow his own suggestion? We are on a cotton item. While his remarks would be very effective on a woollen item, I think he would be the first to recognize that there is a great difference between the different branches of the textile industry. I suggest that he defer his most useful remarks until we get to woollens.

Mr. HOMUTH: If hon. members who stand in their places and condemn the textile industry would give a little thought and study to the Turgeon commission report, they would realize that there are various categories into which that industry is divided.

Mr. COLDWELL: I waited to discuss this particular matter until we reached an item containing the words "not containing wool."

Mr. CAHAN: What are the importations under this item?

Mr. DUNNING: They are under a number of heads.

Mr. CAHAN: Could I also have the volume?

Mr. DUNNING: The importations from the United States last year of collars and cuffs of vegetable fibre amounted to 60 pounds, and were valued at $117. The importations from the United States of diapers, quilts and counterpanes of vegetable fibre amounted to 10,800 pounds, valued at $6,900; fabrics, coated or impregnated, of vegetable fibres, n.o.p., imports from the United States, 67,000 pounds, valued at $33,000; clothing and wearing apparel of vegetable fibres, imports from the United States, 30,000 pounds, valued at $55,800; textile manufactures of vegetable fibres, imports from the United States, 491,900 pounds, valued at $292,000.

That completes the item. We have also some exports under that item, but I suppose my hon. friend is not interested in the exports.

Mr. CAHAN: Not at present, but I am interested in following up the figures the minister has given me. I endeavoured to locate certain figures in the current trade returns, but it was impossible for me to ascertain from that source either the volume or the value. Has the minister any computation of the volume of domestic production from vegetable fibres?

Mr. DUNNING: Unfortunately we cannot separate them. The only one that is separated in the bureau of statistics is cotton. That leaves jute, wool, silk and artificial silk all together.

Mr. CAHAN: Can the minister give an approximate estimate of the value of importations of products of vegetable fibres, and of the value of the production in Canada? I am simply anxious to ascertain whether the importation is sufficiently large to prejudice the production here. Or is it of such a nature as merely to ensure competition which will serve to limit prices rather than to curtail the volume of domestic production?

Mr. DUNNING: On that particular item I would answer in the affirmative, but I can have the totals of each one of these items of Canadian production made up. It will take a little time, but I will give my hon. friend the information when I get it.

Mr. CAHAN: I still think it would help us very much if we had the import figures and the value. The Minister of Finance has given us a tabular statement of rates, but it is almost impossible for an hon. member to compute the volume, as the minister would admit, if he saw the computations which I have made and appreciated the time I have spent going through the entire tariff and trade returns to get the information. It requires a great deal of labour. I think a member of the house should be spared that extraordinary work when the minister and his officers have in their hands a complete statement with regard to the several classifications and the imports under those classifications.

Mr. DUNNING: I can only say that I come here with five complete bound volumes of various kinds of information which I and my officers think may be asked for, and which include such separations as we are able to get from the bureau of statistics. I did not arrange to have included even in my own notes the totals under these items, because you cannot add silk and cotton together and make it mean anything. That is the real trouble.

Mr. CAHAN: No, I was not asking for that. I was dealing with vegetable fibres and products manufactured from vegetable fibres.

Mr. DUNNING: We shall see what we can get.

Mr. CAHAN: The minister knows that for the province of Quebec the production of manufactures of vegetable fibres is very important indeed. I am not going to enter upon a discussion of textiles, but I would say to my western friends that there must be give and take in imposing a general tariff, and I am sure if they will look into the facts they will not agree to wiping out an industry which gives the greatest amount of employment of any single industry in a great province like Quebec.

Mr. HARRIS: I should like to add a word to what the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has just said. The imports under this particular item of wearing apparel made from vegetable fibres were, in 1935, $254,000, and that increased in the year just closed, 1937, to $396,000. Taking the preceding item, the imports of cotton clothing and cotton textile manufactures increased from $589,000 in 1935 to $980,000 in 1937; imports of fabrics wholly of cotton increased from $520,000, in 1935, to $992,000 in 1937; imports of woven fabrics wholly of cotton, bleached or mercerized, increased from $889,000, in 1935, to $1,438,000 in 1937; and the imports under item ex 523, woven fabrics wholly of cotton, not bleached, increased from $512,000, in 1935, to $1,341,000 in 1937. That is to say, the imports under each item almost doubled since 1935.

My reason for rising at this time is again to point out that this is an industry which was reestablished at the so-called Bennett emergency session of parliament, and the return brought down by the national employment commission reflects the effects in increased employment of the measure of protection embodied in that legislation. If one looks at the returns of the national employment commission and takes into consideration the average increase of population, which since 1929 has been 9·96 per cent, one observes that there is an increase of 11,234 people employed in the textile industry over the number employed previously to the implementing of the legislation which was passed at that emergency session.

Mr. CAHAN: That many more people are employed in factories?

Mr. HARRIS: Yes, in textile factories. I am taking the figures in the Purvis report under the heading of Fibres, Textiles and Their Products. When you consider the increase in population, which is taken on a basis of ten per cent in ten years, you find that there are 11,234 more people working in the textile industry to-day than were employed in that industry prior to the enactment of the 1930 legislation.

Of all the things Canada needs at the present time it is that we should all get together, entirely apart from political considerations, and see if we cannot get our people back to work. Here is an outstanding example of an industry in which close to 12,000 more of our Canadian people are being employed. I have every sympathy with the consumer in the cost of this material. I know the consumer is very much concerned. Any one of us, if forced to do it, could make observations from the point of view taken by my hon. friend who has just left the chamber; but should we not, Mr. Chairman, have as our first consideration the fact that a great number of our people in Canada are now unemployed, that 157,000 are now looking for jobs? Twenty thousand have been taken care of by primary industry in its expansion, I will admit; but there has been a shrinkage of 157,000 in the number of people engaged in secondary industry. Here is one of the very few major secondary industries in this country in which there has been a substantial improvement in employment since 1930.

Then we come to the 1935 agreement, and we see an increase in the importations, which, I think the Minister of Finance will agree, have practically doubled in the last three years, the real reason being the 1935 agreement. Now we have consummated another trade agreement which went into effect on January 1, 1939, and if we add the cumulative effects of the last three years to what is going to take place in the next three, it is difficult to come to the conclusion that there will be any real expansion of employment in this country. My main point is that these three very important departments, labour, commerce and finance, do not seem to be characterized by any cohesion or cooperation or correlation with respect to unemployment. In spite of the Turgeon report and the free trade philosophy enunciated at the present time, I still believe that we should look at this matter from a business point of view and endeavour to do everything we can to extend the possibilities of employment in Canada.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 552. Felt, splint for use in making moulded splints for medical purposes, 10 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 553. Household blankets, wholly of cotton, not to include horse blankets, automobile or steamer rugs, or similar articles: 20 per cent and 5 cents per pound.

Mr. CAHAN: What is the production in Canada, and what was the importation last year?

Mr. DUNNING: This is only blankets of cotton. The imports from the United States last year were $1,500 in value. The last complete year for which we have production is 1936, and our home production was then $1,849,000.

Mr. HOMUTH: Were there any imports of cotton blankets from Japan?

Mr. DUNNING: No. The total imports from all countries last year were only $3,000.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 555. Clothing, being women's and children's outer garments, wholly or in part of wool or similar animal fibres, but of which the component of chief value is not silk nor artificial silk: 32½ per cent.

Mr. HOMUTH: This item has to do with cloth of which wool is one of the contents.

Mr. DUNNING: Outer garments made from wool, not the cloth itself.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is more serious, because if the cloth comes in we have at least the privilege of manufacturing it into outer garments. In the factories of the United States, not only in the large clothing factories but in smaller industries, they run nine or ten months on their own production and then, in order to keep their organizations complete, they go ahead and manufacture for the foreign market. We find it in many lines, in toys and in other things that are dumped into the Canadian market. We cannot prove that these things are dumped because they can show that they are willing to sell the products at the same price in the United States. But every time we lower the tariff on something that is turned out by mass production in the United States, we once more add to the unemployment situation in Canada. Take worsted and many other cloths made in the United States and you will find that they are all inferior to and of less weight per yard than the same goods produced here. You have an inferior article. We are faced with tremendous competition from Great Britain in the woollen industry, and this item will extend that competition to the garment industry of Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: I must give information on this item because I am quite sure the hon. member does not desire to paint the picture of the woollen clothing industry darker than it really is. The fact is that our total imports from all countries under this item in 1938 were $265,000, whereas in 1936 our home production, taken from the Women's Factory Clothing Industry, the standard publication for the trade, was $17,799,000. It is very difficult for me to see how imports of $265,000 could cause any appreciable amount of unemployment in an industry whose home production is nearly $18,000,000.

Mr. CAHAN: I doubt whether these computations are made on the same basis.

Mr. DUNNING: I have gone carefully over every item. Pyjamas might not be an outer garment, but the volume of importation would not seriously affect the result. Bathrobes might not be an outer garment, and you could take $300,000 off for that. These are woollen bathrobes.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not dispute that computation, but I dispute the computation which the minister cited in referring to the same items when dealing with the production in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: They are positively under the same tariff item; I can vouch for that.

Mr. HOMUTH: They may be under the same tariff item, but I do not think there is any country in the world better able than the United States to work cotton and rayon into cloth.

Mr. DUNNING: I am speaking of wool only.

Mr. ISNOR: Will the hon. member mention some of the items manufactured wholly from wool in the United States and exported into Canada in large quantities?

Mr. CAHAN: We are dealing with item ex 555, wholly or in part of wool.

Mr. DUNNING: That brings it into the wool category.

Mr. HOMUTH: I repeat that no country in the world is better able than the United States to work cotton into cloth. I could show the house knitted goods which an expert might be expected to describe as wholly of wool, yet when you examine them you find that they contain a large percentage of vegetable fibre. The United States manufacturers are experts at making up cheap cloth that has a very presentable appearance. It is not a question of what has come in; the point is that we are constantly tinkering with the tariff and endangering the jobs of Canadian workmen. We have made an appreciable reduction. I realize that protest is of no avail, because the treaty is in force, but it shows that in these various items we are jeopardizing the jobs of a great many people engaged in the textile and woollen industry of Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: I must object to that as applying to the item before us. I shall try to give information on each item as we come to it in order that the committee may judge, but as far as United States exports to Canada under this item are concerned, I may say that the United Kingdom beat them, because only $82,000 came into this country from the United States as against $159,000 from the United Kingdom.

Mr. HOMUTH: But you are making it possible for a lot more to come in.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Do you want more than thirty-two per cent protection?

Mr. HOMUTH: During the years from 1930 on, the Canadian people purchased woollens cheaper as a result of internal competition within Canada, and employment was given to the greatest number of people engaged in any single secondary industry, than at any other time in the previous thirty years.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): And they sold their wool, farm products, labour and everything else they had to put on the market at very much lower prices, in some cases lower than had been received for such goods over a period of four hundred years.

Mr. HEAPS: It is obvious that if this tariff were twice as high there would still be a certain amount of finished material coming into this country, just as there are people who purchase particular brands of clothing or shoes made abroad, irrespective of price. I could mention coats made in England which people prefer to buy by name. I believe that at present there is comparatively little finished clothing coming into Canada, because generally speaking the Canadian manufacturers in this industry have fairly high protection, and with the internal competition they are able to compete in price and quality with goods from other parts of the world.

Mr. MacNICOL: What quantity of goods under this item came in free under the $100 exemption? I suppose the answer should include the series, ex 555, ex 567 and ex 567a.

Mr. DUNNING: As to all kinds of clothing —that is, through the whole textile schedule, wool, silk, rayon, cotton or any combination of them—the nearest figure we have is about $3,500,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: That would be for eight months?

Mr. DUNNING: For eleven months.

Mr. COLDWELL: How much woollen clothing is taken back by visitors from the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid I cannot answer that.

Mr. COLDWELL: We should look at both sides.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is only one side as far as wheat is concerned.

Mr. DUNNING: To the best of my knowledge the United States authorities do not make a record of it themselves.

Mr. LENNARD: Have the government in their employ experts who can determine the amount of wool or cotton in garments being shipped in? Is an inspection made?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Try and get any by without putting it under the highest schedule they can classify it under.

Mr. LENNARD: Regularly?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, at ports of entry.

Mr. LENNARD: Are they men who are highly competent in regard to textiles, or just someone picked up and given a two weeks' course?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are pretty good.

Mr. LENNARD: I do not want to hold up this item, but could the minister give me further information by letter some time as to who these men are and where they received their instruction?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I can get that information.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 567. Clothing and wearing apparel, n.o.p., made from woven fabrics of which silk is the component of chief value: 30 per cent.

Customs tariff—ex 567a. Clothing and wearing apparel, n.o.p., made from woven fabrics of which the component of chief value is artificial silk or similar synthetic fibres produced by chemical processes: 32½ per cent.

Mr. HEAPS: I should now like to ask the minister the question I asked on the previous item. I think this takes in ladies' dresses made of artificial silk.

Mr. DUNNING: Under ex 567a our imports of artificial silk clothing and wearing apparel from the United States last year were $214,000. Our total exports were $1,870,000.

Mr. CAHAN: Is that exports to the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: They were very small.

Mr. HOMUTH: We could not get them in there.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, we have a little; we sent to the United States $12,000 worth.

Mr. HEAPS: What was our total production?

Mr. DUNNING: The total production was $22,000,000.

Mr. HEAPS: Perhaps the minister can inform me if the information that has come to me is correct. I understand that when the duties were reduced on the finished product there was not a corresponding reduction in duty on the fabric that goes into the making of the dresses, with the result that certain manufacturers find it cheaper to import the finished product from the United States than to produce it in their own factories. I was told of two factories which have recently gone into the importing of the finished product because of the relatively higher cost of the fabric. Quite a number of girls who were employed in factories making these dresses have been laid off, and the owners of the factories have purchased the finished goods in the United States. Was there a corresponding decrease in the duty on the fabrics when the duty on the finished dresses was reduced?

Mr. DUNNING: Not in this case, no. The point is that the United States is not the principal source of supply.

Mr. HEAPS: I believe the United States is one of the principal sources of supply so far as the fabrics are concerned.

Mr. HOMUTH: No, not the fabrics.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. HEAPS: The owners of these factories have told me themselves that when they produce these goods they work on such a narrow margin that even a three or four per cent reduction is very important to them. The minister pointed out that they were able to export over $1,000,000 worth of that class of goods, indicating the efficiency of the industry; in fact they actually export these dresses to Great Britain and can compete with goods produced there. There may be some unfairness in the application of this tariff when the duty on the finished product is reduced without a corresponding reduction on imported material entering into the manufacture of the product.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Would similar goods imported from Japan come under the same rate of duty? What was the amount of the importation from Japan?

Mr. DUNNING: Last year, $9,800.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister has not answered the point I raised, whether he does not think it is unfair to the manufacturers of this class of goods when the import duties on dresses are reduced and a corresponding reduction is not made on fabrics entering into their production.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not speak of that because this agreement does not deal with the fabrics. The fabrics were not discussed between the two countries because, as I pointed out, the United States is not the principal source of supply, although it is an important source. I have before me a request from the garment manufacturers for reduction of the duty on fabrics. I intend to consider it budgetwise. I should not like to give the slightest indication that there is any likelihood of any change in that or any other item of the budget at this moment. The question is not nearly so simple, however, as my hon. friend states it. A number of considerations of very grave importance arise in connection with it, as I think everyone who has had experience with the fabric items will be aware.

Mr. HOMUTH: Would the minister give us the rate of duty on these articles entering the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; 45 cents per pound plus 65 per cent.

Mr. CAHAN: That is reciprocity with a vengeance.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 568. Knitted garments, n.o.p.: 35 per cent.

Customs tariff—568a. Socks and stockings: (ii) N.o.p.: 20 per cent and, per dozen pairs, $1.

Mr. SENN: I should like to express the hope—I might call it the pious hope—that the government has now completed all the tariff tinkering it is going to do in regard to these items and, in fact, in regard to the whole woollen schedule. I intend to outline to the committee, if I may, the changes which have occurred during the past three or four years, since the present government took office, concerning these two items in particular and all woollen items generally. First, however, I should like to make some reference to what has been referred to already, the action that was taken in setting up what is known as the Turgeon commission to investigate the textile industry.

This commission went into a good many of our towns and investigated a number of our textile concerns. Unfortunately, while I believe it was set up as a fact finding commission, at times the attitude of commission counsel was such as to approach what might be called persecution in regard to these different industries.

Mr. HOMUTH: Political persecution.

Mr. SENN: Yes, political persecution, if you want to call it that, instead of an endeavour to find out the facts in regard to these industries. Reference has been made also to the increased activity in the textile industry, particularly in regard to woollens and knitted goods, subsequent to the imposition of the higher duty at the short session of 1930. That was undoubtedly true; the smaller concerns engaged in the manufacture of knitted goods and socks and stockings certainly increased their business to a considerable extent. As has been pointed out already, the result was that internal competition guaranteed to the consumer that prices would not be increased, and in fact prices were lowered in connection with a good many items.

I should like to point out just what has been done in connection with the knitted goods schedules and the socks and stockings items. In 1937 the British preferential tariff on hand knitting yarns, which have to do with knit goods, of course, was reduced from 11¼ cents per pound to 6 cents. On woollen and worsted yarns, for use by manufacturers, the specific duty was reduced from 7½ cents to 5 cents per pound. The duty on socks and stockings was reduced from 30 per cent ad valorem to 20 per cent, while the specific duty of 75 cents per dozen on stockings was eliminated. At the same time the duty on knitted garments was reduced from 25 per cent to 20 per cent. These figures, of course, all have to do with the British preferential tariff; but on January 1 of this year the present schedules came into effect, under which the duties have been further reduced. On knitted goods there has been a reduction from 32½ per cent to 20 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Just on garments; not on socks and stockings.

Mr. SENN: On knitted garments, and the 25 cents per pound specific duty has been eliminated.

Mr. DUNNING: On garments only.

Mr. SENN: On socks and stockings the duty has been reduced from 32½ per cent to 20 per cent and the specific duty from $1.35 to $1. These are quite material changes, in addition to those previously brought about. I do not believe they would have been so serious, however, if it had not been for the favoured nation arrangement. Undoubtedly goods of this kind will come in from other countries enjoying most favoured nation treatment, to the detriment of these industries in Canada.

I do condemn very strongly indeed this continual tinkering with the tariff, because it puts these companies in the position that they are not able to go ahead with any sense of security, and cannot plan their operations for any length of time ahead. I think all any industry asks in this country is that the Canadian market be preserved for goods manufactured and produced in our own country.

Mr. DUNNING: Entirely?

Mr. SENN: I would say this, that if the home market is preserved for them there will be sufficient internal competition to take care of the price.

Mr. DUNNING: That is, if we do not admit any from outside? My hon. friend is advocating total prohibition?

Mr. SENN: No matter what the duty may be, some goods will come in, but I say any duty is high enough only when it gives our own people a fair chance to produce their goods and enjoy their share of the home market.

I should like to point out that a large proportion of the woollen and knitted goods is produced in the small towns of Canada. In the province of Quebec there are thirty-nine towns which are described as mill towns, having mills engaged in the production of woollen or knitted goods. In Ontario there are eighty-two such towns, in the maritime provinces eighteen and in the west eight, making a total of 147 of these towns in which the textile industry accounts for a large part of the business carried on. When the Turgeon commission was sitting in a small town in Ontario the editor of the local newspaper asked permission to make a statement at the close of the hearing. His request was acceded to, and he went on to tell what the two small textile industries located in that town had done for it. He said these industries were founded in 1903, when the town had a population of some two thousand. Since then, coincident with the growth of these industries, the town had developed and progressed until at the time of the hearing its population had doubled. He quoted figures showing that the employees of the textile industries of that town paid over twenty-five per cent of the total taxes, and that less than one-fifth of one per cent of the unpaid taxes was owed by these employees. He stated further that the debenture debt of the town had been cut in two during the worst years of the depression, and said that was directly attributable to the payrolls of these companies. He also stated that during the thirty-three years these companies had been operating they had never been convicted under the minimum wage act and that the wage earners of the town had never suggested that a labour union should be organized. I should like to quote the final words of his statement as they appear in the report of the commission:

> The receipt of steady incomes by the mill employees and their consequent ability to pay their taxes, water and hydro bills, has been the main factor that has made possible our miles of street and sidewalk paving, our fire protection, hydro, water works and sewer systems, and the upkeep of our hospitals, schools, churches, public library and many other by-roads of life that spell comfort, convenience and social development—all unsurpassed in any town of our size in Canada. The district benefits too because the products it grows are sold in town to the mill employees, so the fabric of prosperity is so intertwined that we are all interdependent on one another. The heads of the company are leaders in all the town's philanthropies, and one fact is also certain, that to an unusual degree there are on the company payroll employees who because of age and infirmity would not be on the average payroll in mills elsewhere—and are only on there because of the kindly heart of the men at the top. We whose experience goes back many years, who have seen our town march hand in hand with the company, step by step up the ladder that has brought us to our present position I know would deplore as a tragedy any drastic change that would result in lowering our standard of living, because without our mills there would soon be moss growing on our streets.

[Mr. Senn.]

I put that on Hansard because I think it is a fair description of many of the smaller towns in Ontario and Quebec, where these industries for many years have been the main enterprises and have done so much to develop not only the towns but the country surrounding them.

Mr. DUNNING: It is difficult to let that pass without comment. Certainly no one in the house wants to ruin any towns anywhere; I am quite sure of that.

Mr. SENN: I know that.

Mr. DUNNING: I am also sure that the items we are now discussing cannot have any such effect as my hon. friend so gloomily predicts. What are the facts? We are dealing with an agreement made with the United States. Last year importations of knitted garments into Canada from the United States were valued at just $73,000, and our Canadian production stood at $8,740,000. The major importations are of course not related to this item at all. Those major importations are from the United Kingdom, and even from the United Kingdom last year we imported only $650,000 worth under this item. Those are the figures as against a total production of between $8,000,000 and $9,000,000.

As hon. members have been considering the two items together, probably I should give some figures with respect to socks and stockings, so as to complete the reference to knitted goods. Our total imports of all kinds of socks and stockings amounted to $30,000 from all countries, while our own production was valued at over $17,000,000. Let us look at these things in their proper proportions. Surely there is nothing ruinous about competition of that kind.

Mr. HOMUTH: Then are these items just a gesture to the United States, which will amount to nothing whatever to them?

Mr. CAHAN: No, they serve to appease the military spirit of the world.

Mr. HOMUTH: We had better have the appeasement here. If the United States asked for these concessions, surely they asked for them for a purpose, namely, that they would be able to export to Canada. There are substantial reductions in these various items. While we may say that importations from all countries amount to only eight, ten or fifteen per cent, nevertheless they have asked for these concessions with the idea that they will be able to export all these products into Canada, and they will be placed in the same position, so far as socks, garments and so on are concerned, as they are with respect to many other manufactured articles, such as toys, where they would be able to dump excess production into Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend spoke about importations of eight per cent and fifteen per cent. I would point out that imports are less than one per cent of our Canadian production.

Mr. SENN: The minister has given figures showing that importations in the last two or three years have been very small in comparison with the amount produced in Canada. I shall not dispute the accuracy of his figures; I believe they are correct. However, here is the situation: The tariff was reduced once by the 1935 agreement, and our companies have been able to carry on and to maintain their position in the British market. I know of some companies whose payrolls in the last year have fallen off by nearly $100,000.

Mr. DUNNING: In 1937 employment in this industry was higher than it had been for fifteen years.

Mr. HOMUTH: Give us 1938.

Mr. SENN: Not in 1938, by any means.

Mr. CAHAN: There is a decrease between 1938 and 1937.

Mr. SENN: There comes a time when goods will begin to come in over the tariff which now exists. If we can have an assurance from the minister that this will be the last step for some considerable time, I am sure everybody will be delighted, and industry can then go along with a feeling of security. But how do they know what is going to happen next?

Mr. DUNNING: I hope my hon. friend will not press me to give the assurance that a thirty-five per cent tariff on the item will necessarily be fixed. Parliament must be free to deal with it. The item stands at thirty-five per cent. That is an unreasonable assurance to ask for.

Mr. DEACHMAN: The assurance which the hon. member for Haldimand desires exists in the record of the industry between 1935 and 1936. Production went up nearly $6,000,000, which is a greater increase than was ever made in any year of Canadian history under a Conservative administration.

Mr. LENNARD: The minister gave the total imports of socks and stockings, but he did not give the total value of imports of knitted garments under item ex 568.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, I did. That was the first item I gave.

Mr. LENNARD: The minister gave imports from the United States and the United Kingdom.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member would like to have them from all countries? From all countries they were valued at $857,000, and that figure includes the two figures I have already given separately with respect to the United States and the United Kingdom. Total imports were about one per cent of our own production.

Mr. McNIVEN: It is frequently stated that platforms advanced by political parties are made to get in on but not to stand on. In that regard it will be recalled that during the 1935 election campaign the present Prime Minister stated the Liberal party, if returned to power, would progressively proceed towards lower tariffs and greater freedom of trade.

An hon. MEMBER: Increased taxation.

Mr. McNIVEN: It is known as a fact that what is popularly described as the Dunning budget of 1930 was the lowest schedule of tariff rates ever adopted in this country. The rejection of that budget was one of the outstanding mistakes made in the history of Canada. During the 1935 campaign it was stated that in the years to come progress would be made towards the level of the Dunning budget. For those who have misgivings that political parties make promises and then forget them, I shall place on Hansard a summary of what has been accomplished in the last four years.

Mr. LENNARD: Give all the promises first.

Mr. McNIVEN: I shall deal with them seriatim. With respect to textiles, dealing particularly with the period between May, 1930, and January, 1939, the rates of duty applicable to-day are lower on 75 items than they were in 1930. They are the same on 31 items, slightly higher on 38 items, and uncertain or doubtful on 12 items. This covers a total of 156 items and subitems, and governs importations from the United States. The same story is applicable to importations from the United Kingdom. The rates of duty on textiles imported from the United Kingdom to-day are lower on 36 items. On 86 items they are the same to-day as they were under the Dunning budget. They are higher or slightly higher on 24 items, and are doubtful on some 10 items, making a total of 156 items and subitems. I submit that is a remarkable accomplishment. Coming from western Canada and speaking on behalf of the consumers and users of textiles in my constituency, I want to convey to the government our appreciation of what they have accomplished in so short a time. While I have the greatest respect for the hon. member for Haldimand, I sincerely hope, and I think other hon. members on the government side will join me, that the minister will not listen to his request that the tariff rate on textiles be allowed to remain stationary at thirty-five per cent. Rather we should make greater progress toward reducing the duties on these very necessary articles.

Mr. BROWN: Is the lowest price one pays for an article the greatest factor in the hon. member's economy?

Mr. McNIVEN: The lowest price consistent with quality, considering what it is to be used for and the employment entailed in its production. For the last three years I have listened to hon. gentlemen here, all good friends of mine, berating the government for the reductions which have been made in the tariff, and commenting upon the results as regards employment or unemployment. I think it is generally conceded that tariff rates in this country were never as high as they were following the session of 1930. They continued at practically that level during the whole period of the Bennett regime, and there never was a time in the history of this country when unemployment was so prevalent. During that period we were told that there were no markets, that our commodities could not find their way into the markets of the world.

An hon. MEMBER: They could not blast their way in.

Mr. McNIVEN: That was the expression used. The Prime Minister accepted that challenge by negotiating the trade agreement of 1935, and the trade of this country has improved year by year from that time on, showing substantial increases in our balance of trade.

Mr. MacNICOL: And employment too?

Mr. McNIVEN: Hon. members seem to be much concerned about jobs. The other day an hon. member said that the industries of this country did not give any consideration to the welfare of their employees after they had furnished them with jobs. There are many outstanding exceptions to that statement. I mention one firm located in the city represented by my hon. friend, the International Harvester Company of Hamilton. That company is an outstanding example of right relationships between employer and employee.

The CHAIRMAN: I ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the item before the committee.

Mr. McNIVEN: I should like to develop that point. However, I shall conclude by expressing, on behalf of the people throughout this country, appreciation of what has been accomplished in a very short time by the government in the way of substantial reductions in duties.

Mr. THOMPSON: Let us get back to the textile business for a moment. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has said that from 1930 to 1935, during which time Mr. Bennett was Prime Minister, the tariff was higher than in any other period in our history. Let me say that during that time textiles sold cheaper in Canada than they had at any other time over a period of twenty-five years.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): So did everything else that was produced in Canada.

Mr. THOMPSON: There was a world depression on at that time, but Canada did not suffer as severely as many other countries. Many hon. gentlemen attempt to make it appear that the tariff is paid by the consumer, that when you raise the tariff, up goes the price of goods. That is untrue.

An hon. MEMBER: Who pays it?

Mr. THOMPSON: When the tariff on textiles was raised between 1930 and 1935, textiles sold in Canada cheaper than they had sold in twenty-five years.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): And everything else sold cheaper.

Mr. TUCKER: No. 1 wheat sold for 19 cents a bushel.

Mr. THOMPSON: We hear too much about wheat; we are talking about textiles just now. During the depression the textile mills in the small towns of Ontario and Quebec were the salvation of the country; they kept people at work. But to-day the great majority of these mills are not running more than half time. This tariff is going to give them another blow, and it is not reducing the price of textiles to the consumer.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—569e, ex 613 and ex 618. Miners' safety helmets for use exclusively in mining operations, firemen's helmets and sandblast helmets, of a class or kind not made in Canada; parts of such helmets: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—572. Oriental and imitation oriental rugs or carpets and carpeting, carpets and rugs, n.o.p.: 30 per cent and 7½ cents per square foot.

Mr. BROWN: What are the imports under this item?

Mr. DUNNING: The imports from the United States were worth $44,000, while our own production was valued at about $3,800,000. It will be understood of course that the United States is not our principal source of supply for rugs. Our total imports of rugs, including oriental rugs, last year amounted to 2,390,000 square feet, valued at $937,000.

Mr. BROWN: What was the value of importations from Japan?

Mr. DUNNING: We have no separate record for Japan, but I doubt if there is anything of any consequence from that country.

Mr. DEACHMAN: What is the combined specific and ad valorem rate?

Mr. DUNNING: If we take the ad valorem equivalent as applied last year on the small importations from the United States, which is the only way I can properly answer the question, the former compound duty or the equivalent is well over 100 per cent ad valorem. On orientals and hand woven rugs the old duty was around 50 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Now it is over 50 per cent. Does that apply to the 35 per cent plus 15 cents?

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. DEACHMAN: So the reduction would not be very material.

Mr. DUNNING: It is 7½ cents per square foot. Of course, it depends entirely on the value of the rug. There is a five per cent reduction in the ad valorem, and the specific duty per square foot is cut in half.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 573. Linoleum, floor oilcloth, and cork matting or carpets: 30 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—578. Regalia, badges and belts of all kinds, n.o.p.: 30 per cent.

Mr. BROWN: Does this item cover military uniforms? Would it cover kilts?

Mr. MacNICOL: Do not put a duty on them.

Mr. DUNNING: The details I have here do not include military uniforms, which would come in under the woollen cloth items.

Mr. BROWN: My understanding was that various articles of military uniforms have to be purchased abroad, and the men who are devoting their services to their country have to pay duty on certain service requirements which they have to purchase.

Mr. ILSLEY: On that point I had a good deal of correspondence with applicants for remission of duty. I do not think it is correct to say that the uniforms have to be purchased abroad. Some highland uniforms can be purchased in this country only at very great expense to the purchaser, but that is not true of other uniforms. As a matter of fact, where the cost is very great, we sometimes by order in council remit the duty on highland uniforms, but we have to be very careful in doing that because it would nullify the tariff entirely if we did it freely.

Mr. BROWN: How about the military boots the officers wear?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not remember the allegation ever having been made that the boots could not be bought in Canada.

Mr. STIRLING: The allegation is certainly made with regard to the gold lace that is required for all three services. Is it manufactured anywhere in Canada? It is customary to import it from the old country and pay the duty on it.

Mr. DUNNING: Gold lace comes principally from the United Kingdom.

Mr. STIRLING: And duty is charged on it although it is a de rigueur requirement in the service.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not know under what items it would come in if not under manufactures of gold.

Mr. BROWN: What specific articles would be covered by the word "regalia"?

Mr. DUNNING: As a privy councillor I would say it applies to a privy councillor's uniform. It would include badges, lodge regalia, rosettes, buttons and that sort of thing. Belts include sanitary belts and aprons and body belts.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—584. Bone pitch, crude only; and resin or rosin in packages of not less than 100 pounds: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—585. Coal and pine pitch, burgundy pitch; and coal and pine tar, crude, in packages of not less than fifteen gallons: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—586. Coal, anthracite, n.o.p.: 50 cents per ton.

Mr. BROOKS: This is an item which interests coal producers throughout Canada, but mainly in Nova Scotia and Alberta. I feel that the coal industry needs as much protection as any other industry, just as much as the wheat industry or the textile industry, of which we have heard so much. While the wheat industry may not be directly protected, it is indirectly protected most substantially so far as this country is concerned.

In my constituency there is a small mining centre at Minto, where the miners have been out of work for a considerable period over the last few years. Over in Nova Scotia, as hon. members from that province well know, the miners of Cape Breton and other parts of the province have been on part time most of this winter, as they were during last summer and for some time prior to that. This all indicates that the industry in Canada can probably produce enough coal, of the bituminous kind at least, to satisfy the Canadian market. I know, that geography is rather against the selling of our coal in the central provinces, and perhaps in the west, but the figures indicate that if we wish to protect our own industries and give employment to our own men we need a more substantial duty on coal than we have at present. While the duty on coal has not been lowered, but remains at 75 cents under item 588—

Mr. DUNNING: Would not my hon. friend's remarks apply more directly to item 588?

Mr. BROOKS: I am speaking of coal in general.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no coal in general.

Mr. BROOKS: Well, I am speaking of coal.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a very important difference.

Mr. BROOKS: In any event there is no reduction or increase under item 586. It remains the same. But there is virtually a decrease in the duty by reason of the removal of the excise tax of three per cent.

To show that the present duty has not been adequate, all we need to do is to look at the importations of coal in 1937 and 1938. We imported in 1937, 16,023,147 tons of coal, and in 1938, 14,213,904 tons. The Canadian production of coal in 1937 was 15,835,000 tons, and in 1938, 14,233,000 tons. In other words, we imported practically the same quantity that we produced. My point is that if we produced our own requirements in Canada, or even a large percentage, the miners in the coal mining areas of this country would be given substantial employment.

With respect to anthracite coal, our importations in 1937 amounted to the value of $10,106,000, and if the same amount were imported this year, with the three per cent excise tax taken off, if and when it is taken off, the revenue lost to the country would be $303,180. That tax is in itself a duty giving some protection to the industry. In 1937 the three per cent excise tax on importations of $20,000,000 worth of bituminous coal represented $600,000 of protection to our coal miners.

As I said before, the present duty is wholly inadequate to protect the coal mining industry. We hear a great deal said about the wheat industry, the textile industry and other industries, but no industry in this country is suffering more to-day than the coal mining industry. No other industry requires more assistance or more protection.

I have another question to ask which affects the coal bonus. Under article XV, I understand it is a matter for representation between the two governments. A bonus was given the coal miners in November, 1938. Have any representations been made by the department at Washington with reference to a conference in connection with that bonus?

Mr. DUNNING: There have been no formal representations in that regard.

Mr. BROOKS: Have there been representations of any kind? I do not understand what "formal representations" means.

Mr. DUNNING: If representations are not formal, then from my point of view there aren't any. I use the word "formal" for this reason. It is well known that the United States is very anxious that Canada should sit down with her and consider the coal question as a whole, without reference to our bonus system, except as it might relate to the whole coal situation, and we have expressed our willingness at any time to join in discussions in that respect. I did not wish to convey the impression, however, that these discussions had reference to any protest that might be contemplated by article XV. That is why I said that no formal representations had been made.

Mr. HEAPS: Are we paying a bonus to the coal producers at the present time?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. There is a subvention on the movement of coal. My hon. friend should raise that question on the estimates of the Minister of Mines and Natural Resources. That department handles the subventions.

Mr. MacNICOL: What quantity of anthracite did we import last year from the United States, and how much came in from Wales?

Mr. DUNNING: Our total imports were 3,594,000 tons, of which 1,112,000 tons came from the United Kingdom and 2,013,000 tons came from the United States. That is of anthracite only.

Mr. BROOKS: Was there any from Germany?

Mr. DUNNING: From Germany, 262,000 tons.

Mr. MacNICOL: Was that direct from Germany, or mixed with Welsh coal?

Mr. DUNNING: It is shown as an import from Germany direct.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have a word to say, not to detract from what was said by the hon. member for Royal, because I wish to endorse all that he said in reference to anthracite coal; but knowing how the minister has been pressed to reduce the duty on coal, I for one am pleased that it was not made lower than it is. There is not much that I can compliment the minister upon in this treaty, but I can compliment him on not reducing the present rate on item 586.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend suggest that the duty ought to be increased?

Mr. MacNICOL: No. I know that the minister has been pressed very strongly to put coal on the free list, because when I was in Wales a news item was shown me with regard to a delegation that had appeared asking that anthracite from the United States be placed on the free list, and as a Canadian I am pleased that the minister did not fall for the wiles of the delegation but maintained the duty. It may not be high enough, as the hon. member for Royal says, but I am glad it is not lower than it is.

Mr. DUNNING: I merely wanted to find out how many supporters there would be in the house for the suggestion of the member for Royal that the duty on coal should be increased.

Mr. MacNICOL: I said I endorsed what the hon. member said, and I am pleased that the minister did not fall for the wiles of the delegation that asked that the duty be further reduced.

Mr. DUNNING: I understand the hon. member for Davenport would like to see the duty increased?

Mr. MacNICOL: No; I did not say that at all. I cannot allow the minister to put words in my mouth. I am complimenting the minister on not reducing the duty lower than it is.

Mr. DUNNING: But my hon. friend also said that he was supporting the hon. member for Royal, who certainly expressed the view that the duty on coal ought to be increased.

Mr. MacNICOL: I merely said I endorsed the views of my hon. friend in advocating more production of coal in Canada, but that was not what I got up to say. I rose to say that I am glad the minister did not reduce the duty further. I have been very quiet—

Mr. DUNNING: You have been very good.

Mr. MacNICOL: —because I know the utter uselessness of saying anything.

Mr. BROOKS: I was not speaking about anthracite particularly. The minister mentioned the duty on anthracite.

Mr. DUNNING: We shall be dealing with bituminous in a moment.

Mr. BROOKS: I was speaking of coal in general. The attitude of my good friend from Toronto and of members from the west would indicate how difficult it is in this country to satisfy everybody. The west wants one thing, central Canada wants its manufacturers protected, and we in the maritimes want protection which we cannot get.

Mr. MacNICOL: It seems there is a misunderstanding of what I said. We do not produce anthracite in Canada; am I right?

Mr. DUNNING: Quite.

Mr. MacNICOL: We import all our anthracite. I got up to say, and I say it again, that I am glad the duty on anthracite was not made lower than it is, principally because of my desire that we continue to import anthracite coal from Wales to help the Welsh miners. I did not mention bituminous coal.

Mr. KENNEDY: What is the tariff on coal going into the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: Anthracite entering the United States is free; but we have none to sell them, so it makes no difference to us.

Mr. KENNEDY: Is there no anthracite exported from Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no anthracite exported because we have no anthracite production. Bituminous presents an entirely different picture, and that is why I was anxious for the member for Royal to wait until that item came up. Coal is not merely coal; it is lignite, bituminous or anthracite, and there is a great difference in the treatment of the subject, depending on which you are speaking of.

Mr. McNIVEN: There is a large importation of coal from both the United States and Wales. Into what parts of Canada is that coal imported?

Mr. DUNNING: The anthracite imported from Wales and from the United States is consumed principally in central Canada. There may be a few maritimers so—what shall I say? The hon. member for Royal can supply the adjective—at any rate, there may be a few maritimers who burn anthracite, but not many.

Mr. HARRIS: There is a large available exportable surplus in China as well as Russia. Is there any movement into Canada from China and Russia?

Mr. DUNNING: I have no record of imports of anthracite from China. From Russia we imported 146,000 tons last year, and from French Indo-China, 50,000 tons.

Mr. HARRIS: Yes, French Indo-China is what I meant. Is that importation increasing?

Mr. DUNNING: A slight increase from French Indo-China, from 34,000 tons to 50,000 tons.

Mr. HARRIS: What kind of coal?

Mr. DUNNING: Anthracite.

Mr. HARRIS: That is a broad term. Is it not the small size, what is called in this country blower coal, something of which the consumption is expanding by leaps and bounds? This importation threatens seriously the product from the screening of larger sizes of anthracite at present imported in such great quantities from the United States. I should like to reiterate what the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) said a few minutes ago; this is another example in which the tariff for revenue that produced $303,000 last year on this article is not going to pour that sum into the treasury in 1939 when the excise tax comes off.

Mr. DUNNING: No, it will go to the consumers of anthracite coal in this country.

Mr. HARRIS: The dealers may raise the price.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the price of coal from Germany and Russia laid down at Montreal?

Mr. DUNNING: I can give only the quantities and the customs valuation.

	Tons	Valued at
From Russia	146,000	$ 344,000
From Germany	262,000	1,102,000
From French Indo-China	50,000	130,000

They vary very much.

Mr. HEAPS: And Welsh coal?

Mr. DUNNING: Coal from the United Kingdom works out at just about $5 a ton value for duty.

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) asked a question concerning subventions. I recognize that this subject comes under another item, but it is a little difficult to separate the subventions from the tariff, because both added together form the protection for the coal industry. Could the minister tell us the particular reason for the increase in the subventions on Nova Scotia coal last fall? I do not want to be misunderstood: my question is not a dog-in-the-manger question. We all know that the coal mining industry in Nova Scotia needs as much protection as possible; the plight of the miner in Nova Scotia is very serious. The situation is just as serious in Alberta. I am wondering why the subvention was increased in the one case and not in the other.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry I cannot answer that question. I have here all information relating to the trade treaty, but I have not the information from the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) with respect to the vote of this parliament for coal movement subsidies. I think my hon. friend will have to ask that question at the proper time.

Mr. HANSELL: What does the total protection amount to, including subventions and tariff, on Nova Scotia coal and Alberta coal?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not see how anyone could calculate that, because the subventions are for the movement of coal into specific areas.

Mr. HANSELL: But the subvention is based on so much a ton, is it not?

Mr. DUNNING: So much per ton mile. It differs with every delivery.

Mr. HANSELL: This subject is indeed a very large one, and I suppose that in years gone by everything that could possibly be said on it has already been said in this house. But the coal problem of this country is not yet solved. We are importing 14,000,000 or 15,000,000 tons of coal every year, and as a result our own coal mining industry is almost on the rocks. An hon. member the other day, when dealing with the automobile industry, discussed the question as to what eastern interests could buy from western Canada, because western Canada was buying automobiles from eastern Canada. I rather scratched my head and asked myself—

An hon. MEMBER: Be careful of the few remaining hairs.

Mr. HANSELL: There are not many, but it is said one cannot grow hair and brains in the same place. So far as I can see, there is not much that the east can take from the west except coal, but they could take coal if there were a little reciprocal arrangement. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) the other day made a good suggestion, if it were a practicable one, in connection with the solution of the unemployment problem; he said that industry itself had to play its part. I believe that is so; industry can survive only as people have money to buy its products. I would suggest something to the industries of eastern Canada. I suggest that they check themselves up in regard to what coal they burn.

Let me give hon. members the picture I have in mind. My alarm clock goes off in the morning; I get out of bed to turn off the alarm. I am angry with that clock when it goes off; I look at the face and see that it is manufactured in Hamilton, Ontario. We in the west are buying clocks made in the east.

Mr. McCULLOCH: Is the hon. member talking about anthracite coal?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member must confine his remarks to coal.

Mr. HANSELL: That is to be my next sentence.

Mr. DUNNING: It is all right; he wants to trade some bituminous coal for alarm clocks, but we are not on bituminous coal.

Mr. HANSELL: I know that, but there are several items here that for purposes of discussion might all be rolled into one. I am wondering whether that clock company burns Canadian coal in connection with the manufacture of these clocks. They expect us to buy their clocks; let them buy our coal. I have a list of commodities I buy. I buy my wife some toilet articles; I find they are manufactured in eastern Canada; then I wonder if that company burns Canadian coal. I could go through all the list of manufactured articles. I do not suppose statistics are available. I did think on one occasion I would take time to write to these manufacturing concerns and ask them plainly what kind of coal they burn. Our Liberal friends believe in reciprocity, and reciprocal agreements between Canada and other countries; why not a little reciprocity between east and west? That would facilitate matters a good deal.

I should like to read something at this point, and perhaps the minister can say whether this is a feasible solution of the problem. I am reading this from a submission that was made to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations. I do not know if it is word for word, but it is the sum and substance of the recommendation.

Mr. DUNNING: Whose submission is it?

Mr. HANSELL: It is the recommendation of the national coal committee and the Western Canada fuel association, of Calgary and Winnipeg respectively, prepared under the direction of L. R. Lipsitt, K.C., LL.D., O.B.E.

The recommendation made as to how this can be accomplished—

That is, the solution of the coal problem.

—is that all importations of coal should be forthwith taken under the control of the dominion government by legislation, and that all future importations of American coal should be made under government permit. Approximately 1,000,000 tons of Canadian coal go into the United States annually as against over 14,000,000 tons imported from the States last year. As a matter of permanent policy the States might be given permits to send into Canada ton for ton against what they take from us. As regards all further importations of American coal, they should come in under a quota to be fixed annually, such quota getting less each year as the market adapted itself to Canadian coal and supplies became available, until eventually the Canadian market was reserved exclusively for Canadian coal. The Dominion Fuel Board might well be given extended powers and be asked to assist in working out the policy indicated.

If the carrying out of this policy were spread over a short period of years, eastern industries and eastern householders would be able gradually to adapt themselves to the use of Canadian coal as replacements in equipment were made, and as they gradually became accustomed to the best methods of burning Canadian coal. . . .

In negotiations with our friends across the border, no objection in principle can be taken to the permit and quota system above suggested. It has been put in force by the American government in relation to Canadian cattle going into the States. It has been put in force by Britain in reference to the acceptance of Canadian bacon and other agricultural products. It is not subject to the same objections, during the pending trade negotiations, that would be urged against any increase in existing tariffs. Coal is actually to-day the subject of an agreement permitting the entry into the Irish Free State of British coal, in exchange for permission to send Irish cattle into the British markets. This agreement has been renewed recently, showing the satisfactory results secured by both parties under the original agreement.

If the permit and quota system were once in force, it would give the Canadian government an enormous bargaining factor to secure entry into the States of larger quantities of Canadian cattle, lumber, manufactured goods, and agricultural products. It is quite evident that the importation of American coal could not and would not be stopped at once, but the Canadian government would have immediately this valuable bargaining counter in their hands, in addition to such bargaining powers as already exist.

With a gradual change over, little inconvenience or loss would be sustained by eastern interests and any such loss would be far less than the millions that have been and still are being lost, through the inability of western governments, municipalities and individuals to meet their contractual obligations.

That is the sum and substance of the recommendation of the western coal interests.

Mr. DUNNING: Does that come from the industry?

Mr. HANSELL: It comes from the national coal committee and the Western Canada fuel association who, combined, represent the coal industry in western Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: And is my hon. friend ready to indicate his support of the proposals therein contained?

Mr. HANSELL: I think the coal problem of this country must be dealt with on a broad, national basis. Some system or another, looking at the whole matter with a view to bringing about a broad national policy, should do something to solve that problem. The coal mining industry itself, apart from the workers, is running on a very thin string, so to speak.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend regard that recommendation which he has just spread upon Hansard as a broad, national solution of this problem?

Mr. HANSELL: I think it is. I do not see anything wrong with it.

Mr. DUNNING: I hope all hon. members will read and study it. It is worth studying.

Mr. HANSELL: I agree with the minister that it is worth studying, and I also agree that governments in the past have studied these same things. I am quite certain that they are conscious of the results of quota systems, and that is why I wonder if the minister would care to express himself along this line. We from Alberta, in common with those from other parts of the country, are interested in the solution of the problem itself, and if we can offer any suggestions one way or another, surely some good may come out of them.

[Mr. Hansell.]

Mr. HOWDEN: I do not know the position of coal now, but some ten or twelve years ago when I entered this house it was a burning topic. An investigation was held at that time, and it was found that western coal could not be brought east of Winnipeg, or at least east of Redditt, which is about 125 or 140 miles this side of Winnipeg. In the same way coal from the maritime provinces could not be taken west of Toronto. The railways are a pretty good criterion to go by. The Canadian National have not endeavoured to bring western coal east of Redditt, while I think the Canadian Pacific brings its western coal as far east as Kenora.

At that time western coal was enjoying a subvention of $2.07 a ton in order to permit it to sell in the Ontario market in competition with Pennsylvania coal, which then sold at about $11 a ton. Well, $2.07 is a pretty big subvention; it is fairly high protection to pay for the privilege of marketing western coal in Ontario, and in saying that I am as much a Canadian as anyone. I believe there have been a number of very, very serious investigations into this coal question, which is not a new matter by any means. They always wind up just where we are now. These days coal is brought in from the old country, Germany and other places, as we have been told, when it is found advantageous to do so, and I believe we are getting our Canadian coal on the market to the best possible advantage at the present time. It seems that all the investigations we have had so far have come to that conclusion.

Mr. THOMPSON: I understood the minister to say a few minutes ago that Welsh coal cost $5 a ton or thereabouts, laid down in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the value for duty in Wales.

Mr. THOMPSON: And some coals from other countries were even less than that. Can the minister explain why coal coming in here worth $5 a ton costs the consumers $15 or $16? I paid $16 a ton for the coal I put in my bin last fall.

Mr. GOLDING: You paid too much.

Mr. THOMPSON: I could not get it for less.

Mr. DUNNING: The value for duty is the value in Wales. It has to be transported to my hon. friend's coal bin, I suppose, before it costs him $16 a ton.

Mr. HANSELL: I agree with much but not with all of what has been said by the hon. member for St. Boniface. I think even the coal mining industry would admit that they are fairly well protected. The subvention, together with the tariff, does protect the industry. But in spite of the protection they receive, 15,000,000 tons of coal come into Canada. If the western interests could sell just a million more tons in eastern Canada they would be on their feet, and thousands of miners would be employed. For the moment I am not concerned with the quota system. But if the purchase of a million tons were transferred from the United States to Alberta I believe the mining industry of the republic to the south of us would not be greatly affected, and it would put our industry on its feet.

I wish to refute the hon. member's statement to the effect that western coal brought to eastern Canada was not satisfactory.

Mr. HOWDEN: I did not say the coal was not satisfactory. One of the difficulties found in bringing western coal to eastern Canada was that there was a tendency for the coal to break up and to form slack. In many instances when it reached eastern Canada it was not satisfactory because, unless protected, in a very short time it lost its form.

Mr. McIVOR: There is another side to this matter. We at the head of the lakes think that there is too much duty and too much subvention, and that this condition has brought about unemployment at the head of the lakes. We shall be looking for the same subvention and bounty on iron ore, and we believe we have just as much right to it as the coal people.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): We must remember that 15,000,000 or 16,000,000 tons of coal come to Canada every year. The large manufacturing plants in Ontario and Quebec, plants such as the Steel Company of Canada and the International Nickel Company use large quantities of coal. Large amounts are consumed by greenhouses, and producers of that kind. I would point out to hon. members from the west who are so critical of the desire on the part of eastern people to preserve our manufacturing institutions, that in some instances we have to pay seventy-five cents a ton and in other instances, $1. The actual amount of money paid by Ontario and Quebec is very large. I believe it is an expenditure which we are willing to pay, in order that the western and eastern parts of Canada may prosper, and in order that they may produce and sell larger quantities of coal.

Mr. BROWN: Very often in the house I have heard the suggestion that lower prices are of paramount importance, that in fact they are more important than national economy or national development. As a representative from an industrial constituency I would say that I would do all in my power to induce industries to buy western and eastern coal. I have always said that if the government would spend more time and energy in the development of internal trade, trade among the eastern, western and central provinces, it would be doing much more for the country than it can do by giving concessions to the United States, and to other nations which are competing unfairly. If competition were on a favourable basis one might think differently, but the fact is that only one or two nations of the world are competing with us on an actual cost basis. Most nations are competing on a subsidized basis. A short time ago we heard that subsidized wheat had been unloaded on the Ontario markets. I believe it was the hon. member for Wentworth who showed that shoes from Czechoslovakia were selling for eleven cents a pair in Hamilton stores.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Shoes and anthracite.

Mr. BROWN: I am drawing analogies between various articles.

Mr. DUNNING: Looking at it from the point of view of coal, would the hon. member be prepared to have the duty high enough against United States coal to make it more profitable for an industrialist to buy coal supplies from the maritimes or from Alberta? Will the hon. member face up to that?

Mr. BROWN: If the country as a whole would derive benefit from it, yes.

Mr. DUNNING: That is what we have to consider. If we are to apply the principle that we should use Canadian coal, and if we decide that we shall use it through the operation of the tariff, in the same manner as the tariff is operated in connection with other products, then we must face putting on a duty which would compel industrial plants in central Canada to buy Alberta or maritime coal. That duty on bituminous coal would have to be not seventy-five cents a ton as it is to-day, but I venture to say at least $3 or $3.50 a ton.

I like to look at these matters squarely. Would that be a good thing for Canada? Hon. members who are coal consumers say, No, it would not—and that is what the rest of us say, with respect to their manufactures. That is the difficulty in connection with devising a tariff policy which can be applied generally across the country.

Mr. BROWN: In connection with our railways and other matters we have to pay a price in order to bring about unity in Canada.

Unless that price is too high, unless it will hurt the country as a whole, I say we should be willing to pay it.

Mr. KENNEDY: I was hoping we would reach item 588 because there were one or two observations I wanted to make.

Mr. DUNNING: I wonder if we could not pass this item and the next one and have the discussion on item 588?

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—587. Coke, n.o.p.: $1 per ton.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—588. Coal, n.o.p., including screenings and coal dust of all kinds: 75 cents per ton.

Mr. DUNNING: Now we are on bituminous coal.

Mr. KENNEDY: Several arguments have been advanced for protection, and I do not think we in Alberta are particularly advocating the raising of the tariff in order to force industry in eastern Canada to pay a higher price for coal. If coal from Alberta or Nova Scotia is to be brought to Ontario, it will have to be by increasing the subventions.

Mr. DUNNING: Who pays those?

Mr. KENNEDY: There are several thousand coal miners on relief in Alberta, and I believe there are many in Nova Scotia in the same position. If the dominion government would apply what they pay for relief in Alberta toward increasing the subventions on coal, the eastern industrialists would not have to pay more. A large part of the relief now being paid in Alberta could be eliminated by increasing the subventions. I believe this would cure much of the relief and unemployment situation in Alberta. We have about 13,500 miners in Alberta who hold certificates to mine coal, and only about 5,000 of them are working. Eight thousand coal miners in Alberta are on relief. If these men could be put to work, it would go a long way toward curing the relief situation in that province.

Mr. DUNNING: As I indicated, I am not in a position to discuss subventions when we are dealing with this trade treaty. That is the business of the Minister of Mines and Resources, and I am quite sure that when that item in his estimates comes up, there will be, as there has always been, a very complete discussion. May I suggest to hon. members that it would be better to have this discussion at a time and place at which it would be effective.

[Mr. Brown.]

Mr. KENNEDY: I agree with the minister. I made my remarks because of the argument which had been advanced for protection. I wanted to place myself on record as not advocating higher rates of duties in order to embarrass the eastern industrialist by making him pay more for his coal. The quality of Alberta coal has been brought into this discussion, and I should like to refute what has been said against it. The coal which came to Ontario a few years ago was not the best quality of coal that we have in Alberta. It was taken from the lignite fields and we all know that lignite has a greater percentage of water in it. I understand it runs about sixty heat units to forty per cent water, whereas we have coal in Alberta which runs as high as ninety-six heat units to four per cent water. If the latter type of coal were sent to Ontario, there would be very little crumbling.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Alberta government sent it.

Mr. KENNEDY: Here is another significant point. The freight rate on coal coming to this province is about $8 a ton. A subvention of $2.50 a ton would bring that rate down to $5.50. Wheat can be brought east for $5.20 a ton.

Mr. DUNNING: This has nothing to do with coal coming from the United States, which is what is covered by this item.

Mr. KENNEDY: I was simply replying to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol).

Mr. MacNICOL: I was not finding any fault with Alberta coal; in fact I have used it myself. All I said was that the Alberta government had shipped the coal which was sent to Ontario. If they did not ship us the best coal, that is not our fault.

Mr. KENNEDY: The Alberta government did not ship it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I understand the Ontario government put up about $25,000 in order to try out Alberta coal.

Mr. BLACKMORE: When was that?

Mr. MacNICOL: When Mr. Howard Ferguson was premier. I used the coal myself and I found it very good. I do not know why they stopped shipping it to Ontario.

Mr. DUNNING: This whole discussion is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: I ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the item.

Mr. KENNEDY: There is one way in which Ontario could use Alberta coal. Factories in Ontario could buy the equipment with which to use the small sizes of coal very cheaply. If the coal slacks on the way down and becomes small coal or screenings, it could be burned in Ontario factories at small cost and the lump sizes left for domestic use. I should like to point out that Alberta has twenty-one per cent of the known coal supply of the North American continent, and yet we send to Ontario only one-fifteenth of the coal consumed here. Alberta has eighty-seven per cent of the total coal supply of the Dominion of Canada, and yet we are unable to supply the Ontario market. This is a national problem. I hope to discuss the matter of freight rates with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) when we are dealing with subventions on coal. I mentioned during the budget debate last year that there are sufficient coal reserves in Canada to supply the country for 36,000 years. There is no reason why we should have to import one ton of coal from the United States. Our internal economy should be such as to make coal from the east and the west readily available in Ontario.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Kennedy) had to deal at the moment with the decomposition of Alberta coal because the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) had raised the question. There is another matter I should like to mention because I am not quite sure that it will be in order when we are discussing subventions. I refer to the possible readjustment of freight rates.

Mr. DUNNING: That would be in order when we are dealing with subventions or on any of the estimate items of the Minister of Transport.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) pointed out the possibility of getting control of coal imports, and the minister asked if he favoured that proposal. That put the hon. member in a rather difficult position. There are many factors that would enter into this question. An arrangement could be made with the railroads to reduce the freight rates on coal and enable Alberta coal to be placed in the Ontario market without loss to the Ontario people and with great profit to Alberta.

Mr. EULER: Who would pay the deficits of the railroads?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It seems to me that hon. members are blaming the Creator for placing so much coal so far away from where it is needed. What my hon. friend says about the quality of Alberta coal is true. This coal is the finest domestic coal one can find, but it is so far away. If it is to be brought down to eastern Ontario all rail, it will be tremendously expensive. If it is brought by rail to the head of the lakes and then dumped into a ship, it will be broken up and not be as good a fuel from the domestic point of view. If the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Kennedy) will look up the records of the special committee which studied this matter, I think in 1926, he will find much useful information. The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) and the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Brown) have advocated a greater use of Canadian coal, but the hon. member for Hamilton East in particular overlooks the fact that there are thousands of miles between where the coal is located and where it is to be consumed. If we must pay subsidies, subventions or duties to move this coal, it simply means that there will be a tremendous added cost to the cost of the goods turned out by industry. I am quite sure that the industry he represents would not be willing to pay the cost from the Crowsnest pass—

Mr. BROWN: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Certainly.

Mr. BROWN: We are paying a considerable bonus on wheat, and we from the eastern provinces are glad to do it because it contributes to the national development of Canada. But we think we should also do the same thing for coal.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I cannot see anything of a question in the argument my hon. friend is making. I am beginning to be tired of all this talk about a bonus on wheat when this dominion has not paid a bonus on wheat yet, and is likely to pay the bonus for the first time this year.

To come back to coal, the industry represented by my hon. friend would certainly object—and he would be the first to speak for them—to paying three dollars extra to bring bituminous coal from the Crowsnest pass or the Brazeau fields when it would not serve the purpose as well as the coal they now import cheaply from across the lakes by water and with a short rail haul.

Mr. BROWN: It would help our railways.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): But at whose expense? At the expense of the people who claim that the products of Hamilton industries are already too expensive to be bought on a parity of value with imported products. It would be at the expense of other parts of Canada. There is a problem in Alberta which cannot be solved by added duties, and it is this: Because of the vast quantity of coal deposits in Alberta, too many people went into the industry, and we have in that industry some eight thousand unemployed to-day. How many unemployed would there be if we encouraged people by some artificial means, by bonus, subvention or tariff, to engage still more deeply in that industry and draw larger quantities of that 36,000 years' supply of which the hon. member for Edmonton East speaks? It is ridiculous. The more you encourage the industry by artificial means, the more capital you induce to invest in the industry in the hope of making more profits, the more unemployment you will have.

An hon. MEMBER: That is not correct.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): My hon. friend is entitled to his opinion, but I am speaking from the history of forty years' of development. There are tremendous quantities of very high grade coal in southern Alberta, but that supply is so far away that to bring it to eastern Ontario would be prohibitive to those people who have to buy the output of the industries that would be compelled to use that coal at a higher cost. I do not care whether the taxpayers of Canada pay the extra money to the railroads through subventions, tariffs or anything else, but by the time the costs are all pyramided and passed on to the consumers of this country from coast to coast, the products of industry would be just too expensive.

Mr. BLACKMORE: My hon. friend shows great familiarity with the question. I wonder if he has at his fingers' ends the amount which the railroads say is necessary for moving a ton of Alberta coal to Ontario.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry, but I must insist that we discuss this tariff item. I do not care whether we get through with it by six o'clock or not, but if we go all over the place in this fashion we shall never get through the trade treaty.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member for Melfort raised the point, and unless we have a chance to reply, it stands against us. The minute we begin to answer it, we are out of order. But he was not.

Mr. DUNNING: He was out of order too.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I kept quiet all afternoon trying to have this item carried, but after hon. gentlemen made their arguments I felt that I could claim my right to do my share of talking. The railroads have found that it costs much more money, I would say in reply to the hon. member for Lethbridge—

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, if it was out of order to ask the question, it is out of order to answer it.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Following up the remarks I made a few moments ago, we find that tariff reductions are made all along the line on manufactured products, and yet the duty on coal remains the same. Let me give one illustration of what the duty costs. A greenhouse just north of Toronto pays in duty on coal alone $9,000 a year. And already the duty on cut flowers has been slashed. I do not think that is a fair deal.

Mr. KENNEDY: Would the minister give me the information now that I asked for on item 586 with respect to Canadian coal going to the United States? Is the tariff the same?

Mr. DUNNING: Practically.

Mr. KENNEDY: On all coal, bituminous as well?

Mr. DUNNING: Bituminous is free.

Item agreed to.

PENSION ACT

ABOLITION OF PENSION APPEAL BOARD AND EXTENSION OF TIME FOR PENSION APPLICATIONS

The house resumed from Friday, March 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Power for the second reading of Bill No. 6, to amend the Pension Act.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): I intend to support the bill as far as it goes because I believe that the pension appeal court has outlived its usefulness. It has discredited itself in the eyes of all returned men's organizations and probably in the eyes of all those people who are familiar with the administration of the Pension Act.

I should like to associate myself with the remarks of previous speakers in asking that the bill be referred to a special committee to investigate certain problems of major importance that are confronting pensioners.

I intend to deal only with what I consider one of the main problems facing pensioners, namely, the case of the non-pension widow. To-day there are very few people in Canada who realize that when a married pensioner dies, his pension dies with him automatically unless his wife is in the fortunate position of being able to prove to a somewhat hard-boiled medical board that his death was on account of war service, or unless he was receiving an eighty per cent pension; and of course, many years after the close of the war, it is not such an easy matter to prove that death is on account of war service.

To-day we are living in a time of wars and rumours of war, and I suggest that it is high time the government took steps to acknowledge in full the country's obligations to its pensioners. I do not believe that those obligations are being met in full to-day. Should Canada become involved in another war, I know, speaking for myself, if I were told that in the event of my being seriously wounded and, at a later date, dying after the war, my wife would not receive my pension, I would not consider that my country was dealing in an honourable manner with my widow. Any country that would expect men to be willing to sacrifice their lives for it, without unconditionally accepting full responsibility for the care of those men's dependents, is a country in which there is something radically wrong.

I believe the majority of the members of this house have on their files cases of widows who to-day are suffering from a great injustice. I shall refer briefly to one case with which I am familiar. It illustrates very well the injustice that widows are suffering from to-day. The case is that of a healthy man, a great football player, who enlisted and had his leg blown off. It was amputated at the thigh and he had to undergo several additional operations, which left the stump of the leg in a very sore state so that he was unable to wear an artificial limb. Eventually the weight of his body broke down his other foot so that he could not take proper exercise. Internal diseases followed and finally he died in 1933. Two doctors who attended him both gave evidence that his death was the result of war service. An application for a pension was turned down by the pension board and an appeal was taken to the appeal court. That also was turned down. In 1936 the case was referred to me and I got in touch with the veterans' bureau. We succeeded in getting Doctor Laidlaw, a well-known pathologist in Canada, to take an interest in the case. He submitted evidence to the effect that undoubtedly the man's death was the result of war service. On that evidence we got the appeal court to reopen the case. It was again referred to the pension board, and again a pension was refused.

In the middle of 1938, for some reason or another, somebody, the government or the pension board, had a change of heart and, without a change in the act, that woman was awarded a pension, five years after the death of her husband. In other words, the country had deprived her of her rightful pension for five years. She had been robbed of approximately $3,000 by the government's not acknowledging the fact that a pension was due her. The pension was not made retroactive; that is not possible under the law. There are many similar cases in Canada to-day, and therefore I say that we are not meeting our obligations to the dependents of returned men.

Before the committee that sat in 1936 it was made perfectly clear on many occasions that it was not so much a matter of what a pensioner was entitled to as of what the country could afford to pay. In other words, the country was in a bankrupt state, paying only so many cents on the dollar of its obligation. It was stated in this house by one of its leaders that Canada had been very generous to its returned men. I suggest that when a debtor pays his creditor he is not being generous; he is merely meeting his obligations, and when he does not pay his debt in full he does not meet his obligations. That is the state of Canada to-day in relation to this question. Canada is not meeting its obligations to the dependents of the returned men. To-day, twenty years after the war, we find that we still have many obligations which are left undischarged so far as our returned men are concerned. I therefore add my voice to those of other hon. members in asking that the bill be referred to a special committee to investigate some of the major problems confronting pensioners at the present time.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): There are two important changes in this bill, and while most hon. members would like to see the minister bring down a bill with many more changes going further, still it is only fair to say the two changes that are proposed will, in my opinion at any rate, bring about some measure of relief to the returned men. I refer to the change in connection with the appeal court and the extension of time for applications.

In 1936 when the committee met it was proposed to do away with the appeal court; but it seems that the country was not quite ready for that move because, although the agitation has been kept up since that time, it is only now that legislation is introduced to do away with the appeal court. I agree with a good deal that has already been said, but I disagree with some of the speakers who are advocating that this bill go before a committee. I had the honour of being on the last committee, and I think I can say correctly that almost every aspect, yes, every aspect, of the returned men's problems was dealt with during the time that committee sat in 1936. Those problems may have become aggravated since that time, but to my mind they are essentially the same as they were then. They may be greater, but they are the same. It seems to me that after the deliberations of that committee and, later, the exhaustive research made by the veterans' assistance commission, the minister and hon. members are very well seized of most if not all of the problems confronting the returned men. I doubt whether there is one phase of the whole soldier problem that cannot be discussed on the floor of the house, either before the bill goes into committee or when it is in committee.

I wish to add my meed of praise to what has been said with respect to the Minister of Pensions (Mr. Power). I think I can say without fear of successful contradiction that he is, if not the most sympathetic, one of the most sympathetic ministers we have had in this house in charge of returned men's problems. No one knows the problems of the returned men better than he does, and I have no apologies to offer for voicing my word of praise of the minister.

I know that we should not at this stage discuss the various clauses of the bill, but I want to speak of one aspect, that of doing away with the appeal court. I believe that some further changes will have to be made, because I find that some aspects of the new set-up would appear to preclude many applicants from getting redress to which I think they are entitled. I have one case before me which is very interesting and might be cited in support of what I have to say as to the need for additional phraseology in the bill to provide that special cases may be given attention. This man, Mr. Gibbs, enlisted in 1916 and served until 1919 in France with notably meritorious service. He took ill in 1919 and died in 1921. The doctor who attended him gave it as his considered opinion that this man died from cancer, something he contracted while he was in the army. His widow at the time did not make claim because there was some insurance money coming; but in course of time, after the insurance money had been spent, she appealed to the board of pension commissioners or the tribunal for a pension, and they granted her one. An appeal, however, was taken against the award, and the appeal court reversed the finding and refused pension to the widow.

The strange feature is that the appeal court stated that the whole matter hinged on medical evidence, yet they themselves reversed the award on lay evidence. By that I mean that in 1921 the widow said she noticed this growth on her husband's neck in 1920; then in 1933, when the appeal was up, she said it was 1919 when she noticed the growth. But the sad part is that although the court of appeal stated that the matter hinged on medical evidence, the medical practitioner who gave evidence in the case stated it as his unqualified opinion that the man died as a result of cancer he contracted and had in his body when he returned from overseas. I doubt whether the present bill would touch cases of that kind, unless some proviso is made that a case may be reopened without additional evidence being produced. No new or additional evidence can be produced in a case of that kind, so, without some further provision, this woman will be denied a pension to which I feel she is entitled.

I was pleased when the Minister of Pensions provided hospitalization for non-pensioners. That has been a great advantage, but I should like to see it go a little further. It seems hardly fair that those receiving $20 or $40 a month under war veterans' allowance should have moneys deducted from their allowance during the time they are in hospital. I do not see why they should be called upon to pay, while others receive the benefit freely, and rightly so, of course, if they come under the new regulations.

In passing, I should like to draw the minister's attention to the condition of Shaughnessy hospital in Vancouver. The building was built in 1909 and was used as a school before being taken over by the military authorities. I am not going to say it is a fire-trap, but it is old and was never adapted for a military hospital. With the change in regulations there is no doubt there will be additional demand for hospital accommodation in Vancouver for many years to come, and I would ask the minister to give this matter his serious consideration. I understand plans were drawn up for a new building many years ago, but nothing further was done about the matter.

If protests do come mostly from hon. members representing British Columbia, it is hardly to be wondered at, because British Columbia has a greater proportion of returned men in proportion to population, either pensioners or those receiving war veterans' allowance, than any other province. Just before coming to the house to-night I noted some statistics concerning this. I find that in Ontario there are 5,135 in receipt of war veterans' allowance; in British Columbia, 3,512; in Quebec, 1,476; in Manitoba, 1,372; in Alberta, 1,131; in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, 766; in Saskatchewan, 807; and in New Brunswick, 390. So it appears that British Columbia has twenty-seven per cent of the total number in receipt of war veterans' allowances. The same condition applies as to pensions. Out of 79,864 pensioners, Ontario has 27,549; British Columbia, 10,643; Quebec, 5,499; Manitoba, 7,377; Alberta, 5,821; Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, 4,523; Saskatchewan, 4,306; and New Brunswick, 2,162. Those figures I believe prove what I say, that British Columbia is carrying a heavier load, because disabled ex-service men are there in greater numbers. In further support of this statement, the figures given to the minister by the veterans' assistance commission show that when they were proposing economic allowances, which we are still advocating, they gave a total of 4,650 who would be in receipt of such allowances in Ontario, while in British Columbia they estimated the total would be 6,354. When one compares the population of Ontario, almost 3,000,000, with the population of British Columbia, something over 700,000, one realizes that in British Columbia, the problem is greater and more difficult than in any other province. That is why the voice of British Columbia is heard perhaps more vociferously, through its members in this house and the provincial legion organizations, than is the case with other provinces.

Nearly every speaker has said something regarding the plight of the widows, which hon. members must realize is very serious, and which condition demands that something be done for them. Take the case of a returned man in receipt of a pension of, say $7.50 or $15 a month, with the man and his wife endeavouring to carry on as best they may on this meagre amount. Suddenly the man passes away; the pension is cut off, and how is the widow to carry on for the rest of her days? Heaven only knows. Surely there is some responsibility on this house and this government in regard to these widows, and the plight of ex-service men on relief is even worse. I would urge the minister to give serious consideration to their plight.

I think something should be said with regard to the loyalty of the returned men during these days of stress. I know some people have laughed at the latest move of the returned men's organizations in proposing to organize in defence of Canada; but to me at least it shows that they are still loyal to Canada, and in my opinion that loyalty is well worth preserving. I may have something further to say when the bill is in committee, but I felt that I should at least say this much, particularly on behalf of the widows and before the bill reaches the committee stage.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, several times in this house I have spoken briefly in support of greater consideration for our returned soldiers. It is my opinion, in which I am becoming more confirmed each year, that Canada is not playing fair with the returned men. I think we are forgetful of the fact that each year our returned men and their wives are getting one year older and consequently one year weaker. I do not think we heed the fact that each year there are actually fewer jobs available in this country. We doctor up our statistics in order to make a rather pleasant appearance on paper, but there is no pleasant appearance to be found when we walk the streets of any of our large cities. Each year we see more young people coming into the labour market to take what jobs are available, and each year it becomes more difficult for a man over forty to obtain a position of any kind. In addition, each year there are fewer markets for the commodities people used to produce and by means of which they were enabled to get by. I recall that twelve years ago, we will say, a person could go into any ordinary little community and milk a few cows, plant a good garden, raise a few strawberries, make butter and so on, and find a sufficient market for those commodities to enable him to get by. Then again, in almost every little community it was possible for people to maintain themselves by knitting, sewing, making clothes, doing washings and things of that kind. Many of the widows of fifteen years ago, with the help of their children, were able to carry on in this way; but, sir, to-day it is becoming increasingly difficult to secure a livelihood through these avenues. There is a little dairy, a little milk distributing establishment, in every small town to-day, with someone making a business of it, where fifteen years ago there was no such thing.

I believe we must take cognizance of these matters, for they have an important bearing on this whole question of our returned men and their dependents, especially their widows. I am going to suggest what may seem a little radical, but what I think is only justice. The recommendation of the veterans' assistance commission, which was couched in the following words, should be implemented at once, that——unemployed indigent veterans with service in a theatre of actual war be taken care of by the dominion government while unemployed, and paid unemployment assistance accordingly.

So far as I know, that recommendation has not yet been implemented; I think it should be attended to without further delay. War widows should receive an allowance forthwith, for the reasons I have already indicated. During the last month I have spoken with at least a dozen war widows who have sat down beside me and in blunt sincerity asked, "What can I do to make a living?" It would challenge the best intelligence of this house to tell them what should be done. Certainly I could not tell them, but those widows had to make a living and they had to educate their children.

I think it is time we laid down the principle that all men who saw service in an actual theatre of war should receive $40 a month, and that on their death their widows should receive the same amount without any questions asked. People may say, "Well, where is the money coming from?" It is not my business to discuss that; probably I would be called to order if I did; but without discussing it at all I am going to point out this fact, that thirty years from to-day everyone will be able to see where the money could have come from, and everyone will wonder what kind of dolts we were that we could not see it also. There is no question about that at all. If a war were to break out within the next two or three days, we would be finding money in abundance in order to kill men. It is high time we found money in abundance in order to save men. Just while I am on that point, if I may digress for a moment, I think it is clearly recognized by all who are prepared to face the facts that it would be impossible for this country to engage in a war of the dimensions of the last war and go into debt for the money necessary to conduct such a war. We would have a structure of debt under which we would be absolutely crushed. Clearly, if war came, a way would have to be found to finance that war without going into debt. Then, undoubtedly that way can be found in order to look after those people who are suffering so terribly.

I do not wish to occupy the time of the house unduly; but for the sake of those who in the future may want to know something about the way in which we did things in these days I should like to put on record, as an illustration of the suffering which our people are undergoing, a case which has come to my attention. The men who fought and bled and of whom many died for these people, are suffering as this man is suffering to-day. The letter I have in my hand, dated May 31, 1938, is written from Spokane, Washington. I shall quote passages from it, to save time. As a matter of fact, I shall quote from two letters from the same man, one of which was written to me and the other to an official in Alberta. Here are some of his words:

I do not know if you have heard of my misfortune or not, but I have had my right foot amputated. I have had one hearing, and they will give me one more, but I cannot prove that I contracted this Buerger's disease in France. I was in a British hospital in London, but they did not put down all my record, or it has been lost. I was treated for chronic otitis media, trench fever and trench feet. I have suffered ever since I came out of army with my right foot, but did not know what was wrong until last summer. I was to several of the best doctors in Spokane, and they all said it was Buerger's disease. This disease had been traced back to France. The United States government has a large hospital at Soap Lake near Spokane treating cases like mine, and they are all returned soldiers. Most of these men have had several amputations, and there is no cure for it. This water is used and mud baths stop the disease, but does not cure it. There is no question in the United States government but what these men got this disease in France, and all draw pensions and hospital treatment. I have sure suffered with this, and still am. My leg is not healed up yet.

Was operated on December 7, 1937. I have never asked for any relief of any kind. Have paid my own bills, but I have been down since I came here three years ago. I moved down here on account of my wife's health. She is not strong. She has had three operations, and she has been working keeping me and my two boys since I came here. But I do not think she will be able to last much longer at the work she has to do.

I wish you would see if you can find any of my records or not. If you cannot see if you can see some of the pensions officers, and maybe you can do something for me. I had Doctor Mulloy treat my foot in 1927 and in 1931, so you can see it has been bothering me for a long time.

Those are some of the quotations. And here are quotations from a letter written by the same man on the same date to an official of the Alberta government. Before I begin reading these passages, I submit they are so pathetic as to be disgraceful to the officials of this dominion. All we have to do is to put along with what I have read some further things I shall read, to see how pathetic the whole thing really is:

I wrote your Uncle Hugh and received an answer from him, but he could find no record of me. Went to the hospital I was in London but all records had been sent to war office. He went to the war office and all Canadian records have been sent to Ottawa. So he could not do me any good.

I have had one hearing in the pension board, and I was turned down on account there was no record of me having anything wrong with my foot. I have suffered ever since I came out of army, but I did not know what was wrong with my foot until last summer, and doctors who examined me told me it was Buerger's disease.

Part of this may be repetition of what I have already read.

But my foot was so far gone they had to amputate it. These doctors I had examine me say I got this in France, and I was to some of the best doctors in Spokane.

The next part of the letter is much the same as what I have already read. Then, there is this touching part:

The Red Cross has taken care of me up until now, but don't know what I am going to do now. I know I contracted this in France—but try and prove it to those pension men. I don't suppose any of those guys stood in that mud and rain. It is funny any of us fellows have any feet. I stood in mud sixteen days once, and was on duty all that time. Never did have dry feet—and freezing weather.

I know I am sure entitled to some compensation, if any soldier is. I cannot work and my wife is trying to make a living and send our boys to school. She is not very strong. She has had three operations, and I left up there on account of her health. I wish you would do what you can. If you do not think I have suffered with this foot, ask my mother. She knows how long I have been bothered. I went to Doctor Mulloy in 1927 and also in 1931, but he did not know what was wrong.

I was treated a little for trench feet in the hospital, but they have no record. We used to sit with our feet in coal oil. I have seen several of the boys in the ward I was in with toes and parts of their feet just rotting away. I was in a British hospital in England, and I do not think half the records were kept. Three thousand patients in this hospital, so you can see they were busy and maybe some of the records were lost, or not even put on record. Let them read this letter and see if they would like to be a soldier and get the breaks we got.

I am a member of the Canadian legion, and we have a pension office here. And they have helped me and are still working on my case, and all of the legion say I am entitled to it. I have not asked for pension until last fall, and I have paid all my doctors' bills myself and I do not know how much I have paid. I never asked for a cent of relief in my life, yet. But I am down now and cannot work, and I do not suppose I ever will be able to.

Mr. Speaker, I knew that young man when as a boy, blooming, fresh and vigorous at eighteen years of age, he signed up. I knew that boy when he was returned, and when he signed up again. I know his family. They are in my constituency; I know them all by name. I know that what that boy says is the absolute truth. But can we get anything for him, to help him?—no, sir. I am going to read to the house a letter he received on March 10, 1938. But before doing so, may I say I do not blame the officials in charge. In my judgment they are as fine and sympathetic a lot of men as one could put together. But the laws which we in this parliament have passed have bound those men, with the result that they must write something like what I am going to read:

The commissioners, having reviewed your claim for entitlement to pension in respect of Buerger's disease resulting in amputation of right foot are regretfully of the opinion that this condition has no relation to your service. The commissioners' decision reads as follows:

"This man had two periods of service. He first enlisted February 4, 1915. Served in Canada only and was discharged September 17, 1915, medically unfit.

He reenlisted March 31, 1916, served in France and was discharged November 21, 1917. On his second enlistment he was treated for pyrexia of unknown origin. He was returned to Canada in November, 1917, because of pre-enlistment defective hearing.

The date of application for Buerger's disease October, 1937. Claim is made that the Buerger's disease originated with the pyrexia of unknown origin on service. First evidence of treatment is that of Doctor Mulloy of Cardston, who states he treated Ellison in 1927, and again in 1931. The evidence fails to show relationship to service, and the application is not granted."

I should like to invite your attention to the printed letter which I am enclosing. This sets out certain information with which you are entitled to be furnished, relative to proceeding further with your application, should you desire to do so.

May I just point out to members of the house that that man was down there, on his back. His wife was working to keep the wolf from the door. They are trying to put two boys through school. And yet he is granted a permit to come up here to Canada to present his case again!

I am going to read the letter which I wrote to the authorities on June 27, 1938. This was addressed to General H. F. McDonald, chairman of the Canadian pension commission, and reads:

There is coming before your commission some time this summer the case of R. D. Ellison, West 2215, Mallon Avenue, Spokane, Washington, U.S., who is requesting pension as a result of Buerger's disease contracted while on service in France which resulted in the amputation of a foot.

You will doubtless, I know, appreciate any first hand information to aid you in making your decision. As Mr. Ellison enlisted from my constituency and as both he and all his family are personally well known to me, I am perhaps in a position to give you as accurate an account of his past as anyone in Canada.

Before he enlisted he seemed well and strong. His family are all vigorous, healthy people, and the only physical defect which could be in any way detected in Mr. Ellison was a slight defect in his hearing. He was particularly impressed upon my mind because of his rather outstanding athletic ability and achievements, and I think we could safely assume that before going to France his limbs were sound.

The fact that he reenlisted seems to me to weigh heavily in his favour as you know that it took plenty of courage and patriotism for a youth to sign up once; to sign up a second time after having had experience in that awful struggle required genuine heroism.

Your own observations must have proved to you that many men are of such self-sacrificing, stoical, and independent make-up that they scorn to think of having the state or anybody else keeping them. They enlisted to serve their country and their king and to fight for the cause; especially was that the attitude of our noblest prior to and immediately after 1914. The result was that after discharge many men who were suffering minor pains and disabilities omitted to mention them feeling that they would wear off, or that such disabilities were only to be expected and to be courageously endured by any man whose lot it was to serve in war.

Mr. Ellison and his family generally are of that rather stoical make-up, and the result was that for a long time, although apprehensively aware that all was not right in his feet, he did not inform the officials of his condition as he could not know that there might be developing in his limbs a slowly progressing malignant malady such as Buerger's disease. This of course caused him to neglect to keep such evidence as he might have kept tending to prove that his disability was traceable to his hardships in France, where at one time I am informed he stood in mud and rain for sixteen days; a performance sufficient to destroy the health of anyone. It would appear that any man who had gone through such a trial would never again be the same; that his vitality would be permanently impaired, and that the tissues of the parts of his body particularly subjected to such a strain would have their resistance to malady definitely weakened.

In the case of a man who has gone through such rigours, I believe every possible allowance ought to be made to give him the full benefit of any doubt. The fact that he is in the United States will not predispose any judge against him when it is remembered that he had to go down into Washington for his wife's health.

Mr. Ellison is in painful need; he is deserving of his country.

I am sure that this man's case received every consideration which could be given to it. This is a letter I received under date of July 2, 1938:

In the absence of General McDonald, I have to acknowledge your letter of June 27 last in the above noted case.

On the first hearing of Mr. Ellison's case, the commissioners, with great regret, were unable to find that Buerger's disease had any relation to service, and the application had to be disallowed.

Mr. Ellison, however, has asked that his case proceed to a second hearing and he has appointed the dominion command service bureau of the Canadian legion in Ottawa to represent him during the second hearing. Mr. Ellison may rest assured that, if it is at all possible for the commissioners to grant him a pension, they will be only too glad to do so.

I may add, as regards the last paragraph but one of your letter, the fact that Mr. Ellison is living in the United States has no bearing whatsoever on his claim. The domicile or nationality of a pensioner or an applicant for pension is immaterial to his claim.

There is nothing wrong with that letter. It is just as kindly, sympathetic and earnest a letter as could be written. I am sure all was done that could be done or that was implied in that letter would be done. Having left at home the next letter which they wrote me, I called up the pensions branch and asked them to send me a copy of the letter they had sent later on dealing with this case. I am putting all these details on the record because I want to be perfectly fair to all the people concerned. I want to bring the case up to date, up to the day on which we are considering it. This is the letter I received from General McDonald under date of March 14, 1939:

I am enclosing herewith copy of a letter which was addressed to you on July 2, last, with regard to Mr. Ellison's case. Since that time Mr. Ellison has been awarded a slight aggravation in respect of otitis media and received a gratuity in this respect for $100 as the disability from this condition is very slight at the present time.

The most serious condition he has is Buerger's disease. The commission have not found that the evidence which has been submitted has been sufficient to relate this condition to his service, but it is now being investigated further by two commissioners who are in the west at the present time, and I have been advised by them that they are seeking advice from the doctors who attended him in the United States at Soap Lake, Washington, and they are making an endeavour to visit that place in order to further consider the matter so that if possible every bit of evidence in Mr. Ellison's favour will be brought out. I do not anticipate that their final decision will be given for a few weeks yet, but I will let you know just as soon as I receive it.

Let me hasten to say that with these letters, with the attitude of these men, with the attitude of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) there is absolutely no fault to find. They are doing everything which lies in their power, and yet this man is suffering as no Canadian who fought for his country should be allowed to suffer. The responsibility rests upon us in this chamber.

I think I have spoken as long as I choose to speak, but there is one thing more I should like to say. In my opinion we are treating our returned men in a niggardly fashion. If Canada were a poor country in which there was not the means of an abundant life, it would be a different matter. But there is in this dominion a superabundance of everything that a returned soldier needs to support himself and his family. The fact that we are not making it possible to give to the returned men a sufficiency of that abundance will stand as a condemnation of us and of our generation. How that sufficiency could be given is another matter, but it can be given. Of that there is no possible doubt.

There is just one more observation I believe I shall make before I sit down. Hon. members must have been disturbed by the fact that to-day in the Dominion of Canada and throughout the British empire there is not that fervent alacrity and readiness to serve which existed when we were young men. Why? Largely because of the way in which we are treating these returned men. It is hard enough to-day for a young man to live when he has all his limbs and faculties. Only this summer I spoke to one young man who will be available for the next war. He said that when war comes they would have to go, but he was going to do everything in his power to get into the air force or the navy. When I asked him why, he said the reason was that it would be all over quickly. If we believe we can build an army strong enough to fight the future foes of this land out of men who have been so disheartened that they say things like that, then we are not facing realities. In the very interests of this country and the safety of our empire, such changes should be made as will make the young men, upon whose shoulders the burden of the next war will fall, feel that there is at least some possibility of their being compensated in some measure for the terrible sacrifices which they will be called upon to make. It is my plea, sir, that something be done before it is too late.

Mr. A. A. BROWN (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to speak on this bill to-night, but I should like to say a few words. I well remember the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) stating about two years ago that we should write to him if any returned man had a grievance and had been turned down by the board on account of some technicality or another.

Mr. POWER: I am sure I never said that.

Mr. SPENCE: I never got anything like that from the minister anyway.

Mr. POWER: My hon. friend knows very well I cannot change any decision of the pension commission.

Mr. BROWN: That was my understanding, but the minister's statement now is confirmed by his letters. He could not overrule the board.

Mr. POWER: Read the act.

Mr. BROWN: Yes, but I understood the minister to make the statement in this house that I mentioned in my opening remarks. I accept his word at once.

Mr. POWER: I could not have said that. Under the law I could not change a decision of the pension commissioners.

Mr. BROWN: I want to bring to the attention of the minister the fact that many cases have been rejected by the board on account of technicalities which I think the minister should take some cognizance of and do his best to remedy. I have in my riding a man who served overseas. Before enlisting, he was an athlete in the pink of condition. At the front he was gassed and shell-shocked. He spent considerable time in hospital, and when he came back to the city of Hamilton he was examined only for his heart, and possibly his dental condition. Within a couple of months of his discharge he became troubled with bronchial and asthmatic conditions. Before his discharge he had been passed as fit by one of the doctors who thought he was doing this chap a good turn. Various doctors stated that his bronchial and asthmatic conditions were the result of his war service, but like a good many other soldiers he fought his battles alone and did not wish to become a burden to the country. Three or four years later, when he was no longer in a position to support himself, his savings and earning capacity having gone, he applied for a pension, and he was told, "Your board states that you were discharged physically fit." But, Mr. Speaker, we can produce doctors who will state that undoubtedly this man's condition was caused by his war service.

Another soldier was awarded a partial disability pension for bronchial trouble. He is now becoming absolutely deaf. Physicians for the board say that his deafness has nothing to do with his bronchial trouble. On the other hand, we have specialists who will state that the deafness was undoubtedly caused by the bronchial and asthmatic conditions for which he was receiving a partial disability pension.

Another case is that of the widow of a soldier who was receiving a pension. Some of the doctors stated that the soldier's death was probably caused by his war service. Other doctors attributed it to something else. I think that in such circumstances, where a soldier served overseas for three or four years, was wounded and subjected to gas attacks, he should be given the benefit of any doubt.

Then there is the wife of a returned man, with six children. He was turned down for a pension, and his wife says, "I am going to vote communist in the next election because the government is not looking after the returned men who fought overseas."

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to enter into any monetary discussion of where we are going to find the money to pay for these pensions, as my hon. friend to my left (Mr. Blackmore) started to do, but there are two or three matters I should like to bring to the attention of the minister.

I think this bill is a good one. If I understand it correctly, it does away with the appeal board in Ottawa and sets up appeal boards which will come a little closer to the problems which have to be considered. But I wonder if it would not have been better if the bill had gone a step further and set up some kind of sympathetic board such as they have in England. I am sure the minister knows of this board and that some five hundred cases in England, which would have been a travesty on justice if left as they were, were looked after by the board. We have a great many such cases in Canada, border-line cases of one kind or another, such as a chap in my riding who was afflicted with a funny nerve disease called disseminated sclerosis. The minister no doubt knows the name. It strikes you here, there or some other place in the body. I think the minister understands. But it is very difficult to say just what causes this disease. There is a very great difference of opinion between the doctors, whether this disease is a result of war service or not. I endeavoured to get a pension for this man, who had this border-line disease, but his application was turned down. I think if we had some kind of sympathetic board such as they have in England, and they had seen the record of this man and the difficulties he had gone through during the war, he probably would be getting a pension now. But he was turned down flat.

There are a great many of these cases, and it is difficult to know whether their disability at present is the result of war service or not. We do know that some men are better off as a result of the medical attention they have received during their service, but there are others who seem to go down hill later on, and therefore it is hard to find out whether their trouble is attributable to war service.

To a certain extent I am in favour of this bill, but might it not have been a good idea to extend it a little? There is another class of men, for example, who might have been considered, the imperial veterans. The imperial veteran is like an outcast so far as pensions in Canada are concerned. After all, he is a Canadian and he gets a very small pension from the British government. Living conditions in Canada are different from those in England, and he is having more and more difficulty as time goes on in securing what may be called his rights.

My suggestion to the minister last year was that he should allow these veterans to avail themselves of the services of the advocates connected with our pension department. I do not think the suggestion was too far afield, that the imperials might have the service of the pension department's advocates so that they might be saved expense in their efforts to obtain the pensions which they deserve but apparently cannot get.

There is another point. Last year I was the first member to bring up in the House of Commons the plight of the war widows of Canada. There are not so many of them that should be receiving pensions. We must remember that when our boys went overseas, from 1914 to 1918, they were told that Canada would look after them and their dependents. Canada has done a pretty good job so far, but what do we find now? We find that the war widow whose husband was in receipt of less than eighty per cent pension has great difficulty in getting a pension at all. If her husband dies of a non-pensionable disease, she has a very hard time. If he dies of cancer or of some disease of that sort, she is out of luck, but if he had died two or three days later of a pensionable disease she would get a pension. There are about 2,000 war widows in Canada whose husbands were receiving pensions of from ten to eighty per cent disability, and their maximum pension would be $60 a month. If the husband dies of a non-pensionable disease, the widow is out of luck. But why should she be cut off just because the man dies of a non-pensionable disease whereas, if he lived two or three days longer and died of a pensionable disease, she might have some chance of obtaining a pension?

If these 2,000 war widows obtained $60 a month each, the total would be only about $1,144,000 a year, and that is not very much for the country to pay to redeem all the promises made to our soldiers when they went overseas originally, and the assurance given them that their dependents would not want. I think we might easily have gone further in this bill and extended it to cover these war widows. We must also remember that times are getting harder. These women are getting older all the time, and it does seem a pity that they should be destitute, sometimes with children to look after. They helped their husbands when they were getting a thirty or forty per cent pension and we might have done something in their behalf.

There is one other point which I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. It comes under the Militia Act, but I will bring it up now. In 1919 the Militia Act was revised with respect to pensions. The pensions of those in the militia were increased, but those poor fellows who were pensioned before 1919 have now the same status that they had then. Nothing was done about them. I have asked the Minister of Pensions (Mr. Power) whether he could not persuade the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) to do something under the Militia Act to take care of these men. There are only about ninety or one hundred of them in Canada to-day, and I do not think that these injustices should continue.

I am glad to see that the Pension Act is being amended. I believe the quorums will be in closer touch with the cases and we shall consequently have more justice. I do wish the minister would consider setting up what we might call a sympathetic board to adjudicate on these border-line cases that appeal to our sympathy. We are all anxious to see that no injustices continue against those boys who went overseas and gave such service to the country. I could bring down a volume of pension cases and read them to the house. I have upstairs in my room seven or eight hundred petitions, as one might call them, from war widows. I should be glad to have them bound and give them to the Minister of Pensions for his attention.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): I rise to ask one or two questions of the minister. I know a number of returned men, whose cases I have on file, who have not been successful in getting their pension. The first question I would ask is whether, if this board is changed, it will be possible for those people to have a pension.

Mr. POWER: I cannot reply until we get into committee.

[Mr. Ross (St. Paul's).]

Mr. McIVOR: I know that one of the outstanding reasons which make it difficult for a returned man to get a pension is that they were in such a hurry to get home that they signed off. I said to one man, "Why were you in such a hurry to get home?" He said, "Look here, Dan, if you had not seen your wife and two wee kiddies for four years you would break your neck to get home." And I suppose I would. I know this Pension Act has been improved year after year; I know that after examining the files in the pension board I realized that I had been too hasty in forming a conclusion. I have the record of eight returned men and two war widows who, I think, are entitled to pension, and a generous one. I will give the case of one man who was receiving a fair pension. He had many wounds, and was not as fit for work as the average man. Seemingly he was never out of pain; the only time he had any relief was when he got tight. Then one day something happened, he went down into his own cellar and passed out suddenly. His wife cannot get a pension.

I am proud to-day of the attitude of our returned men all over Canada in relation to our empire and the defence of Canada; many of them are ready to offer their services again. I repeat my question to the minister: Will these people, men or women who have not been successful up to the present time, have any hope under this bill of getting a pension? When I came down and told the story and showed the facts concerning one man, he got a pension, and whether it was the excitement or what, he lived only two weeks after that. I could take the chairman of the pension board into a home in Fort William to-day, and unless there is something very peculiar on the file I am sure that man would receive more consideration.

We are told that returned men should get the benefit of the doubt. I know from my experience in about ten cases that they got the benefit of the doubt. I am sure that the Minister of Pensions (Mr. Power) is just as keen as we are to see that every soldier gets his due, and I am sure he will do his best. I have not any fault to find with any official. But I am anxious to know whether there will be any hope for these people under this bill when it is shown that there is an outstanding need.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): This bill deals almost wholly with the abolition of the appeal court, and a few minor but some fairly substantial changes, all of them for the benefit, I think, of the returned men.

The minister must be gratified at the almost unanimous support his bill has received; I have not heard or read any criticism of what is in the bill, but merely of what is not in it, so to speak. I was not in the house when the earlier debate on the second reading took place, but I have read it in Hansard since, and particularly the speeches made by hon. members from British Columbia, the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), who gave in temperate and non-partisan language a clear exposition of the situation as we see it in British Columbia, where there are so many returned men. Apparently they joined in asking that the minister submit the bill to a pension committee to be set up as in former years. I should like to join in that request. We think of the committees in the past, of which the minister himself was always the most prominent member and very often the chairman, and of the great work he always did in that regard. That was one committee, I think about the only one, that deliberated in a non-partisan spirit, and its report, which was generally unanimous, was of such a character that the government could readily give attention to it, being distinguished, I repeat, by the absence of any political element.

Sending this bill to such a committee would enable a number of matters to be debated, some of which have been touched on here to-night, which it would be impossible thoroughly to discuss here, because the officials are not here and the minister cannot reply to questions until we go into committee; in any event, there are many phases which cannot be adequately discussed in committee of the whole house. I received a letter this morning—I have it before me now; I did not know this question was coming up to-night—touching on a number of features, all of which have been put before the house by one or another of the hon. members from British Columbia. The question of pensions for veterans of the Fenian raid could also be debated before that committee. Even in a political sense I cannot see that the government would have anything to lose by setting up this committee and referring the bill to it, with these other questions which have come up. For one thing it would save a great deal of time and relieve the government of responsibility. The report would probably be unanimous, as I think it always has been; the government could say in defence of their action before the country that this non-partisan committee agreed to so and so, whereas if they go ahead as they are doing now they will have to accept the whole responsibility for matters for which they are perhaps not entirely responsible. Therefore I should like to join with the other hon. members who have urged that pensions matters go to a committee.

It appears probable from the program outlined by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to-day that we are going to be here for a long time yet, and there will probably be ample time for such a committee to sit and consider the whole question; and after all the government have control of both the committee and the house. It would give the ex-soldiers and their representatives the feeling that they got a run for their money at any rate, and that their grievances have received consideration. Some are sound and fundamental, others quite casual and perhaps not deserving of great consideration, but in any event they will be discussed without partisan bias by soldiers; for most of the committee would be ex-soldiers, representing every section of the house and the country. That would be to the benefit of the government and of the country, and certainly it would give the soldiers a feeling of satisfaction even if they did not get all they seek; they would have the satisfaction at any rate of knowing that their case had been heard fairly and fully by an unbiased tribunal.

Mr. J. A. MARSHALL (Camrose): I deem it my duty to take part in the debate on the second reading of Bill No. 6, the purpose of which is to amend the Pension Act. I was a member of the committee which was set up by the house to study the problems of returned men in 1936. The meetings of the committee in that year were interesting to me, and a great deal of progress was made towards the solution of some of the problems confronting the returned men. Since 1936, however, no meetings of that committee have been held, and I believe the time has now come when the committee should sit again to take into consideration the problems which have arisen during the last two years.

The bill now under consideration provides for two changes. The first is the abolition of the pension appeal court and the setting up of appeal boards of the commission, each consisting of three members, in place of the present quorum of the commission. The second change simply extends the time for pension applications to the year 1942.

I am not so much concerned as to whether or not this is a wise move. I am more concerned with the result than with the methods adopted to obtain that result. This change in the act is simply a change of method; we are changing from a pension appeal court to an appeal board of the commission. As I have just said, I am more concerned about the results which we shall obtain from that change than with the methods to be followed. If the results are no better than those of the past, then I must condemn the change. If, on the other hand, we have the word of the minister that it is for the good of the returned soldier, that it will be more beneficial to him, then I am heartily behind the minister. In reference to the second change, the extension of the time to 1942, this simply means that returned men who saw service in an actual theatre of war may have until that year to make application for pension; in other words, it extends the time to one year beyond the life of the present parliament.

I believe the success or failure of the new set-up will depend entirely upon the attitude of mind which will be brought by the members of these boards to the consideration of the cases that come before them. If they concentrate their attention more upon the financial aspect than upon the moral aspect of the situation, then no good will result. If, on the other hand, they are genuinely sincere in desiring to find a solution to the problems of the returned men, the change will be indeed worth while. In advocating that the committee should sit during this session, however, I do so because other problems concerning the returned men require attention. These problems have been outlined already by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), but perhaps I may be pardoned if I list some of them again. No provision is made in any of the acts—I do not use the word "pension" because that is a method of bringing about a certain result—for children born after May 1, 1933. No provision is made in respect of the wife of a pensioner married after May 1, 1933. No provision has been made to take care of the widow of a pensioner unless he dies of a pensionable disability or was in receipt of a pension of eighty per cent or more. These are very important problems which should be discussed by the committee this session. I feel quite sure that the committee, working harmoniously as it did in 1936, could bring in recommendations that would be adopted unanimously by this house.

There is one other problem that has not been tackled as yet; that is the submission that the remainder of the returned soldiers unemployed be provided for by the payment of an allowance to be known as the provisional economic allowance. I believe that is something which should be carefully studied as a possible method of bringing about a certain result, and I believe that committee, if it were called together and given an opportunity of discussing this important matter, could arrive at something that would be well worth while. So I would add my voice to those who have already spoken, in asking the minister in all sincerity to call the committee together during the present session in order that we may discuss some of the important problems that confront the returned men at the present time.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): There are just one or two observations I should like to make, Mr. Speaker; and without taking time to reiterate what has been said by some of the other hon. members who have spoken, let me tell the minister that I endorse the first half of the remarks made by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) in regard to the cases he cited. I endorse what was said by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) in regard to war widows, and also what was said by the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Brown). With regard to the last half of the remarks of the hon. member for Lethbridge, in connection with finding the money, I disagree with him.

I should like to make this other observation, which I made in this house three years ago. It will not be very long before most of these cases are taken care of by Father Time. Another decade will see a large number of these men pass on. So could not this House of Commons, as a unit, support any legislation that will see to it that we as a body do our bit until such time as these men are removed from the scene by time? In that connection I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the plight of the widows, as mentioned by the hon. member for St. Paul's. If a census were taken to ascertain the number of widows who are not in receipt of pensions, and the number of widowers who served overseas and who are not receiving pensions, I think it would be found that there were twice as many widows as widowers.

My point is that a medical man in giving his findings might say that a soldier had probably died from cancer. Perhaps the minister will agree that cancer is one of the diseases which carries off a great many returned men. It may be that their illness from that disease is not related to war service. The same individual might have been shell-shocked and subsequently discharged from the army as being fit. Then, a number of men who served overseas might pass away from heart attack, which could not be attributable to war service. Nevertheless these men have left widows and dependents behind them.

Since their return from overseas the men who had families to provide for found themselves competing with another generation which had grown up during the time they were serving overseas. The returned men have found it difficult to compete in the labour market and to earn sufficient to provide themselves even with the bare necessities of life. Some of those men have passed away, leaving their families more or less destitute through no fault of their own.

My observations are not a reflection on the conduct of the department over which the minister has the privilege of presiding. I believe that ever since the war the department under very difficult circumstances has been trying to do a job. On most of the occasions it has been my privilege to pass judgment on the department I have found fair treatment. I believe the minister will agree with me that only rarely have I found it necessary to speak to him. In fact, since he has been minister of the department, I do not think he has seen me in his office many times.

Coupled with these remarks I should like to make this further one, that I do not believe in any other constituency in Canada there are more cases for consideration by the pension branch than in the one in the suburban area outside Toronto it has been my privilege to represent. I have found the men concerned quite reasonable in their requests. On the other hand, I have found the department and the pension commission reasonable and considerate in the discussion of cases.

But what I want to urge at this time is this: As the time is very short, let us all as a unit, including all parties, do everything humanly possible for the returned men and widows, so that generations to come will be able to say that in this particular regard we have not failed.

I am sorry that I could not follow that section of the remarks of the hon. member for Lethbridge in which he set out his method of finding the money which would be required. I believe the hon. member outlined the Social Credit method of finding the money. As an alternative, may I suggest a more practical way of doing it? It would appear that in the next two—or perhaps six months, depending upon the temper of the house—staggering sums of money will be voted. In those sums I do not include moneys required by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). I would hope that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) would find ways and means for an equal distribution, or a distribution having regard to the principle of representation by population. I should like to see the ministry rise in its place—and by the way I see my point has not been clearly understood by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar). I was suggesting that instead of the Minister of Public Works trying to figure out supplementary estimates amounting to many millions of dollars to be distributed according to the principle of representation by population, otherwise known as "rep. by pop," that you, sir, as Minister of Mines and Resources and as one of the senior members of the cabinet, together with other ministers of the crown, just take that public works money which we shall be asked to vote, cut it in half, and give the remaining half to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) for purposes of pensions.

Mr. POWER: Give it to me.

Mr. HARRIS: The minister says, "Give it to me." I would say it should be cut in half, and certainly I would trust the Minister of Pensions and National Health with it for pension legislation.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall have a great deal of pleasure in conveying the hon. member's suggestion to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. HARRIS: Well, that would be "progress reported" at least. Cut the supplementary estimates in half, so that a half could be directed to those pieces of legislation concerning pensions which are presently on the statute books. Have those moneys equitably distributed, without fear or favour, by the Minister of Pensions and National Health.

We have only about ten years left in which to do everything possible for the returned men. While I am anxious to see economy practised, at the same time I am anxious to see written on the records of history, in the days to come, that without playing politics or conferring any favours on any particular group or class the dominion parliament did its part for those who served to save Canada between 1914 and 1918.

Mr. J. C. LANDERYOU (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I do not feel that I can agree with the hon. member who has just spoken. To my mind it is unnecessary to rob Peter to pay Paul. All I would suggest is that the government carry out the promises which were made in the 1935 election campaign, upon which occasion they stated they were going to issue money and credit sufficient to meet the needs of all. I notice the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) is smiling and nodding his head. I can remember that in many of the provinces he made the statement that there was no shortage of money. That was before he occupied the treasury benches. I believe $430,000,000 was the figure he mentioned at that time, on numerous occasions.

Mr. STEVENS: As a start.

Mr. LANDERYOU: But I do hope that without robbing Peter to pay Paul the government will fulfil its promise to issue money in terms of public need.

I do not believe the bill goes far enough, and I agree with some hon. members who have said that it should be referred to a committee. Many problems have developed in connection with ex-service men, their widows and dependents. Many hon. members from time to time have urged the minister and the government to pass legislation to deal with the problems of the widows of ex-service men. Many have found it very difficult to trace the death of their husbands to war service. At this time I wish to add my views to those of other hon. members who have urged the government to pension the widows of ex-service men, to pay them a straight economic allowance sufficient to meet their requirements.

There is also the question of the ex-service man who was not wounded overseas, who is not in receipt of a pension and who finds himself unable to compete on the labour market with the younger generation. There are no opportunities for such men in industry; there are no opportunities for them in employment of any kind.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): How about Mr. Aberhart?

Mr. LANDERYOU: He is not an ex-service man.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): He can take care of everybody in some way.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The average age of these men is somewhere near fifty years, and it is practically an impossibility for them to secure employment. I feel that a straight economic allowance should be paid to these ex-service men who are now walking the highways and byways of this country without an opportunity for employment of any kind.

Mr. R. E. FINN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak to-night, but I rise for the purpose of complimenting the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) upon bringing down this revamped legislation. I believe it is a step in the right direction; it is an expression of what is in the heart of every hon. member. We all want to see something more done for the returned man if it is at all possible. In fairness to those who were not old enough to go overseas, but who were quite near that age, let me say that they too should receive some consideration from this government and from hon. gentlemen irrespective of party. Hon. gentlemen opposite spoke of these returned men as those who are going down the lane where there will be a last turn before they eventually go to mother earth. I think we should remember that this parliament has been very generous in its desire to do the best it possibly can for these men. I do not want to minimize the service of those who went overseas; I do not want to minimize the service of those who remained at home worrying and wondering whether their loved ones would return—there are those who sacrificed their lives and have asked nothing in return for the great sacrifice they made.

I rise only for the purpose of saying that we should not get the returned soldier in a frame of mind where he thinks that very little has been done for him. Every hon. gentleman knows that in connection with the appointment to every civil service position there is a thirty per cent benefit in favour of the returned soldier. If a return could be made of the positions in every department of government, it would show the large percentage of overseas men who have been appointed to the service and who are now receiving their earthly reward for their fine soldierly service. I do not want for one moment to minimize the service that anyone gave in the great war, because that came very close to me. I saw my young nephew off on a transport which left Halifax, but to-day he is buried in France. He died when only eighteen years of age. Like many others he gave his life for what Woodrow Wilson said was to make democracy safe for the world.

Camp Hill hospital is located in my constituency, and I am glad to see that the minister is making it possible for greater help to be given to the returned soldier who is not able to work because of his overseas service. As I understand this legislation, these men will now be permitted to enter hospital for treatment. Previously they were turned away. I know of returned men in Halifax who are ill, who are nervous, who are suffering many pains, but who have not been permitted to enter the hospital for treatment. The staff in the hospital receive large salaries and are almost falling over each other in carrying out their medical and surgical duties, but these men cannot get treatment. I am not talking about the man who is able to go about and enjoy God's sunlight and fresh air; I am talking about the poor returned soldier who is ill, but to whom these doctors have previously turned a deaf ear. I am glad the minister has provided for the hospitalization of these men.

By this legislation these applications may be reopened until 1942. These are comprehensive measures. I heard some hon. member across the floor say that the estimates of the Department of Public Works should be cut in half, one-half being handed over to the returned soldiers. The Department of Public Works, under the able management of the deputy minister, Mr. Hunter, and the chief engineer, Mr. Cameron, see to the needs of Canada in connection with breakwaters, wharves, dredging and various other matters which are important to the whole of Canada. They must be looked after because, if Canada dies, how can we look after the returned soldier?

These are just a few passing thoughts which came to my mind as I listened to the hon. gentlemen speak. I think there is the desire on the part of all hon. members, irrespective of party or group, to do the best possible for the returned man and to pass such enabling legislation as will be comprehensive to all, whether or not he be learned in the law. For these reasons I am proud to congratulate the hon. Minister of Pensions and National Health, and if in his judgment and the judgment of the house the bill should go to a special committee, there to be gone over and made more straight and less devious for the returned soldier and his widow and dependent children, I shall be pleased on all occasions to give the best that is in me to bring about such results and to make the returned soldier and his dependents feel that we have not forgotten those who fell in Flanders fields where the poppies grow.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Just a word or two, Mr. Speaker, before the bill receives its second reading. First, I want to say that I think everybody is convinced that in the minister himself the department is headed by one who for years has held a very prominent place in this house in the battle for the rights of the returned soldiers; and under him the minister has in General McDonald one for whom the returned men have every respect and the warmest regard.

I heard a member say a few moments ago that he had more returned men in his riding than in any other, but I doubt if any riding has more returned men than the riding of

[Mr. Finn.]

Toronto-Davenport, in which is situated Earlscourt, from which so many, many regiments went overseas.

I have read the bill through just casually, and I may have overlooked something that I had in mind, namely, the hope that the bill would contain some easier provision applying to the widows of returned soldiers. I have several such cases in mind, but I do not think it is necessary for me to mention them specifically at the moment. There is, however, one in particular that has been under my notice for some time, the claim of Mrs. Fuller, whose husband died in the north country, through having been frozen to death on his way back to civilization. I hope that if this bill is referred to a special committee, as I understand is the minister's intention, provision will be made for hearing the widows of returned soldiers, so that they may appear and present their cases in connection with amendments that may be proposed to take care of this class.

I have nothing further to add, but as one representing many returned soldiers I do hope that the sad lot of so many of them who have not received consideration, will be improved through the provisions of this bill.

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, before this bill receives its second reading, I want to associate myself with those who have spoken on behalf of the ex-service men.

Reference has been made to the fast declining number of ex-service men, and that is all too evident throughout Canada. There are one or two classes that I should like particularly to mention. I am heartily in accord with giving all the support that can be granted to the widow of the returned soldier. I know the minister knows, as does every member of this house, that there are a great many widows of returned soldiers who have nursed their husbands through long sickness. The soldier may have been in receipt of a partial or total disability pension, granted sometimes upon compassionate grounds, through the benefit of the doubt being given where the particulars on the discharge certificate were not too clear. Then, when the soldier has died, technicalities are raised, possibly a post-mortem is held, and the benefit of the doubt is not given to the widow and family of the deceased soldier, although to the average lay mind it would seem that the widow and the family should be provided for through a pension.

I know of such cases. One returned soldier was receiving a considerable pension. He died and his widow has now two sons growing up to manhood. Through a technicality these two sons have the humiliating experience of seeing their mother being forced to go out to do domestic work, and it is difficult for these boys who are growing up to understand why the pension of their father, who gave his all for this country, is not permitted to be carried on for at least a few more years to his widow until perhaps she reaches the time when she would be eligible for old age pension.

These are tragic cases, and surely when this bill is under consideration in committee some consideration will be given to providing for them. More latitude should be allowed. We know that the officers of the several departments are most efficient. Tribute has already been paid to them and it does not need repetition at this moment; nevertheless the officials repeatedly say: "We have to live within the terms of the act." I say, Mr. Speaker, let us try to make this act a little more in keeping with our humanitarian ideas, and so I trust that the minister in his wisdom and the committee in their deliberations on this bill will be able to enlarge its provisions to take a little better care of just such cases as I have mentioned. These two boys, who are now growing up to manhood, have seen their father's life sacrificed, his pension cut off, and his widow forced to go out to work simply because his discharge certificate did not contain all the information it should have contained.

Widows and their growing families, descendants of our war veterans, are being robbed of their rights just because some little detail was neglected. I appeal for greater consideration for these soldiers' widows and their families, so that there will not be a blot on the records of this parliament in our treatment of the families of the men who were promised so much when they went overseas in 1914, and so that the growing sons of our returned men, if we should within the next few weeks face similar difficulties again, will not in bitterness say, "If I go I expect to get the same treatment my father got." It is up to this government to see that there is no possible recurrence of these cases. It is up to us in this parliament and it is up to the people of Canada to keep faith with the veterans who went overseas, many of whom are still suffering anguish and all kinds of hardships. Let us keep faith with them and show that Canada stands behind the men who stood for us in our time of need.

Motion (Mr. Power) agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—"Court."

Mr. POWER: Almost all the amendments refer only to cases in which the appeal court was mentioned, and there is a change to "appeal board of the commission." There are a very large number of sections in the act, but under a rule adopted last year it was found necessary to rewrite almost every section which was changed, in many instances simply by the alteration of one word.

Mr. STEVENS: In other words, the effect of the bill is to abolish the appeal court and to replace it with an appeal board.

Mr. POWER: Appeal board of the commission.

Mr. GREEN: Is the minister unwilling to refer the bill to a special committee?

Mr. POWER: I do not think it is necessary to refer it. If the bill were referred to a committee, I do not think the committee would consider it for five minutes, because the house is unanimously in favour of every section, or nearly every section of it. Last year I was blamed, censured and railed at by all sections of the house because I did not immediately introduce a bill to abolish the appeal court. Now that I do it, I am asked to send the bill to a committee. The house was unanimously in favour of the bill, and I do not know why it should go to a committee.

Mr. GREEN: The reason why we ask that it be sent to a committee is that the other defects of the act may be considered.

Mr. POWER: That has nothing to do with this bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Jurisdiction of commission.

Mr. MacNEIL: Will the minister explain the functions of the appeal board to be constituted as part of the commission?

Mr. POWER: They have very much the same jurisdiction as the quorum at the present time, the jurisdiction which the appeal court has had.

Mr. STIRLING: Will it do its work entirely in Ottawa or move about the country?

Mr. POWER: It may travel and the applicant may be heard before it.

Mr. GREEN: How many appeal boards is it intended to set up?

Mr. POWER: There will be more than likely two functioning most of the time, possibly the third at Ottawa.

Mr. MacNEIL: That will be exclusive of the appeal board which will be set up to grant leave to reopen cases?

Mr. POWER: The granting of leave to reopen cases will be one of the functions of the appeal board.

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Regulations.

Mr. GREEN: This merely makes provision for the appeal boards instead of the old pension appeal court.

Mr. POWER: That is all.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Repeal.

Mr. POWER: This repeals all sections dealing with the appeal court.

Mr. GREEN: Will there be any difference in the salaries paid, the total amount of salaries, after this bill? Will they be different from the salaries paid at the present time?

Mr. POWER: If my hon. friend wants to know whether the present pension commissioners will have their salaries increased, the answer is, no.

Mr. GREEN: Apparently the appeal court is to be abolished. Will that mean replacing four members of the appeal court by appointing four new members of the pension commission?

Mr. POWER: If my hon. friend wants to know whether provision will be made for some compensation to the present members of the appeal court, the government is considering that angle of the matter. It is not proposed to let them go without some compensation. With respect to the members of the Canadian pension commission who will become members of the appeal board, it is not proposed that there shall be any extra salary. There will be a saving of some $29,000.

Mr. GREEN: Will there be any new commissioners now?

Mr. POWER: It is possible, but not probable.

Mr. NEILL: Is it the intention of the government to appoint present members of the court as commissioners?

Mr. POWER: The present commissioners will act as appeal board.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. MacNEIL: But is it intended to reappoint those who are now members of the court?

Mr. POWER: That has not been considered. There would be nothing to prevent the government from appointing a member of the court as a member of the commission.

Mr. GREEN: The intention is largely to take members of the present commission and set them up as an appeal board?

Mr. POWER: That is all.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Registrar to be permanent employee of department.

Mr. GREEN: Why is it provided that the registrar shall hold office during pleasure?

Mr. POWER: This office of registrar was created in 1930. I do not know exactly why, but again in 1936 there was some doubt as to whether he was a civil servant or not and in order that he should not be out of a job we have made provision for him in this section. There is no particular reason for it, except that he is a registrar of the appeal court and he would possibly be out of a job unless we did something of the kind.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Repeal.

Mr. GREEN: Will there be any appeals by the crown to the new appeal board?

Mr. POWER: No; this does away with all appeals by the crown.

Mr. GREEN: Will this do away with the reviewing officer?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. MacNEIL: I wish to urge on the minister again the necessity of amending paragraph (b) of section 11 of the Pension Act. Paragraph (b) reads:

> no deduction shall be made from the degree of actual disability of any member of the forces who has served in a theatre of actual war on account of any disability or disabling condition which existed in him at the time at which he became a member of the forces; but no pension shall be paid for a disability or disabling condition which at such time was wilfully concealed, was obvious, was not of a nature to cause rejection from service, or was a congenital defect.

The amendment is necessary for the reason that under the existing regulations the intention as declared in this section is limited with regard to that exception "or was a congenital defect." The intention of parliament with regard to this section was clearly stated on previous occasions—

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out that the hon. member is discussing a section that is not in this bill.

Mr. MacNEIL: The general act has been opened up, and I desire to propose an amendment to section 11. I am attempting to explain the purpose of my amendment.

Mr. POWER: Section 11 of the act is not before us.

Mr. STEVENS: On the point of order, I think it is an accepted rule that when a bill is opened up for amendment, the whole act is open to be considered. But in order to get before the committee a section that is not in the bill referred to the committee a motion must be made in the house on third reading to re-commit the bill with instructions to the committee to do so and so. I think that is the only way in which the new matter can be given consideration.

Mr. MacNEIL: I urge the minister not to press this point of order. If this bill is not to be referred to a special committee of the house, and if we are called to order in discussing the problems that have arisen in connection with other sections of the act, we are placed in a difficult position. I point out that on a previous occasion during the present session when a general act was opened up, it was your ruling, Mr. Chairman, that amendments could be introduced with regard to other sections.

The CHAIRMAN: I quote from May twelfth edition, page 370:

> Amendments cannot be moved which are based on schedules or other provisions, the terms of which have not been placed before the committee.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Extension of time for pension application.

Mr. GREEN: This section is the only one which does not deal with the wiping out of the appeal court. But it does deal with the so-called dead-line. This section should receive the careful consideration of all hon. members. As I understand it, there was no dead-line for applications for pension before the sitting of this parliament in 1936. At that session, the first one of this parliament, a dead-line was imposed in this way: First, all men who served only in England or Canada were cut off as of the first day of July, 1936. After that date no veteran in either one of those two groups could apply for pension. A soldier who served in a theatre of war was given until January 1, 1940, to apply for pension. After that date he would have to get special leave from the pension commission before he could even apply. There was considerable argument about that provision in 1936 before the special committee on pensions and returned soldiers' problems. Many of us felt that there should be no dead-line for the veterans who had served in France. To-day I am more convinced than ever that that dead-line should be wiped out, that no such obstacle to obtaining a pension should be placed in the way of our fighting men who saw service in a theatre of war. I ask this committee to-night, regardless of party—because, after all, these soldier problems are not party matters—to do away with this dead-line. This section of the bill merely proposes to push the dead-line ahead two years, to January 1, 1942. Before that time it will have to come up for consideration again. I submit that there should be no dead-line for the fighting men. Those who apply for pension now, have to trace their disability right back to the time of the war, a very difficult task in itself, without having to get over another hurdle of getting permission from the pension commission even to apply. Many of our returned men who were wounded, who actually bear wounds received overseas, are not drawing pension because, although wounded, they have not broken down. As time goes on and these men get older, they break down as a result of their wounds. Men of that class should not be handicapped when they come to the pension commission to get compensation for disability.

In May, 1936, the house provided for a degree of finality in these matters by providing for the first time that, on what is called second hearing, an applicant had to claim for every disability. There was no such thing as coming back again in a year or two and asking compensation for some additional disability; he had to put all his eggs in the one basket. Also, the number of pension applications has been dropping year by year. In the fiscal year 1937-38, it dropped by 646 as compared with the previous year, and there had been a drop in each year for several years. So, for these reasons too, I suggest to-night that we wipe out this dead-line. For that purpose I move the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), which I think will accomplish that end:

> That bill No. 6, to amend the Pensions Act, be amended by substituting for section 8 thereof the following:

8. Section 12A of the said act, as enacted by section 11 of chapter 44 of the statutes of 1936, is amended by repealing all but the first line thereof and substituting for the portion repealed the following:

"who did not serve in a theatre of actual war shall not be awarded unless application therefor has been made before the first day of July, 1936."

If this amendment is passed, section 12A will read: "a pension for disability of a member of the forces who did not serve in a theatre of actual war shall not be awarded unless application therefor has been made before the first day of July, 1936." In other words, it leaves the dead-line as it stands at the present time for the man who served only in England or Canada, but completely wipes out any reference to a dead-line for the veteran who served in a theatre of war. I believe it is only just that there should be no dead-line for those men who, after all, were Canada's fighting men.

Mr. POWER: I have some doubt as to whether this amendment is quite in order. However, I pass that over for the moment.

I should like to direct the attention of the committee to the fact that from the time pensions were commenced, until 1930, there was always a dead-line, beyond which date applications would not be received. As a matter of fact, I think when the committee met in 1928 the dead-line had been passed, and there was a period of six or eight months during which applications for pensions could not be legally received. No great harm was done, however, there was a renewal of the dead-line, and that had been done every year or every two years. In 1936 this question was given a great deal of consideration by the committee. If the deliberations of that committee should have any authority in this house, this was one of the matters most fully discussed, namely whether or not it would be possible to set a dead-line for applications for pension. As my hon. friend has said, a dead-line was established for applications from people who saw service only in Canada. In 1936, with the unanimous consent of the committee, provision was made in the legislation under which a man, even if he were barred by the time limit, could still come before the commission and have his case considered. As a matter of fact, I think it was the unanimous opinion of the committee in 1936 that the only purpose served by a dead-line was to prevent frivolous claims from being entertained; that anyone who had a real, substantial claim could be heard under the act.

This year I came to the conclusion that there was no agitation on the part of returned soldiers, their associations or anybody else, to have this dead-line extended; but after some consideration, just in case there might be some injustice done, I thought perhaps I had better ask parliament to extend the period for another two years. But even that date is not a dead-line, in that the returned soldier has every opportunity to have his case heard and considered even after 1942, the date established in this bill. I believe the principle is good. As the house knows, in Great Britain the dead-line was set at seven years after the war. If we make certain, by legislation which was unanimously approved by members of the 1936 committee, that no injustice will be done, I hardly think my hon. friend's point is well taken.

Mr. GREEN: I think the minister will remember that this dead-line was a compromise; it was not that we all agreed to it.

Mr. POWER: So many things were compromises with my hon. friend that I cannot be sure about this one.

Mr. MacNEIL: I submit there is ample justification for the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver South. I well remember the discussion in the committee, and my understanding was that the matter was temporarily left in abeyance. The argument of the minister that the dead-line was established by previous parliamentary committees, and that therefore a dead-line should be set now, I suggest is hardly well founded. The reason the dead-line has been advanced from time to time by parliamentary committees is that it has been shown there are still men who have the right to establish entitlement under the act. There are many men who for various reasons have not advanced their claims. They may have been in prosperous circumstances and, out of some feeling of independence, felt that they should not go through the procedure required to establish entitlement. Now, perhaps on account of advancing years or depressed economic conditions, they are seized with the importance of establishing entitlement, particularly having regard to their dependents.

I am particularly interested in the ex-service men who dwell in remote settlements. I have had some experience in visiting the homes of ex-service men living in small settlements up the Pacific coast, and have been astonished at their ignorance with regard to their rights under the act. There are many men who to all appearances could easily establish entitlement to pension in respect of disabilities resulting from wounds; they bear the marks of the wounds on their bodies, but they have not the slightest idea of their rights under the act, and have not advanced their claims. The difference between the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver South and the method suggested by the minister is that under the amendment these men will have the right to advance their claims for entitlement to pension. The minister's proposal leaves it purely as a matter of discretion with the pension commission. We have no quarrel with the commission to-day; but there may be changes in the personnel; various things may occur, and those in charge of the administration of this act at some future time may not view matters in the same way. I suggest that it should always be clear that a man who served in a theatre of actual war can establish that he is suffering from a disability incurred during service, and there should be no statutory limit as to the date of application. As a matter of right, he should be able to advance his claim to entitlement; and I suggest that the very fact that from time to time we have found it necessary to set this date forward is ample justification for eliminating from the act any dead-line at all, thus leaving that right clear and unmistakable.

The CHAIRMAN: With regard to the amendment which is before the committee, I would quote Beauchesne at page 165, citation 555:

No increase can be considered either of an existing, or of a new or temporary tax for the service of the year, except on the initiative of a minister acting on behalf of the crown.

I also quote from Bourinot, at page 407:

No cases can be found of any private member in the Canadian commons receiving the authority of the crown, through a minister, to propose a motion involving the expenditure of public money. No principle is better understood than the constitutional obligation that rests upon the executive government of alone initiating measures imposing charges upon the public exchequer. On one occasion, in the English commons the consent of the crown was given to certain formal resolutions proposed by a private member with reference to charges in courts of law to be defrayed out of the consolidated fund. It was thought, however, that any resolution placing a charge on the consolidated fund should be moved by a minister of the crown, and the more regular procedure was thereupon carried out. It was distinctly affirmed, however, that the member who proposed the motion involving the charge was within his right when he had the sanction of the crown, but it was generally admitted at the same time that it was better, as a matter of policy, that the proposition should emanate from a responsible adviser of the sovereign.

I therefore rule this amendment out of order.

Mr. MacNEIL: If I may speak to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I submit that in respect of this amendment there is no proposed charge against the public treasury; it is merely a matter of administration. The amendment does not suggest an additional charge against the public treasury.

The CHAIRMAN: In giving my ruling I do so because this amendment will increase the amount of money to be paid in pensions.

Mr. GREEN: If I may speak to that point, Mr. Chairman, that is an extremely remote contingency. We are simply asking that the procedure in connection with an application for pension be kept in one stage rather than two. If this section goes through as it is presented by the minister, these men applying for pensions will have to obtain leave from the pension commission, and after that will apply for pension.

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out that the ruling is not debatable.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Carried.

Mr. GREEN: No, it is not carried.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Chairman, I move the following amendment:

That Bill No. 6 be amended by substituting for the year 1942 where it appears in section 8 thereof the year 1952.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Order. It is the same point, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. POWER: I have the same objection as I had to the other amendment. I believe the committee ought to understand that what is being done under the amendment the government is proposing is to allow an applicant to make application until 1942. Under the present Pension Act he is precluded from making application after 1940. We propose extending the time for two years. In his amendment the hon. member for St. Paul's wishes to extend it for twelve years. I would suggest to the committee that sufficient unto the day is the good thereof. It is only an argument on the question of quantum.

Mr. GREEN: We are not moving the amendment just to be funny.

Mr. POWER: It looks like it.

Mr. GREEN: There are many cases in British Columbia of fighting men who have been wounded and who realize that sooner or later they will have to apply for pensions. The great majority of them have no idea whatsoever that there is such a thing as a dead-line. If this bill were passed, after 1941 those men would have to apply to a pension commission in Ottawa to get leave to apply for pension. If the pension commissioners at that time happened to be hard-boiled, or if at that time there happened to be a depression, then it would probably be just too bad for those veterans.

I would point out that about 75,000 Canadian veterans who were wounded on service are not yet drawing pensions. They are the men who are going to be faced with this hurdle. Why make a farce of it? The minister has said that a dead-line was imposed before and that it was lifted; that it was imposed and lifted again, and so on. Why not cut out the dead-line and stop fooling with the question? Let those fighting men know that if they can prove in 1945 or 1948 or 1950 that they are disabled because of something that happened in the war, they will receive their pensions, without having to jump over the additional hurdle of getting from the pension commission a permit to apply for a pension.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): If a man is going to be entitled to a pension to-day, to-morrow, five, ten or twenty years from now, then he is in fact entitled to that pension. I do not not see any reason why there should be any dead-line. Then, if the dead-line is placed at 1942, we shall be placing a handicap on the man who thinks he may have something wrong with him in the following years. He will be hustling, and thinking up some excuse to get in under the wire. A man either is or is not entitled to a pension. There is no reason in the world why he should be precluded from getting it. The amendment suggests that it should be extended to the year 1952, which would give some further time.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: I do not see why the hon. member should be so much worried about the dead-line. Apparently on former occasions it has been changed, and I think if in 1942 it is believed that there are still men who are entitled to pension but who have not been able to avail themselves of the opportunity to apply, we can still revise the dead-line, and make it expire two or three years farther on.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Why should we have to revive it for two or three years? Why not leave it open?

Mr. ROBICHAUD: I think the question has been well explained by the minister. A committee considered this matter and they thought it desirable to have a dead-line. As I have said, it would be an easy matter to extend the date; that has been done before.

Amendment negatived: yeas, 19, nays, 52.

[Mr. Green.]

Section agreed to.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Compassionate pension or allowance.

Mr. STIRLING: To what extent has this section been made use of?

Mr. POWER: In recent years, far more than previously. Page 71 of the report for the year ending March 31, 1938, gives the following figures:

Applications to commission prior to March 31, 1937	995
Pensions awarded	174
Awards not approved	821
Applications to commission, April 1, 1937, to March 31, 1938	150
Pensions awarded	50
Awards not approved	100

Since 1935 there have been some 150 awards under the meritorious clause, and prior to that there were something like ten. My hon. friend will see that there were fifty awards from April 1, 1937, to March 31, 1938, which would appear to have been the greatest number granted in any one year.

Mr. GREEN: Apparently under this revised section 21 the new appeal boards will not have the power to grant a compassionate allowance, whereas previously the court of appeal had that right. Would it not be wise to give power to the appeal boards to grant a compassionate allowance just as the appeal court could do?

Mr. POWER: I do not think we shall be depriving anyone of much opportunity because the appeal court granted only three all the time it was functioning. I am hoping the appeal board will be more generous. The appeal board is really the Canadian pension commission sitting in appeal, so it will be made up of practically the same people.

Mr. GREEN: The inferior court, that is the pension commission with two commissioners, has the power under this section to grant a compassionate allowance, and yet the government is setting up a superior court with three members of the commission, a court which actually sees the man but which has no power to grant such an allowance. That does not seem reasonable.

Mr. POWER: I have no objection to allowing the section to stand in order that the matter may be considered, although I do not think there will be any great advantage to anyone.

Mr. GREEN: Even though the appeal court granted only three compassionate allowances, that meant that three more men were taken out of trouble.

Mr. POWER: There was none last year. However, the section can stand.

Section stands.

On section 11—Date from which disability pension is payable.

Mr. MacNEIL: Does this section restrict in any way the period for which retroactive payments may be made?

Mr. POWER: No, it is just exactly the same as it was.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Date from which death pension payable.

Mr. GREEN: What change is made under this section?

Mr. POWER: This is to have the section correspond with the phraseology of section 27 of the act. There is no change in the meaning or the sense of the section.

Mr. McNIVEN: Would the minister explain under what circumstances a widow or dependent child is entitled to a pension?

Mr. POWER: At the present time a widow of any soldier who dies as a result of his war service is entitled to a pension, if married prior to January 1, 1930. Since the war, 11,000 pensioners have died, and 6,000 widows are now in receipt of a pension. In order to be absolutely sure that the benefit of the doubt would be given to the widow of a soldier, it was enacted many years ago and continued in 1936 that if a man were in receipt of an eighty per cent pension, or over, that is, was in classes 1 to 5, no matter from what disability he might die his widow would be entitled to a pension. Perhaps this would be as good a time as any to state that before this bill finally passes, I propose to proceed to introduce legislation whereby the widow of a man who was in receipt of a pension of fifty per cent or more will be entitled to a pension, if married prior to January 1, 1930. I want to make it clear to the committee that this will not meet the current agitation of the widows by any means, and it is not intended that it should. The current agitation is to permit the granting of a pension to the widows of all ex-soldiers.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Will it be retroactive?

Mr. POWER: If a man were in receipt of a pension of fifty per cent or more and died ten years ago, his widow would be entitled to a pension but not to ten years' back pension.

Mr. GREEN: Fifty per cent or more?

Mr. POWER: Classes to 1 to 11.

Mr. PELLETIER: How many will that take care of?

Mr. POWER: Not very many. It will take care of four or five hundred, which is a small number compared with those who are now pressing the government to have their claims attended to. That is why I want to make it clear that it is not intended to meet that agitation in any way, shape or form. But it is intended to give assurance that the widow of a soldier who was in receipt of a fifty per cent pension or more will get the benefit of the doubt. I think it will give the benefit of the doubt in so far as it is possible to give it. If we were to go below that, it would no longer be a question of giving the benefit of the doubt, it would be a question of giving a pension on purely sympathetic grounds. If we stop at fifty per cent, I think hon. members can be assured that the country is endeavouring in so far as it can to give a pension to the widows of those who have died as a result of their war service.

Mr. LAWSON: It is now eighty per cent and over?

Mr. POWER: It is now eighty per cent and over; we are coming down to fifty per cent. The mechanics of working that out will perhaps be somewhat complicated. I suppose I shall have to proceed by way of resolution to move an amendment to the act. It will simply be an amendment to section 32, subsection 2, to change the words from "one to five" to "one to eleven." Should the house approve the resolution and the amendment, I shall endeavour to consolidate it with the present bill before it is sent to another house.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister consider removing the restriction on children born after May 1, 1933?

Mr. POWER: I hardly think so. The expense of that would be something like $850,000 annually.

Mr. GREEN: To provide for children who were born after May 1, 1933?

Mr. POWER: I have gone into that quite thoroughly, and I find that we would be taking on something like 17,000 children, even assuming that the fecundity rate would be lower on account of the increasing age of our soldiers. The best figure I can get is 17,000 children born since 1933.

Mr. GREEN: That makes it all the more unfair.

Mr. POWER: It did make it all the more unfair when they were cut off in 1933.

Mr. ESLING: I wonder if under section 10 the commissioners would have discretionary power in dealing with the widow of a pensioner who was married after 1930. In this case it was a one hundred per cent pension. It is the case of a much married man, who was married in 1902 and deserted his wife and was divorced in 1907. In 1909 he married No. 2. He deserted her in 1917 while he was overseas. Two years before he was pensioned he married No. 3, representing himself as a single man. In 1922, No. 2 turned up, and he acknowledged her as his legal wife, although he continued to live with No. 3. Hon. members laugh, but it is not so very funny. It is a most unfortunate case. By No. 3 there was a child born, and the man in acknowledging No. 2 as his legal wife did assign a portion of his pension to her, although in the interval before she turned up, No. 3 had been receiving a portion of that pension. But after No. 2 came to light again, No. 3 was required to refund that portion which she had received. No. 2 died in April, 1931, and immediately after, No. 3 was again legally married.

Here is a case where No. 3 had lived with that man as his acknowledged wife, had married innocently, lived with him for twenty years and had a daughter by him, and it does seem that the lapse of a very short period made the situation most unfortunate. The man died last year, and the widow of course received no pension whatever. I would ask the minister if he would not give consideration to bringing in an amendment to cover such a case, putting the line at 1931 or 1932. That would remedy this case, which certainly seems to be a deserving one because it is quite apparent that this woman did not marry the man for the sake of the pension. He had represented himself as a single man, and after living with him for twenty years I think she deserves a pension, but because she was not legally married to this man until after January, 1930, she gets no pension.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. POWER: Perhaps that is a case that might be looked after under the meritorious clause, section 21.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister give us an idea as to how many wives would be affected by removing the line now set at May 1, 1933? He said there were 17,000 children.

Mr. POWER: We estimate about 2,400 wives, but it is only an estimate, and even the number of children is only an estimate. It is based on the fact that in the twelve months prior to May 1, 1933, there were 4,041 children born to pensioners and placed on pension; in the next twelve months 4,655, and so on, and with an annual reduction of ten per cent for loss of fecundity to which I referred, we come to the figure of about 17,000 who would receive the additional allowance. The cost would be $850,000.

Mr. GREEN: I think that is a pretty high estimate.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I understand that there are about 2,000 pensioners' widows at the present time who are not receiving pensions.

Mr. POWER: Probably, yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): But is not the principle the same as with a pensioner? The pensioner is entitled to ten or twenty or thirty per cent or any other percentage. It is not a gratuity which is given by the Dominion of Canada, but something to which the pensioner is entitled by law. Now the minister is proposing to draw the dead-line at fifty per cent. I cannot see any reason for such a discrimination.

Mr. POWER: Does the hon. member want me to withdraw my proposal?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I would suggest that these widows, whether the pension be ten per cent or any other per cent—and ten per cent does not amount to anything—are entitled to the pension just as much as the pensioner is entitled to his.

Mr. MacNEIL: Has the minister any statistics indicating the number of widows in cases where the pensioner died while the additional pension was payable—the total number involved apart from those above the fifty per cent.

Mr. POWER: I do not understand the question.

Mr. MacNEIL: Apart from those above the fifty per cent, there are those who died while receiving pensions. Death is not the result of pensionable disability up to the time of death. The additional pension has been paid to the wife. Are there any statistics indicating the number in that category?

Mr. POWER: It might be somewhat difficult to get them. I really have not those figures.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1938-39

RADIO BROADCASTING

INTERIM REPORT—SCALE OF RADIO LICENCE FEES FOR 1939-40

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher) presented an interim report of the special committee on radio broadcasting, as follows:

The special committee on radio broadcasting appointed to consider the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to review the policies of the corporation begs leave to present the following as an

Interim Report

Your committee, having heard the evidence of the chairman and the general manager of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as to the curtailment in service that must result from a reduction in revenues of the corporation, takes the view that the present scale of radio licence fees shall be continued for the fiscal year 1939-40.

Respectfully submitted,

A. L. Beaubien,
Chairman.

PRIVATE BILL

ANCIENT FORESTERS' MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton) moved the first reading of Bill No. 55 (from the senate) to change the name of Ancient Foresters' Mutual Life Insurance Company to Toronto Mutual Life Insurance Company.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. CLEAVER: This company was incorporated in 1934 under the name Ancient Foresters' Mutual Life Insurance Company. It has been found in carrying on the operations of the company not to be advantageous to have the words "Ancient Foresters" in the title. Therefore it is requested that the name of the company be changed to Toronto Mutual Life Insurance Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SASKATCHEWAN FLOOD CONDITIONS

QUESTION OF DANGER TO OXBOW AND OTHER DAMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) based on a report appearing in the western press, which states that the Oxbow dam is threatened by floods; that a rush call to Harold Beatty of Spears Airways sent 1,000 pounds of sand in bags to the district. It was reported that the water was going over the top of the dam. The bags were carried to the district in two trips and dumped over the side of the plane as near the town as possible. My question is whether they were successful in saving the dam and how many other dams have been threatened or are likely to go out because of the flood.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I have not had a report of any difficulty in connection with the dam at Oxbow. I hope it has not gone out.

MUNICH AGREEMENT

REQUEST FOR TERMS OF CONGRATULATORY TELEGRAM SENT BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): In view of the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is to make an announcement with regard to international affairs will he inform the house of the exact terms of the message, to which some reference was made in the press last October, which he was reported to have sent to Right Hon. Neville Chamberlain, congratulating him upon the Munich agreement?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Yes, I shall be very happy to do so.

WAYS AND MEANS

FISHING INDUSTRY—LICENSING OF BEAM TRAWLERS IN NOVA SCOTIA WATERS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. J. J. KINLEY (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I desire to take advantage of this motion to bring to the attention of the house a matter that is of great importance to the fishing industry, especially in the province of Nova Scotia. I refer to the annual licensing of beam trawlers, sometimes called steam trawlers, I suppose because they are propelled by steam. The immediate reason for bringing forward this matter at the present time is that before April 1 the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) must make up his mind whether he will renew the licences already existing; whether he will receive new applications or, on the other hand, whether he will cancel the licences that exist at the present time. My purpose at the moment is to make an appeal to him, in addition to the representations I have already made, in the interests of the hook and line fishermen of the Atlantic coast.

This matter is controlled by an order in council dated August 29, 1931, which provides:

1. A licence for a fishing vessel using an otter or other trawl of a similar nature, other than a small dragger operated by inshore fishermen, will not be granted, except under the following conditions:

(a) That the applicant for such licence shall furnish the Minister of Fisheries with evidence that will satisfy the said minister that he cannot obtain an adequate supply of suitable fish to enable him properly to conduct and develop his business from the hook and line fishermen, and that if the licence is granted, the extent of his purchase of fresh fish from the said fishermen will not be adversely affected.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that there are two conditions necessary for the granting of a licence; first that the operator cannot obtain a suitable supply of fish from the hook and line fishermen, and second that his purchases from these fishermen will not be adversely affected if he obtains a licence. He must satisfy the Minister of Fisheries, according to the provisions of this order in council.

I do not like this order in council. Each year this matter comes up and the Minister of Fisheries must make a decision. The hook and line fishermen who desire to promote their industry and who wish to build vessels are not able to do so because of the insecurity brought about by this legislation, since they never know what is going to happen each year when this question comes up for consideration. Then again, it puts the Minister of Fisheries on the spot each year, and it seems to me hardly fair that he should be made the umpire, as it were, between different forms of fishing.

I claim that the situation is such that licences should be refused for the year 1939. In the first place there is no question that the corporations can get an adequate supply of fish from the hook and line fishermen; in fact there is an over supply of fish on the Atlantic coast, as there has been for some years. Only the other day we were told by men interested in the business that the cold storages along the coast were full of fish, and that the great difficulty was to get a market for them. There are several large companies on the Atlantic coast engaged in the distribution of fish, but only one company has the privilege of trawling. If trawling is a good thing and something that should be promoted in the fishing industry, why should just this one company have that privilege? Again, in the interests of employment I think the decision this year should go to the hook and line fishermen. In January, 1938, the one company using trawlers employed nine Lunenburg vessels and 225 men. Then when the fishing season started in the fall of 1938 they laid off five vessels and employed only four of the hook and line vessels. This meant that 125 men in my constituency became unemployed, and for every man unemployed in the primary enterprise there are about three others also unemployed in the allied industries.

I wonder if there was ever any definite matter considered by this house that was looked into by so many commissions, and in connection with which the reports of these commissions were not accepted to the extent that is the case here. In the first place we had the Maclean commission, which went throughout Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and down to the Magdalen islands. The majority report of that commission contained this recommendation:

With mounting density of population and a much larger consumption of fish, it is possible that in some future time steam trawlers may be required in Canada to meet the demands of a large fish consuming population. But that time seems to us to be very far distant. And meanwhile, steam trawlers should in our judgment, without fear of the consequence, be prohibited from landing their fish and from obtaining supplies at Canadian ports, in order that the fishing population of the maritime provinces may be protected and retained.

It is only fair to say that the minority report of the chairman, who is now Judge Maclean, dissented from the majority report. He submitted a report of his own, in which he said:

> The number of trawlers in use should not exceed that number which will produce from time to time the market requirements in excess of boat and vessel production. The interest of trawler owners and general public interests would be best served by such a policy, and no sacrifice would be required in its adoption.

Of all the commissioners, Mr. Speaker, who have investigated this matter of trawling on the Atlantic coast the opinion of Judge Maclean is the only one except that of Mr. Young of the price spreads, which did not definitely say that the use of the beam trawler should be prohibited.

This matter has been receiving consideration in Nova Scotia during the past week. A resolution was introduced into the local legislature which reads as follows:

> Whereas a majority of the royal commission, provincial economic inquiry, 1934, appointed under an act of this legislature, found that the beam trawler "should not be permitted to operate" and recommended "that its use be prohibited";
> Therefore resolve that this house urges upon the dominion government and parliament the need for early action to terminate beam trawler operations as recommended by said committee.

This resolution was debated for two days in the provincial legislature, and only two members of the legislature who spoke registered their opinions in favour of the trawlers. A member of the government who on the main motion had spoken against the trawler moved the following amendment:

> That this government requests the Minister of Fisheries to grant no licences to beam or otter trawlers for the year 1939 until it is definitely known and decided that Nova Scotian hook and line fishermen cannot furnish an adequate supply of suitable fish.

Thus it was indicated to the federal authorities that before they permit the operation of the beam trawlers it should be definitely known that the hook and line fishermen cannot supply the needs of the fishing industry. In this regard the Minister of Fisheries has the complete say as to what shall be done. There is no appeal from his decision. As I said before, every year this burden is put upon him.

Then there was a commission in Nova Scotia called the Jones commission. On the Jones commission sat a professor of the University of Toronto; also Mr. Alex. Johnston, at one time federal deputy minister of Fisheries. That commission asked for the abolition of the trawler.

I come now to what has been known as the price spreads committee, followed by a royal commission appointed by the government, which went exhaustively into the matter of beam trawlers. The commission reported as follows:—

> This argument that the trawlers are necessary to provide continuity of supply, has been advanced on previous occasions, and before other commissions investigating the fishing industry. It has, indeed, been the heart of the case in favour of the trawler. We feel, however, that the new type of fishing vessel known as the Lunenburg auxiliary schooner, the development of which has recently been so successful, offers all the advantages of continuity of supply possessed by the trawler and at the same time utilizes more fishing labour, a point which we consider of great importance. We feel, therefore, that under present conditions, trawler operations should be gradually discontinued by government prohibition.

Can we lightly cast aside the findings of three such important commissions? Was there ever a matter so exhaustively investigated, and upon which there seems to have been so much unanimity of opinion on the part of those who have visited the field? In the department, at Ottawa, where men do their work at desks and by correspondence, we find that there is a difference of opinion. But any man who is sent down into the field to see conditions as they really are comes back with the view that the trawler is not necessary and that our social and economic problems would be better served by sticking to the hook and line fishermen.

The fact that there are three trawlers in Nova Scotia does not tell the whole story. The trawler makes of the fish corporation a primary producer; he uses that instrument as a club which he holds over the heads of the fishermen of the country in order that he may control prices. The fishermen have no bargaining power, because the company with the three trawlers say to the fisherman, when he comes in, "I have a trawler coming in tomorrow; if you do not take the price I will give you, I do not need your fish."

The buying of fish in Nova Scotia is highly centralized. Three big companies do the buying, namely the National Fish Company, Lunenburg Sea Products, and General Seafoods, and it is my opinion that they work pretty closely together. I think also that they control to a large extent the prices paid to fishermen. The Lunenburg Sea Products organization is the most successful fishing corporation on the Atlantic coast. They buy fish from all parts of Nova Scotia. They have fleets of vessels under their own management, and working in cooperation with the fishermen. They do not use trawlers. It is the most successful company on the coast, and it seems to me that that is evidence that a company can get a suitable supply of fish without having trawlers.

It might be said that we have a new market in the United States, and that therefore trawlers are necessary. I must advise the house that the United States fishermen were somewhat concerned about the trade agreement, because they said we were going to flood their market. The report came out that they were going to restrict the action of their trawlers from the port of Boston. But one of the principal items in the treaty is fillets, which go in under a quota of 15,000,000 pounds, being 9,000,000 pounds extra per year, amounting to about 27,000,000 pounds of round fish. The three trawlers now operating from Nova Scotia can produce just about that 27,000,000 pounds of fish, which will be necessary to make the fillets to fill the quota for the United States market.

We have an over-supply, and we are told that we should have trawlers because the United States fishermen have trawlers. We are told about two hundred trawlers and all this sort of thing. The United States fishermen have seventy trawlers. I have a telegram before me from Mr. E. H. Cooley, president of the American Fishermen's Association, who tells me that they have seventy trawlers. But the United States people import fish, they cannot get a supply sufficient for their demand, and we regard the United States market as a splendid market for Canadian fish. When it is argued that because the United States fishermen have seventy trawlers we should have seventy, I say simply this, that we do not need trawlers at the present time, and that the fishermen of the maritime provinces want to make a living.

Mr. DEACHMAN: If they do not need them in the fishing industry, why do they buy them? If they have seventy trawlers in the United States, perhaps they should also have trawlers in Canada.

Mr. KINLEY: I do not think that is any argument that we should have them in Canada. The question is whether you do or do not need them. They were able to get them from Great Britain at a low price.

Some beam trawler advocates argue that they can produce fish cheaper than the hook and line fishermen. I refer hon. members to what was brought out in the evidence given before the price spreads commission and what is stated in the Maclean report. It was stated there that the cost of producing fish by beam trawler is $1.89 per hundred pounds. That was the cost some years ago, and it is likely higher to-day. At no time do the fishermen receive more than a cent and a half per pound on the average for their fish from the trawler companies. These companies are able to save money by buying fish from the fishermen, and they get better fish. According to the evidence given before the price spreads commission by a former president of one of the fish companies, these companies preferred trawlers because it gave them better control of the industry and of prices; they were an instrument by which they were able to control their business without regard to the human element. They were able to get along without bargaining with the fishermen when they wanted to buy fish.

The hook and line method is not inadequate, nor is it uneconomical. The Lunenburg fishing schooner is the most economical fishing machine in the world. The companies owning trawlers recognize this fact. Two new vessels have been built after the fashion of the Lunenburg fishing schooner, and they are now being operated successfully out of Halifax. The fisherman is much better off with the hook and line method of fishing. The cost of a fishing schooner is within the range of the pocket-books of a group of fishermen, whereas a beam trawler is such an expensive machine that only a corporation can purchase it. Anyone in Nova Scotia who wants to engage in hook and line fishing can easily secure a schooner. In Lunenburg this method of fishing is a cooperative enterprise, every vessel usually being divided into 64 shares. Any young man who thinks he is fit to command a vessel can go around among the people of the town and county and sell shares in it. Sometimes those who work on the vessel have shares. This has proved to be the most successful method of fishing in Nova Scotia.

It seems to me we would go far towards solving the great problem of unemployment if the production of fish in Nova Scotia were left in the hands of the hook and line fishermen. What is the argument advanced by the trawler companies? They contend that the Americans use trawlers. I say the United States must import fish because they are unable to supply their own market. On the other hand, there are many fishermen along the Atlantic coast who cannot find employment. In former years the Nova Scotia fisherman could go to New England and ship out on a vessel from Gloucester or Boston, but the immigration laws of the United States do not permit that to-day. These men are in Nova Scotia and our main idea should be to find employment for them.

The trawler companies contend that there are certain kinds of fish which cannot be caught by the hook and line fishermen. For several years they came here with the argument that they wanted to catch rose fish. This fish is caught in deep water; it is a soft-fleshed fish caught principally along the coast of the United States. Its selling price is quite low and there is no profit in it for anyone except these large corporations who want to dump it on certain markets. Recently it was found that this fish had a parasite and I understand the health authorities of the United States have had trouble about its use in many of the western states. Fish from Canada enter the United States under a quota, and if we allow this quota to be filled by redfish caught by the beam trawlers, they will replace the higher priced fish which should be going into the United States market.

The trawler companies contend also that they want continuity of supply. The Lunenburg fishing schooner is a more mobile unit than the beam trawler, and it is cheaper to operate. These schooners are equipped with radio telephones and are propelled by diesel engines. They can be brought in and out of port more quickly and are much less expensive to operate. Last year we were told by the trawler companies that they wanted fast transportation. A beam trawler will average nine knots an hour, but a fishing schooner can go from nine to twelve knots an hour. Fish caught one day on the banks can be on the market the next day. When it comes to transportation, the diesel schooner is far ahead of the beam trawler, and their record of continuity is splendid.

Most of these old arguments have been dropped. We are now told that they want these trawlers so that they may catch a few flounders which are probably sold on the English market. The line fisherman can also catch flounders, but when the fishermen bring in too many, the companies use their judgment as to whether they shall buy them. There is one thing which must be admitted about the beam trawler, it is a safer way to fish. However, there is a suggestion now being put forth in connection with the schooners that in addition to the use of dories, they use a long rubber covered line which can be hauled in over the bow and which goes in over the stern. This method will practically double their capacity, and will make the operation of these schooners even more economical. The long line and dory method of fishing from the schooner will make fishing practically as safe as with the beam trawler.

Then we are told that while all this will help the Lunenburg fishermen, it will not help the shore fisherman. If we have an over supply of fish on our markets, if these companies can get their supplies of fish without going to the fishermen, the shore fishermen will suffer. Do you not think that the shore fishermen would be benefited if these companies were obliged to send out their buyers to buy fish from them? There would then be a seller's market instead of a buyer's market in the fishing industry in Nova Scotia.

Hook and line fishermen buy large quantities of bait from the shore fishermen. The hook and line fishermen have built up towns and communities in the province of Nova Scotia. They have helped to establish the allied industries—the sail maker, the blacksmith, the block maker and the shipbuilder; but in view of the insecurity that exists today in the fishing industry people will not build vessels in Nova Scotia now.

The shore fisherman lives on the headlands along the shore, and he must be there to catch the mackerel, the herring, the lobster, and the seasonal fish that frequent those waters at certain seasons of the year. We all know that the headland is the proper place for the shore fisherman to live. But if you take away his backlog, which is the cod fishery, a vital element in making up his revenue, it will make conditions such that the shore fisherman cannot make a living. The first consideration, Mr. Speaker, should be given to the fisherman who lives in the outport and who must maintain himself there for the purpose of carrying on certain of the fisheries of this country, and the cod fishery should be preserved for him.

Suppose someone says that we should allow the beam trawlers to operate; and suppose they increase until you have eight or ten or twelve beam trawlers. There will then be no room for anybody else in the fishing industry in Nova Scotia, and what will you do? You will make of them slum dwellers in the city.

Our shore fishermen are skilled workers. They live in humble homes, it is true, but in healthy homes along the shore of the province where they can bring up their families in wholesome surroundings and get an education in the rural districts; and the rural people are after all the backbone of this country. Anything that tends to centralize this industry in one big port is bad for the province of Nova Scotia. There is no reason why the hook and line fishermen should not be sustained. The menace of the trawler should not be allowed to grow; I contend that for the year 1939 no licences should be issued to the beam trawlers.

There has been a lot of propaganda in this country in favour of the trawler. Some months ago I observed in the Financial Post an article headed, "Truce in the trawler war." The article goes on to say:

> A skilful manoeuvre directed, it is believed, by dominion government officials, has transformed the opposing armies in the maritime trawler battle into comrades in arms—though not perhaps yet in each other's arms.

In a letter to the editor of the Financial Post I said that I did not think this article correctly portrayed the situation as regards either the fishermen or the general public, and I asked to be permitted to write an article for the Financial Post. They sent one of their representatives here and I had a discussion with him. I saw him upstairs, and I expected that the Financial Post would invite me to write the article. Their representative said that the article that had appeared in the Financial Post had been prepared by their own correspondent in the interests of the public. But the Financial Post did not permit me to write an article to be reproduced in that paper in the interests of the public, and I have not yet been granted that privilege.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, under the order in council you are not permitted to have a trawler unless you cannot get an adequate supply of fish from the hook and line fishermen. I claim also that the purchases from the hook and line fishermen should not be adversely affected, as undoubtedly they have been. The burden was put upon the minister to decide, and he must decide before next Saturday.

I liked better the order in council of 1929. Hon. members will recall that when the Hon. Mr. Cardin was minister of fisheries he visited the maritime provinces, and after he came back to Ottawa legislation was passed by parliament amending the Fisheries Act. Under section 56 beam trawling was not permitted except under certain conditions. This led to an order in council which practically prohibited beam trawling, because the order in council of 1929 stipulated that the trawler must be built in Canada and provided for the payment of a tax which would have been prohibitive and would have driven the trawlers out of business. The trawler companies refused to pay the tax and took the matter to the courts. After the case had been before the courts for some time it was withdrawn, and the money that had been paid in taxes by some companies was refunded.

The order in council under which we are working to-day is the one under which the minister must act in dealing with this problem.

Parliament has spoken on this question; three commissions have also spoken. An order in council was passed in 1929, which is said to be ultra vires, but which expressed the opinion of the government and parliament of this country. All the evidence is against the trawler, yet the companies concerned are able to convince people in this part of the country that beam trawlers are necessary in the fishing industry. But the people that we should sustain in the province of Nova Scotia are the hook and line fishermen. We are told that we are against progress. We come here and say to you that what parliament has done in the past should be invoked now, that the time is even more opportune for prohibiting beam trawlers.

While I know this is a difficult question, and while I appreciate the difficulties of the Minister of Fisheries in view of the contending interests who prosecute the fisheries in this country, the evidence is wholly on the side of the hook and line fishemen. I trust that when the minister makes his decision he will see to it that the interests of these fishermen are preserved and protected so that once the industry is stabilized it can go forward and be a benefit to the whole province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) Mr. Speaker, while I have no expert knowledge of the fishing industry, representations have been made to me as to the position in which the fishermen are placed, and as representing one of the groups in this house I feel I could not let the opportunity pass without endorsing what has just been said by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley). I have no desire to go over the ground which he has so fully covered. As I have looked into the situation, one or two points appeal to me which I should like to bring before the house.

First of all, these licences for trawling are being given as a special privilege. The applicant for the licence must convince the Minister of Fisheries that he cannot obtain from the hook and line fishermen an adequate supply of suitable fish to enable him properly to conduct and develop his business. The hook and line fishermen claim very emphatically that that condition does not prevail, that they are able to provide an adequate supply of fish. Futhermore, they claim that even under the new arrangements that have been made under the treaty they can fill the entire quota without any assistance from the trawlers. It is quite obvious that members of parliament cannot go into that technical matter, although sometimes it seems to us from the west that members from eastern Canada discuss the question of growing wheat, and matters of that kind. However, these are matters for the specialist.

I would emphasize what the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg has said, that every royal commission appointed by the government in the past ten years, including the price spreads committee, consisting of members of parliament, has recommended the abolition of the trawler. With that situation prevailing, it seems to me the minister should be able to produce overwhelming evidence to show why the granting of licences should be continued.

A few weeks ago, on March 11, there was published in the Halifax Herald an interesting table showing what the fishermen get and what the consumer has to pay. I shall not take the time to read the whole table, but there are three or four items which are fairly representative, and perhaps I might give them:

	Fisherman is paid by wholesaler Cents per lb.	Consumer pays delivered into home Cents per lb.
Haddock fillet. ..	2	20
Fresh cod fillet. ..	1½	15
Finnan haddie. ..	2	12

This appears under the heading "Fish spread from producer to consumer."

Mr. KINLEY: I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but he speaks of fillets of haddock as being sold at two cents a pound. A fillet is a third of the fish, and that would mean six cents.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am quoting from the table. Fresh cod per pound is 1½ cents to the fisherman and 15 cents to the consumer. That is the information this newspaper gives, and I am quoting as I stated from a table published in the Halifax Herald of March 11. Perhaps it is only fair to say that there are some losses, as noted here, in cutting off the heads, fins, tails and so on. Still that is a tremendous spread, and it may indicate some of the reasons why the ordinary fisherman feels that he ought to have a fair break in this matter. Not only, he thinks, is it a matter of his being able to fill the quota, but in addition to that, this arrangement by which the trawlers are not only fishermen but also dealers gives an unfair advantage to the trawlers, and this seems to be the result.

I should not like to be considered as one who is in any way blocking the natural progress in the development of the best means of getting fish. I know something about the difficulties with which we are faced in regard to trawlers on the Pacific coast. I do not know whether the same difficulties obtain on the Atlantic. But under these circumstances, with the information before the house, it seems to me that the minister should consider very carefully the whole situation before giving licences to the trawlers.

Mr. V. J. POTTIER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I wish to correct an impression that has been left by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) with regard to the price of fillets. A fillet is about a third of the fish, and I should be very much surprised if fillets sold at less than from five to six cents per pound. That would be a fairer price. That is as I understand the situation, and I make that remark in order to give a fairer picture of it. Two cents a pound is altogether too low for fresh fillets, unless there is a glut or something of the kind.

I have heard a great deal about the beam trawler, and I think I can truly say that I have given more thought and consideration to this one item than to any other single question connected with the fishing industry. As far back as I can remember, the fishermen in my constituency have been almost unanimous in their opposition to the trawler.

Mr. ISNOR: What about the local member?

Mr. POTTIER: I am speaking of the fishermen in my constituency. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman is referring to the member for Digby county. The district of Clare, which forms a part of my constituency, is opposed to the beam trawler. That takes care of the remark of my hon. friend. The feeling has been that the beam trawler and the hook and line fisherman cannot exist side by side when both are given an unrestricted field. That is to say, the market for our fish is not such that you could allow a number of beam trawlers to operate without any restriction whatever, because in the end they would take over the production from the hook and line fishermen. That is the view of the fishermen in my district, and it dates back to a time during the war and afterward.

In 1910 we had one beam trawler; in 1913 five; in 1915, four; in 1917, six; in 1918, eight; in 1919, seven; in 1921, six; in 1923, seven; in 1925, nine; in 1927, ten. At the present time we have three. The three beam trawlers now operating catch approximately one-tenth of the fish caught in Nova Scotia. I think it is fair to say that we catch about 200,000,000 pounds of ground-fish in that province, and the three beam trawlers catch about 20,000,000 pounds.

To give a fair picture of the benefits which would accrue from the abolition of the three beam trawlers, one must say that the resulting good is exaggerated. For example, in one of the counties I represent, the county of Yarmouth, if you abolished beam trawlers to-day and related the proportion of fish they catch to the total quantity of fish caught in Nova Scotia, you would find roughly that each fisherman had benefited to the extent of between seven and ten dollars.

Mr. MICHAUD: Per year.

Mr. POTTIER: Yes, per year. I think I can say that, because there is no use in exaggerating the situation. In respect to some counties that would not be true, because they catch the larger proportion of the fish, and without the 20,000,000 pounds caught by the beam trawlers it is fair to expect that they would benefit in proportion; twenty million pounds averaged at 1½ cents a pound comes to about $300,000, and we have between 12,000 and 13,000 bounty fishermen who would be involved in the division of that sum. Some individuals of course who catch more fish would get a larger proportion of the $300,000, such as $20 or $30.

Thinking back over the years, and seeing the trend that has developed, fundamentally the issue as I see it is not only the three beam trawlers, but who is going to survive in Nova Scotia with beam trawling or hook and line fishing. Trawlers and hook and line fishing cannot exist together; with unrestricted trawling in Nova Scotia the hook and line fishermen are doomed. This is demonstrated by what has been happening for the last ten or fifteen years in Massachusetts. For some years I have gone to the fish pier every time I visited Boston, and it is easy to see what is happening there. They have unrestricted beam trawling; the number of trawlers is increasing, and the hook and line fishermen are being gradually pushed out. There are several reasons for this, but the principal one is that a man on a beam trawler in Massachusetts makes about twice the amount that the hook and line fisherman does on a fishing schooner. We have to be careful to see that we do not have in Nova Scotia a repetition of what is happening in the United States.

I speak of beam trawlers unrestricted in number. Fundamentally that is what has brought about this agitation. After the war, when the demand for fish was good, we increased the number of beam trawlers; then the demand fell off; the United States placed a tariff on fish; the West Indian and other foreign markets were affected, and the fight was on.

I do not know what view the minister has. He has to deal with the matter on the evidence submitted to him. But it should not be left in that position; we should have one thing or the other, and the minister should not be harassed and criticized by one side and the other every year. Parliament should relieve the minister of the burden and decide whether we are to have beam trawlers or not. Then the fishermen as well as the companies would know where they stand, and it would be better for the industry generally. I suggest to the minister that if he is going to renew these licences, they should be renewed only for at the most sixty or ninety days, and in the meantime the whole question should be referred to the fisheries committee with instructions to submit definite recommendations so that this matter may be settled once for all.

When this question goes before the committee, two or three other important matters should be considered. There is the question whether foreign trawlers should be allowed to come to our three mile limit when our own trawlers have to keep outside the twelve mile limit. At the present time hundreds of foreign beam trawlers operate on the Atlantic coast and some of them come up to the three mile limit.

Mr. KINLEY: What does the hon. member say is coming to the three mile limit?

Mr. POTTIER: I said there were hundreds of foreign beam trawlers on the Atlantic coast. It may be 250 or 350.

Mr. MICHAUD: The number is 300.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not know the numbers, but my hon. friend's legal argument is certainly sound.

Mr. POTTIER: In former years it was hoped that foreign governments might be approached with a view to bringing about some order in this matter and having their trawlers observe the twelve mile limit, thus reserving our shore fishing for our own fishermen who are fishing from day to day in small boats and can go out only a limited distance. This question should be dealt with by the fisheries committee.

Another matter which should be dealt with is foreigners coming in and hiring on Nova Scotia fishing vessels. There should be some restriction on Newfoundlanders who, on our own vessels, are catching as much fish as the beam trawlers. Some of these captains who argue against the beam trawlers have crews who come from a foreign country.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member does not call Newfoundland a foreign country, does he?

Mr. POTTIER: Well, not necessarily a foreign country—

Mr. MICHAUD: Extraterritorial.

Mr. POTTIER: These things are of paramount importance and should be considered by the committee with a view to recommending to the house a definite policy which would relieve the Minister of Fisheries of the burden which now rests upon him, so that this question of renewal of licences would not come up each year without any appeal from his discretion or reference to any other tribunal. This, of course, is subject to the minister having it in mind to renew the licences. As an alternative I suggest that since a resolution was passed in the provincial legislature to the effect that these licences should not be renewed unless it is definitely known and decided that the shore fishermen cannot produce the fish, a judge of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia should be selected to go into the evidence submitted by the corporation as to whether they can get the fish or whether they cannot. The facts would be brought out by a fair and impartial person. I do not see how anyone could object to that procedure. That would be my second alternative, my second suggestion, before these licences could be issued. It might take two or three months to have this inquiry made, and in that case I would have no objection to the licences being renewed for that short period of time, while the matter is being considered.

I cannot agree entirely with the thought that Canadian owned trawlers are going to remedy the situation. You could develop smaller trawlers; you could develop schooner trawlers that would be just as monopolistic as the present trawlers. So I suggest caution in deciding whether or not Canadian owned or Canadian registered trawlers—

Mr. KINLEY: Canadian built.

Mr. POTTIER: But even if you have a Canadian built trawler fundamentally he is going to be on one side or the other, whether the hook and line fisherman is to survive or whether the trawler is to survive.

I think I should say that my fishermen are practically unanimously against the trawler. I would ask the minister, before issuing these licences, if he is planning to do so, to refer the question to the fisheries committee or appoint a judge to decide and report on the facts with reference to the contention of the companies that they cannot obtain a supply of fresh fish.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, the condition of the fishing industry, particularly in regard to the maritimes, is a matter which has interested parliament for a great many years. The one outstanding thing which may be said in this connection is that parliament has done very little about it. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Pottier), who has just taken his seat, suggests that this matter should be referred to the fisheries committee. I do not see any great objection to that, except that this matter has been investigated over and over and over again, and at the conclusion of each investigation virtually nothing has been done. I do not believe any additional information could be secured. I am certain that the department and the minister have been surfeited with information, contentions and representations of all kinds; in my opinion there is no need for further investigation. What is really needed is action.

The hon. member said that he was opposed to unrestricted trawlers. That was a qualified statement. I should have thought he would take a definite stand on this question, such as that taken by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley).

Mr. POTTIER: I said definitely that my fishermen were opposed to trawling.

Mr. STEVENS: But is the hon. member opposed to it?

Mr. POTTIER: I am representing my fishermen. I hope the hon. gentleman does not think I am representing anybody else.

Mr. STEVENS: That is better, because the minister will be called upon to issue trawler licences within the next few days, and I think it desirable that hon. members speaking to this question should express their opinions very definitely to the minister. The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg has put up a very strong appeal, and I intend to express my views also. I have no connection with the fishing industry, but I think it necessary that every member of this house with any knowledge of the subject, or any member who has taken the trouble to inform himself, should express his views.

The suggestion of my hon. friend in regard to the twelve mile limit is a very sound one. The whole field in that regard should be explored and possibly an effort made to come to an understanding with other countries under which the twelve mile limit might be substituted for the historic, recognized three mile limit. But that is a large question of policy.

Mr. ILSLEY: It has been contrary to the whole policy of Great Britain from time immemorial to extend that three mile limit.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, we did it in connection with liquor right in Canada, right on our own coast, where these fisheries are located. If we can deal with it in regard to liquor surely we can at least explore the situation in regard to fisheries.

Mr. ILSLEY: In connection with liquor it was an anti-smuggling provision.

Mr. STEVENS: Surely we do not have to have a venal crime before the government takes action. However, that does not affect this immediate issue, and I suggest to the minister that the question is one which might be taken into consideration and explored, for whatever it may be worth.

Coming now to the question before us, it seem to me a comparatively simple matter. The policy of this country—and the only policy as far as administration is concerned—that has been followed by different governments is set forth in the order in council which was read by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg. A mere order in council is a pretty weak basis for administration. Perhaps it was all right at the time, for the moment, but it would have been much better if we had crystallized that order in council into an amendment to the act which would have declared our position beyond peradventure. Then, as my hon. friend said a moment ago, the minister would not be badgered every year with the responsibility of coming to a decision. However, that is the basis of our policy. In effect that order in council simply says that if it can be shown that there is an insufficient supply of fresh fish from normal sources, namely the shore fishermen or the hook and line fishermen, the minister is at liberty, as a matter of emergency, shall I say, to issue trawler licences. I think no one will challenge my interpretation of the order in council.

Mr. MICHAUD: Except that it is stated in a positive rather than in a negative way.

Mr. STEVENS: The question arises, is there an insufficient supply of fish? Need I do more than ask the question? One of the problems with which we are confronted is the finding of markets for our fish. The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Finn) a few weeks ago discussed the question of lobsters, and in the course of that discussion the question of a market for fish came up. Last session, and again this session, the hon. member who has just taken his seat, together with other hon. members from the maritimes, made eloquent speeches pleading with parliament to do something to find extended markets for the fish of the maritimes. We are justified, I think, in concluding that there is an ample supply of fish; therefore on that ground there is no need for the issuing of trawler licences.

I propose to refer briefly to the investigation made by the price spreads committee and commission so far as it related to this matter. The subject was gone into fully, and I believe the report discloses what is really at the root of this whole problem; I shall refer to that later, after I have read a few extracts from the report. At page 175 of the report I find this paragraph:

> It appears that formerly there were a number of small companies or dealers purchasing fish from the producers in practically every fishing centre along the Atlantic coast. Gradually, consolidations and amalgamations took place; some of the dealers were forced out of business; larger companies arose. For a time these larger units maintained plants along the sea coast, but later the plants located at remoter points were closed and there became apparent a general trend towards centralization. Even in communities where dealers and companies continued to operate, this trend toward centralization had its effect through a decrease in the number of those offering to purchase fish. In other words there was a local "centralization" even in instances where this did not extend to provincial "centralization."

Here I think we have largely the crux of the whole problem. There has been a gradual concentration in the processing and distribution side of the fisheries industry. I remember a year or two ago visiting some of the centres along the straits of Canso, where magnificent plants had been bought up by the large central company, and closed down; the purchase of fish in that whole district had been more or less abandoned. The result was that the fish had to be taken all the way to Halifax to find a market. Obviously this was done, of course, as a part of the business efficiency methods of the distributing and processing company, but with disregard for the convenience and indeed the welfare of the fishermen themselves.

Let me read further:

> The evidence submitted to us, however, clearly indicates that there are few, if any, problems in connection with actual production.

This supports what I said a moment ago about supply.

> The catch of fish in eastern Canada is ample, and, in some seasons, more than ample to meet the demands of Canadian and export markets.

That I submit in respect to the question of supply. As to earnings of fishermen, everyone knows that in the maritimes they are scandalously low. The figures given here, which prevailed in 1933—there may have been some variations since—were these:

> Evidence submitted by competent witnesses indicates that the earnings of the average fisherman in the different localities of eastern Canada for the year 1933 ran from $75 to $400, according to the district in which the fisherman worked.

Of course I am not including in these figures the workmen on the trawlers. In justice I should say that these figures apply chiefly to shore fishermen. The point I wish to emphasize is that the earnings of fishermen are extremely low. The fisherman's condition is certainly very serious. That I offer further on the question of supply. The report goes on:

These low earnings are in the vast majority of cases, not due to any lack of industrious application to his work on the part of the fisherman, who works longer hours and endures more hardships than do those in many other occupations. They are the result of unfavourable economic conditions which have reflected themselves in the industry and which for the fisherman are intensified by the fact that on the side of the corporation buyer there is strong bargaining power; on his side complete or almost complete absence of such power.

Here again we have the effect of the concentration of control. Let me pause there to say this: After a close study of the problem from the standpoint of distribution and processing, and from that of the fisherman, my firm conviction is that the corporation, chiefly the largest one, desires to have the trawler so that he may have large quantities of fish which will enable him to control the market price of fish from the hook and line fishermen and from the shore fishermen. The minister shakes his head. He may differ from me, and others may differ. But that is my firm conviction, after a careful study of the whole business. I am convinced from the evidence which we heard from the heads of the corporation itself as well as from others—and there were several days of it—that the main reason for the persistent demand for the existence of the trawler is to maintain control over the supply of fish.

If we take the argument they have advanced and treat it seriously, we find it is this. They say that there is a fluctuation in the flow of supply from the hook and line and shore fishermen. That is challenged; however it is their argument. Therefore in order to maintain a steady supply to the markets of Montreal, Toronto and other points in upper Canada, they must have the trawlers. Their argument is that if they cannot have the trawlers, they may break down in their distribution to these centres. I do not consider the argument worthy of very much consideration.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why not?

Mr. STEVENS: First, in the light of the facts as we know them with regard to a supply of fish—and I say an ample supply of fish.

Mr. ILSLEY: A steady supply?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, a steady supply on the market, and—here is the point exactly—not to the convenience of the big processing firm.

Mr. MICHAUD: To the consumer.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, the consumer. What consideration is given the consumer, after all?

Mr. MICHAUD: Very much.

Mr. STEVENS: What consideration is given the consumer? He has to pay from 18 cents to as high as 30 cents a pound.

Mr. MICHAUD: For good fish.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes; and Mr. Fisherman gets from three-quarters of a cent to half a cent a pound. When I asked the head of the institution if there was not somewhere in between a cent and a half—taking the highest price he was giving—and the selling price of 18, 20 or 30 cents another half cent for the fisherman, he shook his head and said he did not think it could be found. No; there was very little consideration for the consumer. And I am not at all satisfied with the method of distribution of fish, despite all this boasting of efficiency on the part of the larger corporation. There is perhaps an improvement, but I doubt if there is very much. We can show extensions of business here and there. But, for example, let us consider the city of Ottawa: Anyone interested in fish merchandizing who will walk around this city and see the way maritime fish is offered to the consumer here will wonder that as much of it is consumed. That is my conviction so far as the distribution in Ottawa is concerned.

Mr. CAHAN: That is due largely to a civic regulation which ought to be abolished if we are to have edible fish in the city of Ottawa.

Mr. STEVENS: Possibly so. But what I am getting at is that we are always willing to find some almost visionary excuse for the distributor—in this instance the distributing company; but it is always at the expense of the fisherman. Here we are, going over this problem year after year, although the facts and conditions have been known for ten or fifteen years. We know about the problems of the fishermen, but outside of some little grant here or some little sop or palliative there, we are doing little or nothing to meet their needs. The first thing we ought to do is to endeavour to get the producing end of this business on a sound footing.

Let us consider the interjection made a moment ago by the Minister of National Revenue with regard to the question of supply. Any study of the history of the industry will disclose the fact—and the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg will set me right if I am astray—that within the last ten or twelve years the schooners from Lunenburg have developed a technique in connection with hook and line fishing which is a great credit to the fishermen of that district. I am told by those who are competent to judge that in its essence the Lunenburg schooner is equal or superior to the trawler, except that it does not sweep up huge quantities of fish in a short time. Steady progress has been made in the last ten or fifteen years by the producers of fish in improving their methods. I am told that these splendid schooners now surpass anything in the world as a fishing instrument. The supply of fish is just as soundly assured as it would be through the operation of trawlers.

There is another question to be considered, that of conservation. I know that this will be brushed aside, but it should be considered nevertheless. I am not advancing this argument with a view to doing away with the trawler because of destructive methods; I am simply saying it is a factor which should be considered, particularly where we have assured an ample continuous supply. The trawler sweeps the bottom of the fishing areas; it sweeps into the ship all sorts of immature fish, poor fish and good fish. I am told there is a possibility of the trawler destroying the marine vegetable life on the ocean floor, which may have some effect upon our fisheries. These are questions to be determined by the fishery experts. I believe they are divided in their opinions, but one thing is certain, that the trawler method of fishing is not helpful to the conservation of fish. At least we can dogmatize on that point.

Mr. POTTIER: That is why we should try to have foreign trawlers keep outside the twelve mile limit.

Mr. STEVENS: I agree that that would be an excellent thing if it could be done. We should have an understanding with the other countries.

Mr. CAHAN: The only possible way it could be done would be by international convention.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is quite right, and I would strongly urge that that be done. I am told that very few of them come within the twelve mile limit, but if they do, the effect is bad.

In its report, after considering all the factors, the question of supply, the low wages paid to the fishermen, the processing costs, the consumer interest, and so on, the commission made this recommendation at page 198:

> This board might be known as the "Fisheries Control Board" and should be restricted only by the terms and provisions of the marketing act. The proposed board should not in the first instance attempt to institute revolutionary reforms, as affecting various branches of the industry, but should proceed through successive steps to eliminate, in logical order, the more pressing disabilities. Its most important duty would be to make every possible effort to ensure that the fishermen secure a fair price for his fish and not, as at present, the pittance that is left over from the consumer's dollar after all other branches of the industry have received their share. The board might next approach the problem arising from conditions in domestic retail markets.

Let me pause to give utterance to a bit of philosophy of mine with regard to the primary producer, not only of fish but of other products as well. The first duty of parliament, indeed I would say the first duty of all students of economics who have the welfare of Canada at heart, should be to see that the primary producer receives a fair return for his effort. That should be the fundamental principle underlying all our economic thinking. It is the basis of whatever I may have in the way of philosophy in approaching economic problems. The same applies to the farmer. I am sorry to say that many approach this question from the point of view of what they call the consumer's dollar—page the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman). They take what they call the consumer's dollar, and out of that must come distribution costs, transportation, processing costs and the profits of these various activities. The primary producer gets what is left. My argument is that it should be exactly the reverse. There should be a fair return to the primary producer, in this instance the fisherman, and upon that you should erect your costs. Then it should be the duty of parliament or other public bodies to scrutinize carefully the subsequent charges and costs, such as processing, distribution and so on, to see that there is no unfair exploitation of the consumer. If we do not give the primary producer a fair return, we cannot have a healthy economic condition. Roughly speaking, one-half of our population is in agriculture while another substantial portion is engaged in the fishing industry. Then we have our lumbering and mining, both major operations. All of these activities are of immense importance to Canada. If this great body of activity is not assured a reasonable and fair price for its efforts, there cannot be a healthy economic condition in the state. Let me continue with the reference the report makes to this board, which I submit is quite appropriate at this time. They recommend further:

Through successive steps the board might then proceed to action in connection with disabilities of the industry in something approaching the following order:

(1) The elimination of misrepresentation of varieties and grades of fish as now prevailing in the retail markets in Canada.

I pause there to interject what I said a moment ago. One of the difficulties in the interior part of Canada, particularly in the densely populated parts of old Ontario, is the lack of accurate information as to the varieties and uses of fish. The minister and his predecessor have done a good deal to improve this condition. Lately we have had a number of broadcasts by some charming lady whose name I have forgotten. All this is useful work, but it merely touches the surface. I continue:

(2) The establishment of a higher standard of quality of fish marketed in Canada by regulating the conditions under which fish, and especially fresh fish, may be handled.

There is a long story there which might be elaborated.

(3) The establishment of adequate inspection of grades as affecting products for the Canadian and export markets.

(4) The elimination of consignment shipments.

This is something which might very well engage the attention of the government.

(5) The elimination of cut-throat competition and other unsound trade practices.

This could be done by making the trade and industry commission a functioning body. In saying that, I do not intend to reflect upon the late Mr. Justice Sedgewick. During his excellent administration his time was fully occupied with the tariff board; the trade and industry commission was a mere incident. It has never been given the consideration or support which it deserved. Such matters as I have mentioned ought to be referred to the suggested board for its consideration and finding—the elimination of cut-throat competition and other unsound practices; the direction of surplus production of fish through channels calculated to bring the most profitable financial return. Let me say this in connection with the export business, whether in fish or in any other product. It is possible that with the growing control of markets the world over, the nation as a whole will be forced to take some part in the export of certain of our primary products. I shall not go further into that at the moment. There is this other question which ought to be referred to the board: a thorough survey of conditions surrounding, as well as the disabilities retarding, development of existing and potential export markets.

These are some of the suggestions that were made. I do not see why such a board as that recommended by the price spreads commission has not been set up before this. Even though there may be a question of jurisdiction, such a board could in my opinion, through the effect of publicity alone, as I have said in this house before in regard to other matters of the kind, where jurisdiction is in question, do a great deal of good.

Let me come back to the immediate issue before us, namely, whether or not within three days to issue licences for these trawlers. I suggest to the minister that for this year we give the fishermen a break. Let us have the corporation do the suffering, if there is to be any suffering, refuse the licences for the trawlers this year, and see what happens. The suggestion is made that if the licences are refused, there will not be a supply of fish. Very well; let us prove it. Why should we always make the fisherman the goat? Why must we always do nothing for fear of interfering with some large corporation operating trawlers, for fear that they might peradventure suffer, on the other hand ignoring the interests and repeated requests of the fishermen? Let us this year reverse the process and refuse the licences for the trawlers. Let us give a test to this request which the fishermen have made, and see if we cannot improve their conditions. At the end of the year, if we see that we have actually improved the conditions of the fishermen, and if there should be some loss or alleged or supposed loss on the part of the corporation, it will be a question of balancing advantages and disadvantages.

Mr. MICHAUD: But what if the loss is on the other side? What if the hook and line fishermen lose?

Mr. STEVENS: As a result of cancellation of the licences?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: The only way that loss could come about—and here I warn the minister—would be through a deliberate and intentional effort on the part of the corporations that are buying these fish to penalize the fishermen.

Mr. MICHAUD: But the damage would be there, nevertheless.

Mr. STEVENS: Then parliament should be made aware of what had happened, and perhaps more drastic measures should be made effective. I have not an atom of sympathy with any institution which would cause loss or suffering to a body of primary producers, just out of spite; just because a policy they advocated was not put into operation—not an atom of sympathy; and nothing this parliament could do would be too severe in dealing with such a situation.

Mr. POTTIER: Refer it to the fisheries committee.

Mr. STEVENS: No, this is something to be acted on right now. I am not reflecting on the fisheries committee at all. Refer your twelve mile limit and these other questions to the committee, but on this particular question let us have action. Let the government, I was going to say, take the bull by the horns, but that would be a mixed metaphor—let them take the fish by the tail and refuse the licences this year, and let us see what will happen as a result. My own feeling is that if these corporations play the game decently there will be benefit to the fishermen, and we shall find that we can get along without the trawler. If the result is such as to warrant it, one might —I am not saying that it should be done—consider the question whether the corporations should be compensated for the loss of the trawlers, assuming it were considered desirable as a matter of permanent definite policy that there should be no trawlers. Let us at least give it a trial. If three trawlers are good for the fishing industry, if trawling is the best way as the hon. member for Huron North seemed to suggest a little while ago, then why not six or twelve or twenty-four trawlers?

An hon. MEMBER: Never.

Mr. STEVENS: No, there would be a revolution down there.

Mr. CAHAN: Will my hon. friend allow a question?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly.

Mr. CAHAN: Has he considered the effect of abolishing trawling in the maritime provinces, and allowing trawler fish to come into our markets under the present customs duties?

Mr. STEVENS: I would certainly deal with that situation by increasing the duties if they did come in to any great extent. My hon. friend has asked a reasonable and pertinent question, but let us look at this thing. We have an asset in our fisheries which we in this parliament control. We have some thirty to forty thousand fishermen engaged in that industry, with tens of thousands more indirectly affected. In three provinces fishing is substantially the major industry. The maintenance of this industry is something worthy of almost any action on our part. If fish filter into our markets from trawlers from Boston or other United States ports, we can deal with that situation, and I would not hesitate to deal with it. This idea that protection is something which should be eternally abhorred is all wrong. In taking that attitude we belie ourselves because we give protection indirectly, this way and that, in many ways; but hon. gentlemen opposite cry to high heaven when the word "protection" is used. Self-preservation is the first law of nature, and reasonable protection for indigenous industries of this kind is the perfectly sound and natural course for us to take, I would not hesitate a moment to meet a contingency of that kind by adequate protection. But let us give to the fishing industry the opportunity which is now before us of doing something at least towards its improvement.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this question. I do not know that I would have spoken this afternoon except for the remarks made by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens). He seemed to assume that the issue here was one between the interests of the fisherman and the interests of the big companies or of one big company, and of course after my hon. friend, with his parliamentary experience and forcefulness, repeats that a number of times hon. members and others are perhaps likely to assume that it is the real issue. The question here is not whether parliament or the minister should act in the interests of the Maritime National Fish company or in the interests of the fishermen of Nova Scotia. The question here is what is in the interests of the fishermen of Nova Scotia.

I should like to say a few words about the background of this matter and about the trawler issue generally. I have listened to discussions in this house during many sessions, and the situation does not develop a great deal as the years go by. There are, however, some slight changes.

As has been pointed out, there are fishing on the banks off the shores of Nova Scotia, the banks of the north Atlantic, about three hundred American and foreign trawlers. Canada has, all told, three trawlers under licence, all three owned by one company, the Maritime National Fish company, which has its head office at Halifax and does business there. It used to be said that the Maritime National Fish company was a United States owned corporation, and that fact was always stressed in the debates; but since 1937 that can no longer be said, because the company, a Canadian corporation, is now widely owned in the maritime provinces. The question, however, is this: Shall the Maritime National Fish company be granted a renewal of its trawler licences?

As to the effect of that, if it were done, I want to trace the facts in detail as I see them. Hon. members must realize that in Nova Scotia there are many types of fishing for ground or bottom fish. There is schooner fishing. The centre of the schooner fishing industry is, I suppose, the town of Lunenburg from which the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) comes. There are the inshore fisheries, which extend almost all around the shores of Nova Scotia. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Pottier) is chiefly interested in the inshore fisheries. East of Halifax, along the long shore-line of eastern Halifax, Guysborough and Richmond, are a large number of inshore fishermen. I believe the bounty figures show about 3,000 of these inshore fishermen along that long coast.

Mr. CAHAN: That is boat fishing.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, the inshore fishermen. They go out in small boats and fish, bring their catch in at night, go out again the next day and so on. The economic distress in Nova Scotia is mainly on that shore-line from Halifax east. That is where conditions became desperate a few years ago, and conditions there are still bad. That is the home of the cooperatives. That is where these priests, clergymen and others have taken an interest in the conditions in their various communities and have organized cooperative stores, credit unions and cooperative lobster packing plants, and they have made some progress in improving the economic condition of the people.

In considering the fishing problem of Nova Scotia, I am not ignoring the problem in my own constituency, or the problem in the constituency of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare; and there is some problem, not nearly as serious as in the eastern constituencies, in the constituency of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg. Ordinarily, however, we think primarily of the problem that exists in the great eastern district, with a large population and a small production, and its poverty. What sort of business does the Maritime National Fish company at Halifax carry on? It carries on predominantly a fresh unfrozen fish business. Hon. members this afternoon have not made any reference to the distinction between the fresh unfrozen fish business and the fresh frozen fish business. Perhaps the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg did; I do not know; but I do not think a clear distinction was made between the fresh unfrozen fish business and the fresh frozen fish business. There is all the difference in the world between the two, and that difference is at the root of the question. It is that distinction which makes the question a difficult one, not a one-sided question as the hon. member for Kootenay East would have us think.

A distributor who carries on a fresh unfrozen fish business must get the fish into the hands of the consumer a very few days after they leave the water, and that means that if there are periods of a week or two weeks during which, on account of storms or for any other reason, the fish cannot be landed at the port and sent forward, the fresh fish business passes into the hands of somebody else. It passes into the hands of suppliers of competing fresh fish, other food products or other kinds of fish. At any rate, it goes. Hon. gentlemen may say there should not be any fresh unfrozen fish business, and there is something to be said for that position in general. It may be said that it would be desirable if all fresh fish that was marketed could be put on the market as frozen fish. But parliament cannot decide the taste of the consumer. The consumers of Montreal, Toronto and other places to which this cod and haddock go from Nova Scotia ask for fresh unfrozen fish and demand that they get it. Therefore the fresh unfrozen fish business is different from the fresh frozen fish business.

I do not blame my hon. friend the member for Queens-Lunenburg for urging what appears to him to be the interest of his constituents—and it was more nearly the interest of his constituents than that of anyone else that he was urging—

Mr. KINLEY: They are in the forefront.

Mr. ILSLEY: —as I shall show in a few minutes. The hon. member asks this question: Why should one company and no one else be allowed to use these trawlers? Well, the hon. gentleman knows, and it is a fact, that at Lunenburg the business is mainly, about eighty-five per cent, a fresh frozen fish business.

Mr. KINLEY: At certain times of the year only.

Mr. ILSLEY: Those are the figures.

Mr. KINLEY: They have plants at Lockeport and other places where they produce fresh fish.

Mr. ILSLEY: At Lockeport the business is fifteen per cent fresh unfrozen and eighty-five per cent fresh frozen; at Lunenburg, thirteen per cent fresh unfrozen and eighty-seven per cent fresh frozen; at Halifax, for the Maritime National Fish Company, 57·4 per cent fresh unfrozen and 40·6 per cent frozen.

Mr. KINLEY: What about Lunenburg?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have already given the figures for Lunenburg—thirteen per cent fresh unfrozen and eighty-seven per cent fresh frozen.

Mr. KINLEY: And Lockeport?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have given it. I must proceed with my speech if I am to finish. I have given those figures. The point is this. Companies such as the Lunenburg Sea Products, a most efficient company, which conducts its business at Lockeport and Lunenburg, although it does some at North Sydney, can operate with schooners because it is doing very largely a fresh frozen fish business. The character of the Maritime National Fish company's business is entirely different.

I want to show the trend of the business during the past few years, and the proportion of these ground fish supplied by the trawlers. In 1934 the total catch in Nova Scotia was 161,110,000 pounds. By 1937 the total had risen to 181,574,000 pounds.

The trawler catch in 1934 was 17,972,000 pounds, and in 1937 that had increased to 18,057,000 pounds.

The catch by offshore schooners in 1934 was 23,132,000 pounds, which by 1937 had increased to 76,870,000 pounds.

The catch of the inshore fishermen in 1934 was 120,005,600 pounds, and by 1937 that had decreased to 86,646,000 pounds.

That is, there was in those four years a 12·7 per cent increase in production, of which increase four-tenths of one per cent was on account of the production by trawlers, and there was an increase of 232·3 per cent in production by schooners and a decrease of 27·8 per cent in the catch of the inshore fishermen. So the business of the inshore fishermen has not been taken away by increase in trawler production of fish but by the 232 per cent increase in schooner production.

Mr. KINLEY: There is an innovation since the earlier years, namely the diesel engine schooner.

Mr. ILSLEY: The price spreads committee report was in 1934 and that dealt with the schooners. The proportion of total catch on account of trawlers was as follows:

	Trawler catch, Percentage
	All Atlantic coast	Nova Scotia
	Per cent	Per cent
1930	12·3	17·3
1931	11·9	17·1
1932	11·3	17·4
1933	8·9	14·5
1934	7·4	11·1
1935	8·9	13·2
1936	7·5	10·7
1937	7·3	9·9

For 1938 I think the proportion landed in Nova Scotia by trawlers was about ten per cent.

Mr. ISNOR: It was 9·96 per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is admitted, I think, by everyone that for supplying the fresh fish market in the winter, next to the trawlers the best method is the Lunenburg schooners. The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg will say that they are the best method, but even the closest friends of the trawlers would admit that the Lunenburg schooners are the next best. It must be realized that there are no inshore fisheries at Halifax to amount to anything; a few fishermen are along the coast outside Halifax, but anyone carrying on a fresh fish business at Halifax has to rely on fish from the banks in the north Atlantic, and the only way to get fresh fish from there is by trawlers or schooners.

Mr. STEVENS: Can they not get fresh fish along the east coast?

Mr. MICHAUD: It is no longer fresh when it gets to Halifax.

Mr. STEVENS: Why did this Maritime National Fish company, with which the minister is very familiar, buy and close up the plant on the strait of Canso where they used to get a supply of shore fish?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know anything about that. And if the hon. member, when he uses the words "with which the minister is very familiar," is intimating that I have any brief for the Maritime National Fish company he is very much mistaken.

Mr. STEVENS: I simply say the minister is obviously very familiar with the operations of the Maritime National Fish company.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not at all. I will come to that if I can. I want to follow out what I was saying. There is no doubt, everyone has always admitted, that if the trawlers were discontinued their place would be taken by the Lunenburg schooners. What difference would that make in the general situation? Nine schooners do the work of three trawlers. The crew is practically the same. You have seventy-five men working on three trawlers, or 225 men working on nine schooners. So you have a net increase in employment of 150 men. I do not think there is any informed person in Nova Scotia who thinks that a change would make any difference to anybody except the 150 men, and such business as might be made by the building of the schooners. It is purely an issue between the schooners and the trawlers.

All these poor fishermen on the long shore-line from Halifax east are unaffected except in two possible ways. Let us assume that the company are right when they say that they could not with schooners keep up a steady supply of fresh fish for the Montreal market, day by day, as they are able to do with trawlers, because the trawlers can plough through storms and all kinds of weather and bring the fish to Halifax, but the schooners, while they can go out in all weathers cannot fish in all weathers, because the fishing is not done from the schooners, it is done from the small boats or dories. If there is a storm for five or six days the men have to stay in the schooners; they cannot go out and fish at all. That is the reason the Maritime National Fish company every year make these representations to the government, at length, under oath, that there are long periods in the winter when they could not get fish from the schooners, while they are able to get them with the trawlers.

Let us assume that they are right when they say that the cancellation of the trawler licences means that they could not supply the fresh fish market, or would have to try to run in some frozen fish; is that not going to hurt the whole fishing industry of Nova Scotia? Is not anything that causes a loss of markets or gives a blow to the market, antagonizes their consumers, the wholesalers and retailers who buy from them, going to have a serious effect on the whole fishing industry? My hon. friend says, "Let us try it; let us see whether the market is lost." My hon. friend must know that when you lose a market, you do not get it back very easily. This market has been built up over the last twenty-five or thirty years; you cannot thus cavalierly experiment with established connections in this way unless you are pretty sure you are right. I grant at once that if the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) is satisfied that these allegations are untrue; that these affidavits are perjured; that there are not long periods during the winter months when schooners and dories could not supply the fresh fish that is required for the market; if he is satisfied with those things, he has to refuse to renew the licences. That is the issue, and that is the basis on which he has given his decision the last two or three years.

I started to say what the effect on the fishermen might be. That is one effect it would have on the fishing industry of Nova Scotia as a whole. There is another.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Frozen fresh fish would not be affected in the way in which the minister has just intimated?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. STEVENS: And a very large proportion of the fish is frozen?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes.

Mr. STEVENS: And could be marketed in those periods when fresh fish is not available?

Mr. ILSLEY: I gave the figures; between fifty and sixty per cent of the output of the Maritime National Fish company is fresh fish; and that is a great deal of fish.

Just let me continue. I had a train of thought, but I get led away from it by these interruptions, and for some reason or another I find it hard to get back to it again to-day. The second point I was going to make was that the Minister of Fisheries, this minister who, we are told, has not done anything for the inshore fishermen of Nova Scotia, within the last year attached a condition to the granting of these licences, that condition being that the Maritime National Fish company must purchase all the fish that was offered from Halifax to Richmond. That is the part of the coast which needs help. The condition was that the company must purchase all this fish at Halifax prices, and provision was made for a collection service to deliver the fish there. The company have carried out that undertaking. Hon. gentlemen might say, "Ah, well, why not make them do that anyway, whether or not they have trawlers?" Well, we have no control over this corporation, which, if I am not mistaken, is provincially incorporated. This is practically the only control this government has; that is, it can stipulate as a condition of the granting of these licences that they treat the inshore fishermen in a certain way, and as a matter of fact that is what has happened. Every year they purchase more hook-and-line fish than they catch in their trawlers. I have not the latest figures, perhaps the Minister of Fisheries can give them later on. I believe they catch something like twenty million pounds of fish by means of their trawlers and purchase between twenty and twenty-three million pounds of hook-and-line fish. So the granting of these licences gives us an opportunity to attach these conditions which will make it necessary for them to purchase these fish from these inshore fishermen. If the trawler licences were cancelled, I do not know who would buy these fish, which are a long distance away and which cost a great deal of money to get to Halifax. I suppose the government would be asked to purchase the fish, or something like that.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but the company bought and closed up a plant on the strait of Canso.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know the story of that plant.

Mr. STEVENS: I saw it there.

Mr. CAHAN: The cost of transportation from the port of Canso was too heavy to permit them to compete with shipments from Halifax.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have listened to evidence given at inquiries in regard to that plant at Canso, which at that time had six or seven trawlers. The agitation against trawlers became very hot, and they could not carry on without them.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes; that evidence has been given repeatedly.

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes, that is what happened.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not what the local people say.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was interested in what was said by the hon. member for Kootenay East as to the point at issue; that is, he said it was not worth while arguing as to whether a steady or adequate supply of fish of a suitable type could be supplied otherwise than by the trawlers. "Why," he said, "look at the tremendous quantities of fish caught in Nova Scotia." He was not getting to the point. When you are dealing with a fresh fish market, it is of no use to have quantities of fish stacked up in Cape Breton or Yarmouth. An adequate supply of suitable fish means a supply when you want it, a steady supply, coming in day by day, which enables you to retain and, if possible, expand and develop your market. That was the point he did not argue; that was the point he said was not worth while arguing, but that is the issue the Minister of Fisheries has to decide.

Mr. STEVENS: The fresh frozen fish would fill any gap.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend is back on that. He is suggesting that we change the consumer demand, which parliament cannot do.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would suggest that the hon. member read the Cockfield Brown report. They went into nearly every retail store in Canada, and made an exhaustive census as to the demand for fresh fish compared with the demand for frozen fish. They came to the conclusion that the demand for fresh fish was very much greater than the demand for frozen fish. Now, does my hon. friend suggest that we do something in an attempt to force frozen fish down the throats of people who want to buy fresh fish? I never heard anything so irresponsible in this house.

Mr. STEVENS: It is not quite so silly as the minister seeks to make out. We are not quite as ignorant as he tries to suggest.

Mr. ILSLEY: But my hon. friend says, "If there are times when you cannot supply fresh fish and you have plenty of frozen fish, why not send them?" That was what he said. His statement can have no other meaning in the world than that which I have placed upon it.

Mr. NEILL: If I might ask a question, are not the fresh fish markets of the whole world governed from time to time by the weather conditions prevailing at nearby sources of supply?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is so; and practically every country in the world has overcome that condition by means of trawlers, of which there are four thousand in operation throughout the world. The United Kingdom relies on trawlers as its method of getting fresh fish; the United States, France and many other countries rely on trawlers. No one will suggest that there is any comparison between trawlers and dories as a means of catching fish in a storm.

Mr. NEILL: I did not ask that. I asked if the fresh fish markets in other countries were not subject to the exigencies of the weather in nearby sources of supply. I do not think you can get away from that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think that is the case.

It has been said that every commission has found in favour of the abolition of the trawler. I was on one of these commissions, and at the time, on the evidence presented to us, I did come to the conclusion, which was shared by a majority of the commission, that the method of fishing by the Lunenburg schooners would be perfectly suitable. My hon. friend says this question was gone into thoroughly. I want to say this, that none of these commissions was set up to deal with the trawler question exclusively. These were commissions which dealt with a wide range of subjects; and when you are dealing with this question and—in the case of the price spreads commission—a hundred others, an extremely limited time is given for consideration of this particular problem. I have learned a good deal since then; I have gone into this question. As far as I can remember, this distinction between fresh and frozen fish was not dealt with before that commission at all. The matter was gone into in a sketchy way; and, as I see them, the facts are exactly as I have stated them to-day. There was the Maclean commission, in which there was a dissenting report. The report following the Cockfield Brown investigation was wholly in favour of trawlers. In the case of the Jones commission, one of the commissioners refused to express any opinion because he did not feel competent to do so. In the price spreads commission also there was a dissenting report. But here is the singular fact, that no one charged with responsibility, no one in the position of a minister and no one in the position of a government since 1910, when trawlers first came into use, has ever reached the situation where they thought they dared take that chance with the fresh fish business of eastern Canada.

Mr. KINLEY: Except in the Ralston order in council of 1929.

Mr. ILSLEY: That was a compromise, or something of the kind.

Mr. KINLEY: It was absolute prohibition.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it was never put into force at all. No person charged with real responsibility has undertaken to abolish these trawlers. It may be that they should be abolished. The situation is in a narrow compass: It is up to this Minister of Fisheries to decide on that question of fact, and unfortunately he has to decide it every year. He has to decide on this question: Can another method of catching fish furnish an adequate supply of suitable fish? He gets evidence on both sides, and he has found himself impelled from year to year to come to the conclusion that it cannot do it.

Mr. DUNNING: Just as his predecessor did.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just as Mr. Rhodes did, just as Mr. Duranleau did and just as other ministers of fisheries have done. They have been doing that every year. Members from Nova Scotia, and notably one of the ablest of Nova Scotians, Mr. Ernst, who represented Queens-Lunenburg, and who was the predecessor of the hon. member who spoke this afternoon, said in a speech I heard in the house, that the question is not one of abolition, but one of regulation. He said, "While this may not be popular in my constituency. I feel that this company in Halifax cannot get a continuous or steady supply of fish unless they have trawlers." Therefore he said they should not be abolished but should be restricted. He and every other minister who held office in the Bennett government between 1931 and 1935, and ministers who have held office since 1935, have come to the same conclusion. There is a business situation there. There is a practical situation. There is no use in trying to make it into an issue between a big corporation and the fishermen. The question is: How are you going to maintain your business and see that you look after those fishermen in eastern Nova Scotia, and at the same time keep some hold on the people who are processing, who have plants and facilities for processing, and see that they buy those fish.

It is true that in some parts of Nova Scotia sentiment is strongly against trawlers. I have heard it said that there was no use in arguing against the sentiment, because people's minds were set. But, as a minister from Nova Scotia, whether it hurts me or helps me, I cannot help saying what I sincerely believe about this matter to which I have given a great deal of thought and study during the last two or three years. I have no fault to find with the manner in which the Minister of Fisheries has dealt with it and is now dealing with it. I hate the legislation, and I hate the order in council. I wish we did not have to have this barrage every year from both sides of the house, but we have to face our responsibilities.

As I have said, the minister has not yet given his decision this year, and I do not know what it will be. But the position lies right within a very narrow compass. There is no use in trying to convert it into a great social or humanitarian issue, because it is not anything of the kind. It is a question of what is the best thing to do for the fishermen of Nova Scotia.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister permit a question? I believe he has under his hand some statistics which might be helpful to me. Where was the frozen fish marketed?

Mr. MICHAUD: In the United States and Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not the figures or destinations before me, but generally speaking I know frozen fish is marketed in Canada and the United States.

Mr. MICHAUD: And Great Britain.

Mr. STEVENS: Who was the scoundrel who rammed it down people's throats, to whom the minister referred?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot seem to explain myself to the hon. member. There is a market for frozen fish and a market for fresh fish, and anybody who knows his business is going to cater to both markets.

Mr. KINLEY: Right.

Mr. STEVENS: And the one company which handles only fresh fish is the company which insists upon these trawlers.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not only fresh fish—but the greater part of its output is fresh fish.

Mr. STEVENS: Its principal business.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, and that is the reason why it says it needs trawlers.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, exactly.

Mr. R. J. DEACHMAN (Huron North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to fish for just a few moments in these troubled waters, and I promise to pull my line in quietly at the first opportunity. I do not like the approach made to the problem by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens). He suggested the price should first be set in regard to the basic products, and then that we should build up until eventually we reach the consumer. But the problem which worries me as a consumer is this: What would you do if, when you came to the eventual consumer, he simply refused to buy? My hon. friend, I think, would be left like Mahomet's coffin —suspended somewhere between heaven and earth.

There is another thing which faces any producer. He must reach the consumer's dollar, but the product he supplies must be within the consumer's capacity to buy. Unless it is within the capacity to buy, then the man has no market for his product, and no pleas on behalf of the basic producer will solve the problem. It must be solved by an adjustment in our fundamental economics.

I was down in Nova Scotia last summer and, while there, made a study of the fishing question. Between 1928, which was a banner year in Canadian production, and 1936, when we were just crawling out of the depression, there was a decline in the volume of fish landings in Nova Scotia to the extent of 1·9 per cent. But the value of fish landed in that province declined during that period by twenty-six per cent. During the same period there was an increase of sixteen per cent in the total number of fishermen. The result was that a production, which had declined twenty-six per cent, had to be distributed among a number of men which had increased by sixteen per cent. The result was that the earnings of the fishermen declined from $467 to $300. As that includes the entire earning of all fishermen, whether engaged in trawlers, schooners or inshore fisheries, we get some conception of how small must have been the reward of the average inshore fisherman of Nova Scotia. And the strange thing about it is that during every period of depression, so far as I was able to trace from the records, the number of inshore fishermen increased. As a result, they were the producers of fish in greater volume, which fell upon the open market, and therefore there was a decline in the price.

During the period between 1928 and 1936 the volume of fish produced by the offshore fishermen decreased roughly by 250,000 hundredweight, and the increased catch of the inshore fishermen was roughly 204,000 hundredweight. During this same period the number of inshore fishermen increased from 13,764 to 16,800, and the number of offshore fishermen declined from 2,093 to 1,559. It is quite evident it was not the increase in production of the offshore fishermen, trawlers or schooners which affected the price of fish, but it was because economic conditions in Nova Scotia had declined, and practically everybody in that province—I was going to say "is born with a fishing line in his hand," but that would be carrying it too far—is at least capable of fishing. The result is that during a period of hard times men go back to the fishing grounds, increase the production of fish, and in a time of declining demand there necessarily is a sharp decline in the price of fish. That decline has been produced primarily by the inshore fishermen, and not by the offshore fishermen.

I ask this question: What are we going to do with this problem? Here are men working for an extremely low wage, a wage which is not consistent with Canadian standards of living. I present to my hon. friends from Nova Scotia this very simple question: Do they not think that with a standard of living as low as it was among the inshore fishermen of Nova Scotia in the last few years, it might be advisable to devise means which would increase the number of men engaged on the shore in processing the fish, in getting them ready for the market and in expanding the markets for this product, instead of trying to resist the inevitable trend to accept the best, cheapest and most simple means of catching fish?

Mr. POTTIER: By what means would you expand?

Mr. DEACHMAN: Is it possible that in Nova Scotia we have the only province which cannot and will not accept improved methods? Are we to move from the cradle to the combine in agriculture; are we to move from the tallow dip to the electric light; are we to have all these great changes in the development of industry, and yet say that Nova Scotia will continue to catch fish as they were caught centuries ago on the sea of Galilee? I cannot believe it possible. I cannot believe that in every other province, in every other dominion and in every other section of the world progress is to be made and yet stop at Nova Scotia because you will not face the inevitable, because you resist continuously the application of the best, most simple and easiest means to achieve the end you have in view. My hon. friend complains that these men are unemployed; but what does he say of the average wage they received? That wage was so low that they would be better unemployed.

Mr. KINLEY: Is the hon. member referring to me?

Mr. DEACHMAN: I was referring to some hon. member who asked about unemployment.

Mr. BAKER: I asked: What about the unemployment question?

Mr. DEACHMAN: Are you approaching this question from the old point of view of increasing employment? You might as well say that men in the woods should use dull axes because more men would be employed. After all, it would take more men to achieve a given purpose with dull axes than it would with proper tools. This summer I saw that lovely province of Nova Scotia in all its glory and beauty, and I hate to think of the men of that province being destined to work with dull axes.

Mr. POTTIER: What the hon. member wants is a fishing industry with no fishermen.

Mr. DEACHMAN: What I want is a fishing industry producing a large volume of fish. I want to see the fishing industry of Nova Scotia producing greater wealth than it is to-day. Admitting that this can be done with fewer men, the fact remains that if there is more wealth produced there will be a greater expansion in business, there will be increased employment and improved conditions for the province. It cannot be possible that all hope of expanding markets for the province of Nova Scotia has ceased. A few years ago there were markets abroad for a much larger volume of fish. If my memory serves me aright—and I think it does—in 1926 eleven trawlers were operating out of Nova Scotia. Was your fishing industry at that time in the state in which it has been lately? Have you improved conditions as you have gradually moved towards the elimination of the trawler? You have not. Conditions have become worse and worse as time has gone on.

In times of depression you come back to fish, and come back to it steadily. The movement of men into inshore fishing decreases the price received for fish, demoralizes the market and ruins the industry which you seek to create. I ask for fair treatment and fair consideration of those men who are actually seeking to expand the industry in Nova Scotia by using the best means available.

A few moments ago the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) referred to the fact that a fairly large factory had been closed at Canso. Let me ask this question: What would happen in any industry if a factory were being operated which did not pay? When the men who own a factory have to take a loss, what follows? That means a decrease in the capital invested in the industry. What does a decrease in the capital invested in an industry mean? That affects the prosperity of your industry. This industry in Nova Scotia depends upon whether it is able to expand foreign and domestic markets. That cannot be done unless there is capital available. The industry depends upon the cooperation of capital.

There is the memorable remedy which can be applied to this or any other problem. There must be an extension of freedom to men to do what they want to do. I do not want to see them restricted by being forced to have their trawlers built in Canada. Last year I found out something about the cost of building trawlers in Canada, compared with having them built in Great Britain. There are some ardent souls who are so anxious to have trawlers built in Canada that they would be willing to have these companies pay double the price they would have to pay to have them built in Great Britain. It is only by the extension of economy; it is only by lowering your costs, that you can operate successfully in this highly competitive market. Here as everywhere freedom is necessary, and I ask the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) to consider the extension of freedom to the Canadian fishing industry.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, much has been said this afternoon about the steam trawler, and I am sure the discussion we have heard will bring back fond memories to many of the older members. This question has been debated on many occasions, and the same arguments have been advanced from different sides of the house. The last two memorable occasions upon which it was debated were in 1929 and 1930. Before 1929, steam trawlers were permitted to operate off the shores of Canada without too much restriction or regimentation, but at that time parliament thought it advisable to regulate trawlers.

For those who are not familiar with fishing terms—and I am sure there are some in this house—may I say that three methods of fishing are used by those who fish on the Atlantic coast for what is known as ground fish, that is cod, haddock and whitefish generally. First, there is the old method of hook and line which has been in use for the last 300 years. Men go off the shore in small boats with a hook and line and try to catch the cod with bait. As soon as they have sufficient fish in their boats, they come to shore to dispose of them as best they can.

Then, there is the more modern method of using the Lunenburg schooner. This type of schooner is called the Lunenburg schooner because the first schooners were built at that port. The fishing is not done from the schooner proper. The schooner is a large boat propelled by a diesel engine. It goes to the grand banks or off the shore and stays several days, generally being manned by a crew of about twenty-five men. Each of these schooners has ten or twelve dories, small wooden boats, which are lowered to the sea when the schooner is out on the high seas, and from which two fishermen fish with hook and line. The success of their catch depends upon the weather and other conditions; when the dory is full, it returns to the schooner, its fish is put into the schooner's stores, and finally the schooner brings its whole catch back to port.

But there is another method which has been described as the trawler method. The trawlers are large boats of the mine sweeper type. As a matter of fact, during the war all our steam trawlers were used as mine sweepers. They are operated by steam, and the fishing is done mechanically. The trawler fishes with a bag which is dragged along the bottom of the sea; when full, the bag is raised with a mechanical derrick and the fish are dumped on to the deck of the trawler. The operation is very similar to the operation of purse seiners on the west coast. It is obvious to those who have seen either the purse seiners on the west coast or the trawlers on the east, that the trawler method enables the operators to catch a large quantity of fish in a relatively short time, and the fish are not kept lying exposed for a long time to sun and weather. That helps to preserve the quality of the fish when it is offered to the consumer.

Trawling is not a new method of fishing; it has been in operation in the old world for many, many years. It was only in 1908 that a company in Nova Scotia decided to try to develop a fresh fish business in Canada by the trawler method. The records of the department show that before the year 1908 there was hardly any fresh fish, unfrozen, sold in Canada, and the very little quantity that was sold on the Toronto and Montreal markets was imported overnight from Boston, or Portland, Maine, and then distributed and consumed. Thirty years ago most of the fish consumed in Canada was dried, salted, pickled or processed fish. But these people had vision and decided to try to capture whatever market there was in this country for fresh fish, and to expand that market if possible.

The department, working in cooperation with these people, approached the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian National express to secure transportation facilities for the delivery of fresh fish from the Atlantic coast to inland markets. When it is realized that the nearest market of any importance to the Atlantic coast is about fifteen hundred miles from the source of production, one appreciates the difficulties of transporting fresh caught fish and keeping it fresh until it is distributed to the consumers in Toronto and Montreal. But that is something which the trade has been able to accomplish in this country. Canada is now recognized as having the best transportation and distribution facilities of any country in the world for marketing fresh fish far from the source of production. The national railways, in cooperation with the government and the industry, helped to develop markets in the large consuming centres, with the result that from 1925 to 1927 there were about twelve trawlers operating from the coast of Nova Scotia to supply the needs of this expanding market.

After the war, people on the Atlantic coast went into fishing more extensively than before, and a far greater number were engaged in the industry. There was a good market in the United States and the fishing industry on the Atlantic coast expanded. In the winter of 1926-27, the weather was very mild and huge quantities of fish were caught by the inshore fishermen, the schooner fishermen, and the twelve trawlers. There was a glut on the market and prices slumped. The natural result followed, and the claim was made that there was no profit in fishing. The hook and line fishermen blamed the trawlers for the predicament they were in, and so the government of the day appointed a commission of five members, headed by Mr. Justice Maclean, to study the problem. On this trawler question the commission divided, four reporting that the trawlers should be abolished, and Mr. Justice Maclean filing a minority report that the use of the trawlers should be restricted and regulated. The government, as a consequence, decided to regulate the use of trawlers. The then Minister of Fisheries, now Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), went down to the Nova Scotia coast, and upon his report regulations were made whereby the use of trawlers was limited and a tax was imposed on fish caught by trawlers to compensate the inshore fishermen for the loss of revenue in their vocation. Two years afterwards, the courts declared these regulations ultra vires, and the situation reverted to practically what it was before 1929.

Parliament in the session of 1931 went fully into the question again and referred it to the fisheries committee, which investigated and made a report, and on that report are based the regulations which have since governed the licensing of trawlers up to this date. I might as well put on the record the regulations of 1931. Section 56 of the Fisheries Act is the one which applies to trawlers. It reads:

56. (1) Every person shall be guilty of an offence, and shall incur therefor a penalty of not less than one hundred dollars and not more than two thousand dollars, recoverable with costs upon summary conviction, who at any time, except under licence from the minister—

(a) with intent to fish or to cause any other person to fish with a vessel that uses an "otter" or other trawl of a similar nature . . .

That is a positive enactment in the fisheries act. Subsection 2 reads:

(2) No such vessel shall carry on fishing operations from or to any Canadian port or ports, unless such vessel is registered as a British ship in Canada and is owned by a Canadian or by a body corporate incorporated under the laws of the Dominion of Canada or of one of the provinces thereof, and having its principal place of business in Canada.

I can skip subsection 3, which has no bearing on the discussion. Subsection 4 reads:

(4) The minister may determine the number of such vessels that shall be eligible to be licensed.

Since 1931, the number of vessels has been limited by the minister by virtue of the power conferred upon him by this subsection, and the number has remained the same until the present date. Subsection 5 reads:

(5) Regulations may be made under the provisions of section thirty-four of this act—

(a) prescribing the form of licence;

(b) specifying the evidence to be submitted with an application for a licence;

(c) fixing the conditions under which a licence shall be issued;

(d) making any other provisions respecting licences.

This is the legislation that authorizes the minister and imposes upon him the obligation of issuing licences when those who apply for them comply with the provisions of the law. Under subsection 4 of section 56 of the Fisheries Act regulations were made from time to time and revised. There were some regulations in 1929. In 1930 and finally in 1931 regulations were formulated providing:

(a) That the applicant for such licence shall furnish the Minister of Fisheries with evidence that will satisfy the said minister, that he cannot obtain an adequate supply of suitable fish to enable him properly to conduct and develop his business from the hook and line fishermen, and that if the licence is granted, the extent of his purchase of fresh fish from the said fishermen will not be adversely affected.

These are the main provisions of the regulations that must be complied with by those who are applying for licences. The minister is being placed in the position of an arbiter or a judge in the matter, and if he is satisfied that the evidence which is submitted to him shows that the person applying for the licence is entitled to receive it, he acts accordingly. I have felt, ever since I have been in office that there was no alternative to issuing the licence, and I have done so for the last three years. True, it puts the minister in an awkward position to have this responsibility placed upon him, but each of us must face his responsibilities and discharge them, and I have tried to discharge my duty as best I could in the last three years.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will the minister indicate the type of evidence that satisfies him?

Mr. MICHAUD: The type of evidence I have required is evidence under oath showing that the applicant cannot obtain from the hook-and-line fishermen an adequate supply of suitable fish—it must be adequate and suitable—to enable him properly to conduct and develop his business; and that if the licence is granted, the extent of his purchases of fresh fish from the fishermen will not be adversely affected. I have always insisted, as my predecessors have done—the record shows this—that the applicants should submit to me sufficient evidence to show that they could not obtain an adequate supply of suitable fish to enable them to carry on their business properly, and that the granting of the licence would not affect the extent of the purchases from the hook-and-line fishermen. Every year such evidence has been submitted under oath, and I have been satisfied that the applicant could not properly continue to develop his business without the operating of the trawler. This year again, evidence has been submitted under oath. There are ten pages of it. I will not read them, but they constitute a public document which can be placed on the records of the house or given to anyone who asks for it.

I have been criticized for having delayed until the last moment the giving of my decision. I felt that in order properly to discharge the duty imposed upon me by the act, and to be fair to everyone concerned, I should wait until the last moment so as to give everyone interested every facility and ample time to put before me such evidence as was required. For that reason I have always delayed as long as possible before making a decision in the matter.

I have before me, up to the present, evidence under oath from two companies. One of these is the Maritime National Fish, Limited—that is the new company—which has applied for three licences, that is, the renewal of the three licences which the company has enjoyed for the last seven years. I have also two applications from General Seafoods, Limited, a United States company that has established a base of operations in Halifax and is applying for these licences.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

FISHERIES ACT

SEINE FISHING FOR SALMON PROHIBITED IN WATERS ADJACENT TO MOUTH OF FRASER RIVER

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved the second reading of Bill No. 29, to amend the Fisheries Act, 1932.

He said: This bill is similar to one which I have introduced on several prior occasions. Briefly, the bill asks for the elimination of seine fishing from a part of the gulf of Georgia, which is really the estuary of the Fraser river. For the benefit of those who are not familiar with the methods of fishing employed on the Pacific coast, which differ somewhat from those in use on the Atlantic coast, it might be advisable if I take a moment to say that there are three principal methods of fishing in use on the Pacific coast, namely, gill netting, seining and trolling. Of course, we have some traps at Sooke harbour, which matter came before the house a short time ago and which, I understand, will come before the fisheries committee for discussion. Gill netting and the use of seines are entirely different. The seine boat is a large power boat costing some $15,000 to $16,000, having a net 1,200 feet long and seventy-three feet deep, whereas the gill net is 1,200 feet long and some thirty-two feet in depth. I give the dimensions in feet rather than the mesh or fathoms to make the picture clear to hon. members.

Reviewing briefly the history of the agitation which has been proceeding on behalf of the seine net fishermen of the Fraser river, I might say that until 1933 the area in question was fished entirely by gill netting; no power boats were allowed into that area. As a result of intensive fishing by seine boats in other parts of the province, an agitation was started by the canning interests and the owners of seine boats, seventy-five to eighty per cent of which are owned by the canning interests, to allow this Fraser river area to be opened up to the use of seines. While there are districts in British Columbia where seine boats can operate and perhaps should be allowed to operate, it has long been the policy of the department to prohibit their operation in certain narrow channels and estuaries. A seine boat with its long deep net follows the fish; the net is cast wherever the fish school, making a circle, and then the bottom of the net is drawn tight, bringing the catch up to the surface of the water. That is why the net is called a purse seine. Then the fish are brailed from that into the boat.

In 1933 there was no Minister of Fisheries, but there was an acting minister whose name was Mr. Duranleau. While the house was in session, an order in council was passed allowing these seine boats to fish in this area. Protest was made by myself and others to the acting minister and, later, on the floor of this house. The explanation given by the acting minister for allowing seine boats to fish in the gulf of Georgia related to quality only. I should like to read one or two extracts from a letter sent by the then acting Minister of Fisheries to myself, stating why he considered the seine boats should be allowed to operate in this area to catch what are called pink salmon. He claimed that the seines could catch them out in the open, and they would be of better quality and so enable the Canadian fishing industry to compete successfully in markets abroad. His whole letter is a setting forth of that argument. He said in part

If these advanced fish could be caught before Fraser river water is reached, their value for canning would be safeguarded. A canned product of a valuation of from one-half million to a million dollars is involved. The question thus resolves itself into one as to whether a type of gear will be permitted that will be effective in acquiring these fish for a first-grade article of commerce, or of permitting an economic loss and waste that will accrue if it is not allowed.

After the order in council was passed, the acting minister and his officials started to bolster up the argument that the purpose of allowing the seine boats in this area was to get better quality pink salmon. They said that the gill net boats could not or did not catch the fish in the same place as the seines, and the quality of their catch was not as good as that of the seines. Knowing that an agitation had started against the use of seines, the fisheries department sent out letters to the industry. I have one here, dated September 27, 1933, which was sent out to the canneries, with a view, I claim, of bolstering up the action of the department and the acting minister in allowing seines in this area. I have not time to read it all, but Mr. MacLeod, supervisor of fisheries, sent this out to the industry, and the last clause reads:

I have been further requested to obtain from each cannery manager a communication setting out his opinion as to whether the seine-caught fish were superior for canning purposes as compared to fish caught by means of gill nets, and also if the authority to use purse seines in the gulf of Georgia has been the means of raising the standard of district No. 1 pack of pink salmon.

I claimed at the time and I still maintain that that letter was worded in a leading way. There was an inference to be drawn from it; the cannery men knew when they got this letter just what the departmental officials wanted. And those cannery interests that had seine boats sent back the report that these seine boats caught pink salmon of better quality than the gill nets. But, Mr. Speaker, this whole matter was a farce, as I can illustrate in just a moment. There were two types of gear operating in this area at one and the same time—seine boats and gill nets. Both brought their catches alongside the wharves at the canneries; they emptied their fish on the cannery floor one after another. So the fish lying on the floor, ready for canning, would be a mixture of pink salmon caught by seines and pink salmon caught by gill nets, all in one heap. Yet some of the cannery men came back with an official reply to the departmental officials in which they stated that in their opinion the salmon caught by the seine boats was of superior quality. There was nothing in the world to substantiate that statement. At that time the inspection board were asked to inquire into the authenticity of this declaration, and their reply is given in a brief which was presented to the fisheries committee by the then deputy minister of fisheries, Doctor Found, when this whole matter was under discussion there. The inspection board were asked as to the quality of the salmon caught by seine boats as against that of the fish caught by gill nets, and this is what they said:

The board had no information regarding each parcel as to whether packed from seined or gill-netted pinks and so can deal with the question in only a general way—

That is a fairly direct statement; yet ever since the order in council—perhaps up to the present day, although I am not sure of that—the departmental officials have endeavoured to bolster up the action taken in 1933, when for the first time by order in council the seine boats were admitted into the gulf of Georgia or the estuary of the Fraser river. In my protest at that time I pointed out to the then acting Minister of Fisheries that this step, under the guise of enabling the seine boats to catch the variety of salmon called pink, was the thin end of the wedge; and that if they were allowed to remain, these seine boats would catch every other variety of salmon coming from outside waters and heading through the strait of Juan de Fuca to the Fraser river, which is exactly what has taken place.

It is true that there was an inspection board in existence at that time, but the way in which that board operated was a scandal, if I might use that term. I should like to use stronger language, but since I am in the House of Commons I will let it go at that. The three men who composed that board were also brokers; that is, they received orders from abroad to buy fish. Very often, consignments or cases of salmon would be turned down by this board, and the canners would be told that the particular pack of salmon graded B. Then, two or three days later, the canners would receive inquiries from these brokers—who were also the inspectors—asking if they had any cases of grade B salmon to sell. It amounted almost to a racket. Just to show how farcical the whole thing was, I might mention just one instance. Certain canners in the northern part of British Columbia would send tins of salmon to Vancouver and ask the board to inspect them. But there was no check made at the canneries in the north in regard to the cases of salmon whence came those samples. In other words, the inspection board trusted to the honesty of these men. I am not doubting their honesty for a moment; but how the inspectors could say, from the samples received, that the pack should be passed, is away beyond me.

Then, as an argument as to why the seiners should be allowed to catch pink salmon, they said, "Well, we are paying a better price for the salmon caught by the seiners compared with the salmon caught by the gill netters," and it was said that the cannery men would never pay a higher price to the seine boats unless the fish were of better quality. Well, I looked into that aspect of the argument and found there was nothing to it. As a matter of fact, one could take various districts where fishing takes place, outside the estuary of the Fraser, and find different prices; but these differences were not altogether on account of differences in quality. For instance, up in Butedale, or Namu, or Bella Coola—and I have the prices for April 2, 1935, as sent out by Doctor A. W. Found—purse seine fishermen were receiving 3½ cents each for pinks, while the gill net fishermen were receiving only three cents. On the other hand, in Butedale the salmon fishermen operating cannery gear, that is, nets loaned to them by the cannery men, were receiving only 2½ cents. In 1934, when I argued this matter, I placed on record figures proving that there was no truth whatever in the statement that the seiners had received a greater price for their pink salmon than had the gill netters.

Then, to come again to the matter of quality, in 1934 they began to exhibit figures of the number of cases of salmon condemned, seeking to leave the thought that these salmon had been caught by gill netters further up the river, that they were of poorer quality and that all the salmon caught by the seiners were A-1 fish. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think I proved to the satisfaction of everyone but the departmental officials and the acting Minister of Fisheries that this was not so. The then acting Minister of Fisheries spoke to me in 1933 when I left the house; he said, "Mr. Reid, I do not know the first thing about fish. I do not know whether a haddie swims opened out flat as you see it in the store, or whether it goes around the sea closed up. But," he stated, "I took the advice of the British Columbia men"—including the then Minister of Trade and Commerce—"but I don't know what it's all about." That was his frank admission to me, just after I had advanced the argument in the house in 1933.

Mr. Speaker, the seine boats never before were allowed in this area. Ever since 1922, after the commission consisting of members of this house had gone to British Columbia and had reported to the house—and I have a copy of the report before me—it was stated that in any district or area where gill netting could be done, no seine boats should be allowed. That policy had been adhered to all the way along until, as I say, in 1933, when they were allowed by order in council to move into this area.

I well remember some of the other arguments in those days by the Department of Fisheries. Prior to that time and in the year following they were arguing, and arguing strenuously, that if the Fraser river fishermen were allowed to export their salmon before it was canned, the whole industry would collapse. And well do I remember the strong arguments put up by the deputy minister of fisheries, both in committee and in person. The argument was made in this way, "Oh, no, we cannot allow the Fraser river fishermen to export these salmon, even though they would get a better price in the United States. If we do that, the industry will be doomed; it will collapse."

Well, Mr. Speaker, after many protestations, especially by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and myself, the embargo was lifted. The industry is still going on. It may be in a little worse condition to-day, but it is not because fishermen have exported great numbers of salmon across the border. May I point this out to hon. members: While it is true that United States interests allow the use of seine boats close to the international boundary line, still they take very great care that in their own country they do not allow the use of seine boats at the mouths of their own rivers. Let me read a communication I have in my hand which sets out the policy in the United States. This was sent to me from the department of fisheries in the state of Washington, under the hand of Mr. B. M. Brennan, Director of Fisheries. Dated May 3, 1934, the letter is as follows:

> Northern Puget sound does not permit gill netting, with few exceptions, because of the nature of the area, hence the fishermen are forced to use a gear which is suitable for that district. The Fraser river permits extensive gill netting as does our Columbia river. We have ruled purse seines out of the latter district and off the coast of Washington within our jurisdiction to prevent the catching of immature fish.

That is in the state of Washington. Up in Bristol bay they have gone a great deal farther in their endeavour to protect the salmon industry there, because no power boats of any kind are allowed in that bay. They do not allow even gasoline engines in the gill net boats, and all salmon fishing in the bay of Bristol must be done by boats driven by sail or by oars. Those are the precautions they take, so careful are they not to allow anything in that district which, in their opinion, would deplete or do harm to the great salmon fishing grounds in Bristol bay and in Alaska.

In the gulf of Georgia we have a condition which, if not watched, will be far more serious than anything which might develop in Bristol bay, because we have a short stretch of water called the strait of Juan de Fuca. All the fish returning from the open waters of the sea pass through that strait and up through the narrow channels heading towards the Fraser river. It is with a view, not altogether but primarily to preserve this area, first of all from depletion and, second, in the interests of the gill net fishermen that I have kept up a fight to have the seine boats eliminated entirely from the gulf of Georgia.

On two occasions I was fortunate enough to have them moved out, first a short distance, and then on another attempt, when a bill was introduced, the minister agreed to move them out still farther. When they were first allowed in, they were right up into the mouth of the Fraser river, and there was a most regrettable destruction. The seine boats are mobile traps. We have heard a great deal about traps. I shall not go into that matter, however, because it is already under discussion.

But I point out that the seine boats in the estuary of the Fraser river can be more destructive than traps, because, while it is true that the fish meet the traps, follow the lead into the heart of the trap and are thereby caught, the seiners watch, just like hawks, and when the fish gather together in schools preparatory to heading up the Fraser river, the seine boats swoop into the midst of them, encircle their nets round them, pull tight the string at the bottom and bring the fish up. A catch of 10,000 salmon at one haul is not unusual.

The fish gather in schools or in masses preparatory to spawning; if they are split up or interfered with, as happens when a seine boat goes in among them, the fish are thrown considerably off their course, and the action of the seining to quite an extent interferes with their migration. It takes some time before they gather together again, heading for the head waters of the Fraser river. The seines catch not only one variety, but all varieties, and in this district where they have been allowed to operate the water is so shallow at times that the net of the seine boat strikes on the bottom and everything including crabs is caught. All varieties, including not only pink and sockeye salmon but spring salmon, are caught; and as the net of the seine is only three and a half inches in width, as against the five and a half or six and a half inches of the gill net, every time the seine boat circles a school it catches everything within that circle, nothing escaping. Considerable quantities of immature fish are destroyed; I refer to fish in the schools of adult salmon hordes heading to the head waters of the Fraser river. The seine net catches everything even, as I say, to the extent of crabs.

When seines were allowed into that area, it was expected and also argued that only a few seine boats would come in. In 1933, some fifty-four seine boats went into the district and caught considerable numbers of fish. In 1938 practically all the seine boats in British Columbia came down into that area. There were as many as 105 large power seine boats waiting in that small area to catch the salmon heading up to spawn. There are only a certain number of fish each year which come through the strait of Juan de Fuca to spawn. If you have 2,000 or more gill-net fishermen and no one else is allowed to fish in that area, the catch would be distributed among those men. But if you allow 105 seine boats to have first crack at the great hordes of salmon, this means not only that they destroy immature fish and split up the schools, but that they rob the gill-net fishermen of part of their legitimate livelihood.

I should like to mention what is not generally known, that the seine boat has from between seven and nine men on board. The boat is worked on shares which are divided into twelfths, five-twelfths going to the owners and seven-twelfths to the crew. If the total catch of a seine boat is worth $12,000, it means that $5,000 goes to the owners of the vessel, while $7,000 is distributed among the crew. But if the same amount of fish were caught by gill-net fishermen, all the $12,000 would be distributed among those fishermen. The loss is borne by the gill-net fishermen who have to buy their own equipment and who mostly reside along or adjacent to the banks of the Fraser river. These seine boats can operate anywhere. They may fish one area and then, when the season opens in another area, they may go there. They may fish in the gulf of Georgia and then go along the west coast of Vancouver island or down into other areas, as they have been doing ever since 1933, and particularly in 1938.

One variety of salmon being caught by the seine boat is known as spring salmon. These schools or hordes of pink or sockeye salmon are so large that generally there are other varieties of fish found mixed up with them. Spring salmon have been getting scarcer as the years go by, and fewer of this variety of fish have been caught by the gill-net fishermen ever since 1933, when the seine boats were first allowed to operate.

Let me go back for a moment again to the quality of the fish. I have before me a letter from Edmunds and Walker Limited, which states that the purse seine fishing bruises the spring salmon when catching them. They point out that better prices are paid to the gill-net fishermen for this variety of salmon than are paid to the seine fishermen when they are presumably out fishing for either pink or sockeye salmon. They have this to say about price:

> At the same time as the seiners were receiving this price of 25 cents a piece or about two-thirds to three-quarters cents per pound the gill-netters were receiving three cents per pound for reds and one cent per pound for whites.

And again:

> The reason for this is that these fish in the process of being brailed and of being transferred from the seine boat to the collector are being so badly bruised and smashed that they must be classified along with white salmon and sold at an equivalent price.

That is most interesting in view of the argument put forth by the departmental officials that the seine boats catch fish of a better quality than those caught by the gill-netters. The evidence this year shows that the seine boats are endeavouring to control the whole area. I am not arguing for one moment that purse seine fishing should not be allowed in British Columbia, because I realize that there are certain districts where it should be allowed. My argument for the elimination of purse seines from the area is based on the fact that the area is small and is an estuary of the Fraser river where the fish school and get ready to head up the river to spawn. For that reason it is important that fishing by seines be entirely eliminated. So far as I know, no protests have been made this year by the industry. In my argument I want it distinctly understood that I am speaking on behalf of the British Columbia Fishermen's Protective Association, whose head office is in New Westminster. The president of this association has the following to say about last year's operations:

> Last year during the run of late sockeye owing to the peculiarity of movement shown by this school of fish, the seines seemed to be unable to contact the school owing to the fact that the fish remained further north for quite some time, which is not usually the case, but once the fish moved south, in the vicinity of Canoe Pass, the seines then plugged the canneries immediately, boats bringing in six to eight thousand loads for each days fishing, and in order to stop a repetition of the wasteful loss of fish through the canneries being plugged, which occurred in 1936, and also to avoid putting up a lot of fish at a cheap price, it was mutually agreed by both our association and the cannery operators to close district number one and let a very fine run of fish go on to the spawning ground.
> This would have been very difficult for us to do, had the price, offered by the cannery operators, remained at a fair level and might be impossible another year. It should be plain from this that the seines still constitute a grave menace to the gill-net fishermen when the fish school in the vicinity of Canoe Pass.

Briefly, my argument is this: The livelihood of well over 2,000 gill net fishermen will be jeopardized if these 105 seine boats are allowed to continue to take from this area salmon heading up the Fraser river. I want to repeat that there are only a certain number of fish which come through the strait headed for the Fraser river. The more seine or power boats that are allowed to operate in that area, the fewer fish there will be for the individual gill-net fishermen who live in this district and whose homes are mostly along the banks of the Fraser river or in the immediate vicinity.

If one looks at this bill from the point of view of the greatest good to the greatest number, one cannot help coming to the conclusion that it should be accepted by the house. This is not altogether a fight that has been going on since British Columbia became a province, because it has become a well established fact in the estuary of the Fraser that this area has always been fished by gill net fishermen. As to quality, I think I have exploded any arguments that have been advanced in that regard. The gill net fishermen went far out in the same area last year and in great numbers. There is no difficulty about the canneries not having sufficient fish. It is a question now of other districts having been depleted, and the cannery men and the seine boat owners saying, "Here is one large area, allow us to fish there."

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I do not think the house should pass this bill unless we hear some more substantial arguments in favour of it than have been presented to-night. While much of what the hon. member said was correct, a good deal of it was beside the point, such as the matter of inspection by brokers; and other parts of it were predicated on conditions as they existed six years ago and which no longer exist to-day.

I see three substantial objections to the bill. In the first place, the passing of the bill, nay, even the introduction of it, is going to be used as an argument—an unsound argument if you will, but nevertheless an argument—in favour of those few individuals in British Columbia who want to maintain the traps at Sooke. The question of fish traps is sub judice; that is, it is referred to a committee and therefore it is not debatable here. But the fishermen out there are dissatisfied over the introduction of this bill. There was a meeting of the United Fishermen's Union in Vancouver recently, and the statement was made there:

> Meantime Mr. Tom Reid, M.P., is reported to have brought down a bill which will, if passed, ban purse-seining on the gulf of Georgia off the Fraser river mouth. The P.C.F.U. and the S.P.S.U. both protest that Mr. Reid should not bring in such a bill at this time, but should devote all his efforts to the fight against fish traps.

At another meeting of the two fishing bodies, a speaker, discussing the same subject, said:

> The fact that 105 seine boats fish in the gulf for 12 days each season, during slack time up north, has little effect on the catches of the gillnetters of the Fraser river. He said that the old antagonism between seiners and the gillnetters and between other various branches of the fishing industry is dying out.

Then a paper called the Fisherman, which I think more truly represents the working fisherman than any of the fishery papers published in Vancouver, had an editorial on fish traps in which there appeared this paragraph:

> We regret that Mr. Tom Reid, unwittingly or otherwise, also played into the hands of the operators and acted against the best interests of the fishermen when he chose such a time to put forward his bill to eliminate seining in the gulf.

This bill will merely make a selfish, local, geographical appeal to one class of fishermen located in the district of New Westminster. It does not forbid seining in British Columbia; it only forbids seining in a small area of a small district. If the opposition to seining were genuine, we would expect to find opposition to seining all over British Columbia; but the hon. member himself admitted twice to-night in his speech that seining must be allowed in the waters of British Columbia. In other words, he is willing to allow seining all over that province provided it is kept out of his district.

There are three methods of commercial fishing in British Columbia—and I am leaving out fish traps, which is not a method of fishing at all, but has been aptly defined, at a meeting of the Olympia legislature, as grand larceny of the fishing industry and a rape of mother nature. Leaving that aside, however, there are three methods of commercial fishing. These methods are; first, trolling, which must not be confounded with trawling, and which is an amplification of the hook and line, which system we are all in favour of because it gives the greatest employment to the greatest number of fishermen and promotes a breed of fine independent fishermen. It does not cost a great deal of money, with hard work and economy, to get the necessary boat and gear, and you could not get a better class of fisherman than the independent troller. But it would be impossible to confine fishing to trollers only because they can catch only two of the five or six varieties of fish. There are only two varieties that take the bait on the hook, and therefore we have to fall back on the gill net, which is a long net that floats with the tide or the current. The fish run up against it and try to go through it, and, as the name implies, they get caught by the gills and are captured. The gill net catches any variety of fish, but it cannot operate in clear water. The water must be muddy or discoloured because, if it is clear, the fish can see the net and readily dive under it and so escape.

It is admitted by my hon. friend himself that the seines do form a certain part of industrial fishing there. It is not the most desirable method of fishing and can be made destructive. The policy of the department is, therefore, that where certain waters can be fished adequately by the gill net or by trolling, the use of seines should be forbidden in that area. But they must allow seines. There are large bodies of water where, on account of the fact that they are frequented by fish which will not take the troll, or because the water is clear and they cannot be fished by gill nets, seines must be allowed. But they are safely guarded. The department is aware of their destructive potentialities, and large areas are set aside in which seines are not allowed to fish at all. Where they are allowed to fish, they are fully and, as they claim, harshly circumscribed by regulations. For instance, they cannot fish within half a mile of the mouth of a creek or river. There is a closed season of forty-eight hours each week, and some weeks they can fish only four days. With these restrictions they are allowed to fish in certain waters. This is quite different from the privileges allowed the traps.

In the early days seines were owned entirely by the canneries, and there was then a good deal of trouble. Now, however, the canneries and the fishermen realize that they need each other and they cooperate to some extent. There is a better feeling now, but they still fight over prices, et cetera. Conditions have changed in regard to seines. The working fisherman has gone ahead, saved and bought his own boat. He is a man of property. A fully equipped seine boat, with diesel engine and the appropriate seine, would be worth up to about $25,000. These men have a considerable stake.

I said that there was a selfish, geographical appeal in this matter, and I can prove it. The waters of British Columbia are divided into three districts—one, two and three—regardless of electoral districts. No. 1 district is in the neighbourhood of Westminster, including the Fraser river. No. 2 district is represented by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson) and takes in all the northern waters. No. 3 covers the district represented by myself and the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). It is principally in Comox-Alberni, although there is a portion in North Vancouver. If this bill passes, there will be no seining in No. 1 district; it will be entirely confined to No. 2 and No. 3. But I ask, why should it be confined to two districts? Why should it not apply to all three?

Seining is allowed in British Columbia by the law of the land, under proper restriction. I do not deny that there is keen competition, but why should the Comox-Alberni district and the Skeena and North Vancouver district carry the whole burden of seiners for 365 days of the year, and No. 1 district kick because they are asked to carry the burden for only ten days of the year—because that is all the time the seines fished there last year. It is really worse; it is not ten days; it amounts to perhaps hardly more than half of that; but at the outside it would be ten days a year. Last year they were allowed to fish ten days in No. 1 district, but on account of the weekly closed season they had only eight days.

These two runs of fish caught in these waters, under these conditions and at that time, are two separate runs, the pinks and the late sockeye, which run in a peculiar way. The sockeye run for two years running, then miss two years, and then run for two years more. The pinks run every alternate year. So it would be fair to say that on the average they run only every second year. Consequently, if fishing were allowed for three weeks every second year, it would not amount to taking off much more than an average of ten days a year during which No. 1 district is asked to carry the burden, if you like, of the seiners, while the other districts carry it for 365 days. Therefore, it is a wholly selfish appeal to one section of fishermen, and only to a part of them, located in the neighbourhood of the Fraser river and a few also in the district represented by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber).

These Fraser river gill netters are not confined to district No. 1. They go up in large numbers in the summer time to the Skeena district, and fish in the Skeena river, but it is now proposed to stop No. 2 and No. 3 district seiners from coming down into No. 1 for ten days, while on the other hand No. 1 district fishermen are welcome to come up and pursue their fishing in No. 2 district.

Now, on the merits of the subject, in 1933 the dominion government allowed seining in all that area from the Fraser river down to the international boundary line, and I may say that the line is not on the land but in the water. They allowed them to come right into the mouth of the river almost, or at least up to where the muddy water came out and mixed itself up with the gulf waters. Down near the line the water is perfectly clear. In 1933, when they allowed fishing all over that area, it did do harm to the gill netters. The hon. member was right in his argument regarding that period. He brought into the house a bill which was referred to the fisheries committee, and was defeated on a nine to eight vote. I was one of the eight who voted for that bill. But conditions have changed. I would still vote for that bill if the area were the same, but it has been changed. The hon. member brought in another bill in 1936, but he withdrew it on the promise that the minister would look into the matter. The minister did so, and he changed the area in 1937, moving the line right down near the boundary line. It just left a strip two miles north of the boundary line. That may seem a good deal, but seines take a great deal of water to operate in. They are liable to drift and so require a great deal of water. The water down there, I say without fear of contradiction, is clear. It cannot be gill netted; it never has been successfully gill netted; it never will be; that is, that area close to the line, two miles north of the line. That is what makes the difference.

Moreover, they catch a very good quality of fish there. Seines are only allowed in that limited area outside the scope of the gill netters. All that muddy water for gill netters is preserved for them. It is only in the clear water that the seines are allowed to operate now.

In 1938 seines took 200,000 sockeye, and the gill netters considerably over a million. The gill netters had a grievance in 1933, and I voted to remedy that grievance, and would do so again. But the grievance has been remedied, and an arrangement made that is fair to all parties.

Therefore I oppose this bill, first, because it gives a specious argument, not a sound one, but still an argument, to those who wish to continue to use traps. Second, there is no hardship done to the gill netters. The present arrangements have been in operation for two years in this reduced area, and no figures have been given to substantiate any complaint; in fact, no complaint has been made. Third, it is unfair to allow the seiners to operate only in No. 2 and No. 3 districts throughout the province, compel our gill netters and trollers in those two districts to carry the burden of the seines for 365 days, and begrudge us the temporary relief that would be afforded by No. 1 district carrying them for ten or fifteen days, and that operating on the average only every other year. Therefore I am against the bill.

Mr. OLOF HANSON (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this bill for several reasons. First of all, I have had information from the fishermen in the area concerning the conditions, and, second, I think the explanation that has been given in support of the bill warrants me in supporting it.

There were no seines in the Fraser river prior to 1933. The gill net fishermen developed the area by gill net fishing. The gill net fishermen establish themselves in and about the mouth of the Fraser river.

In 1933, by order in council, purse seine fishing was allowed in that area. At that time there were approximately three thousand gill net fishermen operating in the mouth of the Fraser river. The number of seiners increased, and last year there were 105 boats fishing in that area, employing perhaps 700 men. There were also between two and three thousand gill net fishermen, and it is difficult for them to make a living in competition with seine fishing.

WAYS AND MEANS

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

Motion (Mr. Dunning) agreed to and the house went into committee of ways and means, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On schedule 1:

Customs tariff—588a. Gas for heating, cooking or illuminating, imported by pipe line: 3 cents per one thousand cubic feet.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—589. Charcoal made from wood: $4 per ton.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—597. Pianofortes and organs: 25 per cent.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: I should like to say a few words on this particular item dealing with pianofortes and organs. Although the piano industry is not large, it is an important industry in this dominion and should be given consideration. From the information I have gathered I am convinced that if this item goes through, we shall be loaded up and flooded with second-hand instruments from the United States. And that will happen at a bad time. This industry suffered during the depression from the competition of other lines of household utilities invented during the last decade. Recently, through its own efforts and initiative, the industry has been recuperating from a long slump. I should like to review briefly the history of the tinkering with the tariff on this line of goods. In 1931, after many years of dumping into this country of pianos from the United States, from the Bowery and the Bronx of New York where they were used to accompany the singing of "The Sidewalks of New York" in the gay nineties, there was established a value for duty—

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Was that the first of the tinkering the hon. member complains about?

Mr. WERMENLINGER: One of my hon. friend's colleagues, I think his neighbour on his right (Mr. Moore), said to this house the other day that it is not so much the tariff rates that stop productivity and curb employment as changes in and tinkering with the tariff.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I was asking whether the change of 1931 was the first tinkering about which the hon. member complains.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: No; that change was made to stop the dumping of pianos and organs that was ruining our industry. In 1935, there was a change in that tariff by which an appraisal value was fixed on pianos, new or used, of $75 as a specific minimum. The excise tax remained; the duty was still 30 per cent. But in 1936 the most favoured nation provision of the trade agreement brought the duty down from 30 per cent to 24¾ per cent, the duty being bound not to be increased over 25 per cent. Under this latest agreement we still have the 24¾ per cent duty; but the excise tax is gone, the specific minimum valuation is gone, and I am informed by leading piano and organ manufacturers of this country that this industry is gone. It may be a comparatively small industry; but if the importance of a large river depends upon the small streams that flow into it, and if a chain is as strong as its weakest link, the industrial fabric in Canada to-day depends upon the prosperity of each and every one of the small industries.

Mr. DUPUIS: Where is that industry situated?

Mr. WERMENLINGER: The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) said, bearing out the statement in the Purvis commission report, that to curb unemployment the government expects cooperation from private industry. This is an opportunity to implement that. I am speaking of the piano industry not because I am interested in it, for I am not; I am not a manufacturer or a dealer—

Mr. DUPUIS: I asked the hon. member where that small industry is situated.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: In Ste. Therese and St. Hyacinthe, Quebec, in Clinton, Ontario, and the Heintzman company in Toronto; we have plenty of them. I may tell the hon. member that in the late 1920s we had a certain number of piano manufacturers, and to-day only twenty per cent of that number remain in business. Are we going to destroy them one by one?

[Mr. McLean (Melfort).]

Mr. DUPUIS: Will the hon. member allow me to remind him that the decrease in the piano industry is principally on account of the radio and the gramophone.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: I admit the advent of radio and the introduction of other household necessities, but the decrease is to a greater extent a result of changes in living conditions.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): And to Liberal party politics.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: At the low year of the depression there were manufactured in this country 400 pianos. Last year, on account of the initiative of the piano manufacturers, 4,000 were manufactured, giving a weekly payroll of $25,000 to workers in piano plants and supply houses. Last year men working in such plants had forty weeks employment out of fifty-two, and manufacturers expected that this year for the first time since the depression they would have been able to give employment for fifty-two weeks had it not been for the change in this item as a result of the concession we have made to the United States.

I have a circular issued by a house in New York, addressed to dealers and pedlars of pianos in Canada. This circular was sent out at the time this treaty was just about concluded, when our manufacturers and wholesalers and dealers in Canada were not aware of the details of this treaty. This circular reads:

Under the new trade agreement the duty on pianos is reduced to such an extent—

"To such an extent."

—as to make it highly profitable to import pianos from the United States, particularly when they can be bought at a fraction of their true worth. With such values to offer we hasten to communicate the details in order that you may lose no time in availing yourselves of the possible profits. For instance we can furnish twenty-one pianos, harnessed to the car, at $500 or $600 for the entire lot. In both cases the pianos will be unrepaired uprights.

As I said a few moments ago, Mr. Chairman, as a result of new designs and the initiative of our piano manufacturers, new interest in this instrument was developed. Within the last few years the piano has come to be recognized as something more than a piece of furniture in a home, rather, as an instrument carrying with it a certain mark of refinement and possessing great educational value. The duty against Canadian pianos entering the United States is forty per cent. There was a time when our pianos and organs were welcome in the markets of the world; but now the high tariffs of other countries are interfering with the export of Canadian made pianos, which are recognized to be of sound, good quality. Under this treaty not only is the tariff against Canadian pianos entering the United States placed at forty per cent as against our tariff of 24¾ per cent; not only have we the elimination of our specific minimum valuation of $75 and the removal of the three per cent excise tax; to add insult to injury the parts required to manufacture pianos in Canada, parts coming from the United States, including ebony, ivory, sounding boards, music wire, glues of all kinds and veneers of woods that do not grow in Canada, all come in under the same tariff rates that applied previously. Therefore, the effective duty against pianos coming from the United States under this item represents a protection to Canadian manufacturers of not 24¾ per cent but fifteen per cent.

Mr. POTTIER: Could the hon. gentleman say when the $75 minimum duty was imposed?

Mr. WERMENLINGER: In 1935.

Mr. DUNNING: No, 1931.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: In 1931, if I am not mistaken, there was an advance of seventy-five per cent in the invoice value of pianos entering Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: No; the minimum duty of $75 was imposed in 1931.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: Then, when was the seventy-five per cent advance made in the invoice prices of these pianos?

Mr. DUNNING: About the same time, but it was discontinued later by the same government that had imposed it.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: From the information I have, it appears that the seventy-five per cent advance took place in 1931, after we had experienced so much dumping, and the $75 minimum duty was applied in 1935. I may be wrong, but the fact remains that at the end of 1938 there was a treaty negotiated under which the minimum valuation of $75 was eliminated. That is the crux of the situation.

Mr. DUNNING: No; the minimum duty, not the minimum valuation.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: Well, call it the minimum duty; but now, under this item, pianos entering Canada from the United States will come in at their invoice value.

Mr. DUNNING: Not those second hand pianos.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: Certainly; second-hand or new.

Mr. DUNNING: No; the Canadian customs law will apply to those.

Mr. WERMENLINGER: Then, why should that circular be issued from New York to all dealers in Canada? At any rate there is an extremely limited market in Canada, and I admit at once, before I am told, that this is not a very, very important industry. There is such a limited market for pianos in Canada that to share this market with foreign competition simply means that our Canadian manufacturers will have to put up with an increased cost per unit in overhead.

Mr. POTTIER: May I ask what effect the increase in duty brought about by the Bennett government had on the industry?

Mr. WERMENLINGER: As I mentioned before, it stopped the dumping. Eighty per cent of the pianos sold in the last two or three years have been of the new design, the boudoir size, and so on. Naturally, in order to sell those pianos, trade-ins had to be accepted. Therefore dealers and wholesalers in Canada are already glutted with old stuff; yet here we are making it possible for second-hand pianos to be brought in from the United States. I fail to see that this is any concession to them, because there are so many dealers, jobbers, wholesalers and manufacturers in the United States that I do not see how they can make any profit out of the small market that is available in Canada. The only result will be that our few remaining plants will close, and, as I said before, we have only about twenty per cent of the plants that were in existence prior to 1929.

There is another side to this story and it is this, that the mechanics engaged in the production of these pianos are experts who have acquired their knowledge through experience and study. If, within the next ten or twenty years, the population of this dominion should become double what it is to-day, where shall we find our experts to work in these plants? Surely my good friends from the west will not say that by purchasing second-hand pianos coming from the Ghetto, the Bronx or the Bowery, of New York, they will bring down the cost of production of wheat. I cite that only because I hear so much about it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me conclude with these words. It will be remembered that until about two years ago Japan exported to the United States pianos that could be sold at retail for less than the wholesale price of pianos made in the United States. What happened? The United States authorities did not hesitate; they notified their customs officials to advance the invoice prices of these pianos.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Can my hon. friend tell us the difference in price between pianos in the United States and in Canada?

Mr. WERMENLINGER: I am not sure about the price, but I could tell the hon. gentleman something about the difference in quality. In any event, Japan lost its market for pianos in the United States. Therefore, without doing any harm to the wheat industry or to the cattle industry of the United States, the United States government protected its piano industry.

Then, is it not true that the Australian government has a customs law by which all pianos entering Australia from foreign countries are invoiced at no less than £25? While we realize that some concessions must be made to negotiate a trade treaty, and while we realize the importance of the treaty, yet we say that if a move is made by which men are thrown out of work and factories are closed, no matter whether they are small or large businesses, it is a move in the wrong direction and is a pity.

I refer again to the statement of the Minister of Labour who, when speaking on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, said he was expecting cooperation from private industry. I say, in view of the fact that the piano and organ industry has done its best to combat conditions and to survive, it would be a pity if, after all these long years, and after all these changes in domestic living conditions, it were threatened by the treaty.

Mr. MacNICOL: How is the department going to take care of a situation that might arise from the information contained in the letter which was read by the hon. member, and which I also read earlier in the debate?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not the bulletin before me which was sent to collectors instructing them how to deal with dumped second-hand pianos. However, to the best of my recollection, the matter has been dealt with in a just but effective manner. The officials of the Department of National Revenue are not here, and I cannot tell the hon. member just what action was taken, but I think there was consideration of some proportion of the value new, or some value which had reasonable relation to the value new, which was fixed as being the minimum value for second-hand pianos.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would it be possible to import a piano at less than $75?

Mr. WERMENLINGER: Certainly.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would all depend upon the value of the piano. I cannot speak definitely but I think some new pianos were quoted at under $100 some years ago. As the item stood, the duty was $75 on those new pianos, plus twenty-five per cent, which was unreasonable.

Mr. DUNNING: As to the effect on the industry may I point out that I have before me figures showing the production of pianos in Canada in 1934 under the rates which my hon. friend described as being suitable and satisfactory. In that year a total of 542 pianos were produced in Canada. In 1936, the first year of the first treaty with the United States, the total production of pianos in Canada, under the reduction which applied until January of this year, was 1,652. That is, the production of pianos actually tripled from 1934 to 1936.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Mr. Chairman, as a result of the use of victrolas and the invention of radio, the piano industry in Canada has declined for many years. But more recently there has been an upward trend in that industry. It has almost become an infant industry in respect to the production of commercial pianos. One can see that the present rate of duty of twenty-five per cent is quite effective on a piano which sells for $300 or $500, or possibly up to $1,000. In those instances there would not be much necessity of the specific duty of $75 per piano which had previously prevailed. But, as I understand the situation, the new commercial type of piano may be valued anywhere from $75 to $100. Consequently, the amount of duty at a twenty-five per cent rate on that commercial piano is not very great.

Considering all the industries related in connection with the supplying of parts and materials, I believe some consideration should be given to the various costs which go into the piano. For instance, in the city of Guelph large quantities of piano plates or castings are manufactured. The coal used in the smelting of the iron costs at shipping points located near where United States pianos are made only about $1.50 a ton. But to bring that coal to Guelph the cost for freight is something like $4.35 a ton, and there is the duty of 81·7 cents a ton. So that a company which manufactures piano plates carries a heavy additional cost of duty and freight on raw materials which does not have to be borne by the plate manufacturers located near United States plants producing these commercial pianos.

I believe the Minister of National Revenue has acted wisely in fixing a valuation on second-hand pianos—

Mr. MacNICOL: But he has not done that.

Mr. GLADSTONE: —and I think it would be well for him to keep a watchful eye on the value of the cheaper pianos which are likely to come into this country. I refer to pianos such as would be sold to the large departmental stores in New York and Chicago.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—597a. Musical instruments of all kinds, n.o.p.; phonographs, graphophones, gramophones and finished parts thereof, including cylinders and records therefor; and mechanical piano and organ players: 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 597a. Cylinders or records specially made for use in the study of languages, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the minister: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 598a. Brass band instruments, of a class or kind not made in Canada: 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—599. Hides and skins, raw, whether dry, salted or pickled; and raw pelts: free.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is there any duty on hides going into the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: On bovine hides the rate is ten per cent, and on others it is free, going into the United States.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—601. Fur skins of all kinds, not dressed in any manner: free.

Mr. BROOKS: I notice this item is marked "free," and I believe it has been free for some time. I do not know that in the past the fox industry in the United States has particularly affected the fur industry in Canada. I understand, however, that the ranches in the United States are increasing rapidly. I have been informed that a few years ago fox raisers in eastern Canada exported large numbers of live animals to the western United States. As soon as the United States had a sufficient number of these animals to stock their own ranches, they placed a heavy duty against the importation of live animals. To-day the fox farming industry is flourishing in many of the western states. There has been possibly no reason for placing a duty against fox furs coming into Canada from the United States up to the present time, but with the increase in fur ranching in the western United States there is a greater need for protection than there has been in the past. What were the importations of fox furs from the United States during the last three years.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall give the figures for all furs under this item, that is fur skins undressed. Imports of all varieties of fur skins from the United States last year were valued at $2,639,000. Our exports to the United States, which enter that country free, were valued at $4,420,000.

Mr. BROOKS: Is the minister correct in saying that foxes enter the United States free?

Mr. DUNNING: Not foxes, but the others do.

Mr. BROOKS: The duty on fox skins is 37½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Everything except black and silver foxes goes in free. They have a duty on fox skins, but that has been reduced under this treaty. My hon. friend wanted the importations of fox skins as distinct from the others?

Mr. BROOKS: For the past three years.

Mr. DUNNING: I have only the figures for two years. In 1937, imports of fox skins from the United States were $276,000, and in 1938, $172,000.

Mr. BROOKS: I think they were about half a million dollars in 1936.

Mr. DUNNING: It varies with the years. Our exports of black and silver foxes last year to the United States were $177,000, and our exports of other fox skins were $570,000.

Mr. BROOKS: Under this treaty the Scandinavian countries will have the same privilege of exporting to the United States market as Canada, under the favoured nation clause?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: What other countries besides the Scandinavian countries will have that privilege?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not in mind a list of all the countries with which the United States has most favoured nation treaties, but I think it is all but Germany.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—604.
(i) Belting leather in butts or bends; and all leather further finished than tanned, n.o.p.: 20 per cent.
(ii) Sheepskin or lambskin leather, further finished than tanned, n.o.p.: 25 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the committee is entitled to some explanation of those two items. The present item in the tariff reads:

Belting leather in butts or bends; sole leather; and all leather further finished than tanned, n.o.p.

Under the treaty that item has been divided, and belting leather, which has been separated from the main item, is to be admitted on a twenty per cent basis, while the duty on sole leather is fixed at twenty-five per cent. It is extremely difficult to understand why there is this difference in these two items, unless it was thought desirable to give some special consideration to manufacturers of sole leather. I do not know whether the minister is in a position to explain why this division was made, but I think the committee is entitled to a complete explanation. As a matter of fact, the result is grossly unfair to the industry because it gives virtually the same protection to sole leather, whereas in connection with belting leather there is a reduction of 7½ per cent. I should like to ask the minister or his colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), for an explanation of the division of this item.

Mr. DUNNING: We simply considered the relative importance of the different branches of the leather industry. For instance, last year the production of sole leather in Canada was over $6,000,000, whereas the production of belting leather was just $200,000. The production of sole leather is an important branch of the leather industry. I do not think it is fair to charge discrimination in the treatment given to different types of leather. It must be remembered that the people who manufacture sole leather do not manufacture patent leather; these are separate and distinct industries.

Mr. STEVENS: Where is the sole leather industry located?

Mr. DUNNING: At a number of points in Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. McNEVIN: At Omemee and Barrie.

[Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. DUNNING: The Minister of Trade and Commerce volunteers the information that there is an industry in Kitchener.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—604b. Sole leather: 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—605a. Genuine pig leathers and genuine morocco leathers; so-called roller leathers: 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—607. Leather, when imported by manufacturers of gloves or leather clothing, for use exclusively in manufacturing gloves or leather clothing, in their own factories: 7½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—609. Belting, of leather: 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 611a. Boots, shoes, slippers and insoles of any material, n.o.p., not including canvas shoes with rubber soles: 30 per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: What amount of shoes were brought in free in 1938 under the $100 exemption?

Mr. DUNNING: If you allow for the twelve months, it would be about $1,000,000.

Mr. HOMUTH: Has the minister comparative figures of the importations in January and February of this year and January and February of last year?

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry I have not.

Mr. HOMUTH: I realize the futility of protesting against this item which deals with boots and shoes. This treaty is going to be passed and anything we may say will not change the situation. In spite of what the Minister of Trade and Commerce and other ministers have said with regard to importations of shoes into this country, a great many more shoes are coming into Canada as a result of the changes in this tariff, and a great many shoes are ordered for spring delivery, with the result that our shoe industry is suffering to-day.

Furthermore, wages have had to be cut in the shoe industry, even in those industries where the highest wages were paid of all the shoe industries in Canada, in order to compete with the low-grade shoes coming in from the United States. I can understand to some extent why the government takes the attitude that a few hundred thousand pairs of shoes coming into Canada last year had no serious effect on the industry in this country, because one has only to read the speech delivered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the Waterloo South by-election to appreciate that in his view the trouble with the shoe industry in Canada, so the minister said, was that we had too many shoe factories, and he also said that the same thing applied to the furniture industry. If that is the attitude of members of the cabinet who negotiate trade agreements, I can readily understand that industry in this country cannot expect any consideration whatever from this government. The government might just as well say we have too many wheat farmers, too many butter producers, and if that is their attitude we might just as well get out of the country and give it back to the Indians.

The fact of the matter is that the shoe industry is one that means a great deal to other industries in this dominion. It is important to the tanneries, for instance, and let us consider for a moment some of the other industries that are affected when we import large quantities of shoes. The upper leather for the shoes comes from Oshawa or Kingston, the black or brown leather from Newmarket or London. Then there is Clark's of Toronto; another firm at Omemee and one at Barrie; also two large industries in the city of Kitchener. All these industries are going to be affected by the greater importation of shoes. Then we have the industries supplying the thread, the wooden heels, the eyelets, the packing cases and various other necessary items in the manufacture of shoes. While I realize the futility of protesting against this reduction in the tariff, which with the removal of the excise duty will represent a reduction of some eight or nine per cent, I do say that to-day the shoe industry in Canada is feeling the very serious effects of the greater importations.

Mr. HANSON: An industry that cannot live with thirty per cent protection has no right to live in this country.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I agree with the hon. member for Skeena. Under the high tariff policy of the Conservative government I could have purchased hides in western Canada for fourteen or fifteen cents. The price is substantially higher now than it was when the Conservative tariff went into operation. I think a thirty per cent protection for the shoe industry is sufficient, particularly in view of the fact that hides and other leathers come in free, and we have now this situation, that because of the high freight rates hides are coming in from the United States instead of being purchased in western Canada. So I agree with the reduction that is made here.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) has made some reference to something I said in the Waterloo South by-election of more or less unhappy memory.

Mr. MANION: Not for us.

Mr. EULER: No, but I am really rising in my place, not on account of what my hon. friend from Waterloo South said, but rather to ascertain the attitude of my hon. friends opposite with regard to tariffs. I do not think anyone in this house who has known me as a member for a good many years will say that I have at any time been in favour of such a reduction in tariffs as will ruin any Canadian industry. I believe my record will prove that. At the same time I have always contended, and I mentioned in the debate on the address that the former leader of the Conservative party, Mr. Bennett, laid this down as a principle, that the Canadian producer or manufacturer should have sufficient tariff protection to give him a chance of fair competition in his own market. I have said that I have no fault to find with that. I believe that Canadian industry ought to have a fair chance in its own market; but if it ought to have a fair chance for competition, surely that means that there should be some competition.

I mentioned the shoe industry in the Waterloo South by-election, where my hon. friend was a candidate at that time, because he had said that the shoe industry was being seriously injured by imports from the United States, and I quoted figures from my own department, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, showing that our importations of shoes from the United States amounted to less than two per cent of the consumption in Canada. I was not referring to what came in under the $100 exemption. I contended that that was not a large enough import to injure the Canadian manufacturer seriously. If it is, then the only possible remedy is to put on a prohibitive tariff. I do not think that can be denied.

I was surprised yesterday or the day before, in the debate on textiles, when my hon. friend, I think from Waterloo South, protested against the injury being done to certain textile industries in this country. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) showed that less than one per cent of the consumption in Canada was imported. If there is going to be the protest made that Canadian industry is going to be ruined because of importations amounting, in some instances, to less than one per cent and, in others, to less than two per cent of the consumption in Canada, then I say the only policy our hon. friends opposite can adopt is one of complete exclusion. I asked my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, when I spoke in the debate on the address, whether he was in favour of a prohibitive tariff, and he said he was not.

Mr. MANION: I am not.

Mr. EULER: I do not think he is. I leave it to the common sense judgment of the house, when objection is made to imports of less than one or two per cent of consumption, whether you can do anything to shut out that small percentage except by putting on an absolutely prohibitive tariff. I have always been in favour of a reasonable tariff so that our own industries could exist. I have never been in favour of an absolutely prohibitive tariff, and I have no objection whatever to saying that here to-night.

The hon. member also spoke of industries in my own city of Kitchener, and in reply to him I repeat that I have had no complaint with regard to the small reduction that is being made in the tariff on shoes. There is still a tariff of thirty per cent, which I think, ordinarily speaking, ought in almost all lines to be a sufficient protection in Canada. I was speaking to one shoe manufacturer, not a supporter of the party on this side of the house, and he said that he had no complaint to make with regard to the reduction.

I would further point out that the shoe manufacturers are getting some benefit by way of certain reductions which are being made under this trade agreement. Take, for instance, kid leather. We have reduced the tariff from 27½ per cent to twenty per cent. I think that is a step in the right direction, one that is going to help the shoe industry. There are two small tanneries manufacturing kid leather in Canada. They have not been able to supply the Canadian market. The only result has been that the Canadian shoe manufacturer has paid more for his kid leather coming in from the United States than he should have paid, and it has made the price of the shoes higher to the Canadian consumer, without benefit to the manufacturer of shoes. Now we have made some reduction there. Further than that, some of the component parts of the shoe, such as thread, will also get the benefit of the reduction and the removal of the excise tax.

But the point I make is this. If it is contended by our hon. friends opposite that the small importation amounting, in some instances, to less than two per cent, less than one per cent, is objectionable, then their own policy can only be, and I think they should say so, one of complete exclusion. Although I am a supporter of a policy of reasonable protection, I say that I am entirely in disagreement with a policy of complete exclusion.

Mr. MacNICOL: With regard to the minister's remarks about two per cent, what I want him to answer me if he can is this: What per cent of fine shoes of Canadian production is the million dollars' worth that came in under the $100 exemption?

Mr. DUNNING: Nobody can answer that.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Minister of Finance referred a few moments ago to the $100 exemption under which fine shoes, or any kind of shoes, but particularly fine shoes, came in. What percentage of Canadian production does that million dollars' worth represent? It is fine shoes that are coming in under the $100 exemption.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend would no doubt describe as "fine" shoes, women's leather boots, shoes and slippers, sizes 2½ and up. That is about the sort of thing he has in mind. I am looking at my own information which I have here in order to try to answer the hon. gentleman's question. There is no classification of what may be described as fine shoes. There are men's leather boots, shoes, and slippers, sizes 5½ and up; women's leather boots, shoes and slippers, sizes 2½ and up; and children's leather boots, shoes and slippers, all other sizes. Women's shoes would more closely approximate what my hon. friend has in mind. Total importations from the United States of that classification of women's leather boots and shoes were $399,000 last year, which of course would be considerably less than one per cent of the total Canadian production. I have also that classification in the production figures. There is nearly $16,000,000 production of that class in Canada. If all of the million dollars to which my hon. friend refers, which came in free of duty under the $100 exemption, fell into that class, it would still be, as nearly as I can figure mentally, about eight per cent of the production of that particular class. It must be remembered that our total production of boots and shoes was $35,500,000 last year, and total imports from the United States were $583,000. Add your million to the $583,000, and then you get some idea of the size of imports in relation to production.

Mr. EULER: There is one point that must be remembered there. While possibly boots and shoes lend themselves a little more readily to importation under the $100 exemption than some other commodities, it must be borne in mind that there is no legislation which provides merely for the importation of boots and shoes in that way under the $100 exemption. It runs all along the line and applies as well to many other commodities. And the same condition exists in the United States. When United States tourists come to Canada, they take back goods to the United States, and therefore it is not fair to apply the principle only to boots and shoes. It applies to radios and to a good many other articles as well.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do I understand the minister to say that the percentage of ladies' shoes imported under the $100 exemption was eight per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: What did the minister say?

Mr. DUNNING: I was trying to calculate mentally the percentage of the figures I gave. I am of the opinion that the $100 exemption both ways is of distinct advantage to Canada on balance. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. MacNICOL: By which the minister means that United States ladies take back Canadian shoes.

Mr. DUNNING: I am talking about the whole exemption, not boots and shoes alone. Americans take back more goods to the United States than Canadians bring back.

Mr. MacNICOL: We have not yet seen any of their statements indicating how much was taken back. In any event, I suppose they would take back more on account of their population. But comparing their population and their production with ours, I am inclined to think we get the wrong end of the stick so far as providing employment for our people is concerned.

Mr. EULER: Even if the reduction of five per cent in the tariff had not been made, there would still be imported as many under the $100 exemption as before, so that it should not enter into the calculations from the point of view of the reduction made.

Mr. MANION: The minister of Trade and Commerce rather threw a challenge at me in regard to the question of tariffs.

Mr. DUNNING: Not a challenge.

Mr. MANION: In a sense it was a challenge, although I did not take it in any offensive spirit. It was a challenge in regard to our attitude towards tariffs. Let me say frankly that I am not a high tariff man, in the sense that I do not favour prohibitive tariffs. I am exactly the same sort of tariff man as the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He is one of the best protectionists in the house and—I say this without intending to be unfair to him—he has never failed to protect the interests and the industries in his own riding. He has watched them carefully. I do not say that offensively, and indeed I do not find anything wrong with it. But take furniture, for example. In this present treaty it is cut down about one-half of one per cent on a thirty-three per cent tariff. My figures are not exact, but I do not think I am far wrong. However, I do not want to argue any questions of detail. Let me say that I believe in a moderate, not a prohibitive tariff; and that is the attitude of the Conservative party generally. I do not agree with my friends from the west, who seem to have the idea that if you put on a thirty per cent tariff the price goes up thirty per cent. In many instances nothing of the sort occurs. The purpose of a tariff is not to raise prices at all; it is simply to hold the market for the people of the country concerned. That is the real purpose of the tariff.

Mr. MacNICOL: And to give employment.

Mr. MANION: Yes. It not only protects the market, it not only protects the industry affected, but also protects the workingmen in the industry; it protects agriculture in many instances.

Mr. DEACHMAN: What about the consumer?

Mr. MANION: I will answer that question in a moment. My hon. friend is a free trader so long as he is not voting, but the minute he votes he is the best Grit in the house. I used to meet him in the street and discuss various questions with him. I used to think he was one of those chaps who always was fighting for principle, but I found when I got here that no one votes more regularly with his party—

Mr. DEACHMAN: I could not vote for yours.

Mr. MANION: You could vote for ours just as well as for yours on protection, generally speaking. As far as the consumer is concerned, I have said many times on the public platform, and I think it is the belief of every hon. member on this side, that no manufacturer or producer has a right to exploit the people behind tariff walls. If a manufacturer, or any producer, is taking unfair advantage of a tariff, he should lose his protection. When the Bennett government in 1930 to 1935 increased the tariff, we took back from the producers and manufacturers a promise that they would not raise prices; and so far as I know, with the exception of one industry, they lived up to their agreement.

Mr. DEACHMAN: That was on April Fool's day.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps my hon. friend knows more about April Fool's day than most people, but that was the agreement and it was carried out.

One point brought out by the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) seems to me utterly foolish. He and some few others talk free trade, but there are only a few supporters of free trade left in the world; they are a sort of extinct species. No country in the world has free trade; the only country that approached it was Great Britain which had free imports, but not free trade, because there was no nation with which they could trade freely. However, from the early part of the last century up to the war Great Britain had free imports, but we all know that now Great Britain has become one of the most highly protected countries in the world. I am sorry to take up time, but I have not taken much time on this agreement except on the original discussion. I put some figures on Hansard in my remarks on the address in reply to the speech from the throne showing that Great Britain is at the present time collecting by means of protective duties three times as much per head of the population as we are. If I remember the figures correctly, Great Britain is collecting about $25 per head and we are collecting $8.50. That is the country which was once free trade. And now the hon. member for Huron North comes out with this antiquated obsolete argument that everyone but himself and a few others threw aside long ago, and attacks his own government with it. The hon. member is about the most antiquated gentleman in this house; he should get up to date.

Mr. DUNNING: Before this Donnybrook goes any further, I did not raise a point of order while the leader of the opposition was speaking—

Mr. MANION: Or the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler).

Mr. DUNNING: As my hon. friend said, he did not take up much time himself on the treaty. But I suggest, as a matter of good sportsmanship that you, Mr. Chairman, might allow the hon. member for Huron North five minutes to reply, which is about the time the leader of the opposition took on the general question of free trade.

Mr. MANION: I am only giving him back a little of his own. He has been abusing me ever since the house met.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member when he "abused" the leader of the opposition was in order so far as the item was concerned. The hon. member for Huron North complained of my appealing on a point of order the other day, so I am trying to put myself right with him now by pleading that he be allowed to be out of order for not more than five minutes.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I shall not need that amount of time. All the arguments which I have heard from my hon. friend the leader of the opposition were old when Adam quarreled with the food controller; there is no need to discuss them. I rise merely to ask the Minister of Finance a simple question: Will he be good enough to let the committee know the percentage that wages bear to the total costs of production in the shoe industry in Canada, and also the percentage of material cost?

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry I have not that information here, but I can get it at a later stage.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I take it as a fairly accurate guess that wages amount to roughly thirty per cent. The tariff rate we now have is thirty per cent, and in addition there is a certain protective element in the sales tax of eight per cent which is levied not only on the value of the goods but on the duty. Last year, or before this change was made, the tariff on shoes was thirty-five per cent plus three per cent on the duty paid value, bringing it up to about thirty-nine per cent, plus the sales tax of eight per cent levied on that value, which would mean approximately an additional three or four per cent levied by the sales tax, bringing the duty altogether pretty close to fifty per cent. Is it enough? It is 100 per cent on the wage cost, at least. Surely even the most embittered protectionist who ever fought the battle for protection must say that a tariff which represents 100 per cent of the wage cost is enough. Surely it is enough.

Mr. HEAPS: One or two statements have been made in connection with which I should like to say a word. In the first place a thirty per cent duty on boots and shoes is fairly high protection. I do not think the shoe industry has much to complain about in that respect. It has been shown by the Minister of Finance that comparatively few shoes are imported. Even if the tariff were doubled or tripled, there would still be some amount of boots and shoes of specialized kinds imported, which certain people demand.

The leader of the opposition made the general statement that tariffs do not raise prices—

Mr. MANION: I said they are not for the purpose of raising prices.

Mr. HEAPS: Well, a statement of that kind is too general. So far as the boot and shoe industry is concerned, I believe the tariff has not had the effect of raising prices in Canada to any appreciable extent. However, I remember very well sitting on the price spreads committee when it went carefully into the boot and shoe industry and discovered a sad state of affairs. Wages in the industry were extremely low; men and women employed in it were very much underpaid, and furthermore many of the concerns in the industry were in a bad financial condition. So apparently the tariff had not the effect of increasing prices; there was so much internal competition that prices were kept fairly low. But, I may mention in passing, there are industries that take full advantage of every bit of tariff protection. I do not want to go into that aspect now. As regards the boot and shoe industry, however, I point out that in spite of the thirty per cent protection granted by this government, and the still higher protection formerly granted, the men and women employed in that industry receive no advantage whatever from the protection given to the industry. It came out in the price spreads investigation that they are among the lowest paid workers in Canada.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—619. Rubber or gutta percha hose, and cotton hose lined with rubber; rubber mats or matting and rubber packing: 22½ per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: What are the imports of rubber hose?

Mr. DUNNING: Of rubber hose, mats and packing, imports from the United States last year amounted to $216,000. Our exports to all countries totaled $224,000, to the United States, $7,900; and our Canadian production, adding all items together, was $2,400,000.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What are our importations of crude rubber from the United States for the last ten years, since the imposition of the excise tax?

Mr. DUNNING: Crude rubber not being in the agreement, I have not the details before me with respect to the imports. If my hon. friend will communicate with me, I shall gladly give him the information as a matter of general interest.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Then, may I ask if it is intended to remove the excise tax from crude rubber?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend will realize immediately that this question does not arise under this agreement. Under the agreement the Canadian government agrees with the United States government that it will ask this parliament to remove the excise on those items named in the schedule. Any decision with respect to items not named in the schedule is a matter of domestic policy for Canada, which will be revealed by the government in due course.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There are many articles that enter into the manufacture of rubber tires and rubber goods, and a great many of those articles are not mentioned in the agreement. Others are included in the agreement, and it is proposed to remove the excise tax from them. In addition, the duty has been reduced on many lines of rubber goods coming into Canada, and it seems to me that before we can intelligently discuss these items concerning rubber goods, we should know what articles will have the excise tax removed, and on what articles it will remain.

Mr. DUNNING: May I tell my hon. friend why that information is not necessary to him. It is not necessary because he gets all his crude rubber free, now, under the British preference, and at present under the British preference there is no three per cent special excise. So my hon. friend can possess his soul in patience in that regard, and be sure that everything is going well.

Customs tariff—651. Buttons of all kinds, covered or not, and button blanks other than in the rough, n.o.p.; recognition buttons and cuff or collar buttons: 30 per cent; and, per gross, 5 cents.

Mr. HOMUTH: What is the importation of buttons from the United States? I should like those figures for this and the next item; I do not know whether or not they are separate.

Mr. DUNNING: I have them separately. Under this item we imported $155,000 worth from the United States and exported $37,000 worth to all countries, the exports to the United States being very small.

Mr. HOMUTH: Were our exports chiefly to Australia and New Zealand?

Mr. DUNNING: Our exports were chiefly to the United Kingdom, British South Africa and Trinidad.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Ross (St. Paul's).]

Customs tariff—651a. Buttons, and button blanks other than in the rough, of vegetable ivory: 30 per cent, and, per gross, 10 cents.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend wants the same information on this item. Our imports from the United States amounted to $54. Exports were included in the previous item, and our Canadian production was $205,000.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—654. Bristles, broom corn, and hair brush pads: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 655a. Crayons of chalk: 20 per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask the reason for cutting this tariff by approximately forty-two per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: I receive a great deal of correspondence about many of these items. I cannot remember one about which there were more requests for a reduction in duty in the last couple of years than I received from schools and places of that kind in connection with the duty on chalk. On looking into the matter it seemed to me that we could do that which is here done.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do we export any crayons ourselves?

Mr. DUNNING: Exports are not separately recorded. If any, they go in with a basket item of exports.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is there any considerable industry in the making of such crayons?

Mr. DUNNING: Our production of chalk and wax crayons amounted to $112,000 in the last recorded year.

Mr. COLDWELL: And our imports?

Mr. DUNNING: Our total imports were $90,000, of which $61,000 came from the United States and most of the balance from Great Britain.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—657a. Cinematograph or moving picture films, positives, one and one-eighth of an inch in width and over, n.o.p.: 2½ cents per linear foot.

Mr. ESLING: May I ask the minister if this is a new item?

Mr. DUNNING: No; this is the same item, with a reduction in the tariff rate.

Mr. ESLING: Then, how does it differ from the ordinary film?

Mr. DUNNING: It is the only item covering cinematograph films, and therefore includes everything one and an eighth inch and over in width. I should make the qualification that these are positives.

Mr. ESLING: These are not returned?

Mr. DUNNING: No; these pay the duty.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—657b; ex 532; ex 711. Parts, unfinished, when imported by manufacturers of cameras, for use in the manufacture of cameras, in their own factories: 5 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—663. Fertilizers, compounded or manufactured, n.o.p.: 5 per cent.
Provided, that Canada reserves the right to withdraw this concession should any restriction be placed on the export of phosphate rock or superphosphate from the United States of America.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—663c; ex 711. Soya beans, soya bean oil cake and soya bean oil meal, when imported for use as animal or poultry feeds, or as fertilizer, or when imported for use in the manufacture of animal or poultry feeds or fertilizers: free.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is there any considerable production of soya beans in Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: The value of the production of soya beans is not separately recorded, but there is very little production of the bean. There is a certain amount of production for fodder purposes, but the trade journal, the Linseed-Soya Bean Oil Industry, reports that soya bean products, which include soya bean oil, soya bean meal and soya bean flour, had a production to a value of $51,000 in Canada in 1936 and $110,000 in 1937; a small production for a variety of purposes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Might I point out to the minister the danger in having soya bean oil cake and other products of the soya bean on the free list. These products are rapidly replacing ordinary farm products of Ontario used for feed, greatly to the detriment of the farmers of this province. I believe soya beans formed the fourth largest field crop of the United States last year, and in view of that fact our farmers are bound to have more and more competition from the soya bean. The production of this commodity is increasing rapidly, but now we find that these products are bound on the free list for three years.

Mr. DUNNING: The only change in this item is that previously manufacturers of products of soya beans obtained their soya beans free, but the man who desired to feed soya beans in order to produce live stock had to pay 22½ per cent. All the change involves is that it gives the man who feeds soya beans the same privilege the manufacturer has had all these years. There has been no production in Canada of any account. Nobody imagines for a moment that placing a tariff on soya beans would help the farmers to grow them in parts of Canada which are climatically unsuited for it. Even in Ontario, in that favoured part of Ontario in which experiments are being made, may I say that a year ago I had figures which showed how very, very small was the production of soya beans of commercial value. I am distinguishing between soya beans in the commercial sense and soya beans in the fodder sense.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I understand what the minister has said. There is in process I know a greater production of soya beans in Canada.

The other important matter is this: I am not objecting to this being placed on the free list, but I am objecting to having these products bound for three years. You cannot get away from it; they are replacing other farm products to a very large extent. Beans are being imported and processed here. More and more of them will be imported, and there are new industries in prospect at the present time. I say the item should not have been bound for three years, and that is my objection.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—670. Grinding wheels, stones or blocks, manufactured by the bonding together of either natural or artificial abrasives; manufactures of emery or of artificial abrasives, n.o.p.: 22½ per cent.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): How much of this product is manufactured in Canada and exported to the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: Total imports of grinding wheels, grinding stones and blocks, and manufactures of emery or abrasive articles from the United States were valued at $170,000, on the whole of the item. Our total exports were valued at $151,000. Our total production is valued at about $1,255,000.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): What is the rate into the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: The rate is ten per cent on emery wheels, files and manufactures of emery, corundum and artificial abrasives, and twenty per cent on wheels of corundum or silicon carbide.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—682a; ex 618. Net floats of aluminum, glass, canvas, cork or rubber, for use exclusively in commercial fishing: free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—688. Artificial teeth, not mounted: free.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is this the teeth in the legislation, Mr. Minister?

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—693. (iii) Antiquities (other than spirits or wines) produced more than 100 years prior to date of importation, under such regulations, including proof of antiquity, as may be prescribed by the minister: free.

Provided that, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in any law or regulation relating to customs, antiquities as described above shall be relieved from the requirements as to origin or content.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—711. All goods not enumerated in this schedule as subject to any other rate of duty, and not otherwise declared free of duty, and not being goods the importation whereof is by law prohibited: 20 per cent.

Provided that duty shall not be deemed to be provided for by this item upon dutiable goods mentioned as "n.o.p." in any preceding tariff item.

Provided further that when the component material of chief value in any non-enumerated article consists of dutiable material enumerated in this schedule as bearing a higher rate of duty than is specified in this tariff item, such non-enumerated article shall be subject to the highest duty which would be chargeable thereon if it were composed wholly of the component material thereof of chief value, such "component material of chief value" being that component material which shall exceed in value any other single component material in its condition as found in the article.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the minister explain the significance of this item?

Mr. DUNNING: This is a general, all-inclusive basket item for everything which has not otherwise been provided for in any part of the tariff schedule. Last year from the United States we imported under the item $6,000,000 worth of all sorts of odds and ends. The long list appears on two pages of the information before me.

Mr. HARRIS: What were the importations for the year before?

Mr. DUNNING: I believe there are sixty-two headings. In the year before, from the United States we imported goods under this item to the value of $5,300,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Could the information be placed on Hansard. I do not wish the minister to read it, but possibly it could be handed to Hansard.

Mr. DUNNING: I should be glad to do that. The table has three columns showing importations from the United Kingdom and the United States, and another column showing total importations. They are as follows:

Mr. HARRIS: This is a large item, and although I do not wish to hold up the minister—

Mr. DUNNING: Has the hon. member anything in mind, because if he has, I can answer specifically.

Mr. HARRIS: There are one or two observations I should like to make. In this day and generation when inventions are being made by leaps and bounds, and when each day there is something new, particularly great advances in science in the United States and in the larger countries, we find more and more items creeping into the basket item 711. Apart, from the fact that the loss in this item 711 in revenue from excise tax is $180,000 this year, during the lifetime of the agreement, unless those charged with the responsibility of saying that such and so shall be listed under item 711 perform their duty thoroughly, a very large number of new materials will find their way into the item. I do not refer to new inventions, particularly, but more to the derivatives from old, established products. I would have in mind coal-tar products, or something of that kind. I do not say, of course. that coal-tar is a specific item, but I just mention it so that hon. members will have some idea of the possibilities of commodities which are liable to find their way into the basket item 711 during the lifetime of this trade agreement.

I should not be at all surprised to see this figure of $6,000,000 imports for last year and $5,000,000 for the year before reach a sum three or four times as large before the expiry of the agreement. That will be so, unless the Minister of Finance and the department under him, and any others who may be charged with the administration of this agreement, are meticulous in exercising their discretion as to what will or will not be allowed to go into the item. I suggest that they should go so far as to make new items, as they go along, so that we in this country, who as a rule are a step behind scientific advance in the United States, will not find this basket item standing out as one of the main items under which tremendous volumes of importations may enter Canada to the detriment of similar Canadian products. Had I known we would reach this item I would have brought a sample of what I have in mind to the attention of the committee. Branch factories may be erected in Canada for purposes of distribution of certain products, but those products invariably have been made for several years in the United States and will find their way into Canada under this particular item.

Leaving all that aside for the moment, I would give warning to those who are charged with the administration of this agreement. Let me reiterate what I have said on previous occasions, that to my mind this is a case where the excise tax provision, which will form part and parcel of the trade agreement after the ratifying legislation is passed, will bring further loss to the treasury of Canada. I know the minister will reply immediately that rather than there being a loss to the treasury, there will be an advantage to the consumer. However, let us be sensible. This three per cent excise tax is not going to be given entirely to the consumer. For example, if three pairs of socks are being sold for $1 and the three per cent excise tax is taken off, they will still be sold for $1. The treasury of Canada will be bereft of $180,000 under this item and $12,000,000 under all the items, and we shall still be paying $1 for three pairs of socks.

Mr. DUNNING: That completes the schedule. If hon. members will turn to the articles in the agreement, we shall deal first with article I.

Mr. STIRLING: After having passed the articles, shall we then proceed to the memoranda and annexes at the end?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not know that the annexes at the end require to be adopted. They will not be in the bill at all, so we shall not require to deal with them. They are for the information of hon. members in considering the bearing of the various features in the treaty. The procedure will be as formerly. We shall go through the articles and then report the whole schedule, being the treaty, out of committee, after which I shall ask for leave to introduce a bill. The bill will go through the usual stages. It will not be read a second time immediately, but it will go through the normal stages of a bill except that when we come to committee of the whole house the chairman will call the schedule, which is the agreement itself, and this, having been carried previously in committee of ways and means, will not require to be gone through again in detail in the committee.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister mind turning to page 51 of the trade agreement and telling me under which particular article I could ask for information with regard to the last paragraph?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no article specifically covering that. That is an understanding between the two countries as to the working out of the treaty in the event of certain contingencies.

On article I:

1. Canada and the United States of America will grant each other unconditional and unrestricted most-favoured nation treatment in all matters concerning customs duties and subsidiary charges of every kind and in the method of levying duties, and, further, in all matters concerning the rules, formalities and charges imposed in connection with the clearing of goods through the customs, and with respect to all laws or regulations affecting the sale or use of imported goods within the country.

2. Accordingly, articles the growth, produce or manufacture of either country imported into the other shall in no case be subject, in regard to the matters referred to above, to any duties, taxes or charges other or higher, or to any rules or formalities other or more burdensome, than those to which the like articles the growth, produce or manufacture of any other foreign country are or may hereafter be subject.

3. Similarly, articles exported from the territory of Canada or the United States of America and consigned to the territory of the other country shall in no case be subject with respect to exportation and in regard to the above-mentioned matters, to any duties, taxes or charges other or higher, or to any rules or formalities other or more burdensome, than those to which the like articles when consigned to the territory of any other foreign country are or may hereafter be subject.

4. Any advantage, favour, privilege or immunity which has been or may hereafter be granted by Canada or the United States of America in regard to the above-mentioned matters, to any article originating in any other foreign country or consigned to the territory of any other foreign country shall be accorded immediately and without compensation to the like article originating in or consigned to the territory of the United States of America or Canada, respectively, and irrespective of the nationality of the carrier.

Article agreed to.

On article II:

1. No prohibition or restriction shall be imposed or maintained on the importation into either country of any article, from whatever place arriving, the growth, produce or manufacture of the other country, to which the importation of the like article the growth, produce or manufacture of any other foreign country is not similarly subject.

2. No prohibition or restriction shall be imposed or maintained on the exportation of any article from either country to the other to which the exportation of the like article to any other foreign country is not similarly subject.

Article agreed to.

On article III:

If imports of any article into either country should be regulated either as regards the total amount permitted to be imported or as regards the amount permitted to be imported at a specified rate of duty, and if shares are allocated to countries of export, the share allocated to the other country shall be based upon the proportion of the total imports of such article from all foreign countries supplied by that country in past years, account being taken in so far as practicable in appropriate cases of any special factors which may have affected or may be affecting the trade in that article. In those cases in which the other country is a relatively large supplier of any such article, the government of the country imposing the regulation shall, whenever practicable, consult with the government of the other country before the share to be allocated to that country is determined.

Article agreed to.

On article IV:

1. If either country establishes or maintains a monopoly for the importation, production or sale of a particular commodity or grants exclusive privileges, formally or in effect, to one or more agencies to import, produce or sell a particular commodity, the government of the country establishing or maintaining such monopoly, or granting such monopoly privileges, agrees that in respect of the foreign purchases of such monopoly or agency the commerce of the other country shall receive fair and equitable treatment. To this end it is agreed that in making its foreign purchases of any product such monopoly or agency will be influenced solely by those considerations, such as price, quality, marketability, and terms of sale, which would ordinarily be taken into account by a private commercial enterprise interested solely in purchasing such product on the most favourable terms.

2. In awarding contracts for public works and in purchasing supplies, neither government shall discriminate against articles the growth, produce or manufacture of the territories of the other country in favour of those of any other foreign country.

Article agreed to.

On article V:

Articles the growth, produce or manufacture of Canada or the United States of America shall, after importation into the other country, be exempt from all internal taxes, fees, charges or exactions, other or higher than those payable on like articles of national origin or any other origin, except as otherwise required by laws in force on the day of the signature of this agreement and subject to the limitations on the authority of either government.

Article agreed to.

On article VI:

1. Articles the growth, produce or manufacture of the United States of America, enumerated and described in schedule I annexed to this agreement shall, on their importation into Canada, be exempt from ordinary customs duties in excess of those set forth in the said schedule, subject to the conditions therein set out. The said articles shall also be exempt from all other duties, taxes, fees, charges, or exactions, imposed on or in connection with importation, in excess of those imposed on the day of the signature of this agreement or required to be imposed thereafter under laws of Canada in force on the day of the signature of this agreement.

2. Schedule I shall have full force and effect as an integral part of this agreement.

Article agreed to.

On article VII:

1. Articles the growth, produce or manufacture of Canada enumerated and described in schedule II annexed to this agreement shall, on their importation into the United States of America, be exempt from ordinary customs duties in excess of those set forth and provided for in the said schedule, subject to the conditions therein set out. The said articles shall also be exempt from all other duties, taxes, fees, charges, or exactions, imposed on or in connection with importation, in excess of those imposed on the day of the signature of this agreement or required to be imposed thereafter under laws of the United States of America in force on the day of the signature of this agreement.

2. Schedule II shall have full force and effect as an integral part of this agreement.

Article agreed to.

On article VIII:

1. The provisions of articles VI and VII of this agreement shall not prevent the government of either country from imposing at any time on the importation of any article a charge equivalent to an internal tax imposed in respect of a like domestic article or in respect of a commodity from which the imported article has been produced or manufactured in whole or in part.

2. Moreover, the provisions of articles VI and VII shall not be construed to embrace such reasonable fees, charges or exactions, imposed at any time by the government of either country in connection with the documentation of any shipment, as are commensurate with the cost of the services performed.

Article agreed to.

On article IX:

Sawed lumber and timbers, telephone, trolley, electric-light, and telegraph poles of wood, and bundles of shingles, the growth, produce or manufacture of Canada, imported into the United States of America, shall not be required to be marked to indicate their origin in any case where the imported article is of the same class or kind as articles which were imported into the United States of America in substantial quantities during the five-year period immediately preceding January 1, 1937, and were not required during such period to be marked to indicate their origin.

Mr. MacNICOL: Could the minister explain the significance of the five-year period in this article?

Mr. DUNNING: In order to determine what articles shall not be marked, reference is made to those which entered the United States from Canada in substantial quantities during the preceding five years without marking required.

Article agreed to.

On article X:

1. No prohibition, restriction or any form of quantitative regulation, whether or not operated in connection with an agency of centralized control, shall be imposed or maintained in Canada on the importation or sale of any article the growth, produce or manufacture of the United States of America enumerated and described in schedule I, or in the United States of America on the importation or sale of any article the growth, produce or manufacture of Canada enumerated and described in schedule II, except as otherwise expressly provided in the said schedules.

2. The foregoing provision shall not apply to quantitative regulations in whatever form which may hereafter be imposed by the government of either country on the importation or sale of any article the growth, produce or manufacture of the other, in conjunction with governmental measures or measures under governmental authority

[Mr. Dunning.]

(a) operating to regulate or control the production, market supply, quality or price of the like article of domestic growth, production or manufacture; or

(b) operating to increase the labour costs of production of the like article of domestic growth, production or manufacture;

Provided, however, that the government proposing to impose any such quantitative regulation shall have satisfied itself, in the case of measures described in subparagraph (a) of this paragraph, that such quantitative regulation is necessary to secure the effective operation of such measures, and, in the case of measures described in subparagraph (b), that such measures are causing the domestic production of the article concerned to be injuriously affected by imports which constitute an abnormal proportion of the total consumption of such article in relation to the proportion supplied in the past by foreign countries.

3. Whenever either government proposes to impose or to effect a substantial alteration in any quantitative regulation authorized by the preceding paragraph, that government shall give notice in writing to that effect to the other and shall, upon request, enter into consultation regarding the matter. If agreement is not reached within thirty days after the receipt of the notice the government giving it shall be free to impose or alter the regulation at any time, and the other government shall be free within fifteen days after such action is taken to terminate this agreement in its entirety on giving thirty days' notice in writing to that effect.

Article agreed to.

On article XI:

In respect of articles the growth, produce or manufacture of the United States of America enumerated and described in schedule I, imported into Canada, and of articles the growth, produce or manufacture of Canada enumerated and described in schedule II, imported into the United States of America, on which ad valorem rates of duty, or duties based upon or regulated in any manner by value, are or may be assessed, the general principles on which dutiable value is determined in each of the importing countries on the day of the signature of this agreement shall not be altered so as to impair the value of any of the concessions provided for in this agreement.

Article agreed to.

On article XII:

1. Nothing in this agreement shall be construed to prevent the enforcement of such measures as the government of either country may see fit to adopt

(a) relating to the importation or exportation of gold or silver;

(b) relating to the control of the import or export or sale for export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war, and in exceptional circumstances, all other military supplies;

(c) relating to neutrality or to public security; or

(d) should that country be engaged in hostilities or war.

2. Subject to the requirement that, under like circumstances and conditions, there shall be no arbitrary discrimination by either country against articles the growth, produce or manufacture of the other country in favour of the like articles the growth, produce or manufacture of any other foreign country, the provisions of this agreement shall not extend to prohibitions or restrictions

(a) imposed on moral or humanitarian grounds;

(b) designed to protect human, animal or plant health or life;

(c) relating to prison-made goods; or

(d) relating to the enforcement of police or revenue laws.

On article XIII:

If a wide variation should occur in the rate of exchange between the currencies of Canada and the United States of America, and if the government of either country should consider the variation so substantial as to prejudice the industries or commerce of that country, it shall be free to propose negotiations for the modification of this agreement; and if agreement with respect thereto is not reached within thirty days following receipt of such proposal, the government making such proposal shall be free to terminate this agreement in its entirety on thirty days' written notice.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was wondering just what is meant by this particular article. Does it not tend to tie our currency to that of the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: I notice there is provision for negotiation and so on, but I have in mind 1931 and 1932 when we kept our currency in line with that of the United States, I think very much to the detriment of our primary producers. It seems to me that if, inferentially at least, we are going to do this under this article, it will be somewhat dangerous from the point of view of the primary producer. To negotiate variations in this treaty at a time when exchange fluctuations overseas are rather serious would, in my opinion, militate rather seriously against the primary producer. I should like to have a word from the minister on this.

Mr. DUNNING: If this ties us to the United States exchangewise, then the other trade agreement ties the United Kingdom to the United States, because the same conditions are present in each treaty. I may say that it would be quite impossible in these days to negotiate a treaty without a provision which would enable each country to be free with respect to exchange. My hon. friend will appreciate that when he considers the matter. This article does not change our situation in the slightest degree, but of course the existence of a trade treaty with any country compels us to count the cost exchangewise with respect to anything we may be contemplating at any time.

On article XIV:

The government of each country reserves the right to withdraw or to modify the concession granted on any article under this agreement, or to impose quantitative regulations on the importation of any such article if, as the result of the extension of such concession to other foreign countries, such countries obtain the major benefit of the concession, and if in consequence imports of the article concerned increase to such an extent as to threaten serious injury to domestic producers: Provided, that before any action authorized by the foregoing reservation is taken, the government proposing to take such action shall give notice in writing to the other government of its intention to do so, and shall afford such other government an opportunity within thirty days after receipt of such notice to consult with it in respect of the proposed action.

Article agreed to.

On article XV:

1. Should any measure be adopted by the government of either country which, while not conflicting with the terms of this agreement, appears to the government of the other country to have the effect of nullifying or impairing any of the objects of the agreement, the government which has adopted any such measure shall consider such representations and proposals as the other may make, with a view to effecting a mutually satisfactory adjustment of the matter.

2. The government of each conutry will accord sympathetic consideration to, and when requested will afford adequate opportunity for consultation regarding, such representations as the other government may make with respect to the operation of customs laws and regulations, quantitative restrictions on imports or the administration thereof, the observance of customs formalities, and the application of sanitary laws and regulations for the protections of human, animal or plant health or life.

3. In the event that the government of either country makes representations to the government of the other country in respect of the application of any sanitary law or regulation for the protection of human, animal or plant health or life, and if there is disagreement with respect thereto, a committee of technical experts on which each government will be represented shall, on the request of either government, be established to consider the matter and to submit recommendations to the two governments.

Mr. HARRIS: Could the minister enlarge on the meaning of the second paragraph where it says, "adequate opportunity for consultation regarding such representations as the other government may make with respect to the operation of customs laws and regulations." My next question, which is perhaps more important, is with reference to the consultations covering quantitative restrictions on imports. What sort of machinery is being set up for the administration of this part of this act?

Mr. DUNNING: Normally, External Affairs, from Canada's end, with the Department of the Secretary of State at Washington, at their end. It is an undertaking on the part of each party that they will listen sympathetically to any representations made by the other party.

Mr. HARRIS: But in matters of consultation of this kind the essential element of time creeps in. I am thinking of another agreement passed in 1932 in connection with which representations have been made in the past, and the minister will have in mind probably what I am thinking of. Just now I am thinking of the great difficulties that Canada is going to get into during the lifetime of this three-year agreement. Will this organization take two or three years, or is there any way of speeding it up? I put this on record in Hansard so that reference may be made to it. The minister will probably agree that the administration of matters of this kind is something like the administration of justice—you get it eventually. I did not know whether the minister would like, from his seat, to enlarge upon the routine that would be followed, so that when we have to do it we may do it with some expedition.

Mr. DUNNING: You can always agree to consult with anybody, but you cannot decide how long it is going to take the two parties who consult to agree. This merely provides amicable machinery for consultation, but it does not guarantee agreement. In the instance to which my hon. friend refers, which was so unfortunate, in connection with the trade treaty known as the Ottawa agreements of 1932, there was no lack of facilities for consultation and communication, but there was distinctly a lack of agreement.

Mr. HARRIS: Would this have the same effect as article XVIII, as I recall it, of the 1932 agreement?

Mr. DUNNING: It is not exactly the same wording.

Mr. McNEVIN: Could dumping be considered under this provision?

Mr. DUNNING: No, that is covered by Canadian law.

Mr. BROOKS: Would bonuses be considered under this item?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, anything of that kind of which either country complains could result in representations under section 1 of Article XV.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Under which article does Canada undertake to remove the excise tax?

Mr. DUNNING: We have already passed that as the head-note to schedule I, at the top of page 13.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. HARRIS: The provision here is for "a committee of technical experts on which each government will be represented to consider the matter and to submit recommendations to the two governments." I imagine this would cover such things as products being shipped into this country in jute packages where the jute might be second-hand, and such like. Has the minister in his docket a note upon which he might enlarge and tell us who the technical experts on this committee are likely to be? Will they be officers within the departments or people drawn from scientific organizations?

Mr. DUNNING: It has not been necessary to invoke the provision as yet, but each country, I think, would decide for itself.

Mr. HARRIS: Countries that have trouble with the foot-and-mouth disease—I am not referring to the United States at the moment—cannot ship goods to this country except under certain regulations. That applies to Scotland at the present time, and it has always been a question as to how judgment shall be given, particularly in the matter of animal products of all kinds; so much so that it has been necessary to send from London, England, to places like Scotland, a special representative of the dominion government to examine the product and give a certificate that the goods are of a class or kind that might be approved and sent through to Canada. The entire plant where the goods are being manufactured is inspected and checked by an official of this dominion government, who is sent at the expense of this government from London to Scotland to examine the entire plant, and a certificate is required from this dominion official that the goods are such as might be shipped in here without let or hindrance. The question I wish to ask is whether the technical experts, in the case of shipments from the United Kingdom, will be from the high commissioners' office. Whether or not they are qualified to pass judgment is another matter.

Mr. DUNNING: I would point out that there is no such provision in the United Kingdom agreement as is contained in section 3 of article XV of this treaty.

Mr. HARRIS: But this is a particular provision now being made. I come back to my question: Who would the technical experts be?

Mr. DUNNING: Each government would be responsible for appointing its own to deal with the particular case as it arises; but remember the decision of the technical experts is not final. The decision of each government with respect to the matter still remains, but this does provide a means of endeavouring to negotiate a way out of a difficulty which arises through sanitary or other regulations for the protection of animal or plant health or life. My hon. friend is thinking, and quite properly, of cases where apparently such regulations have been used to create a prohibition, always a difficult matter. There is no machinery in the United Kingdom-Canada agreement to deal with that. We have to appeal to them as a friendly co-member of the British commonwealth of nations to hear us on the matter. But in this agreement we have tried to set up machinery whereby there can be a technical examination of the merits and a report by such a committee to both governments.

Mr. HARRIS: I appreciate that, and that is the reason I brought up the point. I want to find out what kind of machinery this is going to be, because the minister will agree that it is something new.

Mr. DUNNING: The same provision was in the 1935 agreement with the United States.

Mr. HARRIS: Has it ever functioned?

Mr. DUNNING: We never had occasion to use it.

Mr. HARRIS: If you had, what sort of machinery would it be?

Mr. DUNNING: It would depend upon the particular nature of the disagreement. For instance, if it were something connected with animal health we would not appoint a man from the Department of Public Health.

Mr. HARRIS: But a man from some one of the departments?

Mr. DUNNING: We can get someone from outside if we wish. The government is quite free to do what it wishes in the matter. I cannot say in advance just who it would be.

(b) Nothing in the agreement shall entitle Canada to claim the benefit of any treatment, preference or privilege which may now or hereafter be accorded by the United States of America, its territories or possessions or the Panama canal zone exclusively to one another or to the republic of Cuba. The provisions of this subparagraph shall continue to apply in respect of any benefits now or hereafter accorded by the United States of America, its territories or possessions or the Panama canal zone to the Philippine islands, irrespective of any change in the political status of the Philippine islands.

On the preamble.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to make one or two observations before the preamble carries.

Mr. DUNNING: If I might make a suggestion to my hon. friend, I think that on the second reading of the bill there will be a better opportunity for him to make general observations. That is where such discussion would normally occur.

Mr. MacNICOL: Thank you.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 64, respecting a certain trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 29, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT—CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT

Mr. MALCOLM McLEAN (Melfort) presented the second report of the special committee appointed to inquire into the operation of the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

MARINE AND FISHERIES—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince) presented the first report of the standing committee on marine and fisheries, and moved that the report be concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 28 TO PERMIT STATEMENT ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS ON MARCH 30

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the house will remember that the other day I stated that I hoped to be able to make a statement on foreign affairs to-morrow. I am prepared to make that statement, and would like to do so on the motion to go into committee of supply on the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, which have not yet been called. Thursday is a day upon which His Honour the Speaker leaves the chair without any question being put, and if I am to have the opportunity of making a statement in the manner I have suggested, which I imagine would best meet the convenience of the house, it will be necessary to obtain the unanimous consent of the house to suspend standing order 28. With the consent of the house, therefore, I move:

That standing order 28 be suspended in relation to the committee of supply with respect to the sittings of this house on Thursday and Friday the 30th and 31st March, 1939.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the Prime Minister if opportunity will be afforded for general discussion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The procedure adopted last year, and in previous years, was to have a statement made in the first instance by the Secretary of State for External Affairs while His Honour the Speaker was in the chair, and then have the debate proceed with the Speaker in the chair. When the debate concludes we will then go into committee on the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, at which time detailed discussion can take place, as it always does, in the form of questions and answers.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It could run right over if necessary?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. H. G. CLARKE (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has stated that to-morrow he will discuss external affairs. Could he give the house any information as to conditions in Europe, as the Toronto Telegram of last night reports thirty-four members of the British House of Commons calling for an all-party government to start mobilization—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): —of the nation's wealth, man-power and industry, in preparation for any emergency?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that is a question which may stand until to-morrow, when the debate will take place.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand the hon. member's question is with regard to conditions in Europe. I hope to have a good deal to say on that subject to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. LOCKHART:

1. What property was acquired by the dominion government in connection with the Grimsby rifle range?

2. From whom was such property purchased, and what price was paid to each individual?

3. Has any of such property been subsequently leased?

Mr. DUNNING:

Note.—Statements of liabilities and assets of the Bank of Canada are submitted to the Minister of Finance as at each Wednesday and as at last business day of each month. The answers to questions Nos. 1 and 2 are based on the figures shown in the statements for the dates indicated. Under chapter 60 of the statutes of Canada, 1935, the Bank of Canada values its holdings of gold on the basis of the current market price for gold, that is the amount realizable from the sale of gold in London or New York converted into Canadian dollars at the current rate of exchange.

2. Note.—It is assumed that in this question "currency" means notes and coins and does not include deposits. Statements of liabilities and assets of the chartered banks are submitted to the Minister of Finance as at last juridical day of each month and the answer to this question is based on the figures shown in the statements of the chartered banks for the dates indicated.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That when this house adjourns on Thursday, 6th April, it stand adjourned until Tuesday, 11th April, 1939.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Prime Minister could be persuaded to give us another day. Some of us are not able to get away at week-ends; a number of us have not been home for three months, and unless the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) will provide us with aeroplane services I am afraid that in four days it would be quite impossible to take a trip even as far as Winnipeg and back. One more day would be a good deal of help, if it could be so arranged.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have every disposition to oblige the hon. member if it is going to help to oblige other hon. members as well. I think there is reasonableness in the request he makes, and I certainly would not oppose giving an extra day, if the house generally is prepared to concede it.

Mr. STEVENS: What about the rest of us who live farther away?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, you will have to stay here.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not much comfort.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should be prepared to amend the motion so that it would read:

That when this house adjourns on Wednesday, 5th April, it stand adjourned until Tuesday, 11th April, 1939.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I suggest that the motion stand so as to permit the whips to confer. If they can come to an agreement between now and to-morrow, I will put my motion to-morrow afternoon in accordance with the terms of their agreement. If they do not come to an agreement, I shall use my own discretion as to the motion to be put.

Motion stands.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—APPROVAL OF AGREEMENT SIGNED AT WASHINGTON, NOVEMBER 17, 1938

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 64, respecting a certain trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion? Carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is this the motion for second reading? I understand some hon. members wish to speak on it.

Mr. DUNNING: Several hon. members yesterday suggested to me that they wished to speak, and inquired as to the proper time, and I said it would be on second reading.

Mr. MANION: Your members, or ours?

Mr. DUNNING: No, across the way. I do not wish to have anyone taken by surprise.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CREATION OF DEFENCE PURCHASING BOARD TO ENTER INTO CONTRACTS FOR MUNITIONS, EQUIPMENT, MATERIALS AND SUPPLIES

The house resumed from Thursday, March 16, consideration in committee of Bill No. 38, to establish a defence purchasing board—Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver)—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 4, subsection 4—Tenders.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There was some discussion, hon. members will recall, with regard to subsection 4, following the word "otherwise." This is the subsection which begins:

In respect of all contracts, the board shall, wherever practicable, invite tenders either by means of advertisements in the public press or otherwise.

There was some suggestion of an objection based on the possibility of tenders being invited without giving full scope to the element of competition. In order to meet that objection, the following amendment has been suggested:

That subsection 4 of section 4 of the bill be amended by adding thereto after the word "otherwise" in line 41 of page 3 the following words "it shall be the duty of the board to ensure that tenders in respect of any contracts for the purchase of any defence equipment produced or manufactured in Canada or for the construction of any defence project are invited from every person in Canada believed by the board to be capable of performing the contract, unless for reasons of military secrecy or for other good and sufficient reasons the board is of the opinion that it is not in the public interest to invite tenders in this way."

Mr. DUNNING: I move that amendment.

Mr. BAKER: According to what was passed in an earlier paragraph, should that not read, "in respect of all contracts amounting to less than $5,000?"

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That was disposed of.

Mr. BAKER: Should that not also be inserted here?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No. This deals only with the question of public tenders. Some objection was raised in committee to limiting the possibility of public tenders, and this amendment is designed to meet that objection. It qualifies the powers in regard to the definition of the word "otherwise."

Mr. STIRLING: There will be a full stop, then, at the end of the first sentence and this will be another sentence?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. McGREGOR: How are these manufacturers to be notified of tenders being called? Through public advertisement?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That will be, of course, within the full competence and jurisdiction of the board. They will obtain a full list of those who are competent to tender, and those will be notified directly. Where it is not done by advertisement in the public press, it will be done, I assume, by correspondence from the board.

Mr. McGREGOR: What I want to know is, is it left to the board to say who shall tender and who shall not tender?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The board is given discretion. Public tenders shall be resorted to in every practicable case; but where there are special reasons for not calling for tenders, it will be within the discretion of the board not to call for tenders.

Mr. GREEN: This amendment, I think, illustrates the importance of having on the board adequate representation, particularly from the more remote parts of Canada. Incidentally, this is not the only provision which will work satisfactorily only if there is such representation. There are several other clauses to which the same consideration applies. The other evening, when the bill was up for discussion in committee before, I understood the minister to say it was the intention of the government that the members of the board should reside in the neighbourhood of Ottawa.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Oh, no.

Mr. GREEN: By reason of the Trans-Canada Air Lines, British Columbia is now as near Ottawa as is Toronto. I would ask the minister to bear that in mind. Speaking seriously, these powers of the board can be properly exercised only if the board is representative of different parts of Canada. Consider, for example, section 6, giving the board power to supervise the carrying out of contracts; section 8, paragraph (a), giving it power to inquire as to defence requirements; and section 8, paragraph (c), giving it power to conduct a survey of industrial plants.

I would point out to the minister that British Columbia is probably more directly interested in this defence problem than any other part of Canada. We are concerned particularly with the defence requirements and with the carrying out of defence contracts. Many contracts have been let on the Pacific coast, and there will be many more in carrying out the plans of the government. I would also point out that British Columbia ranks as Canada's third largest industrial province, so that the matter of an industrial survey in that province is of great importance. I should like to have some assurance from the minister that there will be on this board representation from our province.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I can assure my hon. friend that every possible consideration will be given his recommendations, but I should not like to bind myself by undertaking any geographical representation on the board. The decision in the matter will be for the government as a whole and not for the Minister of National Defence.

Amendment agreed to.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 6—Board to supervise carrying out contracts.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There was an objection from the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) to the word "supervise." The suggestion is now that section 6 be struck out and another section substituted, very largely to meet the point raised by the hon. gentleman. The amendment will read:

That section 6 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"6. It shall be the duty of the board to take such steps as shall reasonably ensure that contracts entered into pursuant to the provisions of this part are performed in accordance with their respective terms.

Mr. DUNNING: I move that amendment.

Mr. CAHAN: I suggest that "steps" is not the best term to use.

Mr. STEVENS: "Measures."

Mr. CAHAN: "Measures" is better. What it certainly means is that this board must provide a thorough inspection and supervision during the performance of these contracts, and I think the word "measures," as the hon. member for Kootenay East suggests, is a wider term.

Mr. DUNNING: I move that the word "measures" be substituted for "steps" in the amendment.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister propose to elaborate on that at all? Does he propose to add to section 8?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have considered carefully the observations made by my hon. friend in regard to section 8. After considering the matter, I came to the conclusion that this amendment, based upon the observations of the hon. member for Kootenay East, will largely meet the views of the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) with regard to section 8. If, however, the hon. member thinks the amendment does not meet his views, I shall be glad to defer further consideration of section 8, although the opinion we arrived at was that this amendment, changing the word "supervise" in section 6, would largely meet the objections of the hon. member with regard to section 8. For that reason no amendment is at present proposed to section 8.

Mr. STIRLING: It appears to me to be most desirable that the board should make use of the technical officers of the Department of National Defence for the purpose of this very examination, and in the wording of section 6 as amended, and in section 8 as it is printed, no such connection is alluded to.

[Mr. I. A. Mackenzie.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does my hon. friend still think there should be an addition to section 8, even in view of the amendment to section 6?

Mr. STIRLING: I simply wish to ensure there shall be a clear understanding that the board shall make use of the services of the technical officers of the department for this very work of supervision. If the minister can assure me that that is the full intention of the government, perhaps the committee will consider that satisfactory.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is precisely the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. CAHAN: This board is not independent of the department. It is under the Minister of National Defence and is, in reality, nothing more than an official of the department, and therefore it must be deemed essential, I think, that whatever the department has in the way of technical knowledge and assistance must continue to be utilized to serve the interests of that department and, incidentally, to meet the special requirements of the board. I would certainly oppose this bill entirely if it were intended to set up an independent board or bureau, such as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, or some others which I might name. We do not wish to repudiate responsible self-government in this country and to preclude ministerial responsibility. I have expressed myself very freely in that regard, and I shall not go into the question to-day. I do not think the Department of National Defence is under competent and qualified administration, and this bill is intended to improve the administration; but I trust that we do not intend to improve the administration by depriving it of all authority and resorting to an independent bureau which is not under the direct supervision of the minister of that department.

Mr. WALSH: I wanted to say a few words along lines similar to those followed by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. I have watched the progress of this bill and have given it a certain amount of study, and it seems to me that we are transferring powers to a new creation referred to in general terms as the board. To my mind we are departing seriously from democratic government and democratic institutions as we recognize them in this country; we are providing ways and means for a Minister of National Defence and for a government to take refuge behind a certain creation, and members of parliament and others will find it difficult to obtain information and attach responsibility to the people who are really responsible. I know I was rather severe in my criticism of the present Minister of National Defence and of his department, and I was sincere in that criticism, but I do not think the means being adopted in this bill will meet the real objections that I had to procedures that have been followed in the Department of National Defence in the past year or two.

We cherish our democratic institutions, and I submit that this is a decided departure from those institutions. We are creating something here that is not a part of our social and economic fabric as we have endeavoured to develop it during the past fifty or one hundred years. This board is being given certain powers which I think should rest with the Minister of National Defence, with his department and with the government. I am speaking now as an individual member; I know many of those on my own side of the house will not agree with what I am saying. But I am a firm believer in democratic principles in government, and in the responsibility of ministers of the crown in the administration of their departments, and I feel that to transfer powers such as these from the minister and his department to this board will make it more difficult for members of parliament effectively to represent their constituencies. I do not know whether I am right or wrong in that, but that is how I feel. I have discussed this matter with other members on both sides of the house, and have found that there are members who feel very much as I do. Probably they will not express themselves as I have, perhaps I am wrong in so doing, but I have had this growing conviction and I feel that I should give utterance to it while the bill is going through. I understand that section 7 has been passed, but if you will refer to it you will notice that one of the powers given to this board—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We are coming back to section 7 later.

Mr. WALSH: I will mention this in passing in order to avoid the necessity of rising later on; I do not like to take part too frequently in the discussion in the house nor do I wish to delay measures which are going through. Section 7 refers to the five per cent profit on the average amount of capital employed in the performance of the contract. That is one responsibility we are placing on this board; it has to decide the amount of capital employed, in connection with which there are bound to be differences of opinion. The board is to be clothed with certain authority to decide. In the first place—I know I will be condemned by many hon. members for saying this—I do not think the wheels of industry in this country can turn on five per cent per annum. I am thoroughly convinced of that; and I do not think it is fair to ask industry to operate effectively on five per cent per annum.

Mr. HEAPS: What should they get?

Mr. WALSH: A reasonable profit.

Mr. HEAPS: What is a reasonable profit?

Mr. WALSH: What they are making from day to day in business. If my hon. friend has been in business, or knows anything about business, he knows what is a reasonable profit.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Are the farmers making five per cent?

Mr. WALSH: The farmers are making five per cent, ten per cent and twenty per cent as and when they can make it, the same as business does.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. WALSH: If you take the average for a period of ten or fifteen years you will find that the farmer makes as much profit on his investment and his work as business has made during the past ten or fifteen years.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read the records.

Mr. WALSH: The records are there. We have heard so much in this house about the farmers, particularly the farmers of the west—

The CHAIRMAN: I am afraid the hon. member is getting out of order.

Mr. WALSH: I know, Mr. Chairman, I was led out of order. I should like an opportunity to discuss farmers and business some day.

The CHAIRMAN: I am sorry, but not under this section.

Mr. WALSH: Very well. I just want to emphasize to the minister that we are departing from democratic principles; we are departing from the responsibility of the crown and the responsibility of ministers. Then in connection with section 7 I wanted to raise my voice in protest against limiting the profit to five per cent. I do not think it is sufficient to permit industry to carry on effectively and give the work we expect it to give those who are employed.

Mr. DUNNING: I should like to say just a word with respect to that portion of the hon. member's remarks which bear upon the section now under discussion. At the moment I need not refer to what he said in regard to section 7; we can leave that until we reach the section. With regard to democratic responsibility and the possibility of the evasion of ministerial responsibility through and by means of the creation of this board, may I point out to the hon. member that every contract let by this board must be let with the approval of the governor general in council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance. This means that whether he likes it or not the Minister of Finance must take the responsibility of recommending to the governor general in council the awarding of a contract which has been recommended to him by the purchasing board. I do not think that is a departure from responsible government; in fact I feel it to be a very great intensification of responsible government, at least as far as the Minister of Finance is concerned. The bill also provides that if the board deems a certain course desirable in connection with a certain piece of business, such as calling for tenders and so forth, it must report to the Minister of Finance, who must inform his colleagues.

I can assure my hon. friend that the chain of responsibility exists; that it is very definite and, moreover, it ensures responsibility to this parliament, because the only thing that occurs to me in connection with which the government could plead public interest as a reason for not informing the house of the details of every contract and every order in council, would be wholly in connection with works of secrecy such as details of fortifications and that sort of thing. I cannot conceive of any other matter of public interest which would debar this house from obtaining full information with regard to the activities of the board; because, as I say, when those activities are translated into contractual form it must be done by means of an order in council on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. WALSH: Is there any set-up in connection with our government at the present time that is at all analogous to the proposed board?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not know that there is anything at the moment; the war purchasing commission during the war and the purchasing commission of Canada after the war are the nearest parallels that occur to my mind. I do not know of anything that has just the precise chain of board and ministerial responsibility contemplated by this legislation.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, I would like to place it on record that I think the change which has been outlined by the Minister of Finance is a reprehensible one which should not be endorsed by parliament. The Minister of Finance has a great number of departments under him now. He has more departments under him than I think any man in his position can have the physical strength and the mental and intellectual activity to deal with properly. Now, simply because the Minister of National Defence has been found by a commission to be not quite qualified for the administration of a measure such as this—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman; I ask that that remark be withdrawn.

Mr. CAHAN: I am in order.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the point raised by the Minister of National Defence is well taken. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is an old parliamentarian, and I am sure he will withdraw.

Mr. CAHAN: I was simply stating that this board, which should be a branch of the Department of Defence, is for some reason transferred by this bill to the Minister of Finance and is placed more directly under his control. The Minister of Finance must know that I have a high appreciation of his intellectual and physical abilities, under ordinary circumstances, but I suggest he is quite incapable of attending to this additional work of administration. It is quite unnecessary that it should be transferred to him.

I believe I am in order when I say that the Department of National Defence should be so carefully organized that it can administer the work of national defence and all contracts collateral thereto. Of course the government must be responsible. The Minister of Public Works is responsible for public works; yet the contracts he places are brought by him, with his recommendation and that of his engineers and other officers, to the attention of the government, and his official acts are authorized by order in council. But if I may say so the governmental responsibility exercised by order in council is by way of a supervisory function, after the Minister of Public Works has made his recommendation, and an authorization is given upon that recommendation.

I dislike the change, and I do not think it should be made. If we become engaged in war—and we must trust providence that war will not ensue—the Minister of National Defence ought to be in the primary responsible position. The Minister of Finance will find that he is so absorbed in his own work that he will have no time to assume these further responsibilities.

Let us deal with the matter now. For the sake of the country let us deal fairly with it. If we are to have a department of national defence let that department assume the responsibility which the Minister of Finance proposes to assume under the bill. Of course the Minister of Finance will have to be consulted by the ministers of various departments. He must be consulted in connection with all appropriations for public works or for assisting the provinces in dealing with the provincial matters. He must be consulted by his colleagues in charge of the various departments. He will have to be consulted now with regard to the expenditures of the Department of National Defence, and as to the necessity or expediency of such appropriations being voted from time to time. But do not let us take the foolish initiative of transferring to another department matters which fundamentally are duties of the Department of National Defence, especially when we know that no one man charged with the administration of the Department of Finance can really and effectively undertake the additional work which is being imposed upon him, and especially if we are to face the active defence of our country.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): One would have thought from the remarks of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George that in this legislation we are establishing a new principle. I do not suppose he did me the credit of reading the remarks I made on the second reading of the bill. Had he done so he would have found that I said clearly that there are two precedents for this legislation. One was the War purchasing commission and the other was the purchasing commission of Canada. In the one instance the commission reported directly to the Prime Minister, and in the other it reported to the Minister of Finance. There is in this legislation no departure in principle. It does not represent any abrupt breaking of precedent. I believe that the joint responsibility shared by the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Finance and, as with regard to taxing powers, the Minister of National Revenue—if indeed taxing powers are necessary under the legislation—constitutes a perfect form of administrative responsibility. I do not know whether the hon. member was a member of the House of Commons when the former legislation was placed on the statute book.

Mr. CAHAN: I was not a member of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But my hon. friend is conversant with Canadian public affairs. I am surprised that he did not know that there is no breach of precedent in regard to this legislation. We are following what has been done in the past in regard to ministerial responsibility. I do not think the raising of any constitutional or technical point will interfere with the functioning of the proposed board, which is supposed to carry out in the very best way and in the public interest the heavy and onerous responsibilities with which it is to be charged.

Mr. CAHAN: This board is to act as a branch of the ordinary administration of the Department of National Defence; that is its function. It is true that when we were at war and enormous contracts had to be entered into, special provision was made with respect to them in certain orders in council which now form a large volume, and some of which I helped to draft. If unhappily we become involved in a war, we shall again, no doubt, have to resort to such war measures. But at the present time it is not necessary to resort to the War Measures Act, or to any phantom war measures act such as we have here. It is a measure to overcome a certain political difficulty which we have seen discussed in the press and otherwise.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. CAHAN: At least, Mr. Chairman, I can refer to it in that respect. I do not wish to discuss the matter at greater length, further than to say that I am opposed to it, even though I have only one vote.

Mr. McIVOR: I may feel like a small boy when I am discussing a question of this kind, but I must say I congratulate the Minister of National Defence upon trying not to hold all the power in his own hands. People in the north of Ireland say that two heads are better than one. Four heads must be better than two, and certainly must be better than one—much better. I commend the minister for his wisdom. If there were a member on the board from Vancouver, another from Alberta, another from Quebec, another from Ontario, two or three from the maritimes, and one more from Fort William, they would have far more wisdom than there possibly could be in one head. Certainly the minister is to be commended for his democratic action in this regard.

Mr. WALSH: There is one further point I should like to make, and I know the Minister of National Defence will not consider I am indulging in personalities. I do feel that this is a departure. The Minister of National Defence should be absolutely in charge of every detail in connection with his department. If this board is to be created, it should be created within the department. The master general of the ordnance should be directly connected with, if not actually the chairman of, this board; the minister would then be directly responsible. That would be better than to create a somewhat independent board, which apparently is to report its findings to the Minister of Finance, who reports to the cabinet. Why should not the board report directly to the Minister of National Defence?

I am sure that many hon. members feel as I do in this matter. If I were the minister of national defence I would consider it somewhat of a slight on myself if a board, a creature of my department, were to report to another minister of the crown. Probably the present minister does not feel that way; he is happy in his surroundings and knows cabinet and ministerial procedure far better than I. But that is how I should feel personally, and that is why I am expressing this point of view. I should want to be responsible for everything that took place within my department. I should not want any body under me reporting to another minister of the crown, who would then report to the cabinet.

Is there anything of this kind in Great Britain? If there is a board of this nature, to whom does it report, or to whom is it responsible?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The procedure is the same as we are adopting here. All financial contracts entered into in Great Britain are subject to treasury supervision. This is the principle we are endeavouring to establish by this legislation.

Mr. WALSH: Is the board in England an independent board reporting directly to the chancellor of the exchequer or the treasury board, or does it report to the minister of war or the head of the department for which it is making purchases?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As far as my information goes, there is no separate board in Great Britain. I think it is all done by the director of munitions contracts who reports to the treasury officials.

Mr. CAHAN: In England they have a contract branch in the war department which makes the contracts. These contracts are reported to the treasury board. Within certain limits they are under the supervision of the treasury. Here any department making a contract must keep within the limits prescribed by statute, and, to a certain extent, as prescribed or suggested by the finance department. I do not know that it makes very much difference, but I should like to suggest the following wording for the proposed amendment:

It shall be the duty of the board to adopt such measures as it shall deem necessary to ensure that contracts entered into pursuant to the provisions of this part shall be performed in accordance with their respective terms.

There is a slight difference in wording, but I think it is more emphatic.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a matter of draftsmanship.

Mr. CAHAN: I know something about the supervision of contracts of the kind. It requires a large staff of inspectors and there must be careful supervision to see that proper inspection is made before a contract is deemed to be fully performed.

Mr. STIRLING: I come back to the point I made before. It seems to me it would be a good thing to ensure that the technical officers of the department come in on this inspection work, if for one reason only. It would keep them au fait with the details of either the production of the munitions or the erection of the plant. It does not matter to me whether this is done by an addendum to this section 6 or by adding another clause to section 8. One can visualize the possibility of friction arising between this board and the department. If these contracts are carried out without inspection by the technical officers of the department they will not be nearly so well informed as to the product of which they are going to make use as they would be if it were produced under their supervision.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I just want to repeat the assurance I gave before. I think the amended section 6, along with the last subsection of section 8, will prove quite ample to carry out what the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. DUNNING: I move that the amendment be adopted in the terms suggested by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan):

That section 6 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"6. It shall be the duty of the board to adopt such measures as it shall deem necessary to ensure that contracts entered into pursuant to the provisions of this part shall be performed in accordance with their respective terms.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We will leave section 7 for the moment. The other two sections which were not passed at the last sitting were Nos. 17 and 18 in part II of the bill.

On section 17—Governor in council may borrow for capital expenditures.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Section 17 reads:

17. (1) The governor in council may, in addition to the sums now remaining unborrowed and negotiable of the loans authorized by parliament by any act heretofore passed, raised by way of loan, under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, by the issue and sale or pledge of securities of Canada, in such form, for such separate sums, at such rate of interest and upon such other terms and conditions as the governor in council may approve, such sum or sums of money as may be required to provide for the payment or reimbursement of expenditures of the department, which in the appropriations provided by parliament for the department are chargeable to capital account, hereinafter called "the said expenditures."

(2) The principal raised by way of loan under this act and the interest thereon shall be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

I have pointed out time and time again that legislation is continually being introduced into this house which increases our debt and the burden of taxation placed upon the people of Canada. I have a question or two which I should like to direct to the Department of Finance, which is headed by a scientific money man. The Department of Finance and the Department of National Defence are to share the responsibility of administering this act. The question I wish to direct to the minister is this: In view of the fact that the national debt of Canada and taxation will be increased by the financial provisions of this bill, just how much further can we go in piling up our national debt? Just what limit does he place upon our ability to carry the debt burden in Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I must decline to get into a general discussion of monetary principles on the section of a bill which has to do with providing a method of financing a specific undertaking. We could write books about my hon. friend's question, as he and his friends do, but I do not think any book written by myself, developing that subject and expressing my opinions, would be of any really permanent value because all history shows us that nothing shifts more rapidly or more unexpectedly than people's ability to carry their communal financial and economic burdens. All through history we have had the Jeremiahs telling each succeeding generation that the end was coming, there was no hope, the load was too heavy, and so forth. Yet each succeeding generation has evolved methods of carrying that load or of adjusting it. Any dogmatizing by myself or anyone else as to what can or will be done in the future in relation to the debt creating or debt carrying capacity of a people would be merely the wildest of speculation.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Since the minister has stated that he does not intend to define any limit to the amount of national debt and our capacity to bear taxation—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I do not intend to be out of order, Mr. Chairman, but in view of the fact that we are here adding to Canada's national debt, and there is nothing in my opinion that has a greater effect upon every man, woman and child in this country than monetary policy—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member must confine his remarks to clause 17, which provides that the governor in council may borrow for capital expenditures. He must not attempt, under this clause, to cover the whole range of expenditures or discuss the whole monetary system.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I am dealing, Mr. Chairman, with the provision that:

The governor in council may, in addition to the sums now remaining unborrowed and negotiable of the loans authorized by parliament by any act heretofore passed, raise by way of loan, under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, by the issue and sale or pledge of securities of Canada, in such form, for such separate sums, at such rate of interest and upon such other terms and conditions as the governor in council may approve, such sum or sums of money as may be required to provide for the payment or reimbursement of expenditures of the department.

We are simply borrowing more money, and I am dealing with the effect that borrowing more money will have upon the tremendous debt burden which we are now carrying. I wish to refer to a statement made by a man who has made a study of this question, a statement by a banker in respect to increasing Canada's total debt.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is still out of order, and I would ask him to confine his remarks to the clause before the committee. I am sorry to have to interrupt him so often, but he must comply with the rules.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Mr. Chairman, in respect to the borrowing of money which this section empowers the government to do, I wish to point out that our ability to pay does not keep pace with our increasing debt. If we compare 1937 with 1927—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LANDERYOU: —we find that the annual national income is less by $1,230,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN: I would say to the hon. member that the speech he is attempting to make now might be one he could make on the budget, but he cannot make it on clause 17.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Mr. Chairman, I understand that under this clause we are going to borrow $29,000,000; will that not increase debt and taxation in this country? Most assuredly it will, and if I cannot express my opinion as to the effect of this borrowing upon Canada's economic well-being, then I do not think anybody can be in order in this house.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member will have ample opportunity later in the session to discuss that question.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I do not question that, but I am now asserting my right to discuss it on this clause.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have made my ruling and I ask the hon. member to abide by it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, while I have no use whatever for certain monetary theories that are held by certain gentlemen to the left, it does seem to me that the hon. member has the right, under the rules, to discuss the effect of the borrowing for which authorization is sought by this clause. Surely we cannot simply crowd out theories that do not suit us. We should have some sort of fairness in applying the rules of this house, and I think the hon. member can hardly be shut off in this way.

Mr. DUNNING: Just in support of your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and goodness knows I do not want to shut off discussion in the proper place of any monetary theory; but if we are to read the rules as meaning that on any clause of any bill which involves an expenditure of public money, because that expenditure creates a deficit which can be met only by borrowing, it is therefore in order for us to discuss the whole range of governmental finance in the manner contemplated in the budget debate or upon a motion for going into supply on Mondays or Tuesdays or into committee of ways and means on Mondays or Tuesdays—if we are to permit such discussion on any clause of any bill that spends a dollar, then obviously we shall be here forever. It is not that the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Landeryou) has not plenty of other opportunities. It is that he is seeking this opportunity to develop a general broad public debt discussion, and I suggest to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that if the rules are to be interpreted in that way we can have that kind of speech on at least every bill involving expenditure that comes before the house. It is simply a question of a reasonable interpretation of the rules, and I am inclined to think that the Chairman is right in his ruling in relation to the clause of the bill we are at present discussing.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The Minister of National Defence in answer to a question which I directed to him the other day as to whether he was in favour of the financial policies to be pursued under this bill, said that he must be in favour of them. What did he mean by saying he must be in favour of them?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Res ipsa loquitur.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The Minister of National Defence, who claims to be a sound scientific money man, stated in this house in 1935:

> I suggest the increase of our currency by $430,000,000, which is scientifically justifiable by the appreciation of gold values, to be used for the reduction of our national debt—

Then on another occasion this sound scientific money man has referred to the control by the government of the central bank as the—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member must confine his remarks to the item under discussion, or I shall have to ask him to resume his seat. I have made my ruling. He has the privilege, if he so desires, of appealing against my ruling.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I have no desire, Mr. Chairman, to appeal against your ruling, but I will say that the Minister of Finance has adopted the slogan of "Fire and fall back" once and for all; for he fired many volleys for monetary reform before the 1935 election, and he has now fallen back. I should have said, the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I accept the amendment.

Mr. LANDERYOU: He fired volleys for monetary reform before the election of 1935, but since then he has fallen back into the ranks of the reactionary Minister of Finance.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, on the "reactionary" business, I have not talked about monetary reform; I have done what lay in my power to bring about sane, sensible monetary and credit reform, and what I have done will stand on the records long after my hon. friend's talk has vanished.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I appreciate that, Mr. Chairman, but I notice that the Minister of Finance does not agree with the policies advocated by his associate, with whom he must cooperate in the administration of this legislation.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member must confine himself to the item. I will not permit him, under this item, to continue to discuss monetary questions in general, and I have made my ruling.

Mr. COLDWELL: Before the clause is carried, may we have an explanation of just exactly what it involves. That is really what we want to hear.

Mr. LAWSON: Before the minister rises to speak, I have been waiting for a chance to ask—it combines with what has been asked—why this method of proceeding?

Mr. DUNNING: That is what I was going to deal with. Sections 17 and 18 comprise the financial method. As hon. members of the committee know, in every country the problem of arranging for the financing of large national defence expenditures is very difficult and serious. In the last few years, practically since the war, no expenditures for national defence have been capitalized in any manner in Canada; the expenditures have been met from year to year out of the general revenue of the year; and to the extent that a general over all deficit was created, to that extent the public debt was increased by borrowing to meet the deficit. The growing expenditures in Canada on national defence, part of them of what might be called a capital nature—that is to say they are not immediately consumable but have an ascertainable lifetime of possible service—involve that we give consideration, unless we are prepared to keep on throwing them into a general deficit and thus disguising what our real position is, to evolving some method of separating the annual ordinary expenditure on defence, on the one hand, such as for pay and allowances and materials which are consumed during the year, and on the other hand, for permanent works, such as fortifications and permanent mechanized equipment, which has a certain life. An attempt has been made in this year's estimates to separate one from the other and to capitalize those items which have a value extending over a period of years.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I here ask the minister how these differ from, we will say, ordinary public works as regards capital expenditures?

Mr. DUNNING: They do not. That brings me to the second phase of my subject. I shall immediately be asked, why do you not carry out the sinking fund method with respect to the whole public debt? Most hon. members know I have many times stated that to be an ambition of mine, and one which I hold very dear. But I have also stated to the house—and I do not want to go out of order; I am dealing with the method of capitalization involved in sections 17 and 18, and that involves the sinking fund method—that I do not want to start in respect to debt generally a sinking fund which would be only a paper sinking fund. One of the tragedies of sinking funds, even in England, is that although they express the desire of parliament and of the government to set aside so much each year, it frequently happens that it is necessary to ask for a suspension of the fund for the current year. Any sinking fund which could be devised in Canada to-day for the whole of the public debt which would be within the capacity of the people to pay in addition to what we are already collecting, would not effectively deal with the problem along that line. What I am suggesting here with respect to national defence expenditures is something which I sincerely hope will be gradually spread to the other fields of which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has spoken.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was thinking, not of a sinking fund, but, we will say, the amount spent for post office buildings in contrast with payments for the carrying on of the regular postal services. The minister does not distinguish in that case, does he?

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes, we do distinguish. The Public Works Department erects the buildings for the Post Office Department.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: True, their value is not charged against the post office operations; but that is another reform which I hope I may be able to bring about if I am here long enough. This is away from the subject, if my hon. friend will forgive me for saying so, because the principle we are here seeking to set up is that national defence expenditures of a capital nature, arrived at in the manner I have just described, shall be spread over ten years, and that there shall be voted each year in the estimates of the Department of National Defence a sum chargeable to that year, sufficient to amortize the whole over the period of ten years. That is, we are setting up, in connection with national defence capital expenditures, an amortization of them on a sinking fund basis over a period of ten years. Next year we shall probably find, although I wish it would not be so, that again in the estimates the national defence expenditures will be divided between expenditures out of revenue and expenditures out of capital, and again next year there will be a sum voted out of revenue equivalent not only to the sum required to amortize over ten years this year's capital expenditure, but to the additional sum required to amortize the addition brought about by next year's estimates; and so on. So that we shall have before us in this parliament each year a full knowledge of what our capital expenditure on national defence is, spread over a ten year period, because we shall always have a tenth instalment for each year before us. Frankly, I hope to be able to expand the application of the principle as time goes on, because I am a great believer in planning a method of paying debt at the time you incur it.

Mr. CAHAN: I am afraid that if that ambition is to be realized, its realization will have to be postponed until wars and rumours of wars are at an end.

Mr. DUNNING: I agree with my hon. friend, but in these matters of paying debt I believe in hitching my wagon to a star. Even though I cannot get very far with it, every step is a step in the right direction, in the recognition of the sound principle of making provision for payment on debt when the debt is created.

Mr. CAHAN: But when my hon. friend hitches his wagon to a star, he ought to take very good care that the star in its courses does not switch him off terra firma.

Mr. DUNNING: I agree.

Mr. COLDWELL: I listened attentively to the Minister of Finance. In the estimates this year there is an item, I believe about $29,000,000, capital expenditure; that is one-tenth. Does that mean that it is contemplated that $290,000,000 will be spent over the next ten years?

Mr. DUNNING: The item of $29,000,000 is the total of the estimates of the Department of National Defence which this year are being capitalized, and in the same vote there will be found an item of one-tenth of that amount plus interest, voted this year to apply on the amortization. It is not an expansion of the vote. The vote for amortization this year is about $3,000,000, and that is related to the $29,000,000 based on the ten years' amortization.

Mr. COLDWELL: There was some confusion in the interpretation of that estimate, in the light of the statement just made.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course, the estimate could not be intelligible without the measure we are now passing.

Mr. LAWSON: Would it be correctly stating the minister's interpretation if I said that the effect of this bill, plus the estimates, is as follows: There is no limitation as to the commitments which may be taken by the government for defence expenditures—

Mr. DUNNING: No limitation?

Mr. LAWSON: Just a moment. No limitation on the commitments which may be taken next year so long as the amount payable in respect to those commitments does not exceed the vote contained in the estimates for this year, and so long as it will be repaid within the ten year period, as prescribed by section 18.

Mr. DUNNING: The limitation on expenditures is the estimate, just as it has always been, but this law makes it obligatory to create a ten-year distribution of that portion of the expenditure which was capitalized.

Mr. LAWSON: But there is no limitation on the commitment which may be taken.

Mr. DUNNING: The limitation is the vote itself.

Mr. LAWSON: The government might enter into a contract for an expenditure over the next five years, with a firm manufacturing some article of defence, which by far exceeded this year's estimate, but they can pay for it only to the extent of this year's estimates. The other limitation is that it must be repaid under this scheme within ten years.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, the question of the extent to which a government can commit a future year's estimates by a contract entered into this year, only a small portion of which can be used this year—

Mr. LAWSON: Right.

Mr. DUNNING: —as the hon. member knows, is always a matter of difficulty in administration, particularly when you are ordering goods which you know cannot be delivered for a long time.

Mr. LAWSON: And that applies particularly in defence matters.

Mr. DUNNING: It certainly applies to this particular class of equipment. It has, however, no relationship to the amount which may or may not be capitalized. The amount which may be capitalized has a definite limit in the vote which will come before the house by and by. The only means, so far as I know, of adequately controlling the government in making defence commitments is to have the minister state plainly, in connection with every item as he puts his supplies through, how much of future commitment is involved in the vote. This year we have gone a considerable way in outlining it in the details of the estimates. I do not know that one can be too arbitrary about it, but as Minister of Finance I have always felt it my duty to see to it that large commitments are not entered into on the basis of token payments merely, without parliament being fully cognizant of the position. That is about as far as one can go. It is very difficult administratively at times. For instance, suppose we ordered a number of aeroplanes from England, delivery of which the war office tells us can be made three years hence. Now there is merely a nominal payment to be made on the giving of the contract in the first place—say $10,000—but the total cost might be in millions. If you took a vote for the millions in the year in which the order was given it would be useless; it would be merely padding the estimates to no purpose whatsoever. The important thing is that parliament should be fully advised as to what those future commitments are in order that there shall be no running away without the authority of parliament.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If I may revert to my former question, I am not really clear yet as to why this particular method of finance should be employed in connection with the national defence estimates when it is not the practice in other departments where capital expenditures readily might be distinguished from current expenditures.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend will see, if he looks at the national defence estimates, that in addition to the expenditures of the department authorized this year, there is a vote which must come out of the taxpayers this year of $3,000,000 to amortize the capital portion of the expenditures previously authorized. If we applied that to every public building, every form of capital expenditure at the present time, we should have a larger amount to vote by way of instalments than we can possibly stand under the conditions that now prevail.

Mr. LAWSON: Or spend during the next year.

Mr. DUNNING: Or provide during the next year. We might fool ourselves by putting in a lot of these things and voting them and then find ourselves with a revenue deficit, being consequently under the necessity of borrowing money to retire other borrowed money, which would be a foolish procedure. I am hopeful that by this means we may get on the basis of arranging to liquidate capital expenditures as we create them. I have been rigid in the past four years in what I have admitted to consideration as capital expenditures. I have admitted as a capital expenditure nothing which had not on its face the obligation to repay in some form or other, nothing which did not appear as if it would reasonably be repaid. Then I was content to capitalize it. Even some of these might be subject to the criticism that we might not get the money back. The advances to the farm loan are capitalized; the advances under the housing act are capitalized; the advances to the Canadian National Railways, otherwise than for deficit are capitalized. Our public buildings are not capitalized. Our Municipal Improvements Assistance Act is capitalized because we have the obligation to repay from those who received that money. That is proper and sound, but we have not capitalized expenditures on public buildings.

In answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I might say that if we started capitalizing expenditures on public buildings and improvements of various kinds, it would be desirable to set up this kind of sinking fund provision in connection therewith and vote the instalment each year. That is what I am trying to start in this connection. It seemed a good place to start, on the defence expenditures, and the house will have before it each year what represents one-tenth of the total amount capitalized, which must be provided each year in order to keep up the retirements.

Mr. MacNEIL: I want to be clear as to the method by which parliament controls commitments. I understand that with regard to housing enactments, parliament provides by statute from time to time an outside sum for housing purposes. In what respect will parliament obtain knowledge with regard to commitments made, apart from the amounts actually appearing in the annual estimates?

Mr. DUNNING: It can only be done on each item when each minister is putting through his estimates. For instance, look at page 136 of the estimates, where you will see the following item:

Training of pilots (equipment and properties) —Capital stores and equipment—
New aircraft and engines (commitments $441,840), $1,933,160.
Aircraft spares for stock (commitments $200,000), $115,000.

The advance commitments are there shown. I do not want to lay it down as a principle that can be always followed, that you can definitely say what your advance commitments are; but that is the method of advising parliament as to what is involved in regard to commitments for future years.

Mr. CAHAN: This information is interesting; but unless parliament has authorized commitments, future payments in respect of those or any unauthorized commitments are entirely within the discretion of parliament, and when the time comes for payment, parliament must authorize the expenditure. Otherwise the contractor has to depend upon the personal promises of members of a government, which are usually effective but which are, at times, not of very much value.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Could we just get this clear from the Minister of Finance. For instance, on page 135 of the estimates I find the following:

Air Force Stores—Capital—
Aircraft and engines (commitments, $2,350,000), $8,876,848.

What is the explanation of that?

Mr. DUNNING: That is very clear. The total vote for aircraft and engines for this year is $8,876,000; but what is contemplated within that limit also involves commitments of $2,350,000 for future years. Does my hon. friend get it now?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Out of the $8,000,000?

Mr. DUNNING: No, in addition to the $8,000,000, but which cannot be expended in the year for which the $8,000,000 is asked because there are payments due under contracts which will not mature within the year, but which parliament ought to know about.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): And which will be authorized in future estimates?

Mr. DUNNING: Surely.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—Amortization of sums issued out of consolidated revenue fund for capital expenditures.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. MacNEIL: Why should it be necessary to have a separate financing plan for this department?

Mr. DUNNING: I spent ten minutes trying to explain that in a sense I am using the Department of National Defence as a guinea pig for experiment in connection with something which I believe would be desirable to extend much further in connection with capital commitments.

Mr. CAHAN: As a capital experiment.

Section agreed to.

Section 19 agreed to.

On section 7—Maximum net profit.

Mr. LAWSON: My recollection is that the last time this section was under discussion it was made pretty clear to the committee that this bill would apply only to a very limited, or should I say merely a limited, number of contracts.

Mr. CAHAN: This section?

Mr. LAWSON: This section and the bill as well, as a matter of fact, because you have to link section 7 to section 4 and section 2 (b). My recollection is that the minister was going to try to give us an estimate as to the number of contracts in respect of which there would be invited tenders, the number that would be advertised for public tender, and the number that would come under the provisions of this section.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The taxation provisions apply to a specific form of contract; that is, under section 7 of the bill.

Mr. LAWSON: I am sorry; I did not quite follow that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The taxation provisions of the bill apply to section 7; that is, to contracts which cannot be let under the system of competition by public tender, or with the amendment we passed this afternoon.

Mr. LAWSON: Yes; we are agreed on that, but the minister was going to try to give us an estimate as to what percentage of the whole expenditure of the department would be affected by this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My recollection is that it was about fifteen per cent, as far as we could ascertain it.

Mr. LAWSON: Fifteen per cent of all contracts?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): For the last two years.

Mr. LAWSON: Fifteen per cent would come within the limitation of this five per cent profit?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is that fifteen per cent of the contracts or fifteen per cent of the value of the contracts?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Fifteen per cent of the value of the contracts.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): How many actual contracts would have come under this provision, since this government has been in office?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The total number for 1938-39, up to the end of December, 1938, amounting to more than $5,000 was 246.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): As compared with what total?

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps while this information is being looked up I might point out to my hon. friend who asked the question that it is of doubtful importance in relation to what we have to look forward to under this method of dealing with purchases. It will be apparent on reflection that if the board which is to be set up is dissatisfied with the competition which results from the tender method, or if it believes for any reason that there has been collusion between the tenderers, or that prices are out of line, the board undoubtedly has the right to refuse to accept any tender and throw the contract back under the form of contract contemplated by the taxation provisions of section 7 of the bill. My hon. friend will recognize the importance of that fact.

Mr. MacNEIL: If it is not an ordinary commodity, one specially required for defence purposes, and subsequently this article is sold for less than the price quoted to the government, will the board have power to act and reduce the price paid by the government?

Mr. DUNNING: If I understand the question aright it means would the government repudiate a contract into which it had entered. Of course there is only one answer to that question. If the contract was arrived at by virtue of competitive tenders then it is obvious that the terms of the contract, whatever they were, would have to be carried out. As I indicated a moment ago, if the board has any idea that it is being overcharged by tenderers in connection with any commodity it can always insist on putting the business under this section, under which there is no doubt that profits are limited to five per cent on the capital employed. I hope I have made that clear.

Mr. LAWSON: I think the minister has made it perfectly clear that the board has power to do something if it so desires, but that is a little beside the point that my hon. friend had in mind and that I also had in mind in seeking this information the last time the bill was up for consideration. The point at issue, in its final analysis, is this: I had the impression, rightly or wrongly, when this bill was brought into the house following the discussion on the resolution that in future all profits in respect of the manufacture of defence material were to be limited to five per cent. I soon discovered I was in error, that there was one exception, namely where public tenders were advertised. Then I discovered there was another, namely where there were invited tenders. The minister will realize that when we except all contracts called for by public or invited tender or all contracts limited to a small number of contractors or groups, the measure is made very ineffective from the point of view of the limitation to five per cent of the profits on defence materials. As the minister has quite frankly told us, the most that is accomplished is to limit the application of this provision to fifteen per cent of all purchases. That is the point at issue, and I think the minister's statement is hardly a complete answer.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend will realize that many of the materials required by the Department of National Defence are used by the general public. Competition by way of tender or invited bids is real, because there is a known standard or approximate standard of price.

Mr. LAWSON: Quite so.

Mr. DUNNING: I wish only to make clear that in my opinion the tendency of the legislation is, first, to tend to force competitive bidding.

Mr. LAWSON: Which I think is a good thing.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. Second, it places a powerful weapon in the hands of the purchasing authority in that if competitive bidding is not satisfactory from the point of view of prices, there is another way out which is difficult of operation but which, nevertheless, definitely limits profit. I think it would be quite impossible to work out a limitation of profits scheme to apply on everything the department buys. I believe we must rely upon competition in respect of many commodities which are in general use. And of course if—God forbid—war should come and we have to consider the results of war inflation of one kind and another, outside of this measure altogether we shall have to evolve schemes for profit control which will apply not only on purchases by the Department of National Defence. I think there is no doubt we would come to that.

What we are trying to do here to to place a businesslike piece of machinery in the hands of a purchasing organization which will ensure first the maximum encouragement to competition, and, second, if competition proves to be impossible, a control of the profits of those who are doing the work. I think the bill is soundly conceived from that point of view. I know it is being criticized as being a very radical piece of legislation, the most drastic of its kind to be placed on the statute book of any democratic country. But I believe it will work. I believe it will encourage a maximum of competition, which, after all, is the best means of getting a reasonable price for commodities purchased. If the board is able to show to the government that there has been collusion, that the price level is too high and that profiteering is going to result, they can turn back to the method contemplated by section 7, and have it done on the basis of a five per cent return on capital.

Mr. CAHAN: I may be in error, but I find it extremely difficult to follow the provisions of the bill. In any case, if a contract for not less than $5,000 is awarded without competition, it would come under the provisions of section 7, would it not?

Mr. DUNNING: No, only if it were more than $5,000.

Mr. CAHAN: I understand. Suppose a contract were for $5,500, or $6,000, or some such sum, does the hon. member think any contractor would accept a contract of that kind if, as is set forth in the subsections of section 7, there must be an examination of all his books to find out what capital has been involved in producing goods to the value of $5,500? I find these words in paragraph (a) of subsection 3:

> The board may take into account in determining capital employed in the performance of a contract actual cash outlays incurred in the acquisition of patents, or licences to manufacture, but not goodwill—

And so on. That is, a contract for $6,000 would involve a possible profit of $300.

Mr. DUNNING: The five per cent is not on the contract; it is on the capital employed.

Mr. CAHAN: But that is even more nonsensical. I am taking into consideration the cost of producing the article, as such costs are found in a well equipped factory in which accounts are segregated and audited. But the profit obtained is not likely to be more than $300. To carry out the inquiry, the board must have production of all these accounts and ascertain how much capital is involved in the production of a $6,000 contract by a company capitalized at many millions of dollars. This inquiry would cost more than the amount represented by the entire profit. It strikes me that some other method might be used. No competent factory will take work on that basis, and unless the government takes over the factory and forces the manufacturer to do the work, it certainly will not be done.

Mr. DUNNING: Can my hon. friend conceive of articles costing $6,000 for which it would be impossible to secure competitive tenders? I mean to say that expenditures as small as that undoubtedly will fall within the class for which it is possible to get a tender. Therefore the taxation provisions of section 7 would not apply. The difficulties arise in connection with large expenditures for expensive equipment for which it is not possible or practicable to get competitive tenders. Theoretically what my hon. friend says is quite correct, but as a practical matter I do not think it is.

Mr. CAHAN: I suggest that we deal with realities and not with absurd possibilities such as those I have suggested. I can understand that in connection with a certain contract it may be impossible to obtain tenders. I doubt very much whether there are many contracts to be awarded by the Department of National Defence for which tenders could not be obtained, if the specifications and regulations respecting the contract are clear, and if reasonable opportunity is given to factories to examine the conditions and specifications and prepare the estimates on which they are ready to proceed. I saw tens of millions of dollars worth of contracts placed in the United States and Canada during the war, and I have never yet seen a contract for munitions which could not be filled by tenders from those factories which were well equipped for ordinary mechanical production. Should not the minister reserve section 8 to see if it could not be simplified in some way in order to deal with realities?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I believe the people of Canada as a whole will be disappointed when they realize the full implication of this section. When the minister spoke the other day, he referred to this as being a drastic measure, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) used the same words just a few moments ago. I think most of us welcomed the first announcement by the minister that there would be a five per cent limitation upon profits made from munitions manufacture, but we now realize that if the ratio which existed in the past continues in the future this limitation will apply to only about fifteen per cent of the total value of contracts let by the Department of National Defence. We must realize that there are three kinds of contracts which will be let by the department. First, there will be those called for by public tender. Second, there will be contracts let as a result of certain selected companies being asked to tender. Third, there will be contracts which will be given to companies who have been asked to enter into negotiation with the government. The first two categories cover eighty-five per cent of the value of contracts let by the department up to the present time, and they will not come under this five per cent limitation. Only fifteen per cent—and the percentage may grow smaller—will be subject to the five per cent profit limitation. It seems to me that this clause in section 7 is the joker in the bill because it nullifies to a large degree the value of the whole principle of profit limitation. Just the other day I came across a United States paper containing a cartoon which, at first glance, made me proud. This cartoon showed Uncle Sam sitting at a desk, while a United States taxpayer was showing him a sheet of paper and asking him, "Have you seen this, uncle?" That sheet of paper showed that Canada intended to limit profits on munitions contracts to five per cent. I was quite proud of that cartoon except that I knew, what apparently the person who drew the cartoon did not know, that the cartoon should have said that only fifteen per cent of the value of the contracts let would be under this limitation.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member would have been wrong also.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): And that percentage may grow smaller. As the Minister of Finance said a few moments ago, the tendency is toward public tendering.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does my hon. friend realize that under public tenders the profit may be less than five per cent?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Then there would be no harm in extending this five per cent limitation to all contracts.

Mr. DUNNING: Except that to apply it to all would cost a great deal more than the five per cent. As the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) pointed out, we would need another Department of Finance in order to make it work.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I agree that public tendering will tend to keep down profits to a fairly reasonable level. As the minister said, there are certain staple products which can be obtained by public tender, but that would not apply to the same extent to selected companies. The government may require aeroplane engines or some specialized product which is manufactured only by three or four or half a dozen companies.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has the hon. member before him a copy of the amendment passed this afternoon to subsection 4 of section 4, dealing with that very point?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): To my mind that does not cover it, although it does give the board certain power to act when it thinks there is collusion. But I am not talking about collusion; I am talking about where there are only three or four companies manufacturing a certain specialized article. In such instances, there would not be the same element of competition which would be present in public tendering. It is possible for tremendous profits to be made under these circumstances.

Mr. DUNNING: I dealt with that a moment ago. When the board sees that the element of competition has not been effective in bringing about a fair price level, it will be able to say, "No, gentlemen, there are only two or three of you manufacturing this particular specialty; apparently you have got together and are going to charge us so much, but we are not going to accept your tenders, we are going to give the business under the terms of section 7, on a five per cent profit basis." Surely my hon. friend sees the weapon that this gives to the board. I am quite sure that if he and I are here in a year or two, he will be wanting to know from me just how far the board has gone in preventing abuses of the tendering method. My view is that this gives to a board made up of men who are conscientiously trying to buy as cheaply as possible, a weapon which will ensure that there will be no collusion between a few producers of a specialty article.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I agree with the minister up to that point, but I want to see this profit limitation section being used for more than merely a weapon.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member should remember that there is such a thing as income tax. There will be no profits on munitions if new income taxes are levied.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): They did very well in the past.

Mr. CAHAN: Greater profits were made in the production of wheat during the last war than in the production of munitions.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Some of the armament firms were a long way from going broke.

Mr. CAHAN: Very few of them made money here.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): This provision should be extended to cover the selected companies as well as the chosen companies, if we may use that phrase. Then the bill would be made much stronger, and the people of Canada would be assured that under the present basis at least forty per cent of the total value of munitions contracts would come under this limitation.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will make a concrete suggestion as to how to make that work, we shall gladly consider it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I made a suggestion to the Minister of National Defence the other evening, and I shall make it again to the Minister of Finance. Paragraph (a) of subsection 9 of section 7 reads:

Contracts awarded as a result of competitive tender or subcontracts in connection therewith.

I suggest that that clause should be changed to read:

Contracts awarded as a result of public tender.

Then the only contracts to which this limitation would not apply would be those let by public tender.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think my hon. friend has misconstrued the effect of the amendment to subsection 4 of section 4, which I think meets the point he has raised. It has practically abolished selective lists except where for purposes of military secrecy it is necessary for the board to grant a particular type of contract. The point my hon. friend raised the other day was one of the reasons for drafting this amendment practically abolishing selected lists. There are only two classes of contract now: those by general tender and special contracts covered by the five per cent provision which are specially looked after under the provisions of this legislation. So my hon. friend's fears about the selected lists can be forgotten.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I have not a copy of the amendment before me, but I listened carefully when it was being read and I was not aware that it had that full effect. Does the minister mean to say that there will be no selected tenderers from now on?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I read the amendment again:

That subsection 4 of section 4 of the bill be amended by adding thereto after the word "otherwise" in line 41 of page three the following words, "it shall be the duty of the board—

It is obligatory.

"—to ensure that tenders in respect of any contracts for the purchase of any defence equipment produced or manufactured in Canada or for the construction of any defence project are invited from every person in Canada believed by the board to be capable of performing the contract, unless—

This is the only proviso:

"—for reasons of military secrecy or for other good and sufficient reasons the board is of the opinion that it is not in the public interest to invite tenders in this way."

So for the purposes of this legislation the objection of my hon. friend disappears.

Mr. MacNEIL: It is still possible, even with that amendment, for the board to decide to ask for tenders from within a limited field, and if tenders are invited from within a limited field in that way, the five per cent limitation will not apply. There is still that category to which this five per cent limitation will not apply.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes; discretionary power is vested in the board to deal otherwise for reasons of military secrecy or for other good and sufficient reasons, but their first duty is to invite tenders from everybody capable of tendering.

Mr. MacNEIL: The position has been made very clear with regard to commodities in general use, but we must contemplate articles being required for which this government and possibly other governments are the only purchasers. This point was referred to in the report of the committee presided over by Doctor Skelton, and I understand that their report suggested various methods of control with regard to such contracts. If the government contemplates the purchase of an article for which they and possibly other governments constitute the only market in Canada, and tenders are invited from within a limited field, it seems to me that further control should be exercised with regard to that particular type of contract. That is why I suggested to the Minister of Finance that it might be feasible to have in such contracts a penalty clause providing that after the contract is made and the order placed with a particular firm, if it sells this particular article to other governments at a lower price than that quoted the Canadian government—

Mr. DUNNING: I did not understand the suggestion before.

Mr. MacNEIL: —the government should have power to secure redress in that regard.

Mr. DUNNING: That suggestion is excellent. It is in some contracts to-day. It is a good suggestion as a general principle.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The amendment which the Minister of National Defence has read does not, I think, remove the selected lists of tenderers. It merely provides that all persons who are capable of manufacturing a particular article shall be invited to tender, to make sure that there will not be a restricted list. But subsection 4 provides:

> In respect of all contracts, the board shall, wherever practicable, invite tenders either by means of advertisements in the public press or otherwise.

Then it goes on to say that the selected list must be a wide list. I cannot accept the minister's statement that the amendment removes the selected list.

Mr. DUNNING: If it is known to everybody that there are only ten producers of a given article in Canada, what would be the use of putting in all the press a public advertisement inviting tenders from them? All we can do is to ensure that we get all those producing an article to compete in supplying the department. Any other method of inviting public tenders through the press would be very expensive and utterly useless.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am not suggesting that. I am simply pointing out that the Minister of National Defence is hardly correct in saying that his amendment removes the selected lists. It merely ensures tenders from all of them, but there are still the three classes of contract.

Mr. MacNEIL: I think this second group should be dealt with by the five per cent limitation.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member puts on it an interpretation that I cannot see at all.

Mr. MacNEIL: Where manufacturers of a particular article have formed one common agency and are pooling their resources with regard to filling a munitions contract, how would you deal with it? You might answer, invite all those engaged in the field to tender. But it may be quite obvious that they are in agreement as to how they will deal with government business, and therefore competition would not enter in that event. I could refer to a specific instance. What, then, is the objection to putting some form of profit limitation in such contracts?

Mr. DUNNING: In just what form? How can you express it?

Mr. MacNEIL: By another five per cent limitation where tenders are invited from a limited field, and where for obvious reasons they combine and pool their resources to deal with government business, and therefore have control of prices. There is no competition there, and why should not those in that category be subjected to the five per cent limitation?

Mr. DUNNING: If their resources are pooled, that results in only one tender, does it not? Quite obviously the awarding of business could not in such instances be by competitive tender. Under the bill as it at present stands, a situation like that would undoubtedly result in a resort to the five per cent control clause as the only clause. Has my hon. friend given full weight to the statement I made a little while ago as to the weapon which this places in the hands of the board to ensure that competition is honest competition? What my hon. friend is after, and what I am after, is to ensure that competition is honest competition, and not collusion for the purpose of extortionate profits. I am going to proceed on the assumption that the men on the board will be both honest and able. I believe they will be as honest as the hon. member for Vancouver North or myself. I believe that they will endeavour honestly to buy supplies for the Department of National Defence as cheaply as they can. Now then, have we put into their hands sufficient in the way of authority, sufficient in the way of weapons, if you will, to enable them to accomplish their object? I can say this, that if one year from now it turns out that we have not, we shall be prepared to come back and strengthen the legislation. But I am not prepared to write into the law a lot of theoretical stuff which will prevent it from functioning at all.

Mr. CAHAN: You are doing it pretty well.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend thinks we have gone too far in that direction already, and perhaps others do. At any rate this is an honest effort to put into force what I described a little while ago as the most drastic method of profits control yet devised anywhere, so far as I know, in connection with the purchases of war material.

Mr. CAHAN: I do think that part of section 7 might be reconsidered. I should like to have some expert cost accountant look over that section, and in four or five lines draft what is really intended by the bill. I think we all know what is intended, that the manufacturer, when manufacturing a product worth $5,000 or more, receives the actual cost of competent, effective production. It is upon that cost of effective production that his profit should be based, that is, something over and above the actual cost of competent, efficient production. I do not know, but I think that I could sit down with the minister and draft a clause more clear and concise and definite. Instead of the promise which the minister has just made, if he would make a promise that next year he will introduce an amendment to this section which would be clear, definite, sensible and businesslike, I should be better pleased. To my mind it is not equitable, and I do not think that it will work in the case of men honestly engaged in the production of war munitions or other products.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I seek one little item of information? If a contractor's price is too high, and the board decides to apply the provisions of section 7, what is the next step?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not understand what my hon. friend means by "the next step."

Mr. GRAYDON: If the provisions of section 7 are applied, relative to the five per cent maximum profit, what is the next step the board must take with regard to that contract? You cannot force a bidder to take the contract.

Mr. DUNNING: No. My hon. friend assumes a situation that I referred to a few moments ago, as something which possibly might happen. Tenders are received, and they are all, in the opinion of the board, outrageously too high. They are thrown out. The board then starts afresh to find a contractor who will produce the item under the provisions of section 7.

Mr. MacNEIL: One point which concerns me very much in discussing this bill is as to what extent it restricts the operations of middlemen or agencies. That was the great difficulty with regard to the last war. The prime minister of the day had to deal very sternly with those who attached themselves to the Department of Militia and acted as middlemen for manufacturers or groups of manufacturers. Should there not be a provision here that wherever possible the department or the board should deal direct with the manufacturer? I notice that the minister denied an allegation which recently appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press, that Mr. Ross, of Montreal, had established an agency in Canada for a type of aircraft engine specified by the department, and it is stated that commissions had been collected or may be collected up to $180,000 or possibly $250,000. I will not go into that at length, because the minister has denied it. He may desire to comment on it at this time. But the allegations are rather serious. In the light of that statement, made by a responsible writer, in the Winnipeg Free Press, should there not be included in this bill some specific reference to the operations of middlemen such as are now collecting, it is claimed, huge sums from the department, and have nothing to do with the direct production of material?

Mr. POWER: Can the hon. member not dig up any more garbage somewhere?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am very glad that my hon. friend has brought up the article. I want to quote one or two extracts from it to show that it is absolutely similar to other falsehoods which have been spread recently with regard to the department.

The writer says:

> Towards the end of 1936 the Minister of National Defence decided that only Bristol engines would be installed in the aircraft purchased for the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Again he says:

> The decision of the minister of defence to enforce the installation of the Bristol engine in all aircraft purchased for the Royal Canadian Air Force must have been founded on good reasons which he has not since divulged.

The fact is that the minister made no such decision. The Royal Canadian Air Force is using nineteen different types of engines, only four of which are made by the Bristol Engine Company. The minister could not possibly make any such decision, since the type of engine depends upon the type of aeroplane used. If the minister or anybody else in the department were to order a certain type of engine to be installed in an aeroplane designed for a different type of engine, in all probability the aeroplane would not fly. When the air force adopts a certain type of aeroplane it has to use the engine for which the air frame was designed.

Again the writer says:

> The use of the Bristol . . . was almost exclusively in aircraft which operated rarely in climates similar to that seasonably prevalent in Canada. United States experts question whether it has been tested sufficiently for service in these colder climates.

The fact is that aircraft powered with Bristol engines have been thoroughly tested in Canada during the winter season for the past three years, and the results have been completely satisfactory. This writer to which my hon. friend referred also says:

> The Bristol company sent a representative to Canada in 1936 to inquire into possible agencies, but the Bristol company was suddenly advised that that gentleman had closed a contract after seeing the ministry of defence, who had agreed that the agency for the Bristol should be given to Frank Ross, of Montreal, and his associates.

The fact is that the Bristol company selected this agent in Canada more than ten years ago, and that for the purpose of carrying on the agency a company was incorporated on July 5, 1928. The same interests which owned that company have from that date until now conducted all and any Bristol business in Canada. The Canadian company, I am informed, has thirty-three shareholders, and no one interest has more than ten per cent of the shares of the company.

The writer further says:

> Two other aero engines comparable with the Bristol and actually manufactured in Canada have for years been used in Canadian aircraft, military as well as civil. One of these makes of engines powered the high altitude "Flying Fortress" built by Boeings and turned over to the United States army air corps only two weeks ago. . . . The Bristol engine costs around $12,000. The comparable engines made in Canada, giving employment in Canada, cost some $4,000 less than the Bristol. Purchases of either of these Canadian aero engines of comparable merit with the Bristol would have saved the people of Canada $630,000 on the order of 150 engines.

The fact, Mr. Chairman, is that, with the exception of an experimental effort made by the Canada Car Company within the last year and a half on a light engine, no aeroplane engines are manufactured in the Dominion of Canada. That is the type of falsehood with which we are confronted in these public comments.

The United States-built "flying fortress" is powered by a Cyclone engine, a type which is made in the United States, but not in Canada. Only the number of Bristol engines required to power and provide spares for the aircraft which are designed around the Bristol engines have been or will be purchased. Some engines have been purchased in advance of delivery of the aircraft in which they are to be installed, upon the recommendation of the technical officials of the department, in order to have a reserve, without risk of cancellation due to emergency conditions in the country of manufacture. The department is carrying only twenty-five per cent of spare engines whereas during the war it was found necessary to carry 200 per cent and 300 per cent of spares.

There is no commission at all paid by the Department of National Defence. Any arrangement made by the agency in question is made direct with the Bristol Engine Company in England, and the prices paid, excepting Canadian sales tax and freight charges and so forth, are exactly the same prices as are quoted to the air ministry in London.

All I can say, Mr. Chairman, is that the writer of this scurrilous article is the same gentleman who wrote a former article which the honorary air advisory committee of Canada repudiated and condemned, through Air Marshal Bishop and his associates on the committee, as false and scurrilous and fictitious.

Mr. MacNEIL: May I ask the minister why it is necessary in this instance to have an agency in Canada? Would it not be possible to deal direct with the manufacturers of these particular aircraft engines? The returns tabled recently show that the department is purchasing rifles from the Enfield rifle factory in Great Britain without an intermediary of any kind. The servicing of the rifles and things of that nature can be undertaken within the department. Would it not be possible to deal directly with the manufacturer of these engines instead of through the Canadian agency, and undertake the servicing necessary under the auspices of the department?

Mr. DUNNING: We are getting an awful lot of this apparently deliberate attempt to sabotage public confidence in the department,—

Mr. MacNEIL: I am asking a question.

Mr. DUNNING: —these strings of lies which my hon. friend has quoted in his statement.

Mr. MacNEIL: I merely asked a question.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not now criticizing my hon. friend; I am trying to answer him. I just rise to remark that I am wondering if it is not desirable that we take some rather strong measures with respect to such statements as the minister has just referred to, which cannot do otherwise than weaken the confidence of the Canadian people not only in their government but in the institution of government as such. If there was even a scintilla of truth in them, why, then, we ought to be out. What should be done to a man who scatters that kind of garbage through the press of the country at a time like this? I feel very strongly about it.

As to my hon. friend's last question, the minister has just said plainly that the particular engine to which reference is made is sold to the British government at exactly the same price as it is sold to the Canadian government after making allowance for sales tax and freight. If that is so, of what importance is it to us whether the aircraft engine manufacturer in England chooses to have a Canadian agent to run his business?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is none of our business.

Mr. DUNNING: It is our business merely to get a fair price. The way in which the manufacturer does his business is no concern of ours so long as we get a fair price; and, as the minister pointed out, this particular concern appointed agents in Canada as long ago as 1928 and have the same agents to-day. Should we take the view that we would not buy their goods because they had a Canadian agent? From my point of view, I prefer to see people abroad, doing business in Canada, operate through Canadian concerns. I believe it is good business for Canada, provided always that we do not get stuck on the price as a result; and in this instance, as the minister stated, the price at which we get the goods is the same as the price paid by the British government in England, after making allowance for sales tax and freight.

Mr. COLDWELL: About which there has been a good deal of controversy in Great Britain. Perhaps the British government is paying too much for these aeroplanes.

Mr. HOWE: We value your opinion on that.

Mr. COLDWELL: I said perhaps; I do not know.

An hon. MEMBER: "Perhaps."

Mr. DUNNING: There is too much "perhaps."

Mr. MARTIN: Why say these things?

Mr. POWER: Why not have the courage to say what you mean?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. COLDWELL: When a commission is paid to Canadian firms and we could obtain the articles without having to pay the commission, we ought to buy them without that commission. With regard to what has been said in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver North, it seems to me that there was an innuendo. When statements of the kind published in the Winnipeg Free Press appear in newspapers, I submit that the hon. member for Vancouver North, or anybody else, is justified in rising in his place and basing some questions upon such statements, coming from a newspaper which is known throughout Canada as a Liberal publication and a supporter of the government of the day, and the editor of which, as is pointed out, is on the Rowell commission.

Mr. GOLDING: Did the editor write the item?

Mr. COLDWELL: No, but the editor is on the Rowell commission, and the paper supports the government of which the minister is a member. While it is true that the editor does not write these articles, at the same time the editor does take responsibility for such articles as appear in his newspaper. Indeed, if an article appears and is libellous, the editor and publisher of the newspaper is sued, as well as the author. I do not think we need generate any heat about these things.

Mr. DUNNING: If men's honesty is being attacked one can expect them to resent it, and the Minister of National Defence has every right to resent it.

Mr. COLDWELL: I quite agree, but when it is said that attempts are made to sabotage the department, I know nothing of such attempts. We are not attempting anything of the kind, but we are trying to bring to the attention of the house matters in connection with the department, so that if later on it is important that the people of Canada should have every confidence in the department and what it is doing, we may be sure that confidence will be justified. I think we are fulfilling our function as a part of the opposition in trying to ensure this.

Mr. MARTIN: Does not the hon. gentleman think that, in view of the general discussion on these matters, and our desire to preserve the strength of this parliament, the hon. member for Vancouver North might have asked the minister his view of the article before getting up and making use of it in the house with the obvious inferences that follow from it?

Mr. COLDWELL: No, I do not think so, because the statement upon which the hon. member for Vancouver North based his question had been made publicly throughout Canada, and if I were minister of national defence I would welcome a question that would enable me to say what the Minister of National Defence said a few moments ago.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Are we dealing with the section clause by clause?

The CHAIRMAN: We are on subsection 1.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
