OFFICIAL REPORT

Tuesday, February 21, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

RADIO BROADCASTING

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher) presented the first report of the special committee on radio broadcasting, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MR. MANION

REPORT IN GLOBE AND MAIL OF SPEECH OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION ON FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 17

On the order for motions:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, something which I have rarely had to do in the number of years I have been in this house. On Friday last I spoke in this house on the trade treaty and in opening my remarks I made some reference to those who were continually lecturing us to get on with the business of the people. The Toronto Globe and Mail carried a report of that speech with a large heading which read, "Lecturing by Ballots Irks Manion," and further down they quote me as follows:

> Before he got well into his two-hour onslaught against the trade treaty the opposition leader declared his annoyance with the flood of ballots which has deluged parliament hill for the past week.

That statement is an absolute misrepresentation of the facts. I wish to state definitely and positively that I did not refer to those sending ballots, in any shape, manner or form. Hansard will bear me out in this. I was referring to certain editorials that had been written during the discussion on the Bren gun affair and to a few letters which some of us had received, the editorials and letters suggesting that we were not dealing with the business of the house. In view of the fact that I had not mentioned those who sent ballots, indeed did not have them in mind in any shape or form, on Sunday morning at eleven o'clock I sent the following telegram to the office of the Globe and Mail:

> Statement front page Saturday's Globe and Mail that I expressed resentment against sending here of ballots absolutely untrue. I did not mention or refer to ballots or their senders in my speech and they were not in my mind in the remotest manner in my remarks. Please make correction.

I checked up and I found that that telegram was telephoned to the Globe and Mail at 11.38 a.m. on Sunday, and was delivered at the office of the Globe and Mail at 3.30 p.m. on Sunday. I had hoped that the Globe and Mail would itself make the correction, but as it has not done so and as I have been advised that some of those who sent in ballots took this as an affront to them, I am therefore making this correction and trust that the Globe and Mail will carry it with the same prominence as it did the misinformation; for I have every respect for the sincerity of purpose of the senders of the ballots.

STANDING COMMITTEES

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—CHANGE OF PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

> That the name of Mr. Stirling be substituted for that of Mr. Casselman on the standing committee on public accounts.
> That the name of Mr. Brown be substituted for that of Mr. Graydon on the standing committee on public accounts.
> That the name of Mr. Green be substituted for that of Mr. Church on the standing committee on public accounts.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

RESIGNATION OF JAMES Y. MURDOCH FROM BOARD OF DIRECTORS

On the order for motions:

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): At the last sitting of the house the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) asked me a question with reference to the resignation of Mr. Murdoch as a director of the Canadian National Railways. I replied briefly then. I am tabling all the correspondence exchanged between Mr. Murdoch and myself, and in doing so I might say that the difference between Mr. Murdoch and his fellow-directors had reference to the reappointment of Mr. Hungerford as president of the railway for a further term. Yesterday at a meeting of the remaining directors Mr. Hungerford was unanimously recommended for further appointment.

CIVIL SERVICE

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO TERMS AND OPERATION OF SUPERANNUATION ACT

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved:

That a select special committee of the house consisting of Messrs. Anderson, Baker, Blanchette, Bradette, Davidson, Dunning, Francœur, Hansell, Heaps, Hill, Lockhart, McCann, McLean (Melfort), Mallette, Mutch, Pottier, Wood, be appointed to inquire into the terms and operation of the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and all matters pertaining thereto, with power to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath, to consider evidence taken at the last session of parliament before a select special committee of the house on the same subject matter, and to report from time to time, and that standing order 65 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO OPERATION OF CIVIL SERVICE ACT

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved:

That a select special committee of the House be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Civil Service Act, and all matters pertaining thereto, with power to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath, and to report from time to time;

And that standing order 65 be suspended in relation thereto, and that the select special committee shall consist of twenty-five members and the following be appointed members of the said committee: Messrs. Barber, Boulanger, Clark (York-Sunbury), Cleaver, Deachman, Fournier (Hull), Glen, Golding, Hartigan, Hyndman, Jean, Lacroix (Quebec-Montmorency), Lennard, MacInnis, MacNeil, McNiven (Regina City), Marshall, Mulock, O'Neill, Poole, Pouliot, Spence, Tomlinson, Tucker, Wermenlinger.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, the civil service committee last year carried on its arduous work without the slightest trace of political partisanship. I see the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) laughing. He said once that that committee was like a circus. He could have been the circus and every other member of the committee could have been the manager.

The chairman of the civil service commission, speaking of the committee of last year, said:

This committee has gathered more information than ever before.

There are three branches of the civil service commission: The organization branch, the examination branch and the assignment branch.

With regard, first, to the organization branch, Mr. Putnam, the chief organizer, said once that it was composed of self-taught men.

I will now give the duties of each one of these branches, according to a chart which was tabled before the committee, and which was included in report No. 15:

Organization Branch

Functions: To investigate and report on the organization, personnel establishment and procedure of departments and the classification of all positions in the service, rates of compensation and allowances, and maintain the classification and official classification files. To investigate all proposals for more staff and to check as to need, requisitions for the filling of vacant positions.

Examination Branch

Functions: To examine applicants for entrance to and promotion in the public service; to select and list eligibles in order of merit; to maintain examination records.

Assignment Branch

Functions: To make assignments from eligible lists; to maintain eligible lists in order and up to date; to notify appointees and departments of temporary and permanent assignments and to issue certificates of appointment; to issue extension of temporary certificates as authorized.

That is the designated work of the three chief branches of the civil service commission. There is another branch, administrative and personnel services, with which I shall not deal at the present time.

A distinction should be made between the oral and the documentary evidence which appeared in the committee's report.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask what has all this to do with the appointment of the committee?

Mr. POULIOT: Wait and see.

Mr. HEAPS: I will wait.

Mr. POULIOT: As I said, Mr. Speaker, a distinction should be made between the oral and the documentary evidence of the committee last year. The documentary evidence comprises the final report of the committee and includes a very interesting statement given by Sir Francis Floud; a speech by Lord Stamp which was not included in the report but which the committee was authorized to print, regarding the civil service in British industry; the minutes of the civil service commission, and an index of those minutes; a report on civil servants sixty-five or over; a submission by the professional institute; some data of the treasury board, and data on the personnel of the civil service commission.

I must congratulate the government on having superannuated two people, one of them who was supreme in the civil service commission and without whose recommendation no report of the chief of the organization branch could be considered, no report from any examiner in charge could be considered, and no promotion could be awarded. Those powers were found exorbitant by the last committee.

President Roosevelt in a recent letter to Mr. Justice Reed of the Supreme Court of the United States, who is the head of a committee appointed by the president to study methods of improving government personnel and efficiency of the civil service—I am quoting from the Times of Sunday last—after explaining that he was sorry he was away at the time the committee opened its sittings, said:

> I should not have asked men with your responsibilities in other fields of government and business to undertake this study if I did not deem it of vital importance to the nation.
> The growing complexities of modern government require the development of a trained personnel of men and women of outstanding ability, resourcefulness and breadth of mind willing to devote their lives to the public service.
> Upon the development of such a personnel the future of our democracy may in no small measure depend.

That committee includes Attorney General Frank Murphy and Associate Justice Felix Frankfurter.

I do not wish to go further without mentioning that the government should be congratulated upon having superannuated and taken out of the service a man—a high-standing official,—who was guilty of dirty favouritism.

Now with regard to the documentary evidence already mentioned, if some hon. members object to the publication of the oral evidence they cannot object to the publication of the documentary evidence for the perusal of members of the committee and of members of the House of Commons. I wonder whether hon. members of this house realize what is the amount paid to dominion civil servants. According to a report published by the Bureau of Statistics in 1935, in 1931-32 the amount paid to dominion civil servants was $92,590,000. Of course it was a little less years afterwards. At that time the number of civil servants mentioned in that report was only 44,000. I have been in communication with a very able official of the Department of Finance, Mr. W. C. Ronson, who is assistant deputy minister, and who amongst the people who have foggy minds is one of the few who has a clear mind; he did exceptionally bright work, and I told him that I would commend him to his minister, but is it not much better to commend his work to the house? I obtained some very interesting information from him with regard to the number of civil servants. The total on April 1, 1937, was 57,426. Of them, 40,523 were Canadians, 13,474 from the British Isles, 512 from the British possessions, 451 from the United States, 1,068 from Europe, 95 from elsewhere, and 303 not stated. I wish to draw the attention of the house to the fact that in 1932 there were 44,000 civil servants, and now there are more than 57,000.

Mr. MacNEIL: What is the total payroll?

Mr. POULIOT: I may give it later. A few years ago it was $92,000,000, but it must be more now.

A very interesting editorial was published by Mr. Charles Lynch, then president of the parliamentary press gallery, in the Civil Service Review of September 30, 1938, expressing views which were shared by the officers of the civil service associations. The council of the professional institute met early in February, and according to the Ottawa Citizen of February 6, 1939, they said:

> Concerning the recommendation for rating of employees by a board of three department officers, doubt was expressed that ratings could be established by anyone other than individuals closely concerned with the work of the employee.

This was suggested to the Civil Service Associations when they appeared before the committee, and they agreed to that; and also Mr. Nelson, the chief examiner of the commission, agreed with it. In the Legionary of January, 1938, I read that Major Bowler, who represented the Canadian Legion before the committee, and was accompanied by Mr. J. C. G. Herwig, assistant general secretary of the dominion command,— > —received an extremely courteous hearing from the chairman, Mr. J. F. Pouliot (Lib., Temiscouata), and the members of the committee, several of whom are themselves ex-service men and fully familiar with the problem.

During the recess I asked some questions of the chairman of the civil service commission. He has answered some of them, but did not answer them all. I am told that he has forwarded to the government a memorandum to the effect that the civil service commission has already implemented most of the unanimous recommendations of the committee last year—which of course is untrue: the commission has made very little progress since the last sitting of the committee.

Here is a point of which hon. members should be informed. In spite of the arduous work of all members of the committee, without exception, some official of the professional institute used unparliamentary language in public about members of the House of Commons. I shall not read all that was said, but it appeared in the press; it appeared in the Ottawa Journal of November 29, 1938, as a front-page article, and it was also broadcast by the Canadian Press. The then president of the professional institute has sent a satisfactory apology and withdrawal of the language he used; so have other civil servants who belonged to the Department of Mines; another connected with the Department of Agriculture sent a withdrawal which was rather an apology and which may be considered in due course by the members of the committee if they think that is the thing to do; and another one has done nothing, because his minister was unwilling to act. The correspondence is confidential, but with the permission of the minister I will show it to hon. members concerned and they will do what they please with that.

We hear a lot about the merit system. Does the merit system really exist, or is it only a catchword? I have received from Mr. Bland, of the civil service commission, a list showing the number of the employees of the commission from 1908 until now. Here are some of the earlier figures:

Year	Number of employees
1910	10
1911	13
1912	20
1913	20
1914-15-16	17

At that time the civil service commission was not such a huge body as it is now.

Before giving the figures for succeeding years, may I say this. It might be interesting to hon. members to know what happened in the house in 1918 when a real merit system, as some hon. members believe in it, was brought into force. One must consider that at the time of the Union government there were some Conservatives and Liberals who did not know at all by how many Liberal and how many Conservative votes they had been elected. Therefore, of course, they did not know whom to reward by giving them positions in the civil service. Those prominent amongst the advocates of the merit system were: Mr. Justice Maclean, of the exchequer court, who was a prominent Liberal of Nova Scotia; the Hon. Newton Wesley Rowell, a former Liberal leader of Ontario, and Mr. Fred Pardee, who died a senator and who was the chief whip of the Liberal party in power and in opposition from 1909 until he supported the Union government. In Hansard of April 12, 1918, page 697, I find that Mr. A. K. Maclean, then acting minister of finance, spoke as follows:

> This reform could only be possible under present political conditions. Had my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) been returned to power, I have no doubt that he could not have inaugurated such a reform in the public service. Moreover, had the present Prime Minister been returned to power at the head of a Conservative government, it would have been impossible for him to institute such a reform as this.

Very interesting: the thing could not have been done by any party, but it could be done only by a unionist government. It was one of their accomplishments. To prove that it was one of their accomplishments may I quote the words of one of the most distinguished front benchers of the house, the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe).

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I rise to a point of order. If I understand aright the motion, it is to appoint a committee. What is being said may be very interesting indeed from the political point of view, but I cannot see how it can bear on a motion to appoint a certain committee to consider civil service matters.

Mr. POULIOT: Speaking to the point of order, we have only to see that the motion is for the appointment of a committee of the house "to inquire into the operation of the Civil Service Act, and all matters pertaining thereto, with power to call for persons," et cetera. It is the operation of the Civil Service Act that is being inquired into, and the foundation of the Civil Service Act is the merit system. Therefore I am perfectly in order in continuing to relate what happened in the past.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I ask for your ruling. Do we need to have the history of the Civil Service Act from time immemorial brought before the house on this occasion? I fail to see it, and I ask for your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am of the opinion that the hon. member is in order in the remarks he has been making. The motion is that a special committee of the house be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Civil Service Act, and all matters pertaining thereto, and I do not think that up to the present moment the hon. member has discussed any matters that are irrelevant to the motion. I would ask him, however, to confine what he has to say to such questions as are strictly within the scope of the motion.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not going to go as far back as the deluge, but as we are considering the operation of the Civil Service Act it is important to know what progress has been made during the past twenty years under the merit system.

I was about to quote from page 703 what the right hon. Minister of Justice, who was then a back-bencher, said:

Here we have an exemplification of the advantages of union government.

The so-called merit system was brought in by two kinds of individuals. There were the big manufacturers who wanted to make more money by showing their devotion to the empire, and also the Liberals who had supported the Union government, and the Conservatives as well, who were much embarrassed by patronage and had become in one day statesmen, not bothering about petty jobs. They did not want to reward anyone. They were thinking of great and important matters concerning the whole world.

We still have the same kind of statesmen even among back-benchers. They are not numerous; some are front-benchers, and others are back-benchers; but they are not vulgar politicians. They are statesmen, statesmen, statesmen, going higher and higher. The merit system was created to satisfy the greed of profiteers who wanted to promote their own business outside Canada: the sale of bacon manufactured by the friends of Sir Thomas White, who was then minister of finance; starch manufactured by the minister of railways and canals, J. D. Reid; tinware manufactured by Sir Albert Edward Kemp, minister of overseas military forces; paint manufactured by the minister of the naval service, Hon. C. C. Ballantyne; the products of the Cockshutt plant, and so on and so forth.

On April 12, 1918, at page 707, no less a gentleman than that great Haligonian, Mr. Fielding, said:

I think we are getting away from the purpose for which the civil service commission was created. It was never intended to be a patronage distributing body, but a body with distinct purposes, a body to hold examinations and to take means of guaranteeing the qualifications of applicants for the public service. That, I think, is a correct statement of its original purpose. But now the government seem to be obliged—I am not saying they could do otherwise—to make this commission a patronage distributing body. Now say to A, B and C, who are members of parliament, that they shall have no right to nominate anybody, but that D, E and F, who are called the civil service board, shall nominate and appoint the men, does not seem to me to be abolishing patronage; it is simply transferring it from a number of gentlemen who, whatever their faults may be, have some knowledge of local conditions, and turning it over to gentlemen who have no knowledge of local conditions. It seems to me that is the effect of it.

So spoke Mr. Fielding. There is something further that is interesting in the working of the civil service commission. In my humble view it is a hoax, it is a farce; they are passing the buck. No one is responsible. We ask the government, any government, who is responsible and we are told, the civil service commission; and if we ask the civil service commission the answer is, "We have no responsibility whatever; the responsibility is on the shoulders of the government." Therefore no one knows where he is at.

If hon. members will look into those most interesting publications called blue books they will see the names of prominent people who do not belong to the civil service commission and who have been thanked in every report of the commission since 1908 for their valuable services in sitting on examining boards. Mr. Justice Angers of the exchequer court is not a member of the civil service commission, and there are many others. I have not the last one, 1938, but I direct attention to page 29 of the report of the commission for 1937. They will see a formidable list of men who are supposed to be competent when the civil service commission is not. In the organization branch there are self-taught men. Perhaps there are a couple of sensible men there; the others are fools, and they direct the organization and classification of all departments, the classification of all civil servants. They are the big men of the civil service commission, the "number one" men; and then there are the examiners who, most of them, could not successfully teach in primary schools; and yet they pass upon questions put to applicants regarding astronomy, geology, engineering and every other science for which civil servants may be employed. Most ridiculous!

If the house has no objection, may I table some figures? They give a classification of those persons acting as advisory examiners on civil service boards, divided into civil servants from Ottawa on the one hand and from outside on the other, and not civil servants, from Ottawa on the one hand and from outside on the other. Does the house agree to that?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member cannot file it without unanimous consent.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I will keep it in my pocket.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it.

Mr. MANION: Pass it around.

Mr. POULIOT: If the house agrees I will have it stencilled and send a copy to every member. I say, it is most ridiculous. The civil service commission looks to a mounted policeman, an R.C.M.P. constable either in British Columbia or in Nova Scotia, to decide whether a caretaker for a public building, a lighthouse, is competent; and if at times some other choice is made, it is the principal of a high school, who has to judge the competency of some man whom the civil service commission has never seen and who is appointed without any civil service commissioner ever having seen him.

There are some amusing things in connection with the civil service commission. After 1918 the number of employees on the staff of the civil service commission has increased year by year. These are the numbers from 1918-19 on—and remember, Griffenhagen and Arthur Young & Company were brought in to introduce American efficiency into the dominion public service:

1919-20	204
1920-21	315
1921-22	200
1922-23	232
1923-24	224
1924-25	184
1925-26	188
1926-27	174
1928-29	195
1929-30	244
1930-31	233
1931-32	170
1932-33	148
1933-34	136
1934-35	144
1935-36	169

These men and women are there; many of them are good stenographers, but they know nothing about the structure of any department; they know nothing about the qualifications of civil servants and those who try to get government jobs. They are there; they do not decide anything, but they take for granted that what is done is correct. Suppose there is a vacancy for a chemist; there are no chemists on the civil service commission, no one is able to say anything about the qualifications of the applicants. But they constitute a board and ask for the qualifications of the various applicants. These are sent to the civil service commission. There a minor clerk who knows nothing about chemistry eliminates some of the applications, and the others are left for the decision of the board. Very often the board do not see anyone, at any rate they do not see the applicants who have been eliminated by the minor clerk. They take it for granted, although they know nothing, that they have done fine work. Then they decide that A shall be appointed because he is the first on the list. It is taken for granted because that man is such a prominent man in the city of Ottawa, or such an eminent chemist in the city of Winnipeg, and so on.

Probably no one in this house has ever read the form of the oral examination report. Look at it. "Factors to be considered"—they are the same forms as were there twenty years ago. Nothing is changed; it is tradition, the holy tradition of Foran, the civil service commissioner. He is their guiding star and their inspiration. Observe this:

A

Make a careful observation of the candidate. Notice his personal appearance and his neatness in dress. How do his personality and manner impress you? If he had to deal with the public, do you think he would be tactful, courteous and firm—

Firm!

—or inclined to be abrupt or overbearing? Where would you rank him in comparison with a 100 per cent "ideal" candidate and a "barely satisfactory" 60 per cent candidate?

The margin is from 60 to 100 per cent. If you like him, 100 per cent. If you don't, he has no personality—60 per cent. All the most important officials of the civil service commission were asked, "What is personality?" and every one of them answered, "I don't know." But it is there, and if the examiner finds that the fellow is neatly attired, buys his clothes from Fashioncraft, has engaging manners, and is "firm," then he is 100 per cent. If the examining clerk does not like him, he is not.

But that is not all:

In the column headed "Rating" express your judgment by writing in ink the percentage at which you would rate him. If your rating is less than 60, place a check mark after the word —unsatisfactory.

Below 60, below zero! Then the next section:

B

Having checked over the career of the candidate with him briefly—

Was your father a respectable man? Was your mother a good mother? Have you many sisters—many brothers? Probably you have been a clerk in a general store; oh, yes; you have sold sugar; you have sold apples and flour and biscuits—biscuits are most important.

—what value would you attach to it as fitting him for this particular position?

Note: It is not necessary that his experience should have been exactly in the line required in the position—

It is not necessary. No training is necessary.

—but consider whether it has been of such nature as to indicate his probable success if appointed. Again express your opinion as in factor A.

Personality!

C

Consider the intelligence and mental alertness of the candidate.

Alertness!

How does he react to questioning? Is he quick to grasp the trend of your questions and able to express himself intelligently and readily? Again indicate your judgment as in factor A.

This is sissy talk. Then D:

D

Taking into consideration the actual work to be performed in the position in question, do you consider the candidate to be in possession of the requisite health, strength and other physical attributes required? Do not—

Those words in block letters.

Do not in this instance compare him with a 100 per cent physically fit man, but view him only from the point of view of the work to be performed. As far as his physical fitness is concerned can he carry on with reasonable efficiency? Indicate your judgment as in factor A.

Now, sir, for whom is personality required? It is required for inspectors of dairy products, hatchery assistants, dairy produce graders, poultry inspectors, junior swine graders, stock car inspectors, foremen spat and breeding, stock distribution, customs excise clerks, customs excise examiners, customs excise enforcement officers, immigration guards, customs truckmen—these need personality. Also immigration inspectors, fisheries inspectors, Indian agents—personality, of course! Park wardens, park caretakers, cleaners and helpers —they need personality. Head stewards, investigators of drawback claims—these all need personality. I have a long list, pages of it. Orthopaedic appliance makers, clerks grade 4—they need personality. It is incredible.

Sir, one of the recommendations that was made on behalf of youth, and it was only one, was the superannuation of men at sixty-five and women at sixty. It was in a report presented to the house last year. That report was agreed to by the members of the civil service commission; the members of the house were satisfied with it and of course it was the unanimous report of the committee on which all parties were represented. In the Montreal Standard of February 4 we find the following:

All-Canada civil service plan is now proposed.

That is the headline.

Junior business men in forty-nine cities and towns propose extension of civil service plan into provincial and municipal fields.

Poor youth! What an illusion! I have sent to Mr. Bonar, who occupies the post of chairman of the national committee on the civil service of the junior chamber of commerce of Canada, the whole report of last year to show him what is being done in the civil service commission.

In the old times civil servant appointees were young men who were open-minded, intelligent, had just an ordinary education but were willing to learn, and at that time the chiefs were ready to teach. Therefore young men entering the civil service progressed naturally until they became expert in their branch. But now it is entirely different. With the over-teaching that is done by all universities from coast to coast we do not have any more young men who are open-minded and willing to learn; we have a lot of young B.A's, M.A's, Ph.D's, who are unwilling to learn but always ready to teach, and the chiefs are unwilling to teach but become indispensables, staying in the service after sixty-five years to get a little more than their superannuation. Therefore there is now no cooperation between the young people who get into the civil service and most of those who are over them. Of course there are complaints of favouritism; several complaints were made by all the civil service organizations, but when we asked them to point their finger to the sore spots, everyone refused—they did not want to compromise themselves. Therefore the only part of the oral evidence which is worth anything is that which comes from the files themselves. In the office of the clerk of the committee we had five hundred files which were perused by the members of the committee and which showed how extraordinarily the applicants were dealt with by the civil service commission.

I wonder whether many hon. members have read a small book called A Message to Garcia. It is by Elbert Hubbard, and I take the liberty of quoting a few lines:

> And a man who, when given a letter for Garcia, quietly takes the missive, without asking any idiotic questions, and with no lurking intention of chucking it into the nearest sewer, or doing aught else but deliver it, never gets "laid off," nor has to go on strike for higher wages. Civilization is one long, anxious search for just such individuals. Anything such a man asks shall be granted. He is wanted in every city, town and village—in every office, shop, store and factory. The world cries out for such; he is needed and needed badly—the man who can "carry a message to Garcia."

I wish to apply those words to the hon. members who sat with me on the committee last year. I appreciated their work, which at times was both painful and arduous. We knew nothing about the operation of the Civil Service Act; we received a message from the house, and it was our duty to discover whether the operation of that act was a joke on the house and the country or whether a good purpose was being served.

Now, sir, may I say that I do not know at all what I will do this session. I have informed the government that I want the report of last year, which was unanimous on the part of members representing all parties, submitted to the house. We worked very hard, at times seven days a week, in order to reach conclusions which we thought would be in the best interests of the service and the best interests of the country. That has been done, and I hope the matter will be very seriously considered in the light of the public welfare.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): A few months ago, Mr. Speaker, I objected to a discussion of this kind being carried on when we were supposed to be considering a more or less formal resolution with regard to the selection of a special committee. However, since the discussion has gone on I should like to say that it does seem to me highly improper that in connection with this resolution the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Pouliot) should have attacked civil servants who have no chance to defend themselves.

Mr. POULIOT: Let them run in my constituency.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so. The hon. member has been making a violent attack upon civil servants, calling them all sorts of names without, of course, those civil servants having any chance whatever to defend themselves in this place. But that is not the worst of it; he has made an attack on the whole merit system.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes; he stated that the merit system had been promoted to satisfy the greed of certain persons.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The civil service commission—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is what we are discussing just now.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): —not the merit system.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would say the whole question involved was the merit system, which is the basis of the work of the civil service commission. The hon. member said it was a joke. I took this down, and I think I am quoting him correctly; he said the merit system had been promoted to satisfy the greed of certain persons.

Mr. POULIOT: The so-called merit system, which is very different.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: He was referring to the system under which we are operating at the present time. He said the commission was essentially a patronage distributing body, and even at this late day in our political development he pleaded that patronage should be kept in the hands of those who have knowledge of local conditions, which in effect means that patronage should be almost entirely under the control of the local politicians.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Fielding said that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It may have been said by Mr. Fielding but I fancy the hon. member who spoke is quite in sympathy with Mr. Fielding in this regard.

Mr. POULIOT: Surely.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, whatever may have been true in the earlier days of our history I submit that to-day the people of Canada as a body are heartily sick of the patronage system even to the extent to which it now exists. We are never going to get very much further in the way of cleaner politics as long as the patronage system exists.

Mr. MULOCK: Under the civil service commission.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As long as it exists, I say.

An hon. MEMBER: Under the civil service commission.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will not say we have no measure of patronage under the civil service commission, but at least the setting up of that commission is an attempt to get away from party patronage. It would seem to me that the hon. member who just spoke is anxious to return to the old idea of party patronage. Why, only to-day I heard the possible appointment to a rather important post being discussed. I do not mind mentioning what it was—the appointment of a parliamentary librarian. What was the trend of the discussion? It was that we had always appointed a librarian who was a good party heeler, that the position was considered to be a reward for party services.

Mr. HOWARD: And have they not been very good appointments?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will not say that.

Mr. ROGERS: What does the hon. member mean by "party heeler"? Would he apply that term to the late Hon. Martin Burrell?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: One who has given good party service. That was the trend of the discussion to which I listened to-day.

An hon. MEMBER: Where did you hear that discussion?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Never mind; let me finish my statement. I say that undoubtedly in this country the general feeling is that appointments, especially to certain classes of positions, are made because of party services. I would take that very library position as an illustration, if you like. Most of us liked the late Martin Burrell very much. We thought he was a fine man. He was a literary man, but I would venture to say that Mr. Burrell had no special training as a librarian. He was a splendid literary critic, and possibly it may be a good thing that we should occasionally give some sort of emolument to literary people in this country in order to encourage them to continue writing. I have no particular objection to that, but I have some objection to anyone being appointed to the position of librarian who is not a qualified librarian. That is my position. It is a technical post to which should be appointed a man with the highest technical qualifications.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a point of order. Mr. Burrell was a privy councillor; he is now dead, but he was a most able man.

Mr. HOWARD: May I ask a question? Just because—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If the hon. member who has the floor does not give consent, he should not be interrupted.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Burrell's name was mentioned from across the floor. I was dealing with a general principle and as an illustration said that only an hour or so ago I heard that matter under discussion. It illustrates my point, namely, that to-day a great many appointments are made primarily in order that certain people who have given party service may be rewarded. That is my submission. I could give very many other illustrations; it just happened that this was the matter under discussion at the moment. My point is—and I think that I rightly interpret the feeling of the majority—that the people of Canada are sick of this kind of thing.

Mr. TOMLINSON: Did you ever ask for anything?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No.

Mr. TOMLINSON: Yourself?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No.

Mr. TOMLINSON: Your party?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No.

Mr. TOMLINSON: Any of your party?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Not that I know of.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. gentleman is as firm as the civil service forms require.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not claim any particular credit for that, simply because we are not in a position where we can expect to get favours.

An hon. MEMBER: That is the simple reason.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It may be the simple reason, but I am speaking about a principle. I care not whether the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, the Conservatives, the Liberals or any other party may be involved; the principle is that in this country we should have a system by which appointments should be made on merit after competitive examinations. That is the policy which I think ought to be maintained. We are constantly in danger of encroachment upon even the degree of non-partisan appointment that has so far been attained; for everyone knows that again and again in connection with certain appointments we have the phrase, "notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act." This matter is brought to our attention constantly, and I am really surprised that my good friend from Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) should have the courage, at this stage in the development of our political institutions, actually to plead or demand that we should go back to an earlier state of affairs from which we thought we were at least beginning to try to escape. I regret exceedingly the speech of the hon. member for Témiscouata and I desire to dissociate myself entirely from the sentiments that have been expressed.

There is one other matter to which I should like to refer. I submit that in so prejudging the work of the committee the hon. member has definitely disqualified himself from acting on the committee to which he is to be appointed for the present session. It is not so long since the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) quoted from Beauchesne's parliamentary rules and forms, as follows:

> It shall always be understood that no member who declares or decides against the principle of a bill, resolution, or matter to be committed, can be nominated of such committee.

The Prime Minister went on to say:

> Each hon. member of the committee will be expected, on his honour, to investigate fully the matter which has been referred to the committee of which he is a member. He will be expected, as one who is privileged to sit on the committee, to form his judgment with respect to what should be reported to the house.

And again:

> —no hon. member who had expressed views in this house which prejudged the situation would be entitled to sit on that committee.

That seems to me fairly clear. This motion is distinctly with regard to a certain special committee. We have the chairman of last year, who according to frequent custom would naturally be the chairman this year, prejudging the case. I would say that he has absolutely disqualified himself from serving on that committee.

Mr. POULIOT: I have refused to act as chairman.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: From sitting on the committee, I said.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, as a back-bencher who served on the committee last year, I cannot let this occasion pass without saying a word or two. May I remind the house that a very searching inquiry was made into the operations of the Civil Service Act by the committee under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). As the hon. member has indicated, a report which was unanimously assented to by all members of the committee was tabled in this house last session. It was our expectation that there would be a motion for concurrence in the report and that on such motion there would be a debate with regard to the principles involved. It is a matter of personal regret to me that the hon. member should seize this occasion to anticipate the decision of the house with regard to the report and draw his own conclusions with reference to the evidence heard before the committee. May I make this point, and make it most emphatically: The conclusions which he has presented to the house this afternoon are not incorporated in the report of the committee as unanimously assented to by all the members of the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: If my hon. friend will permit me? The report of last year is not before the house. I am simply expressing my personal views on the motion of the minister, which is entirely different.

Mr. MacNEIL: The report was agreed to by the hon. gentleman as chairman of the committee and it appears on the records of the house, although it is not formally before us at this session. I draw the inference from the motion of the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) that it is the intention to proceed with the inquiry where we left off last session.

I have just this point to make, and other members of the committee can express their own personal opinions. Since the matter has been opened up this afternoon I submit that the weight of evidence indicated that during the past few years the staff of the civil service commission had been making a very honest and efficient endeavour on the whole to carry out the merit system of appointments in the civil service. That was the impression I gained personally as a result of listening day by day to the evidence presented before the committee. No charges of inefficiency or irregularity were made, and certainly there was nothing in the evidence to indicate that there was any less efficiency in that department than in any other department of the government. After hearing the members of the staff of the civil service commission, it was the general impression of members of the committee that after all they were efficient, that they had integrity of purpose with regard to the work entrusted to them, and that they were doing a first-class job.

May I make this point? The chief handicap imposed on the commission has been imposed by hon. members of this house who are determined to force political patronage upon the civil service. One of the most astounding revelations made before that committee was that which showed the growth of political patronage in connection with appointments to the civil service under the present administration. We were presented with long lists containing thousands of positions which had been exempted from the provisions of the Civil Service Act, first by statute, again by the estimates, and again by orders in council. This has had a demoralizing result within the civil service, since we have attempted to merge two systems, a merit system under the civil service commission, and a political patronage system, with all the conflict and confusion thus involved.

Those of us who sit in opposition have knowledge of the method by which appointments are made by defeated Liberal candidates. We know of the antagonistic public opinion that has been aroused by reason of the interference of political patronage with regard to appointments to the civil service. The civil service commission has made an honest attempt to establish the principle that appointments to the civil service of Canada should be available to every citizen of the dominion, and that appointments should be secured by open competitive examination. There is no proper system of qualification, there is no suggestion of competition, when appointments are secretly made on the recommendation of a sitting member, a defeated candidate or a political committee. We have a sad state of affairs in the civil service, but that sad state of affairs is due to the determination to foster political patronage. I should like to refer again to the evidence given by Sir Francis Floud, then high commissioner for the United Kingdom. He spoke very eloquently and very convincingly of the British tradition of appointments now maintained in the United Kingdom. I think that when we heard his evidence many of us desired that the day should come soon in Canada when we would have a similar tradition in the Canadian civil service and get away entirely from all the miserable intrigue that is associated with political patronage.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I did not wish to interrupt my hon. friend when he was speaking, but there is just one statement I should like to make in order to make clear a certain situation. He referred to orders in council which had been passed taking a number of employees out from under the jurisdiction of the civil service commission, and the impression that might be left with the house would be that the government itself had initiated that procedure or that particular course of action. I think I am right in saying that wherever that was done, and it has been done in some cases, it was at the instance of the civil service commission itself. The commission reported to the government that in its opinion there were certain classes of appointment in connection with which it would be much better for the government to accept responsibility rather than the civil service commission, and action was taken accordingly. I am certain I am right in that.

Hon. J. E. LAWSON (York South): Mr. Speaker, before the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) speaks I feel I should make a comment or two with respect to the subject matter under discussion, in view of my past experience in connection with the civil service. I was originally a member of the committee which sat last year, but I had myself replaced because of the fact that other committees of which I was a member were meeting at the same time as the civil service committee. So I was not a party to the report made last year.

In 1932 I had the honour to be chairman of a small special committee of this house which conducted a somewhat extensive investigation into the administration of the Civil Service Act. I will be frank to confess that when I first entered upon that inquiry, representing as I do a constituency some 275 miles from Ottawa, I had the general impression which seemed to prevail in that part of the country from which I came that a civil service job was something of a sinecure, and that the best-off people in this country were the civil servants. From my experience in that exhaustive inquiry and from experiences I have had before and since in departments of government, I would be unfair and unjust did I not say that, taken by and large and all round, I think we have in the civil service of Canada a group of men of whom we can well be proud. I will admit quite frankly that I have gone into offices in some departments of the government service here and seen practices prevailing which would not be permitted or tolerated in private enterprise, but such cases are very few and far between. I am always—I was going to say amazed, but I will put it in this way—I am always surprised at the ability and the energy displayed by a great many of our civil servants in the course of their duties, having regard to the comparatively small remuneration which many of them receive.

Having said that much, I concede that there are many absurdities in the so-called merit system. As pointed out by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) I did when I was chairman of the civil service committee, realize the absurdity of attempting to select floor sweepers and window cleaners and truck men on any so-called merit system and competitive examination basis. I want to be frank and say that much of the report which I as chairman moved in the house in 1932 did not contain my views in their entirety with respect to the civil service. In order to obtain unanimity in the committee there had to be a considerable amount of give and take, and in the long run my job as chairman was to present not my own views but those of the majority of the committee.

So far as the civil service commission itself is concerned, I am confident that they are making a real effort to carry out the job which this parliament has assigned to them. But when you assign to them the job of selecting people for minor positions involving manual labour, I think it is a huge joke to fill these positions on a competitive merit basis.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether my hon. friend from Temiscouata intended to convey in his remarks his opposition to non-partisan appointments for civil service positions in general. If he did I must say that I do not subscribe to that policy. It is a great blessing that we have not in force in the Dominion of Canada a patronage system without any qualification attachments thereto, and I for one shall not advocate such a system. But I am free to say that many improvements might be made in the system which now prevails, particularly in two respects: (1) Eliminate from the so-called merit system minor positions where physical effort and physical labour are required; and (2) change the whole basis of examination for many of the minor positions in the civil service in respect of which examination now prevails.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have I think been on every special civil service committee that has been appointed by the House of Commons since 1930. I sat on the committee last year, and I am rather sorry to hear the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) say many of the things he did this afternoon. It was reminiscent of some of the committee's meetings last year. I think he will agree with me that after the committee had had a number of sittings and said a number of things, some of which I think should not have been said, we got down to business and I believe did some very good work.

I was also sorry to hear the hon. member for Témiscouata make certain references to employees under the civil service commission. I do not think the evidence given by these persons when they appeared before the committee last year bears out the statements that he made in regard to them to-day. If there was anything that stood out in the committee last year it was that these employees demonstrated to the committee that they were fully qualified to deal with the matters with which they were called upon to deal.

I do hope that when this year's committee is organized and gets down to work we shall give our attention wholly and solely to matters with which it is necessary to deal in order to have the civil service function in the best possible way. I have too much respect for the business instincts and business ability of most members of the cabinet to think for one moment that they are not in favour of the merit system, and of appointments to the civil service being made on the basis of ability and merit. The patronage system would make their work even more difficult than it is to-day, and we must all admit that it is difficult enough as it is.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) referred to the great blessing of not having an absolutely unqualified patronage system. Now if it is a blessing to have a merit system, even if it is not a complete one, if we have a good system through having eliminated a great deal of patronage, surely we could have a better system if we eliminated all patronage. That is a matter which the committee can go into this year. Before I sit down I must again say that I deeply regret that the hon. member for Témiscouata made the references he did in his remarks to-day to certain members of the civil service.

Mr. C. B. HOWARD (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to detain the house on this question at the present time. I am entirely in favour of setting up a special committee on the civil service this year, as there are certain defects in the present system which I think it is important to remedy and in respect to which I hope the committee now to be appointed will recommend appropriate action.

On the question of patronage I would say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that I cannot see that it would be worse to place the patronage in the hands of the elected representatives of the people of Canada than to leave it in the hands of an irresponsible body, one which is not responsible to the electors in a democracy. I am entirely in favour of the merit system and of the educational test. I think nobody questions that, but I do say to those who approve that system one hundred per cent that at a time when we are appealing to our manufacturers and industrialists not to let men out because they are over age, thereby throwing them on the country for support, we have no right to limit the age for appointment to the civil service and say that because a man is over thirty-two he shall have no opportunity to get this or that particular position, especially when it is a junior position. When this matter is brought up I can submit two cases.

Let me say further that during my fourteen years as representative of the city of Sherbrooke I have been but twice to the civil service commission: once, when I first arrived here, to be introduced to the personnel, which has since changed; and once when I went down on an appeal in such a case as that to which I have just referred. In the administration of justice in this country we have courts of appeal, the Supreme Court of Canada and the privy council; but we have set up a civil service commission beyond which there is no appeal. In this respect, and it goes to the fundamental aspects of the matter, the principle is entirely wrong. I will give an example. Not very long ago an examination was set by the civil service commission in English, and quite properly so; then the English paper was handed over to departmental officers to be translated into French so that French-Canadian students could answer the questions in their own language. In the translation they used in one question three words which changed entirely the sense of the question, so that French-speaking candidates did not have the same chance as the English-speaking ones. I have been to the civil service commission three times, and they refuse to rectify the mistake, which they admit, saying "We will just take that question out"—but they refuse to hold a new examination.

I am entirely in favour of a civil service commission, but I think it has been going too far. I hope that the committee to be set up this year will see to it that there is a court of appeal from the commission, responsible to the parliament of Canada, where grievances such as I have just mentioned can be redressed.

Another thing: Let us not forget that, while the maximum age of appointees has been limited to thirty-five years, and an educational test has been provided, there is another factor which to my mind is more important than any other, and it is the suitability of the candidate for the position he is to occupy. In the constituency I represent, which is eighty per cent French-Canadian and Catholic, I defy anybody, no matter what part of the country he comes from, to show that there is any one as well qualified to tell which man is best suited to a job as the elected member of the constituency of Sherbrooke, who at this time happens to be myself.

Mr. COLDWELL: What about the defeated candidate, if there was one?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HOWARD: Well, he is not responsible. From 1930 to 1935, when the Tories were in power, I was still the elected member for Sherbrooke. Let me tell the hon. member who just interrupted that during that time I was perfectly satisfied that the defeated Conservative candidate, who happened to be a supporter of the then government, should make the appointments, and during those five years you will not find one single word of criticism from me of his having done so. But I do say this, that when it comes to the aptness of the candidate to suit the mentality of the people he is going to serve, whether you have a civil service commission or not, whether the choice is made by the elected member, Conservative, Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, Independent, Labour or Liberal, where is there as good a judge of the suitability of the candidate as is the representative of the people?

Several other points occur to me, but I am not now going to take time to discuss them. I hope that when this subject goes to the committee it will be considered from a non-political point of view, a businessman's point of view, and that we shall set up or increase the machinery in such a way as to render to the people of this country a service which will be more in line with real democracy.

Mr. WILLIAM HAYHURST (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I was not a member of the civil service committee, but as a new member of this house, after listening to the arguments which have been set forth, it seems to me that there are some factors which we must develop in the merit system administered by the civil service commission. The last speaker remarked that appointments should be non-political. Possibly most hon. members are in favour of non-partisan appointments, but they feel also that they can be made in a business manner, after appraising the educational and tactual equipment of the candidates.

Speaking educationally, it is generally understood that there are two general types of people: those who respond to mental tests —the intelligence quotient, if you like—the sum of the qualities making for the mental personality; and those whose physical personality is the primary essential. The latter is adjusted more to responses due to ability to learn to do things in a physical way—for instance, to learn to ride a bicycle and make a good errand boy; whereas by intelligence tests you select and determine the mental efficiency of an applicant. Consequently we must consider the question from the standpoint of psychology.

Let me say as a new member that I have found the most efficient and courteous services rendered to us by every civil servant whom we have approached in the House of Commons and the houses of parliament generally.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hear, hear.

Mr. HAYHURST: So we feel that some good has been accomplished through the merit system. At the same time we believe that in regard to the appointment of persons whose work requires tactual skill, the selection is best made by a committee which will test the tactual ability as well as give consideration to his personality from the point of view of the mental qualities required in the particular position.

Certainly we should not overthrow the merit system. The civil service requires an entirely different personality from political life: I believe that a politician would be about the last person who could successfully pick out candidates to fill certain civil service posts. I wish to place myself on record as being fundamentally in favour of the merit system, with probably some additional consideration given to the type of person required for jobs other than those in which mental capacity is most important.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) with his usual alertness, has placed the rest of us at a great disadvantage, because he came down to the chamber to-day prepared to make a detailed and comprehensive speech, whereas all the rest of us are taken by surprise. In fact, as he was speaking on personality, I could not help feeling that he would be certain to get one hundred per cent of the marks for that quality, no matter who might be the examiner.

[Mr. Hayhurst.]

It was my privilege last year to serve on the special committee to consider the civil service of Canada. We went into the matter very thoroughly. I believe we held over fifty meetings. Some of them were exciting. Certainly they were all interesting. The members who served on the committee learned a good deal about the civil service. But the committee meetings lasted so long that a report was not brought in until a day or two before the house closed and there was no opportunity to consider the report. It was our understanding, however, that the government at this session would afford an opportunity very early in the proceedings of the house to discuss the report. I suggest most earnestly to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that he provide an opportunity for the discussion of last year's report before going on to set up a new committee. If the former report were considered many points would be cleared up and the work of this year's committee would be greatly simplified. No doubt, the Prime Minister will see what advantages would follow from such a course, merely from the discussion that has taken place here to-day.

My impression was quite different from that of the hon. member for Temiscouata with regard to the findings of last year's committee. There were many things on which we did not agree, but I think that the civil service commission came out of a most searching investigation with flying colours. We were unable to consider the examination branch, and yet to-day the member for Temiscouata has attacked the work of that branch without the committee having considered it in detail last year. I think he will agree with me that this is correct. It is most unfortunate, and I am afraid that such an attack hurts our civil service. I do suggest to the members of the house that the merit system, instead of being inefficient, instead of having broken down, was shown by last year's investigation to be so good that it should be extended. For example, it should be extended to the employees of the national harbours board. It should be extended to the small post offices which were taken out some years ago.

I do not agree with the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) that the positions of cleaners and helpers should be removed from the operation of the act. We debated that point in the committee last year. We fought over it for a long time and in the end the majority opinion was that the positions of cleaners and helpers should be kept under the act where they are at the present time.

Let me make this suggestion in conclusion. Democratic governments are on trial to-day as never before, and democratic government cannot function without a first-class civil service. After all, members of the house and of the senate are only one part of the democratic system. The civil service is a very important part of the system, and we cannot have good government without a first-class civil service. I believe that in Canada to-day we have a first class service, and I hope that this parliament will do everything in its power to give that civil service a chance to go ahead and do its job.

Mr. W. R. TOMLINSON (Bruce): I did not intend to speak on this question this afternoon, but after listening to some of the remarks that have been made, especially by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), who describes the committee as more or less a joke, I must say that the members of that committee who sat last year for a period of four months, two hours a day and sometimes four, were not sitting there for the good of their health. I remember quite well going into that committee as a new member of the house, as one who had discussed the whole civil service question with Mr. Parker of the commission in Great Britain, and who had some idea of the civil service in Great Britain, and I had a very high opinion of the civil service commission in Canada. I still have a very high regard for the merit system in Canada. I do not desire anyone in this house or anyone in the country to feel that I have in my mind no other idea than to go back to the old patronage system.

May I here refer to what Sir Robert Borden did in 1918. I did not know him personally but I had read about him and I honoured him. When he came back from Great Britain he immediately placed under the civil service commission all the positions in Canada, but he had no sooner done so than he realized his mistake. He saw that there were certain small positions in regard to which merit did not enter, and we have since seen certain exemptions made. For instance there are positions of $200 and under which are not under the commission, and there are revenue post offices of $3,000 and less which are not under the commission. Why are they not under the commission? Because the people are becoming tax conscious; that is why. We set up a civil service commission to make appointments on merit, that is, with regard to positions that require merit. But when you tell me—and I spoke on this question in my maiden speech in this house—that I cannot appoint somebody to a little lighthouse, a lighthouse keeper who lights the lamp in the evening, turns it out in the morning and cleans it, when you tell me that I am not capable of making such an appointment and that we must have someone from Ottawa, from the civil service commission, travel up there, or have a high school principal in Port Elgin or Kincardine make the appointment, then I say we are simply wasting the money of the people of this country for the reason that members of this house will not take their own responsibility. The people of Canada are to-day conscious of that fact.

During the sittings of the committee I was perhaps the one who brought forward the question of taking out the small positions from the civil service commission. I questioned the chairman of the commission, a man for whom I have a great deal of respect, because he gave his evidence in a straightforward manner. He is a man who knows what he is talking about, and he informed me that the small positions in the civil service caused more trouble than anything else that they had to deal with. I believe that. He said, "We would be glad to get rid of them." That is correct. When the matter came before the committee, as mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), the majority of the committee decided that all the positions should be under the civil service. That is ridiculous, but I had to abide by that decision and naturally the report came in with that recommendation.

I did not come down prepared to speak on this subject. However, I do not like the insinuations from the third party in this house in connection with patronage. Nobody in my riding can accuse me of patronage.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. TOMLINSON: Let them prove it. Not one of them can. I do not like that insinuation from parties who have never had the responsibility of government. They have never had that responsibility. But they desire to spread throughout this dominion the idea that they never ask for a favour. Let them stand in their place and tell me they have not asked a favour on behalf of their constituents; I would tell them that if they do not look after their constituents they are not representing their ridings as they should.

Miss MACPHAIL: I should like to ask the hon. member a question. What does he mean when he says that hon. members do not carry the responsibility of their constituencies, do not look after their constituencies?

Mr. TOMLINSON: I did not say that. I said if they stand in their place and say they never asked a favour on behalf of their constituents—

Mr. COLDWELL: A right.

Mr. TOMLINSON: —a right, whatever you wish to call it, they are not looking after their constituents. Correct? I say that.

Miss MACPHAIL: What would be the use of asking a favour when the defeated candidate in each constituency has complete control over even the smallest appointment?

Mr. TOMLINSON: I do not know about the hon. member for Grey-Bruce—

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): If we are called upon to rise in our places I rise in mine and say that I have never asked any patronage favours for my constituents.

Mr. TOMLINSON: The hon. member can speak after I have finished. I am not in favour of this patronage system without proper qualifications. I try in every instance, and I think every hon. member does, to present a man who is fit, and work for that particular man. And I believe the civil service commission as it is now constituted renders a useful service. It has control of salaries, it has the recommendations for reclassification, one may say; and I think it renders a great service. As I have indicated, I sat on this committee last year, and I admit I brought in no recommendation or minority report as to the qualifications of the commissioners. But I did notice that in 1932—I see the hon. member is not present now—and in 1934 the committee recommended the removal of all the civil service commissioners. In our report did we recommend the removal of the civil service commissioners? No. Everyone knew there was one commissioner that I would remove if I had the opportunity; I refer to Mr. Potvin, and I stood in the committee and said so. I say that he is not capable of acting on the commission because of his own admissions in that committee. He admitted that when he was appointed he had no special qualifications. He admitted that he went to Montreal and charged $125 for taxi fares. He was appointed in the spring of 1935 by the former government, and was supposed to represent the French-Canadians. His residence of course is Manitoba. This civil service commission should include a properly qualified person from the province of Quebec; it would save a great deal of the difficulty we are now having. The province of Quebec, the French-Canadian citizens of this country, are entitled to proper representation, but they are not receiving it. A man who would place a note on the files before they came over here, to the effect that "this young man cannot be appointed because he belongs to a drama league"—that was his reason for not agreeing to the appointment—how ridiculous it is that a man like that should be on the civil service commission! He should be removed immediately and a proper appointment made from Quebec in whom the French-Canadians would have faith. I say these things because they appear to me to be very important.

The chairman of the committee of last year did not agree with everything I said, and of course I did not agree with everything he said, but it was the first committee of the house on this subject, regardless of 1932 or 1934, that actually conducted its investigation without an eye to political expediency. I say that without fear of contradiction. There was no question in our investigations last year of pulling out files to try to affect the Conservative party. But we did try to ascertain what was the difficulty with the merit system as it now stands, and I was surprised when a certain witness—I may as well mention his name; it was Mr. Phelan, the head of one of the civil service federations,—admitted that he could not answer our questions properly because of certain effects that might follow. Is that the way the heads of these federations should present their case to a committee that is trying to investigate? They should be prepared to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, without fear. That is why we are there; we are not sitting there for fun—at least I am not.

I shall be pleased to act on this committee and to carry forward the work of last year. And I want it to be known that it is not for patronage that I am sitting on the committee. It is a nuisance, but it will be done in the service of the country.

Mr. LAWSON: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the rules of the house do not permit me to accept the challenge issued by my hon. friend, but I shall be pleased to do so at the first opportunity. I would however call attention to a direct misstatement made by the hon. member. He stated that the committee of 1932 recommended the removal of all the commissioners. That is not so. We recommended the removal of two for cause, and that recommendation had the unanimous approval of the committee, including the two Liberal members of this house who were members of it.

Mr. T. J. O'NEILL (Kamloops): I am pleased that it is the intention of the government again to set up this committee on civil service matters. In view of the fact that we have so many people in the civil service it is an excellent idea that this committee should be continued. In fact I think it should be a permanent fixture, just as the railway committee and the public accounts committee or the banking and commerce committee are permanent.

A great deal has been said to-day with reference to the present system. Some hon. members have stated that the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) is apparently trying to destroy the merit system. I do not see how the system as we have it to-day can be properly termed a merit system, or how it could ever function as a merit system when those at the top of the ladder, the commissioners, are appointed by the government which is in power at the time the position becomes vacant. Can the leopard change his spots? You cannot change a man simply by putting him in a government position; he remains just what he was before. I would be the same, and so would even hon. members who claim to the contrary—they would still be of the same mind with regard to politics. If we are to have a merit system, it must start at the top. Those who are at the head of the civil service commission should get there through merit, by promotion from the ranks.

Mr. LAWSON: The chairman of the commission reached that position through promotion.

Mr. O'NEILL: I quite agree, as far as the chairman is concerned.

Reference was made to the age limit. We know that in the civil service to-day there are many men far beyond the age limit, and I see no reason why such men, who have enjoyed large salaries for a number of years, should retain those positions after reaching the age of sixty-five when we have so many young men in the country out of work.

I do not see how there can be a merit system under the procedure of holding oral examinations. After the candidates have written the first part of the examination, a committee is formed to conduct an oral examination, and the chairman of that committee may be a man who knows absolutely nothing about the subject on which he is examining. After the oral examination the candidates are given their rating, which is based principally on that oral test. I quite agree with the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) when he says that minor positions should not be under the civil service commission. Let us assume a caretaker is required for a building in the west; after the written examination there will be an oral one, with perhaps the school principal as chairman of the committee. He probably would not know how to start a fire in a furnace or how to fix a leaking tap; yet he would sit in judgment on those applying for the position. How can a merit system operate under such conditions? It is absolutely impossible. As far as the higher positions are concerned, I quite agree that they should be under the merit system.

I was very much surprised to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) say what he did with regard to the merit system. Every man who has belonged to a labour organization for any length of time knows that the merit system does not work as far as labour men are concerned, because views differ with regard to merit. The employees say one man has the merit; the employer says another man has the merit, so in connection with the railways in particular the merit system had to be discarded and the seniority system adopted.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I am glad the government has seen fit to continue this committee.

Mr. J. A. MARSHALL (Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I wish to dissociate myself from most of the remarks of the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Tomlinson). I think it was absolutely unfair of him to introduce the name of either a member of the commission or a member of the civil service into this house for censure. I believe pressure is constantly brought to bear upon the civil service commission with reference to appointments, but I also believe the men on the commission are above such things as playing politics. I honestly believe the work of the civil service commission can be extended to include positions under the Post Office Department. I find myself in complete opposition to the patronage system in all its forms, whether it has to do with minor positions or with more important positions of trust.

I was a member of the committee last year. We worked faithfully, for long hours, and brought in a report which I believe reflected the opinion of all members. I do hope that in the near future we shall have an opportunity to discuss the recommendations which were brought in at that time. I should like to repeat that I am heartily in favour of the merit system and will do all in my power as a member of that committee to oppose any individual or any member of the committee who may endeavour to introduce any form of patronage.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to prolong this discussion, but I, too, wish to dissociate myself from many of the remarks made in this house this afternoon in criticism of the civil service commission and the present method of making appointments apart from political patronage. The hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Tomlinson) criticized hon. members of this house and said that the taxpayers expected us to assume our responsibilities as members. I do not wish to assume responsibility in connection with appointments for the making of which I have no particular qualifications, and about which I may know very little. But I would point out that to-day, under the patronage system, very often neither the sitting member nor the defeated member, men who enjoy or have enjoyed the confidence of a majority of the electors of the constituency, is responsible for appointments that may be made. I look at page 955 of Hansard for February 15 of this year and find, according to the reply to a question which I asked the Postmaster General (Mr. McLarty), that an appointment in my constituency was made on the recommendation of Mr. W. Richardson of Rosetown. Mr. Richardson is an estimable gentleman, but he was never elected as a member of this house. Mr. Loucks, the former member, is not consulted regarding appointments, nor is the sitting member; a gentleman who could not secure election to this house recommends the appointments in the constituency which I represent.

I do not believe that the member, the previous member or the defeated government candidate should make appointments. As has been pointed out, there are minor appointments in regard to which competitive examinations are perhaps not satisfactory, but there are ways, other than political patronage, of making such appointments. As regards promotions, I believe the merit system should be followed where possible, though I realize that there are positions in connection with which seniority ought to be the determining factor. When we talk of the responsibility of members of this house, I am amazed that hon. members should want to exercise political patronage. After all, I think the recommending of appointments frequently makes enemies for a member. Moreover, I believe there are other matters of greater importance to our constituents and to the country than the matter of making petty appointments and having our time taken up in that way.

I should like to see our civil service placed upon the same basis as the civil service of Great Britain or New Zealand. I remember when the Minister of Finance of New Zealand, Hon. Walter Nash, was here several years ago. I had met him when he was in Canada on a former occasion. His last visit was in 1937, and at that time his secretary told me that he knew Ottawa because of the previous visit he had made as private secretary to Mr. Nash's predecessor. He told me that in New Zealand civil servants were not changed when a change in government occurred. He told me also that only seven changes had been made in the service of that country since the new government took office in 1935. We are told that the civil services of Great Britain and New Zealand are efficient.

The other evening I was glad to compliment the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) when he said that he had not used his powers under the national revenue act to make appointments. I think that is something which should be commended by all those who desire good government. In my opinion political patronage is a form of corruption. Promises of jobs are made prior to an election, and to my mind that is only a form of bribery.

Mr. TOMLINSON: That is just the hon. member's opinion?

Mr. COLDWELL: It is my opinion that the promise of a position as payment for support is bribery and corruption. I do not think you can get away from it.

Mr. O'NEILL: Who does it?

Mr. COLDWELL: I ask the hon. gentleman to ask some of his friends.

Mr. O'NEILL: Did the hon. member ever make such a promise?

Mr. COLDWELL: No, I have never done it and I am very proud of that fact. I have been in public life, municipally and provincially, for a long time and I have made no promises of jobs.

Mr. FLEMING: I heard the hon. gentleman make several promises last year.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Fleming) says that I made several promises during the provincial by-election in his constituency. He is quite right, but they were not promises of appointments; they were promises of good government and promises to further certain policies. That is entirely different from political patronage. I want to place myself behind those who support the civil service commission and the merit system. In my opinion patronage is a baneful influence in our public life. A few years ago I had the privilege of looking into the working of the civil service of one of our provinces, and I protested against men being dismissed because of their political activities. While I believe there are limits beyond which a public servant should not go in his capacity as a citizen, still every citizen ought to be permitted to hold whatever political and religious opinions he desires. Political patronage tends to prevent that being done and helps to discredit our democratic institutions.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I admit candidly that it was not the intention of the government to precipitate a debate this afternoon on civil service matters; the desire was merely to obtain the assent of the house to reviving the committee which I think accomplished excellent work last year. It was thought desirable to continue the work of this committee during the present session. I would point out that one of the reasons why the government is recommending this to the house was the first recommendation made by the committee in its report to the house last session. This recommendation reads:

1. Your committee deems it expedient and in the interest of the public, the civil service and the civil service commission that a standing committee on civil service matters be appointed at the commencement of each session of parliament, and therefore recommends to parliament that standing order 63 be amended by adding after clause (k) of said order, the following clause (l): "on civil service matters to consist of fifteen members, nine of whom shall constitute a quorum."

We were not quite ready to recommend the appointment of a standing committee, and we thought the next best thing would be to recommend the reconstitution of this committee. In our opinion it had not completed its work, and we thought that during the present session it might serve the purpose recommended. We did not feel that the membership of the committee should be reduced to fifteen. I think it is desirable that on a committee to deal with civil service matters all parties, provinces and groups should be represented. After discussing the matter with the Liberal whip, who had been in touch with the whips of the other groups, I came to the conclusion that a committee on civil service matters should consist of twenty-five members. The representation of certain groups would be reduced considerably, if they had any representation at all, with a committee of only fifteen members. If the committee to be reconstituted should renew the recommendation of the previous committee for the setting up of a standing committee on civil service matters, I suggest that consideration should be given to whether the limiting of the membership of such a committee to fifteen would not be a mistake. I would point out to hon. members that there was no time last session to consider the report submitted by the committee. The report was submitted on June 29 and, as all hon. members know, parliament prorogued two days later. Without prolonging the session there was no opportunity for a careful consideration of the report, much less for taking any action in connection with it.

During the recess I have had several interviews with the chairman of the civil service commission. He pointed out to me that of the twenty-five recommendations made by the committee, only five would require parliamentary or legislative action in order that they might be implemented. In most instances a change in regulations would bring about the purposes sought by the committee. I was told that the civil service commission had given study to this matter and had carried out a number of the recommendations made by the committee. In all fairness I think I should state that the former chairman of the committee took the stand when I met him that this was an optimistic statement, and that the commission had not carried out the recommendations to the extent mentioned.

I believe it should be one of the first duties of the new committee to call in representatives of the civil service commission, possibly the chairman, to find out exactly what action the commission has taken in connection with the recommendations which could be carried out by regulation. I must say also it has been suggested to me that two of the points raised in the report should be submitted to the committee dealing with superannuation because of its connection with this work. One of the recommendations is in regard to the eighty per cent of permanent employees in the different departments. It has been pointed out to me that if the present regulation were done away with, for which course quite a number of members have expressed a desire, this would add materially to the charges on the superannuation fund. The other recommendation is in regard to the age limit of sixty-five years.

I do not intend this afternoon to discuss any of these points. Although I respect your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I take the stand personally that the motion at present under consideration is to relieve the house of the discussion of many of the points which have been brought up this afternoon, and I propose to leave them for the committee to deal with. I merely remind the house that we have already in the civil service a regulation whereby a civil servant is not supposed to serve after sixty-five years of age. The recommendation of the committee of last year could mean only one thing, namely, that this regulation should be more drastically enforced. But surely it is not intended, just because the age limit of sixty-five years has been reached, to deprive the government of authority to retain in the service in special cases a man who is of great value and who would be very hard to replace. One other point I would indicate in that connection is that if the regulation were rigidly enforced immediately, this would add a considerable burden to the superannuation fund by throwing out many hundreds of employees whose services could under ordinary circumstances be continued by order in council.

These questions I consider should be reopened for further study by the committee, and there can be a merging with the new recommendations so that when this committee brings in its report during the course of the session we shall have only one report to deal with.

I have only to add a word to alleviate the fears of any hon. member that the continuance of the work of this committee may in the least degree weaken the authority of the civil service commission. On the contrary, the appointment of the committee is meant to strengthen the civil service commission and to surround it with the proper guarantees which it has a right to expect from parliament. I need hardly repeat what has been so often said by my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King), namely that the present government is strongly and unequivocally in favour of the merit system, and I believe that parliament, if the question were put to a vote, would pronounce by a very large majority in favour of the merit system. But we all know that in the application of that system regulations of all sorts have to be considered. There have been inquiries into the administration of the civil service during the course of every parliament. I have myself served on several such committees. The present inquiry was promised early in the life of this parliament, but on account of the shortness of the sessions the inquiry was started only last year, and the expectation in all quarters of the house was that it would be continued this year.

Let me assure hon. members that there is not the least desire on the part of the government, either in instituting the committee last year or in continuing it this year, to do away with the principle that obtains in the civil service. The committee is asked to inquire into the operation of the act and to recommend changes in the regulations. Of course, when you have a parliament of 245 members you cannot prevent all sorts of opinions from being voiced and all sorts of demands from being made, but I wish to say again most emphatically that so far as the government is concerned it stands strongly for the merit system. It wants that system applied fully, and it wants to surround the application of that system with all the guarantees that will make it worthy of our country. That is all I have to say, and in commending this resolution to the house I trust that the interesting debate we have had this afternoon will be referred for continuance to the committee when it is constituted.

Mr. STEWART: Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him one question as to the age for retirement, seventy or sixty-five? Is retirement now compulsory at sixty-five unless in individual cases an extension is made, or is it merely optional?

Mr. RINFRET: At sixty-five it is optional, although it does require an order in council. After seventy it is compulsory.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION FOR APPROVAL SUBJECT TO REQUIRED LEGISLATION

The house resumed from Friday, February 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King that the house go into committee on the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 17th day of November, 1938, between Canada and the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the house reads:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 17th day of November, 1938, between Canada and the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

We are debating this resolution, which is an important government measure effecting far-reaching reductions of duties in this country, and indirectly, perhaps it is fair to say, in Great Britain and the United States. We are debating the principle of this resolution, not the details, and if it had not been for some of the remarks made in the debate, principally by the speaker who preceded me (Mr. Stirling), I think I would try to avoid any mention of any particular commodities or any individual industries, because once one embarks upon a discussion of details it is pretty hard, within the time limit, to cover any ground at all.

What has interested me particularly in the debate has been the issue that seems to be developing between the government and the Conservative opposition. The opposition seems to be disinclined to come out strongly against this trade agreement, but rather to take the position that time alone can tell whether it is a good agreement or not. It is true that time alone can tell what the effect of some of the changes in individual tariff items will be, but it does not require time to tell a reasonably intelligent and patriotic Canadian whether he should be for or against the agreement. If it did, no government would dare sign such an agreement, and no opposition would dare oppose it. But this agreement is not pure speculation; it is not a leap in the dark; it is an agreement that is based on certain principles, and whether one is for or against the agreement should depend not upon the passage of time but upon one's belief or disbelief in those principles. The people of Canada will, I submit, judge the opposition, just as they will judge the government, according as they approve or disapprove those principles.

What does this trade agreement do? What are the principles underlying the making of it and the provisions of it? It seems to me that they are four in number: First, that it was the duty of the Canadian government to facilitate rather than to obstruct the making of the agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States. If one believes, as this government did and does, that the frustration of the negotiations between those two great democracies would have been a calamity, economic but not wholly economic, conditions being what they are in the world to-day, then he believes in one of the principles underlying this agreement, because an agreement of this kind was a pre-requisite to the other agreement.

The second principle is this, that it is in the interests of this country and all countries that the United States and the United Kingdom keep to the pathway of greater freedom of trade instead of greater restriction of trade. The two latter are now protectionist countries. We are not directly affected by Great Britain's protectionism to more than a very small extent, because she lets most of our products into her markets free of duty. But nothing has hurt this country more, economically, in the past than the extreme protectionism of the United States of America; and in my opinion very few things have hurt the United States or the world more. This is not a theoretical question. Many industries in this dominion have had bitter experience of the exclusion of their products from the United States market. And, if we assume that a turning point was coming in the course of the fiscal policy of the United States, it clearly was the duty of Canada to take a course that would lead to the stemming of this protectionist tendency in the United States instead of the encouragement of it. There is in the United States, as in most countries, continuous pressure on government by special interests to exclude competitive products from abroad. By this agreement this tendency is checked and a direction given to United States fiscal policy which will be of immeasurable benefit to mankind. If one believes that this development is important and salutary, he believes in another of the principles underlying this trade agreement.

The third principle is that the stabilization of our trade relations with the United States and the United Kingdom is desirable. The agreement with the United States was terminable by notice at any time after December 31, 1938. By that I mean that a notice could have been given before or after December 31, 1938, provided the agreement itself did not terminate before that time. It would have been most unsatisfactory for Canada to drift precariously in ignorance as to whether the agreement would be terminated, and if so, when. It was most important to give the future of our trade relations with the United States some certainty, and equally important to do so conformably to the wishes of the United Kingdom, so that when 1940 arrives we can expect a continuation for a considerable period, of the satisfactory trade relations which exist between Canada and the United Kingdom. The making of this agreement accords with the trade agreement policy of our two great customers, and places our own trade relations with both on a stable basis. This, it seems to me, is the third principle of the agreement.

The fourth is that our main trade interest as a great exporting nation, the fourth exporting nation in the world, is to have tariffs low in this world rather than high. The conclusion of a trade agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States with a large number of reductions in the tariffs of both countries, the benefits of which extend to many most favoured nations, is bound to have far-reaching reciprocal effects, of which we, as a most favoured supplier of those nations, will in the future receive the benefit.

These, it seems to me, are the main principles of the trade agreement. I do not know whether the opposition believe in them or not, but I think they will have to make up their minds. They have not told the house. The main feature of their attitude is one of rather gloomily predicting that time alone can tell. They do, however, say something else about the trade agreement. They say that it is an exchange of a certain market for an uncertain one. They say that we are losing a certain market in Great Britain and acquiring in lieu thereof an uncertain market in the United States. Neither one of these statements is correct. We are not losing, in any sense of the word, the British market, either partly or wholly; and we are not acquiring a market in the United States which under the circumstances is likely to be uncertain. It is said that if there is a change of government in the United States this agreement may be terminated and we may find our products once more excluded from that country. One of the surest safeguards against the cancellation of the Canada-United States trade agreement is the difference between the levels of our intermediate and general tariffs, which is a very great difference, and I am sure that no United States government will lightly consider the cancellation of an agreement with Canada which will subject their goods once more to the heavy disabilities of entry into this country under the general tariff. It is not reasonable that this would be the case. It may be that if their whole trading policy receives a new orientation at some future date, all their trade agreements will be cancelled; but I would point out that if that is the case, and if our trade agreement continues with Great Britain as we have every reason to expect that it will, the cancellation of the trade agreements as a whole will mean the restoration of our preferences in the British market—which will be a further deterrent to the cancellation of the trade agreements. So that I think we may expect a reasonable degree of certainty and stability to the arrangements that have been made under this trade agreement.

The next position taken by the opposition is that, whether this agreement is good in principle or not, we have paid too high a price for it. As the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) said on Friday night, the question becomes wholly one of price. What is the price that we are said to have paid for the agreement? It is said that we have lowered some of our duties too far, and undoubtedly that will be argued by a great many of the opposition speakers. On that point I can only say that, for an agreement which extends to and affects so many thousands of products imported into this country, the volume of complaint which the government has received is very small indeed. Some industries are afraid that they will lose more than they will gain by the agreement. But that is not true of more than a very few. Canadian industry as a whole is not displeased with, but is rather in favour of, this agreement, as is evident by the expressions of opinion which one has heard and read since the agreement was announced in November. The interests of Canadian industries have been carefully safeguarded, and for the most part they are not injuriously affected in the smallest degree.

The position taken seems to be that tariff concessions by Canada are necessarily sacrifices by this country. That is not the case. Tariff concessions are not necessarily sacrifices. It does not follow that because the other country is helped, this country is hurt. The concessions may help this country even more than the country to which the concessions are made. I have in mind, for example, Indian corn. The duty is reduced by this agreement from twenty cents to ten cents a bushel on the corn which is used by persons feeding stock on farms. But I do not think there would be any opinion, certainly not very much, in this country that the reduction of the farmer's costs from twenty cents to ten cents a bushel on the corn he buys would be an injury to this country; on the contrary it would be a benefit.

The hon. member for Yale, speaking on Friday night, referred to fruits and vegetables. He said that this is the third blow which this government has struck the fruit and vegetable industry. I would point out that the interests of the fruit and vegetable growers have been very carefully safeguarded in this agreement. I have before me a list of the twenty-seven fruits and vegetables which are affected by the agreement, and I have here also a list of their assumed invoice values when imported—I am confident that they are entirely fair, and they have been used in this house before. I have a computation of the protection that will still be extended to these fruits and vegetables during the seasons and in the regions where the protection accorded by fixed valuations applies, and I find that the average of ad valorem equivalents is still 65 per cent, while a great many of the ad valorem equivalents run to much higher figures, two of them going to over 100 per cent. These reductions in the valuations were not lightly agreed to. Everything was taken into account. The tariff rate was reduced from 15 to 10 per cent, but that benefits the consumer in the seasons when the fruits are imported. The agreement provides for sufficient protection in those regions and during those seasons when our growers can meet the demand.

It is said that we should not have consented to the modifications of preferences in the British market, and two products in particular are mentioned, namely wheat and apples. Wheat has been dealt with in the house by several speakers, and I do not feel particularly qualified to discuss it, but the impression I have received since this wheat preference went into effect in 1932 is that it has never had a beneficial effect upon the price of wheat received by the Canadian grower of that commodity. The reason is that the empire is a net exporter of wheat, and when a territory protected by a tariff wall is on an exporting basis the price within the tariff wall is always dependent upon, is always fixed by and cannot be higher than the price of the export surplus. It is true that some foreign wheat may have been shut out of the English market by the duty; but if Canadian wheat cannot all be marketed within the empire and some of it has to be marketed outside, it means that much additional competition outside, with the result that the price is depressed, bringing down the price within the empire to the world level. Under these conditions a duty has no beneficial effect on price.

If I remember correctly, and I meant to look this up, there was provision in the 1932 treaty that if the price were raised, if the price within the United Kingdom were higher than the world price, the protection should be withdrawn; and it never was withdrawn because the price in the United Kingdom market did not rise above the world price.

With regard to the other objection to the removal of the wheat preference, that such a removal will have an effect on ports, there are a great many things to be said. It must be remembered that Canadian ports do not handle only Canadian wheat which is shipped to United Kingdom destinations. Canadian ports handle Canadian wheat which is shipped to non-empire destinations as well; they handle United States wheat which is shipped to overseas destinations, empire and non-empire; and it is a completely inadequate statement of the situation to deal with the effect upon the first-class shipments alone. It is probable that the preference had the effect of routing some Canadian wheat destined for the United Kingdom through Canadian ports, which otherwise would have gone through United States ports. But there may have been—I do not say there was—a corresponding routing of Canadian wheat shipped to other overseas destinations and of United States wheat shipped to overseas destinations through Canadian ports, which otherwise would have been shipped through United States ports. One would have to go into the statistics to find out and it would require expert analysis, because it is far from easy to arrive at the true situation by a cursory examination of the figures. It does not follow that, because some Canadian wheat destined for the United Kingdom was diverted through Canadian ports, the Canadian ports gained on balance.

In the examination I have been able to give the figures, I find some curious facts. I find that even of Canadian wheat shipped to overseas destinations, including the United Kingdom, United States ports handled 30 per cent in the four preference fiscal years following 1932-33, as against only 43 per cent in the four pre-preference years, before 1932-33. In 1935-36, a preference year, the United States ports handled 37 per cent of Canadian wheat shipped to overseas destinations as against 34·7 per cent in 1931-32, a pre-preference year. I find that by far the largest quantity of wheat handled at Halifax was in the crop year 1928-29 when there was no preference, and one of the smallest quantities ever handled, if not the smallest, was in the crop year 1937-38 when there was a preference. So the amount of business done by the ports depends on so many other factors that it is a complete distortion of the facts to represent this as a major factor. Preference has always been a minor, varying and unpredictable factor in the production of Canadian port business.

I come now to a subject of which I know a little more than about wheat, namely, apples. The hon. member for Yale on Friday night said that he could not understand how the Minister of National Revenue could have gone to his constituency and have told the people of the Annapolis valley, who admittedly have a larger interest in the English market for apples than any other constituency in Canada, in fact more than the rest of Canada put together, that in his opinion this agreement would not hurt them but on the contrary would probably in the long run help them. The hon. member's theory, which was a most amusing and interesting one, was that the government had decided to throw away that constituency and to give up any hopes in his constituency, and therefore agreed to the reduction of the apple preference. Well, I hope I do not look as if I had committed political suicide. I am not conscious of having done so and can assure the house that so far as I can appraise the sentiments or the opinions of my constituents, they are in favour of this agreement, not against it, and I can give the reasons why they are.

To begin with, what was done? The duty on United States apples going into the United Kingdom was 4s. 6d. per hundredweight. We consented to a reduction, during the term of the agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States, to 3 shillings per hundredweight. The value of apples that we have shipped from Nova Scotia to the United Kingdom during the past ten years, according to the statistics here, was only a little over $2 a barrel f.o.b., shipping point, but I feel that this must be a little low and I am assuming that the average price during the past ten years was $2.25 a barrel. A duty of 4s. 6d. per hundredweight on that would be about $1.40 a barrel, which would be something over 60 per cent ad valorem on an f.o.b. valuation of $2.25. That is a pretty high protection; it was always recognized as such. As a matter of fact, I found that the apple interests of Nova Scotia in 1932 did not request a duty of 4s. 6d; they requested a duty of 2 shillings first, then 2s. 6d. and when other interests pressed for a duty of 5 shillings, they of course were agreeable to 4s. 6d.

I said that I think the apple growers of Nova Scotia are in favour of this agreement. They realize that the preference was the act of Great Britain, not of Canada; that the duties are British duties, not Canadian; that our agreement could be terminated by either Great Britain or ourselves in 1940, and that after 1940 Great Britain would have had the right to levy duties against our apples, or remove all duties against United States apples, or do anything else she wished with her apple duties. They felt also that it was important that we have some regard for Great Britain's wishes in this matter; that it would be folly for us to stand in her way merely for the sake of retaining an extremely high preference for one more season. It would have been dropping the substance for the shadow. Under this new arrangement our position is stabilized on what might be called a 30 to 40 per cent, rather than a 60 per cent, basis in the British market, which is a reasonable basis. They know that far more important than any duty against United States apples going into Great Britain is the preservation of free entry for our own apples. They feel also that with the new direction which has been given to the trade policies of the three countries, freedom of entry will not be threatened for a long time to come. They are aware that the high 4s. 6d. rate was unduly stimulating British production, and many were worrying about a duty the height of which was raising up in Great Britain competition which would eventually destroy us. The natural result of orchards being set out in Great Britain on a large scale would be that after a while the apple interests there would insist upon duties against our apples. Indeed, as the hon. member for Yale must know, there had already been some agitation for a duty of 2s. 6d. per hundredweight against our apples.

Mr. STIRLING: For many years past.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The new rate, being more moderate, will lessen the danger of over-production of apples in Great Britain with consequent restriction upon the movement of our apples. They recall that in 1930 and 1931 it was felt by Nova Scotian apple interests, probably for the reasons I have just mentioned, that 2 shillings and 2s. 6d. would be enough protection. True, the situation has changed somewhat since that time because of the stimulation of British production, but that process has not gone on so long that a correction cannot be attempted. They realize also that the chief benefit which the United States will get from lower British duties may be, not greater volume of sales in the British market, but greater returns on the same volume, on account of the fact that they will not have to pay so much to the British treasury in high duties. That expectation has been verified by the experience since January 1, as far as anything can be verified in so short a period. Shipments from the United States have not increased since January 1; they have gone along steadily maintaining the same relative proportion to the shipments of a year ago that they did before January 1, showing that the advantage for them is not an enlarged market for their apples but increased returns. Needless to say, our price cannot possibly be affected in the British market unless there is a substantial increase in the quantity of United States apples shipped into that market, and even then the effect on the price is wholly untraceable and unpredictable. I heard one hon. member, the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) I think, say that the reduction in this duty meant a reduction of so many cents a barrel in the price. It means nothing of the kind. The reduction in duty is not necessarily reflected in the price.

Mr. STEWART: That is a good argument for some of the minister's friends.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is true. It all depends on the conditions, but under these conditions it is true. For instance, for the five years succeeding 1932 the prices of our leading varieties were lower by several shillings a barrel than for the five previous years. I made a very careful study of that situation. They might, and probably would, have been lower still, had it not been for the preference, but it is utterly impossible to trace the effect of that particular kind of duty in increased or decreased prices.

Mr. STIRLING: As the Minister of Trade and Commerce says, time will tell.

Mr. EULER: I was echoing what the leader of the opposition said.

Mr. MANION: Keep on; it is worth echoing.

Mr. ILSLEY: The apple interests of Nova Scotia attach some importance to the anti-dumping provision in the agreement between the United States and the United Kingdom by which the British reserve the right to impose dumping duties or take other corrective measures if dumping is resorted to by United States shippers to the United Kingdom. They also attach importance to the letter from the United States government by which the United States have recognized the principle of regulation of shipments and have agreed to call the attention of their industry to the desirability of such regulation. That letter appears in one of the annexes to the agreement. They know that our position in the Canadian market remains unaffected, and they are gratified by the reduction in duties and import taxes, which is provided for by the trade agreement, on some of their supplies, particularly on spraying and dusting materials and fertilizers, and upon agricultural implements, including spraying and other orcharding machinery from which the 3 per cent special excise tax is to be removed. It is for these reasons that the apple growing interests in Nova Scotia are satisfied that the present level of preference, which, after all, on a $2.25 per barrel price basis is still over 40 per cent, when taken with the other provisions of the agreement will prove a help rather than an injury to the apple growing industry of that province.

But even if the situation were different, I am satisfied that my constituents would not be disposed to be so narrow as to regard this agreement purely as a matter of a few cents a barrel on apples.

Mr. SPENCE: The minister must have a wonderful country.

Mr. MICHAUD: It is.

Mr. ILSLEY: I must admit that they are perhaps a little in advance of myself in that regard, and they are a long way in advance of the hon. member for Yale, if we are to take his speech of last Friday night as a true reflection of his feelings. When these trade agreements were first talked of, I found that they appreciated the situation with which this country and this government were confronted. They knew that when the United States and the United Kingdom started negotiations last year, this was a new and dramatic development in international trade. It appealed to their imagination, to the imagination of the people of Great Britain and the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ILSLEY: The Tory party cannot understand that. I knew that when I said that it would provoke a laugh from the opposition benches. But it is true, and true of the people of this country as a whole.

Mr. STIRLING: Such a happy truth!

Mr. ILSLEY: They realized that vital interests, fundamental principles and the future welfare of hundreds of millions of people were involved; they realized that Anglo-Saxon commerce was at the cross-roads. Would it take the way of rigid exclusionism or the way of mutual concession? And they were in favour of Canada adopting a policy of give and take, which they felt was the only policy for this country, as well as for the other two countries involved in the transaction, to adopt.

The people of my constituency, and I think the people of Canada as a whole, realized this, that in a day of totalitarian gibes and sneers at democracy, it was a matter of pride and satisfaction that great democracies could work together for great ends.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

POST OFFICE ACT

AMENDMENT PROHIBITING MAILING OF COMMUNISTIC LITERATURE

Mr. WILFRID LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) moved the second reading of Bill No. 4, to amend the Post Office Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I consider it advisable, before asking the house to prevent the distribution by mail of all communistic propaganda, to define my conception of communism and to endeavour to penetrate hon. members with the importance for this country of preventing the distribution of a species of propaganda opposed to our best traditions and to the Christian character of our country, symbolized every day in this chamber when, before beginning our deliberations, we invoke the help of God.

Communism is above all a philosophical system based on materialism. For communists, matter, that is whatever falls under the senses, was not created, but has always existed. Originally imperfect, matter has evolved and improved until it has produced, first, animals in general, then the human animal which is man.

To the objection that man has a soul spiritual and intelligent which, through the brain, can think and have ideas, communists answer that there is no such thing as the soul. Thought, according to them, is the product of the animal organism in activity. Ideas—yours and mine—are secreted by the brain, just as bile is secreted by the liver and urine by the kidneys.

If intelligence is solely the product of the brain, it disappears at death. There is therefore no future life. If man himself is only the result of evolution and the perfected descendent of eternally-moving matter, there is no creator, no God.

How is it, then, that the communists are so bitter against a God whose existence they deny? Why this inconsistency? Let us seek the explanation.

Communism is not only a religious heresy, it is not only atheism; it is also a system of economics.

The world is out of balance to-day, communists assert, because capitalism has become too powerful. It has upset the balance to the detriment of the working class. In order to rebuild an economic structure better suited to man, whom matter has begotten in view of temporal happiness, it is necessary that the vanquished force regain the upper hand, which is impossible without class war, without political revolution, without upsetting governments, so as to bring about a new economic order where the individual will be merged in the all-embracing proletarian society.

But the revolution of the oppressed masses against their oppressors cannot be carried on without hatred. And belief in God, the existence of religions, particularly of the Catholic religion, the presence of the Pope, of bishops and of priests, are so many obstacles in the way of hatred, so many obstacles to the setting in motion of the class struggle out of which the regenerative revolution is to come.

[Mr. W. Lacroix.]

These obstacles communists seek to remove by attacking God, religion, the clergy and all movements of faith leading to the love of God and of one's neighbour.

Religion says: Thou shalt love thy fellowmen, all of them without exception; white man, thou shalt love the negro; rich man, thou shalt love the poor; poor man, thou shalt love the rich; negro, thou shalt love the white man. To all, thou shalt wish well and, above all, thou shalt seek to do justice to others and respect their rights. Communism speaks otherwise. It says: Thou shalt devote thyself to thy class, to proletarians like thyself; but remember that whoever does not belong to thy class is necessarily thine enemy; remember that good is whatever is useful to thy class and evil whatever may weaken it.

This is a gospel of egoism, as opposed to the gospel of universal brotherhood.

But the opposition between communism and religion, particularly the Catholic religion, extends to other fields. Communism seeks happiness in the joy of ensuring material comfort to all men, while religion teaches that happiness is to be found only in the inner life, in peace of heart and rectitude of mind. Communism knows only the sexual instinct which assimilates man to the beasts, while religion seeks to raise man to true and constant love—conjugal love, paternal or maternal love, filial or fraternal love.

Communism, seeing only the body, recognizes only the individual, while religions honour the family.

Communism makes of truth and justice a matter of class, while religions teach that truth, justice and right are either universal or nothing at all.

Communism subordinates the individual to the social group whose blind servant he is to be, adopting its ideas, its loves and its hates, in a word, its ideology. Religion, on the contrary, places above all else human dignity and free responsibility by virtue of which every man must seek the truth for himself and freely embrace it—human dignity which respects the ideas of others and expects to triumph over error only by the methods of reason, and which places the individual conscience above collective opinion.

Such are the vast differences which separate communism from religion. A struggle is inevitable.

Lenin said:

I hate God as a personal enemy.

He spoke truly, for the real God uproots from the heart of man the god of hatred and violence, of blood and filth, which Lenin adored. That is why communists seek to destroy God. It is also Lenin who said:

> We have dethroned the czars of the earth, we will now destroy those of Heaven. We shall pursue our attacks against God in due time and in the proper manner, and we are confident of overthrowing him in his empire.

Passing from word to action, the communists have in Russia, Mexico and Spain crucified, killed or tortured priests, monks and nuns, violated cemeteries and the corpses of nuns, and pillaged, profaned or demolished temples, tabernacles and sacred vessels.

In order properly to appreciate the malice and hatred of communism against God, religion, the clergy and the faithful, it must be remembered that its leaders have invented a religion whose very name should make the godless tremble. Godlessness exists since eleven years. Organized in 50 countries, it has 7,000,000 active members and 82,000,000 supporters grouped in 70,000 cells, against 9,000 six years ago. Its newspaper, Bezbonitz, has a circulation of 180,000. Every line is a blasphemy, every illustration a sacrilege.

And, in answer to Canadian propagandists who carry diplomacy to the point of distinguishing between godlessness and communism, and maintain that they have nothing to do with the godless, I would say that they are twins.

Words and facts prove it.

In March 1936, Yaroslavsky, leader of the godless, said:

> Ten years of battle against the opium of religion bring the triumph of communism ten years nearer.

Lenin's wife admits that "atheistic education remains the aim of the soviet government." To those words which reflect the intimate relations between the godless and the communists, may be added the testimony of facts. Stalin encourages the godless and rejoices over their success.

On May 15, 1932, the communist government of Russia passed a decree containing 118 clauses and planning in great detail the fight against God. Pravda, the official organ of the Russian communist party, gives its assistance to the godless in the same manner as to the police agents, most of whom are active members of the godless movement.

Therefore, communism is a counter-religion whose creed and worship rest on the inexistence of God, the basis of which is materialism, and whose religious consequences are a battle against religion, against the clergy, the churches and the religious orders. But such an heresy has social consequences which materialized in Russia in a revolting manner.

Communists do not want war upon God for its own sake; they do not want class struggle for its own sake; they do not encourage revolution for the sake of revolution; they do not desire power for the sake of power. To their mind, class war, revolution, the fight against God, power are only means to establish a collectivistic economic system which will replace the capitalist system.

But it would be useless to destroy capitalism and capitalists if the working classes were to apply the same ideas, because they, in their turn, would become capitalists. What then, will be the principles of the communist system?

The first economic act of the working and peasant classes, were they to come to power, would be to put an end to profit. Everyone knows that profit is the spread between the sale price and the cost of production. Ten thousand pairs of shoes cost $15,000 to Company X; the company sells them for $20,000. Its profits will be $5,000, and it will be distributed in dividends to the stockholders. Under the communist system, there will be no profit. It will have been distributed in advance by way of remuneration to the workers. Because, according to the communists, the appreciation in value of a product is solely due to the labour put in it.

Therefore, money capital is not productive. Consequently, interest on money will also be abolished.

If the manual labour alone is to be paid for, how will it be done? Labour is not a commodity, everybody is agreed on that point. It is the condition which must be fulfilled by each one of us, to the extent of his ability, in order that he may have the right to live. From that springs the great principle: from everyone according to his capacity, to everyone according to his needs.

As the labour of everyone varies and his needs also according to his health, his age, and his sex, society alone will distribute commodities and responsibilities. Commerce will be nationalized as well as production.

But, if production is to be commensurate with the needs of consumption, it must conform to predetermined plans to the realization of which labourers will work.

Therefore ,the new state will acquire the industrial plants, the soil, the water powers, the machines, the tools, the buildings, in a word all capital goods. It will be the end of private property.

You will easily see the social consequences of such doctrines.

The communist does not admit other society than the whole of humanity. From that, follows the destruction of the family. In the communistic society, where the individual does not work for himself but where the whole giant community works for all, there is no place for the family. "The primary end of marriage is the support, the education and the future of the child." Now, the child, according to communist ideas, is only a member of the giant community working for all. He is bound to that community, and he should be, as any individual, fed, brought up and guided by it, and not by his parents.

Under our system, milk, swaddling-clothes, fuel, housing and education are goods which parents must buy for their children. Under the communist system:

> There are no goods, but only products, which are not bartered. They are neither bought nor sold, but merely deposited in soviet warehouses and delivered to those who need them.

They are delivered to children as to others, in the State nurseries or kindergarten. And so, parents will be freed from the marriage bond which keeps them together in the interest of the child.

If, under the communist system, the family was merely useless, the bolshevists would not be very much concerned about it. They want to destroy it because it is for them an irreconcilable enemy. How could it be otherwise? He who has a wife; children and a home, will always have a tendency to work for his own family rather than for the giant State, to devote himself entirely to his own kin rather than to an anonymous community and to secure their future by taking something from the common stock. Communism must, therefore, even by resorting to violence, break that universal mentality. The individual should accustom himself not to place a screen between himself and the proletarian society dreamed of, to consider himself as a unit in the gigantic hive, and not, primarily, as a husband or a wife, as a father or a mother.

In order to attain that antifamily aim, communism permits free love, optional registration of marriages as well as of divorces, optional cohabitation, absolute freedom for each consort to organize his life as he wishes; abortion and action without restriction for affiliation.

Is it necessary to add that the application of such principles led to most spectacular failure? It would entail the description of the picture of millions of children slowly dying in concentration camps, where vice reigns supreme; the picture of millions of young men or young women living in the same institutions in a depraved promiscuity encouraged by the State.

Lenin's widow did not hesitate to say:

> For a Russian girl to oppose resistance to rape is to act in opposition to the communist revolution.

Is it a wonder, in those circumstances, that communists consider women only as instruments of pleasure available to all? No wonder that abortions are counted by the million every year, that this number is two or three times that of births. In 1935 alone, there were 150,000 abortions as against 70,000 births, in Moscow, the capital of the U.S.S.R.

Such is communism, considered from the religious, the economic and the social angles. Let us envisage it now from the political point of view.

Is it necessary to repeat that the communists consider that the world is at present divided into two classes: the capitalists, who make others work; the labourers, who work. Above them, governments which protect the capitalists as much as possible to the prejudice of the workers, or proletarians.

Communists insist that capital, wealth, goods and instruments of production belong to everybody, that is to say to the community, to humanity, which will comprise only one class, that of the present proletarians, of the exploited of to-day.

In order to change the existing situation, to destroy the capitalist class and give its wealth to the whole community, communists claim that existing governments should be overthrown and the political power over countries turned over to industrial workers and peasants.

In order to overthrow governments, to conquer power, communists are advocating and organizing revolutions in Mexico and Spain, as they did in Russia.

I have said that they organize revolutions. To that effect, the Third International has been formed, to be the universal instrument of political revolution.

It is time to prove that the idealistic structure of communism, aiming at bringing heaven on earth by means of collectivism, is an immense farce, a colossal humbug.

I will demonstrate: first, that the Third International is the outgrowth of the Russian communist party and of the Russian soviet government; secondly, that the Russian soviet government is the tool, the creature of the Russian communist party; thirdly, that the Russian soviet government and the Russian communist party are ruled by a political bureau having jurisdiction over all the communist parties of the world; fourthly, that this political bureau is, in turn, dominated by one man: Stalin.

And we will all conclude that the famous rule of the proletarian class, which is supposed to lead us to an earthly paradise, is the rule, not of the working class, but of Stalin.

The Third International is the outgrowth of the Russian communist party and of the Russian soviet government. I will prove it: The Third International, called Komintern in Russian, was created in 1918 by three leaders of the Russian communist party, Lenin, Stalin and Sverdlof, at a congress, where 17 of the 35 delegates were members of the Russian communist party. At one of its sittings, Zinovief spoke as follows:

I say that our party considers that it is very urgent officially to establish the Third International.

Lenin stated:

The aim of the International, its essential function, which is the practical application of the marxist doctrine and the social ideal, of a hundred years standing, of the proletarian movement—that distinctive feature of the Third International—has immediately found its expression in the fact that the new International Union of Proletarians has just identified itself, so to speak, with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, designated by the initials U.S.S.R.

Why have the communist party and the government of Soviet Russia created the IIIrd International? In order to carry on revolutionary activities throughout the whole world. As an official organization of the U.S.S.R., the Commissariat for Foreign Affairs could not very well organize the overthrow of foreign governments. An organization free from suspicion, from scruples and from diplomatic sanctions had to be established. Such an organization is the Third International.

While the Commissariat for Foreign Affairs officially represents the Soviet government and maintains contact with the Foreign Offices of other countries in all official relations between states, the Third International deals, in its capacity of special organization of the Russian communist party and of the Soviet State, with all relations with the masses in foreign countries capable of being used for the purposes of world revolution. It endeavours by various means to obtain the adhesion of these masses to the bolshevist cause and to organize them under the auspices of the Komintern, an organization created for the special purpose of acting as an agency of propaganda and world revolution.

I think I have clearly established, first, that the Third International or Komintern is a revolutionary instrument, an incendiary torch destined to light the fire of civil war in all countries. Secondly, I stated that the Russian government is itself the tool of the communist party. Let us look into the matter. It must be admitted that the new Russian constitution established last autumn grants to men and women of 18 years and over the right to vote, that is to choose their rulers. But they cannot choose between candidates. Candidates can be put forward by only one party, the communist party. Section 141 is clear on that point:

The right to nominate candidates is granted to social and workers' organizations, to organizers of the communist party, to trades unions, to cooperative societies, to youth organizations and cultural societies.

Section 126 makes this restriction still more severe, for it says that the communist party——represent the ruling nucleus of all workers' organizations, social as well as state.

The organizations which, under section 141, are allowed to nominate candidates are therefore directed by the communist party. If the candidates among which the rulers are chosen are tools of the communist party, whose iron discipline I shall indicate further on, the resulting government will necessarily be its tool also. Thirdly, the communist party itself is dominated by an executive acting under the orders of an all-powerful political bureau.

In short, the party, composed of only 2,000,000 Russians, holds both government and people under its control by means of its iron discipline. The heads of the party hold that informing and spying are among the duties of every member.

Spying and informing are practised on a large scale. The executive loses no occasion to remove from the party, if not from the land of the living, all those who think differently from the party leaders. Therein is to be found the explanation of the famous trials of the so-called Trotskysts and of others.

According to Ossingsky, the Political Bureau is the last resort. It is the most important section of the party, it is concerned not only with the most serious economic and political problems of Russia, but also with a multitude of less important questions.

Fourthly, it remains to be established that the Political Bureau is dominated by Stalin, that Stalin has the final say, that he is a dictator.

Voroschiloff said before the congress:

It is the Political Bureau that decides upon the policy of the U.S.S.R. . . . I state that comrade Stalin is the most important member of the Political Bureau, although he never claims to be the first; he takes the most active part in the solution of the problems and his proposals are accepted more often than those of the other members.

Stalin is general secretary of the communist party, but that is not the title under which he is acclaimed. At the conventions of the party and of the Third International he is hailed as "chief of the Soviet Union, of the Communist International, of the coming bolshevik world revolution."

The official newspapers of the U.S.S.R. and of the Komintern hail Stalin as the Fuhrer of the U.S.S.R., the supreme chief of the proletariat and of the workers of the world.

In a word, he is the man of iron who, thanks to the G.P.U., terrorizes 161 millions of Russians and sends to the firing squad all those who give him umbrage.

All that is done in the name of liberty, equality and fraternity. In the name of liberty, Russian communism has executed 12,000 priests, 8,000 teachers, and caused the death of 35 to 40 millions of people. In the name of liberty, it has imprisoned millions who were suspected of non-communist opinions, and still almost every day Stalin destroys dozens of his opponents. In the name of liberty, he has forced the citizens to work like mercenaries for thirty cents a day, under the watch of an army of police officers.

In the name of equality, the Moscow government has abolished military distinctions and placed its underlings in command. In the name of equality also, it has stolen the money of the capitalists and of the nobility, especially for the benefit of the heads of the communist party and of the organizers of the revolution of 1917.

Finally, in the name of fraternity, the Russian government has separated husbands from their wives and children. In the name of fraternity, children have been burnt alive or starved to death in concentration camps infested with vermin and vice.

Bondage, slavery, terrorism, persecution and barbarity spell the result of twenty years of communist government. And that is the kind of government that is proposed to the nations of the world! And it is to achieve the same results that the agents of Moscow try to enter America! And it is for such results that many Canadians prepare themselves for the struggle in the ranks of the Third Communist International!

That must not be.

We must prevent the teaching of communism in our country. That is the object of the bill which I submit to this house.

I think communist literature could easily be traced by a proper utilization of the dead-letter branch of the Post Office Department. The communist newspapers are all published in Toronto from where they are sent to different addresses in the province of Quebec. They are mailed free to the members of labour unions. The names of the members of labour unions are obtained from directories, and when those people move to a different address, a large number of those papers are sent to the dead letter office where they can be traced back to their publishers without extra expenditure to the Post Office Department.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, at the last session I moved an amendment to the Post Office Act. I introduced a bill having particular reference to newspapers; it passed this house, but it did not have much success in another place.

Christianity is part of the law of England. By the Constitutional Act of 1791, so much of the law of England was copied in Canada as was adapted to our circumstances, and automatically Christianity became in that year the law of Canada. Had I been at the Conservative convention last July I would have urged that there be incorporated in our platform, a declaration in favour of the Christian religion in Canada, because it was made part of the platform of the Chamberlain government and of the National Conservative party at the great convention which was addressed by Lord Baldwin and Mr. Chamberlain.

In my opinion this particular bill is not one which this parliament should pass. Hon. members need only read Lord Hewart's textbook, The New Despotism, to see where liberty is heading and will wind up if parliament divests itself of any part of its power, either to the Postmaster General or to the governor general in council, and thus gives his or its decision the force of a statute. I am surprised at the use here of the name "Liberalism," because we have no Liberals in this country as they have them in England. It seems to me that some of the real Conservatives are on the government front benches opposite.

I am not a communist, and I have no sympathy with what the hon. gentleman says is being done in the province of Quebec by those who preach subversive doctrines. Let me say something which I hope the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will heed, about Canada's foes within and without the country. I was glad to read, after all the abuse which public men are getting these days, the tribute that was paid to the right hon. gentleman in the venerable and ancient city of Quebec—a tribute which was as merited as deserved. I understand the assembly had a fine and witty chairman in the person of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), whom I do not see present. But let me say this to the right hon. Minister of Justice, that after having sat in this house since 1921, I believe that some of the most distinguished Conservatives who can be found in this country are sitting on the government front benches.

I am opposed to any contraction in the liberty of the subject. The same speeches and the preaching of such doctrines, of which the hon. member has been complaining, are being heard almost every day in the British House of Commons from the communists. If the government want to do something to stop communism, let them go to work as a government and eliminate abuses, social and domestic, in Canada. They have not done very much this session—so little that our friends in another house, having taken three weeks' holiday, decided to take another three weeks. They have not this famous bill of mine to amend the Post Office Act, commonly known as the newspaper bill, but they might have had this Bill No. 4, introduced by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Lacroix).

The hon. gentleman wants to do something to stop communism. When I was chairman of the Toronto police commission, its members included Colonel Denison, the late Judge Winchester, and Lieutenant-Colonel Chief Grasset, a very good chief and for thirty-four years the head, who had served in and commanded the Royal Grenadiers in the North-west Rebellion. His father was rector of St. James cathedral, having succeeded the late Bishop Strachan, the first Bishop of Toronto. When this communistic propaganda first started in Toronto, "It would be far better," said Colonel Denison, "to let these people get up and make some speeches, the way they do in Hyde Park—probably nobody will pay an awful lot of attention to them—than to have them meet privately in secret and do damage." That was the policy then. When this movement started, few belonged. That policy was reversed, and I do not say, wrongly, because concerted efforts had been made by a section of the people to attack the institutions of this country and preach subversive doctrines. I do not know all the circumstances, because I have not been a member of the police commission since 1921, and I do not wish in any sense to criticize the later commission who did their duty. They were dealing with a different time, a different state of affairs, and a different set of facts; they were faced with unrest in the country; their action may have been right or wrong. But I will say this, that under the British constitution we are supposed to have free parliaments, a free press, the rights of free speech and free assembly, and the blessings of Magna Charta. None of these things, in my opinion, exists in Canada to-day. Does Magna Charta exist in Canada to-day with imprisonment for debt; people imprisoned because they cannot find work; rights of property abolished; and youth cast into gaol because they go about the country seeking work, whose only fault is that they cannot find it? Yet we sit here and do nothing about the matter. What we should do is to remove the principal cause of communism, namely, unemployment and cure our social and domestic disorders in the state. Tens of thousands of our Canadian people are suffering untold hardships, many of them suffering privation such as has not been known since the failure of the potato crop in Ireland. Within almost a stone's throw from this building such conditions of unemployment and want exist around us. Why does parliament not do something, instead of discussing a long list of bills and motions to change flags, to change the British North America Act, and to make it impossible for efficiency in the civil service to function by providing that one man shall speak English here, another man French there, German and Danish somewhere else and all that sort of thing, instead of selecting men from the standpoint of efficiency. These are the bills that are brought down in the name of Liberalism in this country, instead of measures to solve the problem of unemployment. I suggest that the government should do something tangible to put a stop to communism, and the first thing for them to do is to remove the evils that create communism, those forces from within and from without. If they do that, I guarantee that there will be no more communism or little of it in Canada.

I am not here to support or justify communism; in fact, communists have run against me many times. In my humble opinion, if the Postmaster General (Mr. McLarty) wants to pass regulations he should pass regulations to put a stop to the flood of United States magazines such as Scribner's coming in with slanderous articles against the king of this country. Let him put a stop to the inroads of United States papers; let him pay some attention to the radio speeches that are being made attacking British institutions. There have been attacks against the Chamberlain government and the Munich pact for some time in the United States. Hardly a United States newspaper supported the Munich pact apart from the Washington Post, the New York Times, the Cleveland Plain Dealer and a few others. They denounced Chamberlain and peace. I say, put a stop to all these attacks upon the British empire, our king and our constitution. But these publications are coming in by tens, yes, and hundreds. I do not blame the Postmaster General; he has been in office only a few days and the barriers were let down in 1935. I know he does not believe in this sort of thing. In 1935 the regulations were changed by this government with the result that all sorts of cheap United States weekly and daily newspapers began to come across the border, newspapers attacking every institution that we hold sacred—Christianity, the church of God, religion, the British empire. These publications with their violent anti-British propaganda, are thrown on the news stand and you can buy them right in every Canadian city including the city of Ottawa.

But these attacks have been coming over the radio, too. Why, they have professors broadcasting. It used to be that an apple a day kept the doctor away; but with the radio came the professor and now it is, a professor a day keeps the unemployed away. The only reliable information we used to get from the "Heart of Empire" came over the radio through Mr. Beverley Baxter. He used to address the Canadian people over the radio, giving them the real facts of what was going on in England under the Chamberlain government, but he was stopped because he was the only man on the radio who criticized the silence of the north American continent, by which I mean the United States and Canada, during the Munich crisis. "Mum" was the word before and after Munich by Canada and the United States. Yet this propaganda continues to come over the radio, and agents and debaters are engaged and maintained to transmit this sort of thing on the international and Canadian broadcasts.

I repeat, let us remove the evils that make for communism and there will not be a hundred communists in Canada to-morrow. Let us abolish some of the great social cruelties and ills from which the people and workers of Quebec and Ontario, the two industrial provinces of Canada, are suffering and there will soon be an end to this evil of communism. In the second place, let us remove, by reforms, the evils that beset the British empire. Canada is assailed by foes from within and without. Our enemies within we know, and we must reorganize and act quickly. We have waited since 1921 for sickness and unemployment insurance, but it is not yet on the statute books. Hon. gentlemen opposite promised that if they were elected they would put such measures into effect within a month or two, but they have not done so yet. Let us reorganize and secure reforms from within the country. Let us revamp and reorganize our parliamentary system and bring it up to date so as to provide security more quickly for the working classes and some relief from the intolerable hardships which they are suffering at the present time. Many of them are being driven out of their homes. Let us reorganize our constitutional system, our cabinet system, our capitalist system, and lastly let us have some measure of law reform which will remedy the evils to which we are exposed both within and without. So far as our foes from without are concerned, we are exactly where we were in 1812. We are dependent on the mother country for protection on land and sea and in the air, and this $63,000,000 that is being provided will not amount to much.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that this is a bill for the purpose of amending the Post Office Act with a view to preventing the spread of communistic propaganda. I must ask him to confine his remarks to the purpose of the bill.

Mr. CHURCH: I think I have kept pretty well to the point, Mr. Speaker. I have been giving reasons why the act should not be amended, and dealing with the principle of the bill, namely, communism and its causes. I am opposed to any interference with the liberty of the subject or to contracting it in any way here. There is not much liberty left to-day. Does Magna Charta exist to-day, with imprisonment for debt without bail, and high-school children being driven to ride the rods in Canada, seeking work and being imprisoned for not finding it? I am absolutely opposed to any further infringement of the liberty of the subject whether it be under this bill or not. We learn from Green's history what conditions were like in his day in England. They were going to put George Stephenson in gaol when he was eighteen years of age because they said he was a communist and thought he was insane—he had perfected the steam engine which has done so much for mankind.

Clause 1 of this bill does not give us any definition of communism. Our Lord, the lowly carpenter, was a communist according to the meaning given by a writer to the word in the Canadian Churchman, a Church of England organ. The word "communism" was defined by the able rector of Christ church in Toronto and has a varied meaning. For instance, communism means, in some instances, anything that is for the good of the community or for the common good. In 1910, when the hydro-electric movement came in, Sir James Whitney, Sir Adam Beck, and I were called communists and were described as nothing but "amateur anarchists" by Sir John Willison, an editor, because we wanted to preserve and reclaim the water powers of Ontario for the people of this province. It would have been well for the province of Quebec had the same thing been done there.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is far from the subject.

Mr. CHURCH: This bill encroaches upon the liberty of the subject. It puts us back about two hundred years. It is proposed to give the Postmaster General power to make regulations. He may prohibit the sending of communist literature. I listened recently to a certain rector preaching on Sundays, and I heard him declare that some communist teaching is in the bible and some of it in the Anglican prayer-book. One of our Anglican rectors has told us that. I have no sympathy whatever with the doctrines of this third international, or of the communist party of Canada, or of such groups. But I have every sympathy with the principle of the liberty of the subject. I believe in the principles of Liberalism as they are understood in the old country, the old Cornish battle-cry. I believe the hon. member would do something far better if he would bring in something practical to help unemployment and solve our social ills in this country. For these reasons I cannot see my way to support the principle of the bill.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I ask my hon. friend's pardon if I speak in English in replying to him, because I desire to be understood by all the members of the house. In his explanatory notes he says:

> The purpose of this amendment is to enlarge the powers of the Postmaster General as to the making of regulations.

And for that purpose he would insert some words about communist literature. As a matter of fact, the postal law as it stands, and the regulations which have been enacted under that law, cover anything that might be objectionable; and I believe that what my hon. friend seeks to do, would, instead of enlarging these powers, have rather the effect of restricting their application to the particular doctrine described in his bill.

The law as it is at present is reproduced in the explanatory notes, and reads:

> 7. The Postmaster General may, subject to the provisions of this act,
> (d) make regulations declaring what shall and what shall not be deemed to be mailable matter for the purposes of this act . . .

And regulation 204 of the Post Office Department, which has been regularly published in the Canada Gazette and which is binding, reads:

> 204. If it be established to the satisfaction of the Postmaster General that any person is engaged or represents himself as engaged in the business of publishing any obscene or immoral books, pamphlets, pictures, prints, engravings, lithographs, photographs or other publication, matter or thing of an indecent, immoral, seditious, disloyal, scurrilous or libelous character, or in the business of an illegal lottery, so-called gift concerts, or other similar enterprise offering prizes or concerning schemes devised or intended to deceive or defraud the public for the purpose of obtaining money under false pretences, or in the business of selling or in anywise disposing of counterfeit money or what is commonly called "green goods," or of drugs, medicines, instruments, books, papers, pamphlets, recipes, prescriptions, or other things with the object or with the pretended object of preventing conception or procuring abortion, and if such person shall, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, endeavour to use the post office for the promotion of such business, or if it be established to the satisfaction of the Postmaster General that any persons are using, or endeavouring to use the post office for any fraudulent or illegal purpose, then, in any such case, it is hereby declared that no letter, packet, parcel, newspaper, book or other thing sent or sought to be sent through the post office by or on behalf of or to or on behalf of such person shall be deemed mailable matter.

Then regulation 205 prescribes:

> It is forbidden to post for delivery or transmission by or through the post any obscene or immoral book, pamphlet . . . or other publication, matter or thing, of an indecent, immoral, seditious, disloyal or scurrilous character. . . .

In short, anything that is subversive, seditious, that advocates the use of force for the purpose of bringing about any change in the government of Canada, is already prohibited under the regulations of the Post Office Department. This does not mean that some do not find their way into the mails, but as I stated, the regulations cover any literature of the kind described by my hon. friend, and cover more. They cover not only subversive literature coming from the communists but subversive literature coming from people who, under the pretence of fighting communism, are also circulating literature which is objectionable and is advocating illegality and other things.

I agree with most of what my hon. friend stated about communism and communists; I agree that we must combat such doctrines, especially the doctrine which is exemplified in the various writings which he has read to the house to-night. But the communists are not the only ones who have been using force to change governments in the world. They are not even the only ones who have circulated literature and committed acts against religion, just as bad as those described by my hon. friend. Just before coming to the house to-night, I happened to put my hand on an article in the Readers Digest for February, 1939, entitled Nazi Scapegoat No. 2, and that scapegoat is catholicism. Perhaps some literature which is there described would be just as objectionable to my hon. friend as that of the communists. For instance, when they speak of "Roman internationalism, the ally of communism;" when the Angriff, which is a very important paper, sneers at the "abnormal alliance between the clergy and Marxism", and when the Völkischer Beobachter speaks of the "criminal attitude" of the Catholic church and its Muscovite ally—well this as far as possible is all barred propaganda, and we ought to do our best to prevent it from being circulated or carried on in Canada.

I am getting reports from pretty good sources, reports which do not go to everybody, and I may say that there is literature propagated in Canada which comes from other than communist sources which as far as possible we would like to check the circulation of in this country. The trouble is that even with the best postal regulations this is a difficult matter to control. For instance, under their regulations the postal authorities do not open what is called first class mail matter, letters and so on; and I think hon. members of this house would be opposed to giving power to any minister to open private letters just because there might be some suspicion that there was something objectionable in them. I know by experience that much of this objectionable propaganda is being sent in sealed letters. Only a couple of months ago a gentleman brought me a letter which had been addressed to him, enclosing a very, very objectionable piece of propaganda literature, at the end of which was not the anvil but rather what the late head of Christianity described as a hooked cross which was not the cross of Christ.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that the postal regulations are sufficient in this regard. I know that in some quarters the mere fact that I do not accept my hon. friend's bill will be branded as a friendly act on my part towards communism, but I say the bill is more restrictive than the regulations are to-day. My hon. friend sent a copy of his bill to the premier of Quebec, and of course I find no fault with that. My hon. friend received that gentleman's blessing for the introduction of the bill, and with that also I find no fault. But in his letter, which he took care to publish in the press, the premier of Quebec attacked the federal government. With that I find no particular fault, either, because we are accustomed to it; but he said he could not understand why this government had issued passports to communists who went to fight in Spain. This is not true. In 1937, as the house remembers, this parliament enacted the Foreign Enlistment Act, which made it a crime for any Canadian to go and fight on either side in the Spanish conflict or for anyone to recruit for either side. When that act was passed, an order in council also was passed prohibiting the issuing of passports to anyone for travel in Spain. As a matter of fact, all passports issued during the last two years contained that exception, reading as follows:

Not valid for travel to Spain, the Balearic islands, the Canary islands, and towns and territories under Spanish sovereignty in Africa.

No doubt some of the twenty odd thousand people to whom passports have been issued each year by the Department of External Affairs found it possible to go to Spain, but not because of their passports. They went there illegally, and just in passing I may add that I know of someone who certainly was on the other side of that conflict, who found a way to get to Spain without having a passport permitting him to do so. But how could the government control that? More than that, in the Foreign Enlistment Act, which made it a crime for a Canadian to enlist or recruit for enlistment in the armies of either side, there were provisions for penalties. All these were put under the sections of the criminal code. Under the law as it is now, if crimes were committed because of that Foreign Enlistment Act, the British North America Act—and I hope I shall not get on the nerves of anybody by mentioning that act—provides that it is the attorney general of the province who must put into execution any penalties of this kind. So perhaps this will give food for thought to those who criticize us in this matter.

Under the circumstances, sympathizing as I do with the purpose which my hon. friend has in view, a purpose which, if such a bill were necessary at present, I would enlarge to apply to other forms of subversive propaganda in Canada, I do think this is unnecessary. In our laws we have all that is required to permit the control which could be exercised by the Postmaster General in this regard.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION FOR APPROVAL SUBJECT TO REQUIRED LEGISLATION

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King that the house go into committee on the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 17th day of November, 1938, between Canada and the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is not in his place to-night because I have a few statements which I should like to make in his hearing; but I trust some of his colleagues will bring them to his attention in Hansard. During the address made by the Prime Minister on Tuesday, February 14, referring to myself he said:

What was the nature of the remarks of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George respecting a trade agreement with the United States, when he spoke in a previous debate of the present session? The hon. member has a number of pet aversions. I believe perhaps one of the strongest is his dislike of the United States, and particularly in those matters which relate to trade. He said in the house, and has said repeatedly outside of it, that there is no use in Canada trading with the United States, because we will always get the worst of it; in some way or another there is, he believes, an influence at work in Washington which makes it impossible for Canadians to protect themselves in the matter of their own interests.

These statements are without excuse. The last statement made can have an application only to one statement which I made in this house and one which I made outside the house, to the effect that the statutory restrictions placed upon the president by the congress of the United States in the matter of the negotiation of trade agreements rendered it impossible for the negotiators of the United States to concede fair and equitable terms to the negotiators of any other country when negotiating trade arrangements with the United States. That is the only reference which I have made upon which that interpretation could possibly be placed, and it is entirely incorrect.

I assume the Prime Minister has recently taken sufficient interest in me to read some of the speeches which I have made on former occasions. There is no doubt that I have aversions. There are few men in public life who are utterly devoid of them. One of my aversions is the conduct of the Prime Minister when he prepares for a general election. In private life and in public life, when there are no elections, he is undoubtedly personally worthy of high esteem and is usually an honourable political opponent. But in an election campaign, or in preparation for one, his imagination is unrestrained, and the creative faculty of his mind is engaged chiefly in drawing erroneous inferences and in presenting biased and mischievous interpretations of the public utterances of his political opponents. Until recently I was not convinced that an early election was pending, but the Prime Minister's address on Tuesday last has served to convince me that he is now eagerly preparing for another political campaign of passionate propaganda.

I have no hostility to or dislike of the people who compose the great nation known as the United States of America and, so far as I can remember, I have never expressed one word of hostility to them or to their educational, cultural or political institutions. I do not believe that the Prime Minister can cite any such expression of mine. But during the past sixty years I have had occasion to discuss with some fervour the pronouncements and propaganda of some of the Washington politicians and the tactics they have pursued, not only toward Canada but toward the British commonwealth of which Canada is a member. On two occasions only, so far as my memory goes, I have in courteous but emphatic terms criticized the efforts of two presidents of the United States, one Democratic and the other Republican, to draw the boundary lines of British territory and to maintain those boundaries by threatened military and naval force.

The right hon. gentleman was perhaps a college student at Toronto when the Venezuelan boundary controversy arose and was not as deeply stirred by the events of that time as were Canadians of my age and older. I was in British Guiana for several months in each of the three years in which that controversy raged. It arose over the British claim to ownership of Barima point, at the eastern bank of the mouth of the Orinoco river. If one bank at the mouth of the river was British and the other bank was, as all admitted, Venezuelan territory, then under international law the navigation of the Orinoco river was free to the traffic of vessels of all nations. The issue was of special interest to the republic of Colombia, because if the British contention prevailed the vessels of Colombia could steam without permission from Venezuela up the Orinoco river and then up the Meta river, which was a branch of the Orinoco, to a river port from which there was in that time an old Spanish road to Bogota, the capital of Colombia, less than ninety miles away. Venezuela claimed both banks of the Orinoco and the right to close that river to commercial navigation and transport.

In December, 1895, President Cleveland in a message to congress declared that it was incumbent upon the United States of its own initiative to appoint a commission to draw the boundary, regardless of the British contention. It was in that connection that Secretary Olney declared that 3,000 miles of ocean "make any permanent political union between a European and an American state unnatural and inexpedient." His whole reference was to the situation in Canada. He contended that:

> The United States is practically sovereign upon this continent and its fiat is law upon subjects to which it confines its interposition.

He contended also that this fiat reached north of the great lakes and the 49th parallel of latitude. It was then that President Cleveland and his secretary of state brought us to the verge of war with the neighbouring republic. Although I undoubtedly criticized and even condemned their claim to trace boundary lines for a British colony in another continent, I made no reflections upon the people of the United States.

Again, a few years later, there was a time when I criticized very freely the conduct of another president of the United States who threatened to draw another boundary line between British Columbia and Alaska. I happened to be in London in October, 1903, when the decision of the Alaskan boundary tribunal was rendered, and it became known in circles close to the British government that Lord Alverstone, the chief justice of England, who sat with two eminent Canadians as the British members of that tribunal, had within a few days of the date of that decision apparently changed his point of view under political pressure from the British government in order to avoid a threatened expedition into Canada by the military forces of the United States.

Older members may recall that Canada's claims with respect to the Alaskan boundary line were declared by President Theodore Roosevelt to be "an outrage pure and simple" and that the Canadians "acted in a spirit of bumptious truculence." The president was even reported to have suggested that north America should thereafter be "inhabited exclusively by citizens of the United States." Although the president had signed an arbitration treaty providing for the appointment as arbitrators of "six impartial jurists of repute," the Canadian public entertained no illusions as to the political prejudices of the three men whom he did appoint. When I was in London in October, 1903, it was alleged that President Roosevelt had notified the British government, through the United States ambassador, that if the boundary line, which the boundary tribunal might thereafter establish, was not in accord with his personal views he would send into Canada a sufficient military force to draw the line as he saw fit. That correspondence has not been published, if it ever took place; and evidently if it did take place, it was excluded from the state papers of the United States.

But after the president had signed this arbitration treaty, we now know that Mr. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, being then in London on a holiday, received a personal letter from President Roosevelt with a request that it be shown privately and unofficially to Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, then colonial secretary. That letter as published subsequently, contained the following:

> But if there is a disagreement I wish it distinctly understood, not only that there will be no arbitration of the matter but that in my message to congress I shall take a position which will prevent any possibility of arbitration hereafter; a position I am inclined to believe, which will render it necessary for congress to give me authority to run the line as we claim it, by our own people, without any further regard to the attitude of England and Canada.

Mr. SLAGHT: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is speaking to a motion for the approval of a recently made trade treaty. I submit that when he is going back forty-five and thirty-eight years and raking up the old bones of disagreement between our neighbours to the south and Canada and the empire over matters territorial, he is entirely out of order.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, I submit that there is no point of order. I am reviewing an address of the Prime Minister, in which he undertook to lay before the house the background of certain negotiations, and I am not exceeding the limits to which he went in making a personal attack upon me with regard to some former speeches which I had made.

Mr. SLAGHT: I ask for a ruling, Mr. Speaker, on the point of order I raised. My point of order is simply this—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SLAGHT: —that to discuss territorial differences is not dealing with the trade treaty.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With regard to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), while perhaps technically he may be right, I would hesitate to call the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George out of order because in this debate there has been allowed a wide latitude. Therefore I think the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. SLAGHT: He is taking a grave responsibility, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CAHAN: The fact also became known, Mr. Speaker, at that time that the president of the United States had established in the district of Alaska a special force which could have been used for that purpose. The Prime Minister may have retained in his scrapbooks some of the speeches which I made regarding the two events I have mentioned, but I said nothing which, with later knowledge of the facts, I now wish to withdraw, and nothing that reflected upon the people of the United States whom, in making any criticisms, I have always distinguished from some of their political leaders and their political representatives.

There was another incident—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before my hon. friend leaves this one, may I ask, does he approve of Lord Alverstone's action in the matter?

Mr. CAHAN: I am not approving or disapproving, but I certainly am disapproving, as I did then, of the intimidation attempted by the President of the United States. The Prime Minister knows as well as I do that a great deal of feeling was aroused in Canada by the action of Lord Alverstone.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, against Lord Alverstone.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, but when the fuller facts became known there was a great deal of feeling in Canada with respect to the intimidation which the President of the United States had, in a covert manner, attempted to exercise upon the British government.

Mr. SLAGHT: Shame.

Mr. CAHAN: I was going to give another incident, but in view of the objections of my hon. friend, who apparently needs a little information with regard to the political history of this country, I shall simply say that I returned from London to Mexico in November, 1903, when the secession of Panama from Colombia occurred. I shall not enter upon a discussion of the events connected therewith save to state that subsequently, during the administration of President Wilson, when a treaty was drawn up for the payment of $25,000,000 damages to Colombia out of the Washington treasury, Mr. Roosevelt himself published an article in which he said:

> The proposed treaty is a crime against the United States. It is an attack upon the honour of the United States, which, if justified, would convict the United States of infamy.

The Prime Minister in his address on the 14th instant, stated that the late Conservative government were divided in opinion as to the merits of the trade treaty which was offered by Mr. Cordell Hull in 1935. I certainly know of no such division. We were all in favour of a fair and equitable agreement. We were unanimous in our opinion that the terms offered by the government of the United States were not fair and equitable and not satisfactory to the Canadian public, and those terms, I submit, have not since then proven satisfactory, as we have clearly disclosed to this house, although a desperate effort is now being made to create the illusion in the minds of the Canadian people that grave sacrifices by our domestic producers of their markets in Great Britain will serve to appease competitive producers in the United States, and in some mysterious way make for world peace.

The covert criticism which the Prime Minister makes of my attitude with respect to trade treaties with the United States is really of no personal concern to me, because I think, in the constituency which I represent at least, my views have been clearly stated and are well understood. But I remind the Prime Minister that personally I consistently hold with certain leaders of the Liberal party to whose opinions my right hon. friend in former days gave due weight. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, speaking in this house on July 31, 1903, said:

> The best and most effective way to maintain friendship with our American neighbours is to be absolutely independent of them.

And on May 7, 1907, at the imperial conference, Sir Wilfrid Laurier was quoted as saying:

> There was a time when we wanted reciprocity with the United States, but our efforts and our offers were put aside and negatived.

And again in 1910, the late Right Hon. W. S. Fielding, then Minister of Finance, in his budget speech used these words:

> We had had negotiations from time to time with our American friends in relation to better trade conditions, and they had not turned out very successfully. We had, after repeated efforts, taken the ground that we should not again approach the United States with proposals for betterment of our trade relations, and that, if the matter was to be reopened again, it should be reopened, not upon the initiative of Canada, but upon the initiative of the United States.

When, in 1911, it was proposed that each country should make corresponding reductions of duty of a temporary nature, a letter was written on January 21, 1911, by Messrs. Fielding and Paterson, the Canadian representatives, to Secretary of State Knox, in which they say:

> It is agreed that the desired tariff changes shall not take the formal shape of a treaty, but that the governments of the two countries will use their utmost efforts to bring about such changes by concurrent legislation at Washington and Ottawa.

And again, in that letter, Messrs. Fielding and Paterson declared:

Nevertheless, it is distinctly understood that we do not attempt to bind for the future the action of the United States congress or the parliament of Canada, but that each of these authorities shall be absolutely free to make any change of tariff policy that may be deemed expedient.

That indicates the nature of the trade agreement which was subsequently laid before the parliament of Canada. Mr. Secretary Knox replied:

I take great pleasure in replying to your statement of the proposed arrangement. It is entirely in accord with my understanding of it.

There was nothing of a permanent nature in that agreement, because it could be rescinded in whole or in part by the United States without notice at any time, and upon that unsatisfactory feature the Conservative opposition was at first based. Mr. Fielding presented the result of his negotiations to parliament on January 26, 1911. But Canadian sentiment was aroused, when on February 14, Mr. James Beauchamp Clark, democratic leader in the House of Representatives, declared in that house that he was in favour of the bill, framed to carry the proposed agreement into effect. He said:

I am for it because I hope to see the day when the American flag will float over every square foot of the British North American possessions, clear to the north pole. . . . I have no doubt whatever that the day is not far distant when Great Britain will joyfully see all her North American possessions become part of this republic.

Two days later, on February 16, Congressman Bennet of New York presented a resolution requesting the president—to enter upon and prosecute from time to time such negotiations with the British government as he may deem expedient for the annexation of the Dominion of Canada to the United States of America.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): When was that?

Mr. CAHAN: That is on February 16, 1911, two or three weeks after that so-called agreement was introduced by Mr. Fielding to the parliament of Canada.

Congressman Bennet then declared in an interview that:

The sentiment for the annexation of Canada is practically unanimous in this country.

The Prime Minister speaks of the opposition of the Conservative party at that time to the treaty. That opposition was engendered by such statements as those I have quoted.

As the politicians and press of the United States expounded their view as to the prospective annexation of Canada, public opinion against the agreement hardened in Canada, until on April 27, in an address at New York, President Cleveland distinctly raised the alternative issues: reciprocity between Canada and the United States, which Washington politicians proclaimed as a preliminary to annexation, or Canada's adhesion to a scheme of inter-imperial preference.

President Cleveland, in his famous "Parting of the Ways" speech said:

I have said that this is a critical time in the solution of the question of reciprocity. It is critical, because unless it is now decided favourably to reciprocity, it is exceedingly probable that no such opportunity will ever again come to the United States. The forces which are at work in England and in Canada to separate her by a Chinese wall from the United States and to make her part of an imperial commercial band reaching from England around the world to England again by a system of preferential tariffs, will derive an impetus from the rejection of this treaty, and if we would have reciprocity with all the advantages that I have described, and that I earnestly and sincerely believe will follow its adoption, we must take it now or give it up forever.

And President Cleveland proceeded to declare:

The amount of Canadian products, that we would take, would make Canada only an adjunct of the United States. It would transfer all their important business to Chicago and New York, with their bank credits and everything else; it would increase greatly the demand of Canada for our manufactures.

It was such references as those to the proposed arrangement, made in the United States and even by the president of the United States, which awakened a strong reaction in Canada, and these statements were followed by innumerable others.

Senator McCumber declared that:

Canadian annexation is the logical conclusion of reciprocity with Canada.

Hon. Samuel McCall of Massachusetts declared that under reciprocity:

The inevitable day will be more quickly reached when the two countries will be politically one.

Congressman Prince of Illinois, said:

Be not deceived. When we go into a country and get control of it, we take it.

Senator Cummins declared:

I am for the annexation of Canada.

Representative Madden of Illinois expressed the hope that:

Canada may become a part of us, as it should be.

While James J. Hill, the railroad magnate, rejoiced that:

Reciprocity will stop the union of the British empire.

From the date of President Cleveland's "Parting of the Ways" speech, the views of the Canadian people became more definitely crystallized, and by reason of the issue which the leading United States politicians had then raised, the decision of the people of Canada became inevitable. Later, under the Underwood tariff, which came into force in October, 1913, and continued during the period of the war, exports from Canada to the United States increased considerably; but the United States emergency tariff of May, 1921, followed by the Fordney-McCumber tariff of September, 1922, reduced our exports of farm products by more than one-half. The government of the present Prime Minister, which had assumed office in December, 1921, were unable to do anything to overcome these disadvantages, and they frankly confessed their inability.

In the budget debate of 1923, the late Hon. W. S. Fielding, then finance minister in the cabinet of the right hon. gentleman opposite said:

The congress of the United States, in the exercise of its undoubted right, has established what is commonly called the Fordney-McCumber tariff, which is largely a high tariff, and which we realize operates to the disadvantage of Canada. Any desire that we may have towards modification of our tariff is naturally held in check by the high tariff of the United States.

And he added that when the opportunity offered—

—the Liberal party stands for reciprocity with the United States when we can get a fair and reasonable agreement.

That has always been and is now the attitude of the Conservative party in Canada. Towards the close of the debate, on May 23, 1923, the right hon. gentleman opposite, who is now Prime Minister, used these words:

What is the position with regard to the United States? Since the Liberal convention was held, there has been enacted by the United States a much higher tariff than ever before existed between Canada and the United States. The Fordney-McCumber tariff, so-called, to-day is operating to the disadvantage of Canada. Is there any member of this house who will stand up in his place and say: Notwithstanding that obvious fact we think we should throw down our bars against the United States and give them an opportunity to come in here and affect our industries in a manner even more seriously than they have already been affected?

I think our American friends will come to see that if, as a result of their—and it is their own business, of course—if as a result of their action Canada is going to seek and obtain new markets in which to buy and sell in Britain, new markets in France and new markets in Italy, is going to develop a reciprocal trade and effect agreements with Australia and possibly other countries as well, if they begin to see that in all these directions we are striking out into and creating new lines of commerce, and that we can manage very well as we are, I am inclined to think that that line of thought, quicker than anything else, will bring about the change which my hon. friends of the Progressive group opposite hope may come.

The present Prime Minister adhered to that attitude until June, 1930, when, while he was still in office, the United States congress enacted the Hawley-Smoot tariff, which practically prohibited Canada's exports of Canada's farm products to the United States, and brought this country to the verge of economic and financial ruin. That Hawley-Smoot tariff reduced in one year our total exports to the United States from $515,000,000 in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1930, to $350,000,000 in the following fiscal year. The United States congress enacted the Hawley-Smoot tariff against our products, although during the five fiscal years ending March 31, 1930, United States exports to Canada exceeded our domestic exports to the United States by $1,296,000,000.

The right hon. gentleman spoke of what he alleged to be my strong dislike of the United States, particularly in trade matters. Let him now tell parliament of his consternation and of his personal opinion of the United States in respect of its treatment of Canada in trade matters when the Hawley-Smoot tariff was under consideration and when it was finally enacted early in 1930. Early in 1930 I made the strongest speech that ever I made in my life against the United States conduct of its trade policy with respect to Canada, and I made it at Washington at the invitation of the United States chambers of commerce before 1,500 to 2,000 representatives from every part of the United States; but before I made that address I regarded the time as so critical that I endeavoured to obtain from two persons very close to the government of the day an opinion as to whether I was using too strong language in making that speech. That was before I went to Washington, and I was assured at that time that at least I was not prejudicing in any way the relations which then existed between the government of that day and the government at Washington. In fact, I think I received official approval of the speech before it was uttered.

Obviously, when the Bennett government came into office—the government of which the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Manion) and I were members—something had to be done. Obviously, when the United States had raised their tariff sky-high; when the Hawley-Smoot tariff had prohibited all our farm products from entering the United States at a time when they had in five years $1,296,000,000 of an excess of their exports to us over our exports to them, it was absolutely necessary to take some action to stop that continued importation from the United States which was destroying our financial credit and reducing the value of our dollar to a very low rate.

The Prime Minister suggested that there was some maladroit action on our part, in that we raised at that time the general tariff which then applied to the United States. We did raise it; we raised it with the clear intention of diminishing that great, excessive export trade to this country which the United States then enjoyed; and then we took the other alternative of negotiating trade arrangements at the Ottawa conference of 1932, trade arrangements with Great Britain and with the other British dominions, in which any loss of our export trade to the United States was made up by the splendid increases which have taken place in our exports to these wider British markets, which are now threatened by the policy of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say one word to my hon. friend before he concludes. He mentioned a moment ago that I had made a personal attack upon him and that his speech this evening was a reply to that attack. I assure him at once that there was nothing in the nature of a personal attack upon him. I did exactly what he did when he was speaking about me in the course of a previous debate. My hon. friend, in referring to what he alleged was my desire to appease the United States talked about my capricious infatuation—

Mr. CAHAN: I quoted what the right hon. gentleman said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —and my illusive infatuation, again referring to the United States. I replied, when I spoke, by making mention of the United States as his pet aversion. We were simply exchanging compliments, I take it.

Mr. CAHAN: I hope the right hon. gentleman will withdraw his remarks in view of what he has now said.

Mr. R. J. DEACHMAN (Huron North): The speech to which we have just listened from the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) ought to make us feel at least grateful for some things. We ought to be thankful that God has given us the power to forget. It would be indeed the greatest conceivable tragedy if all the dark bickerings of a past age should be carried in the mind of every person, and if after fifty years we should be able to rake over the old coals and set ourselves burning with a desire to promote new antagonisms in the different age in which we live.

I remember that Venezuela incident. I remember also the Fashoda incident in which we had a little trouble with France. But I am not forgetting that some years after the Fashoda incident we stood side by side with the people of France in a great fight for democracy. Perhaps a repetition of that may happen, and we may now be joined with those with whom we differed decades ago in the trifling incident about a few bars of sand in Venezuela.

But I am not going to direct much effort to the speech just delivered by my hon. friend. I congratulate him, however, upon one thing; he did not state definitely his opposition to reciprocity, as did his leader. Thus he did not give me the opportunity to reply to him as I intend to reply to the distinguished gentleman who is now the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion).

The object of economic man is to improve his lot by increasing his production. In order to increase his production he must bring influence to bear upon the factors of production. The factors of production are land, labour and capital; and unless you can do something to increase the productivity of the land, the efficiency of labour or the reproductive power of capital, you will not increase your production. I venture to suggest that there is no one here to-night who will say that a tariff—and a high tariff at that—will help to improve the productivity of the soil. I have seen many times in western Canada when one trifling little shower of rain was worth all the tariffs which have ever arisen on earth since Adam quarrelled with the food controller down to the present day.

I recall one time a United States senator saying that the man who made two blades of grass grow where one grew before or two drops of water flow where one "flew" before was a benefactor of the human race. But the tariff will not help. Will a tariff increase the efficiency of labour or the activity of capital? No, it will not. No one will work harder or better—yes he may work harder, but he will not work more efficiently, because he works with dull tools. Nor will it increase the productivity of capital, because where tariffs are applied you get misdirected capitalistic effort. I could name items by the score to which that has happened. I give only one.

We have been for some time importing dates from Mesopotamia. Then it occurred to Mr. Bennett, when he called a special session for the purpose of increasing tariffs, that if he were to put a tariff on pitted dates, he could build up in this dominion an industry for the pitting of dates, and thus give employment to the Canadian people. So these dates in their unpitted state were carried across the Mediterranean sea, past the gates of Hercules, beyond the pillars of the grey Azores, across the foaming billows of the Atlantic and up the St. Lawrence—stones and all,—and finally were landed in Canada. Then they got people to pit them, and in order to promote the pitting of dates, a great industry for the Canadian people, they put on a duty of 2½ cents a pound. The difference between the price of pitted and unpitted dates, if we import them in the normal way, was ½ cent a pound. So the people of Canada were asked to pay an extra 2 cents a pound for dates in order that they might have the great and glorious privilege of consuming dates which had been pitted in the Dominion of Canada. What a wonderful effort for statesmen busy solving the problem of unemployment!

I am not going further into this matter to-night; I merely desired to show what are the factors of production, and to add this one word: In addition to production you must have freedom of exchange, because then you are able to harvest the benefits which result from differing conditions for production in different sections of the world.

I turn now to some of the statements made by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. I think they are particularly interesting. No. 1: This treaty makes for greater competition for our industries, which are very much the same as those of the United States. What does that mean? Our friends suggest that these industries should not have competition, and, not having a larger measure of competition will be able to charge higher prices to the consumer. I want to tell hon. members now what the western producer of wheat pays. The Searle price index of 147 items that western farmers buy now stands at 133 on the basis of 100 for 1913-14, which means that those items cost the farmers of the west at the present time 33 per cent more than they did before the war. The price of wheat, No. 1 northern, as of February 15, open market basis, is 30 per cent lower than it was in 1913-14 or, on board price base, 10 per cent. This means that a bushel of wheat in western Canada has, in relation to the commodities the farmer buys in the open market, a purchasing power of 46 in comparison with a purchasing power of 100 that it had before the war. On the basis of the board price its purchasing power is 68 per cent of what it was. Taking the average price of Canadian farm products we find that on the basis of 100 in 1926 it has slipped to 48·4 in 1932, while manufactured goods dropped to 69·8. And in 1939 the index number of farm products is 64·8, but the price of manufactured goods is 73·5.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask this question: Recognizing these facts; recognizing the position of the farmer in Canada; knowing something of the struggle through which he went during a period of depression, and realizing that he is not yet out of that condition, would a man not need to have considerable nerve if he tried to retain a high tariff so as to permit the manufacturing interests of this country to hold up the prices of manufactured goods, when it is admitted that nothing can be done as far as the price of farm products is concerned?

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition some years ago, speaking in the house, said, "Trade is war." And it is cruel war against the farmer when it comes to a condition like that. General Sherman said, "War is hell." The late Mr. Euclid, whom I met in my old days at school, said that "things which are equal to the same thing are equal to one another." So that in the judgment of Mr. Euclid we would have to put it in this way: Trade is hell. Therefore my hon. friends to the left will not have anything to do with it, and they still keep up the same conception which they had back in 1930 when my hon. friend gave utterance to those words.

Then we are told, as No. 2, that it affords concessions to thirty-one favoured nations which give nothing in return. I am curious about that. When these nations negotiate treaties they will give us something in return, and at the same time these countries which gain from the agreements are countries with which we have done a very large measure of trade. I wonder if my hon. friend is aware of the fact that to foreign countries outside the United States, outside the British empire, in five years before the depression we sold $1,300,000,000 worth of goods. Surely that is a substantial market for Canadian goods.

Then item No. 3: My hon. friend says it brings unfair competition from favoured nations, such as Japan, Germany, Italy. Well the hon. gentleman is always talking about a favourable balance of trade. One of our largest balances of trade is with Japan. In 1937 we sent to Japan $21,000,000 worth of exports and brought back $4,790,000 worth of imports, and the figures are even larger this year. There we have the perfect ideal of Tory trade; we have a favourable balance, and that is true in regard to a number of the other favoured nations with which this treaty will help us expand our trade.

But I am delighted with No. 4: "It is the beginning of the destruction of the whole British preferential system for which we have been struggling since 1897." Well, they struggled against it in 1897, so they have not been keeping up a very consistent struggle. The British preference will be able to stand, no matter what may happen. We are not destroying it; we are modifying it. There is a marked difference between destruction and modification. But may I point out that Canada needs the world for a market. It cannot do without it. In 1938 the British empire took approximately 50 per cent of our products, which means that 50 per cent of our products had to be marketed somewhere else. The people of Canada cannot afford to confine their trade to half the nations of the world. They need every market they can get.

Then in No. 5 the hon. gentleman suggests that this cuts into the British market, which he says is our best market for wheat, fruits, lumber and so on. I have grave doubts as to the accuracy of the prophecies of these hon. gentlemen. They were wrong in 1911; they were wrong in 1936, when we brought in the other reciprocity treaty. I recall hearing man after man tell of the ruin that would follow the introduction of the provision permitting duty free imports up to $100. It was going to wipe out the merchants along the border. But I am not going to deal specifically with these items to-night, because they were dealt with very carefully this afternoon by my hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley).

Now I come to No. 6:

> It injures our Canadian traffic and damages the transportation system, railways, steamships and so forth, sending traffic north and south instead of east and west.

I want to make this suggestion to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition or to any other Conservative or Liberal in the house. Look at the earnings of the Canadian railways; the report can be found in the Canada Year Book. Look at the imports from the United States. Select to your own satisfaction the four years during which our imports from the United States were largest and the four years when they were lowest in recent years, and I will tell you what you will find. In the four years when our imports were highest our railway earnings were highest, and in the four years when our imports were lowest our railway earnings were lowest. But these boys never learn anything. Of course they suggest this is merely a coincidence, but if that coincidence occurs all down through our economic history I wonder what the hon. gentlemen will have to say. If, looking over this house to-night, I noticed a number of gentlemen who had very beautiful heads of hair and knew they were using herpicide, I think I would use herpicide too. I would not think it was a coincidence. But my hon. friends can look at the records of the facts, can stare them in the face, and the only result is that they intensify their drive in the opposite direction. They think the more emphatically they state their claim that our railways will be ruined by imports, in some way eventually some people will come to believe it.

Another argument is that this treaty gives too much in return for too little. Well, what does that amount to? Suppose it increases our trade by 10 per cent and increases the trade of one of the other nations by 25 per cent; we would still be 10 per cent better off than if we accepted the advice of our friends and voted against the treaty. But they seem to have the idea that if it does not benefit all equally it should not be supported. That is a most preposterous suggestion.

Then it is said that we shall lose revenues through the elimination of the 3 per cent excise tax. The 3 per cent excise tax was first applied in 1932. Speaking in this house at the time Mr. Rhodes said:

> I have not the slightest hesitation in saying to my right hon. friend that the government is not wedded to it, other than as a necessity of the moment, as a means of taxation.

Later on Mr. Bennett came along, and what did he do? He was not wedded to it at all, because in April 1934, he cut it in half as far as British imports were concerned and in 1935 removed it from those imports altogether. In those circumstances I wonder if it is not fair to say that if Mr. Bennett had been given the chance, eventually he would have removed it entirely. At least I hope he would have done so, and I am sure he would unless he were persuaded to the contrary by the hon. gentlemen to my left who now hold the view that no tax may be reduced under any circumstances unless they are given the opportunity to do it.

Then my hon. friend said the treaty would probably increase unemployment through greater competition in industries such as coal mining, manufacturing, and so on. Let me say to my hon. friend that time will write that record. In fact, time has already written it. My hon. friends have tried their method of solving the problems of the country, and it has not succeeded. We have succeeded in proving that there is at least some hope for us when we go in this direction, and we propose to go a good deal further than we have gone as yet.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Oh, I am not speaking for my hon. friend at all; he can speak for himself.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Nor for the government?

Mr. DEACHMAN: For the people of Canada, for the people whom I represent, for the people who want it and know we are going to get it.

That brings me to a very interesting point. Referring to the Americans, my hon. friend said:

> Third, they are shrewder traders than we are. I had the word "sharper" in my notes, but I do not like to use it because it might be taken as offensive—

Then he goes on to speak about the down-east Yankee and has this further word to say:

> I simply say, Mr. Speaker, that the United States cares for its own people when it is making a trade treaty of this kind.

I want to show how they are taking care of their own people. It is astonishing that in the House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada we should so frequently hear members speak with an attitude of extreme contempt for the Canadian people. Let me show what we have done as far as Canada is concerned. The Economist of December 3, 1938, said that the business recession in Canada was by no means as intense as it was in the United States. The monthly bulletin of the Cleveland Trust Company, written by Leonard Ayers, made practically the same statement. The last issue of the Bank of Nova Scotia bulletin stated that industrial production, factory payrolls, factory employment and revenue carloadings were distinctly higher in Canada than in the United States. That is in relation to the standard index. The only point at which the United States is temporarily ahead of us is in connection with building construction, where the enormous governmental expenditures of the United States have helped their progress to a certain extent.

What happened in regard to trade? Let us consider the index of trade in the two countries. Take 100 as the index number for 1929 in the United States and Canada. In 1932 the United States trade was represented by the figure 31. In Canada in that year, when our Conservative friends were in power, it was represented by an index number 42. In 1938 the United States index number was up to 59, while the Canadian index number had gone up to 79. I wonder what my hon. friends have to say about that? Are they not proud of their own record back in 1932 when the index number was down to 42, and do they not think they should express at least some appreciation for our efforts when we brought it up to 79?

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition was good enough to tell us that the United States was not a stable market in which to do business, but here again I want to point out that the hon. gentleman was wrong in his conclusion. In our trade with the United Kingdom we moved from an index of 100 in 1926 to 34 in 1932 and up to 80 in 1938. In our trade with the United States we moved from a figure of 100 down to 41 in 1932. We did not go down so far and our recovery was better. In 1938 we had come up to 88. Surely this is a satisfactory indication of the progress we are making so far as trade is concerned.

My hon. friend was good enough the other day to quote from The Economist. I want to quote from the same publication merely to show that it is rather dangerous to quote to this house one part of an article and then forget that in the same article there is a concluding part which alters completely what has been said before. My hon. friend made this quotation from The Economist of November, 1926:

> It is more questionable whether there will be a corresponding increase in British imports. Very few of the concessions made to the United States will result in any category of American goods being placed in a more favourable competitive position vis-a-vis the domestic producer. Most of the agricultural products affected are not grown in this country, or where they are, the domestic producer is already safeguarded.

My hon. friend quoted that, and he took it to be supreme condemnation of the treaty so far as the Dominion of Canada is concerned. But I want to read the concluding paragraph, and then I shall ask my friends if they are going to vote for this treaty, because I do not think they are. I quote:

> The immediate effect of the agreement is not to be measured in terms of a diplomatic reinforcement, still less of a strengthening of the military or economic defences, of either of the signatories. But its long-term effects in the purely political field can be negatively assessed by imagining the derisive joy in certain European capitals and the profound depression in others that would have been produced by a failure of the negotiations. To have brought to birth not merely an agreement, but such a good agreement, is a decisive act of economic statesmanship.

I ask hon. gentlemen behind the leader of the opposition what they are going to do when it comes to a vote upon this issue?

With utter irresponsibility I know they will certainly vote against it. But I ask them: If you were in power would you vote against it? Would you vote against it when one of the leading papers, a paper which was quoted by my distinguished friend, tells you that your action would be greeted by derisive joy in certain European capitals and profound depression in others, and that depression would be felt in the nations with which you are affiliated? Oh, yes, it is all right to do it when you think you can do it, and then go out to the people and show what you have done. But it is somewhat different when you face the realities of what it means not only to Canada but to the world. It is a good agreement; it is considered a decisive act of economic statesmanship. Perhaps I should not expect my hon. friends to agree with it.

But I turn to one more item, the famous balance of trade. My distinguished friend, the leader of the opposition, always wants us to have a favourable balance of trade with the United States. May I point out that during the last three years we have had a larger favourable balance of trade than ever before in all the history of our dealings with the United States. Not a word from them. Not a cheer. I want to point out that in 1912, 1913 and 1914 when they were in the seats of office, not only was there an unfavourable balance of trade, but it was the largest unfavourable balance that had ever existed between Canada and the United States. I have looked through the Hansards of those years; I have gone over the remarks of some of the distinguished gentlemen who were making history at that time, and I could not find a cheep from them. There was not even a flutter of a wing. Never can you find in the records of Hansard any discussion of the balance of trade when our friends are in office, not because the balance is favourable but because when they are at the helm all is well and they do not care.

I will tell them the remedy for any unfavourable balance. If they should have the misfortune to get back to office, I can tell them how they can straighten up this balance of trade. We import from the United States a great many products, such as rubber and so on which are not produced in that country. We also import a number of raw materials for our manufactures. A few of these are manila, sisal, raw silk, bauxite, coal, crude oil, raw cotton, rubber, and so on. I have figured out the total, which by no means covers all the items, as $106,582,000. Why do we buy those materials? What a strange thing for protectionist manufacturers to do!

[Mr. Deachman.]

They buy where they can buy the cheapest, just as ordinary people do. If they want to make my hon. friends happy, they should order them in some other country and pay larger amounts for hauling a greater distance. Most of these items are free or nearly free of duty, and they represent raw materials for our industry. What matter if we have an adverse balance? As far as that is concerned, Canada is capable of paying her debts; she always has been and always will be. What does it matter whether we buy in one country or another?

I should like to quote just one more statement which shows where we are going in regard to these things. This time I quote from the London Spectator of November 25, 1938. In discussing these treaties it has this to say:

> The fundamental value of the Anglo-American trade agreement lies as much in the sacrifices each country was ready to make as in the advantages it secured for its own traders—for till it is realized that every such negotiation must be based on the simple principle of give-and-take the attempt of each side to concentrate on taking must spell inevitable disaster.

That is the fundamental basis of negotiation. There must be giving and taking. If there is concentration upon the one factor of taking all for themselves, then the agreement on the day it is signed will contain in itself the seeds of decay—it will break down; it will not work out in practice. There must be a freedom and breadth of view. Alas I am sorry to say we shall not get that from my friends on the left. But we shall get it from those who are associated with me spiritually, although on the other side of the house. Then the article goes on to say:

> It means that the principle of modifying the Ottawa agreements of 1932 has been conceded. Ottawa, creating the British imperial zollverein of which Joseph Chamberlain dreamed, had good effects and bad. It increased trade within the empire. It to some extent decreased the trade and to a considerable extent increased the suspicions and antagonisms of states outside the empire, particularly the United States and Germany. Since then, and to some extent in consequence, Germany has developed a closed economy based on trade by barter, which makes the prospect of any beneficial commercial agreement with her remote. But that fact, unfortunate in itself, has had some favourable reactions, in producing the recognition among states which still prefer free interchange of the need for increasing trade among themselves. The Anglo-American agreement has gone far to meet that need, for through the operation of the most-favoured-nation clause it means that the tariffs of both countries are lowered not merely in relation to one another but to all countries with which they have signed most-favoured-nation treaties.

> In what form and by what methods the Ottawa circle can be widened, with economic consequences that would produce political results no less valuable than the economic, are matters for further thought. But Mr. Hull, Mr. Mackenzie King and Mr. Stanley have performed a service of no small value in turning the minds of all reflective men in that direction.

Please note that the suggestion is that it was turning the minds of reflective men to that solution of the problem.

The measure of a master is in bringing all men around to his opinion twenty years later. Well, I think if Sir Wilfrid Laurier could look down upon the scenes of to-day he would say that it was a little late. It is twenty-eight years since he made his great venture in bringing about better relations, wider trade, better feeling and a closer understanding between the two neighbouring nations. In making that estimate of twenty years Emerson, who wrote those words, was of course not familiar with the resistance of certain characteristically protectionist minds in the Dominion of Canada; but it is worth while to think that what we are doing to-day, though it may not be accepted now, will, in the fulness of time, with broader minds and deeper conceptions of human interest, bring at least even the most reactionary to a realization of the facts and enable us to establish better relations not only on this continent but throughout the entire world. And the world must be taken into consideration in the things we are doing. We shall be fair not only to those who are on this continent but to those on every continent, broadening our trade, expanding our effort, bringing about the betterment of the human race, a better standard of living and the establishment of broader conceptions in the world we are trying to build.

Mr. T. A. THOMPSON (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to follow the argument of my eloquent friend from Huron North (Mr. Deachman). We have been treated to this free trade lecture of his on so many occasions that it has become quite familiar to us.

I wish it to be clearly understood at the outset that I am not opposed to trade treaties with the United States or any other country so long as those treaties are mutually beneficial. I am thoroughly convinced that no trade treaty made with any country will have the slightest effect upon either country in case of war. Trade treaties were never consummated with the idea of making goodwill between nations. They are simply a cold-blooded business proposition. Trade treaties are very often objectionable not so much in themselves as in the unjust manner in which they are too frequently administered. This particular trade treaty lends itself to just that sort of abuse. It has as many holes in it as a sieve. I intend to deal with this trade treaty on a business basis, ignoring the assumption that it may affect in the slightest degree the relations between Great Britain or Canada and the United States.

This treaty covers so many classes of goods and such a variety of items that it is bound to have repercussions, the importance of which it is difficult to estimate until the treaty has been in operation for some time. Nevertheless it is quite apparent, upon even a casual perusal of its provisions, that Canadian industry and Canadian agriculture will be adversely affected, and that our preferences in the British market will be seriously impaired. And mark you, Mr. Speaker, it was not incumbent upon Canada to sacrifice the principles of empire economic unity to retain good relations with the United States because we already have them. To my mind this treaty displays an absurd idealism, and is the height of economic folly. It is too great a venture in altruism for a young country like Canada to take, and it was altogether unnecessary that Canada should make these concessions to retain Anglo-Saxon unity.

Let us look at a few of the provisions of the treaty. Take cattle, for example. The duty has been reduced from two cents to one and a half cents a pound, so that the average steer, weighing one thousand pounds, will now pay a duty of $15 entering the United States instead of $20. Now, $15 is a very high duty with cattle prices as they are on both sides of the line to-day. There is also a joker in this tariff—two of them, in fact. One of them is that only 60,000 head of cattle can be sent across into the United States in any three months. We know that in Canada our cattle are largely shipped twice a year. The stall-fed cattle go out in late winter or early spring, and the grass-fed cattle go out in the fall. The other joker is that the quota of 225,000 head of cattle is not Canada's quota but the maximum number of cattle that the United States government will permit to enter their country in any one year, and we just get a share of that quota.

What has happened already this year? This treaty went into operation on the first day of January, and before the month of January was out the quota was taken up, Mexico having shipped into the United States almost as many cattle as Canada; so from February 1 to April 1, a period of two months, the duty will be doubled to three cents a pound, or $30 on the average steer, and it will be the first of April before our cattle can be shipped in again at the reduced treaty rate.

Take dairy cows and calves. The duty has been left the same, but the quota has been increased. But our quota in neither dairy cows nor calves was taken up last year; yet the treaty increases quotas which we have not been able to fill in the past.

The duties on live hogs and dressed pork are reduced to such an extent as to permit United States producers to have the trade they had in the Canadian market before these duties were imposed, and that trade was a substantial one.

Take the duty on cream. It has been reduced from 35 cents to 28·3 cents. These fellows at Washington did some close figuring, with their 28·3 cents. That duty is just as prohibitive on a gallon of cream as a duty of 35 cents. They have also increased the quota to 1,500,000 pounds. How much did we ship last year? Only 5,096 gallons of cream; that is all. It is quite easy to raise the quota on something we are not shipping into the United States.

Mr. EULER: How about potatoes?

Mr. THOMPSON: I shall tell the hon. gentleman in a moment if he will just wait.

Again, take milk. The duty has been cut in two, from six and a half cents to three and a quarter cents. It may induce the exportation of more milk, but last year we sent them the bagatelle of 2,470 gallons. We are not shipping milk there, and the concession is of no consequence.

I will now come to the potatoes referred to by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler). The duty was formerly 45 cents upon exports to the United States and 75 cents upon imports into Canada. What has been done? The duty on exports to the United States has been reduced from 45 cents per 100 pounds to 37½ cents—not a very material reduction. But here is the joker: it is good for only nine months. For three months—December, January and February—the exporter must pay 60 cents per 100 pounds, and those are the months when farmers who have stored their potatoes in root houses and cellars are sending them out. What has Canada done? Where is her 75 cents duty? It is gone—"gone with the wind." Potatoes come in here free with the exception of six weeks, and during those six weeks, from the middle of June to July 30, all they pay is 37½ cents. In other words, for nine months Canada must pay 37½ cents to get potatoes into the United States, and for the remaining three months of the year we pay 60 cents, while the Americans send in their potatoes free for ten and a half months and pay only 37½ cents during the other six weeks.

I have heard a great deal in this house about the splendid men whom the government sent to Washington to make this treaty, but I venture to say they did not know potatoes. You could not have picked any three farmers out of this house—I do not care what side you picked them from—who would have signed a lopsided, jug-handled treaty of that sort.

Canada receives no concessions upon wheat, wheat flour, corn, or corn products, and malting barley retains the almost prohibitive duty of 40 cents per 100 pounds.

In this agreement the interests of Canadian manufacturers and Canadian growers of fruit and vegetables have been ignored, and our agriculture has received a staggering blow. The United States have made no concession to Canada which has cost them anything. Suppose that all the concessions they have made belonged only to Canada; suppose that Canada alone were to fill all the quotas which the United States have given—which we shall not do—it would be only a fraction of one per cent of the requirements of the United States. They have kept over 99 per cent of the market for themselves. I repeat that they have given us nothing which has cost them anything.

On the other hand, what has Canada done? Canada has opened up her market to her principal competitor, the United States of America. She has opened it up to a country with from ten to twelve times her population, and not only to that country but to some thirty other nations which, under the favoured nation clause, will have the same concessions in the Canadian market as has the United States.

Mr. MANION: Without any return.

Mr. THOMPSON: One of the principal objections to this treaty is that it has seriously impaired our preference in the British market, that preference which, since 1932, has been the economic lifeblood of this country. This treaty, Mr. Speaker, is destined to bring Canada more and more under the economic domination of the United States. I ask hon. members, how long can a nation of eleven millions of people, living on the northern part of this continent beside one hundred and twenty-five millions of people on the more southern half, retain its economic independence if it is buying from that great nation from fifty to one hundred million dollars a year more than it is selling to them? On top of that we are endeavouring to pay them interest on a mortgage of four and one-quarter billions of dollars which they hold on Canada by way of loans which have been made. How long can we retain our economic independence?

More than that, we are selling to the United States largely raw materials and buying back from them finished products. Canada, with her eleven millions of people, is the greatest customer the United States has for manufactured goods.

Mr. EULER: She is our best customer, too.

Mr. THOMPSON: We can go into the bush and cut pulpwood; we can mine gold and do all the rest of the heavy work. With this treaty and a few more like it, Canadians will be nothing more than hewers of wood and drawers of water for the Americans.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. THOMPSON: That is all they will be.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. THOMPSON: I am glad to hear that applause, because what I have said is the absolute fact. Canada and the United States are natural rivals. That is particularly true with respect to agricultural products. The United States is a great agricultural country, and she has a surplus of and is exporting everything that we are producing. Since the great war, economic nationalism had largely closed the European markets to foreign exporters, and the British market was the only stable market left in the world.

Mr. EULER: It is still free.

Mr. THOMPSON: Since 1932 the United States has looked with a great deal of envy on the preference which her competitor had in the British market. She set herself resolutely to destroy those agreements. I say that no country can prosper or give to its people permanent employment if she permits the importation of goods which she has the capacity to produce. When we send our money out of the country we never see it again. When we spend our money at home we are giving employment to our people, and we are building up markets for both industry and agriculture.

Everything which is required to satisfy the needs of humanity can be and is being produced within the confines of the far-flung British empire. Joseph Chamberlain was the first man to be seized of this great idea, and he was the first British statesman who advocated empire preferences. It is true that he went down to defeat advocating them; but his son, the present Prime Minister of Great Britain, had the honour of signing at Ottawa in 1932 agreements containing the very provisions for which his father had met defeat. Those provisions kept this country solvent and saved our farmers from bankruptcy. Those of us who were in the house at that time well remember how the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), then leader of the opposition, opposed these treaties, how he kept us here week after week, denouncing them, and stating that when he came into office he would repeal them, and how he gathered into line his followers and had them vote against the treaties to a man; not quite to a man; there was one hon. member who voted with us at that time, and he will go down in history as the only Liberal in the house who had sound judgment. Yet, with all the opposition they have received, these treaties have kept this country from bankruptcy since 1932.

Mr. STEWART: And hon. gentlemen opposite renewed the agreements.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They improved the agreements.

Mr. THOMPSON: The treaties with the United States have always been precarious affairs. Their tariffs have moved back and forth like a weaver's shuttle, and have no stability; and I am afraid we are getting into the same rut in Canada. Industry in Canada to-day is being paralyzed by constant monkeying with our tariffs. When one government gets in, down they go; when another gets in; up they go. There is no stability. Tariffs should be taken altogether out of politics. What are tariffs? Tariffs are instruments in the hands of governments whereby they can deal on equality with other countries in which climatic conditions, scales of wages and living conditions are so different that adjustment is necessary. That adjustment should have some permanence; otherwise men will refuse to put money into industry. They will not put money into industry until they have some reasonable assurance of stability.

The hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman), speaking on the address, said he regretted that Canada had rejected the reciprocity treaty of 1911. That treaty contained a clause whereby it could not be terminated without mutual consent, and that gave a foreign country for the first time a say in the domestic affairs of Canada. The late Champ Clark, speaking in the House of Representatives of the United States, gave utterance to the naked truth, when he said that if that treaty passed, as he expected it would, Canada would become an adjunct to the United States. The people of Canada can always look back with pride and pleasure upon having defeated that agreement.

But what happened two years afterwards, in 1913? There was a change of government in the United States. Woodrow Wilson placed agricultural products on the free list, and we had a very much better bargain in 1913 with the United States than was contained in the reciprocity agreement. From 1913 to 1921 agricultural products went free into the United States, but from 1921 to 1930 we lost our markets there while a Liberal government sat on the treasury benches in Canada. It was in that period that the Fordney-McCumber and Hawley-Smoot tariffs and all the other regulations were passed that shut us out of that market. What did the government of that day do? They sat idly on the treasury benches, just as they are sitting to-day, doing nothing, and their only policy was, "We must not provoke that great nation to the south of us." They saw our markets receding; they saw the European market closed, the United States market closed, and yet they sat idly by and allowed the Canadian market to become the dumping ground for the surplus products of every other nation in the world.

Prior to the war Italy, Germany and France bought millions of bushels of Canadian wheat; but the war brought home to them the lesson that they were dependent upon a foreign country for their bread and they were determined not to be caught in that condition again. Therefore they placed on foreign wheat a duty greater than the world price of wheat, until to-day they have become self-sustaining. At any rate, they are no longer a factor in the market in the purchasing of wheat. So in 1930, when the Conservative party came into office, they found the European markets closed and the United States market closed; the only market left was the British market; and they met competition there, on even terms, from their greatest competitor, the United States, a country whose crops were ripe and whose produce was ready for the market from a month to six weeks before our's was.

In the securing of the agreement's of 1932 giving us a preference in the British market there was brought about one of the greatest accomplishments in Canadian history. It must always be borne in mind that the United States is our greatest competitor. The United States has a surplus of the same articles that we export and that we are trying to sell to that country, while on the other hand Great Britain must annually buy hundreds of millions worth of foodstuffs which cannot be produced on that small island. That is where our market lies. Another fact to be borne in mind is that the British market is not a dumping ground where the surplus products of the entire world can be disposed of. Britain has her limitations in purchasing, and every bushel of wheat that the United States sells to Great Britain is just a bushel less that Canada will be able to sell there.

Before this treaty was consummated, the leaders of industry, boards of trade, and leaders in agriculture were consulted in Great Britain and the United States. Delegates from Great Britain and the United States went to that conference, fortified by the advice and the wishes of industry, agriculture and labour in their respective countries. What about Canada? Who was consulted here? These men went to Washington to bargain with men who had agreed upon what they were going to do. Our men had asked advice of no one in Canada, and it was natural that when they came up against the shrewd bargaining power of those two great countries they had it put over them.

The Prime Minister's statement that this treaty will create closer relations with the United States and Great Britain has to my mind no foundation in fact. It is many years since there was even a ripple among these three great democracies—Great Britain, Canada and the United States—and I ask the house, since when has it become incumbent upon a country that has made a trade treaty with another country to fight for that country? We have trade treaties with Germany, Italy and Japan. Did we send our soldiers to fight for Japan in her war? No; the very idea would be repugnant to us. Yet we have trade treaties with those countries.

It is also stated by several prominent British statesmen that the imperial government would never ask Canada or any part of the empire to modify any part of those agreements. That is not the way in which Great Britain does business. When she makes a treaty she stands by it, and it is perfectly obvious that the pressure to have those treaties modified came from our great competitor, the United States.

To my mind the treaty before us is the beginning of the end of our imperial preferences. The United States will never rest content until they have completely wiped them out. The British market to-day is the only stable market there is left in the world, the only market which we should make major attempts to develop. The brevity of this treaty condemns it, in our opinion. Channels of trade cannot be altered every few years without tremendous loss to the exporters.

The other day I read a report from Washington dated November 18, 1938, stating that prior to these preferences going into effect in 1930 they had sold large quantities of wheat to the United Kingdom; that their trade had gone down materially, but that they expected to regain it on getting free entry. They gave these figures: In 1930 the United States sold to Great Britain 39,267,000 bushels of wheat. In 1933, one year after these preferences went into effect, this dropped to 9,000 bushels. In 1930 Canada sold to the United Kingdom 97,234,000 bushels, and in 1933 that increased to 140,459,000 bushels. In other words, prior to these treaties being signed and the preference of six cents a bushel being given to Canada, the United States were supplying 20 per cent of the requirements of the British market in wheat, and after they went into effect, this fell to ·05 per cent; while in 1930 Canada was supplying 40 per cent, and after the preference this rose to 67 per cent. In the face of those figures we have this remarkable statement from two of the ministers. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said the other day that this 6 per cent preference was of doubtful value, and this afternoon the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) said that it was a minor factor.

Mr. ILSLEY: A minor factor in creating port business.

Mr. THOMPSON: All I have to say is that there is none so blind as those who will not see.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The same effect on apples.

Mr. THOMPSON: Every trade treaty this government has made with the United States has been detrimental to the interests of Canada. In 1935, with all due respect to the figures given by the hon. member for Huron North, we had a favourable trade balance with the United States amounting to $57,688,000, but in 1938 we had an unfavourable trade balance of $67,981,518. That is, in three years after this treaty was signed, our trade with the United States fell off to the extent of $125,669,518, and in the same years our trade with Great Britain had risen from $191,000,000 to $225,000,000.

Another alarming feature about this agreement is that it permits some thirty-odd nations to get the same concessions in the Canadian market that the United States have been given. I want also to register my protest against treaties of such great importance being made effective without the sanction of parliament. The Prime Minister said the other day that they had authority to put this agreement into operation without presenting it to parliament. In 1932 Mr. Bennette called a special session of parliament, presented his agreements and had them ratified by parliament before they were made operative. The agreements which were made in 1935 were put into effect on January 1, 1936, and parliament was called together a month later. The agreement of 1938 was put into operation on January 1, 1939, and parliament was called twelve days later. We are now discussing an agreement which is already law, and no hon. member had any say whatever in its provisions. The members of this house who are elected and sent here to look after the business of the country have been ignored. In such an important matter as this, even though the government may argue that they had the legal right to do it, there are things which are not expedient and should not be done.

After examining this treaty carefully I have arrived at the conclusion that Canada has been made a catspaw to pull American chestnuts out of the fire. In conclusion, because I made an agreement that I would allow the government ten minutes to-night, and I am going to do it—

An hon. MEMBER: Too much.

Mr. THOMPSON: No, I said it, and at ten minutes to eleven I stop. But I say that the future welfare of Canada and the happiness and prosperity of her people depend upon closer union with the British empire, and the further development of inter-empire trade. Both of these this treaty tends to destroy.

On motion of Mr. MacLean (Prince) the debate was adjourned.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

292. Departmental administration, $190,540.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works): This amount covers salaries and travelling expenses, stationery, et cetera, of the members of what is called the administrative section of the Department of Public Works at Ottawa. It covers the office of the minister, the offices of the deputy minister, the assistant deputy minister, the secretary and the purchasing agent of the department. There is a little decrease of $130; that is the result of readjustment of positions in the department.

Item agreed to.

Chief architect's branch—

293. Branch administration, $226,280.

This is the administration of the branch of the chief architect's office at Ottawa. There is an increase, also on account of changes in positions in the service and statutory increases.

Mr. STEWART: What attracts the attention at once in reading this item is the substantial increase from $5,000 to $11,560 in temporary assistance. When one looks over the skeleton of these estimates, what impresses one is the almost complete absence of anything in the nature of a program for the construction of public works. The amounts are strikingly small. I think the total of these estimates is $11,000,000, the greater part of which is made up of salaries, administration and all that sort of thing. I can come to no other conclusion than that the minister and the government have in mind bringing in as supplementary estimates a very heavy program of public works. If such is not the case, why should we find in different items increases such as I have mentioned, providing for temporary assistance that cannot possibly be required for the execution of any program embodied in the main estimates? Possibly between now and the next time these estimates are up, the minister may be able to consider this matter and be in a position to make a statement to the committee. I am sure, if this is the main body of the public works program for this year, the minister must be ashamed of it. It is so trifling that it is perfectly clear that it is not the real program of the government at all. It is just a sort of smoke-screen that is put up, and there must be something else behind all these details of administration and so on, which compose the skimpiest, smallest program in the history of the department.

I should like to ask the minister when he hopes to be able to take the committee into his confidence and tell us when those supplementary estimates will be brought down. As the minister knows, it is desirable that the public works department should get its program under way as early in the season as possible. That is one reason why the estimates of this department are usually taken up early in the session, and when they are passed and approved the departmental officials prepare their program and get to work as early in the season as possible. It is difficult to get started as soon as they would like, but unless the supplementary estimates are brought down and passed by this house within a comparatively short time it will be late in the season before it will be possible to undertake this work.

Would the minister be good enough to give us some information as to why these estimates are so emaciated, so abbreviated, so very small as to hardly justify him in opening his department at all at this stage? Apparently he is only asking for a great deal of money for salaries, because he has no program of works in these estimates. That is the very opposite to the usual procedure. The main estimates are supposed to contain the main features of the program of the government, while the supplementaries really cover things that have developed after the preparation of the main estimates. In this case the order is reversed. The main estimates which are here ought to be the supplementary estimates, and apparently the real main estimates are to be brought down some time later, possibly quite late in the session.

I should like the minister to take the committee into his confidence and let us have a statement in regard to the exceptional, extraordinary situation which is disclosed in these estimates.

Mr. CARDIN: I heartily welcome the suggestion of my hon. friend, who has had some experience in the matter, that I should ask for a larger amount of money for my department. I am sure that is in agreement with the view already expressed by most of the members of this house, that the Department of Public Works is not spending enough money.

The reason why the estimates are presented in this form is that we wanted to show in the main estimates what was absolutely necessary for the proper carrying on of the business of the government. That is why we have included only the items which appear in the main estimates. Another reason is that at this early hour of the session we are not in a position, as my hon. friend knows, to determine what expenditures will be required. In connection with works already begun we have not the reports of the engineers and are unable to determine, when the main estimates are brought down, what amounts of money may be required to complete those works. The reports of the engineers and architects are not all in so early in the year. That is one reason why we do not find in the main estimates what may be necessary to complete the works which have been undertaken during the year.

Mr. MANION: At the banquet which was given to my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), I think I heard someone say there was a very fine list of estimates all ready.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. MANION: Oh, yes; I was listening. You gentlemen were at the banquet; you may not remember, but I was sober, listening in up here. I do not remember who it was, but somebody made that statement. Perhaps the minister could tell us something about that splendid list of estimates which were to be brought in.

Just now the minister said these estimates showed what was absolutely indispensable or absolutely necessary. In other words, the supplementary estimates he is going to bring in are not indispensable or absolutely necessary. That was the only conclusion I could reach. Of course I admit that they may be necessary for an election, but I mean necessary as public works. I should like the minister to tell us a little more about the program that is to be brought in, about which we have been hearing so much. Really members of the house should not be the last people in the country to know about these matters.

Mr. CARDIN: I was just proceeding with my remarks when the leader of the opposition interrupted me. I have, however, no objection to letting the item stand.

Mr. STEWART: I am glad to know that the door is not yet entirely closed.

Mr. CARDIN: Oh, no.

Item stands.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 23, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

COMMENT IN OTTAWA CITIZEN ON SPEECH RESPECTING CIVIL SERVICE COMMITTEE

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, to my utmost regret it is my duty to rise to a question of privilege. Referring to yesterday's debate on the civil service commission, the reporter of the Ottawa Citizen, in a column entitled Glimpses of Parliament, writes in this morning's paper:

> Mr. Pouliot, who was chairman last year, gave expression to views which, as usual, were not qualified.

My answer will be threefold. In the first place, I never speak through my hat. In the second place, I would suggest to that gentleman of the press gallery that he read the 43,602 numbered pages of the last 461 files of the civil service commission which were in the office of the clerk of the civil service committee last year, and which have all been returned to the commission. The third part of my answer shall be biblical:

> They have eyes and see not;
> They have ears and hear not;
> They have noses and smell not.

STANDING COMMITTEES

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT—CHANGE OF PERSONNEL

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved:

That the name of Mr. Héon be substituted for that of Mr. Wermenlinger on the standing committee on public accounts.

That the name of Mr. Bercovitch be substituted for that of Mr. Mullins on the standing committee on public accounts.

That the name of Mr. Kennedy be substituted for that of Mr. Hansell on the special committee to inquire into the terms and operation of the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES ACT

SEINE FISHING FOR SALMON PROHIBITED IN WATERS ADJACENT TO MOUTH OF FRASER RIVER

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 29, to amend the Fisheries Act, 1932.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. REID: This bill, Mr. Speaker, is for the purpose of amending the Fisheries Act so as to prevent, by statute, fishing for salmon by the use of purse seines in the estuary of the Fraser river, whch area had always been the fishing ground of the individual gill net fishermen until 1933 when, for the first time and by order in council, seine fishing was allowed in this area.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SALMON TRAP NETS PROHIBITED IN CANADIAN TIDAL WATERS ON BRITISH COLUMBIA COAST

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 30, to amend the Fisheries Act, 1932.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to abolish fish traps in British Columbia.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

OTTAWA GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS AND REALTY PURCHASES

Mr. HYNDMAN:

1. What has been the cost of each new building erected by the government in the city of Ottawa during the years from 1935 to date?
2. What new government buildings are now under construction in the city of Ottawa, and what is the estimated cost of each?

3. What property or properties have been taken over by the government from the city of Ottawa each year since 1926?

4. At what price was each property acquired?

Building	Cost
Justice building (contracted for January 13, 1935)..	$1,365,811 37
Postal terminal building (contracted for March 25, 1935)..	886,025 18
Royal Canadian mint refinery (contracted for March 13, 1935)..	459,088 96
Tailing disposal building, Department of Mines and Resources..	24,860 45
Industrial minerals and ceramics laboratory, Department of Mines and Resources..	137,786 80
Ore dressing laboratory, Department of Mines and Resources	93,887 41

Building	Estimated cost
New supreme court building, including surrounding terraces and underground garages.. ..	$3,360,000 00
New post office building, corner Sparks and Elgin streets.. ..	686,500 00

3 and 4. Portion of Earnscliffe avenue for national research building site. Purchased January 9, 1934, for $1,650. West half of lot 2, south side of Lydia street for Department of Mines and Resources plant, Booth street area. Purchased October 18, 1937, for $450.

TORONTO HARBOUR WORKS

Mr. MARSH:

What was the total amount spent by the federal government on all works in connection with Toronto harbour, between the years 1920 to 1938 inclusive?

Mr. CARDIN:

$7,064,370.18 (April 1, 1920, to December 31, 1938).

HAMILTON HARBOUR WORKS AND BURLINGTON BEACH CANAL IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. MARSH:

1. What were the total moneys spent by the federal government on Hamilton harbour, including Burlington bay, between the years 1920 to 1938, inclusive?

2. What was the total cost of all improvements at Burlington beach canal, including all dredging, widening of canal, building and repairing piers, etc., between the years 1920 to 1938, inclusive?

[Mr. Hyndman.]

Mr. CARDIN:

1. $996,456.77 (April 1, 1920, to December 31, 1938).

2. $2,649,239.74 (April 1, 1920, to December 31, 1938).

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—SEARCHES AT ST. ANSELME, QUE.

Mr. LACROIX (Beauce):

1. Have the Royal Canadian Mounted Police made any searches or investigations on the property of Mr. C. Aug. Cadrin, or of Mr. J. B. Cadrin, merchants at St. Anselme, county of Dorchester, province of Quebec?

2. How many such visits were made to the said property?

3. Did the Royal Canadian Mounted Police constables proceed by virtue of search warrants or not?

4. If not, by what authorization?

5. Were any complaints made that intoxicating liquor was stored in warehouses or other property of the said C. Aug. Cadrin or of the said J. B. Cadrin?

6. If so, by whom?

7. What were the results of such investigation?

8. Is there a limit to the number of such searches that can be made on private property?

9. Can such investigations be conducted at any hour of the day or night?

10. Will steps be taken to prevent unfair and unwarranted annoyance and persecution of peaceful citizens from taking place?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East):

1. Yes.

2. Two searches were made of property occupied by Mr. C. Auguste Cadrin in December 13th, 1938 and January 13th, 1939.

3. No.

4. Writ of assistance issued under the provisions of the Excise Act.

5. Yes.

6. This information cannot be disclosed.

7. No results.

8. The law does not prescribe any limitation.

9. Public interest should govern.

10. Steps are taken at all times by members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to check the reliability of information, as far as possible, before searches are carried out under the provisions of the Excise Act.

SEED GRAIN LOANS GUARANTEE ACT—FEDERAL LIABILITY

Mr. PURDY:

What is the present liability, by provinces, of the federal government on its guarantees under the provisions of the Seed Grain Act of 1938?

Mr. DUNNING: Under the terms of The Seed Grain Loans Guarantee Act, 1938, the dominion government guarantees the principal and interest of loans made in Alberta and Saskatchewan by chartered banks for seed grain assistance to farmers during the spring of 1938. The loans in each province are primarily guaranteed by the provincial government. The province is not required to fulfil its guarantee until three years after the date of any loan and the dominion's liability is only to the amount that the province is unable to fulfil its guarantee. The principal amount of loans authorized to be guaranteed is: Alberta $1,900,000, Saskatchewan $14,500,000. The principal amount guaranteed is not yet determined, but general guarantees have been executed for not exceeding the maximum amount authorized.

VEGETABLE OILS IMPORT—DOMESTIC PRODUCTION OF SHORTENING

Mr. HAYHURST:

1. What quantity of vegetable oils in gallons was imported into Canada in 1938?

2. What quantity of shortening containing no animal fat was produced in Canada in: (a) 1937; (b) 1938?

Mr. EULER:

1. Imports for Consumption

DOCTOR P. S. HUDSON

Mr. MARSHALL:

In the auditor general's report for the year ended March 31, 1938, appears the following item (Part A-38, Agriculture): "Contribution to expenses of Dr. P. S. Hudson from England to Peru, $973.33"—1. Is Dr. Hudson a member of the Canadian civil service?

2. What work was he engaged upon in England?

3. When did he go to England?

4. What are the circumstances surrounding his transfer from England to Peru?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. No.

2. Dr. Hudson is an official of the imperial bureau of plant genetics, Cambridge, England.

3. No information.

4. It was the purpose of the imperial bureau of plant genetics, Cambridge, England, to send an expedition to Peru to secure supplies of new species of potatoes and Dr. Hudson was to be in charge of the expedition. As Canada was especially interested in this work and was to receive a supply of the potatoes obtained, a contribution was made towards the expenses of the expedition. Due to the illness of Dr. Hudson, the expedition was postponed and is now under way under new leadership.

IMPORTS OF VEGETABLES—SEASONAL RESTRICTIONS

Mr. HEON:

1. How many orders in council were passed during the year 1938 with respect to vegetables, to prevent foreign products from invading the Canadian market between the months of April and July?

2. Will orders in council of similar nature be passed during the same period in 1939?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. None required as authority contained in previous orders in council.

2. No, unless further authority required.

LAKE ST. JOHN, ROBERVAL COUNTY, QUE., PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. HEON:

1. Is the dominion government, through the Public Works department, undertaking any works in Lake St. John-Roberval county?

2. If so, what is the nature of such works?

3. To what amount?

4. Is the work to be done under contract or day work?

5. If under contract, who is the contractor?

6. Was he the lowest tenderer?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes.

2. (a) St. Henri de Taillon (Ponte à la Pipe), blasting reef.

(b) Roberval, construction of a protection wall.

3. (a) $500.

(b) $22,000.

4, 5 and 6. (a) Day labour.

(b) Work being done by day labour. Stone required in construction of protection wall being supplied under contract by E. R. Truchon, who was the lowest tenderer.

LIFE INSURANCE PREMIUMS

Mr. FLEMING:

Has the government any knowledge, through the Department of Finance, that the life insurance companies doing business in Canada have raised, or are contemplating raising the premiums on new insurance?

Mr. DUNNING: About four years ago there was a more or less general increase in the premiums for new non-participating policies, the increase on the average amounting to about 2 per cent. There has been no subsequent general revision of such rates. No general increase in participating rates has taken place for many years. The tendency has been rather in the opposite direction through the introduction of low premium special series of policies with lower dividend scales or with deferred participation. Approximately 80 per cent of new life insurance is now effected on plans providing for some form of participation.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE—STATIONARY SEARCH LIGHTS

Mr. MacNEIL:

1. Have any stationary search lights been secured or installed by the Department of National Defence?

2. If so, what firm secured the order for such search lights?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1 and 2. No. Contract is now under consideration.

STANLEY PARK, VANCOUVER—FORTIFICATIONS

Mr. GREEN:

1. Have the fortifications in Stanley park, Vancouver, been completed and turned over to the Department of National Defence?

2. If so, on what date were they turned over?

3. If not, when is it expected that they will be so turned over?

4. What will be the total cost of such fortifications?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. The works are not yet completed.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. By the end of June, 1939.

4. Total cost of works, approximately $205,073.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

DISTRIBUTORS' DISCOUNTS ON IMPORTS—TARIFF BOARD DECLARATIONS

Mr. LAWSON:

1. How many distributors' discounts, and on what imported articles, have been cancelled by the Department of National Revenue, customs division, since January 1, 1939?

2. Has the tariff board given any ruling on any case submitted: (a) as to the legality of the Department of National Revenue granting general distributors' discounts or (b) cancelling the same?

Mr. ILSLEY: Return tabled.

MONTREAL CONSTRUCTION SUPPLY AND EQUIPMENT LIMITED—SHELL MANUFACTURE

Mr. MacNEIL:

1. Was a contract executed with the Montreal Construction Supply and Equipment Limited, Montreal, for the manufacture of shells? If so, on what date?

2. Is this the same firm that secured the contract for the erection of a public building in Ottawa?

3. On what date did this firm commence the manufacture of shells?

4. Has any reason been given for non-delivery of shells?

5. If so, what is the reason?

6. Was this contract awarded on the basis of selection rather than competitive bids? If so, for what reasons?

7. To what extent were the facilities of other manufacturing concerns examined before the selection was made of this particular firm?

PASSENGERS IN ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE PLANES

Mr. MacNEIL:

1. Were any members of the House of Commons carried as passengers in planes of the Royal Canadian Air Force during 1936, 1937, and 1938?

2. If so, was permission granted by the Department of National Defence for such flights?

3. What are the names of the members of the House of Commons who secured this privilege, what was the number of flights in each instance, and between what points?

Mr. POWER (for Mr. Mackenzie, Vancouver): Return tabled.

THE BREN MACHINE GUN

Mr. MacNEIL:

1. Has the Department of National Defence secured information with regard to the Bren gun performance at Bisley?

2. If so, were such reports satisfactory?

3. Do the reports indicate that the Bren gun may be employed safely for overhead fire with advancing troops?

4. Has the Department of National Defence secured reports on other tests made of the Bren gun in competition with other light machine guns?

5. If so, what do these reports indicate as to accuracy of fire and extraction?

6. Is it true that the Bren gun was offered to the German military command and the military staffs of other great powers and rejected?

7. How many men are required to serve the Bren gun in action?

SECRETARY OF STATE—EUROPEAN TRAVEL IN 1938

Mr. WERMENLINGER:

1. Did the Secretary of State visit the continent of Europe during 1938?

2. If so, was he accompanied by anybody connected with the government?

3. What countries did he visit?

4. What was the nature of his business with each country visited?

5. What was accomplished by his visit to each country?

GOVERNMENT LOANS TO EX-SERVICE MEN

Mr. MacNEIL:

1. How many loans have been granted to ex-service men by the Department of Pensions and National Health during, (a) 1937, (b) 1938, under the provisions enabling aid to those requiring tools and equipment in some recognized trade?

2. What was the total amount loaned for such purposes during, (a) 1937, (b) 1938?

3. Have any such loans been made to ex-service men engaged in the fishing industry under this provision during 1937 or 1938?

IMPERIAL EX-SERVICE MEN

Mr. MacNEIL:

1. What is the number of imperial ex-service men now in receipt of the war veterans' allowance?

2. What is the number of ex-service men who served in the South African war, now in receipt of war veterans' allowance?

3. What is the number of former imperial ex-service men now in receipt of unemployment assistance from the Department of Pensions and National Health with: (a) pre-war domicile; (b) domicile prior to 1924?

4. What was the total number of imperial ex-service men admitted to hospitals under the Department of Pensions and National Health in: (a) 1937; (b) 1938?

5. How many imperial ex-service men are employed in the Department of Pensions and National Health?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

MARKETING OF JAPANESE AND SIBERIAN SALMON IN AUSTRALIA

Mr. GREEN:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, reports, memoranda and other documents passing to or from any department of the government and any Canadian trade commissioner in Australia, or any firm or corporation in Canada dealing in canned salmon, concerning unfair methods of competition with Canadian canned salmon in the marketing of Japanese or Siberian salmon in the Australian market.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES — CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION FOR APPROVAL SUBJECT TO REQUIRED LEGISLATION

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King that the house go into committee on the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 17th day of November, 1938, between Canada and the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): Mr. Speaker, in case there might be some little misapprehension regarding the manner in which the treaty is received in the province of Prince Edward Island and in the county I represent. I wish to take this opportunity of making a few observations on the motion now before the house.

It is a real pleasure for me, representing a rural constituency in that province, to be able to say that the treaty has been well received by the people of the province and of the county which I represent. A day or two after the press release was given out I met on the street a friend of mine; although he was strongly opposed politically to me we were always personal friends, and his first observation was: "This time we shall have nothing to fight over; we have not a word to say—the treaty is all in our favour." I believe that that represents pretty well the attitude of people in general. I make that statement for this reason: The United States has always been the natural market for the maritime provinces, and more particularly, possibly, for Prince Edward Island. If we look back over the history of Canada and study the situation of our province before we came into confederation, it will be found that at that time we had a wonderful trade with the people of the United States; we had control of our own customs laws; we had to sacrifice a good deal when we came into confederation, and ever since our people have looked longingly towards the markets of the United States in the hope that some day we might have a better entry into those markets.

While speaking of confederation, I do not think it will be out of the way for me to remind the house at this time that on July 16 of this year the seventy-fifth anniversary of confederation is being celebrated in the province of Prince Edward Island and the city of Charlottetown. A well balanced program has been arranged for the five days of that gathering. Invitations are being sent out to the Prime Minister and the members of his cabinet, to the premiers of all provinces, to the leader of the opposition, and to all hon. members and senators. We sincerely hope that a large number of people across the dominion will take advantage of the occasion and attend this celebration in the city of Charlottetown.

The people of Prince Edward Island were not altogether satisfied with what happened after they came into the union. We were promised that we should have the central markets of Canada as an outlet for our products. We regret that that has not worked out in just the way that we had hoped. One of the difficulties is that the central provinces grow the same agricultural products that we do, and therefore it is simply impossible for us to find in those provinces a ready market for our surplus products. Another reason is the long haul and the exceedingly high freight rates. Our close proximity to the United States and the fact that we have waterborne traffic makes it much more economical for the shipper to send his products into the United States. Naturally, therefore, in all these years they have been looking at that market with longing eyes in the hope that the time again might come when they might have freer access to it.

I remember distinctly the disappointment of the people of Prince Edward Island when the reciprocity agreement of 1911 was defeated. It was defeated, I am sorry to say, by the attitude of our friends opposite, and I am really surprised to see them taking the same attitude at this time towards the treaty now before us. The fact that the United States came to the assistance of our friends, both with money and with the influence which they could bring into the campaign of 1911, goes to prove that the agreement was a splendid one; had the agreement not been entirely in favour of Canada, United States money would not have been put up, nor would the fight have been made which was made then to defeat it.

As the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said the other day, when the treaty of 1911 was first introduced into this house, hon. gentlemen opposite did not know whether they were for it or against it. They were so completely overwhelmed by the wonderful offers made to Canada at that time that at the outset they did not like to oppose it, but afterwards, getting assistance from outside, they plucked up courage and determined to put up a fight against it. As the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) said yesterday, the 1911 treaty would have made Canada an adjunct of the United States—so at that time they started waving the old flag, shouting "No truck or trade with the Yankees", and declaring that if we entered into that agreement with the United States we would immediately lose our national identity and become a mere adjunct of the republic to the south. Of course that suggestion was perfectly ridiculous, and it is just as ridiculous to-day as it was at that time. Still, a good many people seem to fall for it.

The Prime Minister said the other day that he remembered Sir Wilfrid Laurier stating that it might be twenty-five years before another opportunity offered for us again to put through an agreement of that kind, and events have proved that Sir Wilfrid was right. We feel in the maritime provinces that our progress has been practically held back for twenty-five or thirty years owing to the fact that we have not had better trade relations with the United States. As has been pointed out on different occasions in the course of this debate, nine-tenths of our export trade is with the United States and Great Britain. One thing that our friends opposite cannot grasp is that you must be willing to buy before you can expect to sell; they think that trade is a one-way street. Unless they get rid of that idea they will never change their policy of high protection. To my mind, reciprocity is exactly what the word implies; it means that you must be willing to trade both ways.

The other day the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) said that the Prime Minister had made the statement that this was a peace pact. Well, I listened carefully to what the Prime Minister had to say, and the impression I got was that this was not a peace pact to protect us from aggression on the part of the United States or any other country, but that it was an object lesson to the whole world, teaching that the two great democratic countries could be drawn together in a policy of neighbourliness. It is not a peace pact to safeguard us from attack from any other country, but it is what the Prime Minister said it is—an object lesson to the world at large to show what can be done among the democratic nations. Our friends opposite are drawing largely on their imagination when they try to put any other construction on the treaty.

Let me read briefly some extracts from the British press and other British organizations to show what the opinion over there is. We all know what an influential body the British board of trade is. In reference to the agreement, the British board of trade summarizes it as an:

> important and significant step in the efforts of the United Kingdom and the United States governments to reduce trade barriers and so contribute to world peace and prosperity.

The Manchester Guardian says:

> The people of the United States and the United Kingdom will welcome the treaty, "not perhaps for the increased trade it will actually bring so much as for its political significance. . . . Two great democratic countries are able, in a time when self-sufficiency and state regulated trade seem in the ascendent, to set the example of economic disarmament that the world so sadly needs."

The Financial News, independent, states:

> The agreement marks a substantial throwback to sanity and adds: "The agreement in sum is standing testimony to the efficacy of human determination, aided by Anglo-Saxon genius for compromise."

I could read a great many more testimonials of the same sort. For example, the Yorkshire Post, Conservative, says:

> The pact represents the first decisive step towards liberation of international trade the postwar world has achieved and is most valued not only for what it is but for what it promises.

And to quote the Daily Telegraph:

> The goodwill the dominions have displayed in this matter merits particular recognition.

If it were not for the goodwill shown by the dominions it would have been difficult to put the treaty through.

These quotations from the British press are significant, and they bear out exactly what the Prime Minister said the other day, that we are not afraid of aggression from the United States or any other country but that the treaty is an example to the whole world of what democratic nations can do when they sincerely desire to get together.

After listening to our friends across the way in their speeches on this treaty I am led to ask this question: Where do the leader of the opposition and the Conservative party stand in relation to the treaty? Are they for it or against it? The leader of the opposition stated the other day in the closing part of his speech:

> Time alone will tell, but my belief is that the ill effects of the treaty will be very much greater than the good effects.

I submit that if the ill effects of this treaty are greater than the good effects it is up to the leader of the opposition and his party as a whole to vote against the treaty on the floor of the house. But I shall watch very carefully to see whether they will venture so far. They are taking a great deal of time condemning the treaty and they will try to prejudice the minds of the public against it, but I doubt whether they will go the length of voting against it.

I cannot see how any farmer, any member representing a farming constituency in this house, in fact any member representing almost any constituency except a thoroughly industrial one, can oppose this treaty. Hon. gentlemen opposite will remember the time when the Robb budget was introduced. Industrial people from the cities in this vicinity paraded in front of the public buildings with placards on their breasts and backs, declaring that their industries would be closed down and that they were facing starvation on account of that Robb budget. Mr. Robb quietly told those gentlemen to go home and just take their time and see whether the budget would not work out for them a great deal better than they expected. The result was that the automobile industry in this country never had such a period of expansion as it had under the Robb budget.

Mr. STEWART: Can the hon. gentleman tell what changes were made in the budget before it was adopted in the house?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Very few. Yesterday the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) stated that he is still for high protection. When the Conservative convention was held in Ottawa and the new leader was chosen, they adopted a resolution stating that the party stands by its old principle of high protection.

Mr. MacNICOL: On a point of order, there is no use in the hon. gentleman making a statement that is not true. The party did no such thing as have a high protection plank.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I accept the hon. gentleman's correction, but his quarrel will have to be with the press, not me, because I have the clipping.

Mr. MacNICOL: I ought to know, because I was chairman.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): History gives us to understand that the national policy of high protection was inaugurated in Canada to protect our infant industries, and when those infant industries got on their feet the party of our hon. friends opposite was pledged to do away with this high protection policy and adopt a policy of lower tariffs. But those "infant" industries, many of them now hoary with age, are still clamouring for more and more protection. And every time they shout, our friends opposite come to their assistance and are willing to give them higher and higher protection. When all those industrialists and manufacturers climb on the back of the farmer he has pretty heavy going.

Our hon. friends opposite must be either for or against this agreement. They cannot ride two horses; they cannot eat their cake and have it too. They will have to make a decision on this matter, and their time to make it is not far away.

On page 1070 of Hansard of this session the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) is reported as saying that he is absolutely opposed to a prohibitive tariff. But from 1930 to 1935 he was a member of a government which imposed the highest tariff that was ever imposed in this country; if ever there was a tariff that could be described as a prohibitive tariff, that was it. And we know what the results were.

Mr. MacNICOL: It made a lot of good jobs.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I heard one of our friends over there the other day lamenting the plight of the young people of this country. I tell my hon. friends that the prohibitive tariff imposed by that government threw more people out of jobs than any other thing that ever happened. And see the other results. Not only was the indemnity of every hon. member of this house cut—we do not complain so much about that—but the salary of every member of the civil service was cut—

An hon. MEMBER: Why shouldn't it be?

Mr. LAWSON: What has the tariff to do with that?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): —and the business men followed suit, and so on right along the line.

Mr. POULIOT: The truth hurts.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Our friends over there may protest as much as they like; all I have to say is that—

> It is the set of the sails, and not the gales,
> That shows the way they go.

There was a good cartoon in a recent issue of the Montreal Gazette, which to my mind sums up, better than anything else I can think of, the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite. It showed a Conservative gentleman, dressed in black, looking very mournful, and applying black paint to one side of this trade treaty. And there was a charming, smiling, gentle looking Liberal on the other side painting it a lovely white.

Mr. MANION: It should have been red.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): This cartoon cleverly depicts the true state of the case. We have always told the people that the policy of the Liberal party was expansion of trade. We have told them that trade is the lifeblood of the country, that without trade we could not expect to meet our financial obligations and prosper. With that in view, following hard upon the trade treaty of 1935, came the Dunning budget, providing for sweeping reductions in the tariff. Duties were reduced in many cases 17½ per cent. Many articles coming from the United States were made free; the duty on farm machinery was reduced from 25 to 7½ per cent, and so on all down the line. That is one pledge that the Liberal party have kept. They stated in a pamphlet which they issued in 1935 that they would seek to release and promote international as well as internal trade, and they have gone a long way in that direction.

Our trade has gone forward with leaps and bounds. I am not going to quote a great many figures but I have a few here from the bureau of statistics. Let us look at our trade with Great Britain. In the fiscal year 1934-35, the last full year of the Conservative administration, Canada's imports from the United Kingdom were $112,000,000. In the fiscal year 1937-38 they totalled $145,000,000—I use round figures—an improvement of $33,000,000, or 29 per cent. For the same two years our exports to the United Kingdom were $291,000,000 and $410,000,000, a gain of $119,000,000 or 40 per cent.

Look at our trade with the United States. In the Conservative government's last fiscal year, 1934-35, Canada's total trade with the United States was valued at $608,000,000, whereas in 1937-38 it came to $910,000,000, a gain of $300,000,000, or practically 50 per cent.

Mr. SPENCE: Were not times better in 1937-38 than in 1934-35?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): What do our friends over there want? They must be hard to please if those figures do not please them.

Now let us look at the export figures, comparing the same two years, 1934-35 and 1937-38. The percentage of gain in Canada's exports to some of the leading countries was as follows: Great Britain, 40 per cent; United States, 39 per cent; Australia, 79 per cent; Japan, 57 per cent; South Africa, 33 per cent; New Zealand, 118 per cent; Belgium, 24 per cent; the Netherlands, 32 per cent; Germany, 174 per cent; Argentina, 85 per cent, and Ireland, 25 per cent.

Right down the list you find that we have made a substantial gain in our export trade. Is not that what our country needs? Is it not what we have been looking for? We have a great deal—I was going to say to be thankful for, and I do not know that I can use a better expression, in the very favourable situation we enjoy not only from the trade angle but also from the financial angle. Hon. members will recall that during those five years Mr. Bennett was not only prime minister but for most of the time was finance minister as well. He was going to show this country not only how he could run it as prime minister but also how to finance it. In the last year that the Liberals were in power Canada had a surplus of over $47,000,000. The first year after our friends came in they had a deficit of over $87,000,000. The next year the deficit was $114,000,000, the next year $220,000,000, the next year $133,000,000, and in the year following there was a deficit of over $116,000,000. Again I use round figures. The total deficit for those five years was over $672,000,000. That is the record of their party, brought about largely by the trade policies they have followed, because it was shown here yesterday that you cannot have trade dropping off and at the same time maintain your revenue. Our friends opposite complain about the balance of trade. We find that last year we brought in from the United States only $78,000,000 more than we sold them and, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) said the other day, our favourable balance of trade with the whole world was $280,000,000.

Now coming more particularly to the benefits which will accrue to my own province, I should like to refer to the potato situation. In one of his speeches the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) said he thought one county in the maritimes could supply all the potatoes we were permitted to ship under this agreement. I cannot agree with that suggestion; I do not think any county down there could produce 2,500,000 bushels of marketable potatoes, which is our quota under the new agreement. The important thing, however, is that if you take 2,500,000 bushels from the maritime provinces and ship them to the United States you relieve the situation to that extent, so that the different markets in the central provinces may be able to absorb the remainder of the crop. That is why we down there are so pleased with the provisions of this treaty.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the duty prior to 1935 was 75 cents per hundred pounds. Under the 1935 agreement that was reduced to 45 cents, and there was a quota established of 750,000 bushels. Under the new agreement the quota has been increased to 1,500,000 bushels of seed potatoes, while the duty has been further reduced to 37½ cents per hundred pounds or 22½ cents per bushel. That is a real concession. We are permitted to ship in twice the amount of seed potatoes and matters can be arranged in regard to the months of shipment; potatoes can be held and shipped into the United States in plenty of time for spring seeding. Then in regard to table stock, in 1935 there was no quota for potatoes of this class. Under the new agreement, however, we have a quota of 1,000,000 bushels of table stock at 37½ cents per hundred pounds, from March 1 to November 30. That gives us a total of 2,500,000 bushels that we are permitted to ship to the United States. That is what we in the maritimes have been looking and longing for during the past number of years. Quite a substantial duty remains, but I am glad to say that we have a wonderful trade in seed potatoes. I believe eighty per cent of the seed potatoes entering the United States come from Prince Edward Island. Some of the other members from the maritimes are going to deal with this question, so I will leave it in their hands, since they are better prepared to deal with it than I am.

Under this treaty free entry is granted in connection with a great many of our fishery products. Our lobster industry alone is estimated to produce $3,000,000 annually, and we are given free entry for lobsters for the duration of the agreement. This means a great deal to the Canadian fishermen because, as you know, there has been a very strong agitation in some of the Atlantic states to shut out Canadian lobsters. We also have free entry for clams, quahaugs, oysters, crabs, scallops and smelts, and I may say there is a tremendous trade in the last named fish. A splendid table was placed upon Hansard the other day by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, appearing at page 1068. I will not take time to read it again, but I would direct the attention of hon. members to it.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the reduced duty on dairy cattle is a big item in our part of the country. We have always enjoyed a splendid trade in these cattle, and some of the finest dairy herds in the maritimes are in the province of Prince Edward Island. One of the boys from my county exhibited his cattle successfully in Ottawa; he swept the boards at the Royal Winter Fair in competition with United States herds and then went to the United States, where he was again successful against the very best herds from the different experimental farms in that country. I think that is a real tribute to the dairy farmers of Prince Edward Island.

If this agreement will do anything to bring about a more equitable distribution of products I think we should be all in favour of it. I think we all agree that our greatest difficulty to-day is that there is too great a spread between what the farmer receives for what he sells and what he has to pay for what he buys. We have all spoken on this question. Our friends in the far corner are very strong in their views, and we appreciate their sentiments and their sincerity. But nothing concrete was done to deal with this situation until the negotiation of this treaty. The reduction of many duties, which means so much to the consumer, and the opportunity which is given the producer to widen his market, constitute the first concrete evidence we have had in this house that we are trying to bridge the gulf between the consumer and the man who has to market his products. So I think the government are to be congratulated on what they have done.

In conclusion I wish to repeat what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said the other day. When the reciprocity agreement was defeated in 1911 Sir Wilfrid Laurier stated that it might be twenty-five years before another agreement could be negotiated, and he was quite correct. Would not those great statesmen of the past have rejoiced to see the consummation of such a trade pact as this? Would not Fielding, Paterson and Laurier have loved to see the triumph of the principles for which they stood? We are proud indeed that to-day we have a leader of the Liberal party who has caught the vision of those who have gone before, and who has understood so well the message expressed in the words of our own poet—

> To you from falling hands we throw
> The torch; be yours to hold it high.

Let us go on as a party. There is no doubt but that we are on the right track. This agreement gives consideration to all classes of citizens, the consumer, the producer, the farmer, the manufacturer, the labourer and the fisherman. I submit that trade is the very lifeblood of the nation. Without trade we become a decadent people. With trade we go forward to fulfil our destiny as a great and growing nation. Why should Canada fear competition? Canada, a young and virile nation, can compete with any country in the world.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): During the past twenty-four hours, Mr. Speaker, we have heard from two representatives of the maritime provinces. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) seemed anxious to gain a few concessions for the apple growers and others of his own constituency in Nova Scotia, while the hon. gentleman (Mr. MacLean, Prince) who just resumed his seat seemed very happy over getting some little quotas for the benefit of his section of the country. This illustrates the sectional tariff program hon. gentlemen opposite have had ever since confederation. It is a policy of everything by fits and starts, and nothing for very long. The Liberal party have had various unstable trade policies: protection, free trade, semi-free trade, unrestricted reciprocity, free trade as they have it in England, tariff for revenue only. Now there is a desire for complete reciprocity with the United States.

A few days ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke for two hours or more and described the various concessions and reciprocity pacts which had been made in the history of Canada, beginning with the one before confederation, which ended in 1866, which was followed by the treaty of 1877 to which the Mackenzie administration agreed but which the senate of the United States did not pass. Then he came down to the treaty of 1911, and finally discussed the present one.

In his speech the Prime Minister was cheerful about what the by-elections had done for his party. If I understood correctly what he said—and I have read his speech—he claimed that the by-elections of 1934, 1935 and 1936 were won on the trade policies of the Liberal party. That is a trade policy which I have never been able to unravel, and about which I have been able to learn nothing, simply because the Liberal party has a different policy in the prairie provinces from what it has in the industrial provinces, and a different policy for each one. It has a different policy out on the coast.

Speaking of Ontario elections he referred particularly to the one in which I took part, in 1934. May I tell him that the tariff was not mentioned in the election in my constituency, nor had it any effect whatever owing to the boon of the Ottawa agreements. It was, "Beat Bennett, and Bad Times"; and another, "End Unemployment—Vote Liberal." These were some of the promises which have never been carried out, any more than have the tariff policies and promises to that effect of hon. members opposite. I have before me information as to the vote in my constituency, and in that connection I would direct the Prime Minister's attention to the issues of the Toronto Globe, and other Toronto papers published the morning after the election, and to other editorials. Those newspapers stated that trade policies had nothing to do with the results of the election, but that the Conservative candidate was a man whose own record as a public official had, more than anything else, won the election. I shall not, however, refer to particular articles in the newspapers. I got fine help from our party; we were united and won.

Newspaper articles throughout Canada showed that the trade policy had nothing to do with the other by-elections. While in my opinion warm friendship with the United States is obviously of tremendous importance to the people of Canada—because, after all, they are our own kith and kin and stand for the same high principles of civilization, liberty and justice as we do—yet I believe there is more likelihood of gaining by taking a firm stand, an honest and reliable stand, than by giving way on every occasion. I believe it is like anything else worth having in family affairs or business—a fair deal on one's own side.

For instance, the people in some of the states of the union owe British investors large sums of money, but successive British governments have refused to suggest payment or raise the matter for fear of injuring harmonious relations with the people of the United States. It seems to me that Canadian interests are ready to surrender to Washington on any and every occasion. They are more careful about United States interests than about Canadian or British interests. May I say this: If there ever were a time in the history of Canada when courage and prudence are the great need of Canadian statesmen and others who control commercial and domestic policies in the country, surely it must be now.

By no stretch of the imagination could this be called an economic, commercial or business treaty. It is a political treaty, which has arisen through the failure of Canada, and other countries represented at Geneva—and Canada was one of the leaders—to do all along the line there what they set out to do. On Canada's part the treaty is a gesture of appeasement to the United States. It will be recalled that before and after Munich the whole north American continent was silent and gave Britain no direct encouragement. It was Geneva, and pacts of all kinds, which brought about Munich. No country is more responsible than Canada in that connection. Canada has gone farther and has attacked persons who happened to say such things, and has black-balled Mr. Beverley Baxter, M.P., on the radio for telling the truth that the whole of north America was silent.

Last night the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) made some observations. He has been a free trader first, last and all the time. I have a great deal of admiration for him personally, but I think he is all wrong. I can remember when the hon. member went up and down Ontario, when the Drury administration held office in that province, and when the Hon. Mr. Drury, in effect, said that protection was an unmitigated evil in Ontario, and had caused a great deal of suffering to farmers. The Canadian council of agriculture presented a Drury memorandum to hon. members opposite—I do not know whether the hon. member for Huron North was in the house or not at that time—in which it was stated that protection was a robber system. I have placed on Hansard the representations made by this council at that time, but in effect they were that protection was an unmitigated evil which had caused wide-spread disaster in the farming communities of Ontario, and should be abolished. What was the result of the policy? No manufacturer would invest a dollar in industry, in either Quebec or Ontario. Under the low tariff of that day, between 1921 and 1930, six hundred thousand of our own Canadian boys had to go to the United States to look for jobs.

I have great admiration for the people of the United States. They are a great nation. They have led the world in education, industry and other lines of endeavour, and no blame attaches to them in this regard. For those reasons one must have the utmost admiration for them. I admire particularly their smart negotiators and diplomats. They often put it all over our amateur diplomats. It would seem since confederation we have had many novice diplomats, who do not make a very good showing when they are dealing with skilled negotiators of the United States and of the older countries of Europe. Some of them went to see Hitler and others went to see Mussolini. Others did not go so far; they went to Washington in order to make Washington the Ottawa of the south as Sir Wilfrid Laurier was going to make Ottawa the Washington of the north.

Several tariffs have been passed in the United States, and special reference was made the other day to the one in operation at the time the great war broke out. The Underwood tariff continued during the period of the war, and exports from the United States to Canada increased considerably. This was known as the United States emergency tariff. Then, in 1921, the Fordney-McCumber tariff, to which special reference was made by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) when he described its effect on fruit and vegetables and dairy products, was the highest tariff wall in the history of tariffs against the people of this country.

We now come down to 1930, and it will be recalled that the Hawley-Smoot tariff, which was in effect before the election of that year, at which time I sat in the house, was practically prohibitive so far as Canada's exports to the United States were concerned. It brought this country to the verge of ruin, and it and others from 1921 on drove hundreds of thousands to the United States. Under that tariff, imports from the United States went away up and our exports went away down. Our total exports to the United States in the year ending March 31, 1930, were valued at $515,000,000, whereas in the following year they dropped to $350,000,000. Then, under the Hawley-Smoot tariff, during the five year period United States exports to Canada exceeded our domestic exports to the United States by $1,296,000,000. That shows how we succeeded as negotiators. In the last five years from 1933 to 1938 the United States sold Great Britain £563,000,000 more goods than the United States bought from her.

In my opinion the Great Britain-United States treaty and the Canada-United States treaty will cut right across the Ottawa agreements and virtually nullify them. Let us not bother about the preferences sections provisoes, because, in effect, they are merely scraps of paper. We have to judge the treaty by history and in the light of experience. Let us not forget the lessons history has taught us when we are considering the reciprocity tariff schedules.

On May 26, 1937, at the imperial conference the proposed United States treaty was discussed. On that occasion Australia was the only opponent. That country, with only 7,000,000 people, had bought from Great Britain more goods than had the United States, with her 125,000,000 people. This high-sounding talk about lowering tariffs in the United States does not seem much to me, when we realize we are dealing with a country which in the past had the highest tariff in the world, and to obtain the new pact will cause the greatest sacrifices Canada has ever been called upon to make.

I object to the method which was used in negotiating the treaty. We have a tariff board; we have a Department of Trade and Commerce; we have boards of trade; we have labour bodies, we have agricultural bodies—all these were ignored in the consummation of the treaty, although matters of great magnitude were being discussed. Let us compare what was done in the United States and in England, with what was done in Canada, at the time the treaties were being negotiated. In the United States they took industry, labour and agriculture into their confidence. Sixty days were given in which to file objections with the United States Department of Commerce and with the Interstate Commerce Commission. Second, it gave them four months within which to appear and give before a tariff board their views and any objections they might have, on a list of articles which was tabled in this house on February 15, 1938. That is the way in which the United States went about the business.

What did Canada do? I asked the Prime Minister in the house at the time. Oh, he said that Canada could not do it in that way, inasmuch as the President of the United States had certain powers by which he could of his own initiative negotiate a 50 per cent reduction in tariffs for three years. The United States always speaks with two voices on trade matters, defence and foreign affairs. There are always two voices speaking for the American people. One is the president's voice, or the ambassador side, with his power to negotiate a 50 per cent reduction in the tariff for three years. The other voice is that of congressional side, consisting of the Senate and House of Representatives, and that is the voice with newspaper and public opinion behind it in the various states. I have seen scores of United States newspapers which denounced Chamberlain and Britain, and only three of them supported the stand he took at Munich—the Washington Post, the New York Times and the Cleveland Plain Dealer. It is the same with this treaty, which has been introduced with a flourish of trumpets and all that.

The mother country herself is doubtful about this treaty. I doubt if it would ever have been thought of or considered by the British government had it not been negotiated by two free traders, namely, the Right Hon. Oliver Stanley and the Right Hon. Malcolm MacDonald. I can tell the house a great deal about MacDonaldism, past and present. Under the MacDonaldism of the past, which failed, Germany would have won the war. They would have won it if Ramsay MacDonald had had his way, and then later he became Prime Minister of Great Britain in a Conservative administration, which shows what a short memory Britain has. The son, the other member of the family has been negotiating this treaty. He is also a free trader, and I doubt if Britain would ever have agreed to this treaty had it not been for the failure of Geneva and disarmament brought about largely by pacifists, the advice of Canada and MacDonaldism past and present. Malcolm MacDonald has been saying that the British empire is in great danger of being destroyed, and is in peril. I do not know anyone who has done more to help bring such a thing about than MacDonaldism past and present, and their pacifism, and free trade fallacies and insecurity, which brought about Munich.

This treaty, negotiated by these two right hon. gentlemen Stanley and MacDonald, on behalf of Great Britain, does not commend itself to the wisdom and judgment of the British people. Read the trade organ of the British manufacturers, with returns for February and April of last year, and January this year, and you will see that the British manufacturer is very much alarmed about this treaty and has denounced it as fatal to Britain and the empire. It has been negotiated over the heads of industry in Great Britain, over the heads of labour and over the heads of agriculture, by two free traders in the Chamberlain cabinet. But for the failure of Geneva, and the spirit of the dictators, Britain would never have consented to this treaty. They never would have consented to it if Canada had not asked for it, and only because Britain was disarmed and unable to defend itself. Canada has led Britain into this treaty against her own free will. Britain and France appointed former Premier Van Zeeland of Belgium to make a report on what should be done regarding trade and foreign affairs, and the very thing which the two hon. members from the maritimes have been pleading for here in the past twenty-four hours is one of the things that Van Zeeland condemns, namely, quotas and favoured nation treaties. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) showed last night that the quota provided by this treaty for cattle, dairy cows and calves is a farce, that Mexico could ship into the United States on the first day of the treaty almost as many cattle as Canada has under the quota in this present treaty.

The treaty contains provisoes about the British preferences, but the provisoes will not amount to anything and are jokers because Britain, when this treaty terminates at the end of three years, will have made other arrangements and will have forgotten all about the dominions who tried to get away from the Ottawa agreements. Those Ottawa agreements were twice blessed: They increased the trade from Great Britain to Canada forty-six per cent, as Mr. Chamberlain said in speaking on the last budget, and they increased trade from Canada to Great Britain forty per cent. Mr. Stanley and Mr. MacDonald and other free traders contended that the Ottawa agreements would ruin Britain's foreign trade, but they did not do so. Under the Ottawa agreements Britain's trade with foreign countries went up nearly one-third, and Canada's trade with foreign countries went up also twenty-five per cent.

The Ottawa agreements were the consummation of the life-work of Joseph Chamberlain. It took twenty-six years, 1906 to 1932 to attain them. In an address after the South African war at Leicester, England, he proposed an economic trade union between the Teutonic race, Germany, and the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon race, the United States and Great Britain, because they led in industrial power, arts, science and education. But his proposal failed. Had that been brought about we would never have had a world war. Joseph Chamberlain's real policy was one of preferential trade treaties within the empire, and he carried on his great tariff reform campaign from 1906 onwards. Had he succeeded even in this there would not have been a world war in 1914. He died in 1914, just about the time of the war. It took twenty-six years, from 1906 to 1932; and as a tribute to the magnificent contingents sent during the war by Australia and Canada, this magnificent system of British preferences started in 1906 was to be applied in the Ottawa agreements of 1932 to wheat, on which a preference of six cents a bushel was given when carried on British ships, and other concessions were given on other food products, on lumber and dominion food products entering the British market.

But all that, Mr. Speaker, is now being scrapped for this semblance of a trade treaty with the United States for political, not economic purposes. So far as this treaty is concerned, it is here to-day and gone to-morrow; for the Republican party and Governor Landon are pledged to repeal it after the next election in 1940.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) pointed out to me the other day in the house that there was a proviso that if the United States ever abrogated this Canada-United States treaty we could go back and link up with the old former British preferences accorded under the Ottawa agreements, but I say that this proviso will be only a scrap of paper and will never be acted upon, because by that time Britain will have made other arrangements and these preferences that were granted to us in grain and food products will have gone forever and beyond recall.

When it comes to the three per cent excise tax, which is taken off the commodities covered by the Canada-United States agreement, that was about the only slight protection which a great many of our smaller producers had. The concession which the government is making in part will largely benefit the rich, but the small man will lose the only three per cent protection he has. The treaty will also be a blow at empire shipping on the great lakes and the St. Lawrence, because our shipping will lose the preferences which we now have under the Ottawa agreements on grain carried in British ships. It will also ruin our home market and our empire market for our own products, and our own work for our own workmen, and our own empire markets for our own products. We will now have to share all this with the United States, in order to please her and cater to her for favours.

We have annual tariff tinkering, and that, plus the two reciprocity treaties covering a wide and now greatly extended range of articles, high taxation, and the lack of security for industry, agriculture and labour, will cause a dislocation of industry, will certainly instil doubt and fear in the minds of our producers and manufacturers, and will cause widespread unemployment in industry in Canada, reducing the number of jobs for Canadians in Canada. It will paralyze and destroy the fruit and vegetable industry by increased competition and lack of any protection. It will increase the use of California and Florida products by Canadians at the expense of our own products. Would the United States buy from South Africa or from Canada fruits and vegetables at the expense of their own producers in Florida and California? No. It will lead in Ontario to less cultivation of the fruit and vegetable and dairy lands near industrial centres and cause greater losses to these home industries that are already suffering and unable to meet low production costs or sell their produce because it does not pay the cost of labour to assemble it for sale, and is mostly unsalable.

Why destroy the home market for fruit and vegetables entirely? The tariff was 30 per cent; it was cut in 1935 to 15 per cent; and it is now 10 per cent. Such a sacrifice of Canadian interests to please and appease the United States may be welcome to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) and the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean). What do they care about the rest of Canada so long as they can get a few special favours and advantages for their own home counties at the expense of the Ottawa agreements and the general good of Canada and quotas on apples and potatoes?

By agreements such as this Canada will be driven into the pan-United States orbit for trade, defence and migration, rather than rearming in a proper way for the security of people in times like these and cooperating and working with Britain. I fear this will be an empire-wrecking agreement. Washington will become the economic centre of the British empire. None of these policies was discussed in the last election. Do you suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister referred to these matters in the nine provinces in 1935? I never read of his doing so. Oh no, he had a separate trade policy and a separate reciprocity proposal for each of the various provinces, which proposal varied greatly as he travelled across Canada.

For a long time the present government were bitter opponents of the Ottawa agreements; they did all they could while in opposition to belittle them and to threaten to abrogate them. Then the Prime Minister, with the general election of 1935 coming on, had to turn a right-about-face on that particular question, and in a statement said he would not repeal them but would extend their scope.

There is nothing outstanding about this new treaty achievement. The most outstanding thing I can see about it is that Canada is playing the part of Santa Claus to the entire population of the United States; it is distributing favours to 125,000,000 people in that country at the expense of trade and industry and labour and agriculture in our own land, and the people of the United States will never shoot at Santa Claus—oh, no. No jobs will come to Canadians in Canada as a result of this treaty, notwithstanding what was said about it in that celebrated press release. It was a "release" certainly, in a real sense, because one effect of it will be to release tens of thousands of people who are now employed, people who will lose their jobs and perhaps be ruined as a consequence of this lowering of tariffs and continual tinkering with reciprocity pacts, as in the present treaty. The press release blessings of the treaty, experience will show to be a myth.

There has been much flourishing and blowing of trumpets about the joy at the passing of this agreement. The joy will be turned into sorrow for Canada when the results of the second reciprocity treaty appear after one or two years' experience. The first one, in 1935, is admitted by all trade organizations to have been a failure. It has now been widened to include hundreds of other articles. As has been pointed out by two speakers from the maritimes, no doubt it contains some small advantages to very small sections. A few more apples and potatoes and dairy products, such as cream, here and there; a few more cattle here and there, some additional lumber, can be sold, with a reduction of 50 per cent on fish, potatoes, lumber, grain, live cattle and other agricultural products, and some metallic and non-metallic articles, but I predict, when it is all added up, that it will be like the treaty of 1935, of doubtful value even for those favoured districts and sections of Canada by the time they get through with it. It will cause the grain industry to seek a north and south outlet, and make for pegging forever and bonuses for wheat, as it does in hard wheat, to Canada's disadvantage, and destroy our natural markets since confederation for grain through an east and west traffic and an overseas market to Great Britain and her allies and other world markets. It will mean the further bootlegging of our hard wheat in United States elevators and mixing it up with their inferior grades, not only injuring Canada's shipping by rail and water, but also facilitating exports of flour, bootlegged and milled in the United States, to the European markets as Canadian No. 1.

This treaty is called the most momentous achievement of all Canada. It is held up in the house in eulogy for applause, and commended in flights of ecstasy. These flights of ecstasy will mean nothing when we get the trade returns, even for one year. There is nothing at which government supporters have stopped short in praising the treaty; it is supposed to be one of the seven wonders of the world, like the pyramids of Egypt and Niagara falls. After the next presidential election it will be relegated, by whatever party succeeds there, to cold storage, and we shall not then be able to get back our preferences: in spite of what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) has said, we shall have lost them.

The United States negotiators may fool some of our Canadian negotiators some of the time, but the experience of history is that they cannot fool the Canadian public all of the time with such gestures of one-sided trade benefits.

Since the demise of the Morning Post the press of England have been rendering unanimous lip service to the United States and to the League of Nations. That is not the way to get the United States back with us. Read the United States papers; go into any reading room in any of the main cities and look at the chain papers. Outside of a few newspapers I have mentioned they are bitter in denouncing Britain. Do not forget that United States policy for defence and trade purposes is one of isolation, a resolve to keep out of foreign affairs and all commitments and wars unless they are attacked or invaded. It is the same policy which George Washington and Andrew Jackson had; their policy is that of the American people to-day. This treaty has been denounced in most of the United States papers. Instead of securing peace and appeasement between Canada and the United States it will cause more trouble and dissension with Canada than ever. The appeasement argument has been worked too long. The treaty is the result of the complete failure and burial of the League of Nations, which was to have removed international trade barriers, but has promoted more strife than peace. After its failure in achievements, the race was on to go to Washington for appeasement by means of these treaties. The league has gone up in smoke and is in ruins, and this agreement is the result of the new Washington trade treaty league of nations, and to appease the United States and get her help, something that is indispensable, by the Johnson act and the Ludlow resolutions.

With few exceptions, we get our news, published in the Canadian papers, with regard to Britain and this treaty through United States chains of newspapers. In my opinion the 1935 treaty was a mistake and a failure.

Recently I read this dispatch:

From Ottawa comes the report that if the Conservatives wax critical of the United States trade agreement signed at Washington last week the government is ready to make it a major issue in the general election which will likely be held next year.

I say, let the next election come, and it cannot come too soon for Canada's good. I am not one of those Conservatives who apologizes for the share the Conservative party had in the defeat of reciprocity in 1911, an agreement by which the grain trade would have been diverted to north and south; industry and agriculture would have been seriously injured, and would have made paupers out of our soldiers for the cheap boon of reciprocity. That reciprocity treaty would have made a Lazarus out of a country that Laurier professed to have made a nation.

In his last budget speech the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), summing up the condition of Canadian-United States trade in the fiscal year which ended March 31, 1938, said:

Total exports of that country—

The United States—

—fell six per cent below the figure for the previous year to a total of $343,000,000, while imports, at $487,300,000, showed an increase of nearly 24 per cent.

A correspondingly adverse trend did not occur in the British market which absorbed more of our products than in the previous year.

That is the situation which existed under the 1935 agreement with the United States, which the Prime Minister has now agreed to continue and expand. It is interesting to note that it flouts the very principle essential to international trade, and which he eloquently expounded when he laid the 1935 agreement before parliament. He said in the house at that time:

The government of the United States and the government of this country were actuated by one and the same motive, namely to make an agreement that would be equally beneficial to both countries. Could anything destroy the agreement more effectively than that it should be shown in the course of the next three years that one country had got considerably the better of the other? Would not the effect of an agreement reached in that way be to destroy the possibility of its continuance beyond the period of three years?

The Prime Minister apparently feared that it would, if Canada had not the best of the bargain. But when the balance swung against Canada, as the statement I have quoted of the Minister of Finance indicates that it did in the last fiscal year, the Prime Minister forgets it all and hastens to Washington to continue the agreement and extend its operation for another three years to several hundred new articles as well.

The whole question in connection with the treaty amounts to this: Are Canadians willing to see Great Britain open her markets to the United States on the same terms as she gives the dominions? Britain can take only so much bacon, butter and meat. Are we prepared to check the development of the dominions by selling less to the United Kingdom? Are we prepared to help the fruit growers of the southern United States in order that Florida and California may be able to sell in Canada the surplus fruits grown in those states at the expense of our fruit and vegetables?

As I see it, this treaty is free trade and anti-imperial. Our negotiators have driven the dominion out of the British market in order to act the part of Santa Claus to our United States competitors. All we can do here is to hold a post-mortem into it all which will end only in talk.

After all is said and done, not a line of the treaty can be changed or a comma inserted in it, or any amendments made, and it is only shadow-boxing for the Prime Minister to say that we shall go into committee on the resolution and consider the bill in detail on three readings; we can change nothing in it. When we get down to brass-tacks, the House of Commons will become in actual practice, nothing but a house of yes men and a house of nodders, and the whole treaty has been consummated over the heads of industry, labour and agriculture and of parliament in session. So far as this treaty is concerned, the executive have usurped the functions of parliament, and the private member has ceased to exist. It is enough to make the dictators laugh at our democratic way of doing things. Talk of Hitler and Mussolini! Where does the private member stand when all this has been done over his head? He is supposed to be the connecting link between the government of the day and the electorate, and when he ceases to function Burke says that all parliamentary government is at an end. As I say, not a line of this treaty can be changed here by us. This tremendous transaction, which may involve the ruin of many of our industries and of our agriculture, and labour, and cause widespread unemployment, was carried out over the head of parliament.

The United Kingdom cannot possibly give the United States the kind of trade treaty which the Americans ask for without reducing drastically the amount of preference which dominion goods receive in the United Kingdom markets and British goods receive in dominion markets, or without reducing the degree of protection which British goods now enjoy in their own home market. Why were not industry and labour consulted before such root and branch changes were made in our tariff? Why destroy preferences beyond recall? Why create a Pan-American orbit to please the United States and drive Canada into it for trade, defence and migration purposes? What is parliament for? What is our tariff board for? What are boards of trade and labour unions for? Have they no stake in the country? What mandate has the government? Talk of free parliaments; they are now abolished and can only hold a post-mortem. The manner in which the treaty has been negotiated calls for constitutional, parliamentary and cabinet reform. The system is vicious and cannot last. It is deplorable to think of a treaty of such magnitude and such importance being launched without any prior consultation with the business or labour community. Washington, not Ottawa, has become the economic capital of Canada and it will in time become the economic centre of the British empire. The Anglo-American treaty means the end of the Ottawa agreements and the end of British preferences, and it is the forerunner of the dissolution of the British empire.

The proposed agreement is in no sense a business or commercial treaty; it is a political one to gain the friendship of the United States from European and dictators' menaces. Already there is an adverse balance of trade between the United States and Canada, because we are buying many millions more worth of goods from them than they are from us. The adverse trade balance between Britain and the United States is five to one against Britain. Australia buys from Britain more than the United States does.

The new agreements will have disastrous results on imperial unity, and England can no longer devote itself to the cause of empire development and make it effective. What it is going to do is to break up the great Anglo-Saxon confederation known as the British empire and not as the English-speaking union say, "unite the great Anglo-Saxon people." It allows the United States to function as an entity but refuses the same to the dominions. These same people have been misled about the United States before—witness the Irish treaty, the Indian Act, the League of Nations, the treaty of Versailles, the Kellogg pacts; for to please the United States we passed all those pacts. To please the United States we also chased Japan and Italy into German arms.

These unilateral agreements by Canada and Australia will mean the destruction of the Ottawa agreements, and the United States will now become the economic centre of the British empire. The reason for this right-about-face by the government is the danger of the European situation and to secure the support of the United States for its Canadian anti-empire foreign policy. This new agreement will largely nullify the greater benefits which the Ottawa agreements in the years to come might have conferred upon the British empire as a whole, prolong the drawbacks in Canada which business is carrying at present, and lead to widespread unemployment in Canada as well as lead to additional burdens and an increase in taxation, which social services and unemployment are placing on the two central provinces of Canada, that pay now 80 per cent of the cash taxes of Canada.

That is the result, immediate welcome in certain quarters, but you will see the end of it very shortly. This agreement will ruin forever inter-imperial trade, and as Great Britain has to import 80 per cent of her food and almost 100 per cent of her raw materials she will now have to depend on foreign countries. We had an economic unit, the British empire, and under the Chamberlain program let me point out what that unit is. It consists of the British commonwealth of nations, with a population of 450,000,000. Its trade constitutes one-third of the trade of the whole world. Here are some facts. The United Kingdom buys 20 per cent of the total value of her imports from the major dominions, while she sells to them about 26 per cent of the total value of her exports. The dependent empire buys from her somewhat more than half her total exports of iron and steel, wood products, pottery, glass, cutlery and hardware, 60 per cent of British exports of electrical goods, 75 per cent of wearing apparel, paper and cardboard. But for the dominions exclusive of Great Britain 54 per cent of their exports are sold outside the empire, while about 50 per cent of their imports come from sources outside the empire. Bulking it all together, in this empire of 450,000,000 people, our position is being destroyed by the loss of preferences.

Mr. JOSEPH NEEDHAM (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to condemn this trade agreement, but I wish there had been coupled with it a policy providing some benefits to our own Canadian people. I am not so much concerned with foreign markets as I am with our market at home.

Mr. MacNICOL: This treaty kills the home market.

Mr. NEEDHAM: If I saw coupled with this agreement a policy under which our own people would be enabled to enjoy their own production to a greater degree than they can at the present time, it would have been welcomed all over this dominion. When this agreement was signed last November it was acclaimed in the press as a wonderful achievement, as something that would be of great benefit to Canada and to the Canadian people. But many people are still looking for the benefits that were to accrue from the trade agreement of 1935.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in presenting this agreement to the house outlined very fully what he had in mind and what he hoped this agreement would do for this dominion. He said that the Canadian producers in every part of the dominion will share in the benefits. And he went on to outline the benefits to the fishermen in the east, to the potato growers, the fox farmers, the producers of maple products, the dairymen, cheese factories, the growers of hay and of wheat, barley and clover seed, the lumbermen, paper mills, and those raising horses, cattle and poultry. He then dealt with the great benefits resulting to the mining industry.

Referring to the increased quotas for cattle, of which so much has been said, I find in this month's issue of Canadian Business the statement that the former quotas on heavy cattle, calves and dairy cows were all increased last month—referring to November —but the former quotas in 1938 were unused by 45 per cent, 74 per cent and 33 per cent respectively. Therefore many will question whether great advantage is to be obtained from increased quotas.

I notice that the Prime Minister did not mention agricultural implements, of which special mention was made in 1935, when the trade agreement reduced the tariff from 25 per cent to 12½ per cent and the price of agricultural implements went up, not only once but twice. I do not see any change under this agreement in the tariff on agricultural implements. He also said that this agreement means increased purchasing power, and made special mention of Alberta. It may mean increased purchasing power, but I am wondering whether the government have taken any steps to see that the reduction in tariff is passed on to the consumer. I have not heard anything from the Liberal side as to whether this phase of the agreement is receiving attention. I have asked housewives whether they can see any change in the prices of the things they buy for the home, and I have yet to find one that can say she has found any benefits that came into effect on January 1.

The Prime Minister said that the consumers will benefit from the removal of the special excise tax of three per cent. Those benefits should be apparent by now.

Mr. LEADER: The excise tax is not yet removed.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Well, the tariffs are down. I also notice that the Prime Minister had the same thing to say in regard to the 1935 agreement. Speaking on February 25, 1936, as reported in Hansard at page 515, he said:

> —to producers and consumers alike, it will assist our railways, will bring about an increase in purchasing power, and which may help very materially to lift our country out of the depression from which it has been suffering for so many years and to restore an era of prosperity and of better relations with other lands.

The same things were said then as have been repeated this year. But the real test is, did the trade agreement of 1935 produce those results?

Mr. MacNICOL: No, it did not.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Did it bring that era of prosperity? Of course the Liberal side now say, time only will tell; you cannot judge it yet. But this is only the 1935 agreement carried a little further. No doubt it will increase the amount of goods passing between the two countries; that is to be expected. But will it tend towards a solution of our economic problems? Will it give more security for the Canadian people? Increasing the amount of goods passing between the two countries may work to the detriment of Canada. The sales of the two countries may increase, and if they do, in the same proportion as at present, we will be much worse off three years hence than we are to-day from the standpoint of trade, because of the large adverse balance of trade with the United States.

I believe the first function of a government should be to look after the welfare of its people and to see that they are provided for in every possible way. I repeat that there is something seriously wrong when the people of this country cannot enjoy the wealth they produce. I will not dwell upon our resources and our equipment to produce all these things, about which we have heard so much, but it is said that we need markets. The best market Canada can have is her own market at home, which should be supplied to the saturation point before we become very much concerned about exports. I would ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) these questions: Are our people getting all the food they can eat? If not, why? Have our people the warm clothing they need in this cold weather? If not, why? Have they decent homes in which to live? You need only look at the slums in our cities and the shacks on the prairies for an answer to that question. Are our old people, many of whom did the pioneer work of this country, enjoying the fruits of their life work, with that feeling of security to which they are entitled? Again I ask the question: If not, why? It seems to me these are questions the Prime Minister should answer. If we ask the unemployed, they will have an answer. If we ask the transient youths, they will have an answer. If we ask the part time worker or the farmer, they will have an answer.

There is one thing, Mr. Speaker, that grieves me more than anything else as I travel through the older settlements of my own province, and I have no doubt the same thing applies to an even greater extent in Manitoba. I find the second generation renting the homes in which they were born, from mortgage companies, the homesteads of their parents. That is becoming more and more prevalent in these days, and I think it is one of the things that should be the first concern of this government. If our people were properly provided for in regard to the necessities of life we would not be bothered with heavy surpluses of various commodities. It is common knowledge that we have a large carry-over of butter and similar commodities, which is being kept in cold storage while our people are not able to buy them. Last summer in the west it was reported that there were three million pounds of whitefish in storage in Winnipeg, not because the people of the west could not consume that amount of fish but because they were unable to purchase it. It was also reported that application had been made for a closed season on whitefish in Manitoba for this winter, in order that the surplus might be consumed.

So, with thousands of our people lacking the bare necessities of life, I question whether it is the best policy for us to be devising ways and means of sending out of this country more cattle, hogs, milk, cream, potatoes, butter and similar commodities. We know that our exports can be paid for only by imports. If our people have not the value of the goods that are exported—and if they had, it would not be necessary to export them, because they would be consumed at home—how are they going to buy the imports that are necessary?

I have been reading a small book published in 1937, by the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, in which he sets out some of the serious problems they are facing in that country. I should like to quote a few sentences from that book:

Every new device—

I think he has in mind the fact that the lack of purchasing power in the hands of the consumer is largely due to the advent of machinery, which does away with the distribution of wages with which the necessities of life may be purchased.

Every new device has meant that a continually larger number of farmers' sons and daughters have moved to town.

I think this can be applied to Canada one hundred per cent. Then he goes on to say that the per capita consumption of wheat, at five bushels, has remained unchanged for years. Since 1918 they have produced forty per cent more milk with only a fifteen per cent increase in dairy cows. Their increase in pork and lard is eighteen per cent with nine per cent fewer hogs. Chickens are producing more eggs per hundred pounds of feed than they were twenty years ago. Now listen; he says there seems to be good reason to believe that in the decade just ahead there will be continued the trend which characterized the decade of the nineteen twenties, when the manufacturing industries, at the end of that decade, were able to turn out forty per cent more goods with two per cent less man hours; the mining industry five per cent more goods with twenty per cent less man hours. The railroads were able to haul the same quantity of material with twenty per cent less man hours. The nation's total output increased forty-six per cent with an increase of only sixteen per cent in the number of workers. In 1929 about eighty-eight per cent of all the processing of farm products was carried on by corporations. Prior to 1929 very few people felt that corporations had much to do with booms and depressions. Now we know that they have much to do with them, because the worker has no bargaining power, nor has the farmer any bargaining power, selling to a corporation, except in times of extreme shortage, and the same applies to the purchase of almost all the articles we buy. Here he gives what he would term a solution:

> Profits made from inventions should be used in correcting the economic problem created by the machine.
> It is possible to make the machine the servant of man, and not the master. These advances in both industry and agriculture provide the material out of which we might construct a more ample life for all our people. The benefits should be distributed to those who need them.

One would almost think he was a social crediter. But, listen:

> Let us not expand exports as an end in itself, instead of a means. Unless we can buy back the goods sent to us in exchange for our goods, it does not do any good to increase the volume of exports.

This is something which I think demands our very serious consideration.

I repeat: Canada's best market is represented by the huge unsatisfied wants of our own people, and when those needs are supplied we can then turn our attention to securing markets abroad.

All hon. members recall that ten, fifteen or twenty years ago, when mass production was coming into its own, it was thought that it would be one of the greatest advancements, and would do much towards solving our difficulties and making for a richer life. But it did not turn out that way, did it? The natural thing to follow mass production should have been mass consumption. However, that was a part which was not attended to, and no provision was made for it. The mass production was by machinery, and wages were not distributed to buy back the production. Goods began to pile up.

How did the manufacturers act? Some of you can well remember when that intensive advertising program was put on, when it was thought that by that means they could get rid of their production. That program was effective for a while, but it was not sufficient. Then, what followed? They began a system of selling on the instalment plan, and made use of high pressure salesmen. That relieved the pressure for a little while. But still goods piled up faster than they were being sold or consumed; and then the depression struck. That was going on not only in Canada, but the world over. And so I say that accompanying mass production there must be mass consumption. If the government were making provision whereby the people of Canada could buy to the limits of their needs, they would be provided the most effective way of meeting the present situation.

I am not condemning the trade agreement, but I am saying the government should have given more attention to seeing that the people are provided with at least the necessities of food, clothing and shelter. Those were the things pledged by the Prime Minister in 1935. If ever a prime minister had a mandate from a country to carry out his pledge, certainly he had it.

No doubt many hon. members are, I was going to say, concerned, with the attitude of the group to which I belong, when we press for monetary reform. That is what we were sent here for. That is what our constituents pledged us to, and we pledged our abilities to that one end. And so we will press on through this session; and as long as we are here we shall have the same story to tell. I say that because I do not believe there is any solution to the problems facing Canada, unless it be through the economic system we advocate, one which would make such provision as would enable the people at least to enjoy what they produce.

This trade agreement is in reality a fixing of tariff rates and certain quotas between the United States and Canada. It seems strange to me that for over half a century governments have been monkeying with these tariff rates. Surely by this time they should have found the proper relationship or proper balance, one with the other. Yet they seem to be just as far away from it as ever.

I am fully aware that from the point of view of tariff this is a difficult country to govern. We have differences of view in different parts of the country; some advocate low tariff, some high tariff, some no tariff at all; and so it goes. But I would back up the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) who, speaking in the house last week, pleaded with the government to make at least a start towards relieving the situation by purchasing outright, with debt-free money, the bonds coming due this year, thus relieving the taxpayers of $14,000,000. There would be a beginning from which point the development could be enlarged. But it is high time the government sought in some other way than by trade agreements to solve the economic problems of the country.

I wish to place on Hansard the considered opinion of the group to which I belong with respect to the trade agreement. It is as follows:

We believe in the principle of freer trade with other nations, but say that while there is so much want and poverty in Canada, the first concern of this government should be the welfare of the Canadian people.

We reaffirm the statement we have often made that foreign markets are not a solution to Canada's economic problems; that our troubles are due not so much to the lack of external markets as to the restricted consumption at home. Restricted consumption means restricted markets; restricted markets mean restricted production. This in turn means further restricted purchasing power.

We believe that the bases of all prices for both primary and secondary products should be cost of production plus a fair commission. To that end we favour a proper adjustment of tariffs or subsidies, not to benefit one class only but for all citizens; that exchange rates should be fixed by agreement between nations, having regard to the price levels of the various countries, and the rates necessary to give each of them approximate equilibrium. When this is accomplished the general price level will remain stable.

The object of each nation should be to keep its imports and exports as near equal as possible over a period of time, so that international trade would become an exchange of goods and services between nations to their mutual advantage, instead of a desperate struggle by each to lower its price level with a view to underselling others.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the debate this afternoon, to me at any rate, illustrates how very often hon. members can be in agreement upon one point or another, and yet, on the whole, and particularly in respect to the conclusions at which they arrive, can be in complete disagreement. In spite of points in common, they can, in general, hold to views so wide apart that one would think it was quite impossible for them ever to come together. No person I fancy can be in closer agreement than I with the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) when he indicates keen desire to see continuance of the British empire. Nor can there perhaps be more complete disagreement between two people, than there is between us when he suggests that the manner of ensuring its continuance is to insist upon trade going there which might more profitably go somewhere else. And so on with respect to the remainder of his speech. As soon as we get away from his remarks indicating his desire for a continuance of the empire, there seems to be a very thorough disagreement between him and me with regard to his beliefs. And so it is very often. Many of us have the same aims, but we cannot agree at all upon the necessary procedure.

Likewise with reference to the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Needham), often throughout his speech I found myself in agreement with him. For example, no one, I think, would controvert his statement that trade entirely within a country is the best possible kind of trade for such country, because if trade can be effected entirely within a country, we have a producer producing within the country, and then the carriage to the consumer within the country, thus providing employment for those engaged in the transport industry. Next we have the complete manufacture, shall we say, of a second commodity, which in turn is carried by the same transport workers back to the person who produced the first. Economists, I think, have always been agreed that this is the most advantageous form of trade. But our position is that we could not possibly, with the sort of production we have in this country, have our trade confined entirely within the country.

The hon. member speaks of mass consumption meeting mass production. Well, it would simply mean liquidating the mass of the people in this country if you attempted to have mass consumption at home of all the wheat that is produced in Canada, or of the cattle we produce.

Mr. NEEDHAM: May I just interrupt to say that I did not advocate anything of that kind at all.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): You certainly did

Mr. MAYBANK: I have no objection, Mr. Speaker, to being interrupted, but I thought the hon. gentleman was going to ask a question. He may not have intended what I have just now been indicating, but certainly mass consumption, as he called it, could not within Canada keep up with what we raise or produce in this country, and as respects a very large amount of our production nothing can be done with it except sell it to the people of some foreign country. Mass consumption —it just can't be. We could not for a moment consume all the nickel we produce, which I understand comprises the greater part of the world's supply. Likewise with our wheat, our cattle, and many other products.

But again my hon. friend and I come to a point of agreement when he says that you cannot sell if you do not take back goods in exchange; perhaps not from the person to whom you sell; the settlement of international indebtedness is often roundabout. While you do not always take back products from the person to whom you sell, you must take goods from somewhere in exchange for those you send out of the country.

That shows, Mr. Speaker, the extent to which persons can be in complete disagreement with respect to the means of bringing about what they consider desirable. I say at once that I am heartily in favour of this treaty because of the tariff reductions it makes. My view is that tariff reductions are good in themselves. That is my general position. There might be some particular drastic tariff action downward with which I might disagree, but because of the tendency of the low tariffs towards mitigating the cost of living pressure on the consumer, I always favour tariff reductions. I agree at once with the hon. gentleman who has last spoken, that a treaty such as this is not a complete solution of the economic conditions of this country, nor could it be of any country; but it has a tendency at any rate, because of the tariff reductions, to reduce the cost of production to the primary producer.

There are other reasons for supporting the treaty, aside from the reductions to which I refer; for the treaty on its export side is better than it is on what I might call its import side. That is, its encouragement of the exportation of goods from this country is perhaps more important than the part of the treaty which deals with the so-called concessions that we give to the United States. But primarily, just on account of the tariff reductions that are being made, I am strongly in support of the treaty.

I do not hold very much with the statements that have been made anent the danger of this country being flooded with cheap foreign goods. In the first place, no goods can be sent into this country unless the nation sending them in takes payment for them in some of the goods we produce; either that country or some other country must take the goods we produce in settlement of the goods we buy. It is true, as I have said, that international indebtedness may be settled in a roundabout route.

It is possible, although I do not see much indication of its probability in this treaty, that factory workers, for instance, might be displaced, but goods could not come into the country without Canadians being given employment to produce goods with which to pay for them. It just is not possible. Persons in this country must labour to produce goods to pay for the goods which come in. Personally I have no desire to see any man put out of work, be he a factory worker or engaged in any other work. I do think, however, that it would be well, when we are considering this situation, to have in mind the classification of persons in this country into their several callings.

[Mr. Maybank.]

According to the last decennial census in Canada we had gainfully employed in agriculture about 1,100,000 men and 24,000 women. They made up 28·7 per cent of the population. In forestry, fishing and trapping we had close to 100,000; the percentage was 2·5 of the total population. For mining, quarrying, oil and salt wells the percentage of the population was 1·8 per cent. I believe that in the period since the last census the percentage in that particular industry will have been greatly increased.

Coming to manufacturing, we have 16 per cent of the population employed in it, and likewise 16 per cent of the population dependent upon those so employed. In electric light and power the percentage is one-half of one per cent; in construction, 6½ per cent; in transportation, 7·8 per cent; in trade, 9·9 per cent; in finance and insurance 2·4 per cent; the services generally, as they are called, account for 19·5 per cent. There were a certain number of people, about 165,000, not particularly categorized, and representing 4·3 per cent.

Bearing in mind that classification of our people, I think we are bound to say that a tariff reduction having any tendency at all to cheapen goods is bound to benefit by far the great majority of the people of this country. Again, we should remember that one of our largest customers both in respect of imports and exports is the United States of America. This treaty has affected 58 per cent of our total import trade from them. It makes reductions in the duties on a large number of items, not that it makes any difference how many items there are, on account of the fact that they amount to 58 per cent of the trade; and these reductions go all the way from very small amounts up to a complete wiping out of the tariff; a 100 per cent reduction.

As has been pointed out already in this debate, every section of the public in Canada is affected by the cheapening of the costs of production. We have a right to consider not merely the general consumer but the fishermen, the lumbermen, the farmers, and the miners. That is, they are to be considered as producers, and this treaty cheapens the cost of production. But aside altogether from that, there is a general benefit to that person whom we sometimes call the consumer. Of course all are consumers.

In order that we may see the effect of some of these reductions I have noted one or two of them. For example, take cotton woven fabrics, unbleached. In 1935 we had a tariff of 25 per cent plus four cents per pound specific tariff, and on top of that, of course, the well known three per cent excise tax.

By the former agreement, effected in 1935 and brought into effect on January 1, 1936, we cut that down to 20 per cent, and the four cents specific went down to 3½ cents. To-day's agreement reduces that to 17 per cent, plus three cents per pound. With this difference, however: In the former agreement the reduction which I have spoken of left the three per cent excise tax untouched. Under this agreement the three per cent excise tax will also be taken off. I suggest that this will involve a total reduction of probably 35 per cent on the tariff as it was before the time of the first agreement.

In 1935 we were able to buy half a million dollars' worth of these goods, but as a result of the reduction effected by the last treaty we were able in 1937 to purchase one and a third million dollars' worth. There is not much doubt that by reason of further cheapening now, we shall be able to buy a great deal more.

A similar story might be told regarding cotton dyed fabrics. In 1935 we were able to buy $889,000 worth, but through the reductions I have mentioned—a little different in respect of these dyed fabrics and the unbleached ones, in 1937 we were able to buy about one and a half million dollars' worth. Through to-day's further reductions we should be able to purchase more than we have done in the past.

Taking now the case of cotton apparel, I find this. We had at first a duty of 35 per cent plus four cents per pound plus three per cent excise. This was cut to 30 per cent and 1½ cents a pound plus the three per cent. To-day this is being reduced to a straight 30 per cent, and all this represents a total reduction of 23 per cent. We bought to the value of $882,000 in 1935 and over one and a half million dollars worth in 1937.

A similar story can be told with reference to a very large number of items, such as engines and boilers, Diesel engines, aircraft engines, ore crushers, refrigerators, boots and shoes, pharmaceutical preparations, as well as a host of other goods.

If we were to dwell at this moment on the export side of the treaty, a commensurate improvement could be noted. But this is not at the moment my intention. As I have said, there is to be a further reduction of the three per cent excise tax. This tax was put on sometimes between 1930 and 1935, and it was imposed, as hon. members will remember, upon all or nearly all imports. It was levied not on the price of the goods but on the price plus the duty, so that this three per cent has more often turned out to be a tax of three and a half to five per cent. Not so very often five per cent, but there are instances when it was as high as that.

I agree with hon. members who have hitherto spoken with reference to this subject that while under this agreement the three per cent tax is to be taken off only those articles named in the agreement, this practically means a complete repeal of that excise tax. I do not know whether logically it would have to be repealed in respect of every article, although I have not been able to think of many articles on which it might be retained. But I agree with the speakers, mostly on the Conservative side of the house, who have stated that complete repeal must be the result. The difference however, between me and these Conservative speakers is that they speak with disapproval of the repeal of the three per cent excise, while I, on the other hand, welcome it, and am very glad indeed that the tax will come off not merely those articles which I mentioned in the treaty, but others as well.

I have mentioned that this tax was usually more than three per cent. In order to illustrate the importance not merely of some of the tariff reductions but of the excise repeal in particular, I might draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the case of artificial silk wearing apparel. Prior to 1936, in respect to that item we had a duty of 50 per cent plus the three per cent special excise. This made a total effective tariff of, not 53 per cent, but 54½ per cent. In 1936 this was cut down to 31½ per cent, plus the excise tax. To-day this is being further reduced to 30 per cent, without the excise tax. This, I figure, represents a total tariff reduction of 45 per cent. I must add, however, that, with a tariff of 30 per cent, these articles are still a highly protected product.

I might have said that I desired to introduce that particular illustration for the purpose also of drawing attention to the favoured nation clause of the treaty. It is true that the reductions which are effected in this agreement with respect to United States goods apply to a great many more nations than the United States. For example, this artificial silk apparel will come in from France at the same rate of duty as that charged when it enters from the United States. There are certain points of difference between some speakers and myself with regard to the favoured nation clause. It has been said several times that we give these tariff concessions to more nations than those to which the United States gives corresponding concessions. I do not know that from my point of view it matters much, but it does not happen to be true that our concessions go to a larger number of nations than do the United States concessions. The contrary is the fact. We have made treaties containing this favoured nation clause with quite a number of nations: The Argentine, Austria, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Colombia, Costa Rica, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Esthonia, Finland, France, Germany, Guatemala, Haiti, Hungary, Italy, Japan, Latvia, Lithuania, the Netherlands, Norway, Panama, Poland, Portugal, Roumania, Russia, Salvador, Spain, Sweden, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia. The United States on the other hand have not made agreements with quite so large a number of nations. The nations with which they report having agreements are: Cuba, Belgium, Haiti, Sweden, Brazil, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Honduras, Colombia, Guatemala, France, Nicaragua, Finland. Salvador, Costa Rica, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador.

That list is clearly a shorter one than ours, but although the United States have the favoured nation clause in all these agreements and although we have it in all ours, and ours is a larger list, the fact of the matter is that the United States concessions are granted to every nation whether they have an agreement with that nation or not. The appropriate American document sets forth the changes in import duties to every country in the world with the exception of Germany, and, at the time this particular pamphlet was published, January 21, 1937, Australia. They did not give any concessions to either Germany or Australia, but with respect to Australia the situation may have changed in the meantime. From my point of view, however, it does not matter very much that when the United States confers a benefit upon us it promptly gives it to a larger number of nations, nor does it matter to me that when we make an agreement with the United States we promptly give the concessions to twenty-three or twenty-four or thirty nations. Personally I should be glad to see the ambit of the privilege enlarged rather than restricted.

I freely admit that I was bitterly disappointed last year because there were no tariff reductions throughout the whole session. I realized, of course, what the position was. We could have had tariff reductions then, but had they been effected, it is probable that in the intervening period between sessions we would not have been able to persuade the United States to make the reductions in their tariff we have now been able to obtain, and consequently it was probably worth while to wait in order to obtain a benefit for the exporting section of our people at the same time as we should confer a benefit upon the general consumer through reduced import duties.

As I have said, I think the export side of the agreement is even better than the part dealing with our own tariff reductions, in spite of the fact that there are numerous important reductions in our own duties, some of which I have mentioned. With reference to the side of the agreement designed to assist our export trade, I do not desire to speak at length but only sufficiently long to make two observations. The first is that the United States reductions by which our exporting public are benefited affect a trade of $327,500,000; and that this is 83 per cent of the total export trade to the United States. The total trade last year was $493,000,000. Now the point I wish to make particularly, is this, that this $327,500,000 worth of export trade is really $327,500,000 worth of Canadian labour; for there is little, if anything, that is produced that cannot be reckoned in terms of the labour that is in it. We thus open to our exporters a market of 130,000,000 people, affecting trade of the size stated, and as soon as this is done there is given an enormous impetus to Canadian employment.

The other observation I desire to make with reference to the exportation arises out of the lament of opposition speakers, that we have surrendered privileges to Great Britain. It is said that we have given up certain privileges we had in the British market and that this is a matter of regret. It is, however, a fact that by giving them up we brought the United States and Great Britain into an agreement. Aside altogether from that, however, we drew material advantages from our action. The United States gave to the British people certain privileges, and by reason of the favoured nation clause in our treaty, those privileges automatically and immediately came to us also. Our potential trade with reference to a great many of the articles on which concessions were granted, is very great and we get, almost like a direct benefit, this benefit under the British treaty by reason of our favoured nation clause in this agreement.

For example, varnishes from England are reduced from 25 to 15 per cent and automatically we get whatever benefit there is in that. In our commerce reports, paints and varnishes are not separately categorized, but we did a total business in those lines of $911,000 last year. Of that trade $52,500 or 5·7 per cent went to the United States. It went in at the 25 per cent United States customs level. It will now enter, by virtue of the British agreement as it affects varnishes, at 15 per cent, which represents a tariff reduction of 40 per cent.

Again, graphite is one of our exports. Last year we exported $142,000 worth, of which $69,000 went to the United States. The tariff wall against it was 30 per cent. By reason of the agreement now consummated with England that duty has been cut in half, reduced to 15 per cent. The benefit to Great Britain we also get, by reason of the most favoured nation provision. If the demand for graphite were what the economists call an elastic demand, we might expect the doubling of our exports to the United States by reason of the treaty. However, I shouldn't care to follow that line of argument too far, or I might get into the position of the girl who was selling hens from eggs not yet laid.

One other item in the British-American treaty that took my attention is pig-iron. The duty on pig-iron entering the United States from Great Britain was cut by 40 per cent, from $1.25 to 75 cents a ton. Again by reason of the most favoured nation clause that rate comes to us. Last year we exported 21,352 tons of pig-iron, valued at $412,000. Of this the United States took the major part, 16,000 tons of a value of $322,000. It is now 40 per cent easier for us to enter the United States market by reason, first of all, of the releasing of Great Britain from certain engagements she had with us and the consequent effecting of the Great Britain-United States treaty, and by reason of the fact that we have a most favoured nation treaty with the United States herself.

In fact our dealings with Great Britain in this respect illustrate to me peculiarly the wisdom of casting bread upon the waters. I speak with considerable humility, because I cannot claim, as some might be able to do, that I have always fully observed the tenets of religion or the axioms of ethics. I have, however, always believed that these tenets and axioms, when actually applied in business dealings, abundantly demonstrate their truth. No one disputes the wisdom of the golden rule as a general rule of life; it is accepted, even if only theoretically, by everyone. As an economic rule it is equally sound. The best way for this nation to help itself is to help some other nation. Let a nation bring health to another one or increase the health of another nation, and at once a condition is set up which is bound to bring material benefit to the first nation, usually with great promptness. The doctrine, "Do unto others as you would that they should do unto you," which is known as a sound rule in the moral world, is, I submit, also a sound and salutary rule in the world of economics.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): In rising to take part in the discussion of this important resolution, and in attempting to interpret the views of the constituency I represent in this house, I should like first to remind hon. members that this session of this eighteenth parliament of Canada is being subjected at this moment to perhaps the most critical and interested observation and examination that any parliament has undergone for a considerable number of years. To those of us—and there are many hon. members who can speak with just as much conviction on this point as I—who try to live close to the people and the problems of those whom we represent, comes forcibly in these days the realization that the general public is tired of all the old-time platitudes, the old political nostrums, whether done up in the old-time parcels or with new wrappings; they are also tired of talk not based on common sense and sound judgment and not leading to definite action. So, as I approach the discussion of the new trade agreement between Canada and the United States, I do so with the studied purpose in mind that we must consider first of all the welfare of our people, all other considerations being secondary.

It is only natural and proper that the government of the day should stress all the advantages which the treaty appears in their eyes to offer. They will stress its great importance so far as international understanding is concerned. They will stress the need for Anglo-Saxon unity in these days. They will stress the view that the volume of this country's business will be advantageously affected, and that certain classes of producers in this country will benefit by the agreement. That the government supporters take that attitude is exactly what I should expect. But the prospective advantages under this agreement as seen by the general public may not appear quite the same as they do to those who so ardently support the agreement in this house. On the other hand we may also say that those who find the agreement likely to be so devastating to our national life might perhaps tone that theme down a little too, just as in the case of a man in public life. He is not quite so prominent or brilliant a figure as his friends and his party say he is, nor is he quite such a national liability as his political opponents may attempt to prove.

Under our British parliamentary institutions and our constitutional practice it is the job of the opposition to leave the advantages of a measure to be stressed by the party responsible for it, and it is our duty as the opposition to point out the weaknesses of this agreement and make sure that the people of Canada understand both sides of the problem presented to them. There are none of us who say that we disagree with the movement towards Anglo-Saxon unity in these days. But on the other hand surely it can be said with some fairness that a few changes in the customs schedules of our country are not likely to be the major factor in bringing the cautious United States into European entanglements. More than that, surely political imagination must have run wild when some hon. member suggested that it was going to be a great factor in fostering international goodwill. I cannot imagine—although perhaps there are those in the house who can—that Herr Hitler is apt to shake and shiver and then mellow into gentle affection towards us because the Canadian fruit grower loses some of his protection in the sheltered market of Great Britain. We disregard the depth of the roots of international misunderstandings if we allow ourselves to be influenced by such arguments as that. I believe that, so far as the promotion of international goodwill and understanding is concerned, the treaty has only the puniest possibilities at best. Strongly as I may feel with respect to the effect of the agreement on industry and agriculture in my own constituency I am bound to say that it will be judged by its results by the people of Canada.

During another debate this session the suggestion was advanced that some hon. members were opposed in principle to wider markets for our products. Surely that is a far-fetched suggestion for any hon. member to make. I have never heard anyone say in this house that we should not go after wider markets for our products; but I have heard it said, and I subscribe to the doctrine, that when we approach the world for a larger share of its markets we must make sure that the price we pay for that larger share is not either out of reach or out of reason as far as our own people are concerned. More than that, in reaching out for wider markets and deeper and broader channels of trade we must also bear in mind particularly the fact that the standard of living in our country must not be reduced by virtue of any wholesale diminution of our tariff barriers. In addition, a further safeguard must be taken into consideration, and that is the protection of our home market, in defence of which I believe far too little is said in this house. With these safeguards in mind I believe there are few members of this house but would be in favour of wider markets for all our products.

I do not think anyone will deny that when the 1938 agreement was entered into, agriculture and industry were confronted with very unsatisfactory conditions. We were receiving low prices for our field crops and the products of our gardens and orchards, and in addition we had a stagnant industry in this country. In many instances we had low wages; unemployment was widespread, and business faced the future without confidence. This after three years under the 1935 agreement. So perhaps we on this side of the house, and the public at large, may be pardoned if we cast somewhat questioning glances at the possible effects of the new agreement which has been negotiated. I am one of those who believe that a Canada in which abundant prosperity obtains for both agriculture and industry will provide the strongest possible unit in the chain of empire. That seems to me to be one of the greatest possible contributions we can make as a valuable member of an economic and political commonwealth of British nations.

I probably know the situation in regard to industry and agriculture better as it exists in the county of Peel than as it concerns Canada as a whole, and may I tell the house that this agreement does seriously affect us. Imported building and paving brick has to meet a duty of only 15 per cent now as compared with 20 per cent previously. Knitted garments have lost their specific duty protection of 25 cents per pound, while the duty on socks and stockings has been dropped from 32½ per cent to 20 per cent ad valorem, with the specific duty pared from $1.35 a dozen pairs to $1. The protection has been reduced on boots and shoes from 35 per cent to 30 per cent. Ruled and coated paper manufacturers, whose plants in Brampton are not to be equalled anywhere in Canada, have had their protective duty reduced from 32½ per cent to 27½ per cent. Copeland-Chatterson, Limited, which is favourably known throughout the dominion as a company making superior quality loose-leaf systems, now will have to face an already highly competitive market with protection on electro-plated parts for loose-leaf binders reduced from 33¾ per cent to 25 per cent, which, with the removal of the excise tax, means a difference of nearly 12 per cent.

But, Mr. Speaker, while all these things are important, at the moment I am particularly concerned with the effect these reductions will have upon the workingmen employed in these particular industries. To-day many of the workingmen in my district have great difficulty in making ends meet, and some fail to do even that. It is difficult to see how the terms of this agreement will be of any benefit to those people who toil in our plants, who work hard for every cent they get, especially when the products of the workmen of another country, which compete with their own products, find freer access to our markets. You may say, "Oh, yes, but the men on the soil will fare better than those in some of the industries you have described." Perhaps I have not painted the complete picture, and I shall do so as quickly as possible. In another address in this house this year I dealt with the question of the concessions given by the United States on cattle and milk. I need not go into that further at this time, except to say that many farmers were of the opinion that the export quota under the treaty of 60,000 cattle per quarter was for Canada alone. No wonder cattlemen in my riding and throughout Canada were disappointed and discouraged when they found that almost half that quota was filled by Mexico in January of this year. Then, after the quota had been open for one month, we found that we could not ship any more cattle under the lower duty. To-day I picked up the February 16 issue of the weekly live stock market report, published by this government, which states that during the previous week we shipped to the United States 39 beef cattle, 170 dairy cows and 886 calves. I need say no more in that regard; every farmer in Canada will understand that language.

Now may I hurry on to a discussion of the effect of this agreement on another important industry of which the people of my county are proud. I have spoken previously in this house about the great horticultural industry and the flower growing concerns which are so important to the welfare of my riding. In the town of Brampton we have over forty acres covered with glass and heated the year round. The budget of 1930, which was brought down by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), gave us the protection of a 40 per cent duty against United States competition, because of the tremendous drawbacks with which we were faced in regard to the expense of heating, variations in climate and so on. It is true that this was a countervailing provision, but in any event we were given that protection. Under the 1935 agreement, however, the duty was entirely removed from all cut flower products coming from the United States, while the duty in that country against our products remained at 40 per cent. I, along with members from all sides of the house protested at the time, and in the budget of 1936 the 40 per cent protection was again put in force, equalling the amount of the duty collected by the United States.

We expected that this would be all we would have to suffer from trade agreements. But in this agreement we find that the duty has again been reduced from 40 per cent to 25 per cent. True, there is a countervailing provision; but may I say that while some of us were hoping the treaty would not contain any provision prejudicially affecting the cut-flower producers, we have been very much disappointed. I know that the cut flower producers and others engaged in horticultural pursuits are willing to await the practical results of the treaty itself. In the meantime, however, I am told that the producers in Brampton are experiencing some loss of business in the maritime provinces and to some extent in the western provinces as well. May I ask, if the 40 per cent protection was regarded as essential in 1930 and was still considered necessary in the budget of 1936, what changes have taken place in the industry since that time to warrant the reduction to 25 per cent? That is a question which may reasonably be asked. In that nine year period they have not experienced any great prosperity; on the contrary they have suffered many adversities.

Of course, the plant operators constitute one factor. The men working in the plants are another. Those of us who have been hoping through all the years that wage levels would be raised and that there would be more security for the people working in the plants have been doomed to disappointment. All we can do now is to hope the agreement will not work as badly as has been suspected.

I come now to another important branch of agriculture, namely the fruit and vegetable industry. Vegetable growers generally have felt that under the 1935 agreement they bore a greater share of the burden of concessions given by Canada to the United States than did almost any other group in the country. The results have shown that very largely they are right. While imports of all commodities increased during the three years of the last agreement by something like 30 per cent, the increase in importations of fresh vegetables increased not by 30 per cent but by over 53 per cent in the same period. I submit they had a right to expect no further burden to be placed upon them under the present treaty.

But what happened? On three main fronts they have had to give ground under the present treaty. First of all, there was the cut in the general tariff on vegetables coming from the United States to Canada. Under the previous arrangement, which obtained between 1930 and 1935, there was a broad, general tariff of 30 per cent against vegetables coming in. Under the 1935 agreement the rate was reduced by this government to 15 per cent. Under the present agreement there is a further reduction to 10 per cent.

But in addition to that there is the question of added values. Advanced valuations were first placed by the Bennett administration on fresh vegetable products coming into Canada. The changes which took place in that connection are important. When the 1935 agreement came into effect, these values, which were really the major factor in the protection of the vegetable grower, were reduced by 20 per cent from what they were previously. In the latest pact a limit has been set upon the period in which the advanced valuations may be applied. In most instances these periods are shorter than obtained previously. For example, in connection with beans coming into Canada, the period was shortened from 131 days to 98 days; on celery, from 196 days to 182 days; on lettuce, 146 days to 126 days. There is no added value protection on spinach.

The third main front on which vegetable growers had to give way was in connection with the three per cent excise tax. The vegetable growers have taken up the matter in an organized way. One of their problems is this: With the restriction upon the period in which advanced valuations may be made, the point arises as to whether or not that period should be at the earlier or at the later part of the season. A conflict now looms up between the early and late producers. In the opinion of those more qualified to give an opinion than I am, it may result in confusion in the industry.

My plea to the government is this: I would ask it to give some consideration to the splitting of those periods, so that the growers, both early and late, will be able to get some advantage from the restricted periods for advanced valuations which are now in effect.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at three o'clock.

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That Messieurs Barber, Bertrand (Prescott), Fafard, Fraser, Goulet, Gray, Hill, Landeryou, MacInnis, MacMillan, Macphail, Moore, O'Neill, Pinard, Purdy, Rhéaume, Roberge, Spence, Taylor (Norfolk) and Tustin be appointed to assist his Honour the Speaker in the direction of the restaurant as far as the interests of the Commons are concerned, and to act as members of a joint committee of both houses on the restaurant.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Graydon.]

COMPANIES ACT

CONTROL OF PROFITS AND DIVIDENDS OF PROTECTED INDUSTRIES—OBLIGATIONS TO EMPLOYEES AND PUBLIC

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 31, to amend the Companies Act, 1934.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. RAYMOND: Mr. Speaker, last year the royal commission appointed to investigate the textile industry in Canada made its report, which was tabled in the house during the session. The report shows that textile manufacturers, while continually complaining of insufficient tariff protection, have for a number of years enjoyed the advantage of customs duties. This tariff protection is a privilege secured by them from parliament upon representations that their workers would benefit by increased employment and better wages. Unfortunately, the facts revealed at the inquiry show that these companies, far from fulfilling the obligations entailed in the privileges granted to them, have taken advantage of these privileges to make exorbitant profits and distribute scandalous dividends and bonuses to their shareholders, while paying workers less than living wages. The object of this bill is to put an end to such abuses and to come to the aid of the worker, by enabling the Secretary of State to obtain information regarding the operations and management of industrial enterprises enjoying tariff protection, and to exercise some control over their profits and their dividend payments; in brief, to see that they carry out their obligations towards their employees and the public.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BANK ACT

REDUCTION OF RATE OF INTEREST OR DISCOUNT FROM SEVEN TO FIVE PER CENT

Mr. P. J. ROWE (Athabaska) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 32, to amend the Bank Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. ROWE (Athabaska): The amendment, Mr. Speaker, is designed to reduce from seven to five per cent the rate of interest or discount permitted to be charged by banks. With the general reduction of interest rates on government and municipal bonds, and the reduced rate of interest on deposits at present paid by the banks, there should be a corresponding reduction by the banks in the interest rate charged to borrowers.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—PHOTOGRAPHIC EQUIPMENT

Mr. PERLEY:

1. Did the Justice department or any other branch or department of the government during the years of 1935 to 1938, purchase photographic equipment for the royal mounted police in Regina, or for any part of Saskatchewan?
2. If so: (a) from whom was the equipment purchased; (b) what was the nature of the equipment; (c) through what dealer was it purchased, and (d) what was the price paid?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This has to be answered by many departments.

CADETS IN CANADA, BY PROVINCES

Mr. MALLETTE:

How many cadets are there in each of the nine provinces of the dominion?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As at 31st August, 1938: Prince Edward Island, 986; Nova Scotia, 1,496; New Brunswick, 1,381; Quebec, 42,290; Ontario, 22,288; Manitoba, 1,578; Saskatchewan, 1,004; Alberta, 1,104; British Columbia, 1,036.

CANADA'S TRADE COMMISSIONER IN GERMANY

Mr. FLEMING:

1. Has the government of Canada any representative in Germany, acting as a trade commissioner?
2. If so, has this trade commissioner tried to dispose of Canada's surplus farm products in Germany?

Mr. EULER:

1. The Canadian Government trade commissioner in Berlin.
2. Yes.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS—SCULPTURING AND OTHER ORNAMENTATION

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale):

1. What expense has been incurred by the dominion government in the last three years for sculpturing, carving, or other ornamentation, both inside and outside the centre block of the parliament buildings?
2. What are the names of all persons engaged on this work?
3. What was the domicile of each such person at the time of his engagement for such work?
4. How long has each of such persons been resident in Canada?

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—MARINE SERVICES ON GREAT LAKES, CANALS AND RIVERS

Mr. MARSH:

1. What is the total cost of all marine service steamships, including lightships, etc., used on the great lakes, canals and rivers, by the Department of Transport?
2. What was the annual cost to maintain the above mentioned ships, as well as all other aids to navigation, for the years 1920 to 1938, inclusive?

WELLAND CANAL—COST AND REVENUES

Mr. MARSH:

1. What was the total cost of Welland canal until date of official opening, including total cost of all necessary property in connection with this undertaking?
2. What is the cost of wages and operating expenses, including all electric power, paint, repairs, bridges, dredging, etc., each year, from date of official opening until present time?
3. What is the interest to date on bonds or moneys necessary for the building of the canal?
4. What is the total revenue derived from use of canal to date?

CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATION FOR TORONTO MAIL PORTERS

Mr. MULOCK:

1. On what date was the last examination held by the civil service commission in the city of Toronto for mail porters?
2. How many persons tried this examination?
3. How many were successful?
4. How many of those who were successful on this examination have been taken on and received employment as mail porters in this district?
5. How many successful candidates on this civil service examination have not received employment?
6. Has the civil service commission invited applications for a further examination for mail porters in this area?
7. If so, will the present list be abolished, and on what date?

CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATION FOR TORONTO LETTER CARRIERS

Mr. MULOCK:

1. On what date was the last examination held by the civil service commission in the city of Toronto for letter carriers?
2. How many persons tried this examination?
3. How many were successful?
4. How many of those who were successful on this examination have been taken on and received employment as letter carriers in this district?
5. How many successful candidates on this civil service examination have not received employment?
6. Has the civil service commission invited applications for a further examination for letter carriers in this area?
7. If so, will the present eligible list be abolished, and on what date?

NATIONAL HEALTH

INFANT MORTALITY IN CALGARY—QUESTION OF FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO EXPECTANT MOTHERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I wish to direct to the Prime Minister (Mr.

Mackenzie King) a question of which I have already given notice. On December 19, 1938, the city clerk of Calgary, Mr. J. M. Miller, directed a letter to the Prime Minister as follows:

Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Sir:—

The special health committee of the council of the city of Calgary, in meeting recently, gave consideration to a report from the city's Medical Officer of Health, Dr. Hill, wherein it was stated that infant mortality in the city of Calgary, as elsewhere in the Dominion of Canada, was overly heavy due to the fact that expectant mothers were not being given any financial assistance either by the dominion, provincial or municipal governments. Dr. Hill believed, and so stated in his report, that the situation in this regard could be considerably improved upon if an expectant mother was assured some financial assistance during the period of her confinement.

The council adopted the recommendation of the special health committee, that this matter be directed to the attention of the senior governments, with a request that the same receive early and favourable consideration.

May I ask the Prime Minister what action, if any, has been taken in this matter?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am sorry I am not in a position to answer the question at the moment, but I imagine my colleague, the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) will be able to do so.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): So far as I was able to catch the question, with the noise that is going on in the chamber, I take it to be a request by the city council of Calgary that the federal government look after the hospitalization and medical care of certain citizens of that city. In reply I may say that under the British North America Act, section 92, the hospitalization of the citizens of any province is entirely under the control of the province. The federal government has control only over quarantine hospitals.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION FOR APPROVAL SUBJECT TO REQUIRED LEGISLATION

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King that the house go into committee on the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 17th day of November, 1938, between Canada and the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): When the house rose last evening I was discussing the advanced valuations in connection with vegetable imports into Canada, and with particular reference to the shortened periods to which those advanced valuations now apply under the new treaty. Perhaps I should add that not only were the periods shortened under this agreement but the amount by which the valuation may be advanced was at the same time reduced. I take a memorandum prepared by the Canadian Horticultural Council as my basis for giving four examples to show how the progressive lessening of tariff protection for vegetables has worked out during three periods in the last few years. First of all I take the period under the Bennett administration; secondly the period under the 1935 agreement; and thirdly, the period under this last agreement which has been entered into. I want to put on Hansard these four examples of the differences in protection:

	Assumed value		Under Bennett	Under 1935 agreement	Under 1938 agreement
Carrots	87 lb. crate	(1.25)	2.73	1.65	.88
Beans	35 lb. hamper	(1.00)	1.43	.95	.67
Beets	76 lb. crate	(.90)	1.97	1.01	.93
Celery	71 lb. crate	(1.25)	2.13	.83	.74

These, however, must be regarded as maximum total duties which only exist for a short period each year. For the balance of the year only the general tariff protection remains.

In the Dunning budget of 1930 the plight of the vegetable growers was recognized and a general tariff protection of thirty per cent was provided, but that was not regarded as sufficient at the time and in addition to the thirty per cent the then Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) applied for the first time minimum seasonal duties on imports into Canada. Up to the 1935 agreement the minimum seasonal tariff remained, and was supplemented by Mr. Bennett's advanced valuations in order to give further protection; but in 1936 the policy of progressive lessening in protection commenced. Let us see what has happened in the meantime to suggest to the government that we should have less protection for this kind of farm produce.

Since 1930 many conditions have changed, but all the conditions that have changed would call for a tightening and a raising of the tariff rather than a lessening of it. There developed in the meantime a much improved system of refrigerator transportation, which permits of fruits and vegetables from the United States arriving here in almost as good condition as when they left the field. In addition there has been an increase of nearly forty-five per cent in the production of fresh vegetables in the United States, and at the same time a reduction in the unit value of such commodities in the domestic market there. We must also take into consideration the numerous bonuses and subsidies given by the United States government on these and other farm products. Added to all these changed conditions, in the last eight years there has been a most comprehensive program of advertising of American fresh fruits and vegetables, not only in the United States but extending over here also.

The vegetable growing industry in Canada to-day is in a most vulnerable position, perhaps the most vulnerable that it has ever occupied. I need only point out one thing by way of evidence—I do not want to overstate the case, and of course if I do there are those who will pass judgment upon it. In a press release of November 21, 1938, by the executive of the Ontario Vegetable Growers' Association, meeting in Toronto, they said:

> The trade agreement, with its serious reductions in both tariff and seasonal protection, will make it impossible to produce vegetables in Ontario on a commercial basis.

In the county I represent, in addition to the other types of vegetables, we grow potatoes. It is well therefore to make mention of the position of that branch of agriculture under this new agreement.

Before the agreement went into effect Canada imposed a tariff of 75 cents a hundredweight against United States potatoes the year round. Under this agreement potatoes come in from August 1 to June 14, ten and a half months of the year, free, and for the rest of the year the duty is cut in half. But the concessions by the United States to our potato growers are not so sweeping. Prior to this agreement our duty and theirs were the same, namely, 75 cents a hundredweight. They gave us a reduction of half, to 37½ cents a hundredweight for nine months, and for the other three months they cut off only 15 cents. But, as with cattle and milk, the inevitable quota crops up, although there is no quota upon the importation into Canada of United States potatoes.

As has been pointed out many times by those who are perhaps in a better position to do it than I am, the vegetable growing industry of this country is very much underestimated. If there is any branch of agriculture that is in real need of adequate statistics at present, it is the vegetable growing industry. Figures of the bureau of statistics would lead one to believe that only a small percentage of our agricultural production comes from this branch of agriculture. But it is the considered opinion of most people who know that in the vegetable growing industry in Canada to-day there is an annual production value of between $150,000,000 and $200,000,000. If the government had known the true extent of this industry I believe that its protection would not have been jeopardised as it has been. Let us have a true picture of the vegetable growing industry in this country. If necessary we might divert some of the funds voted for the Department of Agriculture each year to an effort to provide an adequate picture of its extent and value.

I leave the vegetable growers for the moment and come to an important part of our horticultural industry, namely, fruit growing. By treatment similar to that given to the vegetable growers in Canada, the fruit grower has also suffered. In addition to the removal of the three per cent excise tax on imports from the United States, there has been a progressive reduction in the duties. The agreement of 1935 reduced our general tariff from 25 per cent to 15 per cent, and now this agreement reduces it again to 10 per cent. In addition, the "added values" have been reduced, and moreover the time during which those "added values" are to be applied has also been diminished.

I should like to read into the record a brief statement showing exactly how this progressively decreased protection works. I take again a memorandum of the Canadian Council of Horticulture as a basis for my statement:

	Invoiced at	Amount of duty
		Under Bennett	Under 1935 agreement	Under 1938 agreement
Cherries, 11 lb. case	.75	.81	.62	.44
Pears, 50 lb. box	1.25	1.00	.77	.68
Strawberries, 33 lb. crate	2.00	1.65	.92	.78

As in the case of vegetables these must be regarded as maximum total duties which only exist for a restricted period each year. For the rest of the year the only protection is the general tariff.

But we went further than that, because this agreement was linked up with the agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States. Under the empire trade agreements the apple grower in Canada obtained a sheltered market in the United Kingdom, to the extent, using our own currency, of about $1.08 a hundredweight. That is, the United States grower in shipping his apples into the United Kingdom market had to jump a hurdle of $1.08 before he could compete on equal terms with the apple grower in Canada. Following that change there was a great revival of business among the apple growers of Canada. It put a great many of them on their feet. But under this new agreement the protection in that sheltered market has been cut from $1.08 to 72 cents a hundredweight.

I am not able to agree on all points with the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley), although I know that in many matters his judgment is good. But the fruit growers I represent are not quite so complacently satisfied with the terms of the agreement as those in the minister's constituency are said to be. I can only suppose that his engaging personality and convincing power of argument must have been in evidence to induce his growers to take that view. In any event most of our people feel that this reduction to 72 cents is sufficient to allow the United States apple grower to jump the fence and compete with us in England.

I have nothing further to say in that regard, except to make one plea on behalf of the fruit and vegetable men at this time: that with all these changes in protective tariffs something will have to be done internally for this branch of agriculture. I say that most seriously. In the meantime, until we have an opportunity to restore some of these tariffs, I suggest that we do as they did in Ontario some years ago, namely, launch, with some kind of government assistance, in cooperation with the growers themselves, an "eat home grown fruit and vegetables" campaign among the housewives of Canada. I am sure the housewife is not always aware of the fact that when she buys carrots from the States while our products are available, she is interfering with the livelihood of some who are her Canadian friends in the vegetable and fruit growing districts. We should advertise and popularize our home grown fruit and vegetable products, because for deliciousness and flavour there is nothing to equal them on the other side of the line or anywhere else in the world.

I want to give this instance, in closing. One of my friends in the county of Peel wanted to exchange a box of apples which he had grown for a crate of oranges which a friend of his had grown in the state of Florida. When he went to ship the box of apples, he found that it cost him $4.14 to ship it to Homestead, Florida. When the man in Florida shipped the oranges back in the same box it cost only $3 to land that box in the county of Peel. I made inquiries and I received this explanation from the Canadian National Railways: You can ship a crate of oranges from Florida to Toronto for somewhere around $3, but this is due entirely to the fact that the United States has a special rate in effect from Florida to Canada to encourage the shipment of Florida oranges. In other words, it is just another subsidy.

I draw that to the attention of the house for the purpose of showing that we as Canadians must wake up. If we are going to protect our own growers we must do something other than lessen tariff protection while providing nothing in compensation by way of subsidization or organized assistance. That in short, Mr. Speaker, is the case of the fruit and vegetable growers in Canada, and I cannot over-emphasize the probable effect of these new arrangements upon that industry and those engaged in it.

In conclusion may I repeat that Canadians should await the practical results of this new agreement before rising to the heights of hilarity over its advantages. Common sense, if nothing else, dictates this course. Our job in this house is to legislate towards a better and a more prosperous Canada. In pointing out some of the obvious weaknesses in this pact we as members of his majesty's loyal opposition have, according to the best British parliamentary traditions, discharged our obligation to the people of the dominion. The final responsibility rests with the government.

Mr. W. G. CLARK (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, the trade treaty with the United States means a great deal to the province of New Brunswick, as well, of course, as to the other provinces of this dominion.

New Brunswick is one province which was not entirely carried away by the 1911 loyalty cry, because it returned in the election of that year a majority of supporters of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Expressions of regret have been heard ever since that many were influenced by the political issue then made of loyalty to the British empire, because after the election it was clearly realized that it was only a political cry, and that the reciprocity proposals, had they not been defeated by that cry, would have been of great economic benefit to the maritime provinces.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), speaking in the house on Friday on this trade agreement, made certain statements about the 1935 general election returns, rather implying that the Liberal government elected was not representative of the people. But an examination of the 1935 election returns, by constituencies, shows that there were elected, by clear majorities of the votes cast, 90 Liberals and only 5 Conservatives; 9 Social Credit, one Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and one independent Conservative. Thus there were more than five times as many Liberals elected by clear majority votes than all the other parties put together, indicating that the Liberal government does well represent the voters.

The geographical situation of New Brunswick makes it a great convenience to trade with the United States, and the present trade treaty by which the United States gives reductions on potatoes, lumber, horses, cattle, maple products, blueberries and furs is a decided benefit and will result in very greatly increased trade during this year.

Reading the address of the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) I note that he states, at page 345 of Hansard:

> It is generally realized that in New Brunswick conditions were never worse than they are at the present time.

And referring to the 1935 treaty with the United States he makes this statement, at page 344 of Hansard:

> The right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said in effect that the people of Canada were blessed by the results of the 1935 treaty.

Again, on page 344, he says:

> I simply want to say that as far as the primary producers of the maritime provinces are concerned, the statement made by the Prime Minister is not borne out by the facts.

But the hon. member has not given the facts. He refers to apples and states that the province of New Brunswick shipped about 48,523 barrels in 1936 to British empire markets, and that the 1937 shipments totalled 25,744 barrels. Having some knowledge of apple production in New Brunswick I noted at once that these figures were evidently about twenty-five times overstated and therefore entirely misleading.

Mr. BROOKS: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that the statement I made was taken from a report of the bureau of statistics and given as sent to me from that department. I consider it as correct a statement as that made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury.

Mr. CLARK (York-Sunbury): I shall be glad to give the house the correct apple crop figures as supplied by the New Brunswick department of agriculture, and prepared under the direction of the provincial horticulturist.

As a matter of fact, 1936 was a poor apple production year for New Brunswick, there being only 29,104 barrels marketed, and of these, 20,147 barrels were sold within the province and 8,957 outside, mostly in Quebec province. So it is very wrong to give the idea that there were 48,523 barrels sold from New Brunswick in British empire markets in 1936. The correct figures for 1937 are as follows: The crop increased to 49,616 barrels, of which 14,548 barrels were sold outside the province, again largely in Quebec province. It will thus be seen that the facts are very different from what the hon. member purported to show. New Brunswick does not export apples to any great extent. Potatoes are New Brunswick's great export crop; Nova Scotia exports large quantities of apples.

While I have great personal esteem for the hon. member for Royal I have wondered why he should give figures which are at least twenty-five times overstated. Evidently it was done for political motives, due to the statement which had been made that the hon. member is equal to twenty-five other men. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) visited New Brunswick, and in paying tribute to the hon. member for Royal he said, as reported in the press of June 6, 1938, that the hon. member for Royal was equal to all the twenty-five members from the maritime provinces who were seated on the government side of the house. The further statement was made that he had been the only hon. member to stand up for New Brunswick. Of course this is political stuff, and no doubt it secured some votes for the hon. member for Greenwood at the Ottawa Conservative convention. It is unfortunate however to have the hon. member for Royal seeing figures twenty-five times their actual size.

While potatoes are the chief crop in New Brunswick, and while we do not export many apples, yet that portion of the St. John river valley in New Brunswick is highly suited to apple raising, and as a result the number of orchards is increasing. I should like to refute the statement of the hon. member for Royal that conditions were never worse in New Brunswick than they are at the present time. I have knowledge of business conditions throughout that province and I am pleased to report that 1937 was one of the best years we have known. There was some recession in 1938, but even in that year business was better than in most other years. Much is expected in the coming summer through increased trade with the United States.

To show the increase in the exports of certain commodities from New Brunswick to the United States I should like to place on record a table giving the figures for the fiscal years 1935 and 1938. I have taken these years because 1935 was the year which immediately preceded the former United States treaty; and the 1938 figures serve to show the material increases brought about by the 1935 treaty.

Exports to the United States through ports in the province of New Brunswick for the fiscal years 1935 and 1938

Item	Unit	Fiscal year	United States Quantity	Value
Blueberries	pounds	1935	195,291	$ 12,831
		1938	1,553,003	67,909
Dairy cattle	number	1935	174	7,678
		1938	951	62,428
Planks, boards and flooring		1935	20,982,000	483,251
		1938	45,449,000	1,252,978

It will be noted that there were over five times as many dairy cattle exported in 1938 as in 1935. Not only that, but there was an increase in value during that period to the extent of almost fifty per cent per head. With further reductions in the new agreement I look forward to a still greater increase in the export of these and other New Brunswick products.

Trade makes for friendships between individuals and nations. Let us then continue to pursue the path of greater trade which will give work to our people, lasting peace and prosperity.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to support the treaty. I believe treaties of this description are to be welcomed at the present time because they tend to bring about better international relations. I do not believe, as is so often contended in the house, that they offer any immediate relief to the domestic problems that confront this nation. Our immediate problems are of such a nature that international treaties of this type will not cure the ills from which the country suffers. Nevertheless I believe they are to be supported because they tend to improve the relationships between ourselves and other countries which are parties to these treaties.

Unfortunately national self-sufficiency is becoming more pronounced all across the world. Recent events in Europe show that the totalitarian states with that kind of philosophy are gaining great strength. Their domination of eastern and southern Europe in my opinion means still further restrictions in world trade. When he discussed the treaty in the house recently the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made the statement that he hoped the treaty would make for peace. I think perhaps he drew an over optimistic picture of what might be done in that regard. All I can say, as I said at the outset, is that I am supporting the treaty because I hope that something of that nature may in part at least be achieved. One thing the treaty does is this: it draws into closer cooperation the three great English-speaking democracies. When I speak of the three democracies I am thinking of the United States, Great Britain herself, and the democracies which comprise the British dominions. Those three divisions are drawn more closely together by an agreement of this description, and I believe that that is all to the good.

Moreover may I point out that closely associated with Great Britain to-day in the struggle for the preservation of democratic institutions is the old republic of France. Anything which can tend to bring these peoples more closely together at the present time may have the effect of preventing the outbreak of a serious and disastrous war. While the treaty is only a step in that direction I believe we ought to support it for this reason, if on no other grounds.

I do not propose to analyse at length the various proposals in the treaty. This has been done in the house quite extensively during the last few days. I think that almost everything that could be said pro and con about the treaty's definite proposals has been said already. However, there are other factors to which, particularly as one representing a western constituency, I should like to direct some attention.

First of all, in the consummation of this treaty once again the west was called upon to relinquish something which seemed at least to have superficial advantage. I know it has been argued that little advantage was derived from the wheat preference, but I contend it did give us some advantage. As I said during a previous debate, I happened to be in the United States of America when the treaty was signed. I noticed that the middle western American newspapers were very much pleased with having at last got rid of the six cent preference. If, with the limited market we now have, that tends to encourage the use of more United States wheat by British mills, then it will have some effect upon our market. There should have been included in the treaty some compensating factors which we do not find there, and to that I shall allude in a few moments.

As a westerner I would also draw attention to the cattle quota. When this treaty was signed there was a widespread or perhaps almost general belief that, as in the case of the former treaty, the quota of 60,000 head of cattle per quarter was a Canadian quota. We have been told in recent days that it is not a Canadian quota. The nation which could grab off immediately the largest percentage of that quota would be in an advantageous position. In reply to a question asked the other day by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) stated that the quota for the first three months of this year had been exhausted in January. He stated that during that month Canada had exported 30,240 animals to the United States, and Mexico 24,760 animals. Because of a lack of appreciation of this fact, there was a severe drop in the price of cattle on the Canadian market immediately the situation was known. It seems to me that if the government of Canada is going to agree to the adoption of quota systems for farm produce being exported abroad, such quotas should be safeguarded so that they will actually work in the interests of the Canadian farmer. In this particular instance, while the quota was of some advantage for a few weeks, the sudden shutting off of exports with two more months of the quarter still to go created a serious factor in the stock market situation in this dominion.

Mr. STEWART: The live stock market.

Mr. COLDWELL: The uneven market which we have had during the past few weeks should be rectified at once if at all possible by the Department of Trade and Commerce and the government of this country.

This treaty is distinctly disappointing in certain other respects when considered from the point of view of a western member. Three years ago the question of the high price of farm implements was raised and a very thorough and exhaustive inquiry was made into the matter by a special committee of the house. An excellent report was presented to parliament containing certain recommendations and stating specifically and categorically that the prices of farm implements were too high, especially in comparison with the prices which the farmer obtained for his produce. When the budget was under discussion last June I believe that the western members of all shades of opinion hoped and indeed believed that when this trade treaty was signed we would find something in it which would reduce the high cost of farm implements. Something was done with regard to cream separators, but otherwise there was relatively little. Once again I draw to the attention of this house the fact that farmers both east and west have to buy the things they use in a highly protected market, whereas they have to sell the bulk of their commodities in the unprotected markets of the world. Consequently we believe we have a case for special consideration by this government or any government which occupies the seats of power.

May I say to the Liberal members of this house that in 1919 the Liberal party adopted a definite program and policy in regard to these matters. After all these years relatively little has been done to implement that policy and program.

Mr. EULER: Does the hon. member not think it is a fairly drastic step to reduce the duty on farm implements from 25 to 7½ per cent?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, but may I point out to the minister that in spite of the reduction which has been made, the prices of farm implements have steadily risen.

Mr. EULER: If it went down still further, they would rise still higher?

Mr. COLDWELL: The government has within its power the ability to do something to regulate this price level.

Mr. EULER: Fix prices?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, fix prices, if that were the only solution. May I point out that because of the protection which has been given in the past to farm implement companies, as was shown by the report of the farm implement committee, one company, the International Harvester Company, controls sixty per cent of the agricultural implement business. It has been shown over and over again, not only with respect to the agricultural implement industry but with respect to the oil and other industries, that where one company in a field controls the majority of business, then that company has a monopoly and can set the price level practically for all other companies.

The point of view that I am expressing is not only the point of view of a member associated with this particular group; I submit it is also the point of view of many Liberals in western Canada. For example, I have in my hand a copy of the Regina Leader-Post of February 15 which contains a report with reference to a resolution introduced into the Saskatchewan legislature by Mr. J. A. Gregory, the Liberal member for The Battlefords. I may be wrong, but I believe Mr. Gregory is the deputy speaker. This report reads:

> Ringing challenge for a return to that sturdy Liberalism upon which the party was founded and strong denunciation of many eastern Liberals as merely adjuncts of the privileged classes of eastern industrialists was sounded in the legislature Tuesday by J. A. Gregory (Liberal, The Battlefords).

This is an opinion expressed not by a member of the group to which I belong, but by an influential Liberal member in the legislature of Saskatchewan.

In my opinion this house is spending a great deal of time in this debate in concentrating upon a discussion of foreign trade and foreign markets, when as a matter of fact we have a great potential consumptive market at home. Many hundreds of thousands of Canadian citizens in this dominion at the present time lack the ordinary necessities of life, without considering the amenities, and it seems to me that we should be concentrating upon improving the conditions in Canada so that we might find a larger consumptive market within this dominion at the present time. Many of our people could consume more butter and more meat, for an example, if they could buy those commodities, and to my mind this house ought to be considering ways and means of increasing that consumptive power. As hon. members realize, I believe, this cannot be done by the issue of relief, although the standards of relief should be raised; or by the issue, as our social credit friends suggest, of dividends; but I do believe that there are essential public works which could be used to build up a better Canada and at the same time distribute purchasing power so that our people could buy the commodities which at the moment we are trying in vain to export. That would give the added advantage of paying wages, instead of relief from which we get nothing at all.

Of course I realize that we must trade, because there are some things we cannot produce which we must get from abroad, and to get those things from abroad we must export something in payment of them. To-day nations are placing quotas and embargoes against trade from without. So that whether we like it or not, some form of planned commerce between nations is in the making, and even this treaty is symptomatic of that fact. For here, written into a treaty to which Canada is a party, you have quotas for primary produce going into the United States and into Great Britain.

Now what can we do? The hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman), whose speeches I always appreciate because they contain a wealth of information and of detail, would say that we have got to get free trade, or at least much freer trade. But to my mind the competitive system under which old-fashioned free trade might have flourished has gone. The competitive system both internally and externally has broken down. Internally great corporations and monopolies occupy the field of industry and of distribution, and in the world to-day both great international monopolies and self-sufficient nationalisms are being built with great rapidity.

The house has a right to ask what the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation would suggest in the face of this situation in regard to external trade. May I quote from our own platform and explanation of that program? We urge in the realm of external trade that we—> —set up import and export boards to encourage and regulate external trade and remove the burden of the tariff.

Let me read also our explanatory note:

> Opponents of planning try to infer that this would lead to national self sufficiency. On the contrary, the more intelligent our economic relationships become, the more it will be realized that a nation, like an individual, is foolish to try to produce something expensively which can be made elsewhere more efficiently and economically. High tariffs are but walls against our income which help to build those great monopolies that oppress us. Trade ought to be an intelligent exchange of goods and services.
> But the necessities of capitalist production make this impossible. For capitalism never distributes among the producers a sufficient amount of purchasing power to enable them to purchase the goods produced. Hence each nation tries to export more and more surplus goods and import less and less from abroad. High tariffs, national self-sufficiency and a struggle for the few remaining markets follow. This leads to threats of war and, finally, to war itself.

And this concluding paragraph:

> The C.C.F. proposes that our international trade shall be planned intelligently so that the nation itself, through its import and export boards, shall arrange for the exchange of goods it can produce economically for those it needs and which others can produce more advantageously. Not until capitalism is banished from the earth can the ideal of universal free trade be realized. Under a Cooperative Commonwealth policy Canada can improve its external trade, remove the burdensome tariff exactions and expand the home market. This would bring great benefits to producer and consumer alike.

That, I believe, is a fair summary of the position of this group in relation to trade and commerce; and may I say it is a realistic approach. Moreover, unless democracy plans to increase the abundance and distribute that abundance, I am afraid that the people will turn to some other form of government or to some other system. And I, believing as I do that our democratic institutions offer still the best vehicle for social and economic improvement, desire to see something done which will strengthen our democratic institutions and democratic ideals among our people. For youth, hundreds of thousands of them, and the unemployed—altogether over a million of them, on relief—will not wait; indeed they cannot wait until, even if it were possible, we could establish universal free trade or attain universal trade agreements. As I said at the outset, let us make such agreements when we can, but let us suffer no illusions that such agreements are going to bring to our people the immediate relief which is so necessary. For trade treaties are not a universal panacea, and very largely, may I say, because they are not universal; nor are they likely to become universal. They will not cure, let me emphasize, our own immediate problems, of unemployment and of poverty. In December, I noticed, we had 407,000 persons registered as unemployed and upwards of a million individual citizens on relief; while workers' wages, another factor in the consumptive field, averaged in industry last year only $16 a week. And this, may I say to my hon. friends opposite, after many years of Liberal administration and Liberal policy.

My purpose in rising this afternoon is to ask members on all sides of the house if they do not think it is high time that this parliament and those who comprise it should face the realities of the present situation. For surely democracy is on trial. Let me repeat, unless our democratic institutions can be made to work to provide our people with opportunities of employment, with opportunities of sharing in the abundance which the resources of the country and the machinery of production make possible for us, then surely they will turn to some other form. Indeed there are threats from many quarters to-day. All across the country one can find what one might term incipient fascism as well as fascism of the blatantly European type; and then we have the growing propaganda for a so-called national government, a national government which, in my opinion, if formed, would be formed of those who desire solely to protect the vested interests in the country rather than the interests of the great masses of the people. To my mind, if these paths were followed they would simply be some more of those blind alleys up which we have been running from time to time.

There is no universal panacea that will immediately solve these problems for us. Our problems in my opinion have to be solved in the light of ultimate aims, step by step. We have got to build the path by which we shall go forward; and because I believe that this treaty is, if only a feeble step, at any rate a step in the right direction, I am supporting it on these grounds. I believe that democracy is quite capable not only of producing abundance but of distributing that abundance to the people of this country. To my mind these times constitute a challenge to every one of us and I should like to see this trade treaty disposed of as quickly as possible now that it has been discussed fairly thoroughly, so that we might proceed with the consideration of those weighty domestic problems that confront us at this moment. And so I support the treaty, though without any illusions that it is going to solve the grave problems that we face in Canada to-day.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): I have listened with a good deal of interest to the speech of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who has just taken his seat. He always delivers an interesting address. He started out by stating that he was going to vote for the approval of this trade agreement, and he gave as the reason that it would promote international peace and goodwill. Well, when we come to consider the parties interested in this three-cornered arrangement, Canada, the United States and Great Britain, and take into account the harmonious and friendly relations that have existed for a long period of years, one wonders if anything can be added which will improve those relations. To me, this is just so much gilding and glitter that has been placed upon this agreement.

Then the hon. gentleman proceeds to relate a number of objections which he has to the agreement, and it appears to me they are very real and very serious ones. In fact, if I were a judge and were compelled to decide, after listening to his arguments in support of the treaty and those he advanced against it, I should have to decide that his arguments against it were very much stronger than those in favour of it.

I propose to deal briefly with two or three matters in connection with this agreement.

Let me refer to two statements appearing in Hansard, both made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). On page 55 you will find the statement by the right hon. gentleman, that in dealing with this treaty we should consider the sequence of events; and in a sketchy way he reviews the events over a period of years leading up to the making of this agreement. Then there is another statement on page 56 which I desire to read, because I think it is important that we should deal with it. On page 56 the right hon. gentleman says:

> May I say at once to my hon. friend that when we discuss trade matters we are almost certain to differ diametrically because we view matters in an entirely different light. I believe the way to help to improve economic conditions, employment and the like is to encourage trade and to obtain as much in the way of trade as we possibly can. My hon. friend opposite believes in the policy of economic nationalism.

In considering the first of these statements as to the sequence of events, I think it is only fair to review the conditions between 1920 and 1930. Those were years of expanding world trade, years in which the trade of Canada expanded in common with the rest of the world and we enjoyed the advantages and the benefits of that world trade. We must not forget that at all times our prosperity is bound up with world prosperity and that conditions arising outside Canada influence conditions in our own country, a fact which sometimes our friends opposite seem to have overlooked in dealing with the conditions between 1930 and 1935.

At the end of 1929 and the beginning of 1930 the markets of the United States were practically closed to Canada because of the increases in the tariff on two occasions by the United States. The world depression had set in. Trade had become disorganized. There was financial chaos, exchange was dislocated, unemployment in Canada was becoming serious. It was more serious than was realized at the time; we were without accurate statistics on the subject. Following this there was dumping of manufactured goods from the United States into Canada without any reference to costs of production, with resulting disorganization of industry and increased unemployment. It is perfectly clear that something had to be done. The steps that were taken between 1930 and 1935 were, I think, the only ones that could have been taken in the circumstances.

An emergency tariff was introduced with the object of lessening unemployment and preventing this ruthless dumping of foreign products in the Canadian market. Concurrently with the raising of duties for this purpose there was an understanding and agreement with the manufacturers of Canada that the prices of their products to the consumer would not be increased. That agreement was respected. There was one case where perhaps it was not, and the penalty immediately followed; their increased protection was removed. The fulfilment of the agreement not to raise prices was strikingly exemplified in the agricultural implement industry; during all those years the prices were not raised. But following 1935, when the duties were reduced by this government, the prices of agricultural implements increased.

The objects of the emergency tariff were in a measure realized. And in dealing with this it must not be forgotten that there were many reductions in the tariff before 1935. Go back to the budget speeches and you will find a long list of items upon which tariffs were reduced over that period.

It must also be borne in mind that during that time Canada retained her share of the world's trade. There was only so much trade to be done in the world; it had shrunk by about sixty per cent.

Another step was taken in the meeting of the empire economic conference in Ottawa in 1932. I have here a report of the proceedings of that conference. I propose to read a number of extracts showing the position taken by the then prime minister of Canada and the prime minister of Great Britain.

On page 69 appears the following statement by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, then prime minister of Canada, chairman of the conference:

> What do we hope for from this conference? The answer is, I think, from all of us, greater markets within the empire. This is the answer from all of us undoubtedly, if we are persuaded, as I am, that greater empire markets mean as well greater world markets. For to us in Canada closer empire economic association does not mean in any sense world dissociation. The trading potentialities of this empire are great. But even one-quarter of the human race cannot profitably shut itself off from contact with the rest of the world.
> When we reach an agreement by which our products pass more freely from one empire country to another, we drive clear channels through the stagnant pools dammed up by the world upheaval, and naturally we will carry past the boundaries of the empire and to its benefit, establish once more again throughout the world that commerce which is its very life blood. The British people in their vigour, industry, and experience have nothing to fear from foreign competition when they are united in that economic association which is now possible. When from this conference that results, we will welcome fair and friendly competition. In our own interest we will welcome it.

And at page 70 we find another statement:

I have said before, and I do not desire to minimize the fact, that Canada must have greater export markets for its natural products. No country can live unto itself in this complex age, and with our relatively small population, with our vast and varied natural resources, with our immense exportable surplus in natural products, we perhaps above all other countries must be assured of other markets than our own. And I confidently believe that the people of the United Kingdom will not hesitate to support our proposal, knowing on their part that it will mean increased prosperity to many of their basic industries, and through them increased prosperity to all classes in the land.

Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin, prime minister of Great Britain, speaking on the same occasion, said, as reported on page 72:

Looking at the situation from another aspect, the trend to-day is towards larger units. International trade is so hampered by barriers of all kinds that a strong opinion is developing in favour of groups, not necessarily political in character, but offering to members economic advantages in the mutual opening of markets. No one suggests that complete free trade within the empire is possible. Considerations of revenue and of past policy stand in the way. But equally there can be no doubt that more constant comunications and more complete information about imperial market requirements would, if properly focussed, present governments with opportunities of securing trade with other countries of the empire, and of making commercial arrangements with other groups of nations such as could hardly be reached if each government acted alone.

What then should be the first aim of this conference? It should be to clear out the channels of trade among ourselves. For that purpose we need not measure too closely or too exactly the relative value of preferences given and received. If we all approach the problem with a view to seeing how much each can contribute to the common stock without detriment to our own national interests, we shall not need to concern ourselves with the relative advantages obtained by each, since we shall know that an increase in the purchasing power of any member of the empire must show itself in increased imperial trade, and the prosperity of each will add to the prosperity of all.

The present universal depression makes the extension and improvement of imperial trade a matter of urgent importance to all parts of the empire. The extension and greater activity of empire trade is the most hopeful means of stimulating demand in the world markets and of restoring a sound level of wholesale commodity prices.

Let us look, Mr. Speaker, at the results of that conference. Eleven agreements were negotiated—United Kingdom-Australia; United Kingdom-Union of South Africa; United Kingdom-New Zealand; United Kingdom-India; United Kingdom-Newfoundland; United Kingdom-Southern Rhodesia; United Kingdom-Canada; Canada-Irish Free State; Canada-Union of South Africa; Canada-Southern Rhodesia and Union of South Africa-Irish Free State. These agreements, all making in the direction of expansion of trade, were opposed by the present Prime Minister and all those associated with him, with the exception of one hon. member, the member for the constituency now called Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Ilsley). In speaking the other day he said he had a very intelligent constituency. He must have. As I say, he was the only one on that side who supported that agreement. His electors were intelligent enough to realize its advantages, and now he says they are still intelligent and are prepared to recognize the reduction of the advantages. He is to be congratulated on having a constituency of that kind.

These agreements were negotiated, and I do not think any member of this house or anyone outside of it will deny that they were of great advantage to the agricultural producers of Canada and to the trade of Canada and the empire generally. Time has fully demonstrated the results.

Following that, the attitude of the United States changed. To a certain extent it softened towards Canada, fortunately, and presented us with the opportunity of expanding our trade in their direction. This opportunity was embraced by the then government, and I propose to read from the white paper to which the Prime Minister referred in his address, entitled The Trade Negotiations between Canada and the United States, 1934 and 1935, which may be found quoted in full in Hansard of 1936, at page 56. This is the letter from the Canadian minister at Washington to the Secretary of State of the United States. It is dated November 14, 1934:

Sir,—

The government of Canada for many months have been giving careful consideration to the means whereby the exchange of commodities between Canada and the United States might be increased, and I have been instructed to present a statement of their views for the information of the government of the United States. The government of Canada believe that the time has come for definite action and that the declared desire of both governments to improve conditions of trade between the two countries should now be carried into effect by the negotiation of a comprehensive trade agreement.

You will recall that when the Prime Minister of Canada visited Washington in April, 1933, at the invitation of the president of the United States, the development of trade between the two countries was sympathetically discussed. On April 29, 1933, Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Bennett issued a joint statement at the end of their conversations, which concluded as follows:

"We have also discussed the problems peculiar to the United States and Canada. We have agreed to begin a search for means to increase the exchange of commodities between our two countries, and thereby promote not only economic betterment on the North American continent, but also the general improvement of world conditions."

At that time it was expected that at an early date the president would be vested with special powers to enter into agreements looking toward an increase in the exchange of commodities between the United States and other countries. Since Mr. Bennett's visit, informal discussions have been carried on, and several methods of improving trade relations between the two countries have been suggested and examined.

In the past eighteen months the governments of the United States and Canada have repeatedly manifested their determination to increase international trade, by declarations of policy and by the conclusion of bilateral trade agreements.

Within that period of time Canada has made trade agreements with several European countries.

The policy of the government of Canada with respect to trade relations with the United States was again stated by the Prime Minister of Canada speaking in the House of Commons on February 19, 1934. Mr. Bennett on that occasion referred to the fact that the governments of the United States and Canada had agreed to begin a search for means to increase the exchange of commodities between the two countries and thereby promote not only economic betterment on the North American continent, but also a general improvement of world conditions, and indicated that the policy of the government was to continue their efforts to that end.

Then follow details as to how this may be accomplished. Then, on page 5 of the white paper there is a sentence which may be quoted at this time:

It is hardly necessary to stress the importance to both the United States and Canada of their mutual trade. For many years each country has provided the other with either its largest or its second largest foreign market.

Mr. EULER: May I ask my hon. friend a question? Does he think the sentence he has last quoted is consistent with the statement made the other day by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), when he referred to the United States market as being such an uncertain market as to be hardly worth dealing with?

Mr. STEWART: I think they are quite consistent. I do not think there is any inconsistency between them. The statement I have just quoted simply recites the fact that over a period of years there has been a large exchange of commodities between the two countries.

Mr. EULER: Not so uncertain a market then.

Mr. STEWART: Well, I think it was very uncertain in 1930, when they were all closed against us.

Mr. EULER: But he refers in the letter to the fact that there has been a very large exchange of commodities.

[Mr. Stewart.]

Mr. STEWART: Yes, over a long period of years there was, but conditions between 1930 and 1934 were not quite the same as they had been before.

Mr. EULER: That is true.

Mr. STEWART: The letter goes on:

But no useful purpose can be served by calculating the relative shares retained by each country in a total world trade that for four years has been steadily shrinking, until in 1933 it fell in value to approximately one-third of the level of 1929. If peace and prosperity are to be established on an enduring basis, it is essential to increase the absolute volume of world trade. No better beginning can be made than by taking steps to increase without delay the volume of trade between two countries which offer the most notable opportunity.

I am quoting this, Mr. Speaker, for the definite purpose of answering the charge that my leader and his party are economic nationalists. This shows clearly that definite and positive steps were taken by the Conservative government to extend the trade of Canada rather than to restrict it, and to place it on a perfectly sound basis, and any statement to the effect that the government of 1930 to 1935 or this party are economic nationalists and not looking for trade is false to the record. It is made without regard to the record, and without a due sense of responsibility, and lacks the essential element of truth. That is all I have to say in that connection. The letter goes on:

Attention has been directed to the trade agreements between Canada and the other members of the British commonwealth of nations signed in Ottawa in 1932. In some quarters the statement has been made that these agreements render difficult the negotiations of a comprehensive and effective trade agreement between Canada and the United States. An examination of the facts will demonstrate conclusively that such is not the case. The agreements concluded at Ottawa in 1932 have been of immense importance in increasing the trade between the several nations of the British commonwealth. The market of the United Kingdom in particular has been a most valuable outlet for Canadian products. In return for the market thus assured Canada has continued and enlarged the preferences which had been accorded the United Kingdom since 1897. The Ottawa agreements do not, however, preclude and in fact have not precluded the signatories from offering extensive and valuable tariff concessions to other countries, and it may be stated positively that the government of Canada is free to enter into an agrement with the United States covering a wide range of products.

The government of Canada is prepared to join the government of the United States in a declaration that their common objective is the attainment of the freest possible exchange of natural products between the two countries. It is recognized that this objective cannot be attained in the immediate future, as important interests in both countries would be disturbed unduly by the sudden removal of existing tariffs on all natural products. The government of Canada would therefore favour, as the first step, the reductions included in the proposals set out in the next paragraph, to be succeeded by progressive mutual reductions in the duties on natural products, leading to the attainment of the declared objective.

I have not time to quote further, but I do suggest to hon. members of this house who seem to have some idea that we did not want to trade with anybody, that they read this letter in full as it is found in Hansard. Would it not be strange if all the appreciation of the value of foreign trade were wrapped up in the knowledge of those who are on the other side of the house? Why, Mr. Speaker, over a period of years there has been a common policy in this country, a common desire to promote trade. There has been the establishment of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the sending of trade commissioners all over the world, under all governments. So I think, sir, the record shows that it would be fairer and more honest for everybody to admit that both parties in Canada have desired an extension of trade. They may differ as to the methods, or as to how it is to be accomplished.

An hon. MEMBER: They do.

Mr. STEWART: Yes, they do; and I shall point out where I believe the difference lies.

I wish, however, to clear up the point I am trying to make, that there is no evidence whatever that Canada desired to build a wall around herself, or that she wished to neglect any opportunity to trade wherever she could make a fair and reasonable trade agreement.

Not only was this communication sent, but negotiations were undertaken and followed up. And may I point out the date? The letter was sent at the end of 1934. The reply of the Secretary of State was in December of that year. Congress met shortly after and did not rise until August of 1935. The dominion election took place in October, 1935. The President of the United States was so busily engaged with congress that he did not have much time to consider these matters. Between August of 1935 and the date of the election there was not much time left, but negotiations had progressed so far that within a very short time after the election the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was able to complete an agreement, the foundation of which had been laid.

Mr. EULER: I do not like to interrupt the hon. member but my impression always has been—and I am quite sure I am correct—that the former prime minister, Mr. Bennett, and the members of his party always contended that the reason the trade agreement was not consummated was that we could not get one which was fair to Canada, and that we were asked to give too much for what they were willing to give in return. But the hon. member now suggests it was merely because Mr. Roosevelt was too busy to proceed with the business until the time it was accepted by this government.

Mr. STEWART: The record is that congress did not rise until August, and that the election in Canada took place in October. What my hon. friend says is perfectly true; I do not dispute that at all.

Mr. EULER: We seem to differ as to the reasons.

Mr. STEWART: The present Prime Minister was so anxious to have some kind of trade agreement that he rushed down to Washington and closed it—and I think they were waiting for him. They saw him coming. I think he signed and adopted an agreement he was not justified in adopting, in the interests of Canada, and an agreement that the former government would not have signed. But I am pointing out that there was very little time for the completion of the negotiations.

Mr. EULER: I thought my hon. friend gave that as a reason.

Mr. STEWART: No, I had not completed the reasons. As I said, shortly after that time the agreement was signed. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) says there is a difference between the two parties in the view of trade.

Mr. EULER: I did not say that.

Mr. STEWART: Well, I understood him to say that there was a difference between us in our views in connection with trade.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend attributed that to the Prime Minister.

Mr. STEWART: I attribute it to the minister in the interruption he made a few moments ago.

Mr. EULER: No, no; if I may interrupt: My hon. friend gave as a reason why his government did not conclude the agreement the fact that the President of the United States was too busy.

Mr. STEWART: No, but prior to that you said there was a difference.

Mr. EULER: I made no such statement.

Mr. STEWART: Very well.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps there is a difference—but I made no such statement.

Mr. STEWART: I think my hon. friend will agree there is a difference.

Mr. EULER: I will not object to the hon. member saying that.

Mr. STEWART: I think he assented to that. I said I would point out in a few moments what the difference was.

Mr. EULER: You attributed that to the Prime Minister.

Mr. STEWART: My view of the difference between this party and that of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as respects foreign trade, is this: To them the hills of foreign trade look green. The far-away hills look green, and they are inclined to emphasize, even to over-emphasize, the value of foreign trade, at the expense of the home market. We fully appreciate the value of foreign trade, but we also appreciate the value of the home market. After all, I believe with few exceptions it is the best market we have; it takes the greatest amount of our products. The British market is the next best.

Mr. EULER: The states buy slightly more from us.

Mr. STEWART: It does not follow that because they buy more they are the better market.

Let us now discuss briefly the results of the last agreement. In doing so I should like to refer particularly to the budget speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) delivered on June 16, 1938, not as it is reported in Hansard but as it appears in a pamphlet, a copy of which I have in my hand. In his speech the minister reviewed the trade of Canada, in which he placed the total trade in the year 1937 at $1,792,109,521 and that of 1938, at $1,946,793,413, an increase of $154,683,892.

Then follows this interesting paragraph.:

An understanding of the course of our foreign trade during the past year and of its effect on the Canadian economy, however, must involve an analysis of the changing composition of our export trade as well as of changes occurring throughout the year in the direction of that trade. For instance, if we are to make a fair comparison of our exports during the last two years to particular countries, it is necessary to exclude gold movements, changes in the direction of which are not primarily related to trade considerations. For this reason, in the tables which I now present showing comparative figures for the last two years of the trade of Canada with the United Kingdom and other commonwealth countries, and with the United States, the figures given do not include gold of any kind but relates solely to other merchandise transactions.

Then follows a table showing the trade of Canada with the commonwealth, with respect to merchandise, all gold being excluded. In that table he shows the total value of exports to the commonwealth in 1937, as $495,031,940 and in 1938 as $516,520,463, an increase of $21,488,523. The total trade with the commonwealth, as shown in the table, indicates an increase of $56,495,719 in 1938 over that of 1937.

Then follows an analysis of the trade of Canada with the United States, and again all gold is excluded. The figures are as follows:

Trade of Canada with the United States
(Merchandise—all gold excluded)

	Fiscal year ended March 31, 1937	Fiscal year ended March 31, 1938	Increase (+) Decrease (−)
Imports from the United States	$393,720,662	$487,328,980	+93,608,318
Exports to the United States	364,354,990	343,250,669	−21,104,321
Total trade with the United States	$758,075,652	$830,579,649	+72,503,997

From these tables it will be noted that the United Kingdom purchased from us during the last fiscal year goods to the value of $407,798,000. This is slightly in excess of 41 per cent of our total exports of merchandise, excluding gold. Exports to other commonwealth countries showed an appreciable improvement, the increase being 23 per cent, and the total volume $108,700,000. Commonwealth countries as a whole, including the United Kingdom, took approximately 52 per cent of our total merchandise exports. Imports from all commonwealth countries increased during the past fiscal year by over 17 per cent, accounting for about 29 per cent of our total purchases from abroad. From the United Kingdom alone our purchases were $15,000,000 greater than in the previous year and amounted to $145,000,000. With the United States our total merchandise trade, again excluding gold movements, amounted to $830,600,000, as compared with $758,100,000 for the preceding fiscal year. Total exports to that country fell 6 per cent below the figure for the previous year to a total of $343,300,000, while imports at $487,300,000 showed an increase of nearly 24 per cent.

Exports falling off 6 per cent; imports increasing 24 per cent.

I should like to follow this up with a reference to a speech made in 1938 by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). On page 4170 of Hansard of that year he is reported as follows:

The paramount value and importance to Canada of sheltered markets in the United Kingdom are made clearly apparent by the trade returns cited by the minister. For the fiscal year ended March 31, 1937, our exports to the United Kingdom were $406,825,443 and our imports $129,507,885 in value. For the fiscal year ended March 31, 1938, our exports for the United Kingdom were $407,797,610 and our imports $144,978,493. Our aggregate export and import trade with the United Kingdom in the two years ended March 31, 1937, and March 31, 1938, were:

Exports	$814,623,053
Imports	274,486,387
Excess of Canada's exports	$540,136,666

And again:

Surely a profitable trade with the United Kingdom to that extent should not be sacrificed by reason of any emotional or hysterical appeals for the improvement of our political relations with the neighbouring republic, as a basis for the establishment of peace throughout the world.

During the same two years, exclusive of gold, Canada's export and import trade with the United States was as follows:

Exports	$707,605,659
Imports	881,049,642
Excess of Canada's imports	$173,433,983

So in those two years, exclusive of gold, our trade with the United States showed a balance in favour of that country amounting to $173,433,983, as compared with a balance in favour of Canada in its dealings with the United Kingdom, for the same two years, of $540,136,666.

I have not the time to quote all the figures given by my hon. friend, but he goes more fully into detail in his speech.

I think it will be admitted that it is desirable that wherever possible we should have a favourable balance of trade. It has been stated in this house that we have favourable trade balances with all countries except Italy and the United States.

Mr. EULER: There are some other small ones.

Mr. STEWART: Perhaps that is right. If there is any country in the world with which we might reasonably expect to have a favourable trade balance it is the United States. It is a country of 130,000,000 and we are 13,000,000.

Mr. MANION: About 12,000,000.

Mr. STEWART: Let us make it 13,000,000 for good measure, ten to one.

Mr. EULER: How does it work out with Great Britain?

Mr. STEWART: Never mind; we have a favourable trade balance with Great Britain, which has a much smaller population, about one-third of that of the United States. I submit it is not unreasonable to expect that we should have a favourable trade balance with the United States, but the figures show that in connection with the agreement negotiated in 1935 the reverse was true, the balance being heavily against us.

I should like to discuss briefly the agreement now before the house. Let us look at the conditions under which we entered into this agreement in 1935. I am sorry I did not enlarge upon the trade figures because they are very illuminating. When the budget comes down or when we are in committee on this matter perhaps we will expand the record a little.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I regret to inform the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) that he has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. STEWART: I need only a few minutes to complete my remarks.

Mr. EULER: Go ahead.

Mr. STEWART: When we entered into the agreement of 1935 we were handicapped in that the average rate of duty on Canadian goods going into the United States was 41·5 per cent, while the average rate on United States goods coming into Canada was 27·4 per cent.

Mr. EULER: Does that include free goods?

Mr. STEWART: Those are the figures quoted by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George in his speech, and when he quotes anything it is pretty accurate.

Mr. CAHAN: It is more than 40 per cent.

Mr. EULER: Did my hon. friend include free goods?

Mr. CAHAN: Their average rate on the dutiable goods is over 40 per cent.

Mr. STEWART: The hon. member has applied the same basis to both countries. What are the powers of the president? He can reduce existing duties only by fifty per cent. He cannot put anything on the free list which was not on the free list, and he cannot put anything on the dutiable list which was not on the dutiable list. That country held hearings before which the interests affected appeared. There is always advantage to a large unit when dealing with a smaller one. Here we had a unit of 130,000,000 people dealing with one of 13,000,000 people. I have heard a member of the present government say that the United States was the most striking example of the benefits of free trade, a country with a population at that time of 120,000,000 people trading freely among themselves. There is something in it. They have a variety of resources, a variety of production and a huge home market. But I think he overlooked the fact that while that was true, they also had the additional advantage of the highest protective wall of any country in the world. They had it going and coming. Our position was not as favourable in the same ratio. We had a low tariff. We applied no quotas against them, while they adopted quotas against us. We made no provision to hear the parties affected by reductions in the tariff, and we started out with an unfavourable trade balance.

We had only one small advantage, the preference in the British market. Let us look at where we stand now. Under the agreement now before the house we have to some extent lost the benefit of that preference, something which for years we made desperate efforts to obtain. We have lost some of that which we found to be of permanent value. We have an unfavourable balance of trade which is likely to be increased by further reductions of duties. The rates against many of our commodities going into the United States are higher than the rates on the same commodities coming into Canada. The reductions provided for in the United Kingdom-United States agreement will probably enable the manufacturers in the United States to export direct to the United Kingdom instead of continuing to maintain the branch factories which they established in Canada in order to take advantage of the British preference. If that occurs, there will be an increase in unemployment in industry in Canada because of the closing of plants and the increase in imports to follow.

We will lose some revenue because of the wiping out of the excise tax. Apparently it will have to be wiped out on everything. This would seem to be an inevitable consequence which possibly was not anticipated. Our railways and ports will lose traffic. We shall have an opportunity of discussing this in committee and of bringing out the advantages and disadvantages of the agreement. There are some advantages. With the necessary information before us we shall be able to arrive at conclusions, but as I see it now, with all the information that is available, the advantages in favour of the United States far outweigh any advantages or benefits to Canada by any concession under this agreement.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in support of the new trade treaty, the motion for which is now before the house, I should like, before referring to the new trade agreement, to deal particularly with some of the statements made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), whom I am pleased to see in his place, and who spoke on Friday last.

[Mr. Stewart.]

I want at the outset to agree with his comment that the agreements were far too important to gloss over. At the beginning of his speech, however, he placed on record some figures pertaining to the last election, and stated that he did not know what they meant. Perhaps I may be pardoned if I draw my own inferences, although I know it is against the rules to do so; but I feel sure that the leader of the opposition did not place those figures on the record merely to take up time. I believe he mentioned that the Liberal party was in power with a minority vote of the people of Canada. He nods his head; I understood him correctly then. In rebuttal I would say that I do not think the leader of the opposition would advocate the casting of all ballots into one barrel or hat and the distributing of them pro rata throughout the country. There are some, I know, who believe in proportional representation and the single transferable vote. According, however, to the record of what has taken place in this country—I refer particularly to the provincial elections in Alberta in 1926 and 1930—the single transferable vote and proportional representation did not give any fairer, in fact, did not give as good a representation, in the provincial legislature as does the present system of plurality votes. Let me quote the figures.

In 1926, 68,896 votes were cast for the United Farmers of Alberta, and they got 42 seats; 36,692 were cast for the Liberals, who got five seats, and 26,197 were cast for Conservatives, with no seats.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I regret to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor, but I am inclined to think he is out of order.

Mr. REID: With all due deference, the attention of the leader of the opposition should have been drawn to that on Friday last when he placed those figures on the record. I believe that under the rules of the house I am entitled to controvert those figures, and I am using these figures by way of reply.

Mr. MANION: If you have no objection, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I have not. As a matter of fact, if I may just interrupt, what happened was that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had boasted a bit of the winning of by-elections and of Liberal victories, and I was giving a few figures which threw a different light on the results. I did not take very long at it.

Mr. REID: I think I can show to the leader of the opposition and to the house another set of figures,—

Mr. SPENCE: What is the difference, anyway?

Mr. REID: —relating to the present membership, which I think is more accurate than the figures he quoted. I want to continue with them because I think they should be on the record.

In the Alberta election of 1926, there were 5,163 votes for Labour, with three elected representatives, and 252 for Liberal-Progressives, who of course did not elect any member. The same condition existed in Alberta at the 1930 election. With 23,000 votes, the Independents got only three seats; 34,000 votes elected eight Liberals, and with 70,000 votes the United Farmers got 34 seats. I believe that disproves any argument that proportional representation is any fairer form of representation than the present system.

I would ask the leader of the opposition also to note this. In the present house, ninety Liberals were elected with majority and ninety-nine with minority votes in their own constituencies. But on the left of you, Mr. Speaker, only five of the thirty-seven Conservative members are sitting with a majority vote in their own constituencies. Of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation members, one only is sitting with a majority vote.

Mr. HEAPS: Did my hon. friend have a majority in his constituency?

Mr. REID: No, and neither did my hon. friend; and I think my majority was just as big as his.

Mr. HEAPS: Nothing near it.

Mr. REID: The Social Credit party are the only group with a majority of members elected by majorities in their respective constituencies. I know my hon. friend from Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) does not like this, but he must just sit and take it.

Mr. HEAPS: My hon. friend will never have the majority which I get.

Mr. REID: Mr. Speaker, I appeal to you. I am willing to argue with the hon. gentleman at any time, but I have only forty minutes.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, let us get on with the business.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. REID: As I was saying, the Social Credit group, with seventeen members, are the only ones who have more than half their number elected by majority vote. Ten were thus elected, and seven by majority votes. Both independent members were elected by minorities, and likewise the leader of the social reconstructionists. I believe that this is a truer picture of the situation in the house than merely to say that if you count all the votes throughout Canada and distribute them equally you will find that just so many voted for the Liberals although the Liberals have so many more seats.

The leader of the opposition, referring to the market of Great Britain, stated that Great Britain collected three times as much customs duties as we did in Canada. Why should she not, when her trade is six times that of Canada? Last year imports to Great Britain were of the value of over five billion dollars, while the value of her exports was under three billion dollars, her total trade being $8,120,749,966. Her per capita imports were $114 as against $71 in the case of Canada. It is no great argument for protection to say that Britain collects three times the customs duties that are collected by Canada when her trade is exactly six times that of this country.

Speaking about imports, the leader of the opposition remarked that there are certain kinds of products which we cannot produce, such as tea, coffee, rubber, cotton, and even some wool. He went on to say that he did not know why this country cannot produce all her requirements of wool. That is very easily understood by those who know anything at all about farming. The wool grown in Canada is rather coarse, on account of climate conditions, and no very fine cloth can be made from it. In Australia and New Zealand, where the farmers have large flocks of sheep, the sheep are kept primarily for wool production, and it is a well known fact that the finest wool in the world comes from those two countries.

An hon. MEMBER: And from Alberta.

Mr. REID: We must import a certain quantity of wool if we are to make or use the finest grades of cloth.

Mr. MANION: We should be raising about five times as many sheep as we are raising.

Mr. REID: But it would not make our wool any better or finer.

Mr. MANION: That is disputed, too.

Mr. REID: Well, a demonstration was held down in the Chateau Laurier. I attended it, and the qualities of wool grown in this country as compared to those of the Australian sheep were fully explained to members.

The leader of the opposition also dealt with a plank of the Conservative platform. I am going to read part of it because it is very interesting:

To provide a diversified economic life which will serve to retain Canada's sons and daughters within our own boundaries.

That is very laudable, but it is merely just a platitude; it does not mean a thing as far as the Conservative party is concerned. I looked up the records after the hon. member had made his speech. I found that from 1926 to 1930, 210,578 Canadians returned from the United States to this country, compared with only 62,432 who returned between 1931 and 1935. As regards those who left this country permanently to take up residence in Great Britain, between 1926 and 1930 some 66,000 left this country, whereas between 1931 and 1935, 77,352 departed to take up permanent residence in the old land. Any policy that the Conservative party might put into effect to retain our Canadians would have to be different from any that they have put into effect in the past, because, according to the figures, the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite has not been successful. One of the grave problems confronting British Columbia is the oriental question, and I noted that during the ten years of Conservative administration, 1912 to 1921, 36,314 orientals came into British Columbia, whereas from 1922 to 1931, only a little over 4,000 came in.

An hon. MEMBER: What has that to do with the trade treaty?

Mr. REID: I do not know how often I must ask hon. gentlemen opposite to be good enough to listen. I am replying to statements made by the leader of the opposition. He is quiet, but those behind him seem to think they have to come to his rescue.

Some mention was made about the loss that would be suffered by the apple growers. Time will not permit me to deal fully with that question. If the preference, however, under the agreements of 1932 were designed to increase the trade of the apple growers of this country, it is noticeable that it did not, for the trade dropped off after 1934. The total shipments of apples from Canada to Great Britain in 1933-34 were 8,755,000 bushels; in 1934-35, 5,582,000 bushels; in 1935-36, 6,496,000 bushels; and in 1936-37, 3,888,000 bushels. Last year the quantity shipped was 6,180,000 bushels. That shows, to me at least, that some other factors than the mere preference must be considered.

The leader of the opposition was a little unfair in what he said with regard to milk. He ridiculed the present quota of 3,000,000 gallons. He called it a mere speck. I wonder how many members have looked up the shipments of milk to the United States in the past eight or nine years? In mentioning milk the leader of the opposition took good care not to refer to Canadian shipments of cream.

In 1930 we shipped over 2,000,000 gallons of cream valued at more than $4,500,000; and in 1930 we shipped over 3,000,000 gallons of milk, which brought $699,199 to Canadian exporters. Since that time and after the Conservative party came into office shipments of cream and milk steadily diminished, until in 1935 exactly eight gallons of cream and none of milk were exported. That is quite interesting. But I would suggest that in the remarks of the leader of the opposition some mention might have been made of cream, because cream does get a preference under the new trade agreement, and the duty on milk has been reduced to 3¼ cents a gallon, the quota being 3,000,000 gallons. But taking first the quota of cream, and thinking of that quota in terms of milk, hon. members will find that it is equivalent to over 17,000,000 gallons of milk; and that added to the 3,000,000 gallons of milk which will be allowed into the United States under the agreement, will mean an available market in that country for over 20,000,000 gallons of milk.

I come now to something that particularly affects British Columbia, namely, shipments of lumber. Lumber is one of the great industries of that province, and what is contained in any agreement is of especial importance to the lumber trade. Let me read two statements made by prominent lumbermen of British Columbia when the treaty was announced. The first is by Mr. Robson, president of the British Columbia Lumber and Shingle Manufacturers' Association. He said:

> The British Columbia lumber industry is extremely pleased by the conclusions that have been reached in this long-drawn-out and difficult, triangular trade agreement.
> Our industry recognized all along that some sacrifices would have to be made to make it possible for the two great English-speaking nations to get closer together, and we feel that our government representatives have protected our interests in an admirable way, considering the many traders, producers and consumers who are entitled to serious consideration.
> We are confident that what losses have occurred in some directions will be fully compensated for in the broader relations and that our industry will continue to be a real factor in the world lumber and shingle trade. We desire to sincerely thank all who have contributed to the successful conclusion of a very difficult task.

That was the statement of the president of the British Columbia Lumber and Shingle Manufacturers' Association comprising every lumber and shingle concern in that province. Then we have the statement of the past president:

> J. H. McDonald of New Westminster, former president of the British Columbia Lumber and Shingle Manufacturers' Association, and a leader in its trade extension work, welcomes the triangular agreement and thinks it must be regarded as generally satisfactory.

If any potential trade with Britain is lost through the United States gaining some entry there it will doubtless be made up by our better chances in the United States market. The removal of the United States quota on Douglas fir and hemlock is a distinct gain also.

The agreement to do away with the necessity of marking all lumber going from Canada is one of the finest things the trade could have obtained. He also welcomes the increased United States quota for British Columbia shingles as a promise of better conditions in the shingle industry.

One of the most important factors with respect to the lumber industry is the removal of the Marking Act. I wonder how many members realize the significance of this to the lumber industry of British Columbia. If the Marking Act of the United States passed against Canadian lumber last year had been kept in effect, it would have meant that no Canadian lumber would have been sold in Washington, Oregon and other states. Not only so, but even lumber that might have entered that market would have gone in at a greatly added cost to the lumber manufacturer. Consider, first of all, the shipment of mouldings, fine small lumber for house interiors. Those exporting that would have to employ extra labour to stamp every single piece, and it was estimated that this would cost at least $20 a carload extra for this class of lumber. Apart from that, I doubt whether, if that requirement had been imposed, we would have sold any lumber in the United States.

We are aware of the intense nationalism prevailing in some quarters in the United States, which are demanding that the American people use nothing but United States lumber and other articles. If an agitation of that kind were set going in the United States, what trade unions or other bodies would have been willing to use lumber stamped as Canadian lumber? It is generally conceded, and I do not think any hon. member would deny, that the removal of the markings requirement has been one of the splendid things done under that agreement on behalf of the lumber industry of British Columbia, even if nothing else had been done.

In passing, might I place on record some figures regarding shipments of lumber to the United States. I want, however, to be fair; no one would deny that the British market is of some importance to us. But bear in mind that British Columbia has been shipping only the cream of its lumber cut to Great Britain. Between 15 and 20 per cent only of a tree is clear No. 1 lumber, and this is what has been going to the old country. The rest of the tree, some 70 or 80 per cent, is of inferior grade, for which a market must be found. That market was principally in the United States, and of course in better times we had a wonderful market for it on the Canadian prairies and locally in British Columbia. Great Britain takes little if any of that inferior grade of lumber. It is interesting to note that in shipping the very cream of our lumber to Great Britain the manufacturers got less than for the poorer grades shipped to the United States. Here are the figures. For planks and boards shipped to Great Britain last year—and for other years one finds the comparison the same—the prices received worked out at $13 per thousand feet, whereas $15 per thousand was obtained for the inferior grades shipped to the United States. For hemlock the figures are the same. But if one takes the total average price of all shipments of wood, including squares, planks and boards, we find that shipments to Great Britain last year brought us $22 per thousand as against $26 per thousand on shipments from British Columbia to the United States. Last year the United States took $168,990,160 worth of our lumber products, that is all products of the forest, including lumber, pulp and paper. Great Britain took $45,354,428 worth. This means that the United States took 60 per cent of our forest products as against 18 per cent taken by Great Britain. I am not minimizing the value of the British market, but I place these figures before the house to show the importance of the United States market for our lumber and forest products.

The leader of the opposition made special reference to doors, and I wish to deal with that for a moment. He said, speaking about some gentleman who had called to see him:

> He says that the door industry in British Columbia began in 1933, after we obtained the preference on doors in the British market. I will read the data he gave me just as I jotted it down. Until 1933 Canada had no wooden door export business at all. In 1933, the year when the British empire trade agreements were negotiated, we exported 50,000 doors, and that number increased to about 1,000,000 doors in 1938. In looking over the figures I found that our exports went to 1,681,000 doors in 1936, when business was a little better, or nearly 2,000,000 doors in that year, and then with the drop in business generally the figure came down to about 1,000,000 doors in 1938.

In reply to that statement I would point out that doors were not bound in the Ottawa agreements at all. Lumber was, and so were apples and other articles, but not wooden doors. In the old country they have what is called an import duties advisory committee, and on three occasions that committee recommended three increases of duty. Those three increases occurred, the first in April, 1932, when a duty of 15 per cent ad valorem was imposed. In June, 1933, it was raised to 2 shillings per door, and then in January, 1935, the duty was raised to 2s. 6d. per door. In January, 1939, there was a drop from 2s. 6d. to 1s. 6d. per door. But if one looks over the shipments of doors to Great Britain one observes the significant fact that in 1936 shipments of doors were actually greater than in 1937 or 1938. In other words, as the import duty was increased, giving more protection to doors from Canada, imports from Canada fell.

I would particularly point out to the leader of the opposition that in the Ottawa agreements of 1932 doors were not dealt with; therefore the information he received from someone from British Columbia was not correct. They are manufacturing doors in the old country from imported stock, and the import duties advisory committee make recommendations to the government according to the production of doors in Great Britain. Practically no complaints have been received from Canadian manufacturers of doors as a result of the reduction in the preference, because it is realized that the duty was being reduced from the high level to which it was raised, simply for the purpose of affording protection to the industry in the United Kingdom. One British Columbia business man said that in his opinion shipments from British Columbia would have continued to decrease under the former preference on account of the expansion of the manufacture in the United Kingdom.

Coming now to the duties on fish in the new agreement, first I would point out the benefit we received in connection with halibut under the new trade treaty put into effect by this government after they first came into office. The duty on halibut entering the United States from Canada was two cents a pound. When we came into office and made the new trade treaty with the United States, that duty was dropped to one cent. Now that one cent a pound duty is being maintained, but the reduction means and has meant many thousands of dollars extra to our Canadian fishermen. We sold to the United States in 1935 over 2,500,000 pounds of halibut; in 1936, over 4,500,000 pounds; in 1937, 4,724,000 pounds; and last year 5,633,200 pounds, with a duty of one cent a pound. This meant that in 1938 some $56,332 more money went into the pockets of our British Columbia fishermen than would have been the case if the duty of two cents a pound, which was in effect prior to this government taking office, had remained.

We have made some shipments into the United States of fresh and frozen salmon. The duty on this has been reduced by 50 per cent. On pickled or salted salmon the duty has been reduced from 20 to 12 per cent. Of our total exports of fishery products in 1937, amounting to $28,902,152, Great Britain took $6,721,766 worth as against $14,004,573 worth going to the United States which is equal to 50 per cent of the total value of our fishery catch in 1937. I point that out to show the valuable market we have in the United States for many of our varieties of fish. I am not overlooking the fact that our canned salmon entering the British market will still retain the 10 per cent preference it has enjoyed since the Ottawa agreements.

Looking over the agreement I note that the duty on corn from the United States, the Argentine and other countries outside the British commonwealth of nations has been reduced from twenty to ten cents a bushel. Formerly it was twenty-five cents a bushel. Great quantities of corn come in from the Argentine and the United States. It is true that corn has in some years been imported from British East Africa and British South Africa, and these importations, of course, are free of duty. But Argentine corn and United States corn are of splendid quality, and we in British Columbia must import corn to carry on a successful poultry business. In 1935—I am speaking strictly of corn fed to poultry—we imported over four million bushels of corn with a value of $2,869,088. In 1938 we imported almost three million bushels, with well over one million bushels coming from the United States and the Argentine. A reduction of ten cents a bushel in the duty means a considerable saving; in fact it means $10,000 more in the hands of our poultry men of British Columbia on the amount imported last year. When I left home for Ottawa early in January the price of corn was almost prohibitive, and wheat was the lowest price known, I think, since confederation, selling at around $21 a ton, while corn was selling for around $38 a ton. The reduction from twenty to ten cents a bushel will mean that we in British Columbia at least will be able to import large quantities of corn at a 50 per cent reduced duty cost from the United States and the Argentine.

I have not time to go into all the details in connection with vegetables, but I would refer for a moment to potatoes, and I want to be fair in my remarks. We in British Columbia have not got all we wanted under this trade treaty. I suppose it would be impossible for any province to get all it wants. Particularly do we criticize the potato tariff. We believe that British Columbia should have been placed on an equal basis with the potato growers in the states of Washington, Oregon and the southern states because there they have a climate and labour conditions superior to ours in British Columbia. If like protection could not have been given, I should like to have seen at least a countervailing duty on potatoes, as we have on eggs. We have a five cent duty on eggs coming in from the United States, and likewise a five cent duty on Canadian eggs going into that country. There are, however, some benefits along that line because the duty on incubators has been reduced. The incubators, the large ones that we use in British Columbia, are imported mainly from the United States. In 1930 we imported 23 658 incubators, with a value of $498,398; there was no duty. In 1935 we imported 560 incubators from the United States, with a value of $8,348, on which we paid a duty of $2,000. Under the new agreement the tariff has been reduced from 12½ per cent to 7½ per cent, and that coupled with the removal of the 3 per cent excise tax will mean that those purchasing incubators—and we import them mainly from the United States—will be saved a considerable sum of money.

There has also been a reduction in the United States duty on oats, from 16 to 8 cents a bushel; on barley going into the United States the duty has been reduced from 20 to 15 cents a bushel; and on rye the duty has been reduced from 15 to 12 cents a bushel. We do a considerable trade with the United States in these grains. For instance, in 1935 we shipped to the United States nearly $1,800,000 worth of oats and over $6,000,000 worth of barley; of rye we shipped to the United States $384,000 in that year, with none going to Great Britain.

One other matter on which I wish particularly to dwell for a few moments is the reductions in duty that have been made on gasoline since this government came into office. Between 1930 and 1935 the duty on gasoline entering Canada was 2½ cents a gallon. In 1936 the duty was reduced to 2¼ cents a gallon, and it is now reduced to one cent a gallon. According to evidence which has been submitted before an inquiry being held in British Columbia, this will mean a saving of $2,000,000 to users of motor cars or trucks. I doubt if any member, even from British Columbia, will dare to criticize the reduction in duty on gasoline. In that province we used some 60,000,000 gallons of gasoline last year. That means a saving of $2,000,000 all of which is going into the pockets of our people; they have been saved that amount.

So, after all, Mr. Speaker, there are many good things in this treaty. It cannot be as bad as the leader of the opposition painted it. I noticed that before he sat down even he was willing to admit that there were some good things in the treaty, and it is going some, I believe, for the leader of the opposition to admit that.

In conclusion, I believe that the new trade treaty as consummated between Great Britain, the United States and Canada, is the first sign of returning sanity to the world as shown in freer trade.

I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) when he said that democracy was on trial. I wish the majority of us who believe in democracy would put it the other way round and say that it is the dictators who are on trial. That, at least, is my construction of the situation. It is true there are many faults with democracy, but, so far as I am concerned, I will fight to retain democracy, even with its faults, as against the systems we are now witnessing in Europe and elsewhere.

I suggest we ought to take the saner and broader view that it is the dictators who are on trial, and remember in those dictator countries they are not providing useful occupation for their people. I wonder what conditions they would have, were it not for the fact that they have many millions of their citizens under arms. I wonder what kind of system they would have. Let us take another viewpoint of these serious affairs; let us take a little more pride in our own democratic system, even though it has many of the faults the hon. member has mentioned.

I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, to rise in my place and support the new trade agreement.

Mr. J. A. MARSHALL (Camrose): Mr. Speaker, as I sat in the house the other day and listened to the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), I could not help contrasting that speech with the one he made in the session of 1936 on a resolution somewhat similar to the present one. All hon. members recall what happened at the election of 1935 when, with a very large following in the house, the Prime Minister was returned to power. In a moment of unguarded ecstasy he announced that the problems of unemployment, debt, taxation and similar evils would be promptly dealt with, and that measures tending to solve those problems would be introduced.

Losing no time he promptly and unostentatiously slipped out of the capital city of Ottawa, accompanied by a band of competent experts, bound for the city of Washington.

In due process of time he made an agreement with the United States, one which was heralded as being of supreme importance to the economic well-being of the people of Canada. I was quite satisfied then, as I am now, that the Prime Minister felt in his heart that in completing the agreement he had achieved something which to a very large extent would cure most of the ills to which we are subject. On that earlier occasion every seat in the Liberal and opposition benches was filled, in marked contrast to the situation which obtained when he delivered his speech on the treaty resolution at the present session. On the earlier occasion his followers were all in their places, and loudly applauded every point he made.

If I recall correctly, at that session very few if any of the social crediters spoke on the resolution. I, for one, did not say a word on it. Why? One lesson I have learned during the last few years is clearly to distinguish between results and methods. I have also learned that as a member of parliament I should at all times and on all occasions endeavour to press for results, and let the methods be taken care of by experts. I firmly believe that the reason for so much acrimony in the debates of the house is that members are constantly quarreling over methods, and not paying proper attention to results.

Trade agreements have always been the rock upon which we have split. Why? Because they are designed as methods to give us results. We will always fight over methods and forget about the results. In the 1936 session, the Prime Minister said, in effect, to us, as members of the House of Commons: "Fellow members, I agree with you that unemployment is still a grievous problem. The people are burdened with debt and taxation, and poverty exists in the midst of plenty. Budgets are far from being balanced, and our young people are wandering hither and thither, not knowing what to do. I have consulted with my colleagues and with experts in the various departments of government, and we have come to the conclusion that trade agreements will go a very long way toward solving our difficulties. Accompanied by some of these experts I went to Washington, and I now offer to you a trade agreement, as a solution to our problems. I recommend to you the acceptance of this trade agreement as a cure for our economic ills. It is one of the great methods of obtaining certain results which I believe will be of great benefit to the Canadian people."

The Prime Minister did not use those words, but in effect that was the thought which was conveyed to me by his speech. I for one took the Prime Minister at his word on that occasion, but I made up my mind that I would demand the removal of those experts, if their plans failed to accomplish the things they were designed to do. I believe that agreement has failed entirely in its purpose, and I therefore demand that the people who were a party to the agreement be removed from office.

Let us ask ourselves this question: Has the trade agreement of 1935 done for Canada all that it was expected to do? That is the question I must ask myself before I can conscientiously give my assent to the present agreement. As I look back over the past three years, I must conclude that the trade agreement has failed to solve to any degree the major problems the country faces. Unemployment continues to be our main and urgent national problem; debts and taxation continue to mount; credit and currency are still in the hands of private vested interests; our budgets remain unbalanced; the railroad problem is ever present, and the problems of youth remain unsolved. Perhaps these problems are a little more perplexing to-day than they were in 1935. Can anyone from his place in this house say that this agreement has solved any of these problems?

Did anyone benefit by the agreement? Let us face this question. I firmly believe that some people did benefit. Big business, from whose coffers I understand flow most of the campaign funds, was one of the main beneficiaries under this pact. Whether one can credit their achievements to trade agreements is a matter of opinion, but certainly the fact stands out in bold relief and we must attribute these things to something. In 1937 the dividends paid by Canadian business firms and industrial corporations reached a peak of $323,750,000. That was the highest figure in many years. I believe the second highest since confederation. For the year ending December 31, 1938, the amount paid was $322,125,000, just slightly under the figure for 1937. When one contrasts the situation which our agriculturists and primary producers faced during those years with conditions such as drought, hail, grasshoppers and the manipulation of prices on the part of those who control the prices of cattle, hogs and dairy products, with the situation as faced by big business enterprises, one can understand quite easily why this trade agreement does not arouse the same enthusiasm in my heart as did the trade agreement of 1935.

Let me touch briefly upon the present agreement. In effect the Prime Minister has said to us: "Gentlemen, this treaty, the ratification of which I am seeking from this parliament, is designed to cement the bonds of friendship between the great democracies of the world." Evidently it is a political, not an ecomonic agreement. Somewhere, some time, the Prime Minister, speaking of this agreement, said that the stability of the civilization we cherish depends more than ever upon the friendly association of the great English speaking nations of the old world and the new. I want to tell the Prime Minister that high sounding platitudes never paid the mortgage on a farm or the grocery bill when crops fail and hog and cattle prices drop out of sight.

As a matter of fact, I am not particularly interested in what the Prime Minister or even the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) thinks of this pact. What I should like is an opportunity to question the three experts who were sent to Washington to negotiate this agreement. I should like to know what general instructions were issued to them. Were they told, in all their deliberations, to lean toward the side of big business, or were they told to bargain on behalf of the primary producers? The experts who worked out this agreement spent more than eight months in constant consultation and negotiation, and their work has been alluded to in glowing terms by the Prime Minister. These experts know what they set out to accomplish, and I should like to know from them what results they hope will accrue from this trade agreement. I should like to know also if they believe that this agreement is designed to cure most of the economic ills of Canada. If it is not designed to do that, then what in common sense is it designed for? If they hedge on their answers, they should be promptly dismissed from the service and their posts occupied by those who know for what we are striving and will use their knowledge and ability toward that end.

The attitude and the position of the group to which I have the honour to belong were clearly and positively set forth yesterday by the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Needham). I need not enlarge upon his remarks, because those who run may read. It seems difficult for some people to understand the philosophy of our group. We believe that the first and main responsibility of any government is toward its own citizens. The consumption of the people of Canada must be greatly stimulated. They are not getting all they can eat or all they can wear. So long as the condition exists where one person in every ten is living on the edge of poverty, our whole attention should be concentrated on this problem rather than on shipping out of the country goods which could easily be consumed within our own borders if the people had the necessary purchasing power.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MARSHALL: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was endeavouring to show that we should concentrate more on the consuming public in the dominion and less on the producer. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) talks about economic nationalism; he seems to have added a new string to his violin and has been playing this string a good deal during the present session. I wish he would define the term "economic nationalism," so that we would know exactly what he meant. Am I an economic nationalist if I advocate a policy which has for its main objective the welfare and the happiness of the people of our own country; if I say that we should feed our own people first, and change the internal economy of this country so that people can get all the clothes they wish to wear; if I say that we should not export any lumber until the people have decent homes to live in; if I should say that we should keep our potatoes, milk, fish, pork, beef and bacon in Canada, and change the money mechanism to enable Canadians to get these things in abundance; and that then, if we still have a surplus after doing all these things, we should look around the world, see what nation or nations require our goods, and exchange those goods for the commodities which we require? Am I to be considered an economic nationalist if I advocate such a policy as that? Then the Prime Minister can put my name down as one who embraces that philosophy.

It is evident, however, that the Prime Minister has not been following the trend of events in Great Britain. They have there a new minister of agriculture, Sir Reginald Dorman-Smith. On February 1 of this year he made his first public speech as minister of agriculture, in the House of Commons at Westminster. This is what he said:

> Action must be swift and direct to produce that expansion of food production from our own soil which I think is necessary. I know of no more important task than of ensuring that in all circumstances there should be adequate supplies of food for our population in times of emergency.

This new and splendid conception of a million men sent back to the land and half a billion dollars' increase in agricultural production has been accepted, acknowledged and launched in the parliament of Great Britain. His statement to parliament on that occasion was greeted with loud and prolonged cheers from the biggest house that has ever debated a private member's motion in the present parliament.

Does the Prime Minister of this country realize the significance of the step which is now being taken by Great Britain? That step in my opinion smacks of economic nationalism, and sounds very much out of harmony with the expression of opinion from the Prime Minister when he said:

> We cannot, like some other countries, pursue a policy of producing all that we consume and consuming all that we produce.

I say to the Prime Minister, kindly, let us try it just for once and see how the people react to the experiment.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, realizing full well that this pact will do nothing more than provide Liberals and Conservatives with an opportunity to argue with each other over tariffs, whether they be high tariffs, low tariffs or what have you; realizing that it will do nothing more than divert another huge stream of dividends into the pockets of big business manipulators; realizing too that the Liberal party can pass this pact whether we like it or not, let us end this discussion, wash our hands as quickly as possible of the pact and get down to the pressing needs of the people, which in my opinion will not be relieved in any great measure by this agreement. Let us tackle unemployment, debt and taxation, and that greatest bugbear of all politicians, the railway problem. Let me assure hon. members that I am willing at any time to sit down with any man or any group of men in an honest endeavour to find a solution of these perplexing problems. Let us try to find a solution of these problems. On the other hand, if the government feels that this trade will cure all our ills, let us clear off our desks, go home, and wait and see.

Scientific engineering has changed our whole economic trend of life. These engineers have conferred upon us untold blessings, but at the same time they have multiplied our problems. If we solicited their help instead of invoking the aid of so-called experts who still live in the reflected glory of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir John A. Macdonald, we would soon get ourselves out of this sorry mess in which we find ourselves to-day; for truly it is a sorry mess. If we did less talking for Hansard and more real work for Canada, we would soon accomplish that which we were sent here to do. When the gong sounds in the next federal election battle, and the nominated candidates stand on platforms extolling the virtues of their own party and magnifying the vices of their opponents, the average Canadian citizen will judge the candidates and their parties, not on the methods used but rather on the results that are obtained.

Mr. H. R. FLEMING (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, the only issue in this debate is whether this is a good trade treaty or not. We are not discussing whether a trade treaty between Canada and the United States or between the United States and Great Britain should have been negotiated. Those treaties have already been made. On this side of the house we evidently believe that this is a good trade treaty. The opposition, however, seem to think it is not. I believe that reasonable people will agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) when he says that time, and time alone, will tell.

Even as a doctor, I would not care to predict the sex of a child before it was born, and I am sure that the leader of the opposition would not, but there are certain things I can predict from heredity. I can be certain, if a child is the offspring of certain lines of white people, it will be white, but I cannot tell what its actions will be when it grows up. Some of its actions may be good and some of its actions may be bad. That is the old Mendelian theory.

The heredity of this child is good. I like its colour, and I think we should give it a chance to prove its usefulness before we judge its character. Because of the eugenics of the mating I have high hopes for this child.

There is a story told of an astrologer who had offended one of the great French kings, and who was about to be beheaded. The French king called him and asked him to predict the date of his death upon the guillotine. The astrologer replied, "Four days before your majesty's death." Needless to say he still kept his head.

The opposition seems to be forecasting a somewhat similar fate for his majesty's Canadian government. Unfortunately in the past we have done something to justify this prediction. We tried to strike a death blow at Toryism by providing for a reduction in tariffs, and about four months afterwards we were "guillotined" from power. Sir Wilfrid Laurier negotiated a trade treaty, and the people did not have an opportunity to find out whether it was good or bad before there was an election. The Dunning budget was brought down in 1930, and once again, before the people could find out whether it was good, bad or indifferent, the Liberal party went to the country and were driven from office. Even the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), who fathered that budget, met personal defeat in the capital city of Saskatchewan. For some weeks now, there has been a persistent rumour in the highways and byways and everywhere else that the Liberal government of to-day will go to the country this year. Of course, I shall have nothing to say about that question; that is the prerogative of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) alone. If I did have any say in the matter, however, I would say that I can see no rhyme or reason why this Liberal government should go to the country this year. As the Prime Minister has pointed out, we have won all the by-elections east and west with the exception of one in Ontario.

Mr. MARSHALL: And one in Alberta.

Mr. FLEMING: Oh, that is a long time ago. In my opinion this is a good treaty, and I am so sincere in that belief that I want to see it proved. Should an appeal be made to the people of Canada to return us to power on the prediction that what we have done will prove to be right, or should we appeal to them when we can point to the results of the treaty? What would have been the effects of the reciprocity treaty that was fought so bitterly in 1911, no one can say with surety. I do not intend to thresh old straw over again, but the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) the other night went back to "No truck or trade with the Yankees". He said we were at the parting of the ways; though he may not have used these words, he implied that Canada would become nine states of the American union; that annexation was in sight, and he brought forward again all the bugbears that we heard in the election cry of 1911.

I remember as a young man attending college at Kingston, and the first public meeting I ever went to was in 1911. During that year we had debates at college on the reciprocity issue and we wrote essays on reciprocal trade treaties. We thought they were a splendid thing. In fact, in the junior matriculation examinations of 1911 one of the questions on the paper was to write an essay on reciprocity. About that particular time there came to the city of Kingston a man known then as the Hon. Mr. Foster, who was heralded to speak on reciprocity. As I remember, a number of us from high school attended that meeting. We were standing at the back of the hall, and I recall vividly—because he was a splendid orator—that with all his oratorical skill, pointing to the end of the hall, he said: "Young men, this may be the first vote that you will cast; but before you do anything, before you act on anything I may say, I would ask you to go to-morrow morning to Macdonald park and there gaze upon the statue of the great Sir John A. Macdonald. For forty years he represented this historic city of Kingston. Read on that monument the inscription: 'As for myself alone, my course is clear. A British subject I was born, a British subject I will die.'"

Well, Mr. Speaker, we wondered what he meant. We wondered whether he implied some test of our loyalty and devotion to king and country. At any rate that was the impression which was left by this great orator who spoke to us on reciprocity. The same old straw is being threshed over now, and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is trying to live over again those old, unhappy, far-off days, and those battles of long ago. He was trying a few nights ago to fight them over. In his old age he has become so vicious and so venomous. Look how venomous he has become against the Prime Minister of the country, how venomous he became a few days ago against the Minister of National Defence.

One of the chief cries of the Tories has always been that we are severing our ties with the mother country; but now, with the present trade arrangement, I do not see how they can say very much about this, because the mother country has also made a trade treaty with the United States. For many reasons it is a brimming measure of satisfaction to us to know that Great Britain has found a basis of economic cooperation with our great neighbouring republic, that great democracy to the south of us. In spite of the tendency of the leader of the opposition to scoff, I believe that this is one of the longest steps toward world stability and peace since the great war. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition was scornful of the idea that this trade agreement would promote better relations or that tariff barriers had in any way interfered with our friendly relationship or with our mutual prosperity. He said we had had friendly relations with the great United States of America since 1812. I am sorry that he is not in his seat at the present moment, but I should like to draw his attention to those unhappy days from 1866 to 1870. That is one period in Canadian history which he evidently missed.

Let me quote from the hon. gentleman's book, his literary masterpiece, Life is an Adventure. In that book the leader of the opposition says at page 266:

> Conditions generally were somewhat depressed through 1924 and 1925, and the tariff question became a very prominent one in the discussions in and out of parliament. The United States rather short-sightedly kept raising its tariffs against Canadian production, particularly against the products of our farms, in face of the fact that Canada's ten million people were purchasing from the United States about two dollars' worth of goods for every dollar's worth that the hundred and twenty million Americans were purchasing from Canada. It was an exceedingly unwise attitude on the part of the American people, as Canada was their best customer among all the trading nations, purchasing annually from them hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of goods, yet year by year facing the antagonistic actions of American protectionists who forced through congress bill after bill prohibiting the import of Canadian farm products. It was the beginning of that economic nationalism which has since grown to such ridiculous proportions all over the world that world trade has been almost completely strangled. But in 1924 and 1925 it particularly affected the relations between Canada and the United States, giving rise to exceedingly antagonistic feelings on the part of the Canadians toward their neighbours.

No more effective answer could be given to what the hon. leader of the opposition now tries to make us believe he believes. This is widely different from the view he expressed in this house when he spoke on this trade treaty. I am inclined to favour the opinion expressed in his literary masterpiece, Life is an Adventure, because at that time he did not have his weather eye on the election winds.

Tariffs—tariffs—tariffs—we have argued them until the subject is threadbare. Soon we shall have to discard this political cloak and strike out in some other direction. Yet give a man a little independence and the truth will out. "Economic nationalism which has since grown to such ridiculous proportions all over the world that world trade has been almost completely strangled." So said my authority, that distinguished soldier, parliamentarian and author, the leader of the opposition.

What is the actual tariff situation in relation to Canada? When Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power in 1896, the average ad valorem rate on dutiable imports was, in round figures, 30 per cent. It was gradually reduced until in 1911 it was 25·9 per cent. Reciprocity would have cut this in half. After 1911 it began to mount again, although there was a considerable drop in 1917 under union government. When the Liberals came into power in 1921, it again dropped and remained fairly constant until the Tories came into power in 1930. Then up it went sky-high. Since the present government came into power, it has gradually declined. But the point is that over a protracted period we have drastically reduced tariffs. In fact, in 1938 the ad valorem duty averaged 23·9 per cent, compared with 23·8 per cent in 1917. The point I wish to make is that the Liberal party worked for three or four or five years in order to get the tariff down to where it was when they went out of power, and then when we go to the country and tell the people that we have reduced the tariff, is it any wonder that even if they do not think we are deliberate prevaricators, at least they think we are a little careless about the truth? We work and get the tariff down but by the time we have it back to where it was when we left office the people do not realize what we had to do.

There are certain things omitted from this tariff cut that I should like to have seen in it. I was pleased this afternoon to hear the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell); what he said seemed to me real Liberalism. That is the Liberalism we should be preaching in western Canada. I have continually stressed the fact that prices of farm implements and gasoline are far too high, and I see no mention of them in the trade treaty. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who is not in his seat to-night, has told us that there are international combines and that we should smash them. Well, I say to the government that if we cannot smash those international combines and reduce prices of farm implements and the price of gasoline, the government may possibly be smashed. Some way must be found to deal with these problems.

I was pleased to hear the other day the answer to a question as to certain agreements that we have in connection with our trade relations with Germany. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) told us that we have certain trade treaties. Since that time I have discussed the matter with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), and I find that on October 22, 1936, a provisional trade agreement was made between Canada and Germany, and that we have increased our sales of goods to Germany from $3,000,000 in 1936 to $18,000,000 in 1938.

How individual items will work out, no one can tell, but I trust that the results of the treaty will be beneficial to the Canadian people. As to the principles underlying this treaty I have every confidence that it is as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said this afternoon, a step in the right direction. I hope and wish and pray that it will develop into a dog-trot race to prosperity.

At the present time we are faced with an armament race. If the situation could be boiled down to a single reason, that reason is antagonisms aroused by protective systems, national isolationism, economic self-sufficiency, resulting in international hatreds. Nations have entrenched themselves in tariff dug-outs and thrown round themselves a wall of bristling steel. On the other hand, freer commercial intercourse promotes mutual knowledge and trust. I was glad to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce the other day state that when he went to the League of Nations and they sat round a common council table and got better acquainted with one another, they were able to discuss their problems in a much more satisfactory way.

All the world contributes to our breakfast table, to our comforts and the convenience and fullness of our lives. Civilization is based upon cooperation; if we refuse to do our part in this wholesome development, this natural way of living, we are contributing to darkness and distrust, and fundamentally are not only anti-social, but anti-Canadian. Our opponents base their arguments on self-interest, or protection. The only logical conclusion is that if we are not going to trade with others, we trade with ourselves only. I can do no better than adopt the language used by the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) some time ago when he said that the channels of trade can be deepened and broadened only by deepening and widening the channels of goodwill.

Canada is a country which recognizes that her destiny as a great nation is to be fulfilled not behind impenetrable tariff walls, which not only shut in but shut out, but rather under a policy that will remove tariff barriers, unfetter trade and provide reasonable facilities for the inflow and outflow of goods and for the dispersal over the seven seas of the surplus which providence has so unstintingly bestowed upon us. Would they have us destroy our position as the fifth trading nation of the world? Would they have us use only such things as are indigenous to or produced in Canada? Carry their argument to its ultimate conclusion and you see what a muddle and mess we should get into. We do not want war; we do not want economic conflict; we want a decent chance to produce the things we can produce and exchange the surplus for other goods. If I am a wheat farmer I am not obliged to believe that I must eat only bread and wear a skirt made of straw in order to enjoy an economic utopia. We can participate in economic appeasement without its indicating a back-stroke against self-government or domestic economic advancement. Indeed, internationalism on one hand and national self-government on the other are the very essence of democracy.

Even if the Tories did succeed in their object of excluding foreign goods which would compete with our domestic production; even if we achieved complete control of our domestic market, there is no reason to believe that this would increase distribution so that the Canadian people could enjoy the full output of Canadian industry. In fact, all the experience we have had of such a situation, when isolationism was throttling trade, showed that this pious hope was doomed to complete disillusionment. As a matter of fact, a few years ago we called it depression. Let me ask these questions: Was Canada less able to produce in the depression period? Had our domestic customers disappeared? Had Canada's resources in some inexplicable way become depleted? Was there no man power available? Had somebody destroyed our factories? If our domestic market is the economic paradise, why did we not simply exploit it and grow fat?

Someone will promptly say: "Oh, well, we did not have any money." I am not going to enter now into any monetary argument because I understood the Minister of Finance to say that there was a proper time and place for that, and that was when the barons of the Bank of Canada would appear before the banking and commerce committee. But if you conceive of money as gold, we are as rich as almost any nation in the world. If you conceive of it in terms of goods and services, we have the physical ability to produce the goods and the people willing to furnish the services.

Almost since time immemorial the two great parties in this country have been arguing tariffs, and evidently there is something to be said on both sides or the argument would not have continued so long. I am not one of those who believe that my opponents are complete fools. But the great difficulty that I see is that tariffs give primary benefit, and, in many instances, the sole benefit, to the big interests. The tariff has become a tax which differentiates between the masses and the classes. I say this because I believe we cannot struggle along indefinitely on a system predicated on benefit to the few. I cannot see the masses suffering forever the sight of the goods they need being destroyed so that a few people may grow rich in money power.

What will be the solution? As the leader of the opposition said, time, and time alone, will tell. But as a member coming from the wind swept prairies of western Canada, I say to the Liberal government sitting here for the fourth session of this parliament, that if they do not do something for the people of western Canada by reducing the price of farm implements and the price of gasoline and increasing the price of primary products, there will be such a revolt when the government goes to the country—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has exhausted his time.

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, someone has likened this trade agreement to a horse trade. We have made the trade, but we have not got our horses home yet.

The last speaker (Mr. Fleming) has said that time will tell. There was such a lot of ballyhoo attached to the launching of this trade treaty that people are now beginning to think that it is not what it was represented to be. But; now they are told—have patience—it is going to take time to work it out. We were told the same thing in 1935, what great benefits were going to come from the treaty of that year, and how expanding trade was going to solve all our problems. According to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), at that time it was going to solve our great problem of unemployment, stimulate industry, and give more business to our railways, which would be in a much better position because of the trade treaty. But we find, on looking over the country, we have unemployment just as bad as ever, we still have our railway deficits with us, and our industries still languish. I wish that some hon. member opposite, before this debate is concluded, would tell us exactly what benefits we have derived from the treaty of 1935. We know pretty well how it has worked out. Apparently it failed to put people to work, nor did it create any more business for our railways. According to trade returns which have been put on Hansard during this debate, the United States is the party that has benefited most from that treaty. Canadian industries have not flourished because of it; in fact, many of them are in a worse position than in 1935.

This trade treaty differs in that it is a triangular arrangement. The Prime Minister, for political effect, has represented this triangular trade arrangement as an international peace move signifying especially a rapprochement between Great Britain and the United States. This has tended to ward off criticism or even examination of the actual terms of the trade bargain. But I think the impression which the Prime Minister sought to give was exploded by my leader (Mr. Manion), who referred to denials from both London and Washington that the trade deal had any relation whatsoever to international politics. It was considered by Washington and London as entirely an economic bargain, and I think that is how we should look at it in this country. It is not a political bargain but an economic bargain entirely, and as Canadians we must consider it from that point of view.

The discussion of this matter, to my mind, involves two questions: First, is it desirable to have freer trade relations with the United States? Second, are the terms of the agreement as a whole beneficial to Canada?

On the first point, the desire for freer trade relations with our neighbours to the south, I think I can safely say that we are all in absolute accord.

As to the second we are not in accord. The Prime Minister and his followers apparently regard the terms of this trade agreement as highly satisfactory; but many of us on this side of the house, after having given the agreement careful study, believe that, on the whole, while this or that particular item might be beneficial to us, it is not in the best interests of Canada.

My first criticism is the same as was directed against the trade treaty of 1935, against quotas being applied to this country. We have given to the United States, a country of 125,000,000 people, everything we had to give, without any restrictions as to quotas. But they are not prepared to give this country the same treatment. Surely it cannot be considered an even deal if we, with a population of 11,000,000 people, must accept quota restrictions on many items of vital concern to us. There is a quota against our shingles, a quota against our cattle, a quota on cream, a quota on milk, and a quota on potatoes. We find we are under a handicap from the very beginning, therefore, in making a fair trade arrangement with the United States.

As has already been pointed out in this debate, the maximum tariff reduction which the president is authorized to make of his own initiative was 50 per cent of the existing rate. The United States tariff is a Republican tariff, the highest tariff in the history of the United States, and even with a 50 per cent reduction it is higher than the Underwood tariff, under which we had free entry into the markets of the United States for a large number of our products.

Second, the powers of the president were restricted as to the duration of the agreement; it was limited to a three-year term.

But the United States did not stop there. They declared, further, that before any bargain of any kind was made with any other country it was essential that the citizens of the United States should be accorded an opportunity of appearing before a tariff board. They had the privilege of filing briefs or presenting arguments concerning any proposal. No such opportunity was given the people of this country. The people of the United States had that advantage over us.

In my opinion this trade arrangement will be most harmful to many Canadian producers. But then the Prime Minister reminded us that the consumer is to benefit. He recited a long list of benefits that would accrue to the consumer; fresh fruit and vegetables, canned vegetables, many types of fish, whisky, cigarettes, and some lines of clothing would come in at reduced rates. What benefit will this be to the consumer, if he has not the money to purchase these commodities, or if he has not a job? That is the question we must consider.

Naturally the next question is: What is the price we are going to pay? What concessions are we called upon to make? That is the question we must ask ourselves at this time. We are giving up some valuable British preferences, preferences we had in the greatest market of the world. We are giving up much of the practical advantage of the Ottawa agreements. British Columbia is one province that knows the value of those agreements. The 10 per cent preference on lumber gave our province a tremendous market in the old land. Our apple growers know the value of the dollar per hundredweight on Canadian apples. Then, we had the wheat preferences, valuable in itself, and especially valuable in the development of Canadian ports.

We are sharing the preference on fruit and lumber, and we are giving up the wheat preference. The United States apparently considers these concessions of real value to them. Let me quote from comments respecting the United States-United Kingdom agreement, as issued from the Department of Commerce at Washington. This is the United States viewpoint, in regard to grains:

One of the most important concessions is the removal of the duty on wheat, which has been equivalent to about six cents per bushel. This has tended to divert trade to Canada and Australia. The United States formerly sold great quantities of wheat to the United Kingdom and with normal crops in the future and the restoration of free entry it should again be able to sell large quantities. Also—

Listen to this—

—as a removal of the preference, it should be possible for American ports and transportation interests to regain their lost business in the transhipment of Canadian wheat to the United Kingdom.

Take the business away from Canadian ports. Then, in regard to fruit, this is the United States viewpoint:

The United Kingdom has long been the most important foreign outlet for American apples. Formerly this country—

The United States.

—was the dominant supplier of British imports, but since 1932 duty margins against American apples have shifted some of the trade to British empire countries which enjoy free entry; the duty is reduced by one-third by the agreement. This concession should help the American apple export trade to regain a substantial portion of its share of the British market displaced through the former duty.

Those preferences were real. They meant markets for Canadian producers. They meant employment for Canadians. They meant dollars in the pockets of Canadians, and purchasing power flowing through Canadian business houses.

What are we getting in return? We are told we are getting some concessions in the United States market for our lumber, regarded by some of some importance, but with which I shall deal a little later on. We are to get concessions for some of our cattle, some of our milk, some of our cream and some of our potatoes. In introducing the resolution the other day the Prime Minister made the following statement:

British Columbia will be greatly benefited by the concessions with respect to forest products.

Let me say that those of us coming from British Columbia are most anxious that the timber industry of our province should be benefited, not injured, by the agreement. I can safely say the timber industry in our province is our most valuable industry. Under normal conditions we have two hundred mills operating, representing a total investment of close to $100,000,000. The whole economic life of British Columbia is bound up in the welfare of the timber industry. When the lumber markets are active, general prosperity prevails. Depressed conditions are usually traceable to a slump in forest products. It is estimated that at least 75 per cent of the business in the coastal area of the province depends basically on the revenue derived from wood and its derivatives.

The empire agreements, so bitterly opposed by hon. members opposite, have been the most important single contribution to the development of off-shore business during the past seven years. The United Kingdom, which bought less than 100,000,000 feet a year prior to the trade agreement, has in recent years been absorbing more than 600,000,000 feet. The total water-borne exports to different parts of the empire have crossed the billion dollar mark. Unfortunately 1938 has not been such a happy year for the industry. It is true there was a greater shipment of lumber to the United Kingdom; yet the returns were not commensurate with the cost of production, with the result that the year was one of the worst the industry has ever had. And this is one time where under the agreement I should think something should be done—and was expected to be done—to improve this industry.

Mr. EULER: May I ask a question?

Mr. BARBER: Yes.

Mr. EULER: Would the hon. member not attach some importance or credence to the statement of lumber people in British Columbia that they are well satisfied with the terms of the agreement?

Mr. BARBER: I may deal with that in a few moments. What are these concessions which were stressed by the Prime Minister? What are the concessions which particularly benefit the lumber industry of British Columbia?

First, we have the removal of the quota. I am sure that was never reached under the present charge of $2 per 1,000 feet on our lumber entering the United States. Then, there is the removal of the marking regulation. We have heard a great deal about that. It was one of the nuisance regulations placed in effect last fall. The removal of that is beneficial to the industry. In return the industry gives to the United States a portion of its preference on the United Kingdom market. That affects about one-sixth of its present business with the United Kingdom. So at the immediate stage of the trade agreement the lumber industry of British Columbia has received no concessions, with the exception of the removal of the marking regulation, whereas on the other hand, it has given a valuable concession to the United States. If that stage is reached in the trade agreement where the excise tax of $1.50 is removed, then the position of the industry will be much stronger. As the government knows, that of course is a matter which is up to congress.

Mr. EULER: It gets concessions in the United States market.

Mr. BARBER: What our lumber industry wants to-day in addition to water-borne traffic, is a better rail market—all of which would be possible if the United States market were opened to us.

I admit, and we all agree, that the red shingle industry has been benefited by the increased quota. But in order that we may see how bright the picture is, may I refer to another wood product to which reference was made this afternoon, namely the manufacture of fir doors. The manufacture of fir doors for the United Kingdom market has developed into an extremely valuable industry in British Columbia. This industry started in 1933, as a result of preferences obtained in the United Kingdom market on account of the 10 per cent preference which was given in 1932 to empire countries. That preference was strengthened in 1935 by an increase in the British preference to 2s. 6d. Under this three way arrangement the United Kingdom duty on these doors has been reduced from 2s. 6d. each to 1s. 6d., or from 61½ cents to 37½ cents per door, dividing our preference with the manufacturers of the United States.

At this point may I quote from a statement issued by the board of commerce at Washington. This comment, found at page 40, has reference to wood and wood products:

> The duty was first imposed in March, 1932, at the rate of 10 per cent ad valorem, and was successively raised until it became 2s. 6d. per door (or 20 per cent whichever is the greater) at the beginning of February, 1935. These successive increases, which were intended primarily as a protection for the domestic door manufacturing industry, have had the effect of practically eliminating importation from the United States and diverting this trade to Canada.
> The United States managed to maintain its trade with the United Kingdom fairly well through 1934, but with the final duty increased to 2s. 6d. per door early in 1935, and the building up of the industry in Canada (imports from which continued to be free of duty) the American trade declined precipitously, until in the first half of 1938 the United Kingdom imported only 1,950 American doors, valued at about $3,500, representing only one-fifth of one per cent by both quantity and value, of the total British door imports. Conversely, imports of Canadian doors have risen from one-fifth of one per cent of the total, by number, in 1932 to 80 per cent of the total in the first half of 1938. The actual number imported from Canada rose to a high of 1,771,251 in 1936, and has since declined somewhat, but the Canadian share of the British market has continued to increase, the imports from Canada having declined less, quantitatively, in 1937 and 1938 than the total imports from all countries.

The curtailing of and the sacrifices made by that industry will mean so many more people out of work. We cannot expect anything else when the preference is handed over. Briefly, these are the wonderful concessions to the forest products industry of which the Prime Minister boasted.

Now I ask: What about the farmer? What is there in this trade arrangement that will help the agricultural industry, an industry that has been struggling under depressed conditions for the last few years? Will it relieve the butter situation in Canada? Will it move the 15,000,000 pounds of surplus butter? Not a chance. We may be able to sell a few gallons of milk and cream if we can get over the United States tariff of 6½ cents a gallon against milk and 28$\frac{3}{10}$ cents a gallon against cream when we are within our quota, and 56$\frac{3}{10}$ cents a gallon when we are over our quota. The quota is just about enough to take care of the production of one county in Ontario. I am sure the dairymen of British Columbia will not be excited over that concession.

The agreement contains a provision to permit live pigs to enter from the United States under a duty of one cent a pound. The duty against fresh pork is 1½ cents a pound.

Then there is the quota against cattle about which we have heard so much. We are told this has been increased from 156,000 to 225,000, but we have discovered only lately that nearly half of this quota is being filled by Mexico. Previously Canada had the whole quota to herself, so that the actual effect is that the quota to-day is less than previously.

Then there is the question of eggs. The duty on United States eggs entering this country has been reduced to five cents per dozen. I can assure the government there will be no cackling or crowing in the poultry yards of British Columbia when eggs from the sunny south start pouring into that province during the winter months. Here is another hard pressed industry that is being called upon to make a sacrifice for the cause of peace in the world.

Next is the potato industry. Potatoes enter this country from June 15 to July 31 by paying a duty of 37½ cents per 100 pounds, while they are allowed to enter free for the balance of the year. Canadian potatoes entering the United States are under a quota, and the United States tariff ranges from 37½ to 75 cents per 100 hundred pounds. That practically destroys the market for early potatoes in this country. I should like to quote a letter received from the British Columbia Potato Growers' Association, and signed by the secretary, in which he gives their opinion as to what will happen under this agreement. The letter reads:

With reference to the provisions and regulations of the new Canada and United States trade agreement, we would like to point out that as far as the province of British Columbia is concerned, it seriously affects our early potato deal. On account of the proximity and climatic advantages of the state of California, the early potato deal in British Columbia will be wiped out, especially as far as the coast is concerned.

As far as the second early and late varieties are concerned, the growers are of the opinion that if there is going to be any trade either way, the tariff should be countervailing or entirely wiped out.

We realize that in this agreement, sacrifices are made on both sides, but we consider it very unfair and too great a sacrifice on the potato growers, especially in British Columbia, where a great surplus has been produced over the past number of years, and which we have in the last three years been endeavouring to control through marketing boards.

We notice that potatoes entering the United States have an all year round duty, but although the tariff is on a sliding schedule, there are a great many provisoes protecting the American potato producer against a dump market; while we have a very short stated period, namely, June 15 to July 31 inclusive, with very little protection and no provisoes, and the dates named, June 15 to July 31, are of absolutely no value to our coast growers.

This is another band of producers called upon to pay a price. As was stated the other evening by my colleague from British Columbia, the fresh fruit and vegetable growers have been dealt another blow by the Liberal party. The attitude of the Liberal party toward this industry is too well known to need my reviewing it at this time. This is a very important industry, from the point of view not only of revenue but of employment. They have always been reasonable in their requests; all they ask is an opportunity to market their products in the Canadian market. They must have protection against the dumping of foreign fruits and vegetables during the seasons when their products are ready for the market. They are not concerned about the tariff that applies during other months in the year. One criticism that was made last season was that the application of the seasonal tariff was considerably delayed. This government has gradually reduced the protection offered during what is termed the "in-season" period. I have prepared a table showing these reductions, which I shall read. These reductions are as follows:

Vegetables	Protection
	In-season period, 1935	In-season period, 1936	In-season period, 1939
Asparagus, crate 15 lbs.	$1.23	$ .89	$ .75
Beans (green), hamper 35 lbs.	1.43	.95	.67·2
Cabbage, crate 85 lbs.	2.41	1.10	.83·8
Carrots, crate 87 lbs.	2.73	1.65	.88·4
Cauliflower, crate 40 lbs.	2.06	1.04	.76·8
Celery, crate 71 lbs.	2.13	.83	.74·1
Cucumbers, hamper 55 lbs.	2.54	1.81	1.23·5
Lettuce, crate 76 lbs.	1.90	.88	.79·6
Onions, per 100 lbs.	1.50	1.08	.95
Rhubarb, box 46 lbs.	1.50	.88	.56·6
Spinach, bushel 22 lbs.	.49½	.31	.04
Tomatoes, lug 34 lbs.	1.65	.68	.51

The in-season period has been completely removed from spinach and tomatoes and reduced on the other items. The same applies to fruits, of which I will list a few; with the in-season reduction in weeks:

	Protection in-season period			Reduction in-season period
	1935	1936	1939	in weeks
Strawberries, crate 33 lbs.	$1.65	$ .92	$ .78·3	8 to 6
Raspberries and logans	1.32	.77	.59	8 to 6
				plums
Plums and prunes, crate 26 lbs.	.51	.34	.31·6	11 to 10
				prunes
				9 to 8
Cherries, case 11 lbs.	.81	.62	.43·8	8 to 7
Pears, box 50 lbs.	1.00	.76	.67·5	22 to 15
Peaches, case 22 lbs.	.65¼	.42	.38	10 to 9

Speaking the other evening, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) used some percentages. Let me give some. The reduction in "in season" protection since 1935 ranges from 45 per cent to 92 per cent on fresh vegetables, and on fresh fruits the reduction is from 24 per cent to 67 per cent.

Some of our friends, particularly members from the prairie provinces, will suggest that, for instance, $1.65 on a crate of berries is a high tariff. They naturally add this sum to the market value and assume that the people are going to have to pay that much more for the fruit. That is not the case. I can illustrate my statement by reference to onions. It will be noticed that in 1935 the protection on onions was $1.50 per 100 pounds, a cent and a half a pound, or $30 a ton; and I can assure hon. members that in that year onions from British Columbia sold on the market in Winnipeg at from $15 to $20 a ton. They could not have reached the Winnipeg market had it not been for the protection, which might be considered high, but the people of Winnipeg did not pay any more for their onions than if they had had to depend upon the United States market.

Some benefits may be derived from this agreement, but it is my opinion, after very careful study, that it will not go very far towards correcting the conditions which exist in this country to-day. It will not go very far towards eliminating relief and unemployment as we now have them. As I say, I cannot see that the agreement will be of great benefit to Canada. I have arrived at that conclusion after studying it, not from a political point of view, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has done, but from the viewpoint of a business transaction in the interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. J. E. J. PATTERSON (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the discussion upon the resolution which is now before the house has been in progress for several days, and I do not wish unduly to prolong it. I should, however, like to examine it for a short time this evening because, I believe, it affects my native province of New Brunswick and especially because it affects the constituency of Victoria-Carleton which I represent. I wish to deal with it with reference to the items having to do with potatoes, that are so extensively grown in the counties of Victoria and Carleton, which, I believe, is the largest potato-growing area in the Dominion of Canada. These two counties have a frontage of some ninety miles along the United States boundary, and lie adjacent to the famous Aroostook county in the state of Maine, which is the largest potato growing section in the eastern states.

The farmers of this section of New Brunswick have been engaged in the production of high grade stock of table and seed potatoes for the past thirty-five years. The soil is particularly adapted to the production of this crop, and in a good growing season yields of from three hundred to three hundred and fifty and even four hundred bushels an acre are harvested. The average farmer plants from ten to twenty-five acres annually, while other farmers plant from fifty to one hundred acres, with an occasional grower planting even more. I may say that there is one man in my constituency who last year planted seven hundred and fifty acres of potatoes. So it will be seen that the successful marketing of this crop is of vital importance to this section of the province. The large quantity of potatoes harvested cannot be taken care of locally, and export markets are necessary. Export markets for our potatoes are of great importance not only to the maritimes but equally to Ontario and Quebec; for the total quantity of potatoes available in the five eastern provinces determines the price which the grower receives for his product.

The potato crop is the third most valuable crop produced in Canada, having a value in 1937, according to the Canada Year Book, of $44,000,000. Wheat and oats are the only crops of greater value, and these have a value of $204,000,000 and $110,000,000 respectively. In the maritimes the potato crop is of still greater importance, because it is practically the only cash crop and has the greatest value of any crop raised. In 1937 it amounted to $11,500,000.

Prior to 1920 we enjoyed excellent markets for our potatoes in Cuba and the United States, in addition to the Canadian market. The Cuban duty from 1904 to 1927 was 65 cents per 100 kilos—220 pounds. In 1927 this duty was changed to a seasonal one of $1 per 100 kilos from June 1 to November 30, and $2 for the balance of the year. In 1929 it was again raised to $1.50 per 100 kilos from July 1 to October 31, and $5 for the balance of the year. In 1931, this was made $5 for the whole year. Again, in 1934, there was another change from July 1 to October 31, $4 per 100 kilos, and $5 per 100 kilos for the balance of the year. Then came 1936, when this duty was doubled. From July 1 to October 31, it was made $8 per 100 kilos, and the rate for the rest of the year was $10 per 100 kilos. This applies only to table potatoes, because seed potatoes enter free of duty. What has been the result? The result is that our exports of potatoes to Cuba have fallen off from 2,303,000 bushels in 1930, with a value of $2,081,000 to 317,000 bushels in 1937, with a value of only $297,000, this being seed potatoes.

Let me now deal with the United States market. Prior to 1921 potatoes were free. In that year a duty of 25 cents a bushel was placed against them. In 1922 this was raised by the Fordney-McCumber tariff to 50 cents per 100 pounds, and again raised by the Hawley-Smoot tariff of 1930 to 75 cents per 100 pounds. This last increase made it almost impossible to gain entrance to the United States market. In 1920, New Brunswick alone had an acreage of 78,335 acres of potatoes, with a value of $10,857,000. This had fallen in 1936 to 45,100 acres of potatoes, with a value of $5,987,000. The result of these increases in the United States tariff was to lower Canadian exports from 4,928,000 bushels in 1930, with a value of $4,720,000, to only 498,000 bushels in 1935, with a value of $206,000.

With the coming into force of the Canada-United States agreement of 1935, our exports again began to increase, and in 1938 amounted to 912,000 bushels, with an increase in value to $684,000. I think it is obvious from the figures I have quoted that when the United States duties were low, our exports were high and consequently the more return the farmer had for his product. In order to get the potato situation squarely before us, I do not think I can do better than read that part of the press release which refers to potatoes.

Potatoes: The new trade agreement provides for valuable concessions on potatoes, both certified seed and table stock, which will be of great help to producers in the maritime provinces and which go much further than the concession on certified seed potatoes in the 1935 trade agreement. Whereas that agreement reduced the duty on certified seed potatoes from 75 cents to 45 cents per 100 pounds during the period March 1 to November 30 and to 60 cents during the remaining three months of the year on an annual quota of 750,000 bushels, the new trade agreement provides for the maximum reduction to 37½ cents per 100 pounds or 22½ cents per bushel on an annual quota of 1,500,000 bushels or double the tariff quota in the former agreement. The reduced rate of 37½ cents per 100 pounds will apply throughout the entire year when the United States is no longer obligated to accord to Cuban seed potatoes a preference of 50 per cent of the duty on seed potatoes imported from other countries during the three months December to February inclusive. Arrangements to be free of this obligation can be made during the course of the year 1939, so that the practical effect will be that the new reduced rate of 37½ cents per 100 pounds will come into force on March 1, 1939, but during the months of January and February, 1939, the rate of 60 cents per 100 pounds will still apply to certified seed potatoes imported from Canada.

The 1935 trade agreement contained no concession on table potatoes. The new trade agreement provides for the maximum reduction to 37½ cents per 100 pounds during the period March 1 to November 30 and a reduction to 60 cents per 100 pounds during the period December 1 to the end of February on a quota of 1,000,000 bushels, which, however, will be increased in any year in which the United States crop falls below 350,000,000 bushels by a quantity equivalent to the amount of the shortage. The reason for the maximum reduction on table potatoes being confined to the period March 1 to November 30 is that the United States has treaty commitments with Cuba which preclude a reduction below 60 cents per 100 pounds during the period December 1 to the end of February. The same consideration is not so important in the case of seed potatoes, because Cuba is not a producer of certified seed potatoes. The quota periods for both certified seed and table potatoes will commence on September 15 of each year. The rate of 37½ cents per 100 pounds is a lower duty than any imposed on Canadian potatoes imported into the United States since 1921.

I do not believe that there is any commodity which has responded more quickly to the impetus given it by this treaty than have potatoes. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), speaking in this debate on Friday last, pointed out that exports of potatoes had increased from $1,043 in January, 1938, to $141,525 in January, 1939. This agreement also provides that the quota of a million bushels for table potatoes will be increased, in any year in which the September estimate of the United States Department of Agriculture is less than 350,000,000 bushels, by a quantity equivalent to the amount of that shortage. Since the tariff quota for potatoes commences on September 15, the additional amount of the quota, if any, will be known before the quota period commences. If this arrangement had been in force during the past ten years, Canada would have enjoyed an increased quota in five years out of the last ten, because the September 1 estimate for the following years was less than 350,000,000 bushels, as follows:

Year	U.S. Sept. 1 estimate (bushels)	Amount under 350,000,000 bushels (bushels)
1929.	349,112,000	888,000
1930.	339,278,000	10,722,000
1933.	293,585,000	56,415,000
1934.	337,141,000	12,859,000
1936.	311,951,000	38,049,000

Mr. BROOKS: How many millions of bushels are produced in Canada?

Mr. PATTERSON: The crop this year was 59,600,000 bushels.

Mr. BROOKS: We could hardly have sent them 38,049,000 bushels in 1936.

Mr. PATTERSON: We would have had the opportunity at any rate.

The leader of the opposition said the other day that one county in New Brunswick could fill the quota. In the years in which the annual crop was lower than 350,000,000 bushels we would have had an unlimited market for our potatoes.

The total quantities under the 350,000,000 bushels in these five years amounted to 120,933,000 bushels, or a yearly average, for the past ten years, of 12,093,000 bushels. With a short rail haul and lower cost of production we can successfully compete with our neighbours in Maine.

Mr. BROOKS: Where did the hon. gentleman get his figures?

Mr. PATTERSON: From the tariff department in Ottawa.

The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson), speaking on this resolution the other evening, is reported on page 1196 of Hansard as having said:

> The duty on exports to the United States has been reduced from 45 cents per 100 pounds to 37½ cents—not a very material reduction. But here is the joker: it is good for only nine months. For three months—December, January and February—the exporter must pay 60 cents per 100 pounds.

While it is true that, for the present Canadian seed potatoes are entitled to the maximum reduction of 37½ cents per 100 pounds only during the period March 1 to November 30, it is believed that, as a result of negotiations now in progress between the United States and Cuba, Canadian potatoes will, from March 1, 1939, be entitled to the low rate during all months of the year up to a quota of 1,500,000 bushels per annum.

Under this treaty United States potatoes are allowed free entry into Canada except for the period from June 15 to July 31. It has been stated by some who are opposing this treaty that this will allow the United States to flood our markets. I am not one who entertains this view, for the reason that the price in Canada is nearly always lower than in the United States. From 1925 to 1938 there is not a single year that the average Canadian retail price has been higher than the average United States retail price, and this is borne out by the following figures which I have secured from the bureau of statistics:

1925..	$1 09	$2 16
1926..	2 02	2 94
1927..	1 53	2 28
1928..	1 27	1 62
1929..	1 38	1 92
1930..	1 66	2 16
1931..	89	1 44
1932..	68	1 02
1933..	92	1 38
1934..	90	1 38
1935..	77	1 14
1936..	1 24	1 92
1937..	1 15	1 68
1938..	85	1 26

I do not believe our United States neighbours will ship potatoes into Canada only to get a lower price than they command on the other side.

Canada's imports of potatoes come almost wholly from the United States and Bermuda. The United States supplies about 90 per cent of these imports. These are nearly all table potatoes, as less than 5 per cent of our imports in 1937 and 1938 were certified seed. Our largest imports of United States potatoes are during the months of June and July, and it is during this period that by the terms of this treaty we are protected by a duty of 37½ cents per 100 pounds. To substantiate this statement I give the following figures:

	Imports of table potatoes from United States		Percentage of fiscal year's imports from United States shipped during June and July per cent
	During 12 months ending March 31 100 lbs.	During June and July 100 lbs.
1931..	406,480	327,230	80
1932..	190,830	153,920	81
1933..	107,470	93,670	87
1934..	96,480	73,430	76
1935..	113,920	94,230	83
1936..	104,700	73,320	70
1937..	119,570	75,600	63
1938..	146,750	113,490	71
	*160,775	*125,610	*78

*Average imports during eight years.

June and July are the months in which we have protection, so that only 20 per cent comes in during the remaining ten months. Again, there is no doubt that a considerable portion of these imports were of a quality below the standard set for Canada grade 1. Imports of potatoes of a grade lower than Canada grade 1 have been prohibited since February 1, 1939, and this will tend to reduce the quantity of future imports.

The potato growers have also received concessions by a reduction in the duty on spraying materials. The cost of spraying is a considerable part of the cost of raising potatoes, and the reduction from 15 per cent to 7½ per cent is of considerable importance to us. Potato growers during the past few years have gone into the raising of hogs. Cull potatoes mixed with grain are used for feed. Through government assistance and cooperative marketing the production of hogs has increased 50 per cent. A reduction by this treaty in the duty on fresh pork entering the United States from 2½ cents to 1¼ cents a pound, coupled with a reduction in the Canadian duty on feed corn from 20 cents to 10 cents a bushel is also of considerable value.

The potato growers of Maine feel that we have made a good bargain. I live only a few miles from the border, and visit there frequently. Prominent potato brokers in Maine have told me that they have been "crucified" and "sold down the river." Governor Barrows charged that the tariff concessions discriminated against them, and Senator Frazier of North Dakota said he was "satisfied the new trade pacts will be of no advantage to farmers." In any trade agreement the parties to the contract, in order to secure concessions, must give concessions. Coming from New Brunswick, I believe that we have received worth while concessions, even more than we had hoped to receive. In addition to potatoes we received valuable concessions on lumber and fish, but the discussion of these I shall leave to other members from the maritimes who are more familiar with them.

Taking the agreement as a whole, Canada received concessions on 202 items of the United States tariff. In 1937 the value of Canadian exports under these items amounted to $327,505,484, compared with total exports to the United States of $394,240,823, or 83 per cent of Canada's sales to the United States. Dutiable goods to the value of $156,232,137 were exported to the United States in 1937. This agreement contains concessions on 170 dutiable items covering exports to the United States in 1937 of $124,825,174, or 80 per cent of the exports of dutiable goods.

In conclusion, I quote from the December issue of Canadian Business:

> Fishermen in the maritime provinces would not believe those who assured them they would get worth while concessions on cod and haddock. Potato growers in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island smiled when they were told easier access with larger quotas would be given them.
> The maritime provinces, with all their misgivings, got much more than they expected.
> Even more incredulous were the lumber operators. They were a downcast lot of men up to the day the new agreement was published. They would not believe anything could be done for them. The virtual embargo against their products, through the marking regulation, imposed by act of congress had during the two months of its operation—September and October—drastically cut their exports, and they could not believe President Roosevelt, especially in view of the congressional election results, would meddle with a congressional law.
> But overnight their dismay was dispelled. The marking regulation is rescinded, and to top it all the quotas on British Columbia fir and hemlock are extended, also the valuable quota on red cedar shingles is enlarged, so night has become a sunny day for the lumber people whose exports have become a big factor in Canada's external trade.

I should like to read one paragraph from a letter of Mr. W. B. Greeley, secretary-manager of the West Coast Lumbermen's Association, dated at Seattle, November 19, 1938:

> It is still more incomprehensible that the American government should remove the quota on Canadian fir and hemlock; should waive the requirement for marking imported lumber; and should remove the present shingle quota pending action by congress on a shingle tariff. Canada has simply driven another good bargain preying upon the free trade proclivities of the administration. I am very greatly disappointed by this outcome of our efforts.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that there is no constituency in the maritimes that will benefit so much from this treaty as will Victoria-Carleton. Being within easy access of the large markets in Boston, New York and other large United States centres, and being able to produce finest quality potatoes at less cost than our Aroostook county neighbours, we shall be able to compete with them successfully in these large markets. I am also convinced that if the farmers of Victoria-Carleton had their choice, whether to accept the 1935 agreement or the one of 1938, they would unhesitatingly choose the present one, and I, as their representative, propose to vote for the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, earlier this evening we heard from the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Fleming), a fellow-member from Saskatchewan. I was interested in listening to him because I expected he would try to point out how this treaty would benefit his constituency and the electors whom he represents. But he did not offer one really constructive argument in favour of the treaty. He indulged in flights of oratory, and I wish to congratulate him upon his ability in that respect. Then he told us one or two things. He referred to this treaty as a baby born unto this government. I think possibly it had two parents, one of them being the United States government and the other this government, but which was father and which was mother I do not care. But the hon. member, being a doctor, might have told us. Speaking figuratively, in medical terms, I would say that this baby was conceived in iniquity, born in depression, and that it will die in disgrace of its parents.

One other thing the hon. member told us, and that was that he does not want an election this year. Then in one of his flights of oratory he threatened this government that if they did not smash the implement combine—I suppose he was referring to the combine in prices—the people would smash this government. I would ask him to recall the bold statement that was made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) during last session, I think it was, in which he threatened the implement companies as to what would happen if they did not do such and such a thing. But nothing happened. Now we have the threat of the hon. member for Humboldt to-night. I might tell the house that following the threats of the Minister of Agriculture against the implement industry, the province of Saskatchewan has now inaugurated an inquiry similar to those which took place in this house in 1937 and 1938. They have the same counsel, and I trust they will get more out of that inquiry than we did in this parliament. The whole speech of the hon. member was an admission of failure on the part of this government.

This trade agreement, Mr. Speaker, is far-reaching in its effects. It may change the whole fiscal policy of Canada, and it should be very carefully considered from the point of view of how it will affect the whole of Canada.

But first I should like to recall that the 1935 trade treaty with the United States was made after the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had paid a visit to Washington and stayed overnight with President Roosevelt, after which he returned and the agreement was signed. But that treaty did not improve conditions in Canada, as we had been led, during the discussion in the house, to believe it would. If one reviews the trade figures of exports and imports for the first ten months of last year, compared with the corresponding months of 1937, one will find that there was a decrease in both exports and imports, and we were heading for an adverse trade balance, which would be detrimental to this country. That treaty did not do what we had been led to expect it would.

The present treaty has been conceived a little differently. The Prime Minister has told us that negotiations were carried on from February last to November 17 last, when the treaty was signed. I asked, what was the cause of the delay? I am credibly informed that the delegates from the United Kingdom and from Canada had to wait for weeks at a time, while the United States delegates consulted with representatives of American industry of all kinds whose business was likely to be affected by the agreements. Why was not Canadian industry consulted in the same manner and given the same consideration? I would ask this government to explain why the live stock industry of Canada was not consulted and given an apportunity of saying whether it was in favour of Mexico enjoying a portion of the quota we have on cattle. Why were not the wheat growers of western Canada, and the pools and the grain exchange consulted with respect to our six cent preference on wheat in the British market? I think that would have been only fair.

The Prime Minister dealt at great length, in introducing this resolution, on the gesture of goodwill that the treaty implied, and the good effect it would have on peace, harmony and unity. But I know, Mr. Speaker, what is in the minds of the western producers, and when they come to consider this treaty from that point of view they will look upon that argument as just so much eyewash. I believe the west is the hardest hit, if I may use that term, of any part of Canada by this agreement. When we have had good relations with the United States for the last forty or fifty years, or more, to suggest that now, after we have made many concessions to the United States, there will be any more harmony or unity between our two countries—well, I do not think the farmer of western Canada will swallow that.

I desire to consider this trade agreement, first, from the point of view of the price we pay for the proposed wider markets we are to have, and, second, from the point of view of how it will affect our domestic market.

Let me say at the outset that naturally a great majority of the people in the west are inclined to favour lower tariffs, and would receive with pleasure any reduction which would mean a lower price on the goods we have to purchase. But I believe the western producer is fair to the extent that he does not desire any benefit at the expense of his fellow Canadian. That is the way in which we are prepared to view the question. I believe in these matters of trade and commerce, and industry, we in western Canada are fairer than we are given credit for. That, however, is the way we feel at this time.

In the past three years we have had some experience in these tariff matters. For instance, we know that during the Bennett regime the duty on implements was increased. It will be recalled that a deal was made with the manufacturers. They signed on the dotted line that they would not increase the price if they got protection, and we saw lower prices. But when this government took office, two reductions in tariffs took place, reducing the rate from 25 per cent to 7½ per cent, and we have seen three major increases in prices. The proof of the pudding is in the eating.

When the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) speaks—and he is the only free trader in the house, I believe—he always keeps away from any article of vital importance. He does not refer to those articles in every-day and practical use in western Canada. His reference the other night to dates was so ridiculous that it was not funny. Certainly no great importance could be attached to the comparisons he made respecting items which would affect our trade.

When introducing the resolution, the Prime Minister referred to concessions which would be of benefit to western Canada. He said that concessions affecting the prairies were received on cattle, swine, poultry, fish, lumber and feed. Saskatchewan produces only a small quantity of lumber, but may I say that there is a concession respecting white spruce which I am pleased to see. It may help that industry in the northern parts of Saskatchewan and Alberta. We may be a little selfish, but we know the effect may be that of increasing the price to the farmer who is to-day in a position to make repairs to his buildings, or to build new ones. In certain parts of the province buildings are in a bad state of repair. If the cost of repairing is increased, the change will, of course, not be received favourably.

May I say a word with respect to fish. The fishing industry can be developed in Saskatchewan. There are fresh water lakes teeming with fish in the northern part of the province. I am informed, in a letter I received the other day, that at the present time thousands of pounds of fish are piled up on the shores, and there is no outlet for the catch. I suggest that the government would do well to take this matter into consideration and to see that some outlet is provided, even if the federal government has to go to the extent of taking up the matter with the provincial government. The fishermen are in straitened circumstances.

The treaty may offer some benefits to the poultry producers; I shall not take time to go into that matter. I regret, however, that we are losing our position in the British market. I recall that in 1932 a trial shipment from Saskatchewan, or one which was made up principally from that province, was received favourably on the British market. I should have liked to see that market developed.

It is scarcely necessary for me to repeat some of the arguments which have already been made with respect to cattle. The agreement is not satisfactory in its manner of operation in this connection. The fact that Mexico shares in the quota makes the whole market very uncertain.

Mr. EULER: It did before.

Mr. PERLEY: Well, I will say this, that there was not one farmer out of a hundred in western Canada—yes, I will say even that there was not more than one member in twenty-five in this house—who knew the quota was to be shared with Mexico. The word never was used. It came like a bolt from the blue to the farmers out west when they learned only recently that Mexico was to share in the quota. One man in my constituency wrote me a letter before the statement was made by the Minister of Agriculture in reply to the question by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn). The letter in question was from a shipper in my constituency whose shipment had arrived at Winnipeg the morning the announcement was made that the quota had been filled. The price was down from one and a half to two cents, and he lost about $500 on the car of cattle. Certainly that man will not forget what the quota has meant to the cattle industry. If I had time I could place on record letters I have received from other shippers who had been advised to withhold their cattle because the quota had been filled.

The duty is now at three cents, and will remain there until April 1, at which time there will be a further opportunity to fill the quota. No doubt at that time there will be a rush from both Mexico and Canada. There can be no doubt that we were not properly informed with respect to that part of the agreement. I would say further that in connection with cattle the Minister of Agriculture should direct his attention to the cattle industry in Saskatchewan. In 1937-38, as a result of the policy adopted by the government in providing relief feed and fodder for cattle, we were dealt a blow. Rules and regulations were set up whereby in certain areas a farmer could not retain more than four female animals. That factor has worked to the detriment of our farmers, and is a blow from which we shall not readily recover in many years. It takes quite a while to produce a steer; in fact, it takes three years to produce one fit for shipment. The west could not supply the quantity it could have supplied in normal times, even if we had the whole quota of 225,000 head to work on. I may say, however, that in normal times prior to the depression and the drought conditions which have affected the prairie provinces, in Saskatchewan alone we could have supplied one-half of the quota, as it stands to-day, Mexico having its share.

From what we have been able to learn, after watching operations in the first month of the first quarter, Canada will supply only three-quarters of one per cent of the total slaughter in the United States in one year. That certainly is not a very great amount.

Let me now say a word with respect to the important question of wheat. I shall try to deal with three or four matters in particular which affect the people in the west, and shall leave other matters in connection with industry to hon. members from eastern Canada. Under the 1932 agreements we enjoyed a preference of six cents in the British market. That was a preference in a sheltered market of 40,000,000 people. It is claimed by some hon. members supporting the government that this preference was never of any great value to us. On that point, however, I prefer to take the views of United States authorities who, after consultation with their growers, saw fit, the day following the signing of the agreement, to issue this press release:

> Wheat: The granting of duty-free treatment for wheat by the United Kingdom should prove of marked value to American wheat growers and the American wheat export trade. The import duty on non-empire wheat has been at the rate of 2 shillings per 480 pounds since November 17, 1932. A duty of this size (about six cents per bushel) applicable to wheat from some countries and not others often is sufficient to divert the trade. . . .
> The United Kingdom is the leading wheat import market of the world. Formerly about a fourth of the total American wheat exports were regularly shipped to the United Kingdom. Under the influence of the world economic depression and the establishment of an import duty in 1932 (with empire wheat remaining duty-free), imports of American wheat into the United Kingdom dropped from 39,267,000 bushels in 1930 (20·1 per cent of total wheat imports) to only 9,000 bushels in 1933 (less than 0·05 per cent of the total), while imports from empire sources for the corresponding years rose from 79,234,000 bushels (40·5 per cent of total wheat imports) to 140,459,000 bushels (67·0 per cent of the total).
> Owing to the droughts of 1934 and 1936, the United States was not in a position to supply its normal share of the United Kingdom wheat market requirements, even had there been no tariff on American wheat. In 1937, however, with a normal wheat crop, the United States supplied 6,485,000 bushels of wheat to the United Kingdom, representing 3·6 per cent of total wheat imports of the United Kingdom for that year. In view of the large wheat surplus this year in the United States and the probability that the United States will continue to be on a wheat export basis in the future, the removal of the competitive disadvantage which confronted our wheat in the United Kingdom should facilitate recovery of a larger share of that market.

Then, in connection with oatmeal, rolled and flaked oats, they say this:

> The reduction to 5s. (a reduction of one-third) from the present duty of 7s. 6d. per hundredweight on these products should help to restore a substantial part of the former American share in the United Kingdom market for oatmeal.

Mr. CRERAR: What is my hon. friend reading from?

Mr. PERLEY: It is a press release by the Department of Commerce, Washington, dated November 18, following the signing of the agreement on November 17. I would prefer to take that rather than the statements which have been quoted here. According to that statement, the United Kingdom was receiving only 9,000 bushels from the United States, but immediately following the signing of these treaties, the United States got busy and sold 20,000,000 bushels in January alone. That was the first sale they made. I have under my hand a report stating that they sold 5,000,000 bushels later on. The language used here is interesting. They say, "Here is another substantial portion of the self-imposed wheat export quota of 100,000,000 bushels." I have not heard any member of the government explain why that term is used, but we may get an explanation later on. However, they did sell an additional 5,000,000 bushels and price was no consideration. They sold at a very low price, and I am informed that the British authorities were a little upset about the matter. This sale had the effect of really breaking the market. Not only did they have the six cent advantage, but they went a little lower and broke the price by two cents.

Mr. EULER: Does the hon. member not know that just before, the British government bought some 25,000,0000 bushels of wheat from Roumania?

Mr. PERLEY: I suppose that country knew the treaty was likely to come into force, and they tried to make a sale. Roumania, Argentina and Russia will all be offering wheat. In effect, they will be dumping on the market. The British authorities are subsidizing their domestic producers, and every time the price is forced down a cent because of supplies thrown on the market, it means another cent to be taken out of the treasury for the domestic producer.

Mr. EULER: They bought wheat so that they could sell some goods of their own, a quite natural procedure.

Mr. PERLEY: We will see how much goods we sell. I would ask for an explanation of that "self-imposed" statement. It would seem the United States have subsidized 100,000,000 bushels. I should like to know why we did not get some concession in the United States market when we gave them that concession. We might have been able to export a little grain to the United States, but their duty remains at 42 cents a bushel, compared with our duty of 12 cents a bushel. There is a reduction on feed grain, when not used for food purposes. I have an inquiry which will appear on the order paper to-morrow with respect to certain imports into Canada from the United States, in connection with which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) will probably be getting some information.

I should like to give a picture of Canada's position in the empire market over a period of years. I have here a statement which with the permission of the house, I should like to place on Hansard. It contains a compilation of figures covering the period 1924 to 1937, showing the imports into the United Kingdom market. The statement is as follows:

The following table shows for the calendar years 1924-37 the percentage of total United Kingdom wheat imports supplied by Canada, Australia, the United States and Argentina, together with the percentage of total imports supplied by all empire countries and all foreign countries. The percentages have been calculated from the imports shown by the United Kingdom trade returns, and it might be pointed out that in the earlier years the imports from the United States included some Canadian wheat shipped via United States ports, while imports from Canada included some United States wheat shipped via St. Lawrence ports.

Calendar years	Canada Per cent	Australia Per cent	United States Per cent	Argentina Per cent	Total British countries Per cent	Total foreign countries Per cent
1925	30·6	16·8	27·4	12·3	55·1	44·9
1926	37·1	9·5	32·4	12·4	49·4	50·6
1927	29·1	13·4	32·3	17·6	47·1	52·9
1928	39·6	9·9	22·8	23·6	51·0	49·0
1929	24·3	11·5	19·9	40·6	36·0	64·0
1930	25·0	12·1	20·1	14·5	40·5	59·5
1931	22·7	19·5	9·4	17·4	42·6	57·4
1932	44·4	22·8	4·4	19·5	67·2	32·8
1933	40·6	26·1	0·0	22·0	67·0	33·0
1934	34·8	21·1	0·0	34·2	56·1	43·9
1935	36·4	17·5	0·6	22·5	54·1	45·9
1936	57·4	23·1	0·0	0·9	83·7	16·3
1937	35·4	23·1	3·6	16·0	65·4	34·6

This statement shows that in the last fourteen year period we have averaged 35½ per cent, and in one year, 1936, we went as high as 57·4 per cent. This shows that the United Kingdom have been consistently taking our wheat.

Mr. CRERAR: Those figures are for wheat?

Mr. PERLEY: For wheat. In the last seven years the United States percentage has averaged only 2½ per cent, with nothing at all for three of those years. We have occupied a consistent position in that market. I have another table here showing the exports from Canada to all countries for the same period. I should like to place this on the record for the information of hon. members

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. PERLEY: This covers the same fourteen year period and it is a very interesting statement.

Mr. EULER: What is it about?

Mr. PERLEY: It is from the bureau of statistics.

Mr. EULER: With regard to wheat only?

Mr. PERLEY: With regard to wheat only. The statement is as follows:

*Wheat only. The United States government discontinued compiling the detailed record of the exports of Canadian grain via United States ports. Only wheat is shown and the figures are approximations.

These figures show that we have shared in their market consistently, especially when considered on a percentage basis. I should like to take the time to quote figures showing imports into the United Kingdom from all countries during the last twenty years, but briefly they show that the United Kingdom imports have been consistent, the decrease in the last few years being less than five per cent. These figures show that the United Kingdom has been a stable market for our wheat. We all recognize that wheat is practically Canada's life-blood, and the finding of a market for this commodity is an all-important problem.

In order to show the seriousness of the present situation, I should like to recite what I consider to be a most amazing situation with respect to wheat. We are in a period at the present time as regards marketing and prices which is comparable with only one other period since world markets for wheat came into being. The period I refer to is the three years from 1930 to 1933. I am not going to take time to quote all the figures in this connection, which I have from the statistics issued by the Food Research Institute of the United States, but I will abbreviate them a little. The situation in 1933 was that the world's carry-over of wheat was the greatest ever known prior to that date. Excluding Russia and China, it had reached 1,132,000,000 bushels. In the crop year 1932-33 prices of wheat for export dropped to the lowest point, absolutely and relatively, ever recorded in the world's wheat markets since those markets existed. I would like hon. members to realize that situation. We had the highest carry-over and we had the lowest prices. On the other hand, during the same period, 1932-33, to consumers in the importing countries prices were very high. To-day we have a similar amazing situation. Reports from the institute I mentioned show the markets for 1938 and 1939 are exactly as I have recited in respect of the period, 1930 to 1933. In eight European countries, namely Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Switzerland and Sweden, the consumption of wheat in the last three years is averaged at 959,000,000 bushels a year. In other words, they have slightly increased their consumption during this period. Their domestic price, which is a subsidized one, is very high. I might figure it out in this way. In these eight countries that I have mentioned, taking the period 1909 to 1914 as giving the base index of 100, we find, in comparing prices in these countries, that the indices for recent years are as follows:

1931 to 1932	120
1932 to 1933	113
1937 to 1938	115

These, of course, take into account subsidized prices ranging from $1.47 to nearly $2, in some instances, in these countries. On the other side of the picture consider Canada and the United States. Taking 1909 to 1914 as furnishing the base index figure of 100, we have at the present time a price averaging only 58 to 60 by comparison with the previous period. This shows that the importing countries are consuming more than the average and that the price is above the average, while exporting countries are producing more and are exporting less, at a lower price. I think we shall all agree that these figures show a critical and amazing situation. Now that I have quoted those figures, who on the government side will dare to argue that the six cent preference in the British market was not of great value in this amazing world situation? No wonder, I say, that the grain merchants of the world state that the policy pursued by this government, through the wheat board of whose operations they were in control, has created a buyer's paradise. I may be able to refer in more detail to this position upon a future occasion. Grain merchants have also made this statement, that the present government is not trying to resist price decline; they are not doing what the Bennett government did from 1930 to 1935 under McFarland's operations, when they persistently resisted price decline, and not only that, were successful in stabilizing prices. True enough, the Bennett government made great accumulations of wheat prior to 1935, but they did this country a service when they stabilized the price; and after they accumulated a surplus the present government sold it, according to a statement tabled yesterday by the minister, at a profit of $24,000,000.

Mr. EULER: And my hon. friends plainly violated the Wheat Board Act by not offering wheat for sale.

Mr. PERLEY: They offered wheat consistently according to the judgment of the board. The first board was only in operation a month or so; when the government changed and the Murray board was put in, it was a fire sale that they undertook for this government. They could not sell it fast enough to take a loss, and they had to take a profit.

Mr. EULER: Pure luck!

Mr. PERLEY: Well, it is a good job we had the luck. The Minister of Agriculture, speaking the other night, I think on the address, stated that the foregoing of the preference that we enjoyed had nothing to do with the diversion of wheat from Canadian ports to United States ports. I would prefer to take the opinion of the United States state department as given in a press release. I shall quote briefly what they said with respect to shipments through Canadian and United States ports.

> The concession of free entry for American wheat should benefit also the American transportation and port business. In order to obtain the benefits of the United Kingdom preference, Canadian wheat, which formerly moved in large quantities through American ports has under the preference been shipped principally to the United Kingdom direct from Canadian ports. In view of this concession, American port and transportation interests will be in a position to reenter the transshipment business.

Again I prefer to take that statement as to how it affects the shipments.

I should like to recall another interesting matter. Taking a million bushels of wheat from Fort William or Port Arthur, shipping it in Canadian bottoms down the lakes through Canadian elevators, unloading and reloading, shipping it down the St. Lawrence to Canadian terminals, then on through Canadian channels to Saint John and Halifax and out to Europe—all these operations involve a cost of ten cents a bushel. It is estimated that this operation means, for Canadian shipping interests, elevator interests, payments of harbour and port fees, and labour, one hundred thousand dollars, and more than half of that is represented by labour. Consider what that means to Canadian industry, labour and shipping; consider what it means in loss to them when we forego that advantage. I have heard over the radio, as I suppose all hon. members have, "The Shadow Knows." I say, the farmer knows and you cannot tell the farmer of western Canada that when his grain is directed through Canadian ports it does not mean something to him in the end, when 50 per cent of the cost is labour; for that means that Canadian labour will be fed with our bacon, pork and butter and cheese.

Mr. EULER: I am sorry to interrupt my hon. friend, but may I ask him whether he knows that as much as fifty million bushels of grain of various kinds have come through Canadian ports, consigned to the United States?

Mr. PERLEY: From Canadian ports to United States ports?

Mr. EULER: Through Canadian ports to United States destinations.

Mr. PERLEY: Yes, that is fine. My answer to that is this, that there are international interests in this grain business, the Big Three, which the minister should know something about. They are considered by the grain interests and the producers of western Canada to be the greatest chiselers in the market; until you eliminate them, ruination is written on the map. These men direct Canadian grain through United States ports, where they can chisel on rates, harbour fees and everything; that is what they are doing. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) could tell us a story about it if he were in the house to-night. You cannot tell the western farmer that we are not gaining anything while our grain is going through Canadian ports.

Western farmers are interested in the dairy business to quite a considerable extent. As I must hurry, I cannot take as much time as I should like to do on this phase of the agreement. The constituency of Qu'Appelle could supply about four times the amount of milk that is provided for in this quota, and it would be only one-fifth of a pint of milk and one-tenth of a pint of cream to each American once a year; that is not very much.

I am leaving to members from other parts of Canada the discussion of the effects of this treaty upon industry. They can set out their case. But from what I have learned with respect to vegetables, fruits and other commodities of that kind, I think there is very little in this agreement for us. We appreciate the fact that the main market is the domestic one. When we consider that 95 per cent of all our primary products, apart from wheat, are consumed in Canada, surely we must realize the importance of maintaining our position in the domestic market. The farmers of the west realize that. They know that if they can supply foodstuffs to workmen in the constituency of Waterloo, engaged in the manufacture of machinery for western Canada, that is better than importing products from Japan or from the south, because those workmen are eating Canadian butter, cheese, pork and so on.

The position we take in western Canada is this. We want to be fair. We do not want any advantages at the expense of any one Canadian. But I should like this government to show us—I have not been able to get it from any of the arguments that have been put forward—whereby this treaty will mean a single job more to any Canadian. The people of Canada are demanding something worth while, but the government have not shown that one young Canadian will get a job through this treaty.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his time has expired.

Mr. PERLEY: I have been interrupted once or twice and I should like to finish.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. PERLEY: There is nothing in this treaty that will encourage any young farmer in the west to remain on the land, get married and establish a home. To my mind these treaties are dangerous. They make for competition in the marketing of some of our primary products, and while there may be a few advantages, the disadvantages materially outweigh them.

In conclusion, I should like to quote an opinion expressed by the President of the United States, who is a pretty good authority. Speaking to the American Farm Bureau at Chicago, he said:

> Agriculture, far from being crucified by this agreement, as some have told you, actually gains from it. We export more agriculture products to Canada than we have imported from her. We shall continue to do so, for the very simple reason that the United States with its larger area of agricultural land, its more varied climate and its vastly greater population produces far more of most agricultural products, including animal products, vegetables and fruits, than does Canada. In the case of the few reductions that have been made, quota limitations are set on the amount that may be brought in at the lower rates.
> On the other side of the picture we believe, and most unbiased men believe, that the general increase in our trade with Canada, including the exports of our factories, will so add to the purchasing power of hundreds of thousands of wage earners that they will be able to spend far more than they do to-day for the products of our own farms, our own forests and our own fisheries. Greater trade is merely another word for more production and more employment. The proof of this particular pudding is in the eating; the best way to judge the new accord is to observe how it works out.

Mr. VITAL MALLETTE (Jacques Cartier) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the house is discussing to-night the resolution introduced by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) which appears on page 8 of to-day's order paper, under No. 15, and reads as follows:

> That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 17th day of November, 1938, between Canada and the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

As this resolution deals with the principle of the treaty rather than with the treaty itself, I shall restrict myself to a discussion of its general principles, leaving the pleasant and interesting task of reviewing its details to the time when the treaty itself will be submitted to the house after the passing of the present resolution.

I shall be telling nothing new to my hon. colleagues when I proclaim that the Liberal doctrine, the policy of the Liberal party of Canada, has always been to seek the improvement of Canada's trade with the whole world.

Being a producing nation—more accurately, an over-producing one—we must naturally find markets for our surplus production of all kinds. The country therefore finds itself in the same position as an ordinary manufacturer who produces more goods than his regular customers can absorb. Such a manufacturer would naturally seek new markets. He would increase his advertising and extend his field of action. Therein lies the very reason for our commercial agreement with the United States.

There used to be advocates of absolute free trade, but ever since the free movement of goods from one country to another has been impeded by customs duties, quotas and restrictions of all kinds, the theory of absolute free trade has undergone substantial modification.

All Liberal administrations have been in favour of better commercial relations with the United States. They have attempted negotiations on many occasions. Those of 1910 and 1911 were on the point of working out satisfactorily for the people of Canada who believed in that sort of policy, but at the general elections of 1911, conducted by the Liberal party on the issue of reciprocity with the United States, the Nationalist opponents of the Laurier government directed a violent campaign against that government on the question of a Canadian navy. The Tories of the time were clever enough to take advantage of the diversion caused by the Nationalist element in the province of Quebec.

The battle-cry of the Tories throughout that election campaign was "No truck or trade with the Yankees," This slogan, which they have kept to the present day, is worth about as much as their other one—"King and chaos."

The Laurier government was not exactly overthrown on account of the opposition of the Canadian people to greater trade relations with the United States; but on account of a conjunction of circumstances which brought about the union of two different groups opposed to the Laurier government for two different reasons, a union which nevertheless resulted in the defeat of the government.

I have often heard expressions of regret about that incident which had an unfortunate effect on the commercial development of Canada. But the Tories had taken such a firm stand during the electoral campaign that they were forced, when they took power, to stick to their word and the dream of better trade relations with the United States vanished for a long time.

It goes without saying that the Canadian people wanted better relations. I could hardly find a better proof of it than the fact that the Bennett government, the most markedly Tory government which we have had for a long time, entered into negotiations with the United States to that end.

A few days before the election of 1935, I think, Right Hon. Mr. Bennett admitted that, if he were returned to power, his government would sign a trade agreement with the United States. That is proof enough of the desire of the Canadian people to broaden and tighten their trade relations with the United States.

The Bennett government had apparently done much work to that end, since the present government was able to sign the agreement with the United States just a few weeks after taking over the administration of the country.

Of course, such a view is not unanimously held by our friends of the Tory party, because quite a number of them would like to build a kind of Chinese tariff wall around Canada, a kind of magic wall which would let Canadian goods out, but would not let in goods from any other country.

That is an absolutely illogical view, because after all trade cannot be but an exchange of goods, and, although use is made of money for statistical purposes, the whole process ends in the sending of goods from one country to others and vice versa.

[Mr. Mallette.]

One of the speakers for the Tories asserted the other day his desire to maintain the standard of living of our workers. In order to achieve that purpose, he wanted to protect them from foreign competition. Well, the fiercest opponents of the present resolution would admit that the standard of living of our neighbours to the south is comparable to that of any other nation in the world. Therefore, such an argument has not much worth. Our political opponents are always speaking about protecting our producers. We share that sentiment. We wish to protect our producers in every branch and we also wish to protect the consumers in every branch, because if there is a forgotten man in the political program of the Tories it is the consumer. The Liberal doctrine, representing the happy medium, takes into account the consumer as well as the producer, for if the consumer has no money to pay for his purchases there will be nothing for the producer.

Only yesterday, one of the opposition speakers complained of the lowering of a 40 per cent duty.

Can it be, Mr. Speaker, that there are Canadian industries which cannot meet United States competition without a tariff protection of 40 per cent? Are those the industries which the Tory party wishes to protect? The people will have their say in the matter the next time they go to the polls.

It will perhaps be useful to hear what a few experts think of the new trade agreement. Speaking on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I quoted the opinions, all favourable to the treaty, of the presidents of the Bank of Montreal, of La. Banque Canadienne Nationale and of La Banque Provinciale. Let us see now what the president of the Bank of Nova Scotia thinks of it. I quote from the Ottawa Journal of January 27, 1939:

(Text)

The importance of the new trade agreements

Canada's ability to take advantage of what further recovery may occur to the south of the border will no doubt be increased by the second Canada-United States trade agreement, which was recently concluded in Washington, together with the associated agreement between the United States and Great Britain. The Canada-United States treaty increases the concessions made by both countries under the agreement of three years ago, and is broadened to include tariff reductions on a large number of items which were not covered in the earlier arrangement. Canada secured a variety of new concessions, the most important of which were on products of the farm and of the fisheries.

There can be no doubt that the three-cornered trade agreement between the United States, Great Britain and Canada was the greatest achievement in reducing trade barriers since the onset of the depression. Unlike many previous treaties, the method of giving preferential treatment through raising tariffs against other countries was not utilized. Every change in the tariff schedules of the three nations, and there were a great many of them, represented a reduction. And through the provision of most favoured nation treatment all these reductions were automatically extended to other countries. While admittedly the new arrangements have resulted in some weakening in the preferential system of the Ottawa agreements, they should do much to encourage trade between the empire and other members of the sterling "bloc" on the one hand and the United States on the other.

That is what the president of the Bank of Nova Scotia said. Then I turned to the annual report of the Dominion Bank and read with great care what the president had to say, and also the general manager. And, believe it or not, there was not a single reference to the treaty. They must be satisfied with it, or at least have no fear of it; they did not even refer to it.

Then the Banque Canadienne—Nationale—and this is something which came in just this morning—say in their monthly letter for February, 1939:

Le nouveau traité de commerce avec la République voisine, qui abaisse les droits ou élargit les contingentements relatifs à un grand nombre de nos produits dont la vente est en régression, aura sur notre commerce d'exportation une influence stimulante dont les effets se révèlent déjà.

I am inclined to think that some hon. members may not read my speech in the translation to-morrow, so I shall translate this myself right away. They say that the new commercial treaty with the neighbouring republic which lowers the customs duties and increases quotas on a large number of our products of which the sale at the moment is diminishing, will have upon our export trade a stimulating influence of which the effects are already revealing themselves.

I have quoted banks. Let us now hear what labour, the other member of the family, has to say about this treaty. This is from the memorandum presented to this government by the All-Canadian Congress of Labour on January 6, 1939, published in the January issue of the Canadian Unionist:

Canada's tariff policy.

The congress joins with the government and the people of Canada in the hope that the trade treaties negotiated with the United States and Great Britain will be mutually advantageous. It is recognized that any arrangements for the extension of trade between the nations involve adjustments within the nations themselves, but so long as the general welfare of the people is the primary consideration, it is felt that the producers and industries concerned should endeavour to cooperate in the effort to increase the exchange of goods and services. In its relationships with other nations, however, the congress believes that trade considerations should not be permitted to influence the government where the fundamental issue of the maintenance of democracy may be involved.

So there you have both capital and labour in favour of this treaty. If I were to seek other backing for my argument I would quote the hon. member for London, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion). Many hon. members have quoted his book, Life is an Adventure. I do not own a copy of the book, because the price is out of reach of the proletariat, of which I am a member. But I thought I could borrow it from the parliamentary library, and on February 9 of this year I put in my request for a copy of the book. I was told that, although the library owns eight copies, none was available for me at the moment. I should not underline the words "for me," because there were others waiting for the book. It should please the hon. gentleman and his editor to know that at the present moment, although the parliamentary library owns eight copies of the book, there is a waiting list of hon. members wanting to get it.

Mr. HEAPS: And that is only the parliamentary library!

Mr. MALLETTE: Yes. The three members ahead of me should have their names on Hansard, because my request dates back to February 9. They are the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. McDonald), the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Francoeur), and the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. McLean). I could not get the book to quote from it, but thank the Lord that in the speech of the hon. gentleman on February 17, as reported in Hansard of that date at page 1047, appear a couple of paragraphs which are extremely encouraging to those of us who think we should have closer relations with the United States. I quote from the speech of the hon leader of the opposition:

There are two chief reasons why Canada must trade with other countries. In the first place we have a huge area, a small population and rich resources, out of which we produce large quantities of raw materials which must be exported. We do not consume all of them ourselves. That, in the first place, compels us to trade with other countries. Secondly, we are a debtor nation.

And further:

In addition to all that, there is a third reason why we must trade. There are certain kinds of products which we cannot produce—tea, coffee, rubber, cotton and even, apparently, wool, though we should, to my mind, be able to produce sufficient wool; I have said that in the house many times. We do not produce oranges—

There are plenty in Ontario:

—and other citrus fruits, and so on. So we are compelled to trade.

So the hon. gentleman advances three good reasons in support of our contention, and I think I am in very good company in quoting him in this instance because I have a high regard for his political sagacity.

We hear so much about our trade with the United States; what is its importance anyway? I have gone to the Canada Year Book, English edition, 1938, and I have extracted a string of figures which I will inflict on the house, if they insist, but I would gladly put them on Hansard, Mr. Speaker, if I am permitted to do so.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman cannot put them on Hansard unless he reads them, except with the unanimous consent of the house. Do I understand that the hon. member has unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MALLETTE: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, because it would have taken me ten minutes to read them. They are as follows:

There is only one more item, another argument in support of our contention which appeared in La Presse of November 19, 1938, two days after November 17, when the treaty was signed. It says:

"We may now expect our small fruits to be exported to the United States," says J. H. Lavoie, director of the provincial service of horticulture in the province of Quebec.

That is very nice coming from the government of Quebec, and there would have been many more in favour of the treaty had the government of that province entertained towards this government a more Christian attitude. But that was the only encouragement we got from that source.

A great deal of fun has been poked at the Prime Minister's use of the word "appeasement" in connection with this trade treaty; but hon. gentlemen who are not too busy might look up the Gazette, published in Montreal, a very good newspaper which has this headline on its front page in this morning's issue, "Chamberlain hopes to weld peace by trade." I admit that the old gentleman with the umbrella, may not always score one hundred per cent, but he makes a terribly good showing. Speaking at Blackburn, England, he is reported to have made this statement, which I will put on Hansard for the benefit of my Tory friends and other unbelievers:

It may well be that this approach by way of trade in which we have a common interest may turn out to be the best and quickest way of bringing about a better understanding between our two countries.

A great many statistics have been put on Hansard in this debate. I have been guilty of putting a few on myself. There is much to be said for statistics, but perhaps I may be permitted to tell a little anecdote which undoubtedly members of the house will appreciate.

A few years ago, in a moment of patriotic fervour, I joined the Montreal Canadian club. I have paid my fee every year since, and I am still a member in good standing.

With me it became almost a part of my religion to attend the Canadian club luncheon at the Windsor hotel, on Peel street, Montreal, nearly every Monday, the day of their weekly luncheon, and I remember that on one occasion the guest was Mr. Philip Kerr, who I think now adorns the House of Lords in England as Lord Lothian. At the beginning of his speech—I do not want to shock the ears of any member—he said that in his opinion there were three kinds of lies, and he enumerated them as follows: Lies, damned lies, and statistics. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that those are my views too.

The King government has therefore, in negotiating a broader trade agreement with the United States, once more upheld the true interests of Canada, thereby achieving a diplomatic and commercial success for which the country will be grateful.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) in the course of his remarks disposed, almost in an aside, of the importance of the concessions that are being granted by this trade treaty to thirty-eight other nations. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) said that the six per cent preference on wheat which Canada enjoyed in the British market is a matter of minor importance, and he also said that the lowering of the import duty on apples entering Great Britain was going to prevent the over-production of apples in Great Britain. I should like to know what we care, to any great extent at all events, about the over-production of apples there. The same argument holds good, I might say, with respect to industry in this country. The sweeping reduction under the treaties will certainly not produce over-production in a great many industries in Canada. In fact, in some places they will be closed up. It will certainly increase unemployment, and will simply mean the crucifixion of some industries.

The speeches of ministers and a great many hon. members opposite concluded with an impassioned appeal to the workers f Canada for what seems to me to be the supreme sacrifice; and all these appeals were made on the grounds of economic appeasement. In fact, so far as I can learn, no one on the government side of the house has said very much yet about employment or unemployment. This world appeasement plea has received its full share of praise. Each speaker in turn has taken a crack at the little, tiny, penny cake of soap, to put some more froth in the old hogshead.

One of the most important points is the effect of the treaty on the industrial worker. Will it give one more man in the country a job? The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has told us that we have been requested by Great Britain to make these concessions. I do not see how the people of Canada can properly judge the merits or demerits of the treaty until they know what concessions we were asked to make. In justice to hon. members and to the country the correspondence with respect to that phase of the matter should be made public. In his statements the Prime Minister has said that we have gone no farther in making these sweeping reductions in our tariffs and in making the sacrifice of our preference in the British market than has been absolutely necessary to bring about the consummation of the treaties—at least, that is the impression he has left on the Canadian people.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I draw my hon. friend's attention to the dispatch from the Secretary of State for the Dominions, in London, which was sent to me at Washington, in which the Secretary of State says on behalf of the British government that the agreement could not have been made except for the sacrifices that the dominions—or at least the concessions which the dominions were prepared to make in this matter.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I did not know that had been put on record. But the fact remains the impression has gone abroad, as I said before, that all the sacrifices and all the sweeping reductions had to be made in order that these treaties might be consummated.

I do not think the Prime Minister had any need to go farther than accede to the request of the British government with respect to what it was necessary to grant in the making of these treaties, and I feel strongly on that point. I feel, too, that ample compensation should have been given to us for any sacrifices we had to make in the British market. In this connection may I quote from the London Weekly Times of November 25, 1937:

> A difficulty throughout has been that the concessions desired by the United States in the British market involve some sacrifice of the advantages hitherto enjoyed by the dominions, which, as Mr. Lyons explained on Monday in an important statement to the press, cannot be expected to acquiesce unless they can be assured of adequate compensation in other directions.

That was the principle of compensation as demonstrated by Mr. Lyons. Then the article continues:

> In his statement Mr. Lyons was careful to make it plain that an Anglo-American trade agreement did not involve the surrender of the principle of imperial preference. Great Britain is not being asked to abandon her system of reciprocal preferential trade within the British commonwealth, which has had such welcome effects in promoting recovery in all the British countries, any more than America is being asked to abandon her system of high protection, to which, in the opinion of most Americans, she owes her unparalleled industrial development. All that is being sought is some modification in the application of these principles which, without jeopardizing any important British or American interest, will facilitate an increase in the trade between the two countries to their mutual advantage.

It is there recognized that the reciprocal preference on trade within the British commonwealth of nations has had a welcome effect in promoting recovery in all British countries, and it is pointed out that the treaty sought between Great Britain and the United States was to promote trade between those two countries. Only some modifications, without jeopardizing any interests, were needed.

The example and the results of the empire trade agreements concluded by the Conservative government in 1932 were before them. Those treaties were debated in the house for five or six weeks, and were very much maligned by the Liberal opposition of that day, which voted against them. We certainly must now give credit to the Prime Minister and to the Conservative government which held office in 1932. Those were the treaties which had such welcome effects in promoting recovery in all British countries, and which resulted in the conclusion of the United Kingdom-United States treaty of today. The United States wanted to get in on it, and they did.

What did the empire treaties mean? I quote from the London Times of November 24, 1938:

> Foreign trade in the British markets not only had not suffered but had actually increased since the Ottawa conference.

And again:

> Simultaneously with the Anglo-American agreement an agreement was signed between Canada and the United States revising the agreement of 1935 to meet the new situation. Other dominions did not attempt to negotiate parallel agreements, but were consulted at every turn....

The other dominions did not make parallel agreements; they did not have to. Neither did we.

What sacrifices did we make? I will mention only a few, but no doubt more and more will be found as time goes on. By losing the preference in the British market we have shared our apple market, our wheat market, our pork market, our lard market, and the markets for several other commodities, meaning a loss of millions of dollars to our producers, our railways, our steamships and our ports. It means unemployment for our producers, our railway workers, our dock workers and our sailors. The advantage to our steamships by way of preference simply meant that before a ship coming from a United States port could unload a cargo of wheat in Great Britain it had to pay $12,000. That duty has been removed and they do not need to pay it any more. A duty of six cents a bushel means $12,000 on a 6,000 ton load. There will be less incentive for our produce to be handled by Canadian railroads, Canadian steamships, Canadian elevators and Canadian ports. If the sacrifice is to be made, what compensation is being given for the sacrifice?

Apparently this sacrifice was not sufficient. The government is taking off the three per cent excise tax on the items covered by the agreement. Our industrial workers are to be sacrificed to that extent. Why did we have to reduce the tariff further on these items? Why were our vegetable growers sacrificed? Why are we to lose from $14,000,000 to $18,000,000 in excise tax? We are told that this is a reduction in taxation, but there is only one way whereby you can reduce taxation—by reducing expenditures. That $18,000,000 will have to be made up in some way, Canada does not receive a single advantage for the advantages she has given. On the other hand, she shares with nineteen other nations which come under the most favoured nation clause the advantages that she has in the United States market. The London Times Weekly has this to say:

> The Canadian government are being subjected to much pressure from various industrial interests to denounce the present trade treaties with Germany and Japan, writes our Ottawa correspondent.
> Even before the trade agreement with the United States was signed the textile manufacturers in Canada were finding themselves at a serious disadvantage in coping with competition which was buttressed by export subsidies and unfair leverage of a state-controlled economic organization.

On motion of Mr. Ross (St. Paul's) the debate was adjourned.

PRIVILEGE—MR. TURGEON

DENIAL OF REPORT IN OTTAWA JOURNAL RESPECTING CAUCUS OF FEBRUARY 23

Mr. TURGEON: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I have in my hand a copy of this evening's Ottawa Journal, which states:

> Liberals study $100,000,000 program of work. Bren gun and budget are considered at caucus.
> A $100,000,000 works program, the Bren gun inquiry by the public accounts committee, the budget, and the radio licence fee were understood to have occupied the attention of Liberal members of the House of Commons and the Senate to-day at their party caucus.

The government's supporters evinced keen interest in the works program which will be presented to parliament next month.

I am speaking as deputy government whip. I was present during every second of to-day's caucus, and I want to say that the report in the Journal is exactly 100 per cent false. We did not talk about the works program in any shape or form whatever; we made no reference to the public accounts committee, and the Bren gun inquiry was not mentioned. The Bren gun debate which took place in the house was mentioned in so far as compliments were paid to some of the Liberal members who had taken part in the debate, but in no other manner. There was no mention whatever of the radio licence fee. I rise to state that the article is exactly 100 per cent false and is not an account in any way of what took place to-day.

Mr. HANSELL: I think we need a press act.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.58 p.m.

Friday, February 24, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAY COMMITTEE

(Translation) First report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Vien.

PRIVILEGE—MR. TURGEON

REPORTS IN TORONTO NEWSPAPERS RESPECTING LIBERAL CAUCUS OF FEBRUARY 23

Mr. J. G. TURGEON (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Last night I had to deny a statement which appeared in the Ottawa Journal concerning proceedings in yesterday's Liberal caucus. I rise to-day to speak again as deputy chief government whip, having been present during every minute of yesterday's caucus. I quote from the Toronto Daily Star of February 23, yesterday's paper, as follows:

A Liberal caucus to-day endorsed the government's new three-point plan to cover wheat growing and marketing in the prairie provinces. It provides:

1. Guarantee of production cost of wheat to all cooperative marketing organizations and pools, whether producers, elevator or grain trade, at a statutory price to be fixed at about 63 cents per bushel.

2. An acreage bonussing plan to apply to al wheat growers, to provide from about $210 or $220 to each farmer of a half section. This amount will be graded off to not more thar about $300 maximum to those farming a section of land.

3. A flat payment not to exceed $2 an acre or $320 per quarter section in fixed crop loss areas where production averages less than five bushels per acre.

I quote from another report, in the Toronto Globe and Mail of Friday, February 24, as follows:

The Canadian government will continue to give a guaranteed wheat price to western farmers, but in the coming crop year it will be about 63 cents per bushel, a figure estimated to be the average cost of wheat production.

This is one of the three main features of a bill which was approved by a Liberal caucus this morning, and which will be introduced in the House of Commons late next week by Hon. James G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture.

These statements which I have quoted from the Toronto Globe and Mail of today's date and the Toronto Star of yesterday's date are utterly and absolutely false. They are not based on any fact whatever. They are completely, one hundred per cent wrong. The matters mentioned were not discussed in any manner or shape whatever.

Mr. PERLEY: I would suggest, in order to prevent any reports of that kind—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PERLEY: —that the minister bring down the bill as soon as possible.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What was the question?

Mr. CASSELMAN: It was not a question.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours that this house has appointed the Honourable the Speaker and Messrs. Barber, Bertrand (Prescott), Fafard, Goulet, Gray, Hill, Landeryou, MacInnis, MacMillan, Macphail (Miss), Moore, O'Neill, Pinard, Purdy, Rhéaume, Roberge, Spence, Taylor (Norfolk), Tustin, a committee to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the restaurant, so far as the interests of the Commons are concerned, and to act as members of a joint committee of both houses on the restaurant.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

OPERATIONS AND SELLING POLICY—TABLING OF WEEKLY REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler). He will recall that last year he agreed to a suggestion made by the then leader of the opposition, the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett, to bring down weekly reports of the wheat board as required under the act and have them placed in the sessional papers office. I should like to know whether he will agree to that being done this year and have them brought down to date, bringing down any subsequent reports as well.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My hon. friend the other day suggested that these reports be tabled, but I was unable to agree to that. This request has to do with filing them as requested last year by the then leader of the opposition. I will give consideration to the request, but I cannot say definitely at the moment whether I can agree to it or not.

GERMAN ALLEGIANCE

DIPLOMATIC ASPECTS OF APPEAL TO CANADIAN CITIZENS FOR RELIEF ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) inquired a few days ago as to a circular, issued in Vancouver and other points, in connection with contributions for German winter relief. The matter has been taken up with the German consular authorities. It is stated that a somewhat similar appeal for winter relief has been issued in Canada, as in other countries in previous years, and that on the present occasion the whole, instead of three quarters, of the sums collected has been used for relief in Canada. I am advised that the German phrase "Deutscher Volksgenosse" used in the circular to describe the persons to whom the appeal for contributions was addressed, while not a term which has been legally defined, applies only to citizens of the German Reich, whether resident in Germany or abroad. The implication which was drawn that Canadians of German origin were specifically included in the appeal does not therefore appear to be correct, if by "Canadians" Canadian nationals are meant. An appeal such as set forth in the circular in question, if addressed to Canadian citizens of whatever origin, would undoubtedly be most improper. Other questions raised by the terms of the circular have been brought to the attention of the consular representatives.

[Mr. Perley.]

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION FOR APPROVAL SUBJECT TO REQUIRED LEGISLATION

The house resumed from Thursday, February 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King that the house go into committee on the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 17th day of November, 1938, between Canada and the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): During the course of my remarks last evening the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) drew my attention to a dispatch from the Secretary of State for the Dominions in London to the effect that the agreement could not have been made except for the sacrifices that the dominions were prepared to make in this matter. I am sorry I did not hear the right hon. gentleman correctly, and thought that some further documents had been tabled. I was quite aware of that dispatch. I am also aware, as I stated earlier in my remarks, that certain sacrifices had to be made by Canada. But what hon. members of this house and the people of Canada should know before they can properly judge the merits or demerits of the new treaty is just what sacrifices we were asked to make or it was necessary for us to make. The dispatch does not mention that. What I am asking for is the removal of the smoke-screen.

Before the house adjourned last night I had quoted a dispatch from the London Weekly Times with respect to protests under the most favoured nation treaties, and I continue.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before my friend continues may I relieve his mind at once by saying that all concessions that were granted were requested and were necessary in order to enable the agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States to be concluded. But with respect to concessions made, there were as far as we are concerned compensations effected in the agreements which we have either with the United Kingdom or with the United States.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I did not hear the right hon. gentleman very well, but tomorrow I shall read in Hansard what he said.

Other countries which have made trade treaties with Canada containing the most favoured nation clause will claim under that clause the benefits of the tariff concessions accorded to the United States. Yet we are told by the government that they have received no complaints, and that the effect on these treaties is a matter of minor importance.

The consequences of these treaties are so far-reaching and involved that it would be impossible for me in the time at my disposal to discuss this aspect of the matter. But the fact is that the ministry do not know what the consequences will be. It would take an expert two or three months to ascertain that. Did we have to make all the sacrifices in order that Great Britain and the United States might conclude this treaty; or for world appeasement, or for peace with the United Stats? We have had peace with them since 1812; do we have to pay for the future? Let me read from the Toronto Daily Star of February 15, 1939:

Asserting that the United States "for selfish reasons" would be forced, defensively, to go to the aid of Canada or Great Britain in an emergency, Representative Pace (Democrat, Georgia) added:

"I feel sure that the President did not say our frontier is on the Rhine. In my judgment he could well have said, 'Our first line of defence is England and France.' When we see England and France go down, we are threatened."

I do not think we have to pay for that. The senator from Georgia simply states the truth.

What did we get by way of compensation for the sacrifices which we have made? I wonder whether hon. members realize that in 1937 the value of all our exports to the United States, which consist of products which they must have, such as newsprint, pulpwood, lobsters, nickel and alloys thereof, totalled $173,000,000 in round figures. Gold is still on the free list, I do not think it is bound; that amounted to about $75,000,000. Are those concessions? We get concessions, it is true, on products which they do not have to have. But these concessions are mostly surrounded by quotas. Let me read from a press release of February 7 last from the United States government. Let us hear something about these concessions. For the calendar year 1938 their exports to Canada for domestic consumption were in round figures $453,000,000. Their imports from Canada for domestic consumption, excluding gold, amounted to $257,000,000, leaving therefore a balance in their favour of $204,000,000, excluding gold. I point out that the United States were not suffering from the results of the 1935 treaty. They did not need further concessions from us.

Then I turn to the press release of November 17, 1938. I wish every Canadian could have a copy so he could read it for himself. I quote from page 12:

In the agreement of 1936 the reduction of United States duties on certain important commodities, mustly agricultural, was safeguarded by the use of tariff quotas, the reduced duties applying only to limited quantities; any imports in excess of the specified limits continued subject to the full rates.

And these quotas are ridiculously small. Agriculture and so on has been amply safeguarded. The quota on milk, for example, is one-fifth of a pint a year to each person in the United States. The quota on cattle for the quarter was filled by January 31. So much for the quotas.

Again I quote, this time from page 15:

The most important free list items bound by the new agreement (including those already bound by the 1936 agreement) are: newsprint paper, wood pulp of all kinds, and pulpwood; lobster, scallops and sea herring; certain kinds of furs; crude asbestos; crude artificial abrasives; and certain fertilizers. The imports from Canada in 1937 of all articles bound free by the agreement amounted to $203,000,000 or 85 per cent of all free imports from that country. The assurance that duties will not be imposed on this huge volume of trade is of great value to Canada and has been taken into consideration by that country in making its concessions to the United States on articles dutiable under the Canadian tariff as well as on duty free articles.

Why, then, should these have been taken into consideration? What do we care whether or not these items are bound free? The only people that care about that are the consumers of the United States; they are the ones who are interested—and possibly their government, for revenue purposes. It is in their interest to have low duties.

Again I quote, this time from page 52:

A secondary reason why the United States has kept newsprint paper and paper materials on the free list may lie in the fact that at least in times of active business construction the cut of wood from American forests for lumber, paper and all other purposes, exceeds the annual growth, with resultant depletion of the total stand of timber, logs, posts, poles, railway ties, pickets, palings and lath. The free entry of these wood products has long been maintained by Congress in the public interest.

I do not think the United States will put a duty on them. I do not see much concession there; it is simply a matter of self-preservation.

Again on page 53 it is pointed out with respect to nickel that Canada is the only producer. Aluminium is controlled by a cartel. I might go on to other items but time does not permit. But these are not concessions; a duty would have very little effect on the export of these items. There is no evidence of compensation here. Then at page 908 of Hansard the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said:

> Those agreements are inseparable in the sense that netiher could have been effected without the other.

This is true only to a small extent. In his various statements the Prime Minister has sought to leave this impression, but he refuses to let us know what Great Britain asked. Let us see what it was necessary for Canada to do in order that Great Britain and the United States might make this agreement. Apparently we had to do just what Great Britain wished. The other dominions did not have to make parallel agreements; they did not have to make concessions to thirty-eight other nations; they did not have to make sweeping tariff reductions. We have received little compensation, while at the same time we have made further sacrifices, as I have already said. Under the circumstances all that was required was a revision of our treaty with Great Britain, and this could have been done by an exchange of notes. Further sacrifices under the Canada-United States agreement had nothing whatever to do with it, nor did Great Britain inform the government of Canada that we must make all these reductions and sacrifices or the United States would not deal with them. If Great Britain did make that statement we should know about it. I do not think they did. They expected that we would get compensation.

Just what did Great Britain ask Canada to do? I believe this correspondence should be made public. If the government had so desired I do not think there would have been any difficulty about renewing the 1935 treaty with the United States, possibly with minor changes which might have been necessary. The United States press release of November 17, 1938, states:

> The experience of both countries with the first agreement, which was already wide in scope, has been generally considered highly satisfactory.

They were certainly speaking for themselves, not for us. They were perfectly satisfied. Then I quote from page 2 of the same press release:

> Roughly three-fifths of the value of the imports into the United States from Canada has long consisted of crude or simply manufactured products of forests and mines which have entered free of duty.

These shrewd negotiators certainly had an eye to the natural products of Canada in order to conserve their own. We must watch our step with respect to the depletion of our forests. Professor Zavitz, provincial forester, has stated that the deforestation of Ontario is threatening the basic water supply for agriculture, and has appealed for cooperation in initiating reforestation schemes to prevent soil erosion and conserve water supplies. According to the Canada Year Book our forests are being depleted at an estimated rate of 3,550 million cubic feet per year. No wonder Professor Zavitz is apprehensive.

Again I quote from page 2 of the United States press release:

> Experience under the first agreement shows that the agriculture and industry of the United States had been left with adequate protection in the domestic market, even though the reduced duties opened to Canadian producers the opportunity to add to their sales in this country.

It is easily seen that they are satisfied.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the propaganda that was sent out in advance, the big noise about world appeasement, the cry that Canada had to make this treaty for the sake of peace, was nothing but subterfuge to cover up the real issue, which was: Is this treaty good or bad for this country? Consider the way this treaty was negotiated: disregarding advice; sending three executives of the civil service to do the job, not one of whom was an industrialist, not one of whom had a broad knowledge of agriculture or mining. This showed the grossest disregard of the best interests of the country. Are these men responsible? I do not know, but I do know they have to follow the policy of the government. The cold, bald facts concerning the 1935 treaty and its results are before us today. Unemployment is greater than it has been since 1935, and is increasing all the time. All the theories, indices, trade statistics and so on put up in defence of the treaties do not alter that fact. We have upwards of four hundred thousand idle workers, another four hundred thousand on part time and thousands of young men who have come of workable age and who have never been able to get jobs. In my own city more people are legitimately on relief than there were in 1935. At the present time those on relief in Toronto number some 67,000, and taxes are increasing by leaps and bounds.

What further have we before our eyes? We have further debt. There is a resolution on the order paper to empower the government to borrow $750,000,000 for refunding, public works and other purposes. This, when broken down, means that $330,000,000 is available for the latter purpose, I suppose mainly for the relief of unemployment and for the pork barrel. Federal revenue from taxes has increased from $317,300,000 in 1935-36 to $448,600,000 in 1937-38, an increase of $131,300,000 in that short time. All taxes in Canada, federal, provincial and municipal, have increased during the same period. Why? Because of the struggle to relieve unemployment which the much-vaunted 1935 treaty was to end. That prophecy has not come true; they have not done the job. We recovered from the 1930 depression faster than the United States. The policies of the Conservative government accounted for that. The United States is recovering from this last recession faster than we are. We never should have sunk so far during this depression, but we are still sinking, held down by this 1935 treaty link. The government is responsible.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what has been done for the industrial worker? Nothing. Not only has no assistance been given him; he has been sacrificed. Where can we look for increased employment to-day? Where is the greatest need? Our secondary industries are practically the only place to which we can look for increased employment, yet they certainly have been crucified by these treaties. The industrial worker accounts for forty per cent of Canada's production, but certainly he has not been given much of a chance. I guess the only place for him is on relief. What bungling there has been in connection with these treaties! We find the government making a bargain with the three per cent excise tax on the items in the treaty, and now it will be necessary to take that excise tax off all imports, otherwise the burden so far as the manufacturers are concerned will be unbearable. The whole thing is just a muddle. I have no doubt a good deal more of this will come to light when the individual items are examined.

It has been said frequently during this debate that time alone will tell. Do the government mean to say that no comprehensive study has been made as the probable results of the treaty, and no conclusions arrived at? Tampering with Canada's economic life under those circumstances is a pretty serious experiment. It shows the grossest incompetence on the part of the government, and on their neglect and incompetence they will be judged. There is no question of taking a firm stand against Hitler and Mussolini here. That stand could have been taken without the sacrifices we had to make. We have given up a large and stable market in Great Britain for a prospective unstable one in the United States—the substance for the shadow.

Every means seems to have been taken carefully to keep out of the public eye the concessions given by the government in the treaty. The government press release and publications have pointed out the advantages, but not the disadvantages. It is so bound to the dogmas of free trade that it has shut its eyes to the disastrous conclusion of the 1935 agreement. The cry for world appeasement and peace are nothing more or less than an effort to foist free trade on the people of Canada. Do not let us be misled by this talk of world appeasement, a bold front against Hitler, or peace with the United States.

Treaties such as the present one are most likely to sow the seeds of discord, discontent and dispute rather than promote peace and goodwill among the people of Canada. We have to pass judgment on the cold facts. The public are still in the dark. They do not know about the unnecessary lengths to which the government has gone, but some day they will have a rude awakening. The Prime Minister's blindness in this matter, and the blundering manner of contracting these agreements, will lead him, not to the crowning glory of his career, but to the valley of humiliation.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, because it deals with the vast matter of trade, the resolution before the house is probably one of the most important which will come before us at the present session. Proof of its importance is found in the fact that many of the speeches delivered by hon. members in the debate on the address, especially by hon. members opposite, had reference to the trade agreement recently consummated with the United States.

This question of trade is one which almost from the very beginning of our confederation has engaged the attention of Canadians. This I believe is perfectly natural and understandable. If we study history and look around us in the world we find that the countries which have attained the highest degree of civilization are those which have reached the highest degree of perfection in their international trade. Many examples could be given. We could cite the example of Great Britain whose trade, I believe, leads that of the world. We could mention France and the United States. The same was true of Germany until that country turned her back on her past and sought to find new paths to national greatness.

It is a significant fact that in Canada we have attained a very strong position indeed in the matter of international trade. Ours is a country vast in extent, with only eleven millions of people, and yet one which in the year 1937 stood sixth among the nations of the world in volume of international trade. In 1936 we held fourth place among the exporting nations of the world, and the same condition held true in 1937. This is without question a remarkable achievement.

I suggest these facts are evidence of two things. They are evidence, first, of the enterprise, resourcefulness and initiative of the Canadian people, and, second, of the value of the resources of our country. Because of this, over the years, if we contrast our position with that of many other countries, we have had in Canada—sometimes up, sometimes down—a remarkable degree of prosperity. I believe that fact is indisputable. Because of this vast volume of trade, touching almost all countries of the world, we have been able to develop the amenities of modern civilization. Our educational system; our hospitalization for the unfortunate, our care for the needy, have reached as high a degree of development as can be found almost anywhere else in the world.

We have been able to do this because of our prosperity. In 1929 our total trade reached the vast sum of well over two and a half billion dollars. While there have been some reverses since that time, partly because of our own mistakes and partly because of conditions beyond our control, nevertheless on the whole it has remained at a high point.

It is perfectly natural and understandable that the question of trade and fiscal policies should create differences of opinion. Broadly speaking—and certainly over the last sixty years—such differences have existed between the two major parties in the country. I know it can be said that there were times, and there have been years when the policies of the two parties appeared to be not far apart. But there is this significant fact, that whenever an opportunity came to free trade from some of its shackles, or to extend the possibility of getting Canadian markets, the Liberal party have been found on one side and the Conservative party on the other.

Mr. CAHAN: Oh, no, no!

Mr. SPENCE: We got the market and you lost it.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friends object to that. I hope before I go much farther I shall demontrate a little more fully the truth of the statement. But in the main that is the fact. The Conservative party has been the one which has always advocated what it thought to be an essential measure of protection for Canadian industry, through the maintenance of tariffs. That will not be disputed. On the other hand, while at times the Liberal party, in the judgment of many of its supporters, has maintained tariffs that were too high, nevertheless it has had its face turned in the right direction. When opportunities have arisen it has moved in the direction of lowering tariffs, promoting trade and thereby aiding in bringing prosperity to the Canadian people.

Since the great war there has been a distinct impetus in the world toward economic and political nationalism. This is particularly true of Europe during the last eight or ten years. What led to this condition? So far as some European countries are concerned, the fear of war and the uncertainty of the future caused them to adopt policies which have unquestionably restricted and hampered international trade and world recovery.

A similar policy was adopted by the United States following the war. The United States has been frequently referred to in this debate as a high tariff country, but there have been times in the past sixty years when their tariffs were not nearly as high as they have been in the last seven or eight years. During the tenure of office of President Wilson the institution of the Underwood tariff brought about substantial reductions in the duties on goods going into that country. Let me say in passing that that tariff was of particular benefit to Canada during those years. But following the war, probably more or less because of a feeling of disappointment over the trend of affairs in Europe, the United States took the other course. We had the Fordney-McCumber tariff in 1922. Then for several years there was in the United States a definite propaganda, energetically carried on, to the end that she should cut herself free from the rest of the world, not only in an economic but also in a political sense. There were those who held and expressed the view that the United States could live unto herself, that she did not need the rest of the world. If Europe was to become a madhouse, at any rate the United States could remain out of it. All this led to the adoption of the Hawley-Smoot tariff in 1930.

What was the idea back of the adoption of the Hawley-Smoot tariff? It was simply a continuation of the policies which had been finding favour in the United States for a number of years previously. The Hawley-

Smoot tariff raised the customs duties to a point which I do not think had ever been reached before in that country. After that was done they looked forward to a period of prosperity; but what happened? Within three years, yes, within two years, the United States had entered the worst period of depression it had ever experienced. There came a time when its banks closed, when its trade had practically disappeared; and with these conditions came unemployment, distress, suffering and misery.

We also had an experiment in Canada. I recall the election of 1930 and the campaign carried on by the former leader of the Conservative party. I can recall some of the speeches made by hon. gentlemen whom I see opposite to me at the present time. What were those speeches? What was their policy at that time? They criticized the policy of the Liberal party in the matter of tariff reduction during the previous ten years. They told the people that the unemployment that was coming along was all due to the fact that tariffs had been reduced, that the country had been on the wrong course. The people took the Conservative party at its word and returned it to power in 1930. One of the first acts of the new administration was to raise the tariff. A little later it was raised again, to the highest level it had ever been in Canadian history. Do any of my hon. friends opposite deny that during the election campaign of 1930 they pressed this policy upon the Canadian people as a cure for their economic ills? Do they deny that they stated on platform after platform that if they were returned to power they would raise the tariff, they would cure unemployment, they would bring prosperity to the country?

Mr. SPENCE: We tried to. That is what you have not done.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) was one of the prime movers in that respect. I really believe the hon. member has a conscience, and it must bother him greatly at times for the part he took—

Mr. SPENCE: Not a bit.

Mr. CRERAR: —in that campaign.

Mr. PERLEY: The hon. member might recite how his own conscience bothers him.

Mr. CRERAR: I will attend to my hon. friend in a little while. I was one of those who was left at home in the 1930 election, but I recall the autumn session in 1930 when the tariff was raised. Why was that done? To cure unemployment and to restore prosperity. Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot deny that. Again in the session of 1931 the tariff was hoisted still higher, for the purpose, it was alleged, of relieving unemployment and bringing prosperity to Canada. What happened? With every increase in the tariff, there was an increase in unemployment and an increase in the burdens placed upon the Canadian taxpayers. That was the result of the mistaken policies of my hon. friends opposite.

Then we had the 1932 conference which was to cure everything. I have never been one of those who had very much faith in the work of the Ottawa conference. I took the trouble this morning to read the opening address by Mr. Baldwin, now Earl Baldwin, who headed the British delegation. The conference would have achieved something worth while if it had followed the lead he gave in that address; but it did not. He pointed out that there were two courses to be followed. The conference could increase intra-empire trade by reducing the tariffs against each other and leaving the general tariffs against outside countries where they were, or they could leave the intra-empire tariffs where they were and increase the general tariff against other countries. Unfortunately it was the latter course that was followed.

Mr. CAHAN: Oh, no, decidedly not.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend may dispute that, but—

Mr. CAHAN: I do.

Mr. CRERAR: —the record is against him.

Mr. CAHAN: Not a bit of it. There was a raising of tariffs and there was a lowering of tariffs.

Mr. CRERAR: So far as Canada was concerned, the lowered tariffs had to do chiefly with things that did not count, while the tariff was raised on things that were vital to the Canadian consumer. May I say in passing that there was another unfortunate consequence that flowed from those agreements. I do not wish to get into a controversy with my hon. friends opposite, but the Ottawa agreements did create in the minds of the have-not countries in an anxious and uncertain world, the idea that the British empire, the mother country and its dominions, was set upon a policy of economic imperialism. The effect of this impression on countries that lacked the sources of raw materials which the British empire possessed has exercised an injurious influence upon the world for the last six or seven years.

But my hon. friends opposite of the Conservative party did endeavour to negotiate a trade treaty with the United States prior to the election of 1935, and in this debate reference has been made to that effort. But while discussions and even negotiations in regard to the treaty went on, no finality had been reached when the general election took place in the autumn of 1935. If one can form any judgment from the speeches made by my hon. friends opposite in this debate, they would never in the world have succeeded in negotiating a trade agreement with the United States, and I am firmly convinced there would have been no such trade agreement if the Conservative party had been returned to power in 1935.

What would have happened? I think I can picture the scene. I am sorry the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) is not in his seat, but I recall his attitude in the budget debate of 1930, and I can see him, if a trade agreement with the United States was coming forward, getting out his shillelagh—it is never far away—and appealing to the red-blooded Canadianism of the Canadian people against having any "truck or trade with the Yankees."

I go on down the line to my good friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). In passing may I say, and I am sure he will take my word for it, that there is no member of the house for whom I have a greater respect, but I was disappointed in the speech he made the other night. If the Conservative administration had been returned in 1935 and a trade agreement with the United States had been approaching finality, I can see him going back to the days of Cleveland and the Alaska boundary award; I can see him citing to his leader all the speeches that had been made by all sorts of politicians in the United States at the time of the reciprocity proposals in 1911. Is there any possible indication that my hon. friend would have supported a reciprocity agreement with the United States?

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly not the agreement that was then suggested by the United States; and my views were made perfectly clear.

Mr. CRERAR: I will say, in the best of good temper, that I do not believe there is any kind of trade agreement that could possibly be made with the United States that my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George would support.

I go on down the line to the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling). He is not in his seat at the moment, but in imagination I can see him looking across to Oregon, seeing a few apple orchards there, and saying: Nothing doing so far as apples are concerned in a trade treaty with our United States neighbours!

Mr. LENNARD: It is more than a few apple orchards.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. I can imagine also—

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member's imagination is working well to-day.

Mr. DUNNING: He has not started painting pictures yet.

Mr. CRERAR: I can imagine what our good friends from Toronto would have said —the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence), the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross), the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol)—what would have been their reaction to an approaching trade agreement with the United States?

Mr. DUNNING: They would have required medical treatment.

Mr. CRERAR: They would have picked up their war weapons and stood four-square against it. It is not that this particular trade treaty is unacceptable to hon. gentlemen opposite, Mr. Speaker; any kind of trade agreement with the United States would be unacceptable to them.

Mr. SPENCE: I do not think it is fair for the hon. gentlemen to make statements of that kind before this house, because he knows better. He knows that if we could have made a trade treaty with the United States that would have been satisfactory to us we would have done so at any time. But the hon. member says that we would not do it under any circumstances.

Mr. CRERAR: I certainly do not wish to be unfair. I withdraw my statement, and moderate it to this extent—

Mr. SPENCE: But you have said it so often—that is the trouble.

Mr. CRERAR: There might be a glimmer of hope, very, very dim and distant but still a glimmer, that the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) would have seen the light.

Mr. SPENCE: I have seen the light many a time, but I see nothing but darkness when I look at you.

Mr. EULER: Can't take it.

Mr. CRERAR: Hon. gentlemen opposite, as I said a moment ago, had a trade treaty with the United States in process of negotiation before the election of 1935, but no finality was reached. Then came the general election, and within six weeks the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), my respected leader, had gone to Washington and negotiated and settled the argument.

Mr. SPENCE: Because he accepted what we would not take—that is all.

Mr. CRERAR: Now, what were the benefits from that agreement? If we take a glance at the economy of Canada to-day what do we find as the greatest need of Canada in its commerce and industry? I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is markets. Take the economic story of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and you will find that that is true. Go down to Nova Scotia: their need is markets for their products. New Brunswick needs markets for its lumber and potatoes; Quebec needs markets for its pulp and paper, lumber and asbestos; Ontario needs markets for its products; the prairie provinces the same, and British Columbia as well. The great need of all our provinces is markets for their products, and the fact of the matter is that the trade agreement, negotiations for which were started by the late administration before the election of 1935, and which were carried to completion by the present administration, did widen the markets for Canadian products. That fact cannot be disputed; the trade figures show it.

Mr. CAHAN: An infinitesimal widening.

Mr. CRERAR: It is not so infinitesimal; on the contrary, it is very considerable, and the benefits from that treaty have been shown in our trade figures. Further, it is not without some significance that while the United States had a very considerable depression in the latter part of 1937 and in 1938, this country in a measure escaped the consequences of that depression. And why? Because our people were profitably employed in producing the things that we could sell.

Mr. CAHAN: Not to the United States.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, to the United States, and the figures show it.

Mr. CAHAN: We sold them elsewhere, in British countries.

Mr. EULER: More went to the United States than to any other country in the world.

Mr. CRERAR: I respectfully suggest to my hon. friend the member for St. Lawrence-St. George that he study the trade figures if he has not done so.

Mr. CAHAN: I am pretty well acquainted with them.

Mr. CRERAR: Now we come to the present agreement. It is not only an extension of the old agreement, but an enlargement of that agreement, a very considerable enlargement. It widens our markets still further. In what way? The Nova Scotia fishermen, who have been having a very difficult time for a number of years past, have wider markets opened to them for their fish. The New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island farmers have wider markets for their potatoes, and there is a wider market for British Columbia lumber. As regards the great pulp and paper industry of Quebec, we find our present free entry to the United States guaranteed during the term of this agreement, and that is not without some significance. The improvements being made by modern scientific research in the processing of paper will probably lead before very long to the development of methods which will enable newsprint to be made from the great stands of southern pine in the United States, and when we consider that our exports of pulp and paper to that country last year amounted to more than $100,000,000, it is worth something to have during the term of this agreement the assurance that no duty will be placed against our pulp and paper.

Coming to Ontario, that province benefits in several ways from the agreement. It benefits under the cattle schedules, under the dairy products schedules and from the reduction in the duty on nickel going into the United States. In Manitoba we find that there are benefits as there are in Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia.

The great need for Canada to-day is markets for her products. Take mineral production alone. In 1918 our total production of zinc, copper, lead and nickel was 297,000,000 pounds. In 1938 it had grown to 1,586,000,000 pounds. Gold is not affected, although I am not very much impressed with the argument of some of my friends opposite that gold should not be taken into account in the trade export figures with respect to the United States. However, in gold, the production in 1918, equated to the present price of gold, was $24,000,000, whereas last year it was over $164,000,000, an evidence again of the expanding exports of the country and the need for markets in our base metals, lumber, pulp and paper, and live stock—indeed, in almost everything we produce.

The point I am making is that this agreement does enlarge the markets for Canadian products, and to the extent that it does so, it helps to promote prosperity in this country; and as it promotes prosperity here, it increases the peace and happiness of the Canadian people. That is a strong reason for the agreement. And what are the criticisms against it? I wish to spend a few minutes in dealing with the criticisms of my hon. friends opposite.

I must confess I have been interested in the course they have taken. When this agreement was first announced it received the blessing of a former Conservative premier of Ontario. The leader of the reconstruction party, a former minister of trade and commerce, and first lieutenant of the leader of the opposition, spoke some quite friendly words for the trade arrangement. He thought it was a good thing. I was in doubt myself as to where the leader of the opposition stood on the question—I am sorry he is not here to-day. In the debate on the address he made a long reference to the treaty. After his speech was over and reported I said to a Conservative friend of mine in the city, "Is the leader of the opposition going to oppose, or is he going to support, this treaty?" The reply was, "Well, from his speech I don't know." And that was understandable.

Let me quote from the speech of the leader of the opposition on January 16. The reference will be found on page 34 of Hansard:

> I am not questioning that there are advantages in this agreement; it would be a queer kind of agreement if it did not produce any benefit. But when the losses and gains are weighed together, my submission is that there is grave doubt of the advantages being more than the disadvantages so far as we are concerned.

He had not made up his mind. In another part of his speech he said that time would tell, and on page 35 of Hansard he is reported further:

> I am now going to leave the trade treaty. I have made a good many general remarks about it, but undoubtedly we shall deal with it more fully when it is up for discussion here. Even then, if it is discussed, as the right hon. gentleman suggested the other day, as soon as this debate is over, I do not think we shall be able to judge as to its merits or demerits, though I anticipate that we shall hear from some men, coming from various sections of the country, interested in certain industries, who may feel that they have been benefited or hurt.

That clearly revealed that the leader of the opposition was even then, as late as January 16, in some doubt. Apparently, however, a course has been mapped and is being followed and we are now meeting from my hon. friends opposite with an increasing measure of opposition to this agreement. Let me deal briefly with some of the counts.

The member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) may be regarded, I think, as the wheat expert—if I may use that much-abused word—of the opposition.

Mr. PERLEY: Thank you.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. CRERAR: He put a lot of interesting figures on Hansard last evening. Not only the member for Qu'Appelle, but several other members of the opposition have criticized this agreement in its relation to wheat. In fact, I am not certain that it is not the strongest point they have endeavoured to make against it, that we lost something when we gave up the British preference of six cents a bushel on wheat. They are lamenting the loss of the British market and asking what we are going to do with our wheat. I believe a very good case can be made out for the argument that the preference of six cents a bushel on wheat was never of any real value to the wheat growers of this country. One of the conditions of that preference—and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George will recall this—is found in article 4 of the 1932 agreement, which reads:

> It is agreed that the duty on either wheat in grain, copper, zinc or lead as provided in this agreement may be removed if at any time empire producers of wheat in grain, copper, zinc and lead respectively are unable or unwilling to offer these commodities on first sale in the United Kingdom at prices not exceeding the world prices and in quantities sufficient to supply the requirements of the United Kingdom consumers.

What does that mean?

An hon. MEMBER: Nothing.

Mr. CRERAR: It means just nothing so far as the value of the preference in the matter of price was concerned.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly, but there was a preference as to quantity.

Mr. CRERAR: I am making my speech. There was no preference so far as price was concerned. It cannot be shown that a single farmer in Canada received an additional cent a bushel for his wheat because of that preference.

Mr. CAHAN: But he received an additional and sheltered market.

Mr. CRERAR: I come now to the point my hon. friend raises. He says it gave us in a certain degree a sheltered market. But did it? Western Canadian wheat has always occupied a special place in the world's markets because of its peculiar quality. The United States produce not more than twenty-five per cent, probably twenty per cent, of hard wheat in their total wheat production. Consequently they do not export a bushel of hard spring wheat; it is all required in the United States. In the more southern states of the Argentine a type of wheat is produced somewhat similar to that raised in Canada. But I repeat, western Canadian wheat has occupied a peculiar position in the world's markets because of its quality. And I submit that it was not a profitable business for the wheat growers of western Canada to have created in Europe a condition under which a larger volume of their wheat than would otherwise be the case, was forced into a particular market, even if it was the British market. Why? After all, wheat is a very fluid thing. The United Kingdom, it is true, is the largest single purchaser of wheat on the continent of Europe. But there are other countries that buy wheat, even in these distressful days: Belgium, Holland, Denmark and the Scandinavian countries; France at times, Italy at times until the last few years. A demand for our hard western wheat existed from all these countries, which imported it to blend with wheat from the Argentine and Australia and other countries, to produce the type of flour required by their customers.

I submit that under the wheat preference scheme all that resulted was that Canada was given a more sheltered market in Great Britain, but more wheat from these other producing countries was sent to the other consuming countries in Europe. The result of that condition was that we were placed in a less competitive position as far as the bids we received for our wheat were concerned. So I believe a very good argument could be made that the wheat preference, while in a sense it gave us a sheltered market for some of our wheat—and not so very much either, as I shall presently show from the figures placed on record last night by the member for Qu'Appelle.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. CRERAR: If I might be permitted just a moment.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. CAHAN: Go on; we are interested.

Mr. CRERAR: A very good argument could be made out that the preference did not result in giving the western wheat producer a single additional dollar for his wheat.

I could deal with the matter of lumber, because that was dealt with at some length by opposition speakers, and the government was criticised for giving up the preference on lumber. Let me tell the house that there are in the northern part of Manitoba several saw mills, one of very considerable size and capacity. During 1932-33, while the United States had the duty of $3 or $4 a thousand against our lumber, those mills were not operating, with the result that there was unemployment and a charge on the public funds for relief. After the 1936 agreement those mills went into operation and have been operating steadily since. Why? Because they find their market in the United States. The same is true of northern British Columbia and northern Saskatchewan. While some sacrifices on the part of the fir lumber industry of the Pacific coast may result from this agreement—I do not think it will be so—the larger opening up of the American market for lumber products is going to result in a great deal more benefit for Canada than would be involved in the exclusion of our lumber from the United States and the maintenance of the preference in the British market.

There are several other matters with which I should like to deal, but I am not going to trespass on the time of the house. In due time this trade agreement will be submitted to the judgment of the Canadian people. I have no doubt whatever what their verdict will be. I am confident that the Canadian people will approve the agreement. They will do so not alone for the material benefits it brings to Canada, considerable as they will be; but they will approve it also because it is an example of friendly trade relationships between two great countries, pointing the surest way to that improvement of international conditions which the world requires. If the world is to settle down to peace, international animosities must be appeased, and the promotion of friendly trade arrangements is the surest way to achieve that end. If for no other reason than this, the resolution we are considering should be approved by this house.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): It is not my intention to try to follow the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) in his argument. I noted during his speech that the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) was paying strict attention. I recall that last year he dealt very effectively with the arguments of the minister, and no doubt he will do so again this year.

Before entering upon a discussion of the treaty I should like to make a few remarks with reference to a statement which was made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Clark) last evening. In paying some attention to my humble self, he said that I had not given the facts with reference to certain statements that I made, particularly with reference to the export of apples from New Brunswick. I told him at that time, and I wish now to tell the house, that the information I gave was obtained from the bureau of statistics. On January 30, 1938 I wrote to the bureau for the information, as follows:

I should be pleased to receive the following information from your department:

1. Number of barrels of apples exported from Nova Scotia during the past two years (a) to the United States; (b) to the British Commonwealth of Nations. Also the same information relative to the province of New Brunswick.

The return I received from the bureau of statistics was as follows:

(a)	1936 barrels	1937 barrels
Nova Scotia to British empire	929,348	1,089,655
Nova Scotia to United States	60	72
(b)
New Brunswick to British empire	48,523	25,744
New Brunswick to United States	38	33

That is the information I gave the house during my previous speech, and, as I say, I obtained it from the bureau of statistics. Apparently the hon. gentleman obtained his information from another source, but I would advise him to go to the bureau of statistics at all times, where he will be given the most reliable information and where I am sure he will be treated, as I have been treated, in a very courteous manner. I must confess that in my experience this is one of the most efficient branches of the public service of Canada.

There was another statement to which the hon. gentleman referred and which I may be pardoned for mentioning here. He quoted the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) who, in a speech delivered in New Brunswick, is supposed to have said that the opposition member from the maritime provinces was as good as the twenty-five government members from the maritimes. I do not know where the hon. member for Greenwood obtained his statistics, but my modesty will hardly permit me to go as far as that. I feel constrained to say that there must have been some slight exaggeration.

This treaty, Mr. Speaker, is exercising the minds of people in all parts of Canada. During my short experience as a member of this house, representing a constituency in the maritime provinces, it has been my privilege to hear discussed both the 1935 and the 1938 treaty. I heard the treaty of 1935 extolled by hon. members opposite as a grand accomplishment which would bring undoubted prosperity to our country. I have no hesitation in saying, however, that it has not improved conditions in the maritime provinces. The only benefit I have heard claimed in this house as having resulted from it is that it brought about some increase in our sales of turnips in the American market. I took occasion to look up the facts regarding the exports of turnips to the United States from the maritimes, and compared the years 1934 and 1935, before the treaty came into operation, with the last two years, 1937 and 1938. The figures are as follows:

	Bushels
1934	1,047,537
1935	1,131,012

So, in connection with the export of turnips, the figures remained practically the same after this treaty came into effect; and so far as the price was concerned, I have heard it stated that the price was more to the advantage of the consumer in the United States than that of the shipper in the maritime provinces.

As has been pointed out very clearly by previous speakers, on this side of the house, that treaty was of great benefit to the people of the United States, and I am not surprised that they are now anxious to have another treaty with Canada, particularly since it is linked up with the treaty with Great Britain, giving the United States special privileges in the British market which we in Canada are losing.

Some hon. members, in an effort to prove that a treaty with the United States would be of great benefit to Canada, have delved into ancient history. They have gone back to 1854-66, and have said that reciprocity was a grand thing for the maritime provinces in those days. There is no question about that; I quite agree, but there is no comparison between the reciprocity of those days and this trade treaty, which is not reciprocity at all. In 1854-66 the maritime provinces produced large quantities of fish, as they do to-day, as well as large quantities of agricultural products and a great deal of lumber. But these commodities had access to United States markets practically free of duty. Then it must be remembered that in those days the United States was engaged in a great war. Men who normally would have been farming, fishing and producing other commodities could not attend to that kind of work, and they needed these commodities. The maritime provinces formed the most convenient source, and we sent them considerable quantities of the things they needed. Of course we were prosperous. Again, in those days the maritime provinces formed one of the great shipbuilding centres of the world.

It is no wonder that from generation to generation the feeling has persisted in the minds of the people of the maritime provinces that reciprocity is a grand thing for us. It would be if we could get it, but, as I said a few moments ago, there is no more similarity between the trade treaty we have to-day and the reciprocity we had in years past than there is between day and night. In the interval, and particularly in recent years, the United States has built up an almost insurmountable tariff against the products of our people, not only of my province but of every part of Canada. Even when the duty is reduced by fifty per cent, as it has been in many instances under this treaty, there still remains a barrier which it is almost impossible, and in many cases absolutely impossible, for our products to surmount.

As has been stated by previous speakers, in concluding a treaty with the United States Canada must exercise more care than is necessary in dealing with any other nation. We are a people of eleven million dealing with a people of one hundred and thirty million. In very large measure the same commodities are produced, bought and sold in the two countries. The great difference is that they sell most of their production—I believe some ninety per cent—in their home market, while we on the other hand must sell a large proportion of what we produce in an outside market. While a change in tariff may make little difference to them, to us it may have dire consequences.

In the maritime provinces we are a rural people. According to the census returns about fifty per cent of the people of Canada are urban, but in the maritime provinces we are over seventy per cent rural. A trade treaty, to benefit the people of the maritime provinces, of necessity must benefit the primary producers. I come from the county of Kings in the province of New Brunswick, which I suppose is the finest dairy county in the three provinces by the sea. As is known, we have many excellent herds of cattle. They have taken prizes at the Royal Winter Fair at Toronto, at the Chicago exhibition and at other exhibitions throughout Canada. We are very proud of the dairy cattle of my county. But what is the condition to-day? In 1935 hon. members opposite told us that we would receive great benefit from the sale of milk and cream to the United States. Not one gallon of cream was sold from my county or any other county in the maritime provinces to the United States, as a result of the treaty. To-day the dairy farmers of that splendid county, one which has been perhaps as prosperous as any other part of the dominion, are having a very hard struggle to get along, on account of the great influx of vegetable oils from other parts of the empire and the world at large, and also the great influx of butter.

Yesterday the hon. member for York-Sunbury said that we were selling more dairy cattle to the United States. There is no question about that. We are compelled to sell dairy cattle to the United States, and to sell them at any price, because we cannot sell the butter and other dairy products we are producing in the maritime provinces.

May I place on Hansard some figures with reference to the production of milk in the county of Kings. I find at page 172 of volume 8 of the census returns for Canada, 1930, that in that year Kings county produced 6,742,000 gallons of milk. It has been stated in the house that one county in Ontario could more than fill the quota. I repeat that Kings county could more than fill the quota of milk which will be permitted entry to the United States. We are allowed 3,000,000 gallons of milk. As I said a moment ago, in 1930 Kings county produced more than 6,000,000 gallons, and I believe it produces more to-day. But the people of that county will sell no milk to the United States, because even with the reduced rate of duty it is not profitable to do so.

I come now to one of the other great products of the maritime provinces. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Patterson) break his three years of silence in the house to come to the defence of the potato interests of his county. He and the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean), said that the treaty would be of great benefit to the potato producers of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. I believe in the maritimes we produce the finest potatoes produced in Canada. Our climate and soil are particularly adapted to the production of this commodity. Without wishing to give offence, may I say that when I sit down to a meal and see before me watery and soggy potatoes produced in other parts of Canada, I feel it would be worth while if the maritime provinces were given the absolute monopoly of producing potatoes in Canada.

Mr. EULER: That's an idea.

Mr. McGREGOR: No potatoes in the Klondike.

Mrs. BLACK: Yes there are, and the best kind of potatoes.

Mr. BROOKS: The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton claims that the treaty will be of great benefit to potato producers of New Brunswick. I am frank enough to say that there will be some benefits, but certainly they will not be as great as the hon. member would have the house and the country believe. I say that for two reasons, first because of the quota placed against our potatoes entering the United States, and secondly because of the free entry of potatoes from the United States to Canada. The United States produce about 400,000,000 bushels of potatoes yearly. We in Canada produce an average crop of 55,000,000 bushels. The table quota for Canada is 1,000,000 bushels. There is to be a duty in the United States of 37½ cents per hundred pounds for nine months of the year, and 60 cents for three months. The three months in which the greater rate is charged are December, January and February. As the producers of potatoes in the maritime provinces well know, December, January and February are the three important months so far as the export from our province is concerned.

The other day the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) said there was one county in New Brunswick which could more than fill the quota. His statement has been criticized, but I want to say that there are at least four counties in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island which could more than fill the quota. For my authority I quote the census of Canada for 1931, volume 8 page 166. In 1930 Carleton county, New Brunswick, produced 3,525,297 bushels, and Victoria county produced 1,835,710 bushels, the whole province of New Brunswick producing 12,153,067 bushels. Each of the counties of Prince Edward Island produced more than 3,000,000 bushels. Kings county produced 3,110,411 bushels; Prince, 4,471,689 bushels, and Queens, 4,409,564 bushels, making a total for the province of Prince Edward Island of 11,991,664 bushels, or practically the same as New Brunswick. I repeat that there are at least four counties which could fill the quota for the United States.

Let us analyse it from another point of view. We are allowed a quota of 1,000,000 bushels of table potatoes. There are 130,000,000 people in the United States. I do not know exactly how many potatoes there would be in a bushel, but I doubt if there would be many more than 130. However, we will say that there are 260.

Mr. MICHAUD: Depending on the size.

Mr. BROOKS: Yes, depending on the size. Of course we grow large potatoes in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and I am speaking of maritime potatoes.

Mr. MICHAUD: Good potatoes.

[Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. BROOKS: This computation means that we would supply one or two potatoes for each person in the United States. That is the quota we receive under the treaty, and about which we hear hon. members opposite boasting.

The quota on seed potatoes has been doubled, an arrangement which is all to the good. I do not question that fact. However I have heard on reliable authority that the quota of 750,000 bushels which we had before could have been filled by one shipper in Prince Edward Island alone. That may have been incorrect, but I am satisfied that two or three shippers in New Brunswick could fill the quota to-day. It simply means that under the quota only a few people would really benefit from seed potato shipments to the United States. As a matter of fact, the ordinary farmer is not producing seed potatoes, the production of which requires a specialized and expensive process, and is engaged in only by wealthy men.

As far as concessions are concerned, the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton said last night that we received only a small quantity of potatoes from the United States. But he did not tell the house that up to this year here had been a 75 cent duty against potatoes coming in from the United States. There is no question in my mind that as a result of the removal of this 75 cent duty for nine months of the year, there will be far larger quantities coming into this country. As a matter of fact, the United States with a production of 400,000,000 bushels could flood the markets of Canada overnight.

The hon. member also stated that his county stood side by side with the great potato-producing county of Aroostook in Maine. He claimed that the cost of producing in Aroostook is less than the cost in Canada.

Mr. KINLEY: The reverse.

Mr. BROOKS: I stand corrected. As to comparative costs of production on either side of the boundary, I am satisfied that the cost of production in New Brunswick is as great as it is in the state of Maine. What enters into production costs? First, there is farm machinery. I have heard hon. members from every part of this dominion state in this house that we in Canada have to pay more for farm machinery than they do in the United States. The cost of their implements of production must be less. Then the cost of fertilizer has to be considered. There is no doubt that we in Canada pay as much as they do in Maine or other parts of the United States, and I am satisfied that we pay more. The hon. member mentioned that the duty on spraying materials had been reduced from 15 to 7½ per cent. That alone would demonstrate that we pay 7½ per cent more for the spraying of our potatoes than do the people in Maine. Then there is the freight to the centres of population. The cost of shipping to the large centres in the United States will have to be considered. It is said that the cost of labour would be the same, but we must not forget that there is a duty of 60 cents per hundredweight against our potatoes for the months of December, January and February and a duty of 37½ per cent for the other months in the year. With all these costs I am satisfied that the total cost of producing potatoes and marketing them in the United States is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $1 per barrel. There would have to be a considerable difference in the price of potatoes produced in the two countries to make our potatoes attractive in their markets.

The hon. member also said that the potato growers of Maine were stating that they had been "sold down the river". How can a quota of 1,000,000 bushels have much effect upon a production of 350,000,000 or 400,000,000 bushels? Still it is claimed that this treaty is going to work great hardship upon potato producers in the state of Maine and in other parts of the United States. The whole thing is ridiculous. Then the hon. member said that there would be an increased quota when there was underproduction in the United States. We must remember that as a rule when there is a poor crop in the United States, there is also a poor crop in Canada. When drought or some other unfavourable condition causes a poor crop in one country, it generally affects the crop in the other. I have been told that the United States is increasing her production areas in order to be able to produce a few million more bushels.

I come now to another group of primary producers in the maritime provinces, the fishermen. Much has been said in this house about the deplorable condition of our fishermen, and we can refer back to similar speeches made by hon. members in years past. If there is any one group in this dominion which should receive sympathetic consideration from this or any other government, it is the fishermen of these provinces. Senator Duff, who has always been a great advocate of the interests of the fishermen, said some time ago that the only solution of their problem was the free entry of fish into the United States. I do not believe that is possible. Speaking in the house in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I quoted certain Nova Scotia periodicals and the statements of gentlemen who are interested in the fishing industry in that province. They were almost unanimous in the view that the present treaty was of practically no benefit to the fishermen.

When he spoke the other day, the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) did not mention any of the great benefits to accrue from this treaty, but he did say that the lobster and smelt fishermen would be benefited. I know, and this house knows, that for years past lobsters and smelts from Canada have been entering the United States free of duty. The United States want our lobsters because their own sources of supply are being depleted. One of the main sources of supply of smelt in the maritime provinces, and perhaps in the world, is the constituency of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Barry), whom I see opposite me. They cannot secure sufficient smelts in the United States to meet their demands.

The experience of the fishing industry has been that up to the present time there certainly is no improvement, either in markets or in prices. In fact it is almost impossible to force sales, and prices are much lower than they were before the trade treaty went into effect. It would appear that the large fish interests in the United States have made up their minds that they are not going to let Canadian fish flood the market, regardless of what Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. King might wish. I understand that during the past month large quantities of salt and smoked fish have been returned to Canada as unfit for sale. This is a most unusual proceeding, as I understand that in the past all fish have been disposed of at some sort of price, although not always one which was profitable to the shipper. Where fish are returned, in some cases the expenses are greater than the cost of the fish.

During the month of January salt fish prices dropped below the point of profit for Canadian producers. This is the first month in which the treaty has been in effect. For instance, in the fall of 1937 green salted cod sold at 4½ cents per pound f.o.b. shipping point in Nova Scotia. In November, 1938, they were selling at 4 cents per pound. With the trade treaty in view the holders were not anxious to sell, and the United States buyers were not in a hurry to buy, each expecting to derive some benefit from the treaty. Time has proven that the American buyers won out, because they are to-day buying large white-naped, or green salted cod, at 3 cents per pound. Boneless cod, which sold in Boston in early December at 12 cents per pound, sold in January and February at 9 and 10 cents per pound. Most of the fish concerns carried large stock of salt fish into the new year in the hope that the market would improve. Just how some of them are going to pull through with these low prices remains to be seen.

Mr. POTTIER: Are my hon. friend and his party opposed to reduction in the American tariff?

Mr. BROOKS: Not at all, if there is any benefit to be derived. Fresh fish, such as halibut and sworfish, are usually consigned to a commission merchant in Boston with the understanding that they will be sold at market prices which the shipper receives, less freight, duty, entry and commission. Therefore it would seem to me that the shipper should receive the benefit of some part of the duty reduction. My opinion is that the shipper will derive very little, if any, benefit from the treaty, and just at the present time it looks as if he might suffer a heavy loss. There is no doubt whatever that the United States buyer will see to it that he gets the benefit of the duty on all produce purchased f.o.b. shipping point.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that if fifteen years ago there had been some such tariff reduction as is being made in this treaty, before the United States had spent millions of dollars on trawlers and other fishing equipment, the treaty might have been of more benefit to the fishermen of the maritime provinces.

With reference to the concessions on salt fish, they really mean nothing so long as the same concessions are granted to Newfoundland as are granted to Canada. We cannot hope either to increase our markets substantially or to secure enhanced prices. In this connection it is essential to remember that Newfoundland fish come into this country duty free. No reduction was made in the duty on salt mackerel, although a reduction would have been of great benefit to the mackerel fisheries. This is probably due to Norway being the major supplier.

I should like to read an article which appeared in the Halifax Herald of February 17, 1939:

> When the terms of the new Canada-United States trade agreement were announced, men prominent in the fishing industry in the maritime provinces made this forecast:
> 1. The salt fish branch of the industry would not be advantaged as a result of the agreement.
> 2. While the volume of sales of Nova Scotia fresh fish would be enlarged in the American market, the price to the primary producers in this province would not be increased.

[Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. BARRY: That is Tory doctrine, I take it.

Mr. BROOKS: My hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Barry) has not taken the opportunity during the past four years to offer any criticism, but no doubt he will stand up and give us his criticisms later. I continue the quotation:

> Early in the new year the manager of the Massachusetts fisheries Association saw "as the first actual effect of the tariff reduction on Canadian fish, under the new Canada-United States trade treaty, a price-drop that came immediately on resumption of business after the Christmas holidays."
> And now, representatives of the New England coast fisheries are meeting "to discuss limitation of catches for Boston boats." A Boston dispatch says:
> "The market has been crowded with Nova Scotia fish since the Canada-United States trade treaty (which made concessions to Canadian fish) took effect. As a result it is necessary to find some way of preventing a surplus flooding the local market."
> While even yet it is too early to attempt any definite analysis of the effects of this agreement upon the fishing industry of this province, it does seem reasonable to assume (as has been pointed out by men prominent in the industry) that a greater influx of Nova Scotia fresh fish into the American market may have a tendency to depress prices there.
> At all events there would appear to be general agreement that the price to the Nova Scotia fishermen themselves will not be increased.

That is the important point, Mr. Speaker, that the price to the Nova Scotia fishermen themselves will not be increased, and since the price is the crux of the whole fishing problem in this province, to obtain any substantial benefit from this new agreement the fishermen will require more money for their products and for their labour, and any benefits coming from this agreement are not getting through to the fishermen of Nova Scotia.

Mr. KINLEY: What is my hon. friend reading from?

Mr. BROOKS: From an article appearing in the Halifax Herald, of February 17. The hon. member can give us his views if he does not agree with it.

Mr. KINLEY: I thought you were quoting Mr. Cooley, of the fish association. He was very much against the agreement, you know.

Mr. BROOKS: I now come to coal. There is very little to be said on the coal mining side of this agreement. As I said at the outset, the primary producers are the ones that must be benefited. I ask hon. members from Nova Scotia, what benefit does this treaty give to the coal miners of their province?

One thing is certain, and we may as well face it now as later, and that is that there is no immediate hope for the coal industry of the maritime provinces through increased duties designed to shut out a greater portion of the imported fuel coal that is now flooding the Canadian market. Canadian coal duties are bound in the new trade treaty; they cannot be raised during the lifetime of the agreement, and actually there has been a cut in the duty when you take into account the removal of the import excise duty of three per cent. It reduces the binding scale during the lifetime of the agreement.

With thousands of men out of employment in the great coal industry of the maritime provinces, this government makes a treaty with the United States which allows a greater importation of coal into Canada from that country. As a matter of fact, statistics show that there is as much coal imported into Canada as there is produced in Canada.

If I had time I should like to quote from the brief of the Nova Scotia government which was presented to the federal government a short time ago, but my time is passing. On the one hand we have this government paying out millions of dollars for asssitance to the coal miners in the maritime provinces by way of subvention, and also the bonus of 75 cents, and on the other hand it allows American coal to come into this country to compete with the very same coal which this government is assisting so that it may reach the central market in Canada. That is an anomalous situation which it is very hard to understand.

Some hon. members have spoken of the great benefits which will be derived from lowering the duty on furs. I have not time to go into that this afternoon, but the bulletin of the Prince Edward Island fox pool comments upon it in an article which appeared not long ago. It sent the chairman of their organization to New York, and he found that the prices of furs were being depressed in the New York market. Why? Because under the favoured nation clause of this treaty furs are coming in from Scandinavian countries, competing with the furs of the United States and Canada, and depressing the market away below the prices which could be secured in the London market. As this article in the bulletin of the Prince Edward Island fox pool says, "There is no benefit, or very little, to the producers of furs in this province."

Mr. EULER: May I ask my hon. friend a question? Would he really assume from that, that the fur producer of Canada would prefer the tariff to remain high against imports into the American market?

Mr. BROOKS: I am simply stating the facts.

Mr. EULER: That is the assumption one must place on the hon. member's statement.

Mr. BROOKS: If the hon. member has any quarrel he will have to have it with the Prince Edward Island pool.

Mr. EULER: I have no quarrel with anyone.

Mr. BROOKS: They are the people who should know.

Mr. EULER: They asked for it—the reduction of the American tariff.

Mr. BROOKS: One of the great benefits that have been lost by Canada, particularly the maritime provinces—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I regret to interrupt, but the hon. member has exhausted his time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. BROOKS: I thank hon. members for the courtesy that they have extended to me, as they have done to others.

It should be of no small consequence that a breach has been made in the wall of empire preference. For five years Canada has enjoyed substantial benefits from her trade with the empire. In fact, during the darkest days of the depression this preference was the salvation of the Canadian people. We found a market for our lumber, farm products and the products of other industries. This was recognized by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in 1935, when, speaking of the agreement then before the House of Commons, he said:

> Let me say that the present administration when it began the negotiation of this agreement made it a matter of policy that nothing would be done in the agreement with the United States that would in any way affect any of the provisions of the Canada-United Kingdom agreements.

These were the words of the leader of a party who himself, with his supporters, fought for weeks to prevent the ratification of the Ottawa agreements.

The Prime Minister may have kept his promise in 1935, but in the 1938 treaty we find that the price which the Canadian people have had to pay is a paring down of the British preference on wheat, bacon, lumber, apples, pears, honey, leather, manufacturing goods and many other articles.

The great problems of this country are not such academic theories as the economic appeasement of the United States, but the practical problems of unity of our own people in the Dominion of Canada and the solving of our unemployment problem. Does the Prime Minister think that we can have a happy and united people if we sacrifice the interest of our working men and farmers for the benefit of United States working men and farmers—those engaged in the production of coal, apples, and so on?

The burden of unemployment continues to bend the back and embitter the spirit of the Canadian people. It is our great problem—a baffling and terrible one. Can hon. members opposite claim that it is being solved by this treaty? I am satisfied when the full force of these concessions to the United States is felt, our difficulties in this connection will be greater than they were before. It is the coal miner of the United States who will receive more employment; the longshoremen of Boston and Baltimore, and not the port workers of Saint John and Halifax; the apple growers of the forty-one apple producing states of the United States and not those of Annapolis valley, Nova Scotia, or of the Okanagan valley of British Columbia.

Already there are many industries that are suffering and many men on the street who had worked before this treaty came into effect. The Prime Minister talks of economic appeasement. The United States, as I said in my previous remarks, is a great democratic country. She is interested in the protection of her democratic institutions, and the government are trying to make a patriotic issue of this treaty. This is the same government that refused to extend a friendly hand when England wanted to train airmen in Canada hardly a year ago, but instead gave them the cold shoulder. It is the same government which, while recognizing that England with her fleet is practically the sole defence to-day of the homes of our Canadian people should we be attacked, has not uttered one word of encouragement or sympathy in this house during the past three years in regard to the tremendous problems which the mother country is called upon to solve.

Mr. BRADETTE: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, early this session I tried to quote from a newspaper article and I was stopped by the chair. I do not want to reflect upon any member but I maintain that a privilege enjoyed by one member should be extended to all. I should like to have your ruling. When I tried to quote from a newspaper I was stopped by every section of the house.

[Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The point is well taken, but it is also well known in this house that for some weeks hon. members have been permitted, rightly or wrongly, to read from newspapers.

Mr. G. W. McDONALD (Souris): The Minister of National Resources (Mr. Crerar) this afternoon very properly referred to the splendid position Canada had attained in world trade, not only on a per capita basis but from the standpoint of quantity and quality. Eighty per cent of that trade is with Great Britain and the United States, which two countries have been linked up in the trade treaty now before the house.

If there is one thing that this government should get credit for, surely it is its success in making trade treaties. I am sure the farmers of western Canada will appreciate the outlet that has been found for the commodities that we produce in such great quantities in this dominion. I know that the opposition to the treaty comes from protected interests, but I would remind those protected interests that even the largest industries in Canada must find a market for their goods beyond the boundaries of the country if they hope to attain any great success. That is true of agriculture, and it is certainly true of mining, lumbering and fishing. It must be true of any industry that hopes to capture its share of the markets in the world.

I am not an expert on trade matters, and so I will speak of this treaty as it applies to the part of the country from which I come. It has been suggested that in making a treaty with the United States any benefit we may receive in that direction we lose in the British market. Hon. members must not forget that Great Britain herself was in sympathy with us in entering into the treaty, and in fact requested it. In my opinion the people of western Canada particularly will be more than pleased with the results of the treaty. Take the cattle quota. The very fact that it was filled within one month should prove the popularity of the treaty. I have figures to show that on November 10, a few days before the treaty was announced, good killing steers in Winnipeg were selling at from $3.50 to $5.50 a hundred. On December 27, a few days before the treaty went into effect, prices had risen to from $4.25 to $6.25. In January they rose as high as from $5.25 to $7.25, or from $5.50 for top prices to $7.25, which is an advance of 1¾ cents a pound. Surely that is an advantage to the cattle growers of the country. I realize that there has been some recession since then, and at the present time the advance is only about one half cent a pound, but that is still one cent higher than the price prior to the announcement of the treaty. By the first of April there is no doubt that prices will again advance, and it is not expected that the quotas will be filled so quickly in the three terms that are yet before us in the present year.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) tries to champion the cause of the farmers, and of course, he has no apologies to make for doing so, but I cannot understand why he should add his opposition to a treaty such as this. It will not gain him any support in western Canada. I suggest that if there is one thing that the people in the west have against the Liberal government, it is that they have not gone far enough in the reduction of duties. However, they have set their faces in the right direction. One-third of the people of this country get their livelihood from farming and two-thirds of the people are directly concerned with the success of agriculture. Why should it be the duty of this or any other government, therefore, to block the outlets for the produce of the country, with which two-thirds of the people are very directly concerned? That should not be the duty of the government.

As I say, I am not a tariff expert, and I do not make a study of these things. But I do not like to see any government too friendly with the tariff protected interests. It is not good for the country. The men that run big industry in this dominion need very little protection; they are well qualified to look after their own interests; it is the working men, the farmers, who have not very much of the good things of this life, who need protection. I hope our government will never become too friendly with the tariff experts. I have a suspicion that the tariff experts are altogether too friendly with the big industries of this country. I have nothing against big industry, and the farmers should not have anything against them, provided they are willing to stand on their own feet.

I know the western farmers have received and are receiving some protection in the form of a bonus on wheat. I am sorry the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) is not in his seat at the present time. He has said a great deal about wheat. But I want to put it to the fair-mindedness of hon. members and of the farmers of western Canada, or of all Canada for that matter: Which government exhibited the most courage—the Bennett government in September, 1935, after six years of the worst drought on the north American continent, both in our country and in the United States, facing an election, setting the guaranteed price of wheat at 87½ cents a bushel when the open market price was 82 cents; or this government in 1938, when wheat was 70 cents or less in the open market—I am sure that October wheat was less than 70 cents a bushel—facing the biggest world crop ever produced, and yet, being willing in face of those conditions, to set the price at 80 cents a bushel? I leave it to the fair judgment of the farmers of this country which government showed the most courage.

Mr. HOMUTH: But did you not have participating certificates with that?

Mr. McDONALD (Souris): What were they worth?

Mr. HOMUTH: What would they have been worth if the government had distributed the money?

Mr. McDONALD (Souris): That is a question which will be settled in the future. Some people say there is $20,000,000, some say $24,000,000, in the hands of this government. I hope they are right. In connection with durum wheat there were some millions of dollars in the hands of the government when the present administration took office. But the hon. member for Qu'Appelle was never able to induce the government of his party to give that money to the people of western Canada. This government had to do it. Any success that this country is ever going to have in making trade treaties will certainly come from a Liberal government or a government that is liberal-minded in that respect.

Much has been said about the press releases by Canada and by the United States. It is easy to see the inconsistency in the arguments of hon. members of the opposition. They say that the press release issued by this government is propaganda, ballyhoo; but they quote from the press release of the United States government to show what a fine treaty this is from the point of view of the United States. Both cannot be right. Surely it is fairer to say that the press release by each government was something in the nature of propaganda. That is quite natural.

I have referred to tariffs. I live in a small town within twelve miles of the United States border. This very year I know one family of three boys who had about 10,000 bushels of renown wheat. One day they got in their car, went across to North Dakota and sold that wheat there for seed grain at $1.10 a bushel. Those boys saved this government over $2,000 by way of wheat bonus.

United States cattle buyers come to our town, pick up all kinds of cattle and give our farmers a better price than they can get in Canada, because two outlets are better than one. True, our United States friends are getting pretty cute; it is said they are too cute for us. They are clever; we have to admit that. But still it is another outlet and we get better prices than we otherwise would.

I have known them to come over to buy flour. When flour was high in the United States, the flour men in our town sold carload after carload to our United States friends. They buy woollen goods in the same way. I knew one man who came over last year to buy a carload of lumber and he said he saved $17 a thousand feet. Surely that is good for Canadian workmen. Our hon. friends to the left say that unless you raise the tariff Canadian workmen are put out of business. Mr. Speaker, Canadian workmen will never be idle if the trade activities of this country are developed.

I should like to quote a few figures to show that this government has dealt more fairly with Great Britain than have our Conservative friends. I take the percentages of trade. In 1926 our exports to Great Britain were 38·5 per cent of our total exports, and our exports to the United States amounted to 36·4 per cent. Six years later, when the Bennett government was in office, our exports to Great Britain were only 29 per cent, a drop of 9·5 per cent. I admit there was some reason for that; there was a depression; wheat had not the same value it had in 1926. We should be fair about these things. But our exports to the United States had risen to 42·9 per cent of the total.

In 1937, with a Liberal government again in office, we sent to Great Britain 38·4 per cent of our total exports, back to the 1926 figures. But our exports to the United States were down 1·9 per cent to 41 per cent.

Much has been said about the recession of 1938. There was some recession. Here are the figures for that year. To Great Britain our exports were 38.2 per cent, down just two-tenths of one per cent. To the United States they were 39·6 per cent, or down 1·6 per cent. The drop in our exports to the United States was just a little greater than the drop in those to Great Britain.

Let us take imports. This is the point that hurts our Conservative friends. In 1926, 17·6 per cent of our imports came from Great Britain, and 65·6 per cent from the United States; a large amount, I admit. But with what country in the world should we do more business than the United States? Their way of life is similar to ours; we live side by side, transportation costs must of necessity be less; it is the most natural thing in the world for us to deal with them. Let us come to 1932. In that year 18·4 per cent of our imports came from Great Britain, while the proportion from the United States dropped to 60·8 per cent. In 1937, under Liberal rule, 19·3 per cent of our imports came from Great Britain, and 58·7 per cent from the United States, the latter percentage being down 2·1 per cent. Then we come to 1938, when the percentage from Great Britain was down a little, to 18·2 per cent, and from the United States the proportion had risen to 61 per cent. But on the whole these figures prove that the Liberals have been more consistent in their dealings with Great Britain than have our Conservative friends.

Much has been said about potatoes. They are not an important product in our part of the country, but I remember a time not five years distant when the people of Manitoba were petitioning their provincial government to petition this government to take the duty off potatoes in order that we might get potatoes from the eastern part of North Dakota where they had a good crop. In our part of the country potatoes were selling for $1.25, and we think it is a pretty big price when they command over 50 cents.

My predecessor from the constituency of Souris made a great fuss about inducing the federal government to put a duty on corn, so that we might feed our own barley. I am here to say that barley never dropped to such low prices as it did in 1931, 1932, 1933 and 1934. In our part of the country barley and oats were so cheap that it paid us to burn them in the furnace rather than buy coal. I know there is a saying which goes, "Wilful waste makes woeful want," and that certainly was the case in Canada. I do not think we had any business burning oats and barley; I do not think they were made for that purpose, but our people could get practically nothing for them. Day after day I listened to radio broadcasts quoting five cents a bushel as the street price for oats, when the freight rate was 25 cents per 100 pounds, while seven and eight cents a bushel were offered for barley. That was under the Bennett regime. Surely everyone knows these commodities cannot be grown at such low prices. But my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle will say that this government scuttled the wheat pool and sold the farmers of western Canada to the grain exchange. I ask him why his government let wheat go as low as 38½ cents a bushel at Fort William.

Tariffs will do funny things, and I should like to illustrate that by something I think I mentioned once before in this house. As I have said, my predecessor induced the government of the day to put a duty against United States corn. It was reported on good authority that a carload of United States corn, passing down the St. Lawrence river en route to some European port, passed a carload of corn from South Africa bound for Canada. Corn was cheap in the United States; but our tariff was so high that we could not import it; we had to send to South Africa for it, while we let our United States friends send their corn to Europe. Will anyone say that trade, conducted along the right lines, does not tend towards friendship, or that the reverse is not equally true?

Much has been said against this treaty. It has been made light of; we have been told that it will not help the cause of peace in any way. The other day an hon. member on the other side of the house very properly said that trade between individuals tends towards friendship, and that is equally true in respect to nations because nations are no different from individuals. Surely if there is one thing more than another that we should try to do, living side by side with the United States, it is to improve our trading position. If we are able to do business more freely than has been the case in the past, I do not think we need worry about the future with regard to relations between our two countries.

I think this government is to be congratulated upon having consummated so many trade treaties. We must secure outlets for our goods; we cannot pile them up. As I have already said, I am sure this government is not going to turn down any possibility of increasing the trade of Canada, and when we increase trade we will reduce unemployment, which can be reduced in no other way. The United States has poured billions of dollars into public works, but it has more unemployment now than it ever had. The problem cannot be solved in that way. I am sorry there are so many unemployed in this country. I should like to see our government do just a little bit more for them, but possibly they are trying to avoid the mistakes made by our neighbours to the south. I know, however, the people of Canada will not condemn the government for trying to increase the good effects of the treaty which they negotiated in 1935.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I agree with what was said by my hon. friend from Camrose (Mr. Marshall). I intend to vote for this treaty; but I wish to protest in the strongest possible terms against the idea which I have heard expressed by so many in this house, that free trade or a lowering of the tariff or any manipulation of the tariff can cure the economic ills from which Canada, as well as the rest of the civilized world, is suffering at the present time. During the election campaign the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) promised monetary reform, but beyond a change in the ownership of the central bank our financial policy has not been altered in the least. And to hold out this trade treaty as a cure for unemployment and all the other economic troubles with which we are faced can only be described, I think, as the grossest fraud and deception.

While sitting in my place here I have heard a great deal about free trade from hon. members on the opposite side. Perhaps I have the advantage over many of them, because I know what free trade is, having been brought up in a free trade country. I am not going into a long discussion as to the merits of free trade or protection. I think the best proof of what we, in this corner say, is the fact that free trade, and the party which sponsored it in England, no longer exist. The Liberals in Canada, it seems to me, have the advantage of talking free trade but administering the country under protection. I do not say that either protection or free trade would solve our economic problems; I do not say that either protection or free trade is the cause of our troubles. They are, in fact, an effect and not a cause. I heard one hon. member opposite put the blame for the depression on the tariff policy of Mr. Bennett and his government. It is absolutely inconceivable to me that such a statement could be made in this house. Beyond any quibbling at all, beyond any doubt whatever, the cause of our economic troubles is financial—and one does not have to take the word of social crediters for that. It is a fact, and I think it is generally acknowledged to be a fact, that our troubles are financial, and that nothing short of a complete and fundamental change in the financial set-up of the country will bring about any permanent or real cure for our economic troubles.

If free trade is the solution, as we have been told, I would ask Liberal members to explain, if they can, why it is that in the United States, where among the different states there is complete free trade and an absolute parity of exchange, the people of New York cannot do business with the people of California. The other day I saw a photograph of a pile of oranges as big as this building, which had been dumped on the ground. There is no tariff to keep those oranges out of the state of New York. Why do these two states not do business? The reason lies in the faulty financial system which piles up debts and prices faster than it generates purchasing power to consume what it produces.

I was brought up in England, and I have been familiar with conditions in Great Britain under free trade. Whether or not the blame is put on free trade, the fact remains that it was under free trade that the slums of England were built. If free trade did not cause the slums it certainly did not prevent them. There is no argument against that. I will answer any question on the point, because questions do not worry me in the slightest, and I do not wish to make statements capable of successful contradiction.

This week I received from an advertising agency a circular calling attention to the fact that there were so many millions of pounds of butter piling up in Canada and that if we did not get rid of the surplus by shipping it out of the country the price of butter would drop to ruinous levels. I undertake to say that if one were to go into ninety per cent of the homes in Canada he would hear the mother or father say to the children eating their suppers: "Now, kids, go easy on the butter; it is thirty cents a pound." I say that not one pound of butter should be exported from Canada until every man, woman and child has all the butter he or she can poke down his or her throat. They should have all the butter they need and all they can possibly use before we should consider exporting a pound of it. We hear about the exportation of apples. How many homes in Canada are supplied with all the apples they need this winter?

Another thing which always strikes me as being the height of absurdity is to talk about a favourable balance of trade. I should like to have explained to me how a country can be said to be enjoying a favourable balance of trade when that expression implies that the country is exporting more of its real wealth than it is receiving in exchange. How can that be a favourable balance of trade? Then, if it is the other way round, and if we are lucky enough to receive more than we export we are said to have an unfavourable balance of trade. Why, the terms are surely contradictory; I cannot see any other explanation.

We are told that freer trade is the way to peace. I do not think that is so at all. When I lived in England before the great war I was a grown man, and anyone in England in the period from the Boer war to the great war who took an interest in public affairs and gave expression to them would have said that war between Germany and England was only a matter of time. It was supposed that those two countries lived on their exports. I do not know how they would live on exports, but that is what we were told; because they lived on their exports there was not room for Germany and England in the markets of the world, and war had to come. And it did. That view was endorsed by President Wilson after the war. He said that the great war was not a political war, but a commercial war waged to secured the markets of the world.

I should like to say a few words with respect to unemployment and its relation to foreign trade. If foreign trade is to be successful we must under-cut our foreign competitors. The only way, or at least the main way, to under-cut or under-sell a competitor is to decrease either the rates of wages or the numbers of men employed. Let us take for example my own business of wheat farming. When I first went to western Canada the farmers used to employ 60,000 or 70,000 harvesters each fall. Now each man does his own harvesting. One man runs a tractor, and cuts and threshes his crop without any help at all. How can he compete in the markets of the world, unless he attempts to cut down his expense? The chief way of cutting expenses is to cut labour costs; I do not know of any other way.

Economic nationalism has been spoken of as though it were a sin. But what are we told? What does any farmer learn after a lifetime of farming? What is he taught—if it is not to produce everything he possibly can for himself, and only trade what he cannot use for what he cannot possibly raise? That is economic nationalism, and surely it is nothing but common sense.

Hon. members in this group are not opposed to trade, but we are opposed to trade for trade's sake. We cannot see the sense of trading merely for the sake of trading. We believe every country should produce as much as it can, and export only what it cannot consume in exchange for what it cannot produce. Surely that is common sense. I believe, if every country did that, and minded its own business, there would be a great deal less danger of war than there is to-day.

I happen to be an Englishman, and as such I believe I know pretty well what Englishmen think. If any hon. member thinks that the English farmer is endeared to his colonial brethren by the dumping of their goods on his market—well, that person does not know very much about the English farmer.

The Australian and English cricket matches have done more to bring about goodwill between those two countries than any trade treaty that could be signed. I believe, if we could meet the old country more often in games such as football and cricket, it would bring about a better feeling than could be brought about by all the trade treaties that ever will be signed.

Germany has gone so far as to export part of its population. It is dumping its Jews on the markets of the world in exchange for goods. That is the logical end of this insanity of "free trade". Those that are not wanted are to be dumped on the other countries; they are to be held up for ransom. The other countries are being told; You will either take them or pay us in goods.

The London Times cannot be accused of sensationalism, but last Christmas it contained columns of advertisements by clergymen and other people asking for coal. It was said there were thousands and thousands of poor people in London and elsewhere who, it was felt, should have fires in their grates, at least on Christmas day. Will anyone say that because France or some other country reduces its imports of British coal, therefore the British people should go without coal? Why is it that there are tens of thousands of people in London and other centres without fires in their grates, when in Wales there are tens of thousands of miners out of work because the mines are idle? If it could be said that there was no coal, that it must be imported, it would be a different matter, but they cannot say that. There is nothing in the world to prevent the British people from supplying themselves with their own coal; but I suppose they will have to wait until some coal can be sent to Canada, and then they may be able to get some for themselves from Russia. That will be so much more convenient.

I have contended that our economic troubles are financial and not brought about because of lack of free trade. I am going to quote, not a social crediter, but Mr. R. G. Hawtrey, the secretary of the British treasury. In a publication entitled, The Art of Central Banking, he says:

> The common factor in pre-war, and post-war, experience is the intimate association of the state of trade with the enlargements and compressions of consumers' income and outlay effected by central banks. If this fundamental causal sequence were understood, the public would hardly acquiesce in the central banks proceeding from their position of complacent detachment to generate depressions, unemployment, bankruptcy, budget deficits and defaults, with all the resulting political and social convulsions while government after government is broken because it can neither stem the flood of ruin nor even provide tolerable palliatives to alleviate the consequences.

I certainly think the words of that gentleman are worthy of the respect of anyone in this house. If he does not know what he is talking about, then I do not know who does.

Here is one point which so far does not seem to have been discussed. The world to-day faces a situation which has never existed before, in that a fraction of the people are able to produce the necessities of life for everyone. That is the fundamental fact which we are up against; it is a problem which will not be solved by juggling tariffs or trying to dispose of what we cannot consume by exporting it to a country which cannot consume what it has produced itself. This condition was forced upon my attention when I was farming. I soon came to realize that if I raised a good crop, then there would not be any price. If there was a good price, then there was no crop. It should be obvious to everyone that if we are to be penalized for producing plenty, then we must be condemned to scarcity forever.

We heard of how they ploughed up the cotton in the United States. Even the mules had more sense because they had to be trained before they would do it. It cannot be said that cotton was not needed, because half the working men in the United States were going round with patches on their pants. I would not like to say that half their wives were not going round branded with "Ogilvie's flour," or something of the kind. In the United States they are actually paying people not to produce. They are endeavouring to reduce the amount of goods produced down to a limited supply of money. I think it was Henry Ford who said that to-day we produce goods in order to buy money, whereas we should be producing money in order to buy goods. Money is kept scarce because, like wheat or anything else, when it is plentiful it is not worth anything. In order to keep up the interest rates, money is being artificially curtailed. Interest is the core of our trouble. This country and the people in it are being sacrificed in order to keep up the interest rates. Scarce money, what they call sound money—

Mr. HOMUTH: It is getting scarcer.

Mr. JAQUES: Yes. In order to conform to a scarcity of money, there must be a scarcity of goods. As soon as people become at all enterprising in the production of goods, they are penalized with ruinous prices for what they have produced. Nothing but a fundamental change in our financial sytem will alter this condition. We in this group believe that a physical possibility should be made financially possible, but apparently the rest of the house thinks that only what is financially desirable shall be physically possible. There is the difference, I think, between the ideas of this group and the ideas of our opponents.

As I said, the right hon. the Prime Minister promised before or during the election that he would issue currency and credit in terms of public need. Of course, I know that idea is ridiculed here. We have been told that we know less about money than anybody on God's green earth. But that does not worry us. We knew this, which the house did not know, that the banks created money, and I believe we can claim it was on account of our statements in this corner of the house that for the first time, I think, in history a responsible minister of the crown has put into the parliamentary records the correct facts of exactly how money is created.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Not quite correct.

Mr. DUNNING: If the hon. member is referring to me, I suggest that he state the facts correctly.

Mr. JAQUES: The minister is quite capable of putting the facts himself. I could not improve on his statement, but even the prestige of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) is not sufficient to convert a number of members of this house. Some of them are still skeptical as to where money comes from exactly, and where it goes to.

Mr. MacINNIS: Have you converted the Minister of Finance?

Mr. JAQUES: That is the inference I draw, yes.

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid we have a different view of the same set of facts.

Mr. JAQUES: Then we agree to differ.

I should like to say, if I am in order, that since all money is created by the banks, then all money is a debt; that being the case, the only money we shall ever have with which to pay our debts is another debt, and if all debts are paid then there would not be any money. I am perfectly willing to stand by those statements, and I shall be interested if any member of the house can disprove them.

[Mr. Homuth.]

Furthermore, since no money ever gets into circulation except as a debt, with an interest charge, it follows that debt must increase, and it is increasing and will continue to increase. I believe that the classic example of a real estate deal was the sale of the island of Manhattan somewhere around 1600 for some thirty or forty dollars. That has been regarded generally as the greatest real estate bargain that was ever made. But I believe I am correct when I say it has been calculated that if the man who bought the island had invested an equivalent amount of money at compound interest, then by to-day he would be able to buy up not only the city of New York but the whole state of New York. That shows the absurdity of thinking we can ever pay our debts under a system of debt money and interest. It is out of the question.

In conclusion, I should like to refer to the statement of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) that if conditions which exist to-day not only in Canada but elsewhere are not righted, he would not give parliament another twenty years of life. I myself, in my humble way, would not go as far as twenty years. It is not a question of the life of any party, Liberal or Conservative; that is a matter of no great importance; but it is parliament itself which is at stake. I absolutely agree with the hon. leader of the opposition when he says that he would not give parliament another twenty years of life if it cannot bring about the results which the people of Canada want, and—here I have the advantage over hon. ministers because wherever they go they are known while I am not known, and people always talk more freely when they do not know who is listening—what the people of Canada want more than anything else is economic security and the freedom to enjoy it. They must have security, and if in the end they cannot get economic security with freedom, they will have it without—and that means dictatorship.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend think economic security without freedom is possible as a permanent condition?

Mr. JAQUES: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: Economic security without freedom as a permanent condition?

Mr. JAQUES: Yes, and I should say that is the condition of the vast majority of the civilized world to-day. So-called freedom lingers on here in Canada. We have political freedom, but we certainly do not have economic security. In Germany they have economic security but not political freedom.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. JAQUES: I would say that a man in gaol has economic security. He knows that to-morrow he will have his work, his meals and his bed, which is more than a great number of Canadians know. Men have said that if they could break a window and get into gaol they would at least be secure.

Mr. SPEAKER: It being six o'clock—

Mr. JAQUES: May I have just one minute more, Mr. Speaker?

In conclusion, I would say that unless parliament itself, not this particular parliament but the institution of parliamentary government, can bring better results, then its days are numbered within the next ten or fifteen years, and parliament as an institution is doomed. Whether hon. members agree with me I do not know, but that is my opinion and it is one I have formed after pretty wide travel and inquiry from one side of Canada to the other.

Mr. DUNNING: What would the hon. member put in its place?

Mr. JAQUES: It is not for me to tell this government how to do it, but somehow or another we must bring economic security to the people of Canada and at the same time retain our freedom. If we do not do this, then they will demand security without freedom, and that is dictatorship in some form or another.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

LORD'S DAY ACT

PENALTY FOR OFFICERS AND DIRECTORS PERMITTING VIOLATION OF THE ACT

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain) moved the second reading of Bill No. 7, to amend the Lord's Day Act.

He said: Supported as I am by La Ligue du Dimanche, by the great majority of the citizens of the province of Quebec, by countless societies and labour unions, and also by the Lord's Day Alliance, I feel it my duty to bring again before this house an amendment to the Lord's Day Act similar to the one which was adopted by the house last year. It will be remembered that my bill of last year purported solely to increase the penalties under the Lord's Day Act in order, to use a common expression, to give teeth to that law. The reasons for the amendment I moved last year still hold good, and it is not my intention to repeat them to-night.

It was in the senate that the bill received its death-blow. When it came back from that body there was nothing left of its original tenor; it was changed from beginning to end. The senate pretended to have adequately amended the Lord's Day Act by increasing the maximum fines and leaving the minimum fines practically as they were before. But, as all corporations have the means to prepare the strongest legal defences, it follows that nothing but minimum fines would, in most instances, be imposed and the violation of the law would continue. It was inconsistent for those in the other place to say that no corporations were violating the law, and at the same time to pretend to impose more severe sanctions. On the other hand, if there is, as is alleged, no violation of the Lord's Day Act, why should there be any fear of stricter sanctions?

My bill purports solely to give to our courts the discretionary power to impose gaol sentences upon those who make their employees work on Sundays. Let me read the amendment:

> Section 14 of the Lord's Day Act, chapter 123 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:
> (2) Any person, being a director, an officer, a superintendent or an employee of a corporation, to whose direction or orders any employee is by the terms or conditions of his employment bound to conform, who authorizes or directs any such last mentioned employee of that corporation to carry on any part of the business of the corporation in violation of any of the provisions of this act, shall be liable, on summary conviction before two justices of the peace, to similar penalties to those to which a corporation is liable under subsection 1 of this section, or for a first offence, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months and not less than one month, with or without hard labour, and for each subsequent offence, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months and not less than two months, with or without hard labour.

An amendment which only increases the minimum fine is, in my opinion, a fool-trap. In fact, the hon. senator for Parkdale made the following statement as to last year's amendment by the senate:

> I regard the amendment as merely a wooden gun with which to do some hunting. I think it is absolutely useless for the purpose of accomplishing what all hon. members of the committee desire, that is, to prevent unnecessary work on Sunday, which has prevailed in certain parts of the country.

He continued:

> It seems to me that every time an important measure comes up here which contemplates the protection of the less fortunate members of Canada's society we devote our entire attention to the question whether we may not be doing an injustice to somebody higher up in the Canadian social scale. Personally, I think it is wrong. I think this provision is entirely useless, and simply amounts to the hunting of violators of the Lord's Day Act with a wooden gun.

Since the only objections came from the other chamber last year, it is my duty to confine my remarks to those objections. Imaginary fears and impossible dangers of all sorts were alleged as arguments against the bill which I introduced last year and which I reintroduce now. Let me refute those arguments by stating that we all know and admit that some works or operations of continuous process can be done on Sunday. Some one brought out as an objection to my bill that certain operations of continuous process compelled some plants to operate on Sunday, and concluded that, if my amendment were passed, the directors of those particular corporations or plants would be liable to imprisonment.

Before raising such a futile and frivolous objection, one should take pains to read the law as it now stands. The Lord's Day Act permits the following work to be done on Sunday. Section 11, paragraph (d), provides:

> Starting or maintaining fires, making repairs to furnaces, and repairs in cases of emergency, and doing any other work when such fires, repairs, or work are essential to any industry or industrial process of such a continuous nature that it cannot be stopped without serious injury to such industry, or its product or to the plant or property used in such process.

My amendment does not restrict this exception. Some one else objected to my amendment because certain industries, such as the canning industry, must occasionally operate on Sunday, and said that my bill would render the directors of such industries liable to imprisonment for having done nothing but urgent work. Perhaps that objector should in the first place have read paragraphs (e), (m) and (w) of section 11 of the Lord's Day Act, which permit the following works on Sunday. Paragraph (m) refers to perishable products which would apply to the canning industry, and it reads:

> (m) The caring for milk, cheese, and live animals and the unloading of and caring for perishable products and live animals, arriving at any point during the Lord's day.

Paragraph (w) reads:

> (w) Any unavoidable work on the Lord's day to save property in cases of emergency, or where such property is in imminent danger of destruction or serious injury.

[Mr. Brunelle.]

And paragraph (e) reads:

> (e) Starting or maintaining fires, and ventilating, hunting out and inspecting mines, when any such work is essential to the protection of property, life or health.

These exceptions do not cover the whole ground; section 11 itself makes provision for others. Section 11 reads:

> Notwithstanding anything herein contained, any person may on the Lord's day do any work of necessity or mercy, and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the ordinary meaning of the expression "work of necessity or mercy," it is hereby declared that it shall be deemed to include the following classes of work.

There are exceptions particularly mentioned, but there may be others according to the circumstances of each case. On the other hand, ample protection to all is accorded from other sources.

In the first place, the provision for imprisonment mentioned in my bill is only an alternative; the courts would be free to impose the same penalties as before if they thought fit. In the second place, the attorney general for each province cannot fail to look into the circumstances of each case before a prosecution is started. We all know that instructions to prosecute for violations of the Lord's Day Act must come from the attorney general of the province in which the offence occurs. I refer to section 16 of the act:

> No action or prosecution for a violation of this act shall be commenced without the leave of the attorney general for the province in which the offence is alleged to have been committed, nor after the expiration of sixty days from the time of the commission of the alleged offence.

In the third place, our courts are fair and equitable, and they would always take into consideration whatever extenuating circumstances might be alleged in favour of those who find it urgent and necessary to work on Sunday.

In reality, if my amendment were accepted, directors or officers of corporations need do only one simple thing to protect themselves; let them definitely and officially notify their superintendents or managers not to do on Sunday any work which is forbidden by the Lord's Day Act, and then there would be no more violations of the law. If there be violations, I submit that directors or officers of corporations, who often are away from the scene of operation of their plants, having given this notice, would have a good defence to any action started against them. Undoubtedly some plants operate on Sunday in violation of the act. Again and again I have seen workmen passing in front of my house on Sundays with their lunch boxes, on their way to the mill to do some work which I know is not urgent. Some transport companies send their trucks out to work on Sundays in violation of the Lord's Day Act, and I am sure some stores and places of business do business on Sunday in violation of the provisions of that act.

I am not a fanatic; I am not moved by excessive religious zeal. Some provincial authorities have the monopoly of such extravagant virtues; I do not want to be a competitor with them in that field. I do not want to do harm to the directors or officers of our corporations, to those who may be innocent or who violate the law in good faith. What I do want is that the penalties under the Lord's Day Act should reach those particular directors or officers who, through indifference or lack of respect for the Christian views of their workmen, do not hesitate to set them to work on Sunday. That is all I want. My humble opinion is that the penalties at present set forth in the Lord's Day Act are not a sufficient deterrent.

The amendment which was made to my bill of last year created an injustice. These corporation plants are built and run with money subscribed by shareholders and bondholders, and it is wrong that directors or officers who allow the law to be violated, should, instead of being personally liable to the penalty, make the funds of the corporation liable. Those funds belong to the bondholders or shareholders, who are not responsible for violations of the law. Those who are responsible should be personally punished.

It is not my intention to say any more, because this bill is identical with that unanimously adopted by this house last year.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): I congratulate the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Brunelle) upon his persistence. We should expect from an hon. member in this corner of the house, that when he is right and is beaten back once, he should, like the Ottawa Senators hockey team, go right at it again to score before the game is over.

The reasons why I seconded this motion are, first, that violation of the Lord's Day Act is a breaking of the moral law; second that it is breaking the law of fair play; and third, that it is breaking the law of the land. The moral law is, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." The Right Hon. Ramsey MacDonald said that a nation that respects one day in seven to rest from toil and worship the Almighty will find this a great bulwark in the upbuilding of manhood in that nation. We cannot break the moral law and not suffer for it; as someone has said, "If we break the moral law, the moral law will break us."

There is in the act a safeguard permitting works of necessity and mercy. But, like my hon. friend, I know of very many instances where men have had to do on Sunday work which was neither necessary nor a work of mercy, but a work of graft. I should not say graft, but it was work in which the toiler was not considered in any way.

Another reason why I support this bill is that if more men were employed there would be less need for Sunday work, and therefore it would be in a small way a cure for unemployment. When we see men carrying their dinner pails and going to work on Sunday while they see other people released from their toil and going to places of worship where they receive some inspiration, encouragement and instruction, it tends to create a sense of defeat in them, and it is not fair. Those of us who were brought up in homes where we were taught to do our daily toil in six days of the week and to be ready on Sunday for rest and worship, feel that working seven days a week is not fair play.

The hon. member says he is not a fanatic with set views on religion. I have some set views. One such view is that there must be a definite standard, and that standard is the Master Workman of Galilee. When we were engaged on construction work, the plumb-line was the standard; if the building did not conform to that plumb-line, it had to be pulled down and built straight. When we test our conduct by the example of the Master Workman of Galilee, then the Sabbath day will have its rightful place.

Mr. RODOLPHE LEDUC (Wright) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Brunelle) on his courage and persistency in introducing for the third time a bill to amend the Lord's Day Act. I am fully in favour of this amendment. Indeed, it is high time we should stop the practice of companies making their employees work unnecessarily and without pressing need on Sundays. By this amendment not only will such companies be subject to a fine, but their directors and managers will also be liable to fine and imprisonment.

I look forward to the day when my province will have an attorney general who, conscious of his responsibilities, will enforce the Lord's Day Act as it should be and is enforced in many other provinces of this dominion.

It is well known that the Lord's Day Act is violated more generally in Quebec than in any other province, and I know that the provincial government is responsible for that state of affairs. To my mind, my hon. friend's bill does not go far enough. It should provide for the punishment not only of company directors but also of federal and provincial ministers who make civil servants work on Sundays without absolute necessity.

I recall a violation of the Lord's Day Act which occurred in my village of Maniwaki on January 15 last, on the eve of the municipal election, and which scandalized a large number of people. On that day an official of the Department of Labour came to distribute cheques issued in payment of wages earned on relief work. The people were shocked at this action of a provincial employee, for they believe that the provincial government should set the example to local companies which at times force their employees to work on Sunday. I communicated the facts to the department concerned, but so far I have received no satisfactory answer from the minister.

I hope the hon. member's bill will be agreed to unanimously and that we shall soon be able to proclaim with pride that Catholic Quebec is showing the way to the entire dominion in the matter of Sunday observance.

Mr. W. R. McDONALD (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, the measure before the house this evening is the same measure which was introduced last year by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Brunelle), which passed this house unanimously and was considered in the senate, where an amendment was made which was not acceptable to this house, and as a consequence that measure did not become law. I take second place to no one in my desire to see the Sunday observance laws duly obeyed in Quebec as well as in the other provinces of Canada. I recognize the fact that the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Champlain this evening provides only an additional penalty and does not add to or detract from the present exceptions under what are known as works of mercy or necessity. Unfortunately, in connection with these exceptions, it has not been made quite clear just what works may be permitted, and I find that the great mining industry in the northern part of my constituency, which, because of these exceptions, considered itself immune to persecution, has been subjected to persecution by an over-zealous inspector of the provincial government, who is absolutely ignorant of the real nature of his duties.

As an indication of the desire of the mining industry in the northern part of my constituency to comply with this act, I shall take time to read the conditions or rules submitted by the mining association to each mining company in my constituency, and I think, after I have read these rules, any fair-minded man will agree that the mining industry is doing its best to see that the law is not violated. I have before me a memorandum addressed to members of the Western Quebec Mine Managers' Association, the president of which is the general manager of the Noranda Mines at Noranda. In this memorandum to the respective managers of these mines the association outlines the different works it considers to be absolutely necessary, and its asks all mine managers and employees to comply strictly with these exceptions, as follows:

1. Operation of cyanide mills, flotation mills, roasting and smelting plants. (Continuous processes which cannot be interrupted.)

2. Mine pumping and the pumping of water for plant and domestic use.

3. Inspection and repairs of operating shafts.

4. Operation of fans or compressors for ventilating mine workings.

5. Repairs to plant and equipment that cannot be done during week days without seriously interfering with the safe and necessary economical operation of the plant.

6. Maintaining essential services, such as boarding houses, heating and lighting, watchmen and police, and similar requirements for the well being of the community.

7. In connection with underground pumping and the maintenance of shafts and underground equipment, it is obvious that one or more hoisting engines would generally have to be operated intermittently on Sunday to raise or lower men or materials.

8. Where crushing is done underground and where it is impracticable to store sufficient ore on surface to carry a mill or smelter over Sunday, it should be permissible, as an emergency measure, to hoist sufficient ore on Sundays to ensure the necessary continuous operation of mill or smelter, but every effort should be made to keep such work to a minimum.

9. Shaft sinking operations should only be done on Sundays where bad ground or a heavy inflow of water makes it unsafe to interrupt such operations on Sundays.

I want to direct particular attention to the next paragraph:

10. To prevent over-zealous subordinates from violating the spirit of the above code, we suggest that a copy or copies of this memorandum be kept posted in a conspicuous place at every mining property and that every department head or foreman be instructed to get special authorization from the manager or other person in charge before undertaking any work on Sunday other than the usual continuous operations mentioned above and routine repairs and maintenance.

They conclude with this:

While the association does not wish to presume to interpret any laws now existing, or which may hereafter be enacted, and can take no responsibility for the legal position of any members resulting from the observance of the above code, we believe that the above listed operations are works of necessity or mercy, and feel that if every effort is made to adhere to this code the mining industry can expect a friendly cooperation from the public and the authorities who are charged with the responsibility of ensuring the proper observation of Sunday.

That indicates the attitude of the mining men in the association towards Sunday labour in their industry. Notwithstanding that fact, and that they have clearly outlined to inspectors and others that such is their attitude, five charges have been laid against them for non-compliance with the act. Apparently the attorney general of the province, as is within his right, has approved the institution of these actions. To date, however, not one of them has come before the courts, so that the mining companies still have the axe suspended over their heads.

Corresponding recently with the association, I suggested that probably an amendment to the law should be made under the provisions of "works of necessity," so as more clearly to define such works as applied to the mining industry. The reply of the president to my suggestion is as follows:

> There are a number of specific operations given in the Lord's Day Act as illustrations of what could be construed as "works of necessity and mercy," but I think it is generally understood that these specific operations were only given as illustrations and I don't see any point to increasing the number of illustrations, because it would be impossible to cover all operations that were necessary as "works of necessity and mercy" and if too many specific acts were mentioned, it might give the impression that it would be lawful to do only such specific operations as were specifically mentioned in the act.

That is the position in which the mining industry finds itself to-day under the act, whereby an over-zealous inspector, ignorant of his duties, may enter prosecutions against them.

As I said a little while ago, it is true that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Champlain has no bearing whatsoever upon that particular phase of the act. But it has the bearing that the companies feel to-day they are under suspicion of the authorities of our province. While to-day they are subject to a fine, if this amendment were to be accepted and became law they would be liable to be thrown into prison, and to that feature they take decided exception.

May I place before the house a further paragraph from the communication I received from the president of the association, in which he gives his opinion as to what he believes would be fitting punishment under the law. He suggests an increased fine, and his words are as follows:

> The objection we have to Mr. Brunelle's amendment is that while we expect and intend to obey both the letter and spirit of the law, from our recent experience we know that an inspector who does not know anything about mining and, therefore, what constitutes "work of necessity or mercy" at a mine, may come in and lay a charge and then a summons is served and . . . the mine manager may then be thrown into gaol because of a misunderstanding or difference of opinion as to the interpretation of the law. He might, of course, appeal and ultimately win his case, but in the meantime he would be subjected to the stigma of a lawbreaker and a criminal and we do not believe that it is necessary to do this in order to ensure proper respect for and observance of the Lord's Day Act. We contend that the present system of fines is sufficient to ensure proper observance of the act and if the fine is not sufficiently high, it could be increased for each succeeding conviction until it was sufficiently high to deter the most indifferent and insolent manager or company.

There, again, is a statement of the views of these men regarding the law. It indicates their intent to observe it, but their opposition to a penalty of imprisonment.

I should like to have it noted that in the action taken by the inspector against these mining companies, the company and the manager in each instance were summonsed, although the present act refers to any mining company, or any company, and does not refer to the manager. I believe my interpretation of section 14 is correct.

I would suggest, therefore, that the hon. member for Champlain ought to bear in mind the debate which took place last year in the senate, and which I read very closely. One senator defending the amendment, who came from a district in which the hon. member's constituency is located, when asked to state the name of some important company or companies which were violating the law, was unable to make reply or to name one company.

I know the hon. member for Champlain has, in certain instances, good grounds for seeking the amendment. My contention, however, is that the amendment goes too far, and in terminating my observations I would ask him again seriously to consider the suggestion made, namely to provide for an increased fine rather than a term of imprisonment.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, when a similar bill was before the house last year, I supported it. I have had no reason to change my views in the meantime, and therefore I support the present measure. There can be no doubt that there have been many abuses of the Lord's Day Act, and strong corporations could easily avoid its prescriptions by paying a penalty when they were brought to court and then proceeding in the same way afterwards.

The bill now before the house would certainly make the law more strict and would have the effect of compelling those who have something to do with such corporations to observe the law. I have great sympathy with much of what has been said by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. McDonald); but may I say that if the exceptions mentioned in the act, chapter 123 of the revised statutes, are not sufficient to cover the instances he has mentioned—and I have no doubt the mining companies to which he has referred want to do what is just and fair—the remedy would be to add something to the law with regard to those exceptions. But I am not sure that they would be needed because section 11 of the Lord's Day Act is quite broad. The first paragraph reads:

> Notwithstanding anything herein contained, any person may on the Lord's day do any work of necessity or mercy, and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the ordinary meaning of the expression "work of necessity or mercy," it is hereby declared that it shall be deemed to include the following classes of work—

Then follow twenty-two paragraphs lettered (a), (b) and (c) to (w) and (x), which give details of the classes of work which may be described as works of necessity or mercy. The act says that this is for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the ordinary meaning of the expression, "work of necessity or mercy." The maintenance of fires, relief works and so on are covered by the paragraphs, which could be added to by way of amendment if that were found necessary. I do not think this should be considered an argument against the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Brunelle). I hope that in another place minds will be changed this year so that this bill may become law.

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this amendment as it now stands. In my opinion this bill contains a joker. It states:

> Any person being a director, an officer, a superintendent or an employee of a corporation, to whose direction or orders any employee is by the terms or conditions of his employment bound to conform—

I am fairly sure that there will never be a conviction of a president or a director of a corporation. The conviction would always be of a junior employee or a straw-boss who would have to take the rap, and for that reason I am opposed to the bill as it now stands.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

REPEAL OF PROVISION RESPECTING SIGNED PLEDGES BY CANDIDATES

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River) moved the second reading of Bill No. 23, to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1938.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Signed pledges by candidates. Repeal.

Mr. POWER: Mr. Chairman, I was under the impression that my hon. friend would give some further explanation on the motion for second reading.

Mr. HEAPS: It was not necessary.

Mr. POWER: I did not make the suggestion I intended to make, that perhaps this bill could be discussed better in the committee on electoral matters, notice of which has already been given and which will shortly be set up. As my hon. friend has preferred to have this matter discussed in committee of the whole house, I have no objection to its being treated in that way, provided he will be kind enough to give us some explanation.

Mr. FAIR: The purpose of this amendment, which I do not for one moment wish to conceal, is to repeal section 106 of the act. I expected that before the bill got into committee I would have had to say a few words, but now that it is in committee I do not think it is necessary to say very much. The section to be repealed reads:

> It shall be an illegal practice and an offence against this act for any candidate for election as member to serve in the House of Commons to sign any written document presented to him by way of demand or claim made upon him, by any person, persons or associations of persons, between the date of the issue of the writ of election and the date of polling, if such document requires such candidate to follow any course of action that will prevent him from exercising freedom of action in parliament if elected, or to resign as such member if called upon to do so by any person, persons or association of persons.

I believe that this is the first time a section of this kind has been included in our Dominion Elections Act.

For quite a number of years we have been treated to speeches on democracy. We pride ourselves on a democratic Canada; yet in the face of those speeches in favour of democracy and our claims that we want to support democracy we have put into the Dominion Elections Act section 106, which, if it is allowed to remain in the act, in my opinion does away with democracy.

Democracy, as I see it, is the will of the people, and when the people of Canada are refused the right to pledge their candidates I think it is treading the path of dictatorships, which nobody in this house wants for a moment. In the country which I left more than twenty-five years ago demands were made for certain constitutional changes which most hon. members know as Home Rule, and to-day there is Home Rule in that country. Several other demands have been made in other countries; and as the representatives of the people are the only spokesmen that the people have in parliament, if we take away from the people the right to have their candidates sign pledges and to back up the promises they make prior to an election I think we are treading on dangerous ground, ground much more dangerous than perhaps some realize.

I do not think it is necessary for me to say much more. The wording of the section itself as it stands in the act is sufficient, I think, to prove that it is dangerous, undemocratic, and along the line of dictatorship by parties, particularly those in power.

From the Ottawa Journal of February 23 last, I clipped this item:

> Want Preelection Promises Kept
> Olympia, Wash., Feb. 23—Political speeches in Washington state may undergo drastic changes if Rep. William J. Pennock's bill passes. It would require major state officers to add this pledge to their oath:
> "I furthermore do promise and swear that to the best of my ability I will endeavour to perform and fulfil all promises made by me during the campaign, as the result of which I was elected to said office."

If we intend to support democracy and keep away from dictatorship, the best thing we can do is get away from section 106 and leave the old act as it stood in that respect.

Mr. POWER: Mr. Chairman, the difference between my hon. friend (Mr. Fair) and myself lies largely, I think, in what is meant by democracy. I am to some extent responsible for section 106 being in the act, because it was at my suggestion to the committee which sat last year that the clause was put in the bill, as reported unanimously by a committee of this house, and as passed by the house with very little objection except that of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps).

The object of the section is to do away with an abuse, which has grown up in our public life, of a large number of small minority groups endeavouring to hold up a candidate by making him sign pledges with respect to everything under the sun. During the last federal election we were confronted in the district of Quebec with nineteen separate and distinct pledges that we had to sign. As a matter of fact, I will say for the better-class candidates that they did not sign, but the candidates who were not so conscientious about their duties to the public did sign everything that was presented to them. They swallowed them whole. They signed things with which they had no concern whatsoever, such as pledges with respect to real property, with which the dominion parliament has no concern. Certain minority groups have got into the habit of asking everything in order, in some instances, to embarrass the better-class candidates, and in others, to assist the worst candidates.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask what is a better-class candidate?

Mr. POWER: A better-class candidate is a man who has some respect for his conscience and for his duty, and proposes to come here and do it. A member of parliament, when he is elected by his constituency—I notice I shall have to be brief—is elected, not to be the mouthpiece or delegate of any group or class in his constituency, but to represent in this house the whole people of Canada. He comes here to give his best judgment upon the questions which are put before him—not to give a decision based upon instructions he may have received from people thousands of miles away who know nothing of the question under discussion.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is democracy.

Mr. HEAPS: That is party politics.

Mr. POWER: It is not democratic in any sense to send a man here hog-tied to do nothing but what is desired by a small group in his constituency. Members who come here with their resignation in the hands of their party executive or of some group of people in their constituency are not, to my mind, performing their duties as representatives of the Canadian people. If it be democratic to allow a small group of ward heelers—and I will call them ward heelers even if they are social crediters or members of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation party—to control the decisions which a member may make in the House of Commons in the performance of his duty, I do not believe in that kind of democracy.

Mr. NEILL: May I ask why you do not make it an offence for these people to ask for a pledge? You are only making it an offence for the unhappy candidate to sign the pledge.

Mr. POWER: I had intended, when the amendment was proposed in committee, to make it an offence for people to ask, and another offence for the man who was fool enough to sign.

Section stands.

TRADE AGREEMENT

CANADA-UNITED STATES—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION FOR APPROVAL SUBJECT TO REQUIRED LEGISLATION

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King that the house go into committee on the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 17th day of November, 1938, between Canada and the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

Mr. MALCOLM McLEAN (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, the matter which is before the house at the present time, namely, the ratification of the trade agreement between Canada and the United States, is in my opinion one of the most important subjects which will come before the house during this session. I do not desire to go back very many years into the history of trade agreements between Canada and the United States, but I would remind the house and the country that during the years between 1930 and 1935 there was a great demand in this country, and a growing demand in the United States, for freer trade facilities between these and other lands. So many restrictions and repressions had been put on the exchanging of surplus commodities of the two countries that there was in them both a great diminution in employment, in the standard of living, and in the confidence of the producers and the consumers of wealth in these countries, so closely bound together by nature and so well fitted to be in every way the counterpart one of the other in trading matters.

After the last election the people of Canada were much heartened by the speed with which the agreement of 1935 was negotiated between the two governments. When that agreement was signed, within a few weeks of the new administration taking office, it was regarded by the people of Canada generally, regardless of what their party politics were, or the views held in the past about the need and value of trading, as a good omen for the future. That has been abundantly justified by the results which sprang from the signing of that agreement, and the creating of larger opportunities of trade flowing north and south during these years.

The other day one of my hon. friends opposite said that that agreement was not successful; that it had not worked out as intended because trade in 1938 had receded, compared with what it had been in 1937. As a matter of fact, he was handing great praise to the treaty and to the way in which it had worked out, because, in other words, he was saying that trade in 1937 had increased at a tremendous rate over 1935. The whole world knows that there was a recession in 1938 which affected the United States particularly and Canada as well. But to-day Canada is coming out of it faster than our neighbours have done; though we have not suffered as badly, nevertheless our trade is bound to be affected by theirs, with or without treaties. That treaty was so successful that by 1937, in less than two years, we had recovered much of the ground lost in employment, in the production of wealth, in trade with the world, and in renewed confidence on the part of the Canadian people in themselves, their land, their institutions and their future.

We in this house know and the government of the day was quite aware of the fact, which has been mentioned by several hon. members, that that treaty was not, as I admit that this new treaty is not, a panacea for all our ills. It would be impossible; it has never been possible in the history of the world for any government to find a single universal remedy for all its troubles. There are groups of men in the country here and there who think they have found a panacea. One group says that all you have to do is to print all the money you want and you will have a solvent for all difficulties, but in their hearts they know better than that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): If it is a question.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wonder if he will tell us of any group in Canada who are foolhardy enough to propose that.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I do not think it would be difficult for anyone to point out to the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) that all his arguments in this house have been designed to indicate that if you print plenty of money you will solve all the material problems of Canada and of the world —not the spiritual, mental and intellectual, but the material problems.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Was that what the hon. gentleman said at first?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I do not mind questions, but I want them put in a clear tone so that they can be heard and understood.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I will put it in a clear enough tone if the hon. gentleman will stop talking long enough. I asked, was that the form in which he made the statement before?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Well, it is not usually assumed that we in this house, with all the responsibilities that the electors put upon us, are sent here to discuss other than material problems. It is not assumed generally that we are sent here to discuss particularly the intellectual or the mental or the spiritual problems of the people. There are other forums in which those questions can be debated. We therefore take it for granted that when we speak of problems we refer to the economic and material problems of the country, because the political and social problems have been largely solved in so far as they can be in a place like this.

To continue, the government knew that this theaty of 1935 could not solve, and they are not claiming now that the 1938 treaty can solve, all our problems. It is impossible to deal with the many-sided phases of modern life, and, by virtue of one trading agreement between two countries out of three, remedy all the evils of which we complain. My hon. friend who asked the question knows as well as I do that over large areas of Canada no wealth amounting to anything has been produced in many years. No wealth has been produced in a part of this dominion which formerly produced wealth in great abundance, and consequently he must know that this is one of the things from which we are suffering, and that the trading of surplus wealth from other areas will not make up for the loss which is entailed by non-production of wealth over so large a part of Canada.

Both the great country to the south of us and ourselves, however, desired a further advancement along the lines now proposed and, as time went on and the value of the agreement was being demonstrated, those who had been opposed to such agreements in Canada and the United States greatly moderated their objections to them, while those who had been in favour of them on general principles now found their arguments backed up by specific reasons, so that there was a willingness to negotiate once more and again to concede more than it had been found practicable to do in the earlier agreement.

To get the most out of such an agreement it was necessary that other countries, if possible, should be negotiated with at the same time, and so we found that for the first time in history the three great English-speaking democracies of the northern hemisphere, the United Kingdom, Canada and the United States, by joint efforts, by a spirit of cooperation, by a spirit of compromise here and there on non-essentials if you will, were able to come together and draft treaties mutually satisfactory to them, which it is believed will result in great good in various ways to the three countries participating and to many other peoples throughout the world.

To the great Secretary of State of the United States much credit is due for the work that he has performed during the last few years in paving the way for these treaties, and I think the people of Canada and of the old land are equally pleased that their governments took a lead in obtaining these results. It was not an easy matter at all, because no trading is particularly easy, and the more people you get into the trade the harder it is to bring it to a successful conclusion. Where negotiations had to be carried on between any two of the nations and then referred to the third one, and difficulties removed there, this was bound to necessitate a great deal of work and difficulties could not be avoided. The mutual concessions, however, that had to be made in the articles dealt with in an earlier agreement were finally arranged satisfactorily, and I believe that a great deal of the credit is due to the technical knowledge, the trained skill and the patience exhibited by the officials of this government who had so much to do, in negotiating with their fellow officials of the other countries, with preparing the way for the adoption of these agreements.

On the first of January last when the new agreement came into effect we found that eighty per cent of all Canada's external trade was more or less beneficially affected by these treaties. For a country in Canada's position, the fourth greatest exporter of goods in the world, even with a small population of eleven millions, to be able to negotiate favourable treaties with the two great peoples who purchase from her more than eighty per cent of all of her exports, is something that is well worth rejoicing over, if it is possible to rejoice at all in matters of trade.

A few years ago we heard from time to time—we do not hear it so often to-day—the argument that there is no trade anyhow. People who believe that are naturally not going to be enthusiastic over trade treaties, and I could not blame them for not being enthusiastic over the negotiation of such agreements as this, because if there is no trade in the world, for the reason that every country has too much of everything that there is no way of disposing of anything, which was the classical way in which some of our friends used to express themselves, then there would be no object in negotiating trade treaties at all. But we have never believed that. The economists of the world have never believed it. As a matter of fact, world economists of high mark have never believed at any time that there was being produced in the world a sufficiency of wealth for the needs of those who were producing and would like to consume more of the wealth being turned out by the various industries in the world, primary and secondary.

In 1928 and 1929, when the wheels of industry were running faster and the factories were more fully occupied than ever before, the great Swedish economist, Professor Gustav Cassel, estimated that barely enough wealth was being produced to maintain the peoples of the world on the standard of living that they had been enjoying, and that they wanted not only to maintain but to increase. I do not know of any way by which the standard of living has been raised so much as by trade. It is true that new inventions, skill in handling them and technical education in its proper meaning have contributed to the production of wealth in greater quantity than formerly, but the production of additional wealth in any country is not going to continue unless it can be exchanged, and if it cannot, that industry is going to fall by the wayside. Before I close I am going to allude to one or two developments of that kind in the province from which I come. I think everyone will agree that if no market is found for the products of those new applications of agricultural industry, the industries wil lcease to expand and to bring wealth to the people affected.

We have sometimes had in this house, from those who are not enthusiastic about this treaty, the argument that trade is a form of war. If that were true, I should not be very much in favour of trade expansion. But I am sure that most people throughout the world to-day are satisfied that trade is not productive of war; neither is it the trading nations who are most inclined to war with one another, nor is the system of private ownership—which is inherent in this treaty—the cause of war. The greatest and best evidence of that is that during all the years in which private ownership and capitalism have flourished in industry and the production and distribution of wealth, in these two great countries lying side by side, probably the most highly capitalized in the world and with the greatest degree of individual freedom and the greatest scope for individual initiative in the world, there has not been the breath of suspicion of war.

I believe that, having succeeded in making these treaties, we should take advantage of them to the utmost possible extent; that we should supply as much wealth as possible to the British and United States markets and should take in exchange as much as possible from those markets in order that we may be paid for what we sell and may enjoy the higher standard of living that such exchanges will make possible. Therefore, even though this debate has continued for a few days, and while most hon. members are ready to vote on it at any time—and I am glad to say that I have found no very strong opposition to the treaty anywhere, and there is no question as to what is going to happen when the vote is taken—I am convinced that the time spent in debating this treaty from various angles that may interest individual members and the people whom they represent is time well spent; for the more a treaty of this kind is discussed and the more familiar our people come to be with its provisions, the more advantage can be obtained from it. I believe that when there has been time for other nations throughout the world to become impressed with the value of this treaty, many of them will also desire to negotiate with these three great English-speaking countries and carry on a wider trade with them and develop freer markets, as we are now doing.

In the short time I have, I could not, if I would, go through all the provisions of this agreement, so I am going to limit my argument to the treaty as it affects us as sellers in the United States market. There is, of course, another side that is very important. But if we cannot sell our goods in the United States we shall be less able to pay for the goods we wish to buy in their market, while it is necessary for us to take the goods we buy from them in order to get paid for what we sell to them. And I do not know that one part is more important than the other. But because they fall into two separate classes, and because the concessions that we have made to the United States can be discussed on the budget or on some other occasion, I shall deal with the other side of the question first and look at the concessions that have been made to us in the United States.

With the concessions obtained in 1935 and in 1938 we have had reductions or bindings on 170 items, affecting $124,825,000 worth of sales that we made to them in the year 1937. We also secure the maximum reduction of 50 per cent of the duty on products exported from Canada to the value in 1937 of $56,000,000, or 49 per cent of the total value of dutiable imports from Canada in that year. That alone is sufficient to encourage the sending of more goods to the United States. But for the purpose of my reasoning I am going to deal with some matters that particularly affect either western Canada or the province of Saskatchewan or that part of it which I represent, or some particular industries in Canada that were more in need of assistance than certain other industries. There are many items which I do not intend to touch.

Taking the list of concessions in schedule II, I draw attention to the fact that our metal industries, one great group of our natural industries in this country that has done so much to carry the state through the difficult years through which we have been and are passing, are getting substantial benefit from this agreement. Aluminum, which carried a duty burden of 4 cents a pound going into the United States, has had that duty reduced to 3 cents. On cadmium, the duty, which was 15 cents a pound, is now reduced to 7½ cents. It is true that there is no aluminum manufactured in the part of the country from which I come; but cadmium is produced in that district, and aluminum is produced on a great scale in Quebec and is of great importance, as indicated by the fact that in 1937 over $4,000,000 worth was shipped from Canada to the United States out of a total importation by that country of $6,770,000.

Nickel and its alloys have also received a reduction in duty, although nickel has been well able to carry itself. I was pleased to see a reduction in the duty on zinc in blocks, pigs or slabs from 1¾ cents to 1⅝ cents. That is not a very large reduction; but, after all, that is the duty per pound, and zinc is not a high priced metal. This slight reduction is going to make it easier to develop many mines in northern Canada where a large percentage of zinc is mixed in with the copper.

Coming now to lumber, and in spite of what was said the other day by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), I think, that not much lumber was manufactured in Saskatchewan, I am particularly pleased with the concessions under both this and the earlier agreement to the lumber industry of western Canada, especially as it affects the people whom I represent and their near neighbours in that part of the country. I find that in connection with Douglas fir and western hemlock the quota of 250,000,000 feet per calendar year under the old agreement has been removed and there is no quantity restriction at all, while the duty is exactly half what it was prior to the negotiation of the first agreement. A reduction from $4 to $2 in the burden on lumber such as Douglas fir and western hemlock, which are found in such quantities in the great maritime province of western Canada, is well worth negotiating. On northern pine, Norway pine and western white spruce, the burden of $4 per thousand feet which was in effect prior to 1936 has been reduced to only 50 cents per thousand feet, and if I read this agreement rightly even that 50 cents is likely to be removed when certain other modifications have been brought about.

Someone said in the house, either yesterday or to-day, that not many farm boys and, in fact, not many men were working to-day by virtue of anything contained in this agreement. I want to tell my hon. friends who have that idea that if it had not been for the agreement of 1935 many men who found employment in the woods would not have been working at all; and if it were not for the great United States market which has been opened up to us, very few of the men who are now in the northern camps taking out spruce would be employed if the trade had to depend on the local market. I am convinced that not hundreds but thousands of men all across Canada are employed to-day—and particularly in the spruce woods—because of the market that has been made available in the United States. The burden has been cut from $4 to 50 cents which, in one district which I know very well, where normally one hundred million feet of spruce lumber are taken out, means a saving of $335,000 per annum in taxation alone. That is a tremendous saving, compared with what they would have had to pay in 1935, and other kinds of lumber are dealt with almost as generously.

Then, to deal with an article produced in the two central provinces, I find that the duty on maple sugar is reduced from 6 cents to 3 cents a pound, while the duty on maple syrup is cut from 4 cents to 2 cents a pound, which is the extreme reduction the president is permitted to make.

Then I come to schedule 7, covering agricultural products. Item 701 deals with cattle weighing less than 200 pounds each. Under the old agreement that weight was 175 pounds and the quota was 51,900, but under the new agreement the quota has been increased to 100,000, while the rate on these calves has been reduced from 2½ cents to 1½ cents per pound. That is a great benefit to those who want to market their calves at an early age and a light weight. Cattle weighing 700 pounds or more and being dairy cows, in connection with which there was a quota of 20,000 head annually under the old agreement, have had that quantity restriction removed entirely. The previous rate was 3 cents a pound and to-day it is 1½ cents. I hope we shall not again have the spectacle we had in this house on one occasion a few years ago, when we had to listen to the then leader of the opposition bewail and bemoan the fate of 125,000 Ontario dairy cows which had been driven south, and which wept their eyes out because they were no longer being milked on the banks of the St. Lawrence or some of our northern rivers, but were subjected to the sad fate of giving their milk and cream down in the state of New York, where they had been moved at the price of from $125 to $150 for a good cow. I hope the time will again come in this country when farmers who wish to do so will be able to sell dairy cattle for similar prices, and when there will be an equal demand. When it comes to cattle weighing 700 pounds or more each, not specially provided for, the quota under the old agreement was 155,799 head, which was a percentage of the cattle slaughtered in the United States between 1928 and 1932. I am sure everyone here is glad to know that this quota has been increased to 225,000 and the duty cut from 3 cents a pound in 1935, and 2 cents, the rate in effect for the last three years, to 1½ cents, which is the maximum reduction possible under the United States statutes.

Everyone in Canada who is interested in agriculture values the provisions of this agreement. Some of my hon. friends opposite have said that only something like four per cent of the members of this house knew anything about this quota being continental or global; that dealers in western Canada, making their livelihood out of the cattle business, did not know that fact, and that losses had been sustained as a consequence. I think my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle and my hon. friend from Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) lamented that lack of knowledge. I just want to say that any man buying and selling cattle for a living in either eastern or western Canada who did not have that much familiarity with the rules under which such cattle could enter the United States, was bound to run into some difficulties, but I think everyone knew last year and the year before and the year before that—

Mr. PERLEY: Did the hon. member know?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Oh, yes.

Mr. PERLEY: Then you are the one out of twenty-five.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): But there are a dozen members over here at the moment who also knew about it; twelve times twenty-five is three hundred, and we have only 245 members in the house. I am quite aware that there was the possibility of a loss to those whose cattle went into the United States after the stop was put on because the quota was nearly exhausted, but my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle knows that the United States government gave notice when the quota was within 5,000 head of being exhausted. They said the duty would be collected on all cattle going in after that, and if it was found later that they came within the quota that duty would be refunded. So that the dealer who took in a carload of cattle, if he had paid freight and duty on them, and taken them to the United States, immediately after the limit was announced, might not have lost money at all. Yet the very fact that he lost $500 on a carload because this agreement was not in effect on that day is, to my mind, the best indication of the value of the agreement, because any bargain which will make over $500 more money on a single car of cattle, without a nickel of expense added, to the dealer or to the farmer, is surely a wonderful agreement for this country.

Mr. PERLEY: It demoralized the Winnipeg market for that day; that is the point.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I should like to talk about swine, pork, bacon, edible animal livers, whole milk, fresh or sour, cream, fresh or sour, skimmed milk, dried buttermilk and cheddar cheese, the duty on which has been reduced from 7 cents to 4 cents a pound, but time does not permit.

I would like, however, to congratulate the hon. member for Qu'Appelle upon the fact that the people he represents in his constituency could easily supply the 15,000,000 gallons of milk, either in the form of milk or cream, which is going to be allowed into the United States.

Mr. PERLEY: I would suggest that the hon. member read the Western Producer, and take a peek at his own constituency.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): My hon. friend does not require to make any suggestions of that kind. I represent the people who sent me here, and have a right to comment on any speech which has been delivered or any statement which has been made in the debate, so long as proper decorum is observed. But I want to say it is a good thing that the cattle in his constituency are so prolific of milk. If they are, I fail to see why he should condemn the government because, as he said a little while ago, they were not allowed to keep more than so many female breeding animals, and were consequently incapable of selling cattle.

On horses going into the United States, the duty has been reduced from $30 a head to $15 a head on horses valued at not more than $150.

Another development in the agricultural industry which I believe is going to be of great value now and in the future, is the production of honey. Formerly it carried a duty burden of three cents a pound into the United States. Under the 1935 agreement that was reduced to two cents, and it is now down to one and one-half cents a pound. For my district which has shipped honey by the carload overseas, and whose honey is taking the highest awards in the empire markets and shows in London, I believe there is a great opportunity for marketing that same product in the United States in future.

A great deal has been said about apples. While they may have lost some preference in the old country market, on the other hand they receive a substantial advantage in the United States market and I am glad to see that this is so. It would not be well to have an industry of that kind penalized.

But I must hurry along and deal with grass seeds and other forage crop seeds, because they are important, too. I find that the rate on alfalfa going into the United States has been reduced from 8 cents a pound in 1935 to 4 cents per pound. The rate on alsike clover is reduced in the same way. On red clover the reduction was from 8 cents to 5 cents a pound in 1935, and it is now reduced to 4 cents. On timothy there is a reduction from 2 cents to 1 cent. On bent-grass the reduction is from 40 cents a pound to 20 cents. On wheatgrass it is from 2 cents to 1 cent, and on bromegrass from 2 cents to 1 cent.

The growing of alfalfa seed, and these other seeds, is one of the great developments to which I referred at the beginning of my observations. In 1936, from the territory I represent less than 100,000 pounds of alfalfa seed were marketed, and the cut in the rate of duty from 8 cents to 4 cents a pound is of great benefit to those people. A year ago, that is for the crop of 1937, over half a million pounds were marketed. The cut in duty meant about $20,000 to the comparatively few farmers producing the seed. Last year, 3,000,000 pounds were marketed, much of it going to the United States, and the price was set by the price available in that country. Three million pounds with a 4 cents a pound reduction in duty represents the sum of $120,000, a matter of the greatest importance to the growers. That is one of the developments in agriculture which, as I have said, could not be continued if a market were not available. I believe the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) would agree with me that it is all important to have a market.

Mr. SENN: Since the hon. member has mentioned my name, I should like to tell him I do not believe our price for alfalfa seed is governed by the United States price at all.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I did not say it was, but I do say—

Mr. SENN: Oh, yes.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): But I said this, that not only does that portion of our alfalfa seed which goes into the United States receive a 4 cent reduction in the burden of duty, but in that section of which I am speaking, namely northeastern Saskatchewan, which produces 3,000,000 pounds, the price of that which was sold at home was governed by the price of that which went into the United States.

Mr. SENN: As a matter of fact, we are not producing enough alfalfa seed in Canada for our own domestic use.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I am glad to hear that, and I hope it is correct. I know the hon. member for Haldimand thinks it is. I know, too, that it is beginning to give some concern to those who see themselves faced with the marketing of from 6,000,000 to 10,000,000 pounds next year, if the crop is normal, on the increased acreage they now have. Our United States outlet has been very important in the last year or two.

There are many other matters with which I should like to deal, particularly potatoes, fish of all kinds, and articles such as pulpwood, other forest products, and many commodities which are dealt with in the agreement. I am particularly pleased to see that the farmers and fishermen of the maritime provinces are getting some advantage out of it. I believe some of them complained, and rightly so, that they had been unfortunate because the government had not been able to get many advantages for them under the treaty of 1935.

The first time I ever spoke in the house I had occasion to deal with conditions in the maritime provinces, and to express the hope that they would be ameliorated. I have now had the satisfaction on two occasions of seeing better conditions in those provinces, and I believe that this market now being opened for their fish, potatoes, and other commodities, will prove beneficial. I know of no people more deserving of any encouragement the government can give. And I know of no people who will rejoice with them more than the people who, having had their struggles on the new lands in the west, appreciate, at least in part, the struggles of the people in the maritime provinces.

Mr. PERLEY: They are still struggling.

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to be responsible for prolonging this debate more than a few minutes. I do propose, however, to deal with some of the items when the treaty is being considered in committee.

To begin with, in my opinion the whole system employed by this government in bringing about these treaties is wrong. I say that because they do not use the system employed in the United States.

The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) asked the following questions of the ministry on February 15, 1938:

1. Will the government lay on the table the list of 47 pages of goods on which the United States propose to discuss further reciprocity with Canada as published partly in the local press on January 8, and on which the people of that country were asked to write the Trade Department at Washington to give their views or objections on any of these items with a public hearing on March 14, afforded?

2. Will the government consider adopting the same method and procedure here in order to give the business men of Canada an opportunity of being heard in the same way by letter, and a public hearing later, before any proposed agreement is consummated, and not after it?

3. Will the government consider calling into consultation Canadian industrialists and agriculturists regarding the effect of same on the Ottawa agreements, before and not after any agreement or treaty is consummated or proposed?

In answer to question number two of the hon. member, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated:

The procedure at present adopted by the United States government in connection with current trade agreements is based upon the fact that agreements concluded under the Trade Agreements Act are not submitted to congress for approval. As the situation in this respect is different in Canada, it is not considered necessary to adopt the United States procedure.

What difference is there? Was this last trade agreement submitted to this parliament before it was signed and before it became law? Were hon. members consulted before this treaty came into effect? This last treaty with the United States came into effect on January 1, 1939; this parliament was called on January 12, and we are now discussing the treaty in the middle of February. In answer to question number three, the Prime Minister stated:

The present practice under which Canadian industrialists, agriculturists, and others interested, may communicate with the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, or other ministers concerned, on all matters respecting commercial treaty negotiations, is believed to be adequate.

How can Canadian industrialists, agriculturists and others interested approach the government in connection with these matters when they have not the faintest idea of what is being considered by the government? If there ever were a purely political treaty executed by this country, it is the one now before us. It is a treaty in which there is very little thought for the common good. It is a treaty to suit one or two sections of this dominion. Apparently the members from those sections control this government. There are supporters of this government who are to-day hanging their heads in shame. They have not been in this house for the past three weeks, ever since this treaty has been under discussion. They are ashamed of it. My belief is that if the treaty of 1935 had not been put into effect, conditions in this country would have improved to such an extent that there would have been increased employment and increased trade within Canada, and we would have had dominion unity instead of disunity. Our working people would have been happier. The supporters of the government have spent so little time in this debate in defending the treaty that their attitude has been pitiable. They have been taking up the time of the house in making personal attacks on hon. members of the opposition and reading from red, white and blue books that have no bearing on the case. In every way they are attempting to belittle the seriousness of the situation.

This afternoon the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) did not quote from the little red book, as some of his colleagues have done, but he did almost everything else. He spent his time in apologizing for certain hon. members, saying he was sorry that this or that member was not in his place. Let me say to the minister that he does not spend any too much time himself in this house, and I regret he is not in his place this evening. I wonder what the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) thought of the statement this afternoon that the treaty might affect a few apple trees in the constituency of the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling). I wonder what the people of the Annapolis valley, of British Columbia and of the apple growing districts of Ontario would think if that was drawn to their attention.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think that was his statement.

Mr. LENNARD: He said something that appeared to me to be along that line.

Mr. ILSLEY: Something quite different.

Mr. LENNARD: Of course I have not seen Hansard, but that is my interpretation of what he said. I do not think the Minister of National Revenue was in the house at the time.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes, I was here.

Mr. LENNARD: I did not think the minister was. Where are the members supporting the government who represent ridings in which there are a great number of market gardeners and fruit growers? Has one of them risen in his place on the floor of this house and defended his position? Not one, Mr. Speaker, not one. I wish to protest against the unfair treatment which has been accorded the market gardeners, the greenhouse industry and the fruit growers of the country by this government in these two treaties. In vegetable growing alone we have a major primary industry. To quote the words of Mr. M. B. Davis and Mr. T. F. Ritchie of the central experimental farm, Ottawa, as delivered at the Carls-Rite hotel, Toronto:

It would seem therefore that we have in this vegetable industry something of real value as a national asset and it is our guess that the industry is easily worth in its entirety $100,000,000 a year. Such an industry merits attention and deserves support if it is to continue as a source of wealth to this country.

I ask in all seriousness: Has this industry received this consideration? I say, no. The sections of the Canadian fruit and vegetable industry which will suffer most severely under the new arrangements with the United States are the hothouse tomato growers, the pear growers and the asparagus growers. The greenhouse industry is the one branch of market gardening most seriously affected. The hothouse growers of tomatoes find that their overhead is the same to-day as it was several years ago. The cost of coal, labour, et cetera, is at the same level, while the duty has been lowered from 30 per cent in 1935 to a bare 10 per cent at the moment. With the two cents a pound dumping duty removed, these men will be practically forced out of business. They will have to readjust their business, and I do not know what other line of production they can turn to which will permit a profitable use of their hothouses. I know many of them have been scraping along for the past few years. I know of several large plants which cannot afford to close down. They have been running along with small losses in the hope that some government would come along and give them relief so that they might operate successfully in the future. If that does not happen soon, I know many of these concerns will go to the wall. These tomato growers have to compete with a field grown crop, harvested with cheap labour and receiving a freight subsidy. What chance have they? What protection is 10 per cent against such competition?

While there has been no change in the dumping duty on pears, the Canadian government has agreed to apply the dumping duty for a twelve week period only. This is not sufficient to cover the entire pear season, and the result will be that the threat of United States imports by Canadian canning companies will be a greater menace than ever. In connection with asparagus, the loss is the three per cent excise, five per cent on the general duty and two-fifths of a cent per pound on the dumping duty. When these are all totalled up, it means a material reduction in the protection against United States asparagus, which some canning companies often import for the purpose of smashing Canadian prices when the canning season rolls round.

This afternoon the hon. member for Souris (Mr. McDonald) stated that one-third of the people of Canada were farmers, and that two-thirds of the people of Canada were interested in agriculture. Does he realize that the other one-third he speaks of are in the market gardening and fruit growing industries, which are directly affected by these treaties? If the other third of the population of Canada are in industry, two-thirds of the population of Canada are directly affected by this treaty.

The hon. member for Victoria, Ontario (Mr. McNevin) stated some time ago that he thought the new trade agreements would help the woollen and knit goods industry. I wonder if he really thinks that, or if he has given it any thought at all. I should like to give a few facts in connection with the woollen and knit goods industry.

1. The industry is essentially Canadian with eighty-five per cent of its $92,000,000 investment being supplied by Canadian investors.

2. Ninety-eight per cent of the goods made by these mills must be sold within Canada.

This is because Canadian wage scales are higher than in other countries, or because the textile tariffs of other countries are against Canadian textiles. Therefore our industry is dependent upon its Canadian market.

3. The government in again lowering the tariff in our Canadian market will give workers in other countries added production and Canadian workers less.

In 1937 our textile industry bought from Australia, direct, over $2,000,000 worth of wool, which constitutes twenty-four per cent of Canada's purchases from that country. It bought from New Zealand over $3,000,000 of wool, which constitutes fifty-eight per cent of the total imports from that country.

In addition to Australian and New Zealand products the industry purchased approximately double the above quantities through Bradford, England, in the form of raw and partly processed wool.

These purchases by Canada from empire countries were a substantial consideration in negotiating trade treaties with these countries, from which Canadian workers in other industries benefit.

Thus, the woollen and knit goods industry contributes in a major way to empire trade, both in its actual purchases from empire countries, and in tariff concessions to competitive empire products, in return for empire trade concessions to Canadian natural and farm products.

The widespread and comprehensive nature of the industry is clearly demonstrated by the fact that its $25,000,000 direct wages are paid into eighty-two municipalities in Ontario; thirty-nine municipalities in Quebec; eighteen municipalities in the maritimes, and seven municipalities in western Canada.

[Mr. Lennard.]

The present economic condition of the textile industry in the United States is forcing her to seek openings in Canada for the surplus production she is not internally absorbing. Further concessions in tariff would merely aggravate the danger to our Canadian industry. This condition illustrates the seriousness of a tariff reduction to a country having such economic difficulties as the United States portrays.

It is of the utmost concern to the woollen and knit goods industry that because of the favoured nation treaties which Canada now has with twenty-two foreign countries, any tariff concessions which are given to the United States must automatically be given to all these others. Unfortunately these others include Japan, Italy, Germany and Czechoslovakia, all of which are textile producing countries operating on wage scales ridiculously low compared with those prevailing in Canada. It would be disastrous to this Canadian industry if the products of that class of foreign production were given an opportunity to gain any further foothold in our Canadian market.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the workmen of this country have been sold out to foreign capital; their very jobs have been jeopardized by these two treaties.

In addition to the confusion and in many cases chaos that has been created in industry through these treaties, there is the additional paralyzing effect of the uncertainty surrounding the excise tax. We read in the press that it will possibly be removed altogether. But who knows? Consequently the industry of this country is to an extent at a standstill, awaiting the outcome. To put it squarely to this government, they are shirking their duty in withholding this information, and it will jeopardize the very existence of many industries, especially in eastern Canada, if this question is not settled very soon. I say that, Mr. Speaker, in all seriousness. I have been approached by industrialists during the past two or three weeks, and they say: "This treaty is signed, and I suppose we shall have to make the best of it, but what is the government going to do about the excise tax? With the present uncertainty our business is paralyzed; we do not want to buy, and people will not buy from us because we do not know, and they do not know, what is going to be done about the three per cent excise tax." It is one of the most serious stumbling blocks before industry in this country at this moment, and this government should end the uncertainty at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (Wellington North): Mr. Speaker, I want to tell the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Lennard) that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) sprung no surprise on the Liberal party by introducing a new reciprocity treaty. The Prime Minister well knows the spirit of the Liberal party. There are not many Conservatives in the house to consult. The Prime Minister would not take their opinion if they did give it, but he knows the spirit of the Liberal party as expressed in caucus and he knows the opinions of Liberal members personally. The Prime Minister knows what each one of us thinks with regard to these trade treaties, and we are behind him one hundred per cent.

Mr. BRADETTE: The country is too.

Mr. BLAIR: My hon. friend from Wentworth says that these trade agreements are politics. Nonsense. They are an expression of true Liberalism in all the provinces of this dominion.

The Prime Minister has urged the house to get on with its business and to stop all this delay, but the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Woodsworth) wished to delay the house still further by more discussion, and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) agreed heartily with the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party as did also the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Blackmore).

The Prime Minister said:

In the first place may I point out that it is over a month since this parliament assembled. In that time the government has not been able, until to-day, to bring forward a single government measure.

The house has been delayed, and those who have complained most about the delay have been the very ones who have taken up most of the time of the house by reading speeches until they almost emptied the chamber. It is ridiculous.

We are passing out of somewhat of a depression which we experienced under the late government, and business is now gradually rising to a higher level. We attribute that progress to the effects of the last trade agreement we made with the United States, which meant very much to the farmers of this country.

When hon. gentlemen opposite despair and speak as if everything were going to the dogs, there are a few things we should remember. First, I would advise them to take something for their liver because they cannot be in good health. We have reason to believe that conditions are not too bad now, and that they will continue to improve. If hon. gentlemen opposite will consult statistics they will find reported that in the last five years the debt of Canadians to the outer world has been reduced by $900,000,000. That is an exact figure easy to remember. Of course, we are indebted to one another as a family; there is indebtedness as between province and province, and the federal government is indebted to Canadians within our borders. That indebtedness, as I say, is among ourselves as a family. Our debt to the outside world has been reduced by $900,000,000.

Another matter that should please hon. gentlemen opposite is in connection with trade balances. They are great on trade balances. Personally I do not think they are as important as my hon. friends opposite consider them. In any event the balance of trade in our favour this year in relation to the whole world is $280,000,000. These are easy figures to remember—$900,000,000 paid, and a balance in our favour of $280,000,000. I believe this is on account of the last reciprocity treaty. Those members who are farmers will recall the time when they sold cattle at 3 cents a pound and pigs at 3 cents a pound and lost thousands of dollars. We got the treaty through and the price was doubled; in fact it was three times as high.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BLAIR: The price of pigs was three times as high, I may tell hon. gentlemen opposite if their memories are bad, because I remember selling the last batch I had at that time for $285. We got as high as 9 and 10 cents a pound after the reciprocity treaty.

In connection with cattle this summary might be found interesting. In the last four years of Conservative rule we sold 30,000 head to the United States, and in the last four years under this government we have sold to the United States 601,000 head. In other words, in four years under the Liberals we have sold twenty times as many as we sold in four years under the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett. This means a great deal to the farmers through northern Ontario, and in my opinion it accounts in large measure for the balance of our trade. I believe it came from the exports of cattle.

This trade treaty is much broader than any we have had before. It includes the British Empire. I cannot understand the opposition voting against a trade treaty with the British empire. For years they used to come into the house, wrap themselves in the union jack and talk about patriotism, waving the flag in our faces. For over thirty years I have heard a great deal about the flag in Toronto, and now that we have a trade treaty with Great Britain; now that there is perfect cooperation with the British people, we find the Conservatives talking hour after hour in opposition to the treaty.

The leader of the opposition says that he cannot vote for the treaty. He opposes it for several reasons. First, he says that it means greater competition in industry. Well, I am sure that the people who sent me here will thank heaven for that. They are paying far too much for their farm implements and there is need for some competition to bring about a reduction in the prices of those articles which they have to buy. This will be a blessing to them.

Next he says that this is the beginning of the destruction of the British preference. Well, now! Imagine the Conservative party starting to nurse the British preference! Why, that was the child of the Liberal party. The Conservative party tried hard to kill it at its birth; yet now they say it is not safe in the hands of its parents. Adjustments are made in the British preference, but it is not destroyed, and I think it will be many a day before it is destroyed—perhaps never.

Next he says that he opposes the treaty because it injures our Canadian traffic, the traffic north and south. That is an old Tory fallacy. Liberalism, let me point out, always tries to bring the producer and the consumer as close together as possible, but the Conservative policy for the last thirty years has been to put up toll gates and barriers between the two. They are constantly doing it. Dear knows, nature has provided enough barriers between producer and consumer without our adding extra ones. Time is a barrier, and a deflater between producer and consumer. Weather is a deflater, because commodities may suffer in going through tropical or cold climates as the case may be. Transportation, freight rates, a hill on the highway—anything that helps to keep traffic back is a deflater and destroyer of trade and commerce.

But the Conservative party are not satisfied with that. They want to put more obstructions in the way, and they complain that this treaty injures our Canadian traffic, the trade going north and south. I suggest to the leader of the opposition and those who approve his policy that he get a highway which is not too congested, one that goes round in a circle, and travel over it for so many miles before depositing cargo. Perhaps they would then vote for the treaty.

The next point he complains about is the removal of the excise tax. The removal of the tax, it is said, will have a paralyzing effect. Its removal will not paralyze the people of my constituency, and the sooner it goes the better. In fact, in my opinion, it should never have been imposed.

I always enjoy listening to the Conservatives heckling a bit once in a while, because it gives me an idea of what brand of politics they have. The last time I spoke in this house I was accused in the house in Toronto of denouncing the Conservatives. No. I do not denounce the Conservatives; it is the Tories I denounce. There is a difference between Tory and Conservative. The Tory votes by tradition. He goes to church once a year, some time about July.

Mr. LENNARD: On a point of order, did the hon. member say that I said that the removal of the three per cent excise tax would paralyze trade? I did not.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: That is not a point of order.

Mr. FAFARD: It is a point of disorder.

Mr. SPENCE: Discuss the lethal chamber.

Mr. BLAIR: I expect that every Tory in Toronto will vote against this treaty. I expect the representatives of Tory constituencies to vote against it. But I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that thousands of Conservatives will be very slow to vote against it; on the contrary, they are anxious to have it go through.

An hon. MEMBER: Will they have a chance?

Mr. BLAIR: They will have a chance to express their opinion before long. The Tory is vastly different from the Conservative. The Tories vote by tradition. The Conservatives study matters and vote according to their judgment. We do not expect any Tories to vote for this treaty, but the Conservatives in this house and outside will be strongly in favour of it. I should like to hear a Conservative member or, indeed, any hon. member go to the farmers north of Toronto and tell them that this treaty will do them harm, tell them that they must not sell their cattle in Buffalo; that to do so is wrong. An hon. member—I do not like to mention names—complained that he was tired of hearing Toronto called hog-town. I can tell him that if he votes against this treaty and insists that the farmers north of Toronto cannot sell their cattle in Buffalo and other United States cities, Toronto will still be called hog-town. If he wants that name changed, a change in conduct is the only way to change it.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): It is too bad the hon. member cannot move there.

Mr. BLAIR: Hon. members complained about the Hawley-Smoot and Fordney-Mc-

Cumber tariffs. They should know that it was the Conservative party which was in power in the United States when those tariffs were imposed. I do not think a Conservative party should be elected anywhere, but we in Canada are not responsible for their having a Conservative government in the United States.

An hon. member complained bitterly about the low tariff years from 1921 to 1930; let me tell him those were years of prosperity in Canada. Those were the years when the farmers bought farms and cars and drove to town—

An hon. MEMBER: And got married.

Mr. BLAIR: Yes, got married. To-day it is being preached by hon. members opposite that people should not get married. We as Liberals do not preach such policies.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: No, we get married.

Mr. BLAIR: We need trade, because it is impossible for a country like Canada with her large surplus of raw materials to live without exporting.

We are charged frequently with not co-operating. Let me say that the King government has cooperated fully with Neville Chamberlain in all his actions during the recent critical conditions in Europe. They also did so at the time when the change in the sovereign took place. These matters are very important. Naturally when a Liberal government in Canada cooperates fully with a Conservative government in Great Britain we receive some criticism, we expect that. But we have no apologies to make. We believe Neville Chamberlain will go down in history as the greatest British statesman in many years, and I believe that the name of Mackenzie King will be associated with his for his splendid cooperation.

This treaty may seem to be merely an economic one, but it is of much more far-reaching importance than merely an economic asset. I have here an extract from a speech of a certain man, I do not know how true it is to his inmost mind because I read his speeches in the Hastings by-election; I have them on file, and whenever I look at them they fairly make me sick. But he has been reading passages from some author and he made this declaration at Fort William, as reported in the St. Catharines Standard of January 28, 1939:

> . . . Colonel George Drew went on to assert that "The one hope of the world is a complete understanding between the British empire and the United States to work together in the preservation of peace, a movement in which we Canadians are the interpreters, the ambassadors between the empire and the United States." Which, most people will agree, we think, sums up Canada's position to a nicety.

There is a passage of which I do not think Colonel Drew was the author, but I give him credit for saying it at a public gathering. It means more than most might think. It is the soul of old Joseph Chamberlain; it may have come from some of his writings. Joseph Chamberlain believed in the unification of the British people the world over. He was narrow in his racial ideas, but was ambitious for the unification of the British people. It also expresses the soul and spirit of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who sought for cooperation with and unification of the British people by means of the British preference and reciprocity, something similar to what we are having now. It was the spirit of J. A. Macdonald, editor of the Globe, who preached the unification of the British people, throughout the United States. Now we have Colonel Drew, and if ever a man had a chance to do a little missionary work, if Colonel Drew would spread that doctrine through the club rooms in Toronto, it would be a godsend for some of the Toronto organizations. That spirit is strongly opposed to some of the ideas we hear in this house. If Colonel Drew puts forward that idea in the Ontario house he will not meet with any opposition, because the keynote and foundation of Liberalism is freer trade and better understanding among the nations of the world.

There is one point I might mention in closing; it is in the spirit of Neville Chamberlain that if a nation is so confined that it has not sufficient territory to support its people, that nation should be allowed to get more territory where there are vacant lands, because people are not going to be content to starve on territory on which it is impossible for them to live. There are nations in the world which are in that position; I believe Neville Chamberlain is anxious to give them relief, and I have great faith that he will do it, although he is being bitterly opposed by many British people. But every nation has a right to live and obtain food and clothing, and if they do not have it at home I think some latitude should be given to them to enable them to secure it in other parts of the world.

The great cause of world peace lies behind this treaty. I know there are hon. members opposite who do not think that; they think this treaty is merely an economic problem. Of course it is that, and a vast one; but its object is also the tying together of the English speaking peoples which will be a factor in our national protection. It tends toward making an economic unit of the British people, and I believe that with that protection we shall be relieved of having to spend as much money for defence as we otherwise would have to spend. I think there will be found a great degree of unification among the British peoples, and it is even broader and wider than that. While Great Britain asks all the dominions to come in, they are extending the glad hand to all nations possessing the spirit of British democracy to come hither and join with them in this great union. That means much. The treaty now before us is all right as far as it goes, but the matter does not end there. Great Britain extends the glad hand to all the democracies of the world. This is the first great step toward the unification of all the democracies and all the British peoples

It was with a great deal of regret that I saw the leader of the opposition rise in his place and tell us why he would not vote for this treaty. These men in the far corner rise in their places and talk against the treaty, but we do not know which way they are going. I have faith in the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party; I generally know which way he will vote, and I have never found him opposing a properly negotiated trade treaty which would bring about lower duties. I have not faith in all hon. members in that corner, but I have faith in him. I think some of these men are talking one way, while they would like to talk the other way. I believe the Conservatives talk one way, while they would like to vote the other way. I believe the leader of the opposition would like to vote for this treaty; yet he is speaking against it.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the Reconstruction party?

Mr. BLAIR: Oh, I think he would vote for high tariffs. I cannot understand why some people talk and look one way and then act the other way. They remind me of a story, which I should not tell, of two English cockneys in a London fog who were going round a corner rather quickly. One fellow was cock-eyed and the other was cross-eyed. Then ran into each other, and one fellow said, "Why can't you look where you're going?" to which the other replied, "Why can't you go where you're looking?" Hon. members should look where they are going and go where they are looking. If you talk against this treaty, be men enough to vote against it. If you have faith in this treaty, quit talking against it and approve it. I suggest to those from western Canada that it would be a great mistake to vote against this treaty, which means much to the farmers of both the east and the west. It may not mean much to industry, but it is a great benefit to the dominion as a whole.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to delay this house for more than a few minutes, but I have a couple of points in mind that I do not think have been touched upon. In the six weeks I have been in this house listening to the debates I have become convinced of at least one thing, and it is that any and every government is condemned. It is ridiculed if it does nothing and seriously maligned if it attempts to do anything. I believe the government considered every aspect of this trade agreement and took the advice of competent men before presenting this measure to parliament. I am sure their opinion has not been changed by the debate that has taken place; on the contrary, I think a great many arguments have been presented that would tend to increase their faith in the agreement.

There is one argument I should like to present, and I do not intend to bring forth the scrap-book in order to prove it. Most of the quotations that have been read in this house during the past five or six weeks, particularly during the debate on the trade agreement, have not proved anything but the colour of the politics of those who wrote the articles. I believe this is a good treaty, and I will try to illustrate one of my reasons for so believing by citing the exports of milk and cream. The milk quota that Canada is allowed to send to the United States is 3,000,000 gallons, while the cream quota has been set at 1,500,000 gallons. The two together, converted into gallons of milk, mean 18,000,000 gallons which, if converted into butter, would mean 9,000,000 pounds. If we could remove 9,000,000 pounds of the surplus butter that is in Canada today, there would be quite a different picture in the market price of the remainder.

I mention that one point because it holds true in regard to any other commodity that might be suggested. The 1,000,000 bushels of potatoes is, in itself, not a great quantity, but surely it is not anticipated that the whole province of New Brunswick or the whole province of British Columbia will go into the growing of potatoes. In my opinion it is fortunate for us that we have to the south a country of 130,000,000 people where we can sell our small surplus, thereby keeping our own markets firm, without seriously interfering with their markets. If we should attempt to increase our quotas beyond what may be sufficient to take care of our surpluses, I think we would be on dangerous ground which might bring about the cancellation of the agreement.

There is one other point I should like to make in connection with lumber, in which we in British Columbia are very much interested.

Is it fair that the lumber of British Columbia should be sold in any market which does not return a fair, reasonable profit? By that I mean a profit which will give the labourers fair wages, which will provide a fair return on the money invested and which will allow some profit to those doing the business. In the old country we have to compete against cheap European labour, and on the lumber we ship there we cannot make sufficient profit to make it worth while. I say it is not fair that the natural resources of this country should be wasted. It takes a hundred years to grow a tree. Why should that tree be cut down with no one profiting from it?

It has been stated several times that United States business men were too smart for our business men. Well, I should not like to say that in many of the club rooms throughout this country unless there was a handy means of exit. I will say this: I believe the United States business man is shrewd. He is just so shrewd in making a deal that he would not use that shrewdness in a deal of this kind, because he wants it to last. If you want to trade in sharp practice you had better get into the horse trading business, not into permanent business conditions. I think the United States business man is just smart enough to try to make a good deal, yet one that is going to be fair and lasting to us all.

My last word is this: This is not a cure-all for all the ills we have in Canada. It is something that will help. Not only will it help, but it will help considerably. I hope the government, before parliament prorogues, will have many other measures brought forward which will assist in solving our problems.

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, before I proceed with just a few of the brief comments I desire to make on the trade agreement which is now being so fully discussed in the house, I want to crave your indulgence by permitting me to speak from the seat properly belonging to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Marsh). My understanding is that hon. members are supposed to address the house from the seats allocated to them, but unfortunately those of us in the back row are still within the shadows, and I would appreciate making my remarks from a seat which is not my own.

First, may I say a word to the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) in reply to his reference respecting goods we sell in the United States, and the concessions made to us. He referred to the circumstance of 225,000 cattle being permitted to be sold in the United States. I happen to have before me the trade agreement, and I have been trying to find the joker in the pack. The reason why Mexico grabbed off nearly 50 per cent of the quota for the first three months is found at the bottom of the page, where it is stated that some consultations might be held before the quotas are finally established. That is the stipulation in the further provision set out in the foot note. I can now realize why Mexico captured nearly 50 per cent of the quota.

When I was home a week ago I learned about one cattle raiser who had fattened about forty head of cattle which he anticipated selling in Buffalo. It was his intention to make an effort to sell in the Buffalo market to which reference was made a few moments ago. He made inquiries, and the reply was, "Well, the only chance you have to take advantage of the lower rate of duty is to wait until after April 1, then watch your step and get in ahead of Mexico."

I have listened attentively to the many speeches which have been made on the merits and demerits of the Canada-United States and Great Britain-United States trade agreements. It is not my desire to prolong the debate, but in looking at yesterday's Hansard I find that at adjournment last night the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) referred particularly to the fact that in all probability we would continue this debate through the entire day. Therefore I assume any hon. member has a right to continue the debate and make his observations.

At the outset I want to tell the hon. member for Wellington North (Mr. Blair) that it would not be in the mind of any right thinking Canadian to think of anything else than trading with other countries in a legitimate way. I believe Canada has demonstrated that by her example in the past, no matter what government might be in power. Canada is endowed with a great wealth of natural resources. No one will dispute that our future prosperity is, in a large measure, dependent upon the legitimate development of those resources. I am one who believes that far too much of our raw materials is now being shipped out of Canada without giving our Canadian workmen a greater share of the employment which would result from a greater development of our resources at home.

Many countries are not as richly blessed as we are, and were we more fully to protect our Canadian workmen by seeing to it that they enjoy a fuller measure of their reward, I believe that at least part of our unemployment problem would be solved. Surely there is no one who will argue that countries needing our products would refuse to buy from us if we took steps more adequately to protect our own workmen.

It is interesting to note that predictions made from this side of the house early in the debate are showing evidence of coming true. I believe it was the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) and some other hon. members from this side who drew to the attention of the government the fact that the three per cent reduction in excise tax on items covered in the trade agreements would ultimately be extended in a general way, and that in reality this amounts to a further three per cent reduction in duty.

I believe recent observations of ministers of the government would indicate that this result is almost inevitable. It has been mentioned by one minister that this will probably mean a loss of several million dollars. I believe it was not many days ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) indicated that this possible loss of revenue resulting from the decreased excise tax would be offset by increased trade. Let me say a word about that increased trade which would be required to make up the loss in revenue, which would probably amount to several millions of dollars.

I have endeavoured to ascertain what percentage of our imports are of manufactured products and what percentage are the products of basic industries. The best information I have received makes one hesitate to quote figures, because they are at variance, depending on the basis of calculations. I have no hesitation, however, in making the definite statement that a very large percentage of our imports is of manufactured products. Accordingly, if we are to increase our trade with countries which demand that we accept their manufactured products, how will that affect the jobs of our Canadian workmen? I say that in many instances they will be sacrificed to countries where the standard of living is much lower than we hope to maintain among our Canadian workers.

I should like to deal a little more at length with fruit and vegetables, because that is one item which is of vital importance to the peninsula from which I come. We see vast quantities of fruits and vegetables coming in from the United States. Figures have been placed on Hansard in answer to questions asked of the government, and it is not necessary to attempt to prove this statement at this time. The fact is that vast amounts of fruits and vegetables are being imported from the United States. Why do we find the fruit and vegetable growers of Canada during the past few months urging upon the government the great necessity of giving further protection to this great primary industry? If they were not alarmed, would they have gathered funds, as they did from their depleted revenues, to send three or four representatives to Washington to make a final fight for their rights? My information is that in one part of Canada where the growers were vitally affected, they raised the sum of $2,500 to send a few of their qualified men to plead their case in Washington. One has only to read the resolutions which have emanated from recent meetings of fruit and vegetable growers to realize how serious they consider their position to be. My opinion is that any government that was alive to the needs of the fruit and vegetable growers of this country would have worked in closer harmony instead of requiring these men to take these drastic steps to protect their interests.

It is not my desire to indulge in repetitions, and I urge hon. members to study the tables which were placed on Hansard last evening, I believe by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber). I am in possession of a much more extensive survey than that which was placed on Hansard by the hon. member, and which appears on page 1259. I could add many more items to those already in print which would indicate the same trend of reduced protection and shortened in-season periods with which the fruit and vegetable growers are faced.

The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) referred to the concessions which had been made to us. I should like to place on Hansard some of the concessions which have been made to the United States. I have in my hand a bulletin prepared by the American Institute of Food Distribution, and I should like to place on Hansard a few excerpts from this booklet which is dated November 19, two days after the treaty was signed. I call particular attention to the heading of this article, which reads:

This digest of the agreement between the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom, including some fifty colonies, was prepared by the food institute staff from official material furnished by Washington.

This document was prepared from official material furnished by Washington. I quote:

Two new reciprocal trade agreements negotiated by Mr. Hull with the United Kingdom and her colonies and Canada—his 19th and 20th—cover the largest trading countries in the world. It applies to all parts of the British empire, including more than fifty non-self-governing colonies, with the exception of Australia, New Zealand, Union of South Africa, Ireland, India, Burma and South Rhodesia. It goes into effect January 1 for an initial period of three years.

American farm products on which Great Britain granted concessions were valued in 1936 at more than $200,000,000. Our imports on which concessions were granted amounted to $141,500,000 in 1937. Canada has lowered duties on American products which in 1937 were valued at $241,000,000. American concessions to Canada covered products whose trade in 1937 totalled $121,000,000.

As far as it relates to the food industry, we got the best of the negotiations with Great Britain. We gave only negligible concessions on food in return for the major concessions Great Britain granted. Our principal concessions consisted of duty reductions in manufactured articles.

In the Canadian agreement, duties which were reduced in 1936 were further reduced. We gained substantial concessions on fresh, canned and dried fruits and vegetables in return for concessions on lumber, meats, fishery products, dairy products and some minor items like frozen blueberries. Following are analyses of individual bargains struck with Great Britain and Canada:

I want to repeat that this article is based on information supplied to this institute by Washington. The first item we hear about is the six cent preference on wheat. They say:

Wheat—Duty free treatment instead of six cents per bushel should prove of marked value —duty of this size often sufficient to divert trade. Concession should also benefit transportation business because of transshipments. United Kingdom is leading wheat import market of the world. Formerly one-fourth of United States exports went there. In 1930 shipments were 39,267,000 bushels, 20·1 per cent of United Kingdom's wheat imports; dropped to 9,000 bushels, ·05 per cent of the total, in 1933. In 1937 United States supplied 6,485,000 bushels, 3·6 per cent. United States probably will continue now on an export basis.

Then we come to oatmeal, rolled and flake oats, in connection with which they say:

Reduction of one-third should help restore substantial part of the former American share of United Kingdom market, which ranged from eleven to twenty-eight per cent from 1927 to 1931. New British duty in 1932 forced imports to decline heavily and since 1934 they have virtually ceased.

I come now to lard. Somebody has said that the farmers in some parts of this country are smiling. But what has been done about lard?

Lard—10 per cent ad valorem duty removed. This is the third ranking agricultural item in value imported by the United Kingdom (after cotton and tobacco) with the United States sending 55 per cent of its exports to the United Kingdom in 1937 compared with 29 per cent in 1929. Our lard business increased steadily until around 1934 (92 per cent) but from then on the American share dropped to around 38 per cent. Duty removal will tend to check the trend toward substitution of other fats and oils, also enable American lard to make substantial quantitative gains in United Kingdom.

I come next to apples, and a great many members of this house know something about apples:

Apples, fresh—reduced duty equivalent to 16 per cent ad valorem compared with 24 per cent, should help America regain a substantial portion of the market displaced by former duty. United States encouraging cooperation of apple exporters with empire fruits council to secure orderly marketing in United Kingdom, long the most important outlet for American apples, taking about 40 per cent of our exports—which comprise 10 per cent of our total crop.

There are many other items which time will not permit me to mention, but there are one or two more points in particular to which I wish to refer. The article goes on to refer to United States concessions to the United Kingdom, and then to concessions obtained from Canada by the United States. It says:

Concessions obtained from Canada (by United States)

Trade advantages are extended to many major farm products of the United States, including fruits and vegetables, meat products, grains and grain products. Agreement covers agricultural products valued at $47,000,000 in 1937, representing 90 per cent of all Canadian imports of our farm products.

Those are the concessions obtained from Canada, according to this report. It goes on:

Fresh fruits and vegetables constitute the chief item in the concessions granted by Canada.

There are other items, Mr. Speaker, which time will not permit me to mention.

Is it any wonder, that the fruit and vegetable growers have recently urged upon the government the necessity of 100 per cent fruit content in all processed fruits exported to the United Kingdom? I know that this question is giving the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) serious concern, and that he is giving it fair consideration. He must recognize that it is one of the last hopes our fruit and vegetable growers have left, and I strongly urge the government to listen to this plea of our growers.

Surely if this government, when negotiating these trade agreements, had taken our many Canadian interests more into their confidence, our primary and secondary producers would have been better served.

I do urge upon this government, and upon the new government that I anticipate will be formed in the very near future after the next election, and not by the party opposite, that they take steps to supply the fruit and vegetable industry with more accurate statistics. Acreages and values now supplied are wholly misleading and incorrect, and the growers have been complaining of that for years. Surely the industry deserves more consideration in that respect.

And dove-tailed in with all this is the effect which the treaty is going to have on employment. Primary and secondary industry supplies the employment for our people, and the curtailment of industry has an immediate effect on employment. I know this question is giving the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) great concern, and he has probably only scratched the surface of the situation. But still we find headlines like this relating even to the city of Ottawa: "More unemployed men of Ottawa at Union Mission than ever before." So you do not have to go outside Ottawa to realize what the unemployment situation is. That headline appeared in this morning's Ottawa Journal. The day before yesterday eight young men appeared before the magistrate in my own city—eight in one day—all under twenty years of age. I say, Mr. Speaker, that this inroad on the basic and secondary industries of this country is the main factor in the unemployment situation.

We hear some members of the house praising this government because, they say, the consumer is able to buy this or that article a cent or two cheaper, although it is because we are increasing our purchases from countries where labour can be bought for a song. But who heard the consumer complaining a few years ago about the cent or two extra they had to pay for what they bought when everybody in the country was receiving a pay envelope? The conclusion is obvious. We must protect our basic and secondary industries against the inroads of cheap competition, and then our unemployment problems will immediately begin to disappear.

I note that the hon. Minister of Labour, speaking in Toronto this week, suggested that reductions be made in provincial governments. I suggest that he begin at Ottawa to find the solution for a balanced budget. Every taxpayer in this country is awaiting with anxiety the budget soon to be brought down by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). We have had an expression of opinion in the last few days from a small cross-section of one part of Canada, in the ballots that have been sent to every member of this house. Surely it is time that this government and all governments woke up to the lavish expenditures by governments and to our increasing national debt. If it continues, I warn the minister that the recent flood of ballots into Ottawa from one small cross-section of the country will be insignificant compared with the outcry that will be raised against this government from coast to coast if the next budget presents no evidence of economy being practised. I think it behooves this government not to talk about provincial governments first cutting down their expenditures and balancing their budgets. It is all very well to talk about reductions by the provinces but Canada is looking to Ottawa to lead the way.

I have just one other thought in closing. We have heard considerable in this debate about economic appeasement, but there is an appeasement required within the boundaries of Canada that is far more necessary at this moment than to attempt, as has been done in this house, to raise the cry of international appeasement from without. We have all heard in our school days the tale of Nero fiddling while Rome burned, but I see from press reports to-night that there is further provincial appeasement confronting this government and of a nature that will keep them busy during the next few months to come.

I am in full accord with the principle of trading with nations that desire to trade with us on a reasonable basis, but I am definitely opposed to trade agreements that take away a part of the birthright of our Canadian people.

On motion of Mr. Turgeon the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Ilsley the house adjourned at 10.59 p.m.

[Mr. Lockhart.]

Monday, February 27, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING COMMITTEES

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—CHANGE OF PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Kennedy be substituted for that of Mr. Elliott (Kindersley) on the standing committee on public accounts.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MR. KENNEDY

EDITORIAL IN EDMONTON BULLETIN OF FEBRUARY 23, 1939

On the order for motions:

Mr. O. A. KENNEDY (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In the Edmonton Bulletin of February 23, 1939, appears the following editorial:

Three provinces block the way.

A national unemployment insurance scheme will be set up at the present session of parliament if the governments of Alberta, Quebec and New Brunswick will agree to a constitutional amendment giving parliament power to establish such a system.

This was stated in definite terms by Hon. Norman Rogers on Tuesday. Parliament was only prevented making an all but unanimous declaration of approval of such a scheme by the member for Edmonton East, who talked against the clock until closing time. If his idea was to avoid having to take a stand on the issue, he succeeded for the day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the hon. member reading?

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. member is rising to a question of privilege.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no question of privilege there.

Mr. KENNEDY: This statement is absolutely untrue. I did not talk until closing time, and I did not try to avoid taking a stand on the issue. I definitely stated my stand while speaking. I wish for the benefit of the Edmonton Bulletin to give the true facts of the case.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member has stated his question of privilege.

Mr. KENNEDY: I should like to show that it was not I who talked the debate out on that day. I think I should have the right—

Mr. SPEAKER: I think all hon. members understand the hon. member's question of privilege.

Mr. KENNEDY: I am pointing out that none of the members from the three provinces who are accused by this editorial of blocking the way was able to speak until 9.45 on that evening. I think in fairness those members should have been allowed to speak.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member should resume his seat. He has stated his question of privilege.

UNEMPLOYMENT

RELIEF OF TRANSIENT UNEMPLOYED EX-SERVICE MEN IN OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): I desire to ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) whether it is possible for him to take any action with respect to the relief of ex-service men among the transient unemployed for whom food and shelter cannot any longer be provided in Ottawa, and who cannot establish domicile elsewhere.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): If the persons on behalf of whom the hon. member is making representation are pensioners, they are entitled to unemployment assistance. If they are unfit and unemployable, they are entitled to war veteran's allowance. If they are fit and for the moment unemployed, they have the same privileges as any other citizen. I may add that I think my hon. friend knows that just as well as I do.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT—APPLICATION FOR LOANS UNDER PART II

Mr. GREEN:

1. Have any applications been received for loans under part II of the National Housing Act, 1938?

2. If so, which of such applications were made by limited-dividend housing corporations, and which by other local housing authorities, and what was the amount applied for in each case?

3. What applications have been approved?

4. If any applications have been rejected, upon what grounds were the respective applications rejected?

Mr. DUNNING: No formal applications for loans have been received under part II of the National Housing Act, 1938. Representatives of various municipalities and several groups of private persons interested in the formation of limited-dividend housing corporations have been in touch with the Department of Finance and have received information, advice and technical assistance in connection with the organization of local housing authorities and the preparation of detailed plans for low-rental housing projects.

In most provinces action still has to be taken by the provincial government to enable the municipalities of the province concerned to grant partial tax exemption to low rental housing projects and otherwise comply with the terms of the act.

LOANS UNDER HOUSING AND HOME IMPROVEMENT ACTS—ISLAND OF MONTREAL

Mr. MALLETTE:

How many loans, and for what total, have been made so far to the different municipalities on the island of Montreal under: (a) the Dominion Housing Act; (b) the Home Improvement Act; (c) the National Housing Act?

Mr. DUNNING:

(a) and (c). Up to January 31, 1939, the number and amount of dominion and national housing act loans made in municipalities on Montreal island are as follows:

ST. GEORGES DE BEAUCE, QUE., POST OFFICE SITE

Mr. HÉON:

1. Did the dominion government purchase a piece of land for the building of a post office at St. Georges, Beauce county, within the last four years?
2. If so, from whom was such land purchased?
3. At what price?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes, in September, 1938.
2. Mathias Dutil.
3. $3,250.

SHORTENING MADE FROM VEGETABLE OILS AND ANIMAL FATS

Mr. HYNDMAN:

How much shortening was made from vegetable oils imported into Canada from other countries in each of the years 1934, 1935, 1936 and 1937?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. EULER: Statistics of the production of vegetable shortening do not make distinction between the quantity produced from imported refined oils and that made from oils refined in Canada. The total production of shortening from vegetable oils in Canada follows:

	Pounds
1934	81,215,669
1935	99,991,293
1936	108,383,811
1937—In the slaughtering and meat packing industry	72,926,866

Production in the miscellaneous food industries group for 1937 is not available.

Mr. PERLEY:

How much shortening was made from vegetable oils produced in Canada, in each of the years 1934, 1935, 1936 and 1937?

Mr. EULER: Statistics of the production of vegetable shortening do not make distinction between the quantity produced from oils refined in Canada and that produced from imported refined oils. The total production of shortening from vegetable oils follows:

1934	7,159,809
1935	6,702,357
1936	7,345,455
1937	9,297,422

Mr. PERLEY:

How much shortening was made in Canada from vegetable oil and animal fats in each of the years 1934, 1935, 1936 and 1937?

Mr. EULER: Total production of shortening (vegetable and animal):

	Pounds
1934	88,375,478
1935	106,693,650
1936	115,729,266
1937—In the slaughtering and meat packing industry	82,224,288

Production in the miscellaneous food industries group for 1937 is not available.

Mr. TUSTIN:

How much shortening was produced by all industries in Canada from vegetable oils in each of the years 1934, 1935, 1936, 1937 and 1938?

Mr. EULER:

Quantity of shortening produced by all industries in Canada from vegetable oils in each of the years 1934, 1935, 1936, 1937 and 1938:

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT—ONTARIO

Mr. MARSH:

1. How many farmers in Ontario effected a settlement under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act during 1938?
2. How many were there in the county of Wentworth?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. 2,289.
2. 68.

COAL IMPORTS

Mr. MARSH:

What was the total tonnage of foreign coal imported into Canada year by year, 1929 to 1938 inclusive, and from what countries?

[Mr. Marsh.]

Mr. EULER:

AIR MAIL, TORONTO AND HAMILTON

Mr. MARSH:

1. Has the Postmaster General received any submission or plan from the trans-Canada airways relating to the conveyance of air mail between Hamilton and Malton airports, or between Hamilton and Toronto island airports?

2. Is the Postmaster General considering any plan regarding this, and, if not, will he do so?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. No.

2. Schedules on trans-Canada air mail service are being so adjusted as to give the maximum benefits not only to points immediately en route, but also to important postal centres off the route.

CAMPBELLTON, N.B., DEEP WATER WHARF

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Is the federal government carrying on a relief work program in the vicinity of the Deep Water wharf at Campbellton, Restigouche county, New Brunswick, and wholly paid by the federal government?

2. If so, under what department at Ottawa is the expenditure being made, and who is responsible for the administration of said expenditure?

3. What are the names of the various foremen or supervisors, and what is the remuneration to each?

4. Is this work being carried on under the patronage system or is the town council and poor commissioner consulted with a view of giving as many needy men employment as possible?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. (a) Additional fill is being placed in the rear of the extension to the deep water wharf by day labour rather than by contract, in order to assist in the unemployment situation at Campbellton; (b) Yes.

2. (a) Department of Public Works; (b) District engineer.

3. Two foremen (Thomas N. Dickie and Harry Comeau) at $5 a day each.

4. In the execution of the work, as far as practicable and consistent with reasonable efficiency and economy, first consideration is given to the employment of those who, if available and competent, are most in need in the locality in which the works are to be performed, without any discrimination whatsoever, preference being shown to unemployed ex-service men and unemployed married and single men with dependents.

ROYAL VISIT TO CANADA—PARTICIPATION OF RETURNED SOLDIERS AND SCHOOL CHILDREN

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What arrangements have been made for the participation of returned soldiers and school children throughout Canada at the various receptions during the coming visit of His Majesty?

2. Has federal power, during the visit, been delegated to the provinces over the heads of the chief municipalities in the dominion?

3. If so, what precedent is there for such procedure?

4. Has the attention of the government been called to the refusal to the board of education of Toronto of leave to include visit to 22,000 school children at the University of Toronto stadium, after the visit to Hart House?

[Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. In a statement issued by the Prime Minister of Canada on January 5, 1939, setting out principles to guide Canadian authorities who may be in charge of arrangements for the visit to Canada of Their Majesties, the following appears:

"Wherever possible, special provision should be made to afford children, young persons, and veterans of the great war opportunities of seeing the king and queen."

2. His Majesty having graciously intimated his desire, if possible, to visit the capitals of the provinces, communications have been had with the provincial authorities, who are co-operating with the heads of the municipalities.

3. In connection with the silver jubilee of His Majesty King George V in 1935, communications in respect to celebrations in various cities, towns and other municipalities were had through the provincial authorities.

4. No.

MONTREAL CONSTRUCTION, SUPPLY AND EQUIPMENT COMPANY

Mr. MacNEIL:

For a copy of all orders in council, correspondence, telegrams, reports, contracts and other documents, relating to the contract awarded to the Montreal Construction Supply and Equipment Company, Limited, Montreal, for the manufacture of shells.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Before this motion is carried I should like to inform the house that the contract itself was tabled in this house on January 13. There is, of course, no objection whatever to producing the other documents asked for by my hon. friend.

[Mr. T. C. Douglas.]

WHEAT POLICY

FIXING OF PRICE AT NINETY-FIVE CENTS PER BUSHEL FOR NO. 1 NORTHERN

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, this parliament should immediately take such steps as are necessary to insure the farmers of Canada a fixed price of ninety-five cents per bushel for number one northern wheat at their local elevator.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity at this session of parliament of introducing the resolution which appears on the order paper in my name. I am aware that the government intends to bring down legislation with regard to farm insurance, but I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I do not intend to dwell on that point, because I think we are all in agreement that some form of farm insurance should be inaugurated in this country; in fact I think such legislation is long overdue. This resolution, however, deals with an entirely different matter, that of a set price for the producers, and I think it is most opportune that we should consider this question now.

I have before me an extract from the Ottawa Citizen of February 20, 1939. This purports to be an interview with the Minister of Agriculture:

Under the new legislation the government will hope to confine its grain marketings assistance to farmers who find themselves hard pressed economically through no fault of their own and only through emergency conditions.

"The new legislation" Mr. Gardiner said in an interview, "will provide machinery by which the government may come to the assistance of an average farmer who farms with an average degree of efficiency and through no fault of his own but due to emergency conditions over which he has no control finds himself in danger of losing his farm."

Emergency conditions might mean drought, grasshoppers or the condition of international wheat markets. The aid will be in the form of acreage bonus which will apply to coarse grains as well as wheat. The general resources of the farmer will be taken into consideration, it was learned.

The acreage bonus will be dependent on the extent of crop failure a farmer suffers. For example, a farmer who has a crop of ten bushels to the acre would not receive as much acreage bonus as one whose crop only returned five bushels an acre.

My resolution does not refer to farm insurance. We all realize that that is necessary, but it is an entirely different question and should be treated by itself. I am dealing with the farm problem from a different angle, namely that of the basic price, or the cost of production for the farmers of Canada.

All hon. members will readily see that party politics have no place in a resolution of this type, which deals with a national problem; nor shall I attempt to found my argument on behalf of the Canadian farmer, especially the western farmer, on any false premise, but I shall give facts and figures from which no logical argument may arise.

An erroneous impression has been spread in eastern Canada as regards farming in the west. Occasionally one may see in the papers a statement to the effect that some farmer has had a crop of fifty bushels to the acre, and some easterner may visualize fabulous fortunes being made by western wheat growers. It is true that a small portion of a large field, possibly ten acres, may have yielded fifty bushels per acre, but as a general rule the average is much less.

The Dominion Bureau of Statistics gives the average yield per acre for the last five years in the dominion as follows:

Year	Yield per acre
1938	13·5 bushels
1937	7·5 "
1936	8·6 "
1935	11·7 "
1934	11·5 "
1933	10·8 "

These figures indicate an average yield of about 11 bushels per acre during the period.

It is reported in a book published by the Alberta government, entitled, A Report on the Rehabilitation of Dry Areas of Alberta and Crop Insurance, 1935 and 1936, prepared by the Hon. W. M. Chant, that the average yield in that province is about ten bushels to the acre. According to the statement issued as of January 26, 1939, by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, the average for the last ten year period was 13·84 bushels per acre, and the production in the three western provinces was as follows:

Province	Average yield per acre
Manitoba	13·84 bushels
Alberta	14·65 "
Saskatchewan	8·46 "

Or, for the three western provinces the average yield has been 12·3 bushels per acre.

There are many reasons for such a low yield per acre. When I visited the province of Saskatchewan during the month of June last I saw the most wonderful crops that one could imagine. They should have yielded an average of twenty or thirty bushels, and probably would have, had not grasshoppers and cutworms destroyed the entire crop, leaving those farmers destitute. Had it not been for the direct relief they received, some would have suffered severe hardship. Such losses are common, not only in Saskatchewan, but in Manitoba and Alberta as well. Thousands of dollars are spent every year in attempting to control these pests.

If this were the only obstacle that prevented a crop, the situation would not be so desperate. During the summer and fall of 1938 there was more hail in the province of Alberta than there had been in any other year subsequent to 1928. Of all the forces of destruction I think there is none so devastating as a hail storm. I saw crops in the district in which I live that were almost ready to cut—in fact, one round with the binder had been made. The next day the hail came and completely destroyed it. In places where the grain had stood three or four feet high, not a solitary straw could be seen, nothing but black dirt. Along the sides of the road, hail lay six or seven inches deep —the entire year's work gone in a few minutes; and, worse still, no feed for the stock, nor was there any money for the family to buy the necessities of life.

Large numbers of acres every year in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta are dried out. One must not forget that all financial costs had already been expended on this land and not one cent could be returned.

As reported in Hansard, page 138, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said that—

> The average price of wheat in Canada for 1936 crop was $1.22 per bushel, No. 1 northern, Fort William.

Further down on the same page, the minister is reported as having said:

> Wheat sold in 1937 in Canada at an average price of about $1.31, No. 1 northern.

Such statements give an entirely wrong picture of the true state of affairs. First of all it must be remembered that little No. 1 northern is raised. The proof of this statement I will give a little later in my address. But just here let me give the statement of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics issued on May 13, 1938, relating to the average prices for the year 1936.

They quote the average price at 0·94. Compare this to $1.22 as stated by the minister. The 1937 average price was $1 as compared to the minister's quotation of $1.31. The average price for 1938 as published by the bureau was 0·59. It should here be borne in mind that this does not include cost of freight.

We are fortunate at this time in being able to record the actual cost to the western farmer of raising a bushel of wheat. There were two provinces carrying on this work, Alberta, and Saskatchewan. While both provinces worked independently, it is remarkable to note how nearly the same their results are. The men in Alberta who conducted the experiment had two thoughts in mind: first, what it actually would cost the farmer to raise a bushel of wheat, and second, whether it was cheaper to farm by tractor or by horse. This work was carried on by the Whitla experimental station in Alberta.

I have here two tables showing the cost of producing wheat, per acre, by horse equipment and by power equipment. No freight is included in either table. This is the cost for the preparation of the land and does not include hauling to the elevator, or freight cost. Without bothering the house with details I should like to have it placed on Hansard.

Mr. DONNELLY: I should like to ask the hon. member what he is reading from.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I have not been quoting from anything.

Mr. DONNELLY: You have been reading something. I do not know what it is, but I should like to know.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I just stated that I have two tables which for the benefit of hon. members I should like to place on Hansard. They are statements in regard to the cost per acre of producing wheat. One deals with horse-power equipment, and the other with power equipment. Both contain information prepared at the experimental station at Whitla, Alberta.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has no right to place a table on Hansard, unless he includes it in his speech. Only the Minister of Finance can do that, on the presentation of the budget, by special leave and with the unanimous consent of the house.

An hon. MEMBER: Read it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member cannot read it like that.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Then I shall place it on Hansard by saying that this is a table which deals with the cost of raising wheat, through using horse-power equipment. The table gives minute details, and that is why I did not wish to take the time to read it. I thought it might be interesting to some of the eastern members who know very little about conditions in the west. I thought they might like to find out what it actually costs a farmer to raise a bushel of wheat. But it will suffice to say that it comes under two headings, wheat after summer fallow, and wheat after wheat. In the years in question with horse equipment the total cost was $9.85 per acre, for first crop wheat and $9.50 per acre for second crop wheat.

It will be noted that tractor farming is the cheaper method. It has often been claimed by hon. members that the farmers of western Canada should not use power machinery, as it is too costly a method, but should be content with the use of horse equipment. Why should we expect our farmers to use the more antiquated and costly methods of farming when the same results can be achieved with more modern, scientific power machinery, and a great saving of labour and time can be effected?

Mr. DONNELLY: I rise to a point of order. I want to know what the hon. member is reading from—whether he is reading his speech, or what he is doing.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): No, I am not reading anything.

Mr. DONNELLY: You are reading your speech, or some article.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am not reading anything. If the hon. member would listen he would get some information.

Mr. DONNELLY: You are reading your speech, or some paper. Is it your speech?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I will answer any question the hon. member has to ask after I have finished.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is a rule of the house that no hon. member may read his speech, or read a prepared statement. He must make his speech. He must deliver it to the house.

Mr. PELLETIER: Speaking to the point of order, I submit the hon. member is referring once in a while to some notes he has prepared. That has been the practice followed by most hon. members of the house. Notes have been prepared, and they have referred to them.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have rendered my decision. If the hon. member is only consulting his notes, he is in order. If he is reading his speech, verbatim, from a written statement prepared in advance, he is out of order.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am just consulting notes.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Copious notes.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It is and should be the aim of all industries, whether agriculture or otherwise, to operate in the cheapest and most efficient manner possible in order that they may have the greatest financial return for the time and labour expended. No seed or hauling is included in either of these two tables, so we should in both cases add $1.25 per acre for seed wheat and five cents per bushel or 50 cents per acre for hauling the grain to the elevator. In the table using horse-power the cost per acre for the first crop of wheat after fallow is $9.80, plus $1.25 for seed and 50 cents for hauling, making $11.55, and at ten bushels per acre, the cost per bushel is $1.15½. For the second crop of wheat the cost is given at $9.50 per acre. By adding $1.25 for seed and 50 cents for hauling this makes $11.25 per acre, and at ten bushels per acre, the cost of raising one bushel is $1.12½.

Mr. DONNELLY: I contend the hon. member is reading his speech. I have sat in the house for most of this session and so far I have not spoken at all, but I have had to listen to dozens and dozens of speeches which have been read and I think it is time this practice was stopped.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I should like to know why the hon. member picks on this member to raise an objection.

Mr. DONNELLY: It is not this hon. member alone; it has been done by hon. members all over the house. It is all right when an hon. member first comes into the house to use notes when speaking; we have no objection to his reading his speech then, but I think it should be stopped when it goes on day after day, week after week and month after month.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is there any other hon. member who wishes to speak to the point of order?

Mr. PELLETIER: I submit that the hon. member is dealing with a technical matter involving the use of a number of statistical tables, something which could not possibly be memorized. As I stated a moment ago, he is referring closely to his notes in order to give accurate information to the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Standing order number 41 deals with those things which should not be done by an hon. member and, paragraph (o) of that order reads:

(o) read from a written, previously prepared speech.

If the hon. member is reading from a previously prepared speech, he is not in order and he should discontinue reading; if he is not, then he is in order.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The other table using power machinery is a little cheaper. The first crop of wheat after fallow is $9.74, plus $1.25 for seed and 50 cents for hauling which makes $11.49, making the cost per bushel $1·149. For the second crop of wheat the table shows $8.99, which with the $1.25 for seed and 50 cents for hauling makes a total of $10.74 per acre, or $1·074 per bushel as the cost of production. It should be particularly noted that in neither case was there any profit allowed to the farmer. Surely if there is any industry which is entitled to a fair commission on its investment, it is western farming. It has been the consensus of opinion in this house that all the wheat raised in the west is No. 1 northern, and so it has been assumed that the farmers get the full pegged price of 80 cents, but such is certainly not the case.

On January 26, 1939, I received a book from the bureau of statistics entitled Monthly Review of the Wheat Situation, published by authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler). On page 34 the following statement appears:

The 1938 wheat crop in the praire provinces is averaging about a grade higher than in 1937, with No. 2 northern the more common grade this year, compared with No. 3 northern a year ago. The best grading from the 1938 crop has occurred in northern Alberta with No. 1 northern predominating. Winnipeg inspections are concentrating in No. 2 northern and are somewhat better than 1937. The effects of rust damage in Saskatchewan in 1938 are shown in Moose Jaw inspections, which are ranging between No. 2 and No. 3 northern, whereas the small volume of inspections in 1937 was predominantly No. 1 northern. Northern Saskatchewan inspections are about the same as last year, varying between No. 2 and No. 3 northern, while central and northern Alberta inspections are going more into No. 2 northern this year, with No. 3 northern the predominating grade in 1937.

Is there an hon. member in this house who dares say that when it costs over $1.10 to raise a bushel of wheat, that 80 cents a bushel is a fair pegged price? No, not 80 cents; for 20 cents must come off the freight, so the farmer gets only 60 cents per bushel for No. 1 northern, but as wheat is mostly graded No. 2 or No. 3 northern, all he actually gets is about 54 cents, less than half of what it costs him to produce the wheat.

A further analysis has been made of this problem in the province of Saskatchewan, to which I have made reference. This appeared in the Western Producer of June 25, 1939, and is based on the university farm revenue study. It deals with eleven types of soil as well as with different localities throughout the province, and they have arrived at a definite conclusion in regard to the cost of raising a bushel of wheat. I shall not take up this report in detail. Suffice it to say that the average cost of producing wheat is as follows:

Average cost of production per bushel on half-section farms	$0.92
Average cost of production per bushel on section farms	.78
Average cost of production per bushel on half-section and section farms	.85
Average cost of production per bushel on farm	.85
Average freight cost per bushel to Fort William	.18
Total average cost per bushel to produce and ship to market	$1.03

There can now be no doubt in the mind of anyone as to what it costs to raise a bushel of wheat. That fact is proven by the investigation made in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta which shows that the wheat growers have been attempting the impossible in trying to produce below cost. Alberta is the best customer of eastern Canada. Ever since the early settlement of the west began there has been a desire to make that portion of the dominion a better market for eastern manufactured goods. So year by year it became a better market. Whenever a crop failure occurred, a decided shortage of sales for eastern manufactured goods took place. In the industrial cities of Ontario and Quebec the factories closed down and men and women of all ages walked the streets in search of employment. A further indication of the contribution which the province of Alberta has made and is making to Canada, and particularly to the central provinces, will be found in the volume of retail merchandising sales within the province. The volume, for the years 1930 to 1934 inclusive, is estimated by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics as follows:

1930	$176,537,100
1931	135,095,000
1932	115,354,000
1933	108,431,000
1934	120,423,000

As the years quoted are those of depression, it is obvious that the volume would be considerably higher in the preceding years when the prices of wheat were higher.

It has been estimated that at least seventy-five per cent of the retail merchandising sales consist of goods manufactured in other provinces, principally in Ontario and Quebec. Alberta is indeed a good customer of the eastern manufacturer. Not only does Alberta, along with Manitoba and Saskatchewan, provide a larger market for the manufacturer in other parts of Canada, but annually a large volume of business is done in the prairie provinces by the banks, trust and loan companies and life and fire insurance companies, which for the most part have their principal places of business in other provinces.

Again, one has only to consider the elaborate plants and business organizations located in other provinces for the handling of the annual wheat crop produced in the prairie provinces. The principal grain exchange is located in Winnipeg, but there is also an exchange in Vancouver. Numerous large terminal elevators have been erected at Vancouver, Prince Rupert, Fort William, Port Arthur, Toronto and Montreal, while wheat cargoes constitute a large volume of the tonnage carried annually over the great lakes. So also do the great transcontinental railways carry thousands of bushels of wheat from the west. I have in my hand a table compiled from the preliminary returns of the census of the prairie provinces of 1926 and of preceding censuses which shows definitely that Alberta is the best customer for eastern manufactured tractors, combines, motor trucks and automobiles. In 1921 motor trucks were included with automobiles. This statement is true not only of Alberta, but also equally true of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. It includes motor trucks and automobiles on farms, with tractors and combines, and covers the period from 1921 to 1936. It shows that in the year 1921 the number of tractors sold in Canada was, 47,455, of which 38,485 were sold in the prairie provinces; in 1931, the number sold in all of Canada was 105,360, of which 81,659 were sold to the prairie provinces. As to combines, the total number sold in Canada in 1931 was 8,917, of which 8,897 were sold in the prairie provinces. Of motor trucks, 48,401 were sold in Canada in 1931, of which 21,517 were sold in the prairie provinces.

The automobile industry of eastern Canada made a substantial share of its sales in the three western provinces; for in 1921, out of 157,022 sold in Canada, 133,049, or more than half of the total sales, went to the west. Does not this prove that eastern business is dependent upon the success of the western farmer? Why not treat these agriculturists fairly and thus increase the prosperity of all Canadians?

The next table shows the sales of tractors only in the prairie provinces for the years 1920 to 1936. It shows that 95,113 tractors were sold by eastern firms to the prairie provinces in the period from 1920 to 1936.

What would happen to these eastern manufacturers if the farmers of the west went bankrupt? Is this market worth retaining? It is evident from this table that the sales of tractors has fallen off very considerably since 1928. Why has this been so? It must be apparent to all that the reason is a lack of purchasing power in the prairie provinces. The farmer has been going behind year after year through no fault of his own, for he has been raising greater quantities of grain; but because he has been producing at a financial loss. A tabulation of the sales of any other item of farm machinery would show approximately the same results.

From these facts there can be no question that the west not only is an excellent customer of the east but keeps eastern people employed in the industries and is directly responsible for the prosperity that Ontario and Quebec enjoy.

It is urgently essential that a closer co-operation and thorough understanding prevail between these two sections of the dominion to ensure the best results for the country as a whole. I feel that it is most necessary at this time, in order to enable hon. members to have this complete understanding, to make an informative statement respecting the financial status of western farmers.

I have outlined some of the conditions of the west which seriously need the attention of every hon. member of the house, not from a partisan point of view, but from the realization that such conditions must cease if we are ever to have a unified Canada working in the interests of the whole dominion. Industrial and agricultural conditions in western Canada are such that no delay should be permitted. The last five years have been years of decided under-crop production, three years of which have been almost total crop failures, and as a result the financial condition of the farmers is such that it is impossible for them to carry on without some assurance of at least the cost of production.

In the early years of the history of the province the tenure of the land was largely that of ownership. In 1901, out of 9,479 farms, approximately 9,076 were held by owners, while only 211 were held by tenants and 192 by part-owners and part-tenants. This situation of ownership has changed greatly since then, as is shown by the table, VI, which is taken from The Case for Alberta, published by the Alberta government in 1938. There is not much use in placing the table on Hansard for the information of hon. members, because apparently some of them are not interested in conditions in the west.

The census of 1931 shows that out of 100,358 farms in the province, 67,562 were held by owners, while 16,208 were held by tenants and 16,588 were held by part-owners and part-tenants. It will be observed that since 1931 there has been a decline in the number of farms held by owners, and a substantial increase in the number of farms held by part-owners and part-tenants.

Thus, it is quite evident that the farmers of the west are speedily becoming land tenants rather than land owners.

In 1931, there were 728,625 farms in Canada valued at $4,053,282,300. Of these farms, 242,850 were reported mortgaged to the amount of $671,776,850, and the average mortgage was $2,776. In Manitoba the average mortgage was $3,165; in Saskatchewan, $3,141; in Alberta, $3,072; in British Columbia, $2,436. In 1936, the average indebtedness per farm in Manitoba was $2,630; in Saskatchewan, $3,023; in Alberta, $2,804. These figures are given by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, May 13, 1938 Again I say probably it will not be worth while putting this table on Hansard, because perhaps some members might not be interested in knowing just what a great contribution the western part of Canada makes yearly to the eastern part of Canada, nor do they realize how urgent it is that we develop a united Canada instead of having, under the present system, a disorganized Canada.

It is evident that the farmers in the west will never be able to pay off their indebtedness unless they have assured them at least the cost of production for the wheat that they raise. We of western Canada have no desire for special privileges, yet we feel that we should have the same consideration that other industries enjoy in the dominion.

Following the wheat conference which was called by the Bracken government of Manitoba, the Western Producer, in its issue of December 29, 1938, published an article having to do with an address by Professor Hope of the university of Saskatchewan, entitled The Burden of Debt, from which I quote:

> Professor Hope, Saskatchewan University, threw a glare on the debt situation in Saskatchewan which must have nearly blinded those in the creditor class. The total shrinkage in cash sales from the farm between 1926 and 1938, he said, was $2,700,000,000; for the three years 1931-33 it was over one billion dollars. The farm debt of Saskatchewan alone is $546,000,000, and with wheat at eighty cents a bushel Fort William, more than one-half of the debtor farmers will have to say "No" to the debt collectors. Professor Hope gave production costs for certain areas in Saskatchewan, showing that eighty cents a bushel at Fort William does not begin adequately to meet the situation in Saskatchewan, and presumably in the other two provinces as well. He said: "On the basis of the facts presented if all the farmers of western Canada were entirely free of debt, or if they did not pay their debts, it would seem that the present farm prices for grain would probably barely maintain a reasonable level of living. It certainly would not maintain a reasonable level of living and enable them to build up their buildings, machinery, homes and personal effects up to the level prior to 1931.

"Conservatively, it would probably require with average yields a farm price for wheat of average grade of about ninety cents, with coarse grains in proportion, to maintain a reasonable level of living and service the present debt on western farms. It would require somewhat more than this to restore the farming community to the condition of 1931."

The wheat conference that was recently held in Manitoba produced some interesting statistics in that regard, showing the financial position of the west, and that the west cannot carry on unless a farm insurance scheme is provided and, in addition, the farmers receive at least the cost of production.

Some of the leading public men in this country have definitely taken the stand that the price of farm products should not be protected. The present leader of the Conservative party, the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), stated in an address to the people of Edmonton on October 19 last, as reported in the Calgary Albertan of October 20, 1938:

Doctor Manion restated his belief in a moderate protective tariff. Both industry and workmen needed protection against cheap imports. Farmers, except wheat farmers of the west, deserved protection. Wheat farmers could not be protected.

Mr. MANION: I meant they could not be protected by tariffs, that is all.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I accept the qualification. But I would ask the hon. gentleman to state to this house just how any industry can carry on if it does not get the cost of production. Surely it is evident from the above remarks that should the Conservative party ever form a government in this country, their policy would be that of discrimination against the western agricultural industry, especially against the wheat farmer.

Mr. MANION: That is not so at all.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The present government must have the same attitude as the Conservatives, inasmuch as they have done absolutely nothing to assure the farmers the cost of production. A pegged price of eighty cents, netting the farmers 57 cents for No. 2 northern, is about half the cost of raising a bushel of wheat.

The Commonwealth of Australia has gone a great deal further than Canada has in taking care of farmers' problems. I have here a bill introduced by the minister of commerce, Right Hon. Sir Earle Page, which assures the growers a price of five shillings and twopence, or about $1.17½ per bushel at Williamstown, Victoria. I will not take time to read the bill, but it can be found in the 1937-38 statutes of the commonwealth house of representatives, under date November 24, 1938. In introducing the bill, the minister stated definitely that the attitude of the commonwealth was to give the farmer a set price at the local elevators of about $1.12. That is worth doing. But what is our government doing? So far it has done nothing.

New Zealand has taken similar action with respect to primary products. While the act to which I refer deals exclusively with dairy products, it is definitely stated that the intention of the government of New Zealand was to assure to producers of dairy products the actual cost of production and make it possible for them to have a decent standard of living.

The Commonwealth of Australia and the Dominion of New Zealand are not the only countries which have been able to do something definite for their farmers. Let me read from a letter dated January 31, 1939, which I received from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics:

You will note that I am showing no domestic price for the United Kingdom in the present crop year 1938-39. This average price will not be definitely ascertained until after the end of the crop year, but it should be in the neighbourhood of 44 shillings per quarter.

That is about $1.17½ per bushel. That is what Great Britain has done. With this letter I received from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics a statement showing some of the prices paid to the grower in other countries which are said to be not so democratic as ours. The prices quoted are in dollars and cents per bushel.

This shows that other governments are at least progressing in what they are doing for their farmers. Surely it is not too much to ask for the greatest industry in all Canada, the one which gives more employment than any other, that we should have a definite set price of at least ninety-five cents a bushel at local elevators. When we see that this Liberal government is assuring the manufacturers of machine guns—implements of destruction—their production price plus ten per cent profit, we wonder why they hesitate to do this much for the western farmer, who supports the east more than, probably, the worker in any other industry. It would not be necessary to increase taxation; a set price could be financed from the credit of the dominion issued debt free. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) could make good, even at this late day, his forgotten promise in 1935, to "issue currency and credit in terms of public need"; for if ever there was an urgent public need it is that of guaranteeing the farmers of Canada a fixed price of ninety-five cents a bushel, thus at least assuring them the cost of production.

I know that it is the government's intention to bring down legislation as far as farm insurance is concerned. I believe that the whole house is in agreement with such a policy, but that is an entirely different proposition from assuring the farmer a set price for the things he raises, and should be treated as such. For if you are to limit your assistance to farm insurance, where the people will be on a relief standard, they will not be put in a position to patronize eastern industry or pay their debts. I think we all agree that there should be farm insurance, but let it also be understood in this house that it is necessary, for the unity of Canada and for the sake of all industries, parts and parties, that there should be a definite price of ninety-five cents a bushel for No. 1 northern wheat at the local elevators.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, the business of farming, if we can call it such, is in a very precarious condition at the present time. It is not news to this house when I say that farming is the backbone of the country to-day, as it has been for a great number of years. In order to support this statement it is necessary only to go back and look up some figures of production of wheat alone. We find that from 1912 to 1938 inclusive the staggering quantity of 8,495,571,700 bushels of wheat was produced, valued at $7,852,066,800. This amount, which represents just one variety of grain, must have had a very beneficial effect upon the building up of the country, because it was distributed directly or indirectly among all classes in all parts of the dominion.

Farming as a business is entirely different from all other industries. Perhaps this accounts for the present condition of the farming population. The farmers, a very numerous body, have to buy from a comparative few who get together and fix prices to suit themselves, the prices usually being whatever the traffic will bear. When the farmer comes to sell his products he is compelled once more to deal with the few, and finds himself confronted with prices set by those who purchase his goods and who are associated with financial institutions through whose help they work their will.

Farmers as a class do everything possible to pay their debts. I must admit that to-day the farm debt situation is not very sound, but I think it will be agreed that farmers have been going through a very tough time. Until some of these adverse conditions are regulated and eased it will be impossible for the farmers to pay all their debts. I personally know of farmers who have gone to the extent of depriving themselves and their families of several of the necessities of life. Statistics show that in the vast majority of cases farmers are living on a far lower standard than numbers of our people who are on relief in the towns and cities. I am not saying this with the slightest idea of dragging down the standard of living of those on relief, because I know that in most cases these people are not on relief of their own choice; they have been put there by circumstances over which they have no control. But I do believe that the standard of living of the farmer should be raised, and probably this can best be done by increasing the price of the farmers' produce and bringing down the cost of the things they have to buy. To the farmer it does not matter greatly whether the price of grain is high or low, so long as the price of the things he has to buy is in proportion.

The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) has given a very extensive survey of costs of production in Saskatchewan and Alberta. I do not think the figures can be successfully challenged. The Department of Agriculture in a bulletin issued in 1932 gave the average cost of growing wheat as ninety-five cents a bushel. That is basis No. 1 northern at the local elevator. As has been pointed out by a previous speaker, that is much more than the actual amount the farmer gets at the local elevator, nearly twenty cents a bushel being deducted for freight and handling; and where the grade is lower than No. 1 northern, as is very often the case on account of frost, hail, drought, rust and other causes, he is compelled to take a further reduction.

I quote from an address recently given by Major Strange, director of the research department of the Searle Grain Company of Winnipeg:

I have averaged up the price of all wheat produced for sixty-two years and I find it comes out to $1.14 for No. 2 northern at Winnipeg. I suggest that this is a very good average price.

No farmer would find the slightest fault with this price. The trouble is however that in some years great fluctuations have occurred. For instance it went as high as nearly $3 a bushel in 1918 and as low as 38½ cents a bushel in December, 1932.

There is another item which I believe has been lost sight of, whether intentionally or not, by most of those who have given figures on cost of production; I refer to interest. Knowing from experience that the interest on a farmer's debt runs to about twenty-five cents on every bushel of wheat he grows, this should be taken into consideration when considering the cost of growing wheat. A number of economists have figured out the cost of interest, their estimates running in some cases as high as thirty cents a bushel, but I believe from information we can secure that twenty-five cents for every bushel grown is a reasonable figure. The debt situation is one which must not be lost sight of, and as just one way of relieving this I suggest a reduction in the interest on Canadian Farm Loan Board loans. A reduction of two per cent could be effected without doing any one any material damage, and would help to a great extent the borrowers from that board.

In Winnipeg from December 12 to December 15 last there was a conference on markets, and Professor Hope of the university of Saskatchewan had this to say:

A few years ago a member of the Department of Farm Management of the University of Saskatchewan made a careful analysis of 195 farm loans in the prairie area. These loans were placed from 1910 to 1927, but most of them from 1920 to 1925. By 1933, 41 were paid off, 36 were foreclosed and 84 were still current. The average debt against current loans was $9.87 per acre compared with an original loan of $11.79 per acre, after an average duration of twelve years. The interest rate was 8 per cent. Based on the twelve years of payment history of current loans from 1922 to 1933, these farmers were able to pay about 3 per cent annually on the appraised value of the farm real estate. As the total farm capital includes live stock and machinery as well as real estate, it appears reasonable to infer that on the average they could not earn more than 3 per cent on their total capital investment payments in good years.

[Mr. Fair.]

The best lands had a better payment history than the figures quoted and the poorer lands much worse. The results of this study indicated that either the poorer lands were appraised by the loaning company at too high a figure, or else the amount loaned was too great.

A study of the loaning operations of one of the largest loaning agencies in Saskatchewan is now being undertaken. Preliminary results of this investigation also indicate that on the average the farmer borrowers have earned about 3 per cent annually on the appraised value of the real estate alone, which is not all the farm capital.

In his conclusions Professor Hope said:

On the basis of the facts presented, if all the farmers of western Canada were entirely free of debt, or if they did not pay their debts, it would seem that the present farm prices for grain, would probably barely maintain a reasonable level of living. They certainly would not maintain a reasonable level of living and enable them to build up their buildings, machinery, homes and personal effects to the level prior to 1931.

Conservatively it would probably require with average yields a farm price for wheat of average grade of about 90 cents, with coarse grains in proportion, to maintain a reasonable level of living and service the present debt on western farms. It would require somewhat more than this to restore the farming community to the condition of 1931.

In the light of the present world wheat situation a further drastic debt reduction policy is a partial solution of the western farm problem.

It has been suggested that farmers should learn how to live on a lower standard in order to meet the present debt situation. But any policy that compels such a solution does not solve the problem if we hope to maintain our present social system.

If we consider the basis on which farmers do their business, and compare it with the basis on which government operations are carried on, I think it is clear that the farmer is carrying on his operations in a better way and more economically than governments and some other lines of business. It is suggested that farmers cut down the cost of production to meet the requirements of the market, but it is impossible to put this suggestion into practice, because once land is broken it is not desirable to let it go into disuse. If it is not worked, it will grow weeds, and we all know the damage caused by crops of weeds. If prices and demand are not satisfactory to the manufacturer, he can close his factory and save a lot of the overhead. Speaking of overhead, it was also stated at the Winnipeg conference that fixed charges run anywhere from fifty to seventy per cent of the cost of production of wheat. In January, 1935, the Secretary of the United States Department of Agriculture submitted a document prepared by Gardiner C. Means, of Columbia university, from which the following is taken.

This shows the difference between industry and farming in the matter of cutting down production when prices fall below cost:

Commodity	Permanent drop in prices Per cent	Permanent drop in production Per cent
Agricultural implements	6	80
Motor vehicles	16	80
Cement	18	65
Iron and steel	20	83
Automobile tires	33	70
Textiles	45	30
Food products	49	14
Leather	50	20
Petroleum	56	20
Agricultural commodities	63	6

This shows that the greater the degree of control of production of the various commodities the greater the resistance to a decline in prices. In the free market system and under complete competition decreased demand is translated into decreased prices. In the system of control decreased demand is translated into decreased production. So we see the two extremes; the agricultural implement industry, with great control, drops production eighty per cent and encounters a reduction of six per cent in prices, while the farmers encounter a drop of sixty-three per cent in prices for farm products when their production is decreased only six per cent.

Taking 1929 as the basis, statistics gathered by the League of Nations show the following comparative declines in production and prices as of 1932: In the United States the decline in production was 46·2 per cent and the decline in price 29 per cent. In Canada the decline in production was 41·9 per cent and the decline in price 27 per cent. In Germany the decline in production was 46·7 per cent and the decline in price 28 per cent. In the United Kingdom the decline in production was 16·5 per cent and the decline in price 7 per cent. In the same period agricultural production maintained an increase of 3 per cent and agricultural prices declined as much as 58 per cent in Canada, 57 per cent in the United States and 49 per cent in the Argentine, while in European countries where governments intervened to shelter their farmers the decline was less, averaging about 35 per cent in Germany, 37 per cent in Italy and 28 per cent in Great Britain.

The opinion has been, and I believe still is, held by some hon. members that the price of wheat in western Canada is of interest to the west only. I would point out that the prosperity of all Canada depends a great deal on the price of our wheat in the west. This fact is recognized by Major H. G. Strange, of the Searle Grain Company, who in a recent broadcast said:

> This is a most serious matter that every one of us in the west and many in eastern Canada should consider.

The entire economic structure of western Canada; the railways with all their branches; primary and high schools; our roads, both country, market and gravel; our municipalities; our vast elevator system for handling grain; our hamlets, villages, towns and cities; our governments; our universities, have all been built up and populated with over two million people in the expectation that the west would be able to keep in production the amount of acreage it now has in wheat, about twenty-four million acres, which on an average would produce around four hundred million bushels a year, and which would make it necessary to export to some ninety-two different countries between 250 and 300 million bushels a year. As production declines from these levels, so unquestionably will the population of the west decline; so unquestionably will the cost of everything the farmers buy and the cost of selling all their produce increase. So, therefore, will tens of thousands of workers be thrown out of employment, including a number of the farmers themselves. So will the standard of living of everyone on the land, in towns and cities, decline. It is a sad and distressing picture for the future, unless the situation can be remedied. These words, I believe, present the picture as far as other parts of Canada are concerned, because, though merchants and others do not wish to admit the fact, their prosperity depends entirely on the prosperity of the farmers.

Several estimates have been made as to the amount necessary to bring reasonably up to date the equipment of farmers, including tractors, farm machinery, horses, harness, outbuildings as well as their homes and furniture, clothing, and so on; but I believe an estimate of $500,000,000 is reasonable. You will readily understand, Mr. Speaker, that a great many people in Canada would benefit if that amount of money were put into circulation. It would mean that the railroad workers, the manufacturers and labour in general would be benefited. I believe it would also cut down the number of unemployed and reduce the number on relief, thereby removing the necessity for some of the taxes we are paying at the present time.

The effect of low prices for grain is reflected also in the following table, showing the estimated purchases of farm machinery by Canadian farmers during the years 1920 to 1937 inclusive:

1920	$82,183,000
1921	54,405,000
1922	28,096,000
1923	39,909,000
1924	29,096,000
1925	31,719,000
1926	52,211,000
1927	70,521,000
1928	89,306,000
1929	70,316,000
1930	51,558,000
1931	16,282,000
1932	8,213,000
1933	8,196,000
1934	11,638,000
1935	17,087,000
1936	25,857,000

You will notice that from a high of some $82,000,000 in 1920 we went down to about $8,000,000 in 1932 and 1933. That is in connection with only one industry, and it will be readily realized that the low prices of grain have had a tremendous effect on other industries all across Canada. In the report of the special committee on farm implement prices the following appears at page 1215:

The International Harvester Company during the period of 1935 to 1936, inclusive, marketed 77·60 of its total Canadian sales volume in western Canada and 22·40 in eastern Canada. In the same period the purchases for the Massey Harris Company showed 66·69 marketed in western Canada and 33·31 in eastern Canada. In addition, Deere and Company confines its operations wholly to western Canada and this is largely true of the remainder of the companies manufacturing in the United States and marketing their products in Canada.

In view of the fact that only slightly over 40 per cent of the total number of farmers in Canada are located in the four western provinces, the importance of the problem to this section of the country in comparison with the east can be readily recognized. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics shows that in 1928 the west purchased from the east, at point-of-origin price, goods to the amount of $387,000,000, while in 1933 purchases were reduced to $80,000,000. This reduction can be traced directly to the ruinously low prices received for grain. During the years 1926 to 1929 cash sales of farm products averaged $530,640,000, while during the period 1931 to 1933 they dropped to $164,429,000, or an average drop per year of $366,201,000.

Further evidence of the farmer's lack of purchasing power is reflected in the income tax paid by farmers. If farmers were the only ones left to pay income tax I am afraid the Minister of Finance would have to look elsewhere for his revenue, because the farmers' belts will not stand much more tightening; in fact, in many cases they are ready to break. The income tax figures regarding farmers are as follows:

Fiscal year	No. of farmers	Average tax	Percentage of total
1919-20	9,475	$ 52 56	3·77
1924-25	3,067	53 23	·64
1930-31	2,626	57 96	·45
1931-32	653	55 71	·10
1932-33	249	110 92	·15
1933-34	262	85 24	·07
1934-35	416	57 89	·09
1935-36	694	67 16	·14
1936-37	921	82 95	·21

This statement is amply justified by the following table, which shows the index numbers of farm implement prices, taking the basis of 100 for 1926. These prices of farm machinery are based on those of the Regina territory:

Index Numbers of Farm Implement Prices
(1926=100)

Year	Regina territory
1913	61·1
1923	99·5
1924	110·1
1925	101·3
1926	100·0
1927	99·9
1928	100·3
1929	100·1
1930	99·1
1931	99·0
1932	97·9
1933	93·7
1934	93·5
1935	93·3
1936	96·6
1937	96·2
1938	102·8

Hon. members will see from the table that farm machinery prices have stayed up very close to the 1926 level, although the prices of other commodities have gone down very considerably.

The following table gives index numbers in respect of the wholesale prices of Canadian farm products, the commodities farmers have to sell, and the prices of articles farmers have to buy:

Year	Index numbers of Wholesale prices of Canadian farmer products	Things farmers buy (Searle Grain Co.)
1929	100·8	103·2
1930	82·3	98·7
1931	56·3	87·9
1932	48·4	82·8
1933	51·0	79·0
1934	59·0	79·0
1935	63·5	79·6
1936	69·4	80·3
1937 (estimated)	84·2	86·6

I have one more table put out by the Searle Grain Company, last September, which gives the following information for 1938 as compared with 1913-14, taking the basis as 100:

16 items of groceries	116
36 items of clothing	132
28 items household equipment	148
53 items farm equipment	138
12 items farm machinery	162
2 items of taxes (municipal and school)	169

The table shows an average of 137 for the total of 147 items.

With respect to products farmers have to sell, wheat, according to open market prices is placed at 67; the board price is placed at 91, and the price of steers at 83.

In their bulletin of May 18, 1938, the same company has given further detailed information, but I shall not read all of it. Perhaps it is sufficient to say that the farmer on the average half-section of land has to pay out annually, for living expenses and the necessities to produce a crop, the amount of $908.42. Against this I will place on record the average amount of income that has been received by western farmers between 1926 and 1937 inclusive:

Year	Amount received
1926	$2,143
1927	1,989
1928	2,286
1929	1,755

I would ask hon. members to take particular note of the change in farm income about the year 1929, when we had that wonderful man-made crash, and again in 1930, when we started to reap the benefits of it. The table continues:

Year	Amount received
1930	$ 919
1931	571
1932	562
1933	565
1934	748
1935	781
1937	901

The amounts I have given are gross income. Out of this gross income the farmer has to pay all his living expenses, including taxes, wages, interest, food, clothing, and so on, and, in Alberta, an added amount of approximately $135 to satisfy tariff requirements, as shown in a report prepared by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers).

May I now place on record figures which will give some idea of the value of the increased crop of 1938. This information is taken from the December issue of the Monthly Review, which deals with the wheat situation.

The first estimate of the gross value of the principal field crops grown in Canada in 1938 is $527,419,000, which is $30,968,000, or six per cent below the estimated value of the 1937 production, and $84,881,400 below that of 1936. The values of the 1936 harvest were the highest since 1930. Very low yields in 1937 and sharply reduced prices in 1938 have resulted in successive reductions in value in the past two years.

While the 1938 wheat production is nearly double that of 1937, the average farm price is only 57 cents as compared with $1.02 last year. Thus the value of the crop is only about $12,000,000 greater. Increases in the production of oats, barley and rye in 1938 failed to offset declines in prices, and the combined values of these crops is $35,694,000 less than in 1937. Farm prices for oats in 1938 have averaged 25 cents per bushel as compared with 43 cents in 1937; for barley, 28 cents as compared with 51 cents and for rye 28 cents as compared with 72 cents per bushel last year. Flax seed production in 1938 was more than double that of 1937, which offset the decline of 36 cents in the average farm price, and increased the total value by nearly $500,000.

I have in my hand a table which shows the cost of No. 1 northern wheat at my shipping point over a number of years, going back to 1915. The same table shows the cost of a binder at that point, and the number of bushels required to purchase a binder. To read the table would require some considerable time, as it covers a period from 1915 to 1938, and if hon. members would permit I should like to have it placed on Hansard.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member may place it on Hansard with the unanimous consent of the house, but not otherwise.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. FAIR: Thank you. The table is as follows:

Year	Cost of 8-foot binder	Price of Wheat No. 1 Northern	Bushels required
1915	$175	$ .94	186
1916	177	1.86	95
1917	204	2.02	101
1918	260	2.05	127
1919	270	1.98	136
1920	298	1.80	166
1921	339	1.10	308
1922	287	.91	315
1923	298	.88	339
1924	323	1.50	215
1925	298	1.32	226
1926	298	1.27	235
1927	298	1.27	235
1928	298	1.05	284
1929	298	1.05	284
1930	293	.45	651
1931	293	.41	715
1932	288	.35	823
1933	274	.49	560
1934	274	.62	442
1935	272	.65	418
1936	290	.75	386
1937	314	.81	388
1938	332	.40	830

The table shows that the high average yearly price for No. 1 northern during that period was $2.05 per bushel in 1918, and in 1932 a low price of 35 cents. The high price of a binder in that time was $339 in the year 1921, and the low price was $175 in 1915. In 1916, ninety-five bushels of wheat were required to buy a binder, whereas 830 bushels were required in 1938. During the period 1924 to 1929, the average price of a binder was $302; the average price of No. 1 northern wheat was $1.24, and the average number of bushels required to buy a binder was 246. In the period between 1930 and 1935, the average cost of a binder was $282, the average price of No. 1 northern was 49½ cents, and the average number of bushels required to buy a binder was 601. I think that is enough to show some of the things we are up against. I believe it also shows how difficult it is to regulate prices or acreage or production. This year we may have a crop of twenty or twenty-five bushels to the acre, and next year nothing at all. I believe we have now advanced sufficient argument to convince the house that the farmer is not and has not for some time been receiving his costs of production. Because it is desirable that the farmer should be kept in business, something must be done to guarantee him at least his costs of production, along with a reasonable profit.

The next question is: How shall we deal with this problem? Several suggestions have been made with which I shall not take the time to deal, but I would like to give one or two instances. A sit-down strike was advocated by a meeting of Cooperative Commonwealth Federation farmers at Vegreville. This meeting was addressed by the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Rowe) and Mr. Irvine, a former member of this house. I do not think a sit-down strike will help the situation in any way. What we must do is create more purchasing power and place it in the hands of those who grow our wheat as well as those who are in business across the country.

Another suggestion is that the four great wheat exporting countries of the world should get together. These four countries export eighty-six per cent of the world's total volume of exports, sixteen other countries exporting the remaining fourteen per cent. I think this country should take the lead in getting together with the other exporting countries and doing something about this problem. A suggestion has been made to cut down acreage. That may be all right, and then again it may not be all right. If everyone in the world was getting enough to eat I believe we should have to produce still more, but as many have not the wherewithal to buy, something must be done.

The least this government can do is to guarantee the farmer his costs of production, and ninety-five cents a bushel for No. 1 northern at the local elevator seems to me to be a reasonable basis on which to work. Up to the end of the 1937 crop year the farmers of Canada had been subsidized to the extent of $12,719,901. As this method of subsidizing seems to be sound for other lines of industry, there is no reason why it should not be sound in the case of the farming industry when such disastrous conditions prevail. A direct subsidy has been paid to or provided for the manufacturers of farm implements by way of tariff protection, and we have paid thousands of dollars annually to the steamship companies. Large amounts of cash and millions of acres of land have been turned over to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Large amounts have also been expended on roads to give access to mining areas, and tax removals in different forms have been provided for mining companies.

In the past the farmer has paid a large share of the taxes that have been collected to pay these subsidies, and apparently he has a lot of paying to do yet, judging from the increase in our national debt. It is only fair to point out that a large amount of the taxes the farmer pays is paid indirectly, because the whole structure rests squarely on the shoulders of the primary producer. For a number of years the United States has bonused its farmers to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars, as has France, Australia and the Argentine. At the present time farmers in Germany are being paid $2.25 a bushel for wheat; in Italy they are receiving $2.15 a bushel, and in France, $1.50 to $1.60 a bushel. The quality of the wheat in all cases is far below that of Canadian wheat. I believe the farmers of Canada should receive just as good treatment as the farmers of other countries. We are compelled to compete with them on the world market, and it is impossible to do that because we are forced to buy on a protected market, whereas those from whom we purchase are running their prices higher than we are able to bear.

The other products of the farm should also be considered in this scheme. I have before me a table showing the average price of oats, barley and flax for the past thirty years, and rye for the past twenty-one years, all on a Fort William basis. The figures are as follows:

	High	Low	Average	1938
Oats..	$1.00	.24	.48	.24
Barley..	1.61	.28	.66	.28

The minister has announced a scheme, but I do not think it will help the farmer who is trying to get along. To some extent it is a relief scheme, or perhaps it could be called an insurance plan. I have not been able to give it a name, but when the plan is definitely before us perhaps I may be able to give it its proper name and discuss it at greater length.

The various matters I have brought up at this time have been dealt with in just a cursory way, but I hope to be able to go into them further as time goes on. Hon. members will readily realize that should the price of wheat continue to stay below the cost of production, the result will be more unemployment and more men on relief. Industry and trade all across the country will be slowed up. As to the method of financing, if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has not yet been converted or enlightened, there are several hon. members in this house who can tell him how to go about that in a way that will do more for Canada than our present poor system of financing. The wheat growers of the west are not the only ones that should be benefited. The farmers in all parts of Canada should receive a correspondingly fair price for their agricultural products.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to discuss the problem raised by this motion, although there is a resolution standing on the order paper in my name somewhat similar to the one now under discussion. However, that resolution may never be reached.

At the outset may I say I am not convinced that ninety-five cents a bushel at the local elevator is the price that should be set. That is something that will have to be inquired into very carefully, and I shall have more to say about it a little later.

The resolution which has been presented this afternoon deals with one of the basic conditions of the rehabilitation of western Canada. I should like to say again what I have said before, that the problem of the rehabilitation of agriculture is not directly a western problem. It is a problem which involves the whole Dominion of Canada. Upon the ultimate success of our rehabilitation schemes will depend the economic welfare of the country in which we live.

I do not propose to discuss this afternoon the various newspaper stories which have emanated from this city since the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) made his statement a short time ago. I am going to wait until the bills are presented to the house in order that we may have a clear understanding of what it is intended to do in regard to this particular matter. But there are some points which I think should be placed before this house, because I am convinced that many hon. members are not aware of the general condition of the western farmer and the economic situation with which he is faced. Some think that perhaps the provinces should assume more of the burden of their own rehabilitation, but the Saskatchewan brief presented to the Rowell commission clearly indicates that even the normal expenditures of Saskatchewan cannot be met on the basis of taxation now in effect in that province.

In the proceedings of the conference on markets for western farm products, held at Winnipeg in December under the leadership of Premier Bracken of Manitoba, there are to be found data a study of which one can recommend to members on all sides of this house, particularly those from other than western constituencies. For example, a paper was presented at the conference by Professor Hope, and in the discussion which followed it was quite noticeable that Professor Hope's general statements were not in any respect seriously challenged. I propose, therefore, to place before the house some of the conclusions at which Professor Hope arrived.

He showed first the disastrous decline in the value of farm products in recent years. At page 150 of the report of the conference he says:

> The Dominion Bureau of Statistics estimated that for the period 1926 to 1929 the average annual cash sales of farm products in the three prairie provinces amounted to about $530,640,000. For the three years 1931 to 1933 the annual average amounted to $164,439,000, a reduction of $366,201,000 per year. For these three years alone, 1931 to 1933, the total reduction in cash income amounts to over one billion dollars compared with a similar period of three years before the depression and drought period. Cumulating each annual deficit below the average 1926 to 1929 figure of $530,000,000, the total shrinkage in cash sales up to 1938 amounts to approximately $2,700,000,000. The debt structure of western farmers prior to 1929 was based on the assumption that this total deficit would be in the form of income in the years following 1929. The unfortunate turn of events since 1929, has resulted in some debt reductions, worn out equipment, depleted homes and clothing and in some cases impaired health of the farm population. And the story is not finished.

Thus Professor Hope paints a word picture of western agriculture. He goes on to say that these conditions resulted in the intolerable burden which made dominion aid essential. He says:

The Saskatchewan brief before the Rowell commission on interprovincial relations, after exhaustive analysis estimated the total farm debt of Saskatchewan at December, 1937, to be approximately $482,000,000. In 1938 practically no interest was paid on this debt, only half the taxes were collected, direct relief and seed and fodder have been given on a big scale following the widespread drought of 1937. It is estimated that the total debt increased about $64,000,000 during the past year and now stands at $546,000,000 or about $18 per acre of crop land, or about $25 per acre of seeded crop.

Then Professor Hope, at the conference, proceeded to show that this debt situation, originating not only in crop failures and in depression but in low prices, was only a part of the picture. He goes on to say, on the same page:

But the total farm debt is only a part of the story. Ten years in which a combination of prices and yields have reduced two-thirds of the farming population to a subsistence level, and a steadily mounting debt, have left their mark on the physical equipment of the country. The Saskatchewan brief estimated that it would require at least $200,000,000 to bring the farm buildings, machinery, household furnishings and clothes of the farmers of Saskatchewan up to the moderate standards of 1931. Since this figure was calculated another year of partial depletion has been experienced. Under the circumstances the $200,000,000 which amounts to $1,450 per farm is conservative. Over the drought area itself, comprising two-thirds of the province it would be close to $2,000 per farm.

Then he tells other parts of Canada that on a Fort William price of eighty cents for No. 1 northern these obligations cannot be met and western agriculture cannot prosper. He says:

There is a feeling prevalent among some people who are not entirely conversant with the west, that because of the numerous cancellations of indebtedness, such as taxes, relief and arrears of interest, the debt situation is solved and it only needs average yields with present prices to clear up the whole situation. Such is far from the facts. It is true many concessions by creditors have been made. But in Saskatchewan at least, due to a continuance of unfavourable climatic conditions for the past two years and low prices this year, a situation has been reached where considerably more than half the farmers with average yields and present prices for wheat (80 cents basis Fort William) cannot hope to liquidate their debts and restore the conditions of their farms and homes to the pre-depression level.

I shall not go over all of the ground that Professor Hope covered in relation to the costs of production. This no doubt will be thoroughly discussed when the bills to be presented by the government are brought down, and the question of costs of production can wait until then. But I should like to point out that allowing living costs, not on as high a scale as the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) suggested a few moments ago, but at from $700 to $850 per year for the average farm family, with average yields, Professor Hope says:

Conservatively, it would probably require with average yields a farm price for wheat of average grade—

Not No. 1 northern, mark you, but average grade:

—of about ninety cents, with coarse grains in proportion, to maintain a reasonable level of living and service the present debt on western farms. It would require somewhat more than this to restore the farming community to the condition of 1931.

And this ninety-cent farm price estimated by Professor Hope for the average grade is for wheat from average land. The minister pointed out that there are lands that can produce a bushel of wheat for considerably less than ninety cents, but Professor Hope states that, taking the lowest cost of production he quotes for a bushel of wheat in the Regina and Rosetown areas, not one per cent of Saskatchewan farmers have the requisite machinery and the proper type of land to produce wheat at that relatively low cost.

Mr. BOTHWELL: May I ask my hon. friend how he computes that ninety cents?

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not want to go into that detail this afternoon, but I would refer the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) to page 151 of the proceedings of the conference on markets for western farm products, where Professor Hope gives the data upon which he bases his calculation of ninety cents. Now ninety cents, let us remember, is a farm price, and if you add eighteen or twenty cents to the price of the wheat you find that well over a dollar a bushel is required at Fort William to give this farm price of ninety or ninety-five cents. This, surely, explains why the west is in the condition in which we find it to-day.

May I say that in regard to this particular matter there is general agreement among the people of western Canada. L. W. Brockington, K.C., well known to members of this house as the chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, was for some time counsel for the Northwest Grain Dealers' Association, connected with the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, an organization for which many of our western farmers have no love, and which many of us would like to see eliminated. But in a discussion at the conference, Mr. Brockington questioned Professor Hope. I quote from the proceedings:

I would like to ask Professor Hope, if I might, two questions. This morning, in quoting figures as to the minimum price of wheat necessary to maintain certain amenities in Saskatchewan, you were, I think, referring to the price on the farm and not the price at Fort William. The following essential fact, however distasteful it may be to some people in eastern Canada, should be stated directly. Am I correct in drawing from your remarks this morning this conclusion, that in so far as Saskatchewan is concerned the price of 80 cents a bushel for wheat at Fort William is quite inadequate to enable the Saskatchewan farmer to pay anything but a small portion of his existing debt, and certainly to allow him to maintain decent standards of living. Would you say that was a correct conclusion?

Professor Hope: The present price at Fort William is not enabling the farmer to pay any debt in Saskatchewan except in a few cases in the north.

Mr. Brockington: And if such a price were maintained over a period of years it wouldn't enable him to maintain a reasonable standard of living?

Professor Hope: No debt could be paid.

Mr. Brockington: How about the standard of living?

Professor Hope: Probably only just fair.

Mr. Brockington: Can you say what the conditions are in Manitoba and Alberta?

Professor Hope: That is a little more difficult, because we haven't actually got any definite debt figures on Manitoba and Alberta. It would be more or less of a guess, I admit that, but I would make a guess that 80 cents at present—60 cents on the farm—would enable the farmer in the provinces to meet very little of their interest charges.

Mr. Brockington: In Alberta?

Professor Hope: In Alberta and Manitoba, both situations, as I take it, are somewhat similar. Both have had fairly close to average yields in the last eight years.

Mr. Brockington: In view of that may I say this; If the farmer of western Canada is not to be allowed to subside into a condition of living and of livelihood less comfortable, less secure, less worthy of him and not to maintain the position that as a good and useful citizen he ought to occupy, the wheat price should be more than 80 cents.

Professor Hope: That is right.

The price discussed by Mr. Brockington and Professor Hope was a farm price and not a Fort William price. It is easy to understand also why the question of providing seed has arisen again in some areas of Saskatchewan; farmers whose crops were small gave way to pressure on the part of their creditors, or failed perhaps to understand and appreciate the importance of keeping seed. One might add that it is essential that in this coming spring the farmer seeding his land shall put in good seed.

Let me also say once again that the policies of successive federal governments, which have compelled our farmers to take low prices for their produce and to pay high prices for the things they have to buy, make this matter also a federal responsibility, for obviously they have no reserves.

The wheat price, that is the farm price, then, should be more than eighty cents a bushel. Under the conditions which prevail, the western grower must receive assistance from some source. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the provinces are unable to provide it, and we shall have to undertake it as a dominion-wide responsibility.

May I refer again to the question of seed. I believe that if we are to keep down the amount which will be required from the federal treasury to, what is sometimes called, "bonus"—though I do not think that is the word, I would say, "compensate"—the western grower, wheat of high quality will have to be grown on our western plains. It is not quantity that will bring prosperity to western Canada. In a world where there is keen competition for a relatively restricted market, the quality of our wheat will count very heavily. I suggest that in any policy presented to this house by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), however the compensation be worked out, something should be done to improve the general quality of our grain. That is to say, we should give definite encouragement to farmers who are endeavouring to produce the best grades of grain which will give Canada's wheat a standing in the world market. Unless we grow wheat of good quality—and that is one of the reasons why good rustless seed grain is so essential at the present time—and can market it at a fair price not only the western farmer suffers but everybody suffers. Eastern industry suffers, of course, but much more directly do the merchants, the doctors and the teachers suffer in the affected areas; and that these groups are suffering I scarcely need tell this house.

I remember that the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) thought the teachers were not suffering to the extent that some of the reports indicated. Just a few days after he had made that statement I received a clipping from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of January 18, from a place called Peesane, in his constituency, in which the following appears:

> Peesane school board has succeeded in obtaining a food voucher for the amount of seven dollars for the use of the teacher in Peesane school. This is the first salary that has been paid the teacher since school commenced last August.

So we see that all suffer if the harvest fails, and we cannot have harvest unless we have seed time, with fairly good seed. This, then, may I add, becomes also a matter of dominion-wide importance.

May I say to our eastern friends that a prosperous west would do much to solve not only the problems of unemployment and industry, but also the problems of the dairy farmer and the fruit grower both in the east and along the Pacific coast. We all know that when there was money in western Canada our people were able to buy eastern products, and the entire country benefited. I should like to emphasize once more that while other branches of industry, like mining, have in the last few years to some extent compensated our general national economy for the loss in the returns from western Canada, yet the day will surely come again when we shall be made to realize from bitter experience that agriculture, and not mining or something dependent perhaps on war industries, is the great basic industry of Canada. So this is a national problem of wide implications.

I was glad to hear the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair), who preceded me, make the point that wheat is not the only farm product to be considered. The time is rapidly approaching, in my opinion has already come, when this country will have to adopt minimum prices for various other farm products. At the moment we are discussing grain, so I say that with coarse grains almost worthless in many areas in western Canada, the time has come when we must consider the whole problem of grain and the advisability of adopting fixed minimum prices for coarse grains as well as for wheat. I have on my desk at the moment a telegram which I received yesterday from the directors of the Rosetown cooperative association. The Rosetown district is almost exclusively wheat growing. They urged that if an acreage bonus is to replace a fixed minimum price for wheat, the bonus should apply on all cereal crops, regardless of the size of the farm. But the point I am making is that we must realize that other grains must receive some protection in the price level as well as wheat.

To my mind the price level should be considered entirely apart from the problem of drought and of sub-marginal lands. These latter problems ought to be dealt with by crop insurance and suitable forms of rehabilitation. In the general discussion which is going on in the country at the present time these problems are being confused, but they are distinct and separate. Perhaps the government's bills will help to clarify that situation. I hope that we shall not get them confused here or in the bills which are to be presented, because to my mind they are distinct problems requiring separate treatment. The time has come when the problem of sub-marginal land will have to be tackled by the authorities, the problem of crop insurance carefully considered, and the matter of the fixed price considered apart from either of these problems. I do not know to what extent the federal department has inquired into the crop insurance system that has been adopted in the United States, but I understand that Premier Bracken of Manitoba has again given a good lead by sending down a group of legislators to Washington to look into the "ever normal granary" experiments of the United States Secretary of Agriculture.

A low fixed price and an acreage bonus will in my opinion be unsatisfactory. It would tend to keep sub-marginal land in cultivation, and not make for careful cultivation or the maintenance of a high quality product. Hence I say these problems should be considered separately. If, as I said a little earlier, more and more the success of our agriculture is to depend on quality rather than quantity of the product that we place in the world's markets, in any scheme recognition should be given to the production of a high quality product. Also the adoption of any set minimum price involves orderly marketing. In my view orderly marketing cannot be undertaken in a market half speculative and half controlled. In other words, we must have either one thing or the other, the open market or orderly marketing through a government board. We have tried the speculative market for years and found it unsatisfactory; to-day other countries in the world are setting prices and marketing through government boards, and I believe the time has come when a board or boards representative of producer interests should have the responsibility of marketing all our farm produce.

If there are still those who think the marketing of our products at low prices will win back the lost markets, I do not believe that opinion can be upheld to-day. A flow of cheap wheat will not wash down hostile tariff walls and remove the embargoes of the European dictators. We must face the grim reality, regrettable though it be, that self-sufficiencies and nationalisms across the sea have entirely altered the picture as far as marketing our wheat is concerned. Hence it seems to me that instead of looking overseas for a solution, waiting for trade to improve and all that, the problem is right here on our own door step and requires not only our best efforts but the very best brains we can find in the country to do the thing that has to be done. I believe we are more and more being forced to the conclusion that this involves planning of our agricultural production, and the adoption of minimum prices, crop insurance and a comprehensive national marketing scheme.

I noticed that the hon. member for Battle River spoke of a Cooperative Commonwealth Federation meeting urging a sit-down strike. Of course strange resolutions are often presented at local meetings and carried, but that certainly does not mean that the organization with which I am connected believes in that method of dealing with this problem. In fact we have long been on record. Our Regina manifesto of 1933, and the platform subsequently published, in regard to farming calls for:

(f) The setting-up of marketing boards for primary products under growers' control.

(g) A guaranteed minimum price, based upon the average cost of production over an average period of years, to reduce the disparity between the prices of agricultural and industrial products, and to provide the farmer with an adequate standard of living.

In an explanation regarding that issue published by our national office we find these words:

The proposals submitted in this plank are clear, practical and urgently needed. A guaranteed and adequate minimum price must be adopted by the government for farm products. This, together with the abolition of monopolies which exploit the farmer, the adjustment and reduction of accumulated debts, suitable schemes of crop insurance and the development of cooperative organizations and marketing boards enabling the organized farmer to mind his own business, are fundamental requirements of a rehabilitated agricultural industry. Moreover, the problem is national in its scope and effect and must, therefore, find its solution on national and not on provincial lines.

So this afternoon I have endeavoured to place before the house our point of view. I have also placed before the house a few excerpts from a document which I wish every hon. member would read, the proceedings of the conference on markets for western farm products which was arranged by the government of Manitoba and held in Winnipeg from December 13 to December 15, 1938.

It seems to me that if this parliament is going to grapple with this problem, the members of this house must have the picture clearly in their minds. I know there are still some people who think the west, like a poor relation, is dependent upon the east. That is not true. After all, western Canada has, in bygone years, produced vast quantities of new wealth, upon which the great buildings and great industries of eastern Canada were largely founded. So, Mr. Speaker, I have pleasure in supporting the resolution, although I have reservations with regard to the suggested price, which I do not think may be high enough.

Mr. H. A. McKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): I did not intend to speak on this resolution, Mr. Speaker, and I shall be very brief in my remarks. When I came into the house this afternoon and read this resolution, I thought it was not too bad, that it would take in all Canada; but when I saw that it referred to No. 1 northern, I knew at once it had to do only with the three western provinces. Canada is an agricultural country, and to my mind the problems of the farmers are the most important problems before the people to-day, because at least forty per cent of the people live in rural districts and derive their livelihood from some branch or another of agriculture. I believe that a prosperous agriculture means a prosperous Canada, and further I believe that we shall never be economically sound in this dominion until the producers of primary products receive much better remuneration than they do to-day.

I have every sympathy for the western farmer; I should like to see him get ninety-five cents or a dollar or even more a bushel for his wheat, but the setting of a minimum price for wheat has proven rather dangerous this year. I assume that step was taken under the wheat board act which, if I remember correctly, was passed in July, 1935, enabling the government to set a minimum price for wheat in the western provinces. Since that time I believe the government have taken some action each year in regard to the price of wheat.

I wonder how the government arrived at the minimum price of 80 cents a bushel for No. 1 northern wheat, basis Fort William, this year. On looking up the market quotations I find that on August 4, when the minimum price was fixed at 80 cents, the Winnipeg market closed at 86⅞ cents for cash wheat and 76⅞ cents for October futures. For several weeks futures prices on world markets had been fluctuating moderately, based approximately on the August 4 level, sometimes rising a few cents above it. For example, at Winnipeg on June 1, October futures sold at 76⅜ cents, and on August 4, at 76⅞ cents. In the meantime they had fluctuated between a low of 73¾ cents and a high of 89⅝ cents. On the same dates October futures in Liverpool had been at 82 cents and 83½ cents, and in the interval ranged between 82 cents and 91 cents. September futures in Chicago, on the same dates, sold at 69⅞ cents and 68⅞ cents, ranging between 67⅛ cents and 83¼ cents. So probably the government should not be blamed too much for setting the figure at 80 cents, but how did it work out? Well, as we all know, it has worked out rather badly and is expected to cost the taxpayers of Canada approximately $48,000,000.

But, Mr. Speaker, that $48,000,000 went to the people who had good crops; for last year the wheat crop of the west has been estimated at from 250,000,000 to 300,000,000 bushels, and, as I have said, the benefit of that legislation went to the people who had the crops. It seems to work on the basis of the old parable concerning the talents: To the man who had ten talents were given ten more; to the man who had five talents were given five more, but from the man who had one talent was taken away even that which he had. So the basis was this: To him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath. That certainly did not help the men on relief at that time; they are still on relief. The man who did not have a crop did not share in that $48,000,000, which went to reimburse western farmers for their bountiful crop. That seems hardly fair to the remainder of the farmers of Canada.

Ontario farmers produce approximately 20,000,000 bushels of wheat a year, and last year they had to sell their wheat at approximately fifty cents a bushel. But they did not get fifty cents, because they had to give up part of that price in order to reimburse the western farmer who had a good crop and who had received more for his wheat than the Ontario farmer was paid.

The western farmers say, "Oh, but have we not paid tribute to Ontario industrialists for many years?" Well, the Ontario farmer has paid the very same tribute, and it must be remembered that the farmers of Ontario outnumber the farmers of any single province of the west. According to the bureau of statistics there are 170,660 farmers in Ontario, 115,000 farmers in Saskatchewan and 85,000 farmers in Alberta. The Ontario farmers live under the same tariff regulations and restrictions that affect the western farmers, and the only possible difference between them is in connection with the freight haul.

I must say that I oppose this resolution asking for a set price of ninety-five cents per bushel. I believe that the wheat board act should be amended or should be removed from the statute books altogether, and that any such legislation should deal with the whole of Canada. Ontario farmers are not at all prosperous. Perhaps we have not as great a wheat problem; but farmers engaged in dairying, poultry raising and other branches of agriculture are not receiving the cost of production for the produce they have to sell.

[Mr. H. A. McKenzie.]

Again I say I have every sympathy for the western farmers, but this minimum price certainly works out very badly. I am sorry to have to take this stand; but I am not thinking so much about the western farmer, the eastern farmer, the industrialist or any other individual. I am at least trying to think of the people of Canada as a whole and what is in their best interests. This resolution, if adopted, would not give the same advantages to all the farmers of this country, so I must oppose it.

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain): I had not thought of speaking on this motion, Mr. Speaker, but I believe it is my duty to express my opposition to it. The motion reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, this parliament should immediately take such steps as are necessary to ensure the farmers of Canada a fixed price of ninety-five cents per bushel for number one northern wheat at their local elevator.

In the first place I think the motion is useless, in view of the recent declaration by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that there would be no more fixed prices for wheat. In the second place, if we are to help the western farmers I think there are other tillers of the soil who are in as great difficulty as the farmers of the west. I have particular reference to the dairy farmers of eastern Canada. If the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston), who moved this resolution, is sincerely interested in agriculture, as I believe he is, I think he should have suggested a plan under which all the farmers of Canada would obtain some advantage.

I suggest that the dairy farmers of Canada are entitled to particular help at the present time. During the past few years the federal government has guaranteed a certain price for western wheat. There were good reasons for making such regulations. Western farmers have to face a situation which is anything but satisfactory. They are exposed to soil drifting in the early spring. On some occasions they have to seed their land over again, if they can afford to buy the seed for the second operation. In June and July they are exposed to excessively hot winds which burn the growing wheat grass. They are exposed to hail storms which destroy whatever crop they may happen to have. They are exposed to the dangers of frost and rust which every year do substantial damage in some wheat fields. Finally, when the crop is harvested they cannot always sell it. Indeed, the west is far from being an ideal location for farming.

I am familiar with conditions in the west. I have hundreds of acres of land in Saskatchewan which, since 1929, have brought me no income. I feel, however, that is my difficulty, and not one which the ratepayers of the whole country should be asked to carry. If I lose money in the west, and if my properties do not pay I do not believe I am justified in asking compensation from anybody else. I should like other farmers in the west to take the same attitude as I take.

There are farmers in Ontario and Quebec, and some in my constituency particularly, who at one time or another have had to sell their butter and cheese at prices which have allowed them no profit whatever. There are legions of farmers in those two provinces who can scarcely make ends meet, simply because they do not obtain reasonable prices for their products. Dairy farmers need assistance, and need it badly. The commodities they must buy are sold at high prices. Farm machinery, despite recent reductions, is being sold at exorbitant prices. In fact, all the necessities of life on the farm must be purchased at prices which necessitate a much higher income. Yet, in spite of their difficulties, the eastern farmers have never had any bonus or special compensation for their losses. They have never been guaranteed any set price. I have submitted on other occasions, and I again say, that particularly the eastern dairy farmers should have assistance. Is it not as expedient to guarantee the eastern farmers a certain price as it is to give that guarantee to others?

I would ask the hon. member for Bow River to pay a visit to some of the eastern farmers. I do not suggest that he should see the farmers who are living in the vicinity of the big cities; let him visit those who live in the remote sections of Ontario and Quebec. If he were to do so, he would find out that the plight of our farmers in the east is not such as will enable them to help others very much longer.

I know the government is unable to pay the deficit of every producer; I know it is impossible to assure success to all, but I repeat that if we are to help one class of farmers we should help the whole class—not a class within a class.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is the hon. member aware that the suggested guaranteed price is for all the farmers of Canada? If he will read the resolution he will find that out.

Mr. BRUNELLE: That may be. Of course the resolution refers to "No. 1 northern." I believe in the same treatment of all and special privileges to none.

I have faith in the Minister of Agriculture, and I am sure he will find a way to help the farming industry of the whole of Canada. I have confidence in him because I am sure he is, if not the greatest, one of the greatest ministers of agriculture we have ever had. To avoid any possibility of contradiction, I should say he is the ablest of the ministers of agriculture the country has had.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is a good speech.

Mr. BRUNELLE: I am opposed to the motion asking for a guarantee of ninety-five cents per bushel for No. 1 northern wheat. I am opposed to any guarantee of prices which would not include every Canadian farmer who, like a great many of our eastern farmers, is in need at the present time. If this motion comes to a vote I shall vote against it, despite the fact that if it were passed it might prove beneficial and profitable to me, on account of my holdings in the west. I am convinced, however, that it is unfair, and I shall live up to my convictions.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in support of the principle of the resolution now before the house. What I shall have to say will be both brief and general in nature, because the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has already outlined a wheat policy, the details of which are not yet before the house. I believe it would be unwise in a debate on the resolution to enter into a discussion of those details, and for that reason I shall confine myself to the principle of a guaranteed price for agricultural products.

I should like to say, however, that on the 16th of this month I listened with keen interest to the speech of the Minister of Agriculture in which, very vaguely and indefinitely, he outlined a wheat policy. Very few of us know any of its details, unless we have been following closely the western papers. From day to day I have been deeply interested in noticing articles by Chester Bloom, in which a number of proposals are set out. For instance, I notice Thursday's paper contained the statement, "Production cost of wheat may be set at sixty-three cents", and Saturday's has the following in red ink:

Bigger bonus on smaller yields. Three separate bills to cover Ottawa's new grain marketing policy for dominion.

I do not know whether or not it is becoming a habit with the government, but members of parliament have either to go to banquets or to read the press of two or three hundred miles away to find out what impending legislation is going to be. We shall, however, be glad to see it when it does comes down, and to learn something about the details at that time.

First of all, may I say a word or two respecting the observations of the two hon. members who have preceded me. Naturally they have expressed the point of view of men representing eastern agriculturists. I have a great deal of sympathy with their point of view. I have spent a good many weekends in the rural districts of Ontario and have seen conditions such as have been outlined by the previous speaker. This last weekend I found I had even more admiration for the Ontario farmer. I went out to a country point, got snow-bound and had to stay there overnight. If the Ontario farmer is able to travel over roads similar to the one I came over this morning, he deserves all my admiration.

I should like to say to the hon. gentlemen that we are not asking that the eastern farmer should do something for the western farmer. What we are trying to do is to point out that the same people who are exploiting the western farmer are also exploiting the eastern farmer, and that the same economy which makes it almost impossible for the western farmer to maintain a decent standard of living is having exactly the same effect upon the eastern farmer. When we ask for a fixed guaranteed price for our agriculturists, we are not asking that for western Canada alone, we are asking it for all farmers generally. Their problems are similar even though their products may be different.

The statement was made by one of the previous speakers that the fixed price for wheat was going to cost in the neighbourhood of $48,000,000. That may be debatable; but leaving it at that, I should like to point out that according to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) we are operating to-day under a fiscal system which takes $86,000,000 from the western farmer in terms of the goods he has to buy, and gives him back only $30,000,000, which leaves a deficit of $56,000,000. As has been pointed out again and again, the wheat producer is perhaps the only agriculturist who gets practically no benefit from the system of protective tariffs which we have in Canada. The hon. member who preceded me said that apart from the long freight haul, the problem of the eastern and the western farmer was the same. That is not so. While the eastern farmer buys his goods in a protected market, he is able to sell in a protected market most of the commodities he produces. The western farmer, particularly the wheat producer, sells almost exclusively on a world competitive market, while he buys in a protected market which raises the cost of the commodities he has to purchase.

[Mr. T. C. Douglas.]

I do not want to raise the issue of the east versus the west. I think the plight of the farmers across Canada is serious. When I hear a man like the premier of Ontario saying at a banquet in Toronto last fall that the east is like an old milch cow which the west had been milking for years, all I can say is that if the western farmers have been milking that cow for some years, they have been feeding it for all the years. They have been feeding it in terms of tariff protection, high prices for machinery and the necessities of life, high freight rates, increased cost of implements of production and increased interest rates on the money they have been compelled to borrow.

It is not my intention at this time to deal with this subject at any length, but I should like to touch on one or two phases of the principle of this resolution. First, I should like to deal with the justification for fixing a guaranteed price. I should like to draw to the attention of the house the fact that the farmers are operating with increasing costs and decreasing incomes. Over a period of years, while the prices they have received for their products have been dropping, the cost of producing those commodities has not dropped in proportion. I should like to refer to the proceedings of the conference on markets for western farm products, called to sit in Winnipeg by Premier Bracken. I refer to page 17, which contains a statement by Major Strange, a wheat economist, who is, I believe, connected with the Searle Grain Company. I quote a short paragraph as follows:

> However, the cost of production for farmers of western Canada to-day is about 37 per cent more than it was before the war. The greater part of that is owing to the tariffs of Canada, and the other smaller portion of it is due to the higher hourly rates of wages of labour. But the greater portion is from the tariffs.

I direct the attention of the house to that statement.

An hon. MEMBER: You are supporting the treaty?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): We have stated already we are supporting the treaty. Here we have a wheat economist of some reputation saying that, in terms of what he has to pay for the commodities he needs, it costs the farmers 37 per cent more to-day to produce a bushel of wheat than it cost him to produce it before the war. I should like to refer to a statement made by Professor Hope, which appears at page 149 of the same proceedings. Dealing with fixed costs, interest charges and so on, he said:

> It is because of the high fixed charges in agriculture that farmers, perhaps more than any other group, are particularly concerned with prolonged periods of low prices. In a period of low prices the farmer cannot reduce his labour costs by firing his family. It is true he can reduce some of his living costs, but there is a definite limit even to that. His life insurance is fixed and most of his cash costs of living are the result of retail prices set by powerful groups who limit production in order to maintain prices. His buildings and machinery replacements can be postponed, but eventually they have to be met if he is to stay in production. The interest and principal of all his debts become due and payable. Before very long, in spite of all the economies possible, even to the extent of depriving his family of the bare necessities of a subsistence living, and the little so-called luxuries that make life worthwhile, the farmer is bankrupt and realizes that after twenty years of labour he has nothing he can really call his own. It does not help matters to say that the farmers should not go into debt and thereby decrease their fixed charges. As pointed out previously this is a normal and necessary thing in the transfer of ownership. It is true that some farmers have contracted too much debt even for normal times, but surely the creditors have had as much to say in this matter as the debtors. It takes two people in a contract for one to go into debt.

I do not think that needs any elaboration. I have some statistics here, but I shall not quote them because the house has perhaps had all the statistics it can digest in one afternoon. An examination of the indices shows that while the indices of the costs of the things the farmer buys have risen and have remained fairly stable, the indices of the costs of the commodities he has to sell have dropped steadily, in some instances disastrously. This was particularly true last fall. The people in the west have been praying for a good crop. They had a fairly good crop last year, the 1938 crop being practically double the 1937 one. In spite of that, however, the cash income was not much larger, and the net income was actually less. This shows, of course, that producing more goods is no answer unless the results of producing those goods will give you a bigger income and a better standard of living. We must enable the farmer to reduce his costs, or we must make it possible for him to bring his prices into relationship with his costs.

Can we help the farmer to reduce his costs? I think all of us who have lived in the west have believed for years that the farmer's costs could be reduced mainly by lowering the tariff on the necessities of life and the implements of production. I have no hesitation in saying that for many years I held vainly to that hope. The Liberal party had, and still has, its strength in western Canada largely because the people continue to believe that if you lower the tariff on the necessities of life and the implements of production you will enable the farmer to produce his commodities for less, and consequently to compete on the markets of the world.

I used to believe that; but at last, disillusioned, I have had to surrender my faith in any such reduction. It is easy to see why a reduction in the tariff has not been followed by a drop in the farmer's cost of production. Why? First of all, of course, because even in the Liberal party there are sections that are going to see to it that special privileges are still protected and preserved, and that certain tariffs do not drop too low. The second reason is that reductions in the tariff can always be offset by changing valuations for duty purposes and other regulations that nullify the effect of lowering the tariff. But the main reason why reductions in the tariff have not been followed by a reduction in the cost of production is the fact that since the great war we have moved from a competitive capitalism into a monopolistic capitalism, in which the elements of competition are no longer present to bring down prices when the tariff is removed. The best illustration of that has come right under our very noses in this parliament in the past four years.

When the present government came into power there was a twenty-five per cent duty on farm machinery. Hon. gentlemen opposite were elected on their promises to lower the cost of farm machinery, and I say to their credit that one of the first things they did was to reduce that tariff from twenty-five per cent to 12½ per cent, and in the next budget from 12½ to 7½ per cent, so that the tariff on farm machinery to-day is only about thirty per cent of what it was in 1935. Has that tariff reduction been followed by a reduction in prices? It has been followed by three increases in price. Why? Because the element of competition has been removed. In the agriculture committee that was set up to study farm implement prices and did so very thoroughly, it was pointed out that one company controlled sixty per cent of the farm implement industry. Not only had it a monopoly in this country, but international capital controlled its production on both sides of the international boundary. It was also pointed out that the various implement companies had competition with respect to service but not with respect to price, and so when the tariff was reduced prices did not go down, but, on the contrary, went up. The law of supply and demand was no longer effective because even during the depression the manufacturers restricted production and kept prices of agricultural implements up; in fact, actually raised them.

I draw attention to these facts, Mr. Speaker, because I think it is necessary that those of us who have pinned our faith on a reduction in tariffs as a means whereby the farmer could produce for less should realize that we have been pinning our faith on a waning hope. We are living in a day of monopolistic capitalism, with combines controlling the production of farm machinery, oil, gasoline, radios, and with two great packing firms controlling most of the meat packing industry of Canada.

I have some figures here that were collected by a group interested in research, the league for social reconstruction, in the city of Winnipeg. They are figures of comparative prices in Canada and the United States, at Hallock, Minnesota, and Morris, Manitoba, the prices being taken in July, 1937. I have checked these prices with two other points, one in Saskatchewan and one in North Dakota, where I found the spread was similar, and in some items even wider. Here is the comparison of prices in Canada and the United States, taken at Hallock, Minnesota, and Morris, Manitoba:

	United States	Canada
International truck, ¾-ton, standard equipment	$ 735 00	$ 952 00
Ford automobile, 2-door standard	685 00	871 00
4·75-19 Goodyear tires and tubes	11 75	16 80
Standard Red Crown gas, delivered large lots, tax included	23 60	27 80
Distillate tractor fuel	13 60	14 30
De Laval cream separators, 750-lb. cap	121 50	124 75
Gas engines, I.H.C.	70 00	91 00
12-foot combine harvesters with engines	1,700 00	1,839 00
Disc harrow	140 00	170 00
Sugar, 100 pounds	5 50	6 65
Coffee, per pound	28	45
Oranges	39	45
Overalls	1 69	1 95
Four-buckle overshoes	1 98	3 29
Turkish bath towels, 20 by 40	25	35
Unbleached sheeting, 36 inches wide, per yard	49	65
No. 2 I.H.C. cream separator	90 90	102 50

I could give prices on many other articles, but I have quoted enough to illustrate my point. Here you have two towns less than forty miles apart. Here are the producers, conscious of the fact that the goods which they buy and which enter into their cost of production are costing them more in Canada than they could buy them for across the line. I went into the little town of Minton in my constituency and found that a man had gone across the line and bought a pair of overalls in Plentywood, Montana, the big supersix overall, for ninety-eight cents, whereas the price in a Canadian town less than thirty miles away was $2.20.

It is not going to be possible very much longer to keep on telling the farmer that if you reduce the tariff you are going to cut down his cost of production and enable him to compete in the markets of the world. He is now coming to see that somehow or another the octopus controlling the economic and financial system of Canada is able to fix more or less the prices of the commodities the farmer has to buy and leave him in the position of taking almost anything he can get for what he has to sell. We must face the fact that we have moved into a state of monopoly. Take the things we buy every day. Twenty years ago I remember often buying a package of Wrigley's chewing gum. It cost me then exactly what it costs to-day, five cents, while in the meantime the price of wheat may have gone up from thirty cents to over $2 a bushel and fluctuated in between, but the price of chewing gum has remained the same. Why? Because the manufacturer is able to fix the price. The same is true of automobiles, radios and all the other commodities a farmer has to buy, particularly those he must buy in order to produce his goods.

Mr. MARTIN: Is the hon. member opposed to a tariff on automobiles?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am opposed to a tariff that makes it necessary for a man to pay more for what he has to buy unless the government is prepared to give him some compensation for the extra price he is now compelled to pay. I object to the farmer having to buy in a protected market and sell in an unprotected market. If he is to be asked to sell in an unprotected market, he should be allowed to buy in an unprotected market. But the fact is that he is compelled to buy in a protected market, to protect certain eastern interests. I have no objection to setting up an economy that tends to protect industry in eastern Canada; but I say that, in compensation for the benefits received, eastern industry ought to be prepared to see that those whose costs are thereby increased will receive a square deal by means of compensating adjustments.

I want to point out in conclusion that since we cannot—and I believe it is evident that we cannot—under our existing fiscal system reduce, at least to any appreciable extent, the cost of agricultural production, we are bound to do for the farmer what we are doing for other industries, namely, guarantee him a cost of production which will be commensurate with a decent standard of living. I have in my hand the bulletin issued by the Searle Grain Company on Thursday, February 16. The author is discussing the very objections to this plan which have been mentioned by some hon. members opposite. He says this:

A dispatch from Ottawa was published also on February 13th to the effect that there seemed to be in Eastern Canada a realization that public finances of the dominion could not stand an annual drain of the present wheat price guarantee of eighty cents, and that the present policy would lead to serious increase in wheat acreage.

The Bracken conference of course must have taken objections of this kind into consideration. We, however, for our own part would like to suggest that these do not appear to be very valid. It has been often shown that eighty cents for No. 1 northern Fort William is still well below the cost of production of wheat by the great bulk of the farmers, and as such, certainly is no inducement for producers to increase their wheat acreage.

May I make just one other citation in support of what I have said? Referring again to Professor Hope—who, I think, with Professor Britnell, is one of the best agricultural economists in western Canada, and one of whose work the people of Saskatchewan are proud—I find the professor has this to say:

On the basis of the facts presented, if all the farmers of western Canada were entirely free of debt, or if they did not pay their debts, it would seem that the present farm prices for grain would probably barely maintain a reasonable level of living. It certainly would not maintain a reasonable level of living and enable them to build up their buildings, machinery, homes and personal effects up to the level prior to 1931.

Conservatively it would probably require with average yields a farm price for wheat of average grade of about ninety cents, with coarse grains in proportion to maintain a reasonable level of living and service the present debt on western farms. It would require somewhat more than this to restore the farming community to the condition of 1931.

So I submit to this house that, while the problem of all farmers demands the attention of this parliament—and like my deskmate, I agree that we ought to study seriously the possibility of fixed guaranteed prices for all agricultural producers—the wheat producers of Canada, whether west or east, have a special claim upon our attention because, while their costs of production are held more or less stable by virtue of the economy under which we live, they have continued for the past seven or eight years to sell their products on the markets of the world at a figure that has not given them a decent standard of living for themselves or enabled them to meet their obligations, and consequently has worked a hardship upon the business people with whom they are associated.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): In rising to support the resolution in favour of ninety-five cent wheat for the farmers of Canada, it is my particular task to show where the money is to come from. I believe that the words of the hon. members who spoke first and second on the resolution show that there is developing rapidly in Canada an agricultural problem of major importance. This government has already signified that it realizes, first, that the problem exists; and, second, that it is a major problem. What is disturbing people all over the dominion is the question what we are to do to get the money to pay these fixed prices on wheat, meat, wool and every other kind of commodity as similar claims come along. And these other claims will certainly come along. For us to suggest that the western farmers should get a just price for wheat, and to imply that eastern farmers are not to get similar consideration, would be an absurdity unworthy of the members of this house. I hasten to say that there is no such implication in what I have to say.

I am in favour of giving a just price for every primary product. At the same time I believe that this little group which I have the honour to lead is the only group up to the present time which has suggested a practicable scheme whereby the money for this purpose can be raised, without taxation.

Mr. MacNICOL: This is going to be good.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I know there is in the minds of many hon. members, notwithstanding the earnest efforts we have put forth during the three years we have been here, a certain scepticism concerning our whole set of suggestions. I do not blame hon.

members for this, but I hasten to tell them that they are profoundly mistaken, and the day will come when they will realize it, and their children and grandchildren will be stricken with amazement that their parents could not see this. That time is coming as sure as we are here in this house. We may recall, for example, that only seventy-five years ago it was impossible, I am told, to sell a furnace to the average citizen of Boston; for he said, "What, go to bed and leave a fire burning in my basement?" Absurd as that sounds to us, just as absurd will seem the attitude which a good many people are taking towards monetary reform.

I point out that the first resolution which this group moved was one which rather mystified a good many people. It called upon the dominion government to proceed at once to create purchasing power, and to use that purchasing power in ameliorating economic conditions in Canada. The government, or members of the Liberal party, have been trying ever since to get us to give details. We have the details. I have offered on several occasions, if hon. members would come to my office, to go into as great detail as they desire. But we are in this awkward position: Let hon. members imagine that nothing was known about operations for peritonitis; that we did not know any means of cleansing a wound or disinfecting a knife or stopping the flow of blood or putting the patient to sleep or any one of the scores of techniques necessary for a successful operation for peritonitis. Then suppose we suggested that the only way to cure someone was to operate on him, and when we were asked what we would do, we said, "Take a knife and cut him open." Imagine what people would have thought of that one hundred and fifty years ago, and all the discussion that would be aroused! It would seem so astounding that most people would oppose it at once. We are in just the same difficult position. But this year we intend to be much more specific in regard to the possible working out of a monetary reform system.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think the hon. member is wandering from the subject. What we are dealing with is the following proposed resolution:

> That, in the opinion of this house, this parliament should immediately take such steps as are necessary to insure the farmers of Canada a fixed price of ninety-five cents per bushel for No. 1 northern wheat at their local elevator.

The hon. member should confine himself to the resolution.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have said that the particular aspect of the subject which I wish to discuss is where the money is to come from to pay this fixed price. Is that not in order?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it is too far from the subject.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I trust my next remarks will be nearer the subject, Mr. Speaker. If it is the desire of the house that I should give a lot of statistics I can give them, just like other hon. members. I can show that farmers in western Canada are in an absolutely impossible position, if that is of more value than showing how they can be got out of that position. But surely it is of far greater value to hon. members that I tell them how the farmers of Canada can be got out of that position. Would that be in order?

Mr. SPEAKER: There will be many other opportunities for the hon. member to discuss the subject of monetary reform, but I think he should not do so on this motion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then it is not in order for me to discuss how we can get the money to pay this fixed price?

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think so.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If my hon. friend is in order in discussing monetary reform on this motion, because he says the money will have to be found somewhere, he could discuss it on every matter that comes before the house. I believe he should deal with that subject in a discussion by itself, and confine himself now to the question of a fixed price for wheat.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, it never once entered my mind that answering the everlasting and incessant question that is raised in connection with any proposal whatsoever, where is the money coming from? would not be relevant to this question. I would suppose that in the minds of hon. members, as it certainly is in the mind of every person in Canada with whom I have talked about this subject, the all important question is, "Where are you going to get the money? The idea is fine, it is good, it is right, they ought to have it," they say, "but where are you going to get the money? If you can tell us where you are going to get it, surely they should get $1.50 a bushel." That is the attitude they take. For us to come here and advocate a fixed price of $1.25 a bushel for wheat, which is what we ought to advocate, and to advocate a just price for meat, wool, honey, butter, milk, cream, eggs, hides, everything that the farmer produces; for us to urge that that just price be given but not to tell the people how the money is to be raised, is for us to advocate an absurdity.

Mr. SPEAKER: After my decision I do not think the hon. member should proceed to give an elaborate statement of how to get the money. The question before the house is the motion which I have just read, and I think the hon. member should not wander so far from it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There are many works and reforms that I should like to have in my constituency, but the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) says that there is no money for them. I suggest that we both ask for those things, and then one day try to convince the Minister of Finance that there is money somewhere so that we can get what we want. But this, I believe, is not the time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: This is the first time it ever dawned upon me that it would not be in order to discuss this question in connection with such a subject. Ever since I was old enough to understand English the very first question that came up whenever I wanted anything was how I was going to pay for it; for, if you cannot pay for a thing, you cannot have it. So, in deciding whether or not we should give the farmers of Canada a just price for their products, the whole question depends upon whether or not we can get the money without taxation and without borrowing. Of course if you, Mr. Speaker, feel that to be out of order—

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it is.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Very well.

Mr. HANSELL: In rising to that point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: I have given my decision and have said that the hon. member should confine his remarks strictly to the resolution now before the house. Otherwise we could discuss all sorts of things.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, Mr. Speaker, if I had only known this five minutes ago I would have had plenty of material here to go on with, because I have a whole drawerful of material similar to that which was brought forward by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) and the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair). There is no doubt in the world that the time is coming when we simply must give the primary producers prices which will enable them to recover the cost of production plus a sufficient profit to enable them to live. From Winnipeg west there is not a single agricultural product, so far as I know, which the farmers can produce consistently and make pay. I think I can defy anyone successfully to challenge that statement. The only hope we see, then, is this: Under our present system can the country change its ways and bring about a better situation so that the condition of the farmers may be improved. If it cannot, then I say it is a foregone conclusion that the industry of agriculture is doomed to failure and ruin.

If I am not to be allowed to talk about how to get out of the difficulty, I can talk about the difficulty itself. I wish I had some of the material that I have in my room in volumes, so that my words might be of greater worth, because of themselves words are of no value. I must say that one thing which has depressed me almost beyond endurance has been to sit in this house and listen to men talking, talking, talking, about what ought to be done but which cannot be done under the present system. What is the use of talking? I do not wish to be critical, but I am going to say a word or two about the two old parties, the Liberals and the Conservatives. I have not the slightest fault to find with them, except that there is not an idea in either party that will come anywhere near solving the problems with which we are faced. I challenge any man in this house to name a single solitary principle in the program of either party which will solve this problem: first of all, how to get more money in this country. If we go into debt we are simply mortgaging the future, and our children, the citizens of to-morrow, will be faced not only with the problem with which we are faced—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have to remind the hon. member once more that the resolution states:

> That, in the opinion of this house, this parliament should immediately take such steps as are necessary to insure the farmers of Canada a fixed price of ninety-five cents per bushel for number one northern wheat at their local elevator.

I do not think it is the proper place or time, in connection with a resolution of this kind, to discusss our monetary system or how the money can be obtained.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Very well. I am wondering what could be talked about.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member to deal with the subject matter of the resolution before the house, as to whether or not it is advisable to adopt the resolution.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, manifestly it is advisable. Without at least ninety-five cents a bushel we are going to have the whole agricultural population on relief in due time, and it is only a matter of time. You simply cannot produce wheat costing you ninety-six cents a bushel and sell it for ninety-five cents, and keep going. If we had known we were going to be held down in this way, Mr. Speaker, we would have divided up the material that was placed on Hansard by the hon. member for Bow River and the hon. member for Battle River. If hon. members will read carefully the remarks of those two hon. gentlemen they will see that it is absolutely inevitable that we should pay at least ninety-five cents a bushel, or more. Otherwise we shall have not only the whole agricultural population but also at least three provinces on relief.

There is one tendency which I have noticed in this house, and which I regret. A great number of people are indisposed to listen to a contention such as this. They say, "Well, the western people are always coming down here asking for something." That is a monstrous untruth.

Mr. BOUCHARD: That is what we are here for, to ask for something.

Mr. BLACKMORE: All we are asking for is a set of conditions under which we can live. Take the Searle index, which was referred to this afternoon. Hon. members will remember that it definitely proved that for the 147 commodities the farmers buy, the index price is 136·5, speaking from memory, compared with the figure of 100 for those same 147 commodities before the war, and the farmers are getting less for their products than they were getting before the war. Even at that time they were barely able to carry on. That alone is enough; that proves it.

I shall not occupy any more of the time of the house. But I will say this—and I do not want it construed as a threat—that if there is going to be an effort to shut us off every time we undertake to talk social credit, we will create situations in which it will be in order, and they will be plentiful.

Mr. ARTHUR J. LAPOINTE (Matapedia-Matane): (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak briefly on the motion of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston), my first words will be to state my unhesitating opposition to it. The hon. member asks the government to take immediately such steps as are necessary to ensure the farmers of Canada a fixed price of 95 cents for number one northern wheat at their elevator. Why stop there? Why not one dollar instead of 95 cents?

Such a policy, Mr. Speaker, would indeed be favouring the west at the expense of the east. It is high time that the people of western Canada learn to turn somewhere else than towards the government when they find themselves in difficulties. Hearing certain hon. members speak, one would think that the depression struck only the west. Let them go east and look around; they will find that there also distress is present. They will find our workers unemployed; they will find our farmers threatened with the loss of their farms which they have hewed out of the virgin forest by the sweat of their brow. It is my opinion that the western provinces have been amply assisted by federal governments. If the latter are to continue in this course, they will have to make up their mind, as my friend the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Brunelle) said this afternoon, to subsidize the farmers of the east.

They will assuredly have to come to the aid of the butter and cheese producers who are faced with ruin because of the surplus quantities of these products now on the market. They will have to help the potato growers who a few years ago had to sell their product at 8 or 9 cents a bushel. They will have to help the farmers who, as in the autumn of 1936, saw their crops destroyed by early frosts. Doubtless, Mr. Speaker, each province has its problems and its troubles; but it is wrong to take advantage of the present difficult times to raise one province or one section of the country against another.

Hearing some of my hon. colleagues from the west, one would think that it is western Canada that has built up the eastern provinces and has ensured their livelihood. It seems to me that eastern Canada has contributed a large share in the construction of the western railroads, when certain sections of the east, in Quebec province, for instance, were sacrificed. I think each section of the country furnished its share. Let us seek to understand our problems better; we shall then find it easier to solve them.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order: I would like to ask if the hon. member is reading his speech?

Mr. SPEAKER: To my mind he is not.

Mr. HANSELL: He is looking down, anyway.

Mr. BOUCHARD: It is French; you cannot judge.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Matapedia-Matane): (Translation) To hear some of my western friends, one would think that the west has built up the eastern provinces and supported them. It seems to me, though, that eastern Canada has largely contributed to the construction of the western railways, while certain areas of eastern Quebec, for example, were being neglected. To my mind, each section of the country has made its contribution. Let us endeavour to attain a better understanding of our problems; we shall then be able to solve them more easily.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) desires to close the debate. I should like to have heard a statement from him earlier in the debate on this important question. I do not think any more important question will come before the house this session than that which we have been discussing this afternoon. In view of the statement made a few days ago by the minister, it would have been a splendid thing if we had had a statement from him earlier to-day.

World marketing conditions at the present time are more or less demoralized; the situation in which the producer finds himself is extremely uncertain. This afternoon the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) referred to the report of the conference called by Premier Bracken, which was held in Winnipeg. I followed the proceedings of that conference rather closely, and I have summarized briefly what I think took place, and some of the decisions reached.

They reviewed agriculture, past, present and future. They found that the price trend on many primary products was definitely down. So far as wheat was concerned, the price was only half to-day what it was a year ago. In fact a larger crop this year has resulted in about $30,000,000 less to the producer. Certain questions were considered, and I shall give briefly the answers:

Question 1: Is there a shrinkage in world's demand?

Answer: Yes.

Question 2: Is the annual production maintained in Canada?

Answer: Yes.

Question 3: Is the low price likely to continue?

Answer: Yes.

Question 4: Is the carry-over likely to increase?

Answer: Quite probable.

The general view of the conference was that the present picture represents world conditions of an extraordinary character.

The present problem to be solved, it was decided, was the control of production, and the question was asked: Can we reduce the cost of production and control the cost of production at the same time?

While there was no definite recommendation made at the conference, we know a committee was set up to carry on further investigation. It was considered, however, that the two main factors in relieving the difficulty would be to find export markets or regain lost markets, and to lower the cost of production. In addition, it was apparent that the prairie provinces have the major responsibility, but it was also apparent that they have no desire to shirk their responsibility.

All this goes to prove that we are in a critical position with respect to marketing. I have had a little experience in different ways with respect to wheat growing and wheat marketing. As a grain dealer I have operated a private elevator, and I think I can speak with a little authority. I have had some experience on committees of this house dealing with the wheat problem, particularly when Mr. McFarland was here in 1934 reviewing his stabilization operations, when a committee of nine of us reviewed the Canadian Wheat Board Act, and at a later time when Mr. Murray's operations as head of the wheat board were reviewed.

I watched the operations of the board in its handling of the 1938 crop, and at this point I want to say that before the system of having a wheat board and marketing through that board, with a fixed minimum price, is condemned—and I assume there is truth in the statement we have read in the press and those we have heard in the house from the Minister of Agriculture to the effect that the wheat board is to be set aside so far as the handling of wheat is concerned—we should have a thorough investigation into the operations of the board in handling the 1938 crop.

I shall not take time to-night to deal with their operations in detail, but I think it is evident that the policy they pursued had a depressing effect and has resulted in a considerable portion of the loss which the Minister of Agriculture forecast we might have to take. I say that this loss is a direct result of their policy, and a matter which should be investigated thoroughly.

All sorts of evidence can be produced by authorities in the United States and Canada who are closely associated with the grain business. Before proceeding further, I wish to lay before hon. members three or four outstanding facts. This afternoon hon. members to my left had much to say about the condition in which the farmers of the west find themselves. I am going to try to give another picture to-night. I do not think we should parade our difficulties as they seem to want to do from time to time. The farmer of western Canada realizes that he has made a contribution to this confederation, and all he wants is fair consideration.

The development of prairie wheat farming was sponsored by the whole of Canada. Wheat farming in western Canada was an important industry long before our mining industry, our textile industry, our paper industry or many of our other industries became real, national assets. But this great national wheat industry is now being threatened by subversion and, therefore, it has become the obligation of the whole of this dominion. The west was encouraged to produce during the war, and production was increased considerably.

There is another fact I should like to call to the attention of hon. members. During the last twenty-eight years the western provinces have produced, according to the bureau of statistics, 9,500,000,000 bushels of wheat. The average yearly production over that period is 340,000,000 bushels, and the average export, around 250,000,000 bushels. The average price for No. 1 northern at Fort William was $1.27, while the average price for all grades was in the neighbourhood of ninety cents. These are figures I think we should keep in mind. In the last twenty-eight years new wealth to the extent of $10,450,000,000 has been produced. What does that mean to industry in eastern Canada? What does it mean in the way of purchasing power, in the way of payments for labour and in many other ways?

In the last three years the production of coarse grains, that is, oats, barley, rye and flax, was valued at $231,000,000, even though these crops were sold at low prices. This afternoon reference was made to the fact that oats had sold at as low as eleven cents a bushel this year. I would direct attention also to the fact that we paid freight averaging about fourteen cents a bushel on that wheat. This amounted to an average of $27,500,000 a year. In the twenty-eight year period, we had paid over one billion dollars in freight, apart from lake freights. I want hon. members to note that this is on wheat alone. I shall not review the amount of money invested in the purchase of machinery, as reference has been made to this already. It is, however, interesting to note that the west purchased $20,000,000 worth of machinery annually. The freight on that machinery during that period amounted to about $250,000,000. All this must have meant something to industry and to the general business of this dominion. I am giving this side of the picture in order to impress upon hon. members the importance of this great industry in western Canada.

I do not propose to go in detail into the plans I suggested. I have a resolution on the order paper, but I do not know whether it will be reached. I should like to have had an opportunity of discussing it, but possibly I may be able to say something when the bill comes down. I hope the minister will inform the house to-night when he expects to bring down his bill. The reports which have gone out from this house have more or less excited the whole of Canada, and certainly the west is interested in having this information. Apparently this matter is important enough to have brought provincial authorities and members of the wheat pool here to Ottawa. I understand that these gentlemen are in this city at this time, and I do hope we shall have something definite in a few days.

I believe the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) was in order to-night. When an hon. member proposes to the house a plan or scheme which will need money to carry it out, it is only fair that he should be given an opportunity to show how the money can be obtained. With the scheme I have in mind I believe that over a long term of years the wheat industry could stand on its own feet. That is where our farmers want to be. They do not want to be coming to Ottawa, to eastern Canada, all the time with their hands out. We should have a proper board with proper authority. There should be producer representation on that board, and it should have the courage to act. I believe the advisory board should have been reinstated, with farmer representatives. With such a board I believe the wheat industry could carry on by itself. Later on, I may have an opportunity of outlining what I think can be done. I have definite ideas as to how we can control production and marketing.

From what I have seen announced in the press as to the scheme proposed by the minister, I want to warn him that crop insurance is a different matter from marketing. The two must not be confused. There is another point to consider. I do not think the wheat board can be scuttled for the next year. There certainly will be a large carry-over, and any other board or pool which might be set up and financed by the government to carry out a fixed minimum price policy will be in competition with the present board in connection with the surplus which it will have to carry over. That is an important point to keep in mind.

I suggest to the minister that he deal adequately with this question. We want something of a permanent nature. We do not want a board in to-day and out to-morrow. We did not have a board in 1936 when wheat was selling at $1.22, and in 1937 when it was selling at $1.31. They could have paid the price suggested to-day quite handily and had a nice reserve set up. That would have been the proper thing to do in order to keep this on a business basis. Unless this is done, the minister is going to find himself in a worse position, and the problem will be harder to deal with later on. I think the wheat board must continue. With world marketing conditions as they are to-day, I do not think we dare scuttle the board. I hope the bill will come down in good time so that we may have an opportunity to discuss it in detail. Possibly we can put forward some suggestions which will help the minister in making this whole matter worth while.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The resolution before the house moved by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) reads:

> That in the opinion of this house, this parliament should immediately take such steps as are necessary to insure the farmers of Canada a fixed price of ninety-five cents per bushel for number one northern wheat at their local elevator.

Someone has said the fact that this applies only to No. 1 northern wheat confines the effect of the resolution to western Canada, and probably that is correct because it is only in western Canada that we grow No. 1 northern wheat. I therefore wish to take a few moments to discuss with hon. members the suggestion that a fixed price of ninety-five cents be established for wheat at the local elevators, I assume, in western Canada.

A ninety-five cent price at the local elevator would be about the same as $1.15 at Fort William; that is, it would be approximately thirty-five cents higher than the price which was set for this year. In other words, if there had been a price of $1.15 set for the year 1938-39, and the price of wheat had been what it has been, the Dominion of Canada would have found it necessary to put up by way of bonus about $150,000,000. Only to state that amount to the house indicates, I think, that it would be very difficult for any government, no matter what it might call itself, to fix a price of $1.15 for wheat, have the experience tripled which we have had during this last season, and have the system based upon that experience continue for one year longer in the Dominion of Canada.

I tried to state to the house about ten days ago the effect of the set price which we did have in its relationship to the earnings of farmers in western Canada, and I think it was apparent to everyone that even with the eighty cent set price we had created such inequalities in western Canada that very few would advocate a continuance of the pegged price or set price or fixed price even at the level we had last year. If we were going to assume that the price of wheat would be as low as or lower than that amount for any year in which this ninety-five price was going to be active, it is apparent that no government could retain in existence a price based upon it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. A few moments ago I was ruled out of order for discussing where the money could come from. The hon. minister now is discussing where the money cannot come from. Is that not out of order?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry, but the hon. minister is not wandering away so far as the hon. member did.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), speaking a few moments ago, said something to the effect that if we had had a board in operation with a set price for 1936 and 1937 we might have created a reserve—I think that was the term he used—to take care of some of the losses in succeeding years. But, unfortunately, under the legislation which we have at the present time, it would not have been possible to do that; for it provides that after the initial price has been paid, any additional earnings, if there are any, are to be paid out in participation to the individuals who delivered the wheat, and therefore, under the present legislation, no reserve could have been set up.

Mr. PERLEY: I know that perfectly well, but I was suggesting that a system of that kind could be set up for the future and the act amended to provide for it.

Mr. GARDINER: But under the legislation we have had in these last two years it could not have been done.

Mr. PERLEY: I agree.

Mr. GARDINER: Someone has said within the last half hour that the farmers of western Canada are reasonable. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is no more reasonable group in Canada associated with any of our industries than the farmers of western Canada.

Mr. CASSELMAN: What about eastern Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: They are just as reasonable in eastern Canada.

Mr. CASSELMAN: More reasonable.

Mr. GARDINER: I would not say more reasonable, but they are just as reasonable. As a matter of fact, the great bulk of the farmers in western Canada are the sons and daughters of the farmers of eastern Canada. I want to read to the house to-night a letter I have received from a farmer; I do not know him at all, but he is a constituent of one of the members of this house from the western part of Canada, and he says that he sent a copy of this letter or a similar letter to the member. This farmer lives at Gladstone, Manitoba. His letter is dated February 17, 1939, and it expresses so well what I think is the opinion of a great many farmers in western Canada that I think it should go on Hansard. It reads:

Hon. J. G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,

As I have just heard on the radio this morning that your department is considering a wheat acreage bonus, I thought I would write and give my views, which are the views of a diversified farmer who has never received any government assistance.

I am not in favour of a pegged price for wheat as it encourages everyone to grow wheat at the expense of oats and barley; also if wheat was at its own level in price, much more of it would be used for feed, also more of it would be held off the market on the farm, thus keeping down the visible supply.

In my own case if prices are low I always hold grain over in portable granaries and when better prices come clear everything pretty well out, and it has worked with me every time.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I would say, without knowing this gentleman at all, that he is probably one of those reasonable men who came from eastern Canada and had considerable experience in farming there before going to the west. His letter continues:

As to an acreage bonus I would suggest it only be on summer fallow. Otherwise there will be a tendency to put land in crop which will never grow a crop owing to weeds, etcetera; also it should not be confined to wheat; otherwise more land will be put in wheat at the expense of oats and barley. Flax being a good price need not have an acreage bonus. I will enclose a copy of this letter to the member for Neepawa.

I remain,
Yours truly,
Alex. Hart.

He apparently was doing some thinking after he had written the letter, because he adds this postcript:

The bonused acreage should be limited.

To my mind that is a man who would be the average farmer in western Canada, a man who is probably thinking of his own business, writing as a result of thinking about it, and not expecting other people in Canada to do unreasonable things in relation to his business.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

It has been suggested that the farmer in western Canada needs ninety-five cents a bushel on the average at his own farm in order to maintain him on his farm. I am not going to say anything to-night which would in any way tend to remove that idea from the mind of anyone in this house. I do not think it is necessary to do so. I have here the average price obtained by farmers of western Canada for their wheat, not at Fort William, but at their farms over the last thirty years.

Away back in 1908 that average price was seventy-nine cents; in 1909, eighty-two cents; in 1910, seventy-eight cents; in 1911, sixty-one cents; in 1912, fifty-nine cents; in 1913, sixty-five cents. Those were the years preceding the war, and the average price of the farm during those six years was seventy-one cents.

Then we have the years during the war, 1914 to 1920, in which the price was affected by the war.

An hon. MEMBER: Is that for No. 1 northern?

Mr. GARDINER: It is for the average of his wheat, no matter what the grade. The average price received at the farm in 1914 was $1.24; in 1915, 90 cents; in 1916, $1.29; in 1917, $1.92; in 1918, $2; in 1919, $2.34; in 1920, $1.58. The average price during those seven years was $1.61. These are the average prices for the three western provinces.

If we take the next three years, in which prices were comparatively low, the average price received by the farmer at the farm in 1921 was seventy-eight cents; in 1922, eighty-three cents; in 1923, sixty-five cents; or an average, for those three years, of seventy-five cents a bushel at the farm, or at the farmer's local point.

Again, 1924-1929 was a period of comparatively high prices: 1924, $1.21; 1925, $1.23; 1926, $1.07; 1927, ninety-eight cents; 1928, seventy-eight cents; 1929, $1.03; the average price for those six years being $1.05.

Then, taking the last seven years, which were very difficult years, the returns were: 1930, forty-seven cents; 1931, thirty-seven cents; 1932, thirty-four cents; 1933, forty-seven cents; 1934, sixty cents; 1935, sixty cents; 1936, eighty-eight cents; or an average during the seven years of fifty-three cents.

Over the whole thirty-one years the average is 94·7 cents a bushel or almost exactly the price which is stated in this resolution as that which the government of Canada ought to pay as an initial price to the farmers of western Canada. For the twenty-four years apart from the war years the average price was seventy-five cents a bushel.

The farmers of western Canada being reasonable people, and a great many of them having had a long experience in the west—I imagine that the gentleman whose letter I read, if he has reached the age of fifty, has probably been over forty years in the particular area in which he resides—will agree with me when I say this, that through the conduct of their business over that long period of time they have obtained an average of about ninety-five cents a bushel for their wheat. These particular individuals do not expect the government of Canada or anyone else to secure for them an average of ninety-five cents by paying it out of the treasury of Canada. By conducting their own affairs they have secured for their wheat an average, over the thirty year period, of ninety-five cents a bushel. If the arguments advanced by hon. members of the social credit group are sound, and ninety-five cents is an amount which would make it possible for a farmer to operate over a long term of years, those who have conducted their affairs in a way to make that possible have been able to get by, as this gentleman says he has, without any government assistance whatsoever.

I am quite sure there are some hon. members who would say, "Well, then, why assist anyone?" Again, I would say that the reason for giving assistance is the fact that not all the farmers of western Canada have had an opportunity of farming in the west over that period of time; the contrary is true of a substantial percentage. Many of them came there without anything at all. Many of them are sons and daughters of those fine farmers of whom my hon. friend spoke, from the eastern part of Canada, who went to the west at a time when conditions in the east were rather difficult, started on farms in the western part of Canada, have done the best they could, and came into this difficult period we are now passing through, when the going is hard largely because world factors and climatic factors have been unfavourable. They are without sufficient resources to see them through their difficulties and into another period when perhaps they will have similar experiences to those of my old Manitoba friend who has had a much longer time and experience wherein to establish himself. In my opinion the government owes it as a duty to people who have run into these difficulties to set up some system under which they can carry on during the difficult period they are now passing through, and get back into a period where they can put themselves on a sounder basis financially than they would be able to do if we allowed them to be crowded off their land and out of their homes and into our towns and villages to add to the lists of those who are receiving relief at the present time. So I say, Mr. Speaker, that what we think should be done in connection with a matter of this kind is to take all the facts into consideration and deal with the situation as we find it.

I do not wish to deal at any considerable length to-night with this matter because, when I made the announcement ten days ago of the intended policy of the government in relation to this question, I was aware of the fact that just two days previously there had been held in Saskatoon a meeting of a committee which had been appointed as a result of the conference which has been referred to many times during this debate. That conference was called by the premier of Manitoba. He invited to it people from different parts of Canada and the United States and had discussions upon questions having to do with the marketing of farm products. We were not in any way associated with the calling of the conference. We sent to it all of our officials who were invited to give of their experience, in order that farmers in western Canada and others in business throughout Canada might benefit from that experience. But we had no active part in that conference, nor did we have anything official from the conference, so far as I am aware, until the fourteenth day of the present month, when we received an intimation from the conference in Saskatoon that they were asking for a set price upon wheat for the year 1939-40 somewhat on the same basis as the price had been set for last year.

We had been giving study to this question throughout last summer, and I had carried on negotiations with a great many people before the conference was called in Winnipeg, and following the time that the conference was held in that city. As a result of these conferences and negotiations we had evolved a policy in connection with the matter of handling wheat and assisting the farmers of the area where the greater part of our spring wheat is grown; and having come to the conclusion that it was not advisable to continue a set-up such as we had last year, which resulted in the conditions I outlined to this house ten days ago, we thought it wise to make that known to the people of Canada, and more particularly to those who were discussing the matter in the western part of Canada. And when we made it known, or about that time, we received from that delegation which was meeting in Saskatoon an intimation that they desired to meet the government on February 28 to discuss the representations which they had to make in relation to the wheat policy of this government. So we decided to go no further with the matter until after to-morrow, when we expect to meet the delegation which has come to Ottawa representing the Bracken conference which was held in Winnipeg, and the meeting which was held on February 14 in Saskatoon. We shall hear their representations to-morrow, and after we have heard them we shall be in a position to discuss further with hon. members policies which we hope to present to the house.

In conclusion, I should like to say that as a result of the findings of the conference which were published in the city of Saskatoon and were forwarded on that particular day to the government, and as a result of the announcement which I made ten days ago, I have been in receipt of considerable correspondence from different parts of western Canada dealing with this particular question. Even before that conference was held, I had considerable correspondence from western Canada. And to indicate to hon. members from all parts of Canada that western farmers are reasonable, let me say that since the results of paying the bonus during last year have been known to the farmers of western Canada, I cannot at the moment recall receiving from any individual a letter advocating a continuance of the policy we followed last year. There have been people who have suggested changes. There have been many who have said we should continue the wheat board. But in no instance that I can recall at the moment—if there were any they were very few—has anyone said, "Continue the wheat board; pay the initial prices you paid last year, and do nothing more with regard to wheat than you did last year."

As I say, people have suggested that changes be made. They have not all agreed on what the changes ought to be. We have studied carefully all the suggestions made by those who have written in, many coming from organizations from one end of western Canada to the other. We have studied carefully the opinions that have come from the eastern part of Canada as well as from the extreme west. We have studied editorial comment in newspapers throughout Canada. We have studied the policies followed in Australia, Argentina, the United States and other wheat producing countries throughout the world. We have tried from this study to evolve a system of handling wheat from western Canada, and more particularly of dealing with the farmer who produces the wheat, which would be more suitable to the farmers of Canada than could result from simply transplanting to this country any system which may have been adopted in some other country.

In common with every hon. member, I hope that when the legislation comes down it will create better conditions in Canada—I do not say western Canada, but better conditions in Canada than anything we have had, and that in creating better conditions it will not cause as heavy a charge upon the treasury of Canada as some of the systems under which we have been operating. I suggest, if it meets with the approval of the mover, now that we have had a discussion upon his motion which has lasted all afternoon and part of the evening, that it might serve the purpose if he withdrew his resolution. The discussion could be resumed on the legislation when it is brought down. I suggest also that the discussion could be carried on in connection with the third resolution that is on the order paper, still further on the resolution of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and still further in connection with the resolution of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley). So there will be four further opportunities of discussing the matter, without taking a vote on this resolution now. Therefore, if the hon. member has no objection, I suggest that a withdrawal of this resolution now would serve his purpose.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): We will withdraw it, Mr. Speaker.

Resolution withdrawn.

LIVE STOCK

PROPOSED APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO ALL PHASES OF THE INDUSTRY

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, a special committee of its members should be appointed forthwith to inquire into the conditions pertaining to the Canadian live stock industry in all its phases, and with special reference to the production, sale and distribution of all live stock and live stock products, both in Canada and abroad.

He said: In moving this resolution I am conscious of the fact that I am discussing a subject which is of the greatest importance to the Canadian people. It was said this afternoon that the motion preceding this was of the utmost importance. I believe that to be true, and I believe that the question of live stock is of just as great importance. The two subjects are allied in any system of permanent agriculture. It has often been said that agriculture is the basic industry of Canada. That statement is absolutely true. I think a fair estimate would be that half the people of Canada are employed directly in agriculture, while other thousands are engaged in the transportation, distribution and marketing of agricultural products. And the rest of the population are directly concerned, because it is agriculture that furnishes the food supply for the nation.

The resolution is drafted in broad terms. My idea in so drafting was, that this subject could be discussed from every angle, that we should not be called to order if it was within my power to avoid it. It will be observed that I ask that this special committee be appointed forthwith. That, of course, is now impossible. Some six or seven weeks of the session have passed, and it is not likely that if a committee were now appointed it would be able to proceed as I desired when I sent in my resolution.

The next point in the resolution is that the industry be inquired into in all its phases. The last phrase, which I think takes in almost everything, is "both in Canada and abroad." I hope that other hon. members will join in this debate and present their point of view concerning associated lines of agriculture. For myself I have specialized in the breeding of pure bred stock, so I shall confine my remarks mostly to that phase of the resolution.

I am quite aware of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is working energetically to evolve some marketing plan or plans that will help the agricultural producers of this country. But it seems to me that we can offer some suggestions that may be helpful to the minister and the officials in his department.

Canadian agriculture is disorganized. The industry lacks direction. Instead of cooperation among the farmers they are engaged in cutthroat competition. That, I think, has been true through all the years that we can remember. As a class we are individualists. While we say we believe in cooperation, I am sorry to have to confess that our farmers have not supported cooperative movements as they should. There is no regulation of production; there is first a scarcity and then a surplus. Witness our past operations in regard to wheat marketing.

To-day that great branch of agriculture to which we refer as the dairy industry is in difficulties. They have a surplus which is bearing down the price of their products. I believe the figures in connection with this industry show that they produced $260,000,000 worth of products last year. I am not going into that phase of the matter to-night, but I get letters from many dairy farmers, complaining bitterly that they have to sell butter fat at a lower price than they should have to sell it at, even when the grass is green and it costs them nothing to feed their cows. It seems to me that the Minister of Agriculture might well say, we must get rid of this surplus of, say 5,000,000 pounds—which after all is really only a week's supply for the people of Canada. I would suggest that if it cannot be sold, it might be handed out for relief purposes, because I believe there are thousands of people on relief in this country, as well as thousands who are not getting relief, who could eat this 5,000,000 pounds of butter and this would provide for them a more wholesome diet.

Then we have the fluctuations in price. I am going to direct the attention of the house to the situation which developed last summer when, within the space of three or four days, the price of hogs dropped 3½ cents a pound. This is what agriculturists in every branch of the industry have been up against, and these fluctuations were really what prompted me to ask for this investigation. There is a real demand for an investigation of this kind. There is dissatisfaction everywhere. All hon. members need to do is go to their desks, turn up their files and read the letters the agriculturists are sending to them every day. During the dying days of last session I made the suggestion that a parliamentary investigation be held into the industry of agriculture. About a week or ten days later I received the following letter:

> We noted with satisfaction your comments in the House of Commons in regard to a thorough investigation of the live stock situation in Canada. Our board of directors—

That is, the United Farmers.

> —discussed this at our meeting yesterday and we are particularly anxious that any investigations undertaken should be conducted by a special committee of the house or other body competent to handle such an investigation. I may say that those of you in the house who are working for such an investigation can be sure of backing from farm organizations engaged in the live stock business and from a great many others as well which are linked together in the Canadian chamber of agriculture.

That is signed by H. H. Haanam, who, I believe, was secretary at that time. Then we find that last year the Manitoba legislature, being concerned as to the state of agriculture, appointed a special committee to investigate the industry. My information is that they did not get very far, because they found this was a matter which really belonged to the parliament of Canada. I believe the minister of agriculture for Manitoba asked that the ministers of agriculture of the three prairie provinces get together in connection with this matter, and I understand this meeting was held in Regina and attended by our federal minister. I am not at liberty to convey the results of that meeting, nor have I the exact information, but this just goes to show that there is deep concern and more or less confusion in regard to the marketing of agricultural products in Canada.

As I pointed out in my opening remarks I intend to deal almost exclusively with the question of live stock. More live stock in Canada would create more labour; there is no doubt about that. In my own experience we employ more men in the winter than in the summer, for the reason that to a large extent we centre our operations on live stock. I can also state from experience that live stock will compel farmers to sow clover and crops of that kind, and I know this is perhaps the greatest guarantee against soil drifting, which is quite prevalent in the west. I remember that my land drifted before I got into the live stock business, sowing clover and other grass crops, and putting manure on the land. I solved the problem of soil drifting to my entire satisfaction, and I say this method will solve the difficulty. We know also that it will preserve the fertility of the land.

I am amazed when I read of the production per acre in the old land and other European countries, where they have been cultivating the same land for a thousand years or more. They grow perhaps twice as much per acre as we do in western Canada, because they have a permanent system of agriculture, which means they have developed their live stock industry. If we went into live stock to a greater extent, it would, in a measure, solve the problem of our wheat surplus, because more acres would be put into grass and other forage crops, thus taking that acreage out of the production of wheat.

Live stock production is a matter of paramount importance. Someone may ask if Canada is a cattle country. Well, we can produce in Canada cattle as good as can be produced anywhere in the world, and we have demonstrated that over and over again. I remember last year talking to a member of parliament who said our trouble was that we did not have the proper beef here in Canada, and I think he doubted if we could produce it. I just want to remind him of the reception given our cattle when they were placed on the British market in the fresh beef state this year, they outsold even the home product. Yes, we can produce the right kind of cattle in Canada. We have some handicaps, but we also have some great advantages. I think one of our greatest assets is our climate, which helps produce feeder stock which, when removed to other feeding grounds such as the United States or the old country, make rapid gains. Many times I have read the statement by old country feeders that Canadian cattle were the healthiest and best doers in the world.

Someone may ask if we have markets available. I would say that we have three important markets to which Canadian live stock raisers have access and in which they enjoy advantages shared by live stock raisers in only one or two other countries. First I will deal with the domestic market, which after all, I believe to be of first importance. In reading the Ottawa papers I notice that on the market here one can buy hindquarters of beef for eight cents a pound. I wonder what kind of beef that is. We are selling our best beef in Winnipeg for as much as eight cents a pound live weight; yet those carcasses can be purchased on the market here for eight cents a pound, dressed. I wonder if one could really call it beef. Perhaps a better name for it would be cat meat, which is the term used in referring to dairy cattle. I am not blaming the farmers; I am not blaming the people who buy this meat. I am just pointing out that consumers will not make an exclusive diet of that sort of food, but will buy just as little as they can get away with. I would take those dairy cows and inferior beef animals and make canner meat of them. I have not the figures before me, but I believe we import thousands of pounds of canned meat annually from South America. Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture could find some way of canning those old dairy cows and selling them in place of the meat we import from the Argentine.

I should like to say something about the British market. There we have a preferred position in regard to both live cattle and beef. We are also in a preferred position in regard to live cattle going into the United States. But I am sorry we are not in a more preferred position in regard to sending dressed beef to the United States, that six cents a pound duty is almost prohibitive. I shall refer to markets later on in my speech.

May I now deal with the proper type that Canadian farmers should be producing. We have three main beef breeds in Canada, and I am going to take the old reliable shorthorns first. I believe they may be classed as the universal breed, because they have gone into nearly every corner of the civilized world. The Scottish shorthorns, which are the pure beef type, are a model of beef. No one who loves beef cattle can find any fault with a model of Scottish shorthorn. Developed in Great Britain and imported to America they made rapid strides. But I believe the Argentine furnishes us with the greatest example in regard to what a good breed of cattle can do. I am sorry I never have had the opportunity, as I know some hon. members have, to view the carcasses as they are hung up in the Smithfield market, and those people declare that the carcasses do not vary an inch in length. They are as uniform as beef carcasses can possibly be.

But there is another breed of shorthorn cattle. This breed also was developed in England, and I believe they are good cattle. But they are not a good beef type. I am sorry to know that many farmers in Canada are trying to get the proper type of beef animal from a dual purpose shorthorn cow. If it is crossed with a good beef bull, there is no doubt it is possible to get a fair animal, but one cannot get the right type of beef which can be expected to compete with the type produced in some other countries.

I wonder how many members in the house to-night have visited the royal winter fair. I assume many have. But I would ask those who have not to take time off next year, so as to visit that exhibition. I would ask them to watch the judging of the shorthorn cattle, and the dual purpose shorthorns, and study the difference between the two breeds. In that way they will get the idea I am trying to convey. It is impossible to get the proper type of beef animal from dairy shorthorns.

The second breed I would mention are the Herefords, or the white-faces. A man who understands the beef business knows that the Hereford is supreme on the ranges of this country. They have made a valuable contribution on this North American continent. I believe it is a well known fact that our best beef comes from the western ranges. I read that the baby beeves which were killed and fetched the top prices in Great Britain—more, indeed, than the Scottish beasts—were baby beeves of the Hereford breed.

I must now turn to my own special breed of cattle, the Aberdeen-Angus. I will not say they are any better than any other breed, but I prefer them, and that is why I am breeding them. Modesty will not permit me to extol the virtues of this particular breed, and for that reason I shall offer to the house some comments from authorities on live stock. I shall quote a sentence from Alvin Sanders, who used to be editor of the Breeders' Gazette, a publication printed in Chicago, and at one time the greatest live stock journal on the North American continent. I noticed this observation in the Iowa Journal two or three years ago, and I have been saving it, never expecting to use it other than for my own information. The quotation is as follows:

> Generally speaking I would say that of all the beef breeds the Aberdeen-Angus is the most highly specialized. It seems most perfectly adapted to the production of superlative block results under high pressure fattening rations.

May I now quote another first class authority, the Hon. Duncan Marshall. This observation, too, was reported in the Iowa Journal and reproduced in the pages of the Farmers' Advocate, an Ontario publication. The Hon. Duncan Marshall, it may be noted, is a past president of the shorthorn association, and when visiting the Smithfield show he said:

> When I got to the good steers it was a rare treat. The cross cattle were very fine, and this means the Aberdeen-Angus cross. This was particularly true of the good steers, as with the exception of a few blue ones practically all the high class steers in the show yard had black skins. The results of fat stock shows in various parts of the world must have made it apparent to everyone that cross-bred commercial cattle are continually coming to the front. This is particularly true where the cross has been the blending of Aberdeen-Angus and shorthorn character.

May I quote this further article from our own Commercial Intelligence Journal of February 20, 1937. This will be of interest to hon. members, and of interest to people throughout the country—if they should have an opportunity to read my remarks. The Commercial Intelligence Journal makes this statement.

> Buyers have expressed pleasure at the steady improvement in the type and class of cattle shipped from Canada, and particularly in 1936 there has been a much more satisfactory proportion of young cattle, including a large number of well-bred cross-Angus types, which are particularly favoured in Scotland.
> In connection with prices, it must be pointed out that the choicest beef cattle received from Canada—young cross-Angus types weighing from 1,000 to 1,150 pounds—have fetched as much as 45s. per live cwt., and that the average for a complete shipment is very much reduced by prices realized for rough, inferior cattle.

I could continue, but that will be sufficient for my purpose. Hon. members may be wondering what connection all this may have with the production of a proper beef type of Canadian cattle, the type which we may hope to export to Great Britain. It is a fact that most of the female stock in Canada, most of the cows, are of shorthorn foundation. That is true in regard to Ireland also. Ireland is using the very finest types of purely beef bred shorthorns, Herefords and Aberdeen-Angus on the shorthorn cows to produce the desired product for Great Britain. That is the point I wish to make.

So far, however, as Canadian cattle are concerned, speaking generally their quality is not high. I would not wish to leave the impression that we have not very many fine herds of all breeds of cattle. But the average cow from which most of these store cattle are being produced is not high. There is no gainsaying that statement, and as proof of it may I point out that I have examined the figures for the last number of years covering shipments made to our stock-yards, and I have found that only one-third of the cattle going into Canadian stock-yards are of the two top grades, namely choice and good, and two-thirds are in the lower brackets, namely medium and common. This statement should convince anyone that the quality of our cattle needs grading up. We must find some way of improving our beef cattle, and there is no easier, quicker or more efficient way of doing so than through the use of better sires.

I am going to say something about the bull policies now in force in Canada. I contend that our policies have been rather slipshod and haphazard. There has been no settled policy, either federal or provincial. Sometimes one province was in and sometimes the other was out. At other times there has been overlapping. Canada has no really stable live stock policy. I was going to give the details of the federal bull policy in Canada, but I see my time is slipping by. Suffice it to say that our policies are certainly not to be commended. I believe the desire is to do the best that can be done, but we must evolve some other method of improving our stock.

I should like to give figures relative to bulls on loan by the federal government, according to the information secured last year from the department. These figures are not divided into dual purpose and beef type animals, so I do not know the percentages. There were 1,342 shorthorn bulls on loan, or seventy-three per cent of the total. There were 357 Herefords, or nineteen per cent. There were 148 Aberdeen-Angus, or eight per cent. I also obtained the figures with regard to the prairie farm rehabilitation association. They have purchased fifteen shorthorns, three Herefords and two Aberdeen-Angus.

In comparison with what Canada has done in this regard, I should like to refer to the efforts made by Ireland. We must remember that Ireland is our chief competitor. Last year I took it upon myself to send to the old country to get all the information possible in regard to the policies adopted in Great Britain and Ireland. There is certainly a wealth of material available. I shall not give it in detail, but I have a few notes in regard to the cattle industry in Ireland.

The cattle industry of Ireland is of a two-fold character. The cattle are bred for both dairy and beef purposes. The annual value of the dairy industry is approximately $40,000,000, while the value of the beef trade is approximately $100,000,000. Ireland exports approximately 750,000 live cattle to Great Britain annually. The breeding cows are ninety per cent dual purpose shorthorns, and the endeavour is to mate these to high-class beef type bulls, mostly of the shorthorn, Hereford and Aberdeen-Angus breeds. As the Irish farmer cannot afford to neglect the dairy end of his business and must replenish his dairy herd from time to time, a good percentage of dairy shorthorn bulls are used. At the same time they realize that if their store and beef cattle are to find favour in the British market, they must show a measure of superior beef type. The Irish have always taken a keen interest in their cattle industry, as they realize the importance that industry plays in their national economy.

Down through the years state assistance has been given, mostly in the form of subsidizing the sire. While the various schemes resulted in general improvement, the efforts were voluntary and there were always some who were careless in their breeding operations. This inferior stock found its way to market and hurt the reputation of the Irish cattle. In 1924 a more determined effort was made to improve the qualities of their store cattle. The minister of agriculture introduced a bill which called for the licensing of all bulls in the country, and the act came into force the following year. It is to be noted that this policy of improvement coincided with the lifting of the embargo against Canadian cattle entering Great Britain. They felt sure that we would take advantage of our opportunities, and they were determined to improve the quality of their own stock.

I have dealt with the class of bulls on loan by the dominion government, and I should now like to give the comparative figures for Ireland. I am going to do this by quoting the figures obtained from bull sales which have been held in Ireland. I hold in my hand tables giving the results over a ten year period of the bull sales in Dublin and Belfast, the largest markets in the north and south of Ireland. It would save considerable time if I could have these tables placed on Hansard. First, I would summarize the figures by stating that in the Dublin sales there was a total of 1,540 beef shorthorns sold, the average price received being $178. There were 2,659 Aberdeen-Angus sold, the average price being $205. There were 1,929 Herefords sold, the average price being $212.50. In the Belfast sales, there were 2,012 beef shorthorns sold at an average price of $154.50. There were 985 Aberdeen-Angus sold, at an average price of $163. There were no Hereford sold.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The statements may be placed on Hansard only with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. LEADER: The statements are:

1938	202	36- 6- 1d.	115	33-19- 0d.

These tables show the class of bulls they are using to produce the store cattle which compete with Canadian cattle in the British market. A comparison between Ireland and Canada of the types of bulls used shows that in beef shorthorns, the Irish percentage is thirty-five per cent compared with seventy-three per cent in Canada. In the case of Herefords, it is nineteen per cent and nineteen per cent respectively, while with Aberdeen-Angus it is forty-six per cent and eight per cent respectively. Ireland has several bull schemes in operation. I intended to give the details of these, but I shall not take the time to do this as the house has been good enough to extend my time.

In the main, the government offers premiums to the purchaser of a bull. These premiums range from £15 to £22 and are paid annually for the period the bull is in service, provided the terms of the agreement are fulfilled. The government also grants loans to farmers who wish to buy premium bulls, the farmer paying one-third of the purchase price. The loan is payable in two annual instalments, with interest at five per cent. The farmer can usually liquidate his loan out of the proceeds of his premiums. The government also purchases, mostly in Scotland, a number of high-class sires which are loaned to breeders with outstanding herds, with the stipulation that the male calves will provide premium bulls for the annual bull sales.

Even in the poorer districts with the poorer farmers the government has a policy of presenting bulls free of charge. Premium bulls are selected from the breeders at certain times and places, when and where it is most convenient. The selections are made by good judges of live stock, who are usually farmer breeders. The premium bulls must be presented by their owners at approved shows which are held twice annually in the spring and autumn. Anyone who wants a premium bull must make application three weeks before the show and sale. Each applicant must select his own bull. He must agree to the terms prescribed, which compel him to allow public service, he being allowed to charge a service fee of 2s. 6d. Bulls must be at least ten months old before premiums are granted.

These schemes are well advertised. I think we can make some criticism of our department because they have not advertised their several bull schemes. Most of our farmers are practically ignorant of the fact that we have a bull scheme in operation. Such schemes are well advertised in Ireland. I have a statement here which I shall not take time to read, but there is no doubt that the quality of the Irish cattle which have been shipped during the last ten years has improved wonderfully. So much for cattle improvement.

I should now like to go back to the markets I mentioned a moment ago. I made the statement that Ireland exported annually to Great Britain approximately 750,000 head of store cattle, and I believe that last year it was in the neighbourhood of 850,000 head. Canada exported on the average in the last five years a little over 27,000 head. This means, Mr. Speaker, that for every one store beast that we sold to the old country, Ireland sold twenty-eight.

I want to say a word about the irregularity of our cattle shipments to the old country, which I believe is one of the main reasons why we have not been able to gain more headway in that market. We have not been able to assure the buyers in Great Britain of a continuity of supply. I made the statement in the house on a former occasion that we should be prepared, if necessary, to bonus our cattle going to Great Britain to provide a certain minimum consignment every month, thus assuring that market of a continuity of supply. I have before me figures of our cattle shipments covering a ten year period, and they go from none in 1929 to 27,307 head in 1938; in one year it was 53,852 head and the next year 6,704 head, which indicates how irregular our shipments to the old country have been. The same applies to our shipment of cattle to the United States. In 1929 we shipped 160,103 head; in 1930, 19,483 head; in 1931, 9,000 head; in 1935, 102,000; in 1937, 208,000; in 1938, 98,408.

We have heard something about filling our quota of cattle going into the United States, and I have figures here for the last three years since we negotiated our first treaty with the United States. In 1936 Canada sent 134,610 head of cattle to the United States, or 86·4 per cent of the quota, while Mexico shipped 21,189, or 13·6 per cent of the quota; in 1937 Canada shipped 131,193 head, or 84·2 per cent of the quota, and Mexico 24,606 head, or 15·8 per cent of the quota; in 1938 we shipped 75,529 head, or 60·3 per cent of the quota, and Mexico shipped 49,741, or 39·7 per cent of the quota. Neither country was able to fill the entire quota last year; but if we had been in a position to take advantage of the United States market, if we had had a sufficient number of cattle, we would perhaps have had about the same percentage of quota as we had in the two previous years, which averaged eighty-five per cent. I do not intend to follow that any further this evening because it would take too much time.

I want to say something about the possibilities of placing fresh killed beef in the old country. I have a table here showing a total of 11,184,928 long hundredweights of beef imported into Great Britain in 1938. That represents 2,236,985 head of cattle, and of this vast trade Canada's share was 5,200 hundredweight, or 1,300 head—1,300 head in a total of 2,236,985 head! As to the possibilities of placing our fresh killed beef on the British market, first I want to give full credit to the Minister of Agriculture and his department for the experiment they have carried on in the past year, although in my opinion it was not necessary because the feasibility of placing our fresh killed beef on the British market had been demonstrated on three previous occasions. Nevertheless I am here to pay this tribute, that the department has proved beyond any doubt the feasibility of this undertaking, which, after all, is perhaps a very good thing.

We have had various reports in regard to our fresh killed beef placed on the British market and how it was received. One man said it was sensational.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but I must remind him that he has spoken for forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. LEADER: Mr. Shaw, director of marketing service of the Department of Agriculture, Ottawa, speaking at the conference in Winnipeg, said:

> Among the difficulties being encountered are an extremely limited supply of beef of the proper kind.

Does it not mean something to the farmers of this country that we cannot find twenty-five good cattle a week to ship to the old land? It should mean something and it does. I want to suggest to the minister to-night that he place a buyer at the boys' and girls' shows held annually in all parts of Canada and pay a fair price for these cattle in competition with the different abattoirs. I know that the buyers from the abattoirs are good patrons of these sales and that they pay a fair price, but I am going to ask the department to place a buyer there in competition, which may help sell these cattle and will encourage our young boys and girls to raise more beef. There is no doubt they will find the proper type of beef cattle at these shows.

Mr. Shaw goes on to enumerate other difficulties encountered:

> Insufficient depth to railway refrigerator cars to allow for hanging full sides, this necessitating the removal of the chuck on the majority of the carcases; lack of necessary facilities at the docks for the safe and economical handling of fresh commodities; insufficient depth in ship's refrigerator chamber to allow hanging of full sides.

All these are serious handicaps. Last year I stated that I believed these cattle should be killed at the seaboard and then loaded directly into our ships and transported, and that there should be no rail haul for dressed beef. If we develop a system in this country whereby we are going to kill these cattle at Toronto, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton and elsewhere, it is going to mean railway transportation and the providing of refrigeration facilities, and the producers of this country will have to pay for that equipment. There is no doubt that it will come out of the price to the producers.

Mr. Shaw mentions that dock and shipping facilities are lacking. But we must have these facilities in any event. If we are going to spend money in providing proper equipment, all well and good, but I would hesitate to develop this industry on the basis of having the cattle killed in the interior and shipped to the seaboard.

I want to quote what the minister said last year when this matter was under discussion. He told us that the beef slaughtered at Birkenhead sold for prices which compared favourably with the prices paid for the best Scottish beef; also that the beef which was killed in Montreal sold at a little lower price; and that which was killed in Saskatoon brought a lower price still. The minister also told us that our Canadian railways did not have proper cars to transport the beef. Again he said that we are carrying on the experiment under the most difficult conditions one can possibly prescribe, and if we can succeed under those conditions we could succeed much better if we had better facilities. There is no doubt that the experiment has succeeded; but I still maintain that if we are going to develop this great industry, our cattle must be killed at the seaboard, placed directly in refrigerator ships, and put on the market in the best possible condition. I wish just to quote—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to be as brief as possible, because he has exceeded his time.

Mr. LEADER: I am sorry.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. LEADER: I am about to close. I am really cutting it out in chunks. I wanted to quote the president of the Western Live Stock Union of Canada. In addressing a conference at Winnipeg he made this statement:

> Beef has to hang between 9, 10 and 12 days to make it perfect for consumption purposes. Practically the time it takes from the time it leaves our ports to arrive in the British market is the time to make it prime fresh beef.

Last year I quoted Doctor Hind, who, I believe, is one of the greatest authorities in Canada on this subject. She has made a world tour, and has investigated this matter with great care. She makes the definite statement that these cattle should be killed at the seaboard, as they do in the Argentine, if we are to meet with the measure of success which we deserve. And so I maintain that our natural advantages should not be lost by the adoption of false methods. The benefits of this industry should go primarily to the producer rather than to the transportation companies and the private packing plants.

I would recommend to the minister that he develop cooperative producers' packing plants. These, I believe, should be followed up by cooperative retail butcher shops for the sale of our cattle in Great Britain.

I would recommend that the federal government discontinue their bull loaning policy. Let them get out of the business altogether and enable the provinces to develop a policy of their own. This is too big a country to develop and provide for these matters from Ottawa; it should be a provincial responsibility, and I believe the provinces would undertake it if they were encouraged to do so. I suggest to the provinces that they carry out policies similar to the ones now in vogue in Ireland. This would leave the federal government with plenty to do. In my opinion they should assist the provinces on a fifty-fifty basis, giving them sufficient financial aid and allowing them supervision of the bull schemes. According to the figures for 1937, the federal government bull policy cost $71,920.52, which is a beginning of the financial assistance they might give to the provinces. The federal government would still guard the health of our cattle.

Another thing I think the federal authorities might do is to discourage the increasing practice of shipping direct to packing plants; they should encourage shipments to the stockyards. Our primary duty however, is to search for new outlets for our live stock products and develop an efficient marketing service.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry, but the hon. member has now exceeded his time by ten or twelve minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. LEADER: All I am going to say, Mr. Speaker, is that anything that the government, the Minister of Agriculture or his department can do will have my hearty cooperation.

Mr. WILLIAM HAYHURST (Vegreville): We have listened with a great deal of interest to what has been said by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader).

This resolution is very broad in its scope. It suggests that a special committee of hon. members be appointed "to inquire into the conditions pertaining to the Canadian live stock industry in all its phases, and with special reference to the production, sale and distribution of all live stock and live stock products, both in Canada and abroad." The hon. member has covered the subject very well. As he is a breeder of Aberdeen-Angus cattle and I am a breeder of shorthorns, we have something in common. We feel that the farming community of Canada is a basic community. As the hon. member said, agriculture is a basic industry; with that we all agree.

This afternoon we listened to many speeches, all of them dealing with agriculture. Some speeches advocated the fixing of a just price for products such as wheat, oats, barley and rye. For myself, I would just as soon see a just price for live stock, irrespective of whether they are from dairy herds or live stock as sold to the packing plants.

It was my privilege this last summer to go to England and France and see something of the live stock industry in those two great countries, as well as to get some information about the marketing methods practised there. I myself was born on a farm in England, and I know something of the shorthorn cattle industry from the ground upward, particularly its great development in the north of England and the south of Scotland. As the hon. member for Portage la Prairie has said, the cross between shorthorns and Aberdeen-Angus gives the best beef on the Smithfield market.

It is along the line of quality that I would address my remarks this evening, although I intend to speak briefly. I do not know that much was said this afternoon about quality—not as much as should have been said. Hon. members were saying that the price of wheat should be ninety-five cents for No. 1 northern; but most western farmers do not raise No. 1 northern, and the fact is that the great spread in prices, rather than the actual figure for No. 1 northern wheat, is what cripples the farmers in western Canada. The same principle is true of our cattle industry. Many of our finest cattle are sold to the packing plants without much real grading, that is, such as would give the farmer the benefit of the grade. As has been suggested with regard to wheat, so with cattle, we do not always get the benefit of the grade.

As regards the sale of quality cattle, it is vitally important that the government see to it that farmers who raise good cattle get a proper price. The same applies also to the hog industry. Farmers who raise good hogs should reap the benefit of their skill. We know we have a quota from Great Britain for hogs, and that quota is not filled. Year in and year out many thousands more hogs could be shipped to the British market. When I was in England I noticed that on many of the street-cars and buses was the sign, "Eat Danish bacon—it's best." On other buses one would see, "Bacon is best when it's Danish." Wherever you went you would see those signs. We did not see many Canadian signs, although I noticed on the back of the Commercial Intelligence Journal some window-dressing,—"Buy Canadian eggs." Such things are good in their way. But I found that in England they know very little about some of the very best products which Canada raises.

I remember that last year the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) suggested that cheese had not been properly advertised in Great Britain before he investigated the matter, and that upon investigation and a proper advertising campaign being put on, a great improvement in the cheese business developed. There is no doubt that it pays to advertise. I suppose that many hon. members receive these communications from different advertising companies stating that if we advertised more, even in Canada, we could sell tremendous quantities of cheese, butter and other products. There is no doubt that if much of the foolishness over the radio were changed into advertising, to tell the people that we have millions of pounds of good butter ready for distribution and sale to Canadian citizens, much more butter would be used. So we are missing even our own market. The dairy producers find a glut of butter on the market and are anxious that it be removed so that they can get a reasonable or just price for their butter.

As other hon. members have said, agriculture is the basic industry of Canada. But the foundation of agriculture is the soil. The Minister of Agriculture has a great rehabilitation program for western Canada, and I do not doubt that it is needed in eastern Canada also. We should not be provincial in these matters; we are just as vitally interested in the work of French-Canadian farmers in Quebec or the farmers in the maritime provinces or in Ontario as we are in the western farmers; all farmers should benefit. If the soil is depleted, productive capacity will be curtailed. So the problem of rehabilitation is fundamental.

I have a clipping from the London Daily Telegraph and Morning Post's financial and industrial review of February 13, 1939, in which Viscount Lymington is quoted as saying that one of the greatest wastes in Australia and in Canada is the development of desert areas caused by the destruction of the sod on large sections of land. If the cattle industry were restored to its proper prominence in Canada and proper rotations introduced on cultivated land, this waste would be stopped. Our capital depends upon soil fertility more than on any other factor. If the fertility of the soil is destroyed, our cheap food of to-day will be dear to-morrow. At present we hear about a surplus of foodstuffs, but many economists believe that we are heading for a time when there will not be any too much for the world's needs. To-day farmers are in trouble for lack of markets, and in the virgin areas little attention has been paid to conserving the fertility of the land. We have had a great number of "soil miners."

Mr. MICHAUD: Gold diggers.

Mr. HAYHURST: They are gold diggers on the surface. They are using up the best of the soil and our capital is being lost. Whatever the base of our money, it is ultimately based on the productive capacity, the real value of our great dominion. Yet we are actually making deserts, and that is the greatest waste in Canada to-day. So, when talking about live stock production or any agricultural production, we must remember that it depends upon soil fertility, and not waste that fertility, which is our country's capital. Another great waste is the wasted organic matter. One need not go far in western Canada in the fall, after the threshing season is over, to see a lurid glow on the horizon from the burning straw piles. Much of that vegetable matter should be returned to the soil. We have many agricultural experts in the Department of Agriculture who could probably give ideas of more value than my rambling remarks. But what we want is results; we want the experts to see that this waste is stopped.

The hon. member for Portage la Prairie spoke of marketing. I was going to read a statement about marketing by Viscount Lymington. He said:

> The profit and costs taken by the distributor mean that so much less food is consumed than should be consumed, that prices are forced down still more owing to what is wrongly called "the world surplus of production."

The idea briefly is that the extent of the spread in prices between what the farmer gets and what the consumer has to pay actually lessens consumption. We know that if one orders a beefsteak in the dining car on the train, one has to pay as much for it as the farmer gets for two bushels of wheat. Consequently this great spread in prices is probably the greatest waste we have in the distribution process in Canada to-day. The removal of that waste should improve our agricultural well-being, raise the standard of living in Canada and benefit our farming industry.

Whatever type of animal we are raising, the first thing to be stressed is quality. Then we must have a comprehensive marketing plan both in Canada and abroad. Both eastern and western Canada will benefit by such a marketing scheme. I do not know whether the hon. member for Portage la Prairie meant that we should give the provinces more control of our cattle and hog raising industries, but we should see that the very best products possible are produced. Then, with our advertising campaign, we should be able to compete with the products of Ireland or Denmark on the British market, and instead of the British people thinking that the best bacon is Danish they will know that the best bacon is Canadian.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): This resolution of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) has the support of this group. We believe that a committee such as suggested by this resolution would serve a useful purpose. The resolution is broad and general; it relates to "the Canadian live stock industry in all its phases, and with special reference to the production"—that I think was well covered by the mover—and the "sale and distribution of all live stock and live stock products."

Throughout the country there is a great deal of dissatisfaction regarding the sale and distribution of live stock and live stock products. The spread between what the producer receives and what the consumer pays cannot be understood by either the producer or the consumer. To-day we have two packing firms which together control some eighty-five per cent of the entire packing business of Canada. I know they deny that and say it is an overstatement; that if we took into account all the animals slaughtered in local abattoirs and slaughterhouses, that percentage would be greatly reduced; in fact they say it would be cut about in half. But I just draw this to the attention of the house, that after all the price is set, not by the animals slaughtered in local slaughterhouses, but by the animals marketed on the big markets where the packers, because of lack of competition, are practically able to set the price. The price spreads committee made the statement that two companies controlled eighty-five per cent of that business. So it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this house would be well advised to set up a committee to deal with the matter suggested by the mover of the resolution and to carry on from where the price spreads committee left off in that regard.

We have heard from the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hayhurst) something about the marketing of our products in Great Britain. When I was at my old home there several years ago, we had visiting us a gentleman who had been in Canada for thirty years, whom I had known here and who had gone back to live in Scotland. When we had Danish bacon for breakfast I suggested that Canadian bacon was good, but this gentleman remarked that Canadian bacon did not compare with the Danish product. The next day I bought some Canadian bacon and took it home to my mother, and I remember that we found it to be quite inferior to the bacon they were accustomed to use. There must be some reason for that. I believe in latter years that condition has been improved owing to the fact that, as I am told, our packing firms are following the example of Denmark and shipping the sides to Great Britain, curing them there to a certain extent.

I think this resolution is worthy of the support of all hon. members, and I hope that when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) speaks, he will agree to the setting up of such a committee. I have risen on behalf of this particular group simply to say that we shall be glad to give the proposal all our support.

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say anything on this resolution, but because of its importance I think I must trespass on the goodwill of the house for a few moments to support the proposal of my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader). I am only sorry that it was not brought in during an earlier session of parliament, because it opens up a broad field. My hon. friend took something over his allotted time to discuss the subject, but I believe he only touched the fringe of it. There is so much to be said and so much to be considered in connection with this matter that I do not believe any committee could make a thorough review of all the aspects and phases of the live stock industry, including production and marketing, unless it worked practically every day.

I think we all agree that the live stock industry is not in a flourishing condition at the present time. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hayhurst) said live stock was the backbone of agriculture. So it is. If we are to maintain the fertility of our farms it is important that we keep a certain number of live stock. This is a most important branch of agriculture; I believe it stands fourth in the matter of returns to the farmers. In the nine years from 1930 to 1938 the value of farm animals produced in Canada was $1,046,000,000. If one adds to that the value of the wool produced, amounting to $18,000,000, and of the poultry and eggs produced, amounting to $482,000,000, one has a grand total of $1,547,000,000, only about $10,000,000 less than the value of our wheat production, about which so much is said in this house. So live stock is a very important industry in Canada, and anything that can be done to strengthen its position and put it on a more profitable basis should and, I believe, will have the support of all members of this house.

My hon. friend who introduced the resolution dealt principally with cattle, but that is only one phase of the live stock industry. We have cattle, horses, sheep, swine and poultry, all of which contribute largely to the revenues of our farmers, and each of which is important in itself. We have some 728,000 farmers in this country, and I believe over half of them derive a considerable proportion of their income from live stock. That means we have over 350,000 units producing live stock in Canada. Because we have all these small units it necessarily follows that they must be serviced. The live stock which they produce must be collected, killed, processed and distributed. During the last quarter century the character of these services has greatly changed. As time goes on, a much larger proportion of our live stock is being slaughtered in abattoirs, which involves increased costs in connection with freight, processing and distribution. For some reason or another these services seem to be continually widening the spread between producer and consumer prices, and I believe, if this committee functions, something should be done in the way of making a particular study of this question, because it seems to me that the spread has become rather too wide, so that it is interfering not only with the price the consumer has to pay but also with the return to the farmer.

After all, Mr. Speaker, we export a very small proportion of our live stock production. In 1937 we exported some seventeen per cent of our cattle, twenty-five per cent of our hogs, less than one per cent of our sheep, and 1·9 per cent of our poultry and poultry products. In all, we exported some eleven or twelve per cent of our live stock products, but the unfortunate thing is that it is the export price which largely determines what the farmer will receive for his cattle and other live stock. It seems to me that question should be considered carefully, because this does not appear to be a fair or sound basis upon which to set live stock prices in Canada.

The matter has been mentioned already, but I should like to say something in regard to the way in which our bacon is marketed in Great Britain. Unfortunately it does not command a comparable price with bacon from other countries. I have before me the weekly market report of February 23, giving the comparative prices of bacon in Great Britain, and unfortunately Canada is lowest of all. The price for a long hundredweight of Canadian bacon ranges from eighty-five to ninety-two shillings, while Danish bacon ranges from ninety-one to 100 shillings and English bacon from ninety to 100 shillings. The bacon more nearly in line with Canadian bacon is Baltic bacon, the price of which ranges from eighty-four to ninety-two shillings per hundredweight. Something should be done about this situation. It is most unfortunate that we in Canada, producing so many hogs of extra good quality, should be forced to take the prices we are taking to-day in the market of Great Britain, our chief market for our exportable surplus.

Something has been said about the price spreads commission. I can remember that before that commission Mr. Stanley McLean, head of Canada Packers, told us that the price which we receive for Canadian bacon in England is the chief determining factor in the price the farmer receives for his hogs. I believe if we were to send over a better quality of bacon, and bacon of more uniform quality, we would help the farmer materially in the price he receives for his hogs.

A good deal has been said about production. I fully agree with the hon. member who introduced the resolution when he says that our beef cattle are not as good as they should be. Of course we have many good herds, but if an hon. member were to go to the Toronto stock-yards he would find nondescript cattle there for sale. The prices received for these poorer grades of cattle have a tendency to reduce the price of cattle throughout the dominion, because the same thing is true not only at the Toronto stock-yards but at Winnipeg and other points.

Something was said by one hon. member about canning our old dairy cows. That might be one solution of the problem, but I believe we could very well afford to establish a fund to take off the markets altogether those old dairy cows and the cheaper trash appearing on the markets. I believe if we did that we would go a long way toward improving the prices the farmer receives for his cattle.

I said at the beginning I did not intend to speak at length, but may I say this one further word: Too often the farmer's products do not flow on to the market in the right proportions. There are certain periods of the year when hogs, particularly, flow to the markets very rapidly. At other times in the year the packers cannot get enough to supply their requirements. Something should be done to control this situation, and I do not believe it will ever be done unless the Department of Agriculture undertakes it. Farmers cannot very well get together in the matter and regulate the flow of their hogs to the market. I have heard it said that there are times, particularly in the spring and fall, when the hogs are coming out so rapidly the abattoirs are unable to handle them, and they are left in pens for three or four days. As a result they fail in flesh; there is considerable shrinkage; they have to be fed and, naturally, when the abattoir has an over-supply it is not inclined to pay the price it might otherwise pay if some sort of regimentation were carried out, and the farmers could be induced to bring their hogs along more evenly throughout the year.

Something was said about the law of supply and demand governing our prices. It seems to me there must be some correlation of that law of supply and demand, if it is to govern. In my view that, too, is the duty of our Department of Agriculture. I say that because unless something is done by way of setting up a marketing board, or of setting up some method of cooperative marketing, we are not going to solve the farmers' price problem, which after all is the most serious one with which he is faced.

I have said before, and I now repeat, that if the farmer is given a reasonable price for his product we need not worry about his producing the goods. He will produce them in quantity and quality. As long as he does not get a reasonable price he will be discouraged. The effect at the present time is that he is not producing as he should produce, and is not taking the care he should take.

I believe the resolution is worthy of the support of the house. I repeat that I am sorry it was not brought in at a former session, because if the matter is to be thoroughly investigated by a committee, undoubtedly such investigation could not be completed before the end of the session when it would be too late for the government to take action on any suggestions the committee might make.

Mr. C. R. EVANS (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say only a few words with respect to the live stock policy in the debate on the resolution presented to the house by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader). May I say at the outset that he deserves a great deal of credit for presenting in an able manner the difficulties live stock breeders are having in marketing their product, and the trouble they are having in controlling the breeding of good beef cattle. I agree with him to this extent, that we should breed good beef cattle—not to quantity, but to quality. In Saskatchewan in the past two or three years our herds have been reduced. May I say to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that at the present time in Saskatchewan we have a situation which offers to his department and to the department in Regina an opportunity to supervise the replacement of herds, and particularly the breeding stock, in southern Saskatchewan, so that we may breed a quality of cattle which will meet the demands of the beef market.

In the short time I shall take I should like to direct my remarks more particularly to the live stock industry in Saskatchewan. That portion of the province I have the honour to represent is particularly adapted to the raising and producing of good live stock, including cattle, horses, sheep and hogs.

For the past number of years the ranchers in southwestern Saskatchewan have endeavoured to develop their herds to meet the market demands for first quality beef. In that part of the province I believe we have some of the best herds of white-faced cattle to be found anywhere on the north American continent. I have in mind one particular herd owned by a large rancher. This ranch straddles the border of Saskatchewan and Alberta and consists of about 10,000 or 12,000 head of cattle, and I would say for the last fifteen or twenty years they have been using the best males money could buy, in white-faced cattle. To-day the herd is possibly as good as any pure bred herd on the north American continent, although they are not registered.

Two years ago from the town of Maple Creek we marketed something like 16,000 head of cattle. About 2,000 of these were marketed under the emergency policy of the federal Department of Agriculture, but the balance were either beef or store cattle which were shipped to eastern Canada. I was particularly interested in one shipment that went to the maritime provinces. The gentleman who bought these cattle came out west in the latter part of 1937 when the store cattle had been nearly all shipped out, and there was nothing left but spade heifers. Many of the feeders in eastern Canada, particularly in that portion of the maritime provinces from which he came, did not know anything about this class of cattle. I went out with him to a rancher who had, in a feeding lot, about 200 head of this particular kind of cattle, and he chose a carload of twenty-eight head, which was shipped to Truro, Nova Scotia. I asked him to keep in touch with me and let me know the success of the shipment. Later on I received word that these cattle had fed out satisfactorily and had been shipped overseas.

When the herds in Saskatchewan were reduced in 1937, there were 508,000 head of all classes of cattle shipped out, and under the federal marketing policy, about 74,000 head. There were a lot of immature and what is commonly known as scrub cattle taken out of the province. Naturally this left the best type of cattle in the hands of the farmers and ranchers. Under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act the federal government has been setting up community pastures in the drought areas, and in 1937 many of these small ranchers and farmers will keep their best cattle in these pastures. As the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) has said, under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act there were purchased twenty pure bred bulls last year to be put in these community pastures for the production of a better class of live stock.

The federal bull loaning policy is in operation in Saskatchewan, and the hon. member for Portage la Prairie has already given the number of pure bred sires that have been put out during the years this policy has been in operation. From 1933 to 1938 there have been put out under the federal bull loaning policy in Saskatchewan, 371 shorthorns, 116

Herefords, forty Aberdeen-Angus, three red poll and one Holstein. It is interesting to note that under the emergency policy of 1937, the greatest number of scrub and inferior cattle came from those areas where dairying was being carried on. The better class of cattle came from the ranching areas in the southwest which breed particularly white-faced cattle. As the hon. member for Portage la Prairie has stated, this is the best class of beef cattle, together with shorthorns and black-poll Angus.

Then we have in operation in Saskatchewan what is known as the pure bred sire areas act, which came into force in 1927. This act becomes operative on the application by a municipality that the area within that municipality become what is known as a pure bred sire area. The act covers bulls, stallions, boars and rams, and stipulates that the animals used in the particular municipality shall be pure breds and come up to a certain standard. In the case of the hog and sheep families, good sires may be used which are not pure breds. There are sixty-nine municipalities in the province operating under this act, and very good results have been obtained in the ten years it has been in operation. However, there have been set-backs because of the drought.

We also have in that province a company which will loan a certain amount of money to a farmer with which to buy a good type of female for the production of beef. This company is known as the Dominion Agricultural Credit Association, and it operates in the three prairie provinces. They have inspectors who go out to choose the females for breeding purposes, and also to inspect the farm and ranch where the females are to be kept to see that there is proper water, shelter and feed. Credit is extended to the farmer or rancher for a period of three years, and payments are made from the production of the animal.

We hear a great deal about the exporting of beef, and I should like to refer briefly to this matter. We had some experience in this regard in the southwestern part of the province in 1933 and 1934, and the results were not very satisfactory. I notice from the statistics of the Department of Agriculture that in 1933 we exported to Great Britain a little over 50,000 head of cattle. The exports in 1934 numbered 53,000 head. My experience is that this is not the best way to export our beef. For example, I know of two cars containing fifty-six head which were shipped in 1934. These cattle were of the same breed as those raised by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie. They were a splendid type of animal weighing about 1,280 pounds. They were billed through from my home town to Montreal, from which point they were to be shipped to Birkenhead, England. When they were inspected at Winnipeg, one steer was taken out because it showed signs of lump-jaw. This animal was sold on October 14 and brought $27.50. The other fifty-five head went through to Birkenhead where they were sold, but the rancher received only $17.50 a head, compared with the $27.50 he received in Winnipeg for the steer showing lump-jaw.

I agree with the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) and the hon. member for Portage la Prairie when they say that it would be much better to have our steers slaughtered at the sea port and shipped as fresh killed beef. In that way we could distribute our shipments over the year to much better advantage than we can when shipping the live steers. The low prices that the rancher and beef breeder received for their cattle in 1934 resulted in our shipping to the old country in 1935 only 6,704 head of cattle.

I should now like to say a few words on the horse industry. In the portion of the province from which I come, many horses of various types and classes are raised on the ranches. We have a good type of heavy draft horse, but apparently the western horse does not meet the demands of the eastern market to the extent we should like. I think there might be some way of having supervision of the marketing of our western horses.

We also have in southwestern Saskatchewan an association known as the Hunter and Saddle Association, of which we have a breeding station at Shaunavon and another at Maple Creek. The association is given assistance by the federal Department of Agriculture, which supplies a thoroughbred stallion to each breeding station. This service has been in operation for about ten years with satisfactory results. Last year at the Hunter and Saddle show at Shaunavon and Maple Creek some splendid animals were shown, and some of them changed hands to eastern buyers at satisfactory prices. I would commend to the minister that assistance be continued in this type of breeding in Saskatchewan, and I should also like to see some assistance given in a horse marketing policy in the province of Saskatchewan.

I am quite prepared, Mr. Speaker, to support the resolution of my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie, asking for a committee to investigate the marketing and production of live stock.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a couple of minutes to say that I support the resolution, largely because of what I think a study by a committee of this house would lead to. I believe, if a group of members studied the live stock problem in all its phases, both domestic and foreign, it would inevitably come to the conclusion that we had to have commodity marketing and a more comprehensive marketing scheme, and the sooner we come to that conclusion the better, not only for the live stock industry but for all farmers. Further, a study would bring to light such facts as would tend at least to lead to the organization of producers. As a matter of fact, they could not take advantage of a marketing scheme until they were organized as commodity groups, though at the rate the government is moving towards marketing they will have plenty of time to organize. But undoubtedly a study would lead to further light on the subject, and the farmers are themselves coming to the conclusion that commodity organization and a comprehensive marketing scheme are necessary.

Then I think a committee would also lead to the conclusion, as the price spreads inquiry did, that we need cooperative or publicly owned processing plants.

A comprehensive study would also bring us to the conclusion that we cannot allow domestic prices to be set by very small surpluses, and in that regard I think we shall have to take a leaf out of the manufacturer's book. He has always sold his surplus abroad at lower prices than he got in the home market. Even though the transportation charges might be very high, his surplus was sold in foreign countries for very much less than at home. I think we are coming close to the time of a two-price agriculture, and anything that will hasten the day of better prices for domestic consumption will be welcomed by our farmers.

Such a study I think would also convince Ontario people and the east generally that the thing that would be most disastrous to eastern farmers would be for western farmers to go into mixed farming in a big way, that when they go into cattle production in a big way it is a sad day for Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes. It would affect Ontario very much, and such a study by the committee might get the idea over to Ontario farmers, including one very prominent one who happens to be premier at the moment. It is time we understand that any change from wheat to general farming in western Canada is going to involve eastern Canada in an entirely new set of problems added to those they already have. So, while it does look like a pretty large order a special committee could get started at all events, and it may be that if this is not the last session of this parliament, and there are now some signs that this is true, if the committee does not get finished this year, it could continue its labours next year. At any rate the sooner we start, the sooner we get through, and the sooner we may get results.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, a year ago the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) suggested that a committee be appointed to study the marketing of live stock and the live stock question generally. At that time I suggested to him that a study was being made of the situation existing in relation to live stock production and live stock marketing, and that we hoped during this session of the house to bring down certain legislation. This year the hon. member placed his resolution on the order paper early in the session, and I intimated to him at that time that we had certain legislation under preparation and almost ready for introduction, but suggested to him that it would still be well to have this matter discussed in order that the views of different members might be placed before the government before the legislation was introduced.

I would have no objection, and the government, I am sure, would have none, to a committee of the house being appointed to study this matter, if it is thought advisable to do so; but I should like to suggest that a few days be allowed to pass until that legislation is introduced, and then if it does not meet the situation as members desire to have it met, we can still go on with an investigation by a committee of this house.

There have been some questions raised tonight as to which I should probably say a word or two before eleven o'clock. One of them has to do with the trial shipments we have made this year to the Smithfield market in Great Britain. As has been stated by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie and others, the type of beef which is being sent over is what is known as baby beef; that is, beef which dresses around 450 pounds. We have been sending over twenty-five head a week.

A year ago it was suggested that this beef be killed at the seaboard, and some of our friends from the eastern provinces, the maritimes particularly, suggested that we might select that beef in the maritime provinces. At that time I think I was able to indicate that marketings in the maritime provinces were so small that it would be impossible for us to select the type of beef we required in any of the marketings that are made in the maritime provinces. As a matter of fact, during the summer we had considerable difficulty in selecting, even on the Toronto market, the twenty-five head of the type required by the Smithfield market, and there were, I think, three weeks, in succession, in the middle of the summer—I am speaking from memory—during which we were unable to find, on the Toronto market, the twenty-five head of what are known as baby beef. We had therefore to send over twenty-five head of heavies. Those heavies did not bring us so good a price as the Scottish beef, and they did not compete with the Scottish beef.

The lighter type of animal, fed to market at the younger age, is in great demand on the British market now, as it has been for some years. This is because of the fact that in Britain, as in this country, many of the younger members of the family, when they reach the age of eighteen to twenty, leave home and are not to be found in the home circle. A larger and larger percentage of the homes in British cities, as in Canadian cities, are today occupied by two or three people. Two or three people do not want big cuts of beef. In the old days the habit was to cook large roasts and to have them as cold meat at succeeding meals, but that is not the practice today. With electric heating and cooking and all that kind of thing, the smaller roast is required by a considerable percentage of those who are eating meat in the old country. For that reason they prefer the smaller type of animal, well finished. It is that demand which made it possible to sell twenty-five head of what are known as baby beef on the British market week by week throughout the past year, and to get the very best results and the very best satisfaction from the selling.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the minister, is the government making some allowance to the packers for the parts which they do not ship to the old country? They do not ship the whole carcase. What allowance is being made for the parts they do not ship?

Mr. GARDINER: There are what are known as short sides which are shipped to the old country, partly because the demand is much greater for that section of the cut, and partly for the reason given by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, that the facilities to ship full sides, both in the railway cars on this side and by boat to the old country, are not such as allow for shipping of the full side of beef. The prices that are actually allowed to the packer I am not able to give at the moment.

Mr. MacNICOL: In view of the fact that only part of the beef is shipped over, does the government bonus the packer for the part that is kept at home?

Mr. GARDINER: Not because of that fact. It would be absolutely impossible for a profit to be made on twenty-five head of any kind of beef shipped weekly to the old country. The only thing which has been proven by these shipments is the fact that they can be shipped; that they can be landed in Great Britain in good shape and that they can be sold at the top of the market. If we can increase that shipment and sale to, say a thousand head a week, probably there would be no difficulty whatsoever about making a profit on it, but with only twenty-five head that is not possible.

I should like just to read to the house a statement which came over from the old country from Modern Meat Marketing, a journal of the United Kingdom, in regard to these shipments. This is under date January, 1939:

> Easily the best beef of any description yet seen at Smithfield within the memory of the oldest trader at Smithfield was a consignment of 44 short and six long sides of Canadian fresh beef on the stand of Messrs. W. Burchnall, Ltd., during the Christmas market, writes "Buyer." Although I was early on the scene, I was unable to secure a side and was not surprised to learn that the short sides fetched 6s. to 6s. 4d. per stone—8d. per stone more than the best Scotch beef then on offer—and that the long sides made 5s. 8d. per stone. The finish was excellent, with not an ounce of waste, and it was a great pity that our fat stock show judges were not present in force to inspect what was undoubtedly a triumph of good breeding and wise feeding.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask one further question?

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to wind up at eleven o'clock.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is in reference to the Scottish beef. Was that the short side or the full side?

Mr. GARDINER: I assume that most of the Scottish beef that would be there would be the full side, but the cuts referred to are comparable. There is another statement from Lieutenant-Colonel T. Dunlop Young, who makes inspections at the market, which is just as important.

The other remark I wish to make with regard to it is this, that we have under way at present a policy which had its beginnings, as has been stated by some hon. members from the west, in our pastures in the west. We are attempting to raise or breed a type of beef on these western pastures which could be properly finished, if necessary in Ontario stables and even in maritime stables, and shipped to the old country market. The killing facilities at the coast are not just what are required at the present time in order to give the best service, but I am sure that those can be provided if we have the stock in the east sufficiently close to the abattoirs when they are finished to make shipment from there rather than to have it made from Toronto. But these shipments that have been made have been all from Toronto, and they have worked out to good advantage.

Just one word with regard to shipments of bacon. I have here a graph which, if all hon. members of the house could see it, would enable them perhaps to realize fully the chief reason why it is there is such a variation in price in pork and particularly in bacon in this country. If the Danish people did the same thing which this graph indicates; that is, if they allowed the marketings to start at this particular level and run down to this lower level in the middle, and then run up to this level in the fall of the year, they would get exactly the same price results we are getting in Canada. If I had the time I could read to the house the marketings of the different months of the year which are illustrated by the graph.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why not put them on Hansard?

Mr. GARDINER: They could be placed on Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the permission of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. GARDINER: There are two columns of figures, the one giving marketings in thousands and the other giving prices, for 1938, and also for 1937. It will be seen that the prices remained almost at a level during 1937, when the marketings were pretty well leveled out, but in 1938, when the marketings were not at all leveled out, the prices varied greatly, from $8.28 in January to $11.83 in July, and back to $8.56 in December.

These facts among others must be taken into account when considering why it is that our prices run up and down. I have a great deal of sympathy for the suggestion made by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail), but even a marketing set-up based on commodity production would not bring the results that are obtained in Denmark unless we market our products in the same way as they do in Denmark. Their pork and bacon production in that country is absolutely under control of a cooperative. The cooperative owns all the hogs; they allow people to feed them only if they feed them properly; they dictate what they are to be fed, and how much; they determine when they are going to market them, and when they are ready to go to market they kill them in abattoirs which are under their control, load them in boats which are their own, put them in compartments properly fitted up for the shipment of bacon, send them to Great Britain, and keep control of them until they are actually placed on the market. Anyone who knows conditions in Denmark and compares them with conditions in this country knows that it will be a long time before any country as widely spread as the Dominion of Canada, with all the varying conditions we have here, can emulate what is being done in Denmark. Nevertheless we can do a great deal to assist.

Last summer I had the privilege of visiting the home of Andrew Anderson, who is farming at Innisfail, Alberta. If anyone wants to see a real basis for the solution of our hog problem in Canada he should visit that farm. I think Mr. Anderson is a Dane; he is either a Dane or a Norwegian; he has been farming there for a considerable time. I dropped in at his place last summer. He was then busy equipping a pig house in which he hoped to have pigs born in every month of the year. He had a heating plant in it, and had it fitted up so that he could have his pigs coming in every month. I said to him, "Does it pay to do that kind of thing?" "Well," he said, "it would not pay me to do anything else," and he said, "probably it would not pay me as much as it does pay me if everybody else in Canada did what I was trained to do before I came to this country, namely, have hogs to sell every month of the year. Having hogs to sell each month, I can make good money feeding at the price at which we can obtain feed in this western country." I think that is the basis for a solution. We can investigate the question from now until doomsday; but if we just place the emphasis on the fact that someone in the packing plant is trying to get an advantage over us, and we do not play our own part in trying to see that the hogs are produced in the proper way and at the right time, we shall never accomplish for agriculture in this country what it is possible for us to accomplish.

I suggest that, if the hon. member who introduced the resolution has no objection, it might now be withdrawn. It has, I think, served a very good purpose. Legislation will be brought down; and if that legislation does not meet fully with the approval of hon. members we can give consideration in a very few days' time to the suggestions contained in the resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: By consent of the house, the hon. member may have leave to withdraw his motion.

Mr. LEADER: In view of the statement made by the minister, I think it advisable to withdraw the resolution.

Motion withdrawn.

At 11.05 the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, February 28, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

THE LATE J. W. RUTHERFORD

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will have learned with deep regret of the death, last night, of the member for Kent, Ontario, Doctor James W. Rutherford.

While death, when it occurs, seems to take us by surprise, in the case of Doctor Rutherford, the surprise is that having met with the very serious accident he did, in September, 1935, he continued to live as long as he did. Only a very brave and resolute spirit could have endured the physical suffering he endured for so long a time and have risen above it to the extent that on occasions he did. Death to the doctor meant release from suffering borne with the utmost patience and fortitude over three and a half years.

The personnel of the House of Commons has so largely changed in recent years that I doubt if there are, in its membership at the present time, one-fifth of those who were members of parliament at the time Doctor Rutherford himself became a member in 1926. The accident with which the Doctor met occurred in the course of the electoral campaign of 1935. It deprived him of further personal participation in the elections, and deprived him also of the opportunity of taking his seat in the present parliament, save on one occasion when, during the last session, he made an appearance in a wheel chair for a day or two in this house.

Many hon. members, therefore, will have had little or no acquaintance with Doctor Rutherford, and will be unable to appreciate, as those of us who knew him in the years he sat in the Commons between 1926 and 1935, how great is the loss suffered by the constituency he represented, by the public life of our country, and by his profession because of the injuries which brought prematurely to its close a career which had already been marked by many achievements, and gave promise of long continued personal and public service.

Doctor Rutherford's life associations were with the western portion of the province of Ontario and more immediately with the county of Kent in which he was born in 1875, and with the city of Chatham at whose public schools and collegiate institute, he received his early education, and where the greater part of his life was spent. He was a graduate of the university of Toronto. He pursued post-graduate studies in medicine at University College, London, England. Doctor Rutherford soon came to be recognized as a leading physician and surgeon in western Ontario, and at the time of his membership in this house was looked upon as one of the leading surgeons in our country. In the choice of his profession, Doctor Rutherford followed and was, no doubt, inspired by the example of his father who, for half a century, had practised medicine in Chatham.

Doctor Rutherford's popularity in the county of Kent was evidenced by his selection as one of the candidates in the general election of 1925, by his election to parliament in 1926, and his re-election at the general elections of 1930 and 1935.

Recalling the part which he took in the proceedings of this house in the two preceding parliaments, and the position he had come to occupy in his profession, I can only express the regret which I know will be shared by all, that one whose life was so wholly devoted to the well-being of others, so eminently useful and skilful, should have been brought to its close in circumstances so tragic.

Doctor Rutherford's loss will be particularly felt by the Liberal party of which, in the province of Ontario, he was recognized as a foremost member. In his passing the government suffers the loss of one of its ablest supporters, and many of us, the loss of one who was the most loyal and devoted of friends.

The sympathy of hon. members will go out, in full measure, to Mrs. Rutherford and to her son and daughter who, during the past three and a half years, have suffered so much in the way of anxiety and have now lost to sight the one who throughout their lives had been the centre of their affections.

We may look, I know, to His Honour the Speaker to convey to Mrs. Rutherford and the others who have been so greatly bereaved, the expression of our deepest sympathy.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I join with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in expressing to the family of the late Doctor Rutherford, the sympathy of our party. Whenever on these painful occasions one rises to pay tribute to some member who has gone, unconsciously a thought as to the high mortality rate of the House of Commons comes to one's mind. Only a few weeks ago we were speaking about the deaths of David Beaubier and Samuel Jacobs, one from each side of the house, and Doctor Rutherford is the third member whose loss we mourn in this early part of the session.

Naturally, I did not have the opportunity of knowing Doctor Rutherford as intimately as my right hon. friend and the party opposite, but the little I did know of him was to his credit. Like the late David Beaubier, of whom I spoke a few weeks ago, he did not take part in debate in the house as frequently as some of the rest of us. But I have often wondered if perhaps those of us who speak so frequently render as much service as those who speak less. Doctor Rutherford certainly bore a good reputation as a member of the various committees upon which he served, and as one who looked after the interests of his constituents and carried out whatever other duties devolved upon him as a member of the House of Commons.

If I may be permitted to say so, many times in the house I have been struck with the fact that men who originally have been trained as medical practitioners have given valuable service in the House of Commons. I have come to the conclusion that a medical training affords a splendid mental development for the work of the house. Doctor Rutherford was certainly no exception in that respect; he always gave the service expected of him.

I should like to join sincerely indeed with my right hon. friend and the party to which he belongs in expressing sympathy to that party upon its loss of another outstanding member, and I would join with him and other hon. members of the house in passing on, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the family of Doctor Rutherford, our deep sympathy.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, hon. members in the group to which I belong would like to join with the others in expressing through you our sympathy to Mrs. Rutherford and the family in the loss which they have sustained.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as hon. members in this group had no opportunity of knowing Doctor Rutherford, except by report and from the one day during which he so bravely sat in the house and showed he was able to endure suffering with calmness and fortitude, it seems to me it is fitting that we should associate ourselves with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his eloquent and fitting tribute. We desire, sir, that you remember us when you extend to the bereaved family the consolations of the house.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, Doctor James Warren Rutherford was one of the most adroit and the most skilful surgeons not only of the province of Ontario but of the whole of Canada. He had a large practice, and his career as a practitioner was very brilliant. He performed so many operations which were considered as miracles in modern surgery that his name was respected and honoured by the heads of the medical profession on the whole north American continent.

It was at first a great sacrifice for him to enter into politics. Until then he had given all his time to his numerous patients, who were so dear to him. But he was a man of deep convictions. He was a true Canadian of Scotch ancestry, and a Liberal at heart.

He was a strong believer in the necessity of promoting Liberal ideals and Liberal policies for the welfare of his fellow countrymen. From 1926 to 1935 he divided his time between attending to his large practice and attending to the sittings of the House of Commons. His colleagues who had the privilege of knowing him intimately during that period will always cherish the most pleasant memory of his kindness, of his discreet humour, of his wisdom, and of his everlasting friendship.

While campaigning in the last general election he was the victim of an unfortunate accident. He was in the hospital, for the first time as a patient, when he learned that he had again been elected by a large majority. Then the suggestion was made to him to resign his seat in favour of some one else. He refused, saying that death only could break the happy association with parliament, which he prized so much. Last year he came to the house on a wheel chair, to attend a debate in which he was particularly interested.

If I may be permitted to add a few personal recollections, I would say that it was he who invited me to speak, for the first time outside of Ottawa, in Ontario. The occasion was in April, 1932, at the annual meeting of the Ontario Women's Liberal Association, which was held in his city, the beautiful maple city of Chatham. Mr. Hepburn spoke on that occasion. On the following day, in company with another dear friend of ours, Mr. Melville Rossie, editor of the London Advertiser, we went to speak at Lucan, where our friend from Middlesex East, Colonel Ross, also spoke. At that time Mr. Hepburn was apparently in very good health. I attended another meeting at Chatham on June 14, 1934, which was held in the armouries. On that occasion the hall was packed to capacity, and the two most prominent people in attendance were Mr. Hepburn and Doctor Rutherford who, in the meantime, had saved Mr. Hepburn's life. Mr. Hepburn will tell anyone that the fact he is still alive is due to the skilful operation performed by Doctor Rutherford.

I should like therefore to join with others who have spoken and to express my deep grief at the death of such a dear friend, one who was a great medical man, a great Liberal and a great Scotsman.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE

BIRTHDAY GREETINGS TO THE HON. MR. RINFRET

On the order for motions:

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I desire to thank the house for its cordial expression of goodwill, as shown by the applause with which I have just been greeted, on the occasion of my birthday anniversary. When one advances in years he realizes that he needs a little sympathy on occasions of this kind, and again I thank my fellow members of the house for what has been forthcoming to-day.

CIVIL SERVICE

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO TERMS AND OPERATION OF SUPERANNUATION ACT— FIRST REPORT

Mr. MALCOLM McLEAN (Melfort) presented the first report of the special committee appointed to inquire into the operation of the Civil Service Superannuation Act, as follows:

The special committee appointed to inquire into the operation of the Civil Service Superannuation Act begs leave to present the following as a first report:

Your committee recommends that it be granted leave to print from day to day 500 copies in English and 200 copies in French of its minutes of proceedings and evidence and that standing order 64 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort) moved that the report be concurred in.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Of course this motion should have notice. There are distinct rules of the house regarding printing, and I believe the time has come when we should scrutinize with great care the granting of permission to have stenographic reports made of committee proceedings. I think this is going beyond all reason. Years ago it used to be limited to specially interesting subjects, but to have a special Hansard for practically every committee, as is done now, I think is going too far. My opinion is that such requests as this should be referred to the committee on printing as to the advisability and, above all, the necessities of the case. I know nothing about the circumstances which have brought forth this motion, and I am objecting to it not for any particular reason, but rather on general principles.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I have considerable sympathy with the view expressed by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), it will be remembered that I raised the question in almost similar terms a year ago. There is not only the expense involved in providing complete Hansard reports of all committees, and the cost of printing; but the fact is that our available staff facilities were not sufficient to meet the demands which were made last session and are not sufficient to meet those which probably will be made this session. It is very difficult to discriminate as between committees. Last year we found that each committee insisted upon its proceedings being made a matter of record.

With regard to this committee, I am advised that the work done last session, which is a matter of record, very nearly completes what will be required by way of evidence. The nature of the matters being dealt with in this case I think justifies a record being made, because specific statements and calculations made by witnesses require to be a matter of Hansard record, particularly when they are not included in any submitted written document. I do not think there will be great difficulty with regard to this committee.

Mr. STEVENS: My remarks apply to all committees.

Mr. DUNNING: So far as the taking of evidence in this committee is concerned, the work is practically completed. If the committee is of the same mind as it was last year, I take it that from now on it will be a matter of the committee discussing what ought to be done in the light of the evidence. That will certainly not necessitate a Hansard record

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It is not anticipated that much printing will be required, outside of possibly the final report and one or two sessions of the committee. However, in order to have that little done, authority must be requested.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION

PETITION OF ST. JEAN BAPTISTE SOCIETY OF ST. EUSEBE RESPECTING IMMIGRATION

On the order for motions.

Mr. HERMAS DESLAURIERS (St. Mary's): Mr. Speaker, at the request of the St. Eusèbe parish section of the St. Jean Baptiste society and of a group of young people of that parish, I beg leave to lay on the table of the house a petition expressing their opinion respecting immigration.

FOREIGN POLICY

RECOGNITION OF FRANCO GOVERNMENT—PROTECTION OF DEFEATED GOVERNMENT FORCES AND REFUGEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) state the position of the government with regard to the recognition of the Franco government in Spain? Second, will the Canadian government press upon the British government and the other members of the League of Nations the need of securing from Franco guarantees as to the protection of defeated government forces and of refugees?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend, who was kind enough to give me notice of his motion, that the government is awaiting further information before arriving at a decision with respect to the recognition of General Franco; the British government has already taken up with General Franco the question of assurances against reprisals.

RADIO BROADCASTING

METHOD OF APPOINTING RADIO LICENCE VENDORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). He is not in his seat at the moment but perhaps the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will have it brought to his attention. It is in regard to the method of appointing radio licence vendors. I understand from letters I am receiving that the system is being changed in some way on April 1. I think it would be an advantage to all of us here to be told in what manner these radio licence vendors are to be appointed, whether by the government, by the radio corporation, or otherwise. I think the house should be made aware of any change that is to be made in that respect.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—ALLOCATION OF CATTLE QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (Wellington North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) a question with regard to the provisions of the trade agreement with the United States. I understand the government has officially requested the government of the United States of America to allocate the quota on heavy types of cattle for the remainder of this year, and I should like to know if a satisfactory reply has been received from the United States.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): As I stated during the debate on the resolution with regard to the trade agreement with the United States, negotiations were in progress between this government and the government of the United States in connection with the allocation of the quota on heavy cattle. Those negotiations were carried on by an official of the Department of Trade and Commerce and an official of the department of Agriculture. At the time I spoke on the matter an arrangement had been arrived at, but I was not in position then to make a statement. However, to-day I can say that the President of the United States has signed a proclamation allocating among countries of export the quantity of cattle weighing 700 pounds or more each, other than cows imported psecially for dairy purposes, entitled to enter the United States during the remainder of the year 1939 at the reduced duty of 1½ cents per pound provided for in the trade agreement.

In accordance with the provisions of the trade agreement the government of Canada officially requested the government of the United States of America to allocate the quotas on this type of cattle for the remainder of this calendar year. Article III of the trade agreement provides that the share allocated to Canada shall be based upon the proportion of the total imports supplied by Canada in past years, account being taken in so far as practicable in appropriate cases of any special factors which may have affected or may be affecting the trade in the article in question. After carefully considering all the factors and after consultation with the government of Canada, the president decided that imports during the years 1936 and 1937 are representative of imports of this class of cattle. Accordingly, the allocation for the remainder of the year 1939 is made on the basis of imports during the above years. This will give Canada 86·2 per cent of the quota and other countries 13·8 per cent. This means that the share of the quarterly quotas of 60,000 head allocated to Canada is 51,720 head. The allocation of the annual quota for the remainder of this year will be based on 225,000 head less the 60,000 head imported during the first quarter of the year, or a total of 165,000 head, of which the share allocated to Canada will amount to 142,230 head.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): This is just for the remainder of the year; it is not retroactive?

Mr. EULER: No, of course not.

Mr. MANION: In view of statements regarding the cattle quota, which has been discussed in the house on the basis appearing in the press release given out by the government, may I ask whether any other changes are being made with respect to the trade treaty? In other words, is the government at the present time negotiating with the United States government to make any other changes in regard to the treaty as a whole?

Mr. EULER: Not so far as I know. What is being done now is being done under the terms of the agreement.

Mr. MANION: I understand that.

CANADA-GERMANY—SHIPMENT OF UNITED STATES COMMODITIES TO GERMANY THROUGH CANADIAN PORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Considerable concern has been aroused in many quarters in British Columbia regarding shipments of dehydrated or dried apples through Canadian ports to Germany by United States exporters. Some suspicion has arisen in British Columbia over the recent shipment of some three thousand cases through British Columbia ports destined for Germany, it being felt that United States exporters might be taking advantage of the barter arrangements between Canada and Germany and that these shipments by United States interests may be going through as a portion of the Canadian quota.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, perhaps for purposes of clarity I might make a reference to the payments agreement to which my hon. friend (Mr. Reid) referred.

When the payments agreement, which was complementary to the trade agreement made with Germany in 1936, was concluded, the vital principle of it was that the German government obligated itself to provide exchange for the purchase of Canadian goods at least to the amount of all purchases made by Canada in Germany.

The government had its attention directed to a complaint that certain United States commodities, in this case dried apples, were imported into Canada in transit and re-exported to Germany, and the fear was that the amount of the shipment in money value would be charged against the amount of exchange that would be allocated for the purchase of Canadian goods. Accordingly, representations have been made through the Canadian government's trade commissioner at Berlin to the German authorities asking that payment for shipment of dried apples exported from Canada to Germany be not made from the funds accruing under the German-Canadian payments agreement unless the shipments carried a Canadian inspection certificate. Of course, the house will understand that no Canadian inspection certificate would be given for goods of American origin.

CANADA-UNITED STATES—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION FOR APPROVAL SUBJECT TO REQUIRED LEGISLATION

The house resumed from Friday, February 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King that the house go into committee on the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 17th day of November, 1938, between Canada and the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

Mr. J. A. GLEN (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, there will be discussed during this session subjects of importance which in themselves and in reference to their particular objects are a necessary part of the administration of Canada. There will be many subjects which will create excitement and discord, such as the Bren gun debate; but I think I am safe in saying that the subject of the present discussion, approval of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on November 17, 1938, between Canada and the United States of America, is of transcendent importance because of the magnitude of the items covered by the agreement and the fact that our agreement is linked with and closely related to the agreement signed on the same day between the United States and the United Kingdom. It must be a unique, or, more certainly, a rare occurrence in the history of nations that three great exporting and importing countries can find it possible in these troublous and fear-ridden days to sit down and after many days evolve a treaty for the exchange of products in a reasonable and practical manner, so reasonable and practical that each country knows and realizes and admits that concessions must be given by each in order that a reciprocal bargain may be concluded. To add to the difficulties these treaties had to recognize the provisions of existing agreements which required careful and thorough examination as to all the implications which the new agreement created.

In addition, the United Kingdom had to consult and obtain the cooperation of the other dominions—Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India—and Newfoundland, in order to complete its agreement with the United States. Likewise Canada had to obtain the consent of the United Kingdom and the Union of South Africa for the modification of guaranteed preferential margins. It will thus be seen that the whole treaty bristled with difficulties. It is difficult enough to complete an agreement with one country, but to complete a treaty involving a three-way agreement entered into by three countries, an agreement which having regard to the most favoured nation clause in the agreements of the three countries, involved other countries also, I regard as the most outstanding example of the tenacity and determination of the Prime Minister, thus to embody in legislation the policy of the Liberal party. If this government had done nothing except complete the agreement in 1935 with the United States and the present agreement, they have by so doing made the greatest contribution that has been made in Canada in the last nine years, towards the welfare of the common people. This government can say with truth that in that ever-forward march, of which this is the second major step, towards greater freedom of trade, they have been true to Liberal principles.

It is the custom to-day on the part of certain interests and individuals to decry and depreciate the government. They see in the legislation which has been enacted since 1935 a challenge to and a frustration of those hopes of privilege and power which for so long controlled the economics of the country. They see the trade of the country growing extensively and likely to expand more generously and become more widespread than ever before, and they fear the effect in the exclusive circles of privilege.

To-day we have an example in a paper published in Toronto, the Globe and Mail, of the extent to which a free press can descend, in the way of innuendo and wilful perversion. They print daily, set in double column, the heading, "What parliament has done", and, in brackets underneath, "January 12 to February 27, 1939—as condensed from Hansard", the second date in each case being the date of the particular issue. Under this heading a blank is left, and they expect that the citizens of this country will fill it in. Well now, this editor, the boy wonder of Toronto—and I hope Toronto will keep him—qualifies it and makes it read, "January 12 to February 17," not what this goverment has done since 1935, upon which surely any man with a sense of decency must judge the government. He does not say that the government has not done anything, but there is only one meaning he intends to convey, namely that the small blank space represents all its achievements.

It is true that the heading over this blank space is "What parliament has done", and therefore all parties in the house must share the blame. It is no wonder that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) rose in his place the other day to protest against this form of criticism, which after all is not very original, although Mr. McCullagh may think so. We have had that kind of criticism of all forms of government, be it school board, municipality, province or dominion. It is journalism of this kind which gives point to those who would seek to trammel and restrict and prohibit a free press. It is journalism of this kind which is the rule in the totalitarian states and which prohibits the publication of contrary views.

I would say that in no period of recent parliamentary history or even possibly in more remote times, has a secret or hidden motive so flagrantly transgressed the best traditions of journalism. If this paper, or rather this editor, wished to be fair, he might have stated some of the achievements of this government, which since taking office in October 1935 has successfully negotiated sixteen trade expansion arrangements with other countries. He might have stated that in the best year of the Bennett government, the year 1934-35, the external trade of Canada was valued at $1,286,000,000, while in 1937-38, under the present administration, despite the depression in the United States and a short Canadian wheat crop, the external trade of Canada was valued at $1,883,000,000, an improvement of $597,000,000, or forty-six per cent. He might have stated that as between those years our trade with Great Britain increased by $152,000,000, or thirty-seven per cent. Our trade in the same years with the United States increased by $292,000,000, or forty-six per cent; and our trade with the remaining countries increased in the same years by $143,000,000, or fifty-two per cent. These gains were not achieved by a government resting on its oars, but by intense and intensive effort, in the belief, which has been demonstrated, that the welfare of our dominion must depend more largely than any other effort of government upon the development of trade.

This editor might have stated that those treaties with the United States were completed at a time and in a period when they were most urgently needed. The first breach made by any country in the wall of world economic nationalism was made by this government. Without that 1935 agreement the present agreement could not have been consummated, and we would not now have had the most effective reply which has yet been made by the democracies to the dictator states.

This editor might have referred to the unemployment problem. If he has a scheme to cure it, we are all waiting eagerly to hear it. It might not be out of place to remind him that the United States, the richest country in the world, has not yet solved or cured it; that Great Britain has not solved it; that in fact the only country in the world which has less unemployment relative to its size and importance is Germany—and the reason is not far to seek. I do not need to tell that editor, nor do I need to say to the house, that it has been accomplished simply by the employment of men and women in the arsenals and in the army. I might suggest, and ask the editor of this paper, does he desire us to adopt the regimentation which will cure that unemployment? If he has any sense of logic he must be against that policy, to judge from the squawk he made when he was denied what he called free speech because the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation refused his request to use its facilities.

I should like also to point out that only ten days ago the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) stated that the government were ready and willing to go ahead with a measure of unemployment insurance if the three provinces which withheld their cooperation consented to its doing so. In fact, when the premier of Quebec doubted the sincerity of the government in this regard, the minister gave the direct challenge to the premier that he could easily test that sincerity by agreeing to the necessary amendment to the British North America Act.

On the question of unemployment and trade treaties I will quote very high authority Mr. Chamberlain, the Prime Minister of Britain, speaking at, I believe, Blackburn on February 23, had this to say:

> The Prime Minister declared that "even a slight improvement in trade generally does more to reduce unemployment than all the artificial remedies anyone has ever thought of, and it is a significant fact that the easing of international tension which made itself felt after the German chancellor's speech at the end of last month produced instantaneous improvement in the trade reports which come in to the government from all parts of the country."

I propose to deal later with the question of peace as this treaty affects it. But I should like also to say, and to point out to this editor, that there are a number of measures, all tending to alleviate the domestic ills of Canada, and all being furthered by the effects of a trade treaty such as has been negotiated. I shall give only the headings of them:

Closing of relief camps and placing of men in railway employment.

Farm improvement and employment plan.

Home improvement plan.

Youth training projects.

Prairie farm rehabilitation activities.

Improvement of national highways and national parks.

Development of roads into mining areas.

Financial aid to municipalities for self-liquidating public works.

National housing legislation.
Development of our ports.
Back to the land settlement.
Reestablishment of needy fishermen.
Harbour and waterway improvement.
Reforestation.
Special surveys of mineral areas.
Joint public works with provinces.

These are legislative enactments of this government which can come to fruition only if we have trade. In fact, I expect that when the cry of "do nothing" which has been raised against this government is dead—and it is almost dead, at all events nearing its last gasp—we shall find the editor and the opposition changing their cry and saying: Let us stop; we are surfeited with legislation.

Perhaps the editor will now have sufficient to fill up the little wee blank in his newspaper.

But before I leave the editor I should like to call his attention to some other facts. I understand that he is very much in favour of the unification of railways. All right: he carries that principle into effect so far that he has a unification of newspapers. I find from his own statement over the radio that the total investment in these two papers is six million dollars; the total revenue of the two in 1938 was $2,196,070 and the total expenses $2,174,835, leaving a net profit of $21,235. These figures do not include any allowance for depreciation, nor is it even recorded whether rent was paid for the splendid building which that paper now occupies. It is amazing that this gentleman, who proposes to lecture parliament and all its members on how to conduct the business of the country, can realize from the combination of these two papers a profit on his operations of only one-third of one per cent; and that, Mr. Speaker, in spite of the increased price to the purchasers of the papers he now sells. I find that in 1936 it cost our own library $5 for this newspaper; in 1937 it cost $6; in 1938 and at the present time it costs $7. Well, if there is an estimated circulation of 165,000 it is a safe guess that the public are now paying $400,000 for this unified paper. I do not know why there should be such an increase, but I do think that this editor ought to tell us just why these things should happen and why the people should pay an extra price for the paper. He who is asking that there shall be a reduction in taxation should also consider the fact that the consumer, that is, the reader, has to pay more for the paper under the unified system. Apparently he is in favour of unifying the railways, which he thinks is the best thing, but his experience so far in the unification of his own paper has not proved very profitable.

I will now leave that gentleman and quote an extract from a speech made by Lord Baldwin; after all it may hit the mark so far as this editor is concerned. Lord Baldwin has said:

> There is nothing more curious in modern evolution than the effect of an enormous fortune rapidly made, and the control of newspapers of your own. The three most striking cases are Mr. Hearst in America, Lord Rothermere in England, and Lord Beaverbrook. It seems to destroy the balance; the power of being able to suppress everything a man says that you do not like, the power of attacking all the time without there being any possibility of being hit back; it goes to the head like wine, and you find in all these cases attempts have been made outside the province of journalism to domineer—to blackmail. Mr. Hearst has tried for years to dominate American politics. He has failed every time.

There is another feature that I might call attention to, a singular result of this campaign. I was shown a number of envelopes containing coupons which an hon. member of this house received—not an hon. member from Toronto. The envelopes bore the Toronto, Ontario, postal terminal stamp and were all addressed in the same handwriting, but they were supposed to come from constituents in my hon. friend's riding. The block letters filling in the little blank were evidently made by the same hand. Whether the handwriting on the envelopes and the block letters were all done by the same hand I do not know but I have my suspicions. I prophesy that if and when the editor forms his leadership party he will find himself in mixed company. In fact, I should not be surprised if he enlisted all the elements present in the communist and fascist factions in Canada. These factions have been seeking places wherein to spread their propaganda, and here they can qualify actually within the leadership party of Mr. McCullagh.

An hon. MEMBER: Leaderless party.

Mr. GLEN: Very well, have it that way if you like. Their object is propaganda. At present they are not very numerous and not very popular in Canada, but they can qualify for membership in the leadership league, and with such fine motives and high ideals as must be adopted with such a leader they will have an opportunity to propagate their specious thoughts.

What has this government done in the way of increasing trade? I have said before that our economic ills can be, if not entirely at any rate immeasurably, lightened in this day and generation by one method only, and that is trade. I take no stock in the theories of the Social Credit group. Whatever merit they have, if any, cannot be applied in the trade world of to-day. They have to convert the world to their thoughts and they are not making very much headway in their own province of Alberta. The Commonwealth Co-operative Federation lightly dismiss the question of trade, but they will not dare vote against this resolution. The theory of national socialism is having a real trial in Germany and Italy and with so many rugged individualists in the party on the other side I am quite satisfied that in their hearts they know and recognize the value of trading, but they carefully restrain their enthusiasm; for that would mean giving credit to the government, which is not in their lexicon.

And now we come to the Tories. It is said that there is no difference between the Liberals and the Tories on tariffs. I humbly suggest that those who say so can hardly do so now with any degree of truth. That slogan is like the other one of which I spoke—if it is not dead it is certainly damned. There is evidence of that. In the year 1936 after the trade treaty came into effect there were reductions on 192 items and in 1937 there were reductions on 354. Surely that is a fair record. Going further, however, I find that not only has the government reduced the tariff rate on a great variety of items, but it has also transferred an appreciable number to the free list. Evidence of this is seen in the import figures for the fiscal year 1937-38, when out of a total of $799,069,000 worth of goods imported into Canada, $364,904,000 worth entered duty free; that is, 45 per cent of all the goods which entered Canada during the last fiscal year came in without having to pay duty.

My time is going fast and I must hurry to a conclusion, but I wish to deal with some things which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) has said. Some speakers have taken the position that to aver that these treaties have any bearing on the peace of the world is far-fetched. The leader of the opposition, on pages 1051 and 1056 of Hansard, devoted two columns to ridiculing this, and on page 1053 he said:

> I submit that the talk about this treaty as having anything whatever to do with world peace is simply what Mr. Oliver Stanley called it, "eyewash."

It is a pity that the leader of the opposition in the exuberance of his verbosity should utter such sentiments. In his position as leader of the opposition he is inclined to put the emphasis on the opposition and forget the leadership. I suggest that he should cultivate the virtues of understatement. He quoted with approval what Mr. Stanley said. Let me quote a greater authority. I have here a little book entitled Together We Stand, written by Leonard J. Reid, financial editor of the London Daily Telegraph, with a foreword by Viscount Horne, a former chancellor of the exchequer. This book tells of Mr. Reid's visit to the United States in 1937 and deals with trade relations and the psychology of the two peoples. It is quite apposite and apropos of this particular discussion. Referring to Mr. Reid, Viscount Horne says in the foreword:

> No more confident observer could have applied his mind to the problems of the present relations between America and Great Britain; and none could have obtained more adequate information. He has formed certain very definite impressions which he records in this book. It is interesting to observe, from statements in the public press, that Sir Josiah Stamp, who has newly returned from a tour in the United States of America, has arrived at conclusions practically identical in character with those disclosed in this treatise.

An on the second page of the foreword he says:

> A large section of American opinion has come to the conclusion that the prosperity of the United States depends in a considerable measure upon the extension of international trade, and the present administration is seeking means by which such trade can be fostered. The Secretary of State, Mr. Cordell Hull, is an ardent champion of this policy, and he is ably seconded by Mr. Wallace, who has preached with great persistency and unabated enthusiasm that the success of farming in the United States must depend upon the availability of export markets.

The leader of the opposition says that to talk of peace in connection with this agreement is "eyewash."

Mr. MANION: Oliver Stanley said that.

Mr. GLEN: Yes, but my hon. friend approved it. At page 28 Mr. Reid says:

> The government and the leaders of the business world in the United States, under the courageous lead and inspiration of Mr. Cordell Hull, the secretary of state, are now convinced that America's old economic policy of prohibitive tariffs and isolation was wrong and harmful both to herself and to the world. Having come to this conclusion, Mr. Hull, who has been working for years at the successful arrangement of bilateral trade treaties, now wishes to arrange one with Britain. His belief is that freer conditions of world trade must be established if the world is to escape another catastrophic depression and probably another world war. America, he and his followers believe, cannot lead the way to this goal alone. America and Britain or, better still, America and the British commonwealth, working in cooperation, could do so.

I may interject that this was written in 1937.

> They see the world, as it is at present, drifting inevitably into chaos, and envisage a British-American trade pact, opening up the door to a series of agreements on currency, gold and a host of other matters, as the only alternative to rapidly approaching world disaster. So they sincerely and honestly want it very much.

These are the observations of the financial editor of the Daily Telegraph on his return to London, speaking of the viewpoint of the Americas. Then on pages 79 and 80 of the same book he says:

It is firmly believed in official circles at Washington that a series of agreements between the United States and Britain, designed to free and encourage international trade and to stabilize the currency position, would be rapidly and eagerly followed by Scandinavia and the whole of what is known as the "sterling bloc," and also by all the countries of South America. The picture thus presented is one of such a huge portion of the earth's surface working together with a common aim of increasing trade and prosperity and providing security against financial shocks, that, in the Washington view, there is no nation in the world which could afford to defy it or even stand outside it.

Then, in answer to the leader of the opposition in regard to "eyewash," he goes on to say:

This is the big idealistic vision which is in vogue in Washington to-day. The very bigness of the conception causes cynics to write it off as a mere vague and unpractical philosophy. But any English statesman—

And, I would interject, any Canadian statesman.

—who decided that minor difficulties of tariff schedules were of more importance than the attempt to achieve, with real practical hopes of success, a new basis for prosperity and security in the world, would surely be risking the direct condemnation of history.

Those are the words of a distinguished visitor to the United States, words which have been quoted with approval by Viscount Horne, a former chancellor of the exchequer.

Mr. MANION: Does my hon. friend suggest that the opinion of the economic expert of the London Telegraph, who I take it wrote the book, carries more weight than that of the president of the board of trade, a member of the British cabinet?

Mr. GLEN: I do say this, that he is speaking from a disinterested point of view, with the knowledge gained during his visit through contacts with the leaders of thought and opinion in Washington. He returns to the old country and publishes his book, which has been approved by Viscount Horne, a former chancellor of the exchequer. If there is any better authority I should like to know about it.

Mr. MANION: I would say Stanley was at least as good, if not better.

Mr. GLEN: He has yet to prove himself; Viscount Horne has done so. Then Mr. Reid goes further and deals with the Canadian agreement at pages 64, 65 and 66. At page 64 he says:

Canada is a member of the British commonwealth, bound up equally with ourselves and her fellow dominions with the whole Ottawa system of exclusive preferences, yet Canada has managed to devise and put into practice a trade treaty with the United States. It took a lot of time to devise, a great deal of hard work and a very great deal of good will. The negotiators started in a small way, facing hosts of difficulties and ironing them out slowly and patiently until to-day the American-Canadian pact is working smoothly to the mutual advantage of both countries and is definitely increasing the volume of trade. In the case of Canada itself it is not surprising that the maximum good will for the project of agreement with America should be forthcoming. Not merely geographical propinquity, but the interweaving of trade interests naturally makes it of vital importance for Canada to be on the best possible terms in every way with her great and powerful neighbour.

Then on page 65:

Finally, to those who say that the Ottawa agreements obstruct the project of British-American trade cooperation, I would reply that the difficulties in the way of a trade agreement between Britain and America, or between America and most of the British Empire are less difficult in their technicalities than was the agreement between Canada and America whose economic situations and needs have a greater similarity than that which exists between America and England.

So we have the evidence of this distinguished Englishman, Mr. Speaker, and the sure and certain knowledge that this government and this nation are entitled to take credit not only for making the first breach in the wall of economic nationalism but also for preparing the way for the completion of the agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States of America.

In this book Mr. Reid refers to a publication issued by the National Foreign Trade Council of the United States, which states much better than I could exactly what trade treaties mean and why those of us on this side of the house are so glad to support them. At page 33, under the heading "Foreign trade and the domestic welfare" and the subheading "The choice that confronts us," the foreign trade council gives these alternatives:

With Increasing Foreign Trade	With Foreign Trade Restricted
A higher standard of living.	A lower standard of living.
A self-reliant agriculture.	Continued agricultural subsidies.
Full employment in industry.	Permanent large unemployment.
"Payment in full" for our exports.	Closing the door to payment for exports.
A free and unregimented economy.	Regimentation of agriculture and industry.
Sound money.	Currency tinkering.
The road to international concord.	The threat of military conflict.

So far as we in the west are concerned I think I can quote the words that were contained in a letter I received the other day from one of my constituents. This man, who is a Ukrainian, said: "We do not want any Christmas gifts in the form of bonuses. Give us a chance to trade and to buy our goods in freer, lower-priced markets, and we will look after ourselves." This is the viewpoint of most of us in the west. We do not want any Christmas gifts by way of bonuses but we do want to purchase our goods in freer, lower-priced markets. This treaty, together with the 1935 treaty, will go a long way towards acceding to that request. Mine is a rural constituency, and naturally my first sympathies are with my people and their problems. It is a mixed constituency, with a large Ukrainian population, who have created a settlement which, from a farming point of view, could not be bettered. In 1935 I asked my constituents to support me as a member of the Liberal party, in order that we might have in power a government that would reduce these barriers to trade. I can go back to them now and say, "What I told you during the campaign is being carried into effect by this government to-day. They have made the greatest reductions in the tariff of this country to be made by any government in Canada." I know they are going forward to ever-increasing markets, and in that way they will lessen the burden of our producers. I say also that there is only one party in Canada to which we can look for that freedom of trade, and that, I am glad to say, is the party I support to-day.

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, in rising to protest against the adoption of this motion for approval of the trade treaty I wish also to protest in the house against the unwarranted and continual castigations of people engaged in industry in eastern Canada. I happen to be engaged in industry, and very much interested in the development and prosperity of industry in Canada. I realize the best customer industry in this country can have is the prosperous agriculturist. But so, too, the best customer the agriculturist can have in Canada is the prosperous working man in the factories throughout the dominion.

I have listened attentively to the speeches of the ministers and of hon. members opposite. I have listened carefully to what they had to say. One after the other got up and criticized industry; not one member opposite has stood in his place in the house and had a kind word to say for industry in Canada or those engaged in it.

I wonder what the members from that great industrial area of Windsor are going to do in connection with this trade treaty?

Mr. MacNICOL: They will be like a clam.

Mr. HOMUTH: I wonder what the Liberal members from Brantford, Toronto, Renfrew, Oshawa and other industrial areas of Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes are going to do?

Mr. MARTIN: You will hear the member from Windsor.

Mr. HOMUTH: What are they going to do with this trade agreement?

Mr. FACTOR: They are all satisfied with the treaty, and they are not taking up the time of the house.

Mr. HOMUTH: The fact of the matter is that they are not satisfied with the trade agreement. The fact is that they will support the trade agreement in the meantime, but I should not be a bit surprised if, when the various items come up for discussion, one after the other they will stand in their places and try to satisfy their own districts, and register their protests against some of the things that are being done in the treaty.

This continual tariff changing by the government, as I have said before in the house, is doing nothing but giving industry the jitters, and it is slowly but surely lowering the standard of living of the industrial workers of Canada. Member after member, particularly those from the western provinces, have stood in the house and demanded protection for the western wheat farmer. I have never known of a bill presented to the house to do something for western Canada to which eastern members have taken exception. In those terrible days of the last few years eastern Canada unhesitatingly went to the assistance of western Canada in every possible way. I have said before and I repeat that if we are to solve the problems of Canada there can be no east, no west, no Ontario, no Quebec—we have to look at these matters from the broad Canadian viewpoint.

So I say I resent very much hon. members standing in the house and continually taking a lot of fun out of criticizing the so-called industrial leaders in the eastern part of this country. During all my political life I have fought, and will continue to fight, for the industrial workers and the farmers. I come from a county which is prominent not only industrially but also from the standpoint of agriculture. Perhaps in no place in Canada is there better exemplification of the extent to which the rural producer and the urban industrial worker depend on each other for their prosperity. For the few moments at my disposal, therefore, I shall deal with the matter of agriculture.

Sitting in the house and time and again listening to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) deal with matters pertaining to agriculture, about the only thing I have heard him discuss has been the question of wheat. So far he has said nothing with regard to vegetable growers, fruit growers and people engaged in various other forms of agriculture, particularly the forms common in eastern Canada. From what is happening in Canada to-day I can see very plainly that when the minister deals with wheat, apparently he is not very much interested in the wheat grower of eastern Canada.

In 1938 there was a carry-over of eight or ten million bushels of eastern wheat. In the same year we produced eighteen or twenty million bushels. Therefore we have a tremendous carry-over of wheat, and yet to-day throughout eastern Canada, and particularly in Ontario, hundreds of thousands of bushels of subsidized United States wheat are coming into this country and are being milled in Ontario. On Saturday last the wheat quotation to a Canadian mill in Buffalo was 46 cents, and the quotation to a United States mill in that city was 72 cents. Yesterday there was a spread of 30 cents a bushel between the price of wheat in Buffalo for the United States mill and the price of wheat in that city for the Canadian mill. That is the wheat which is coming into this country, a country flooded with wheat. We do not know what to do with it.

Hours and days of the time of the house have been taken up in an effort to find a solution of our wheat problem. Yet here are these thousands of bushels coming into Canada to be milled, while the farmers of Ontario who buy their bread are sitting at the table and eating bread made from subsidized United States wheat, at a time when their granaries are full of their own wheat, and they do not know what to do with it. Surely the time has come when something must be done for the wheat farmer of eastern Canada. I say in all seriousness that I trust the governments of Ontario and Quebec, if they do not already know it, will take cognizance of what is going on, and will protest and urge that the federal government is absolutely neglecting the wheat farmer of eastern Canada.

Mr. MARTIN: What did you do between 1930 and 1935?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Answer that first.

[Mr. Homuth.]

Mr. HOMUTH: I don't care what was done in 1930 or 1935. What I am concerned about is the welfare of the people of Canada. We are not looking back; we are looking forward. And if this government would look forward, as we are trying to do, it would not attempt to put through a trade treaty such as this.

Much has been said regarding the great benefits which will accrue to agriculture throughout Canada. I was not only interested but well pleased when from his place in the house this afternoon the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) told us the government had made arrangements with the government of the United States whereby our portion of the quota on cattle could go into the United States. I still maintain that the understanding given to the people of this country was that Canada was to receive one hundred per cent of that 225,000 head. One does not need to go any further than Hansard and read the statement of the Minister of Agriculture when the matter was brought up in the house by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn). On page 822 of Hansard the minister is reported as follows:

> I might add that there is a provision in the agreement whereby, if quotas work out as this one apparently has, through consultation with the United States government, an arrangement may be made with regard to it in order to make it work as it was intended to work.

There is no question that the Minister of Agriculture has admitted that the intent was that we were to have 225,000 head.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not want my hon. friend putting words in my mouth. If he will read all the statement he will see that I said exactly the opposite.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is in Hansard. The minister may read it to-morrow.

Mr. GARDINER: It is not in Hansard as the hon. member states. He should read the whole statement. The statement shows that we never at any time had the whole quota.

Mr. HOMUTH: Do you deny the words "as it was intended to work"?

Mr. GARDINER: Read the whole statement. It is that Mexico always had part of it.

Mr. HOMUTH: The peculiar thing about this whole trade agreement is that whatever concessions we got from the United States are on a quota basis. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has referred to the fact that less than two per cent of the shoes purchased in Canada are imported. We might do the same thing and work out, not what could go into the United States but what can go in.

We can send milk and cream into the United States only to the limit of the quota, but we impose no quota on goods coming into this country. Our tariff on wheat is 12 cents a bushel as compared with a duty of 42 cents on wheat going into the United States. This is the government with which they made an appeasement treaty. This is the government to which they looked with such great friendliness as to what was going to happen as a result of this trade agreement. What is happening as a result of this trade agreement? The farmers of eastern Canada are suffering because of the hundreds of thousands of bushels of wheat that are coming into this country.

Mr. EULER: What is the quota on boots and shoes going into the United States?

Mr. HOMUTH: There is no quota on boots and shoes going into the United States, and the minister knows that only too well. I shall have something to say about shoes later on. What I want to emphasize is that those things which they point out to the farmers as being of such great benefit are on such a ridiculous quota basis. Even the increased number of cattle that we can send into the United States under this new agreement amounts to about one-third of one per cent of their total consumption. Other hon. members have already told this house what the milk quota means. The county of Waterloo is not a dairying county, but it produces three times as much milk as the total United States quota. We produce as much cream in that county as is provided for by the United States quota. The amount which we can send to the United States would give every American citizen three tablespoons of cream once a year. What a wonderful thing they have given to us! What a wonderful friendly gesture that is!

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): It saved a world war, though.

Mr. HOMUTH: Of course. My hon. friend referred to the number of shoes coming into this country. I have said before, and I repeat, that the question is not the number of shoes that come into this country, but how many would come in if our shoe manufacturers did not lower wages and the quality of their product in order to compete against the cheap United States shoes. If it were not that I have some regard for the dignity of this house I would have brought some shoes here to show some of the westerners the type of shoe that they have been told will come in here cheaper and thus reduce the cost of their wearing apparel, production costs, and so on. They are shoes for evening wear, ladies' shoes, and so on. I should like to see some of the western or eastern rural housewives wearing this type of shoe as they work around the barns.

Mr. MUTCH: They have stopped working in the barns in the west.

Mr. HOMUTH: The same thing is true in connection with furniture. It is not a question of the amount of furniture that may come into this country; it is the threat of the furniture that may come in. Our furniture manufacturers must be prepared to make a product which will compete with the United States article. My hon. friends from the west laugh when we talk about protection for industry in Canada, but let them stand up in this house and say whether or not they have accepted the policy of protection. They have accepted the government bonus on wheat, which is protection in a different way. Then this year the Minister of Agriculture is offering them protection in still another way. Eastern Canada is not objecting to that. Eastern Canada is not saying that this should not be done for the west. But eastern Canada does say that you should have some regard for the great industrial areas in eastern Canada and for the industrial workers employed in the various industries in that part of the country. That is all we are asking. Is that not fair? If we would quit playing politics with our wheat policy and other matters and get down to business, we would be in a better position to solve our problems without all the bickering that is going on.

Last June and July the boot and shoe workers' union in South Waterloo protested to the government against the provisions of this treaty. Protests were also sent by the boot and shoe manufacturers. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has said that he received no protests from the shoe industry in his riding.

Mr. EULER: That is quite correct.

Mr. HOMUTH: But the minister has received protests from boot and shoe manufacturers who represent the boot and shoe manufacturers in North Waterloo. It might be interesting to deal with some of these protests for a moment.

In June or July of 1938 the boot and shoe manufacturers' association came to Ottawa and placed before the government a brief setting forth the condition of the shoe industry and how they were threatened with the importations from the United States. At about the same time many of the ministers were sent letters by the boot and shoe workers' union of South Waterloo protesting against the conditions which obtained in the shoe industry. This letter was signed by Marvin McKenzie, secretary treasurer of the Canadian shoe workers' union. It reads:

Owing to the fact that we have a Conservative representative in our district since the death of the late A. M. Edwards, I as secretary of local three of above organization representing some 400 members have been instructed to call your attention to the great number of shoes being imported into Canada from the U.S.A. and the extremely low prices at which they are being offered to the public.

We feel that these shoes are being shipped into Canada at considerably lower prices than they can be produced and it is working a hardship on the manufacturers and the workers.

Our organization has many members out of work and so many working short time and this unfair competition is definitely making it so much worse.

The shoes in question particularly are ladies' cheap evening shoes.

We have been informed that some of the retailers have stated that they are not buying this class of footwear in Canada for next season.

In view of the foregoing conditions, we respectfully request you use every means available to investigate this menace with a view of helping the manufacturers to operate successfully and make it possible for the workers to retain their self-respect by keeping off relief.

We trust that you will give this your favourable consideration.

Yours respectfully,
The Canadian Shoe Workers' Union,
Marvin McKenzie,
Secretary-Treasurer.

This is the letter that went from the secretary of the boot and shoe workers' union. Mr. F. R. Sims, for the commissioner of customs, replied that considerable effort would be involved in investigating the whole matter of costs and determining whether or not these shoes were being dumped into Canada.

The secretary of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) also replied to the boot and shoe workers' union, as follows:

Dear Sir,—

The Prime Minister has asked me to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of recent date, with respect to conditions in the shoe manufacturing business due to the importation of shoes from the United States.

Mr. King wishes me to let you know that the representations contained in your communication have been carefully noted.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) also received a letter from the boot and shoe workers' union, to which he replied:

Your letter of recent date addressed to the Minister of Labour has been received and will be brought to his attention at the first opportunity.

[Mr. Homuth.]

All this occurred in June and July of 1938, when the treaty was under consideration. Yet in spite of all these protests made to the minister and the government, the government went ahead and negotiated the trade treaty with the United States, which will result, when the excise duty is taken off, in reducing the protection on shoes made in Canada by nine to ten per cent—and this in spite of all the protests made by these various organizations representing the shoe industry and the workers engaged in that industry.

Mr. FRASER: What is the present rate of duty on shoes?

Mr. HOMUTH: Ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He can tell you. On January 23, 1939, a letter was received by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, reading as follows:

Dear Sir,—

You will shortly receive a letter which I have instructed our manager, Mr. Roy Weaver, to write to you in connection with the shoe industry. This letter is prompted by your remarks to the house that imports were less than two per cent of the Canadian consumption.

While this statement is quite true when one takes the general picture, the story is entirely different when one analyses the shoe trade in its various classifications. In the district that you represent, there are at least two factories that are facing a very serious and difficult situation due to importations in 1938 of shoes from the United States and under the new trade treaty the importations in this particular field will very definitely increase in 1939.

I myself last week saw samples of shoes that are to be purchased from the United States in quantities by one of our large retailing organizations and this business is coming directly out of factories in your own district. I urge you to give very serious consideration to this and I would appreciate an opportunity of personally discussing the shoe industry with you sometime when it is convenient to you.

Yours very truly,
Shoe Manufacturers' Association,
W. H. Brimblecombe,
President.

To this the minister replied:

In reply to your letter of January 23 I wish to say that I have received no complaints from the local shoe manufacturers in Kitchener. I do not anticipate that the reductions which have been made in the new Canada-United States agreement will materially increase the importation of footwear.

I should point out that the tariff has been reduced on kid leather from 27½ to 20 per cent. This is a valuable concession to the manufacturers of ladies' shoes. Excise tax will also be removed from a number of the materials used in the manufacture of footwear. I would be disappointed indeed if the shoe industry in this country is injured by the new agreement.

While I shall be glad to discuss matters with you at any time, I am bound to say that no change can be made in the agreement as it has already been signed.

The last paragraph of that letter, Mr. Speaker, raises the whole question of the method followed by the government of this dominion in making trade agreements. We have heard considerable talk about the men who went over there and negotiated the details of the treaty. I knew Mr. McKinnon before he ever came down here, and I knew of Mr. Wilgress and Mr. Robertson, three capable men. I doubt if there is a man in any country anywhere who knows custom duties better than Mr. McKinnon; I have no hesitation in saying that. But Mr. McKinnon does not make trade treaties. All Mr. McKinnon does is to work out the intricate details of the treaty after the government has announced its policy. Mr. McKinnon worked out the increases in the tariff in 1930, and in the following year. He simply carries out whatever the tariff policy of the government is. And so, regardless of what is contained in this treaty, all that Mr. McKinnon and his assistants had to do with it was the working out of the various items and making one dovetail with the other. The policy itself is the policy of the government.

On the other hand, in the United States, they gave their people, regardless of what line of business they were engaged in, an opportunity to consider the trade treaty before it was concluded. The United States gave notice to all those likely to be affected in any way by the treaty, setting forth the various items that were to be considered. Every item that was to be considered when the United States negotiated its trade treaties with the United Kingdom and Canada was set forth in a pamphlet so that a man reading it could say: Well, this item does not affect me, so I do not have to bother. But if any item did affect him, he had the opportunity of going to Washington and laying his case before the men who were negotiating the treaty on behalf of the Washington government. That was also the procedure in England, and we can readily see that the men who went to Washington, representing the interests of United States industry, were certainly very successful in the pleas they made before the committee of inquiry.

But in Canada we knew nothing even as to the items that were to be considered, and we had no opportunity of going before any committee. The government may say: Well, you had a chance of coming down or sending in your brief. But since the items that were to be considered were not known, that would have meant that every industry in the country would have had to send in a brief to safeguard its interests—and judging by the treaty itself, certainly little consideration was given to the briefs that were placed before the government. The shoe brief is a very fine example of how representations made to the government were ignored. Here was the policy of the government, a low tariff policy, and it was this policy of the government that the three men who negotiated on behalf of Canada at Washington were going to carry out. So I say, Mr. Speaker, that the whole basis on which we make trade agreements is wrong and unfair to this country, unfair to our vegetable and fruit growers, unfair to our farmers, unfair to the wheat growers of western Canada, unfair to industry generally.

Mr. MacNICOL: Unfair to labour.

Mr. HOMUTH: They have no idea what labour is. One can easily understand a situation such as that when one realizes the set-up of the present cabinet. Perhaps one of the most remarkable things about our government is this. We have in it, I believe, eight lawyers, one newspaper publisher, one journalist, one university professor, three who are mentioned as farmers—one who was a school teacher who became a farmer; another used to be a farmer and since 1921 has been a very smart—I will not say statesman, shall I say politician?—and yet another who is no longer known as a farmer but is looked upon as a financier; I refer to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning).

Mr. MacNICOL: He is the best of the lot.

Mr. HOMUTH: There are none more pleased than those engaged in industry that the Minister of Finance is back in his place in the house. I have no hesitation in saying that the one member of the government in whom the industrial workers and the heads of industry in this country feel they can have some confidence is the present Minister of Finance. But not one man belonging to that present cabinet has had any practical industrial experience. Not one man in that cabinet has had a close association with labour and knows what are the hours and conditions of labour. So one can easily understand why idealistic trade agreements are made with the United States and with Great Britain. It is not a policy of appeasement. The agreement was a business deal between Great Britain and the United States, with us in between, and as a result we are getting thoroughly squeezed.

I should have liked to deal at some length with the textile industry. I intend to go into that subject when the various items come up. But when we talk about the quotas which the United States give our primary producers in Canada, I should like to mention a few of the quotas which are extended to other countries in which the standard of living is very low.

In 1937 Japan had 20 per cent of the cotton rayon bedspread business of Canada. In 1938 Japan had 72 per cent of that whole business, with the result that some of our industries could no longer produce any of these articles and had to close down. Of woollen textiles, 43 per cent of our total consumption was imported. As to worsted clothing, 65 per cent of the total consumed in Canada was imported.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. HOMUTH: Why? Because this government is more concerned about industrial workers in other countries than it is about our own. In Japan the wage rate in the textile industry is from 2 to 2¾ cents an hour. Japan must import its raw products from the southern states or from Egypt. The price of the raw products is just the same laid down in Japan as it is laid down in any city of Canada. But their workers are paid about 2½ cents an hour. On the other hand there are codes in the Ontario law; we have to pay from 30 cents an hour upwards to our textile workers.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): Did they pay that in 1935 and before that?

Mr. MARTIN: Do not answer relevant questions!

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HOMUTH: I may say this, that in all the time I have been engaged in industry I have found that ninety-nine per cent of our industrial heads are fair to their employees if they are given a chance by the government in power. If they are unfair to their employees this government could take action against them and see to it that they are fair. Again I say that if this government had handled the whole situation as between themselves and the various provinces as they should have done, in a spirit of cooperation and with a determination to do something worth while for Canada and for the industrial workers, we should have had by this time unemployment insurance and decent labour laws throughout the dominion.

I have not time to take up another subject,—

Mr. SPENCE: The hon. member has done very well.

Mr. HOMUTH: —but I do say this, that we are going to watch carefully and with considerable interest how various hon. members on the Liberal side of the house vote with regard to this trade treaty. We shall see whether they vote as their hearts dictate, or whether they vote as the Liberal whip dictates to them.

Mr. WILLIAM HAYHURST (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth). He is a distinct asset to the Conservative party; his exposition of Conservative ideas upon this subject was an able one.

The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen), who preceded the hon. member for Waterloo South, said something about the Social Credit party. Let me tell him that the Alberta government is generally recognized as the best government in Canada. It is cognizant of the situation as it exists. Perhaps the criticism by the Right Hon. Oliver Stanley that some observations of his opponents were so much eyewash could be applied to certain hon. members who so inconsistently charge the Alberta government with inefficiency. That government has a policy of its own; it is developing in a new way the industries of the province. It is a characteristic of our party that it is always looking forward. On two occasions this afternoon we have heard questions about what happened in 1930 and even as far back as 1896. Apparently anything is good enough to conceal the urgencies of the present situation by references to what happened in the past. If anyone made an error in past years, it must be pointed to as something grievous and the party which made that error is deemed to be forever inimical to the welfare of the nation, although there is nothing we can do about it to-day.

I want hon. members to realize that our party is here as an independent group with our own ideas upon tariffs and economics generally. The hon. member for Marquette flippantly mentioned this afternoon what he called economic nationalism. I wonder if he is able to define that term. I have seen many definitions of it. I have seen also many definitions of democracy. I know that communists call themselves the real democrats, that fascists style themselves socialistic or socialist democrats, and that all the parties in this house term themselves democrats. It is difficult indeed to understand the real meaning of words which are so glibly uttered by some hon. members in dealing with subjects upon which they seem to know hardly anything. Thus, at this moment, I had to rise to defend the government of Alberta, because that government has, in its own way and without recourse to tariffs, done something to develop the industry of the province.

We, as a group, are in favour of this trade treaty, and in my constituency most of the people, I am sure, are in favour of it. That group of people whom I have the honour to represent are probably the most cosmopolitan in Canada. Besides the native-born Canadians we have people from all parts of Europe. While this treaty probably contains features that are not so acceptable to us, it is on the whole acceptable because it introduces a fresh spirit of understanding between the great English-speaking nations of the world. We must develop a spirit of friendship with Britain on the one hand, and with the United States on the other. To-day people travel more than they have ever done in the history of the world, and this year it is a good thing that the government have brought forward this treaty. It seems that various factors are working together at this time to promote the welfare of the English-speaking nations and to develop a spirit of harmony among these peoples. I do not know whether it was planned or not, but at any rate we have the great fair in New York which will bring many citizens from Europe, and in Canada we have the royal visit, which will also bring from Europe and the United States a great many visitors; and these visitors will all, to a certain degree, benefit through these trade agreements by purchases in Canada.

There is no doubt in my mind that trade agreements create harmony between peoples. In so far as this agreement affects western Canada, the two items that are of most interest to my district are those dealing with cattle and dairy products. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) this afternoon mentioned some modifications with respect to cattle. I did not get clearly what he said, but I shall be able to read it in Hansard to-morrow. As regards cattle I find this statement in the press release. On cattle weighing 700 pounds or more each there is a maximum reduction of 1½ cents a pound, compared with two cents a pound under the 1935 trade agreement, and three cents a pound under the tariff act of 1930.

The new trade agreement provides that the maximum reduction in duty shall apply to 225,000 head imported in any one calendar year, of which not more than 60,000 head shall be imported during any one quarter of the calendar year. In other words, provision is made not only for a further reduction in duty by the maximum, but also for an increase in the annual quota to which the reduced duty applies of nearly 70,000 head over the quota provided for in the 1935 trade agreement. On calves the new trade agreement provides for the continuation of the reduced rate of 1½ cents per pound accorded in the 1935 trade agreement as compared with the tariff rate of 2½ cents per pound, but the tariff quota to which this reduced rate applies is increased from 51,933 head to 100,000 head in any one calendar year. The weight bracket to which the reduced rate applies is also increased from 175 to 200 pounds, any calves weighing less than this being eligible for importation under the concession in the trade agreement. On dairy cows the concession in the 1935 trade agreement of the maximum reduction to 1½ cents per pound is continued in the new trade agreement, but the quota limitation of 20,000 head in any one calendar year is abolished.

. . . .

The new trade agreement provides for the maximum reduction in duty to 3¼ cents per gallon, the quantity of milk to be admitted at the reduced rate to be 3,000,000 gallons in any one calendar year.

And there is a further reduction of four cents a pound on cheese.

The hon. member for Waterloo South said that more milk and cream was produced in his constituency than required. At the same time, I would point out, we need some markets for our products abroad. At present vast quantities of butter have accumulated on the Canadian market, and something should be done to relieve this congestion of dairy products. Farmers generally are desirous that something should be done to-day to have more butter consumed in Canada, and if a certain quantity of milk is diverted to other markets it will, of course, relieve the situation in regard to butter and cheese.

An hon. member last week said that we should play the game in this house, that nations should play the game with one another; and, of course, playing with other nations would cultivate a greater mutual respect. I admit that this is important, but we must exercise self-control in all things until it is reduced to a habit. We must take our losses as sportsmen, and if there are losses in the trade agreement, such as the six cents wheat preference in Britain, we should take them in a sporting spirit, realizing that the concessions cannot be all in our favour, that we must give some concessions in return. It is notable, in international trade, that nine-tenths of all our external trade was conducted last year with empire countries and with the United States. Much of the remainder was done with nations which are and always have been on friendly terms with this country. This, I think, proves that trade and goodwill among nations are reciprocal. No nation can live unto itself alone; we can induce other people to buy from us only by making it as easy as possible for them to sell to us.

During this debate we have heard much about the pride of the Liberal party in the achievements of Laurier and the pride of the Conservative party in those of Macdonald. A great deal has been said about the past. Well, we have threshed this old straw over and over again until we are sick and tired of hearing anything about it, and now we must look for the wheat. We have been told that it is only by working harder and harder, and so increasing the size of the cake, that we can hope for a larger slice. Now that a large cake has been produced, we are told that we cannot eat it because it is too large.

Mr. HEAPS: Send it abroad.

Mr. HAYHURST: The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) says, "Send it abroad." Cannot we distribute it? The capacity to produce has been demonstrated, but the capacity to distribute our products within the country is not evident. Thus we have a state of misery for the producer and equally a state of misery for those who are not given an opportunity to produce. Each trading nation seems to be on the horns of this dilemma. I brought with me this afternoon The Case for Canadian Agriculture, by J. T. Hull, in which the author deals with the question of self-sufficiency. I quote:

In every country touched by western civilization this organization of agriculture is going on—land reforms, security of tenure, controlled marketing, credit facilities, import regulations and quotas, price guarantees and so, each taking its place according to national needs and national policies. This movement is, in the main, the product of the approach to national self-sufficiency which has curtailed world markets within the area of developed societies, although there are other factors which should not be overlooked. With respect to wheat this is the significance of these policies: In the five-year period 1919-24 Germany imported 36·5 per cent of her wheat requirements; in the period 1932-39 she imported 4·5 per cent. For France the figures are 11·7 per cent down to 3·1 per cent; for Italy, 22·3 per cent down to 6·6 per cent; for Austria, Czechoslovakia and Switzerland combined, 46·1 per cent down to 27·7 per cent; for Norway, Sweden and other three small countries combined, from 65·7 per cent to 25 per cent.

It is futile to rail against what is the natural and inevitable result of the advance of civilization. No reasonable argument can be made against the adoption by any country of policies designed to develop to the fullest possible extent its economic potentialities and increase the material well being of its people. It should be recognized, however, that there is a difference between a policy of economic efficiency and welfare, and one founded on fear or expansionist or insular ambitions. From the standpoint of welfare and the greatest enjoyment of the fruits of men's labour, no nation can be completely self sufficient, nor can it share in or maintain vital, cultural and social influences without contact and intercourse with the outside world. Thus the problem we have to face in this respect, is how to maintain, by consent, trading and economic relations so as to bring the greatest benefits to all without injury to any.

With this end in view negotiations were commenced between the farmers' organizations in Great Britain and the dominions, the result of which was the empire producers' conference, held in Sydney, Australia, in March, 1938. The decisions of that conference were embodied in several resolutions, six of which are mentioned here. The conference was attended by Sir Reginald Dorman-Smith, who is now the British Minister of Agriculture, and in that connection I should like to quote an interesting newspaper article:

In political and farming circles the appointment of Sir Reginald is taken to mean that the government's agricultural policy is likely to follow the lines of the proposals of price insurance which have already been made by the national farmers' union.

The political correspondent of the Yorkshire Post is responsible for the statement that the condition on which Sir Reginald Dorman-Smith accepted the post is that British farmers are to get an extra £15,000,000 a year from the state, this meaning that governmental financial assistance will be more than doubled.

It is believed that price insurance proposals will cover barley, oats, sugar beet, beef, sheep, pigs, milk and other dairy products, eggs and poultry. Wheat is already the subject of price insurance, the deficiencies being made up from levies on all flour milled in the country. There are also temporary existing schemes dealing with oats and barley, while beef is the object of a present subsidy.

I may add that if Great Britain really made an effort to become self-sufficient she could do so. It is now obvious that British agricultural policy is being increasingly directed towards greater production at home and the regulation of competitive imports. Canada is concerned primarily over the marketing of its surplus products. There apears to be a flaw in this system; it seems that we are unable to deal adequately with an economy of abundance. There seems to be something wrong between the production and the consumption of goods. Some nations are concerned over their food supplies because of the fear of war. Canada is concerned over the marketing of her surplus products. Whatever the situation, each country must improve its agriculture. In this country agriculture is the backbone of our industry.

Previously I mentioned something about cheese. It is significant that the production of hogs and cheese, two of our products which can be sold abroad, was considerably reduced last year. The gradings of hogs were down 670,000 head, and in western Canada alone the reduction was over half a million. All the time there was a great market for those hogs waiting in England, and I believe it is still waiting. This also applies to cheese. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has said a great deal about advertising Canadian cheese abroad, and it would be only natural to expect that cheese production would have increased.

The greatest criticism I have to offer in this connection is this: I believe we should have some kind of planned economy, and I think some sort of broadcasts should be supplied to our farmers in order to indicate where we are deficient in supplying the markets of the world, so that the farmers may be encouraged to produce those commodities which may be necessary in order to supply those deficiences. Perhaps then we would not have such tremendous surpluses of butter while there was a great demand for cheese. As the situation is now, with the production of cheese reduced, the production of butter has increased. We would suggest that some of the heads of the different departments broadcast from time to time statistics with regard to the quantity of cheese and butter on hand, in order that our farmers may know at the right time what commodities to produce. We fight over methods and neglect results. Under our present economy the farmer, like everyone else, is in business to make money. He makes his money by selling goods ,but he can make more money by selling fewer goods at higher prices. The trouble is that the farmer has no control over the price of the goods he sells. That price is fixed by the law of financial supply and demand, and is not based on cost. Why not? It should be based on cost plus a fair commission. That is why I suggest that some of our friends who speak so flippantly about economic nationalism should define that term and explain what they mean by it.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the greatest fault of the present system is its wastefulness. We produce surpluses of many commodities, for which surpluses we must find markets. In many instances we find that because of unfair competition farmers are placed at a great disadvantage in marketing their products. Let us consider dairy products. The figures I have before me indicate that last year we imported over 14,000,000 gallons of various types of vegetable oils. Those oils compete directly with butter and other dairy products, and render the life of the dairy farmer more precarious.

I find that in 1938, 4,135,000 pounds of creamery butter were exported, while in 1937, 5,141,000 pounds were exported. In other words, we reduced our exports of butter. On the other hand, we increased our imports of butter. While in 1937, only 113,000 pounds of butter were imported, in 1938, there were 4,915,000 pounds imported. With a great mass of butter on hand in Canada we imported about forty-five times the amount which had been imported in the previous year. That seems ridiculous.

And so we have our farmers competing not only with imports of butter but also with those of vegetable oils from which margarine and other products used in some restaurants are made. I do not say they are used in the restaurants of Ottawa, but we know that some vegetable oil products, which take the place of animal products that should be sold in Canada, are used in practically all restaurants.

It seems to me we have to feed the whole world before we feed our own people. In securing markets the government should be sure of maintaining the standard of living of our people. It cannot be over-emphasized that the public interest, which stands above party, is best served only when the national resources are used in such a way as to obtain the greatest happiness for the greatest number of people. These trade agreements are only a beginning. While in their way they may be excellent, much more is required. Unbalanced economics must be restored to equilibrium. Closed economics must be reopened. By facing the issue calmly we may be assured of peace, and by mutual help and understanding we shall make Canada a great nation.

On various occasions we have heard about good government. We well remember that Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, a former Prime Minister of Great Britain, said that good government was no excuse for self-government. Therefore we must develop in our people the spirit of self-government, so that they will look into these affairs themselves. It is in that spirit that the group to which I belong favours the treaty. It may be a stepping-stone to more happiness and better things to come.

Mr. J. R. KIRK (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, it is with the utmost confidence in the beneficial results that are certain to accrue to the people of Canada from the new trade treaty with the United States that I rise to make a few observations. At the outset I wish most strongly to commend and to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and members of his government upon the splendid way in which they have, by various trade agreements, brought to still greater fruition the policy to which the Liberal party has pledged itself, year in and year out.

When in 1935 the Bennett-Manion government placed its future in the hands of the people, the cry of battle was met by the Liberal party with a well defined platform, calculated to assist the best interests of the dominion at large. And the electorate of Canada, having had full and plenty of Messrs. Bennett and Manion, returned Mr. Mackenzie

King with the largest majority of supporters any party has ever had in the House of Commons.

The making of a trade treaty with the United States is no new policy of the Liberal party. Although defeated on a trade treaty in the general election of 1911, the Liberal party still continued to believe their trade policy was right. Back in 1923 the following resolution was debated in the House of Commons:

That the governor in council may authorize any minister of the crown to enter into negotiations with any authorized representative of the government of the United States with a view to the making of a commercial agreement between the two countries, on terms which may be deemed mutually beneficial. Any agreement so made shall be subject to the approval of the parliament of Canada.

In the debate which preceded the adoption of the resolution the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen declared the continuing opposition by the Conservative party to a policy of reciprocity. Mr. Fielding, supporting the resolution, made the following declaration:

Hon. gentlemen of the Conservative party, so far as they permit themselves to be represented by my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) are against any trade treaty with the United States. In the name of the Liberal party of Canada, I declare to-day that we stand for reciprocity with the United States. I say that when the opportunity comes to make a fair treaty or agreement, and the agreement of 1911 was a fair and reasonable agreement, we are proud to declare in the face of the parliament of Canada, whatever the fate of it may be, that this Liberal party stands for reciprocity with the United States when we can get a fair and reasonable agreement. That is our position. We are content to let the people judge between the honourable gentlemen and ourselves on that point.

Comparing the foregoing with the present attitude of the Liberal party, we readily see that the Liberal party has not deviated from its belief in the beneficial results to be had from reciprocity.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, from listening during the last few days to speeches made by hon. members opposite on the trade agreement, that their policy is no different from that of their predecessors, namely "no truck or trade with the Yankees." It would be interesting to know just how the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) feels about this agreement. I notice that at page 316 of Hansard for 1930, when he was Minister of Trade and Commerce in the Bennett government, and tariffs were being raised sky-high, he is reported to have said:

We are amending the tariff for the purpose of trying to reengage in the industries of Canada tens of thousands of honest Canadian citizens.

[Mr. Kirk.]

Again at page 318 he is reported as follows:

—that the right hon. gentleman who is Prime Minister—

That is Mr. Bennett.

—of this country to-day stands for a policy which has not had a trial in Canada for thirty-five years, a policy for the protection of Canadian industry. There has not been an opportunity up to the present time to give effect to that policy.

And again at page 319, he continued:

When these measures—

The new tariff.

—which are now in existence . . . are in full effect, they will provide work for some 30,000 to 50,000 industrialists in this country.

And at page 322 he continued:

Instead of quibbling about whether it is going to take the last of the 117,000 unemployed, we say that it will take the first 30,000 or 40,000 and therefore it is a worthy measure which should have the support of this house.

The same hon. member is reported to have written an open letter a few days later to his "fellow citizens." This letter, under date of October 4, 1930, is in part as follows:

Every year for the past few years, Canada has been importing $800,000,000 worth of merchandise that she might just as well have been producing from her own mines, or her own farms, or in her own factories. Some things, of course, like raw cotton and raw rubber, she must import. But making due allowance for such items the fact remains that $800,000,000 of her annual imports have been of a class or kind that she was quite capable of producing for herself. With the aid of statistics giving the annual value of Canadian factory production, and the number of persons employed therein, it requires little figuring to show that every $5,600 worth of goods turned out has meant a job for one person. Assuming that something close to that ratio would hold good as the average for all classes of products, it follows that were we to produce in Canada the $800,000,000 worth of merchandise that we have been importing unnecessarily, we would be giving employment to 147,527 workers more than are now employed, to say nothing of the thousands of others to whom employment would come indirectly, as a result of this new stimulus to business in general. Now do you see how true it is that were we all to practise a little intelligent discrimination in our daily buying, our unemployment problem would quickly and permanently disappear?

It will be seen from this letter that the hon. member attempted to explain in detail why and how the Canada-first tariff, enacted in September, 1930, would bring Canada's unemployed back to work. But I submit that time has proven that this policy of economic nationalism did not lessen unemployment, but on the contrary increased it. All of which proves that high tariffs increase unemployment. Apparently by 1932 the hon. gentleman had a change of heart in regard to the matter of national policy, as is indicated by his remarks on the Canada-United States trade agreement of 1935. Supporting the trade agreement resolution before the house he made the following statement, to be found on page 723 of Hansard for 1936:

About 1932, in view of conditions that were developing the world over and the inhibitions against Canadian exports entering other countries, I felt that quotas, import restrictions, the raising of tariffs, what is commonly called a national spirit, which was so prevalent and is still so prevalent throughout the world, placed many obstacles in the way of our trade and in the way of trade generally. I felt it was highly desirable that Canada should study the trade relations between our country and the United States, and with that in mind I instructed the staff under me at the time to proceed to a study of the trade between the two countries, and to prepare in detail the items upon which without injury to ourselves and in all fairness to the United States we might offer some considerations for favourable trade.

The above is indeed a far cry from the economic nationalism which he had championed so ardently a few years previously. It is apparent that his leader, if consistent, will vote against the resolution, because referring to the possible results of the treaty, he said, as reported on page 1066 of Hansard of this year:

Time alone will tell, but my belief is that the ill effects will be very much greater than the good effects.

Certainly no one would vote against his own better judgment. The question in many minds is: What will be the position taken by our chameleon friend, the hon. member for Kootenay East.

I should like to deal for a moment with some of the remarks made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), which were referred to later by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion). At page 912 of Hansard the hon. leader of the opposition is reported as follows:

I do not want to puncture the bubble the right hon. gentleman has been blowing, but at the same time I do not think it is necessary to get quite so much excited about the marvellous peace treaty which has been negotiated by the right hon. gentleman to keep the United States and Canada and the United States and Great Britain from going to war.

And again at page 1050 of Hansard the leader of the opposition is reported as saying:

The right hon. gentleman talked as if this was not a trade treaty but a peace treaty. As I listened to him, I thought he spoke, as if we had just been engaged in a spectacular war with some great nation and had won a glorious victory;

And again:

He spoke as if we had won some great victory, and yet, as I pointed out the other night, not since 1812, a period of over a hundred years, have we had any differences of a serious nature with the United States, and certainly since the beginning of the century there have been no differences between Great Britain and the United States.

What the right hon. Prime Minister did say and to which the hon. leader of the opposition took exception is to be found on page 910 of Hansard:

Once again we have played the part of reconciling and interpreting the two great English-speaking nations to each other. The making of these agreements, especially when the world situation is so precarious as it unfortunately is, is an achievement of superlative importance, which will have its repercussions throughout the world in the next generation. In the present, each of us sleeps more safely in his bed because of the rapproachement between the world's two greatest democracies, a rapproachement that could not have been effected without the assent and the cooperation of Canada. If this administration were to end to-morrow, it would have its honourable place in world history on this score alone. That is the broad fact of the present situation. Like Canning, we have done our indispensable part to call into existence a "new world to redress the balance of the old."

And again at page 911:

The trade agreements concluded between Canada and the United States, and Great Britain and the United States constitute the one outstanding contribution of our times toward economic disarmament. As such, they have immeasurably helped to create a basic situation more favourable to peaceful relations between nations . . . It is deeply gratifying to the government that . . . we were able to further not only the ends of commerce and trade but the all important ends of international goodwill.

At the imperial conference of 1937, the representatives of the several governments concerned had under review the possibility of reviving confidence and increasing the stability of economic and financial conditions in the world, a process which they considered essential to the prosperity of individual countries as well as to international peace. In order to assist in furthering this end, they declared themselves ready to cooperate with other nations in examining current difficulties, including trade barriers and other obstacles to the increase of international trade and the improvement of the general standard of living. The imperial conference also declared:

The outstanding feature of the discussion was the emphatic desire expressed by the representatives of every part of the British commonwealth represented at the conference, that all practicable steps should be taken to secure the stimulation of international trade. It was recognized that in the last resort, the prosperity of the countries of the commonwealth depends on that of the world as a whole, and that a healthy growth of international trade, accompanied by an improvement in the general standard of living, is an essential step to political appeasement.

Surely the above declaration will convince even the most doubtful that there is a close connection between international trade and international peace. The trend of the speeches of the opposition has been to create a feeling of gloom as to Canada's future. Might I suggest at this point that it would be well for them to try to inspire the people with a spirit of confidence in their country. The Hon. Colonel J. L. Ralston some time ago, in an address to the presidents of the life insurance companies of America, stated, "Confidence feeds on confidence." Might it not be to the better advantage of Canada for these gloom-mongers to change their line of talk in keeping with the above, and thus do their part to promote confidence in Canada's economic future?

I should like to turn now to a consideration of what this treaty will mean to our people. Members from other sections of the country have already indicated the benefits that will accrue to the people in their respective districts. My remarks will be more or less confined to the benefits that the maritime provinces will derive from this agreement. I shall deal first with our export trade, consisting in great part of fish, lumber, potatoes, apples and foxes. I shall not take up the time of the house in discussing the latter four items because the hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley), in his speech the other afternoon, dealt very effectively with the apple industry, and other hon. members from the maritimes have shown the likely improvements in the lumber, potato and fox industries.

But I might say in passing that at the annual meeting of the councillors of the municipality of Antigonish, a resolution was passed offering free to young men, farms which belonged to the municipality, the only condition being that these young men should operate the farms and pay the taxes for five years, after which time they would be given the deeds of the property. I learn from the municipal clerk that this offer has attracted many applicants from various parts of the province who are anxious to start out for themselves in the farming industry. I suggest that the government should make it as easy as possible for these young farmers to get government loans to help them stock and equip these farms, thus putting themselves in a position to take advantage of the benefits of the trade treaty.

I am lately in receipt of a copy of a resolution of protest passed by the Antigonish county farmers' association based on an intimation they received of a sales tax about to be imposed by the government on certain materials used in making balanced rations for poultry and live stock. But on inquiry I was glad to learn from the Minister of National Revenue that such is not the case, that there has never been any intention on the part of the government to impose such a tax. At this point, I should like to say that I was pleased to note that the government was able to reduce the duty on corn, a reduction which will represent an immense saving to our farmers.

Referring to the fishing industry, with the kind permission of the house I wish to put on Hansard a statement indicating the benefits which the fishermen of the maritimes will derive from the new trade agreement, based on the quantities of fish shipped to the United States in 1936 and 1937. This statement includes only fish known to have been produced and shipped from Atlantic coast waters, and does not take into consideration salmon, halibut and tuna, which would considerably increase the given figures, but for these items figures separate from Pacific coast shipments were not available. My object in preparing this statement is to show in definite figures the extra amounts which the fishermen would have enjoyed in those years had the present treaty duties been in effect. In 1936 this amount was $221,738.61, and in 1937, $184,-076.46, money which would have represented a great boon to maritime fishermen. Estimating that the shipments of these classes of fish for the present year will even approximate those of either 1936 or 1937, we can easily see what a benefit the fishermen will derive, and I think it is quite safe to say that with this added impetus the fish export business will increase materially over the figures for either of the given years.

But our maritime fishermen, whose gear has been seriously destroyed in the recent storms, will need some real government assistance to repair and replace their losses, and thus enable them to carry on the fishing business in a worth while way, so that they will be in a position to avail themselves of the benefits indicated in the treaty.

The benefits which the consumer will receive from this trade agreement must not be overlooked. Many articles of every-day use, such as foodstuffs, clothing, et cetera, will be reduced in price, thereby tending to lower the cost of living. The producer also will benefit from the lower prices he will have to pay for articles of production—fishermen's supplies, dairy and horticultural machinery, fertilizers, et cetera. Personally, Mr. Speaker, I think this government deserves great credit for being able to consummate an agreement such as this presently being discussed without having made any concessions on coal, which means a great deal not only to the miners in the maritimes, but to those interested in many other branches of industry, such as the farmer, fisherman, lumberman, manufacturer, railroad man and others.

To put our people of the maritimes in a position to take advantage of the benefits of this trade agreement there are suggestions I should like to make to the government. I believe there should be a revision of the freight rates. From a recent issue of the Halifax Chronicle I learn that Mr. Rand H. Matheson, manager of the maritime transportation commission, told an Amherst audience that a revision of our freight rates is essential to meet changing conditions in transportation, as well as to establish a complete parity with rates granted certain types of freight in upper Canada.

While on the subject of transportation, I wish to draw to the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) and the other members of the government, a most unfortunate situation existing in my constituency. In Guysborough county there are thousands of acres of standing timber that cannot be cut and put on the market for the very simple reason that we have no means of transporting it.

Mr. BAKER: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member tell us what authority he is quoting, or what he is reading from?

Mr. MARTIN: He is referring to his notes.

Mr. EULER: He is not establishing any precedent anyhow.

Mr. KIRK: As many hon. members probably know, there is a limited distance in which lumber can be hauled profitably with teams, also a limited distance in which it can be hauled by auto truck, which means that there remain only two profitable methods of transportation, namely, rail and water. In this instance the haul to the waterfront is too long, and we have no railroad. The construction of what was known as the Guysborough railway was started in 1929 by the then government, under the leadership of the present Prime Minister. But after several millions had already been spent on the construction of the railway, and although there was a great number of unemployed in the country at the time, the government which succeeded my right hon. leader's government in 1930 issued instructions that the work on the railway should be stopped. To those, of course, who know the political record of the constituency, the reason for such an order is quite obvious. I hope, however, it is not the intention of this present government, again under the leadership of my right hon. leader, to allow the money that has already been spent on this project to be entirely lost. In this connection may I quote from an editorial which appeared some months ago in The Eastern Chronicle, a newspaper published in Nova Scotia, headed "Guysborough railway":

> No sadder picture can be imagined than to drive through that country and note the political ruins of that enterprise. The grading has been completed and is now growing grass. The right-of-way belongs to the government, having been purchased and paid for. The concrete abutments for bridges are in place. All seems ready for the ties, rails, steel bridges and the station houses and platforms. As it stands to-day, it is a travesty upon the viciousness of party politics. For half a century the road has figured in public debates and in 1910 a contract was let and a change of government cancelled it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but he is out of order, and I would ask him to confine his remarks to the trade treaty.

Mr. KIRK: I am trying, Mr. Speaker, to show the necessity of building a railroad in that territory, so that its products can be transported and get the benefit of this trade treaty.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The point of order is well rail-roaded.

Mr. STEVENS: The railroad is probably included in the $112,000,000.

Mr. KIRK: I continue with the quotation from The Eastern Chronicle:

> In 1926 negotiations for its construction were again resumed and a contract let to the Dominion Construction Company. Actual work was undertaken and the present state of the road reached, when a change of government took place in 1930, when there developed the most callous instance of political rancour ever displayed. The work was immediately abandoned. The steel for rails and bridges assembled on cars at Stellarton were distributed elsewhere and people of that long-suffering county made to suffer for their political sins. It was rabid Toryism run wild.
> The need for this railway was just as evident in 1930 as it was in 1926. The need is just as evident to-day. If the Liberal government of 1926 was justified in starting the work, as it was, that same justification exists to-day.
> Might we point out several pertinent things with respect to the Guysborough railway. It is intended to tap a county that has no other railway connection. It is the great unspoiled and undeveloped county of the maritimes. Guysborough county possesses a potential fishery wealth such as no other stretch of coast line in Canada, but alas, those sturdy fishermen of that coastal county have no means of transportation by which to market the product of the sea that comes in such great quantities to its shore.

Again Guysborough county has a great lumber wealth. This is evident by the use made in that regard of the first ten miles from Sunny Brae, where the projected road contacted the established railway. On this ten miles, rails were laid during construction and have been maintained in semi-fashion since for the movement of lumber freight. This information is furnished by one who should know, and is to the effect that upon that short section of rough road there originated more freight than on any like branch in the Canadian National railway system.

Another important item at this juncture in unemployment would be the completion of the railway. The rails and bridges would give direct employment to the steel workers—both manufacturing and fabricating. The ties and the station houses would employ lumber from our own woods. In fact, the completion of the road would call for, first, the utilization of our natural products; and, second, the employment of local labour.

The prospects of this road are not to be overlooked. Tapping as it will the great fishery resources, should bring to its support the Minister of Fisheries. The agricultural possibilities are in keeping with that reached by any maritime road. The magnificent St. Mary's valleys are an instance. Although now miles away from the rails they are productive and prosperous, and, had they transport connection, their wealth could be enormously increased. The region through which the railway projects is a sportsman's paradise and can be developed into a holiday seeker's mecca.

These arguments are old and oft repeated, but the repetition has not detracted from their truth, as a true story cannot die of old age.

But over all is the necessity of keeping faith with the people of Guysborough county. They have been falsely and traitorously dealt with. They have been made a cat's paw of a Tory majority in Ontario or some other section, and such wretched intolerance should not be permitted to obtain.

I want to tell members of this house, and especially the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), the Minister of Transport, and their colleagues, that this section of Canada needs a railway to open up and develop this territory which can be developed in no other way. Lumber, farming, fishing and mining would all benefit, and the development of these industries naturally would mean employment—a livelihood for many of our people, which in turn would mean greater liquid wealth which would undoubtedly help the railroads, steamship companies, manufacturers and many others. I cannot urge too strongly on the members of this government the great possibilities that exist for the development of the natural resources of Guysborough, if this railway is completed. The hardwood areas alone are something that, within ten years, are going to be of inestimable value. I might remind the ministers that there is still considerable unemployment in our country, although we do not hear so much about it as in some sections, because our people are the type who tighten up their belts, so to speak, and endure with patience all manner of hardships and suffering before resorting to relief.

Mr. MANION: They have to, under this government.

Mr. KIRK: And they had to do plenty of it between 1930 and 1935. This unemployment situation is just one more reason why I implore this government to complete the construction of the Guysborough railroad as soon as possible.

Before concluding my remarks, I wish to refer to the Saint Francis Xavier university extension movement which has for some years been cooperating with the various departments of government. Their activities are many and varied, and there is no doubt that they are assisting our primary producers in a way that will help them to profit to an even greater extent from the trade treaty.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with the remarks of my friend the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Fleming), who thinks that the government should not go to the country this year. On the contrary, my opinion is that the record of the Mackenzie King government is such that they can go to the country at any time and receive a mandate from the people to continue to carry on their good work.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): They will get the same result, no matter when they go.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, to-day I propose to discuss this Canada-United States trade agreement, and the concessions which have been made by Canada under the United Kingdom-Canada agreement, from the point of view of those Canadians who live on the Pacific slope, the people of British Columbia—that great province which is rapidly becoming the third province in Canada in population, but is furthest from the centre of Canada, and with problems so different from the rest of Canada—problems which we feel are often so little understood by the other Canadians. Incidentally, no individuals could do more than members of this house to help in the understanding of our problems. They are all in a position of influence, and they all have free transportation, both for themselves and for their families. I suggest to them that during the coming summer those who have not been to the Pacific coast should visit our province. Hon. members on the other side may not have an opportunity to do so under the same favourable conditions next year. We shall be very glad to have them with us before the unhappy event. That invitation is extended particularly to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and to the senior members of his cabinet, who have been conspicuous by their absence from British Columbia since the election campaign of four years ago.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We have been too busy here.

Mr. GREEN: To understand the effect of this agreement and of these concessions on British Columbia, one must bear in mind two facts, which I should like to stress. First, British Columbia is primarily a lumber province, with the bulk of the lumbering done in the coast region, where we have the famous Douglas fir. The second fact which should be borne in mind is that the neighbouring states of Washington and Oregon are also on the Pacific slope, and that they occupy much the same position in the United States as British Columbia occupies in Canada, producing much the same products and giving us the stiffest kind of competition, for example, in lumbering, fruit growing and fishing. These two states have a much larger population than British Columbia, and their people have much more capital behind them than our people. Also they have in the other states of the union a much larger home market than British Columbia has in the other provinces of this dominion.

It so happens that lumbering and fruit growing are the two industries in our province which are most affected by this United States agreement and by the concessions Canada has made under the United Kingdom agreement. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) has dealt with the fruit growing industry, and I do not intend to deal with it to-day, but I do propose to deal with the industry of lumbering, which is our greatest and most important industry.

I am glad to be able to do so, because the government can do something further for the lumber industry, whereas it cannot do anything for any other industry. A discussion on lumbering is not purely academic, as it is with respect to other Canadian industries. I say this because under the Canada-United States agreement lumber, and lumber alone, is dealt with in two stages, the first stage coming into force with the rest of the treaty on January 1 of this year, the second stage coming into force only if, as and when the United States sees fit to remove its import excise tax of $1.50 per thousand feet board measure. In other words, the bargain on lumber is not yet concluded, although this government have put Canada in the weak position of binding herself in advance to make further great concessions in lumber if the United States chooses to bring in the second stage by dropping its import excise tax.

Incidentally, the United States is not bound to drop that excise tax; it is not bound to bring in the second stage of the lumber bargain. But I do suggest that the government's job on lumber is only half done, and I urge upon them at once to bring all possible pressure to bear on the United States not to renew this import excise tax when it expires at the end of June of this year. I urge that because the first stage of the lumber bargain is all one-sided, and unless this second stage is brought into force the agreement will have been most unfair to the lumber industry; certainly there will have been a great injustice done to the thousands of people engaged in that industry in British Columbia, to thousands of others engaged in dependent industries, and, in fact, to people in almost every walk of life in our province.

That brings me to a consideration of just what this stage of the lumber bargain is. But as a background, and so that the real effects of this Canada-United States agreement and the concessions Canada has made under the Canada-United Kingdom agreement may be clearly seen, I should like to sketch roughly the history of the lumbering industry in the coast area of British Columbia during the last decade. I deal with that area alone because while there is lumbering done in other parts of the province, the industry is largely centred in the wet belt which is known as the coast area.

The story of lumber in that area for the past ten years is quite a romantic tale. In 1929, just ten years ago, that area sold approximately 1,040,000,000 feet board measure of lumber in Canada, in our home market, the best market any industry can have. We sold a little more than half that amount, namely 540,000,000 board feet, in the United States. In the United States market we had free entry—no duty, no excise tax. We had had free entry since 1913. We sold only 70,000,000 feet to the United Kingdom where at that time, of course, we had no preference, and we sold, including the 70,000,000 feet to Great Britain, a total of 160,000,000 feet tc the empire. In addition, we sold 240,000,000 feet to foreign lands, principally Japan and China.

I propose to say nothing further about the home market, except that it fell with the depression and has risen again until in 1937 it was about 565,000,000 feet; or about the foreign market, except that it has gone on much the same as in 1929, now up, now down; at the present time it is below 100,000,000 feet, largely because of the trouble in Asia.

I deal particularly with our markets in the United States, the United Kingdom and the British empire. In 1930 the United States passed the Hawley-Smoot tariff, the highest, I believe, in the modern history of the United States. That tariff imposed a duty of $1 per thousand feet against Canadian lumber, with the result that in 1931 our sales to the United States had dropped by about one-half, while our sales to the empire remained about the same. Not content with the Hawley-Smoot tariff the United States in 1932 passed a Revenue Act, which imposed an import excise tax of $3 per thousand feet, making a hurdle of $4 per thousand feet to be overcome by our lumber going into the United States. That hurdle was prohibitive.

Hon. members should bear in mind at all times that this business of raising high levies, this business of stopping trade, was started not by Canada but by the United States. Our lumber market was placed in such a position by this hurdle of $4 per thousand feet that a substitute market simply had to be found, and fortunately the Bennett government were able to negotiate in 1932 the empire agreements which gave us, generally speaking, a preference of ten per cent. As a result of these two moves—the United States raising its levies and Great Britain and other parts of the empire giving us a preference—in 1933 British Columbia sold in the United States only 30,000,000 feet as against over 540,000,000 feet in 1929; but despite the depression, our sales to Great Britain went up from 70,000,000 feet in 1929 to 270,000,000 feet in 1933, having increased about four times, and our sales to the empire rose from 160,000,000 feet in 1929 to 430,000,000 feet in 1933. By 1935 our sales to the United States were up to 95,000,000 feet, still very low, while our sales to the United Kingdom were 455,000,000 feet, and to the empire, 635,000,000 feet. The empire trade was steadily increasing.

In the fall of 1935 this government came into office and negotiated the Canada-United States agreement, which cut in half the duty and import excise tax, totalling $4 per thousand feet, subject to a quota of 250,000,000 feet in any one year for Douglas fir and western hemlock, which are the two types of lumber we produce in the largest quantities. That first Canada-United States agreement has been a great disappointment to the lumber industry of British Columbia. In the years following the negotiation of the treaty Canada has never been able to sell the quota. The nearest approach was in 1938 when we sold approximately 170,000,000 feet, or about seventy per cent. But on the other side of the picture our sales to the United Kingdom have climbed and climbed until in 1938 we sold to Great Britain 740,000,000 feet—more lumber than we have ever sold to the United States in one year. To the empire as a whole we sold last year 960,000,000 feet, quite an increase from 160,000,000 feet in 1929—all as a direct result of the preference given us by the empire trade agreements.

Now this present government boast of increasing export trade. They boast of the great treaties they have negotiated, but they never have achieved anything like the empire agreements, and I do not believe they ever will. If they ever did achieve agreements of that type, we would be kept here for five years hearing all the talk about the wonderful things that had been done.

Mr. HANSON: May I ask a question?

Mr. GREEN: Ask it after dinner. The United States sums up the situation very clearly in its press release dealing with the United Kingdom agreement. At page 36 we find:

> The position with regard to a number of important individual products is even more unsatisfactory than that with regard to the wood group as a whole, since there has been, as a result of the import duties, a very serious diversion of the trade from the United States to empire countries in several products, notably Douglas fir and certain other softwood lumber, plywood, and doors. In the case of doors, the United Kingdom had taken—

"Had" taken, mark you.

> —as high as 94 per cent of the United States total annual exports, but the increase in 1935 in the duty to 2s. 6d. per door has almost eliminated American competition. One of the major objectives of the present trade agreement has been, therefore—

This is the United States speaking.

> —to restore as far as possible the competitive position of the United States as a supplier of these products which have been so seriously affected by empire preference in the United Kingdom.

PRIVATE BILL

QUEBEC RAILWAY, LIGHT AND POWER COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 8, respecting the Quebec Railway, Light and Power Company—Mr. Parent (Quebec West and South)—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Declaratory.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Chairman, I find that this is bad legislation.

The CHAIRMAN: I must inform the committee that this section was amended in committee.

Mr. POULIOT: I know that very well; I was there when it was amended, and I will express my view about the amendment, which makes the bill more unsound legally.

Mr. STEVENS: Might we have the amendment read? I think it is the custom.

The CHAIRMAN: The following is to be added to subsection 2:

Subject to all provincial and municipal enactments in respect to highways and motor vehicles operated thereon, and applicable thereto.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you, sir. The story behind this bill is that in the year of grace 1925 the city of Quebec entered into a contract with the Quebec Light, Heat and Power Company, or the Quebec Railway Company, by virtue of which an exclusive thirty year franchise was granted by the city for trolley car operation.

Mr. STEVENS: What was the date of the contract?

Mr. POULIOT: It was granted in 1925, so the thirty year franchise would extend to the year of grace 1955.

Mr. STEVENS: That was between the city of Quebec and the company?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. Last fall another agreement was entered into in order that the same exclusive franchise might include the operation of buses until the year of grace 1955. The bill is interesting, but the bad part of it is still more interesting. I am strongly opposed to any exclusive franchise. I am for competition. I know it is pretty hard to have street railway competition in a city like Quebec because it might turn out as badly as it did in Detroit; they might become bankrupt. A certain privilege is required for the construction of railway lines on the streets of a city, but when it comes to the operation of a bus service the situation is entirely different. In the first place, I do not see why this company should have an exclusive franchise for the operation of buses within the city of Quebec. I would ask hon. members to read the explanatory note, which contains the words "in and in the neighbourhood of the city of Quebec." What is the neighbourhood of the city of Quebec? Does it extend to Rivière du Loup, which is 120 miles away?

Mr. PARENT (Quebec West and South): Oh, no.

Mr. POULIOT: Just a moment; my hon. friend may answer my questions in due course. I want to know; I do not want "no." It may come as far west of Quebec as the beautiful Gatineau hills. Then these people of the Quebec Railway Company will take advantage of this legislation to say, "we have an enactment of the dominion parliament granting us a franchise. Therefore all you other owners of buses get down into the ditch when we pass along. We are masters of the highway." I am not for this legislation, I am all against it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank my hon. friend for saying "hear, hear." There are some members of this committee who are opposed to all exclusive franchises, some of whom spoke on behalf of this bill in committee the other day. But I will not insist on that any longer. My first point is that the granting of any exclusive privileges is against all principles of Liberalism, and I am strongly opposed to it.

Mr. MANION: Is that not a strange reason, coming from that side of the house?

Mr. POULIOT: Well, if my eyes do not deceive me, this bill comes from that side of the house. But I hope to make conversions by explaining my point of view. There is something else. If there is an exclusive franchise there must be some control of rates. Will that control be exercised by the public utilities commission of the province of Quebec or by the transport board that we have here in Ottawa? We are facing a dilemma. We are told that the company has a federal charter, which it obtained some forty years ago in order to secure a federal subsidy. Since then, however, most of their legislation has been provincial; many times the city of Quebec has made agreements with this company, which agreements have been sanctioned by provincial legislation. That is known to everyone who is fond of reading provincial statutes. Who will exercise control in connection with rates? Will it be the public utilities commission of Quebec or will it be the federal transport board? It will be neither. This legislation is hybrid; it is illegitimate. If we had no lady members of this house I would use other and possibly stronger expressions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not asking what those expressions may be, but I really should like to understand why this company will not come under either provincial or federal control with regard to rates.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend, who has been a professor of philosophy, knows very well that the first part of a discussion is the status quaestionis, the statement of the question, and afterwards we make due distinctions. I hope my hon. friend will not ask me to define the Quebec utilities commission or the federal transport board, which he understands very well, I am sure, as all members of the committee do.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If I understood the hon. member aright, he said the control over rates would not come under either body, and I do not understand that statement.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank my hon. friend for his question, and I hope that by explaining the matter clearly I may bring him to agree with me. The chairman of the transport board has expressed himself clearly in regard to the operation of buses; this matter does not come under the transport board except perhaps—he was not sure of that—in the case of bus companies operating between two provinces or between one province and a foreign country such as the United States. His doubt was on this ground, that at first the railway commision was appointed to study and decide upon railway lines and railway questions. Later, its powers were extended, but not to include bus companies operating only within a province. That is the point. And by stating in the explanatory note to the bill that the bus company is operating within the limits and in the neighbourhood of the city of Quebec, we are to presume that the operations will not be outside the province of Quebec.

Moreover, the company cannot come under the jurisdiction of the transport board, unless it is stated that the buses will operate between two provinces, or between one province and a foreign country. That is an important point. Therefore it is beyond doubt that the transport board has no authority whatever over the rates on the buses which will be operated by the company within the city of Quebec or in the neighbourhood of that city, whatever that neighbourhood may include. If I have not made myself clear on this point, I would suggest that hon. members ask me to be more precise. That, however, is the first point.

Then there was an amendment which made the bill still worse. Our contention was that this parliament has no authority whatever upon the operation of buses, because they come under provincial jurisdiction entirely. The provinces impose licences on buses, and we have no authority whatever, because they use the king's highway for their operations and, according to the law and according to the general understanding, we have nothing whatever to do with buses.

Although I am not sure, because I had occasion to leave the committee for a few moments, I believe an amendment was suggested by the legal representative of the Department of Transport. He suggested an addition to the bill whereby it should be subject to all provincial and municipal regulations. As hon. members know very well, this parliament has no authority whatever with regard to municipal matters. All those things come under the exclusive jurisdiction of provincial legislatures; everyone knows that. Therefore, if there is an appendix to the bill to the effect that the whole matter will be subject to provincial and municipal regulations, there is the implication that it cannot be subject to the regulations of the transport board. It would come only under provincial jurisdiction, and therefore we would have no jurisdiction at all to include buses in the powers granted to the company.

If hon. members were to take the trouble to read section 8 of chapter 59 of the statutes of 1895, they would find the following in the explanatory note:

> The company may use and employ for locomotion and propulsion of its cars, vehicles and rolling stock, where such power is required, electricity in all its forms, steam and any approved mechanical power or other means, agency or force for such purpose that science or invention may develop, and shall have all rights, powers, privileges—

And so on. We will notice the expression "electricity in all its forms, steam and any approved mechanical power or other means, agency or force for such purpose that science or invention may develop." They already have the power to operate any kind of vehicles, including buses or steam engines. But they come here to ask us for some privileged federal legislation, and I am opposed to it.

They say a serious doubt was expressed by all concerned—referring to the authority of the board of transport—which I denied, of course. No learned counsel appearing for the company or for the city of Quebec dared to affirm or to state that the board of transport had any authority to fix rates.

Mr. HEAPS: What would my hon. friend offer in place of this bill? What would he substitute?

Mr. POULIOT: I would substitute nothing, because I assume I would suggest the withdrawal of the bill. This is none of our business. We are here asked to ratify a private agreement between a railway company and the city of Quebec; that is what is behind the bill. Before that, when the same thing occurred, the company and the city of Quebec went to the legislature to have their agreements confirmed. Now for the first time they come before the federal parliament and ask us to do what was done before by the Quebec legislature, namely to confirm a private agreement. We have nothing whatever to do with it.

If the travelling public go to the board of transport they will be told by the chairman and the learned commissioners that they have nothing to do with it, because they have no control whatever over bus services, and that it is a provincial matter. If the company is brought before the public utilities commission of the province of Quebec, it will argue that that body has no authority. The company will say, "our power to operate buses has been granted to us by the dominion parliament; therefore we deny the jurisdiction of the Quebec utilities commission." Then the people of the province of Quebec will complain about the high rates imposed upon them by the company, with the assent of the city of Quebec—which does not make it any better. The people will have to incur heavy expenditures to have writs of certiorari, and so on, to bring the matter before another court, if they can. They will be in a muddle of procedure—and in the meantime they will be paying high rates to travel on those buses. That is one point.

Every member of the committee knows very well that the private legislation passed by any provincial legislature, and by the dominion parliament as well, is a shameful queue to the statute books of the country. There are very few pieces of private legislation which can stand. Nearly every piece of private legislation is pure rot, and this time the Quebec Railway Company comes, with the assent of the city of Quebec, to secure from this dominion parliament an exclusive franchise—under disguise. And in virtue of that amphibious legislation, when the people of the city of Quebec and the surrounding neighbourhood —which might be the whole province, because no one knows the ambitions of the president of the Quebec Railway Company, and his associates—

Mr. COLDWELL: Who is the president?

Mr. POULIOT: I assume it is Julian C. Smith. When those people desire to extend the operation of the bus company to all boundaries of the province of Quebec, and whenever a man, or two men, or ten men, or scores, or hundreds of men complain of the high rates imposed upon them by the company, they will go to the board of transport, where they will be told that there is no jurisdiction and that they should go to the Quebec utilities commission. If they follow that advice, they will apply to the Quebec utilities commission, but they will be told by that commission that they have no jurisdiction. That commission will contend that, as the company is operating under a federal bill giving it the power to operate buses, they can do nothing and the people must suffer an injustice. The people will then curse the dominion parliament and will write to the hon. members who voted for this bill. They will be told they were wrong in thinking the bill was innocuous, that it covered simply an agreement between the city and the railway company.

Mr. HANSON: Would not the amendment submitted by the Department of Transport and accepted by the committee protect the government and the city of Quebec? I did not understand it thoroughly, but that amendment was accepted unanimously in the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: I am just coming to that point. A learned counsel of the department, who is just as familiar with the law as I am with astronomy—it is a very dark night to-night—approved that amendment. What power do we have to state in our legislation that it shall be subject to provincial or municipal regulation?

Mr. HANSON: The amendment protects the provincial rights.

Mr. POULIOT: No. My hon. friend is good enough to listen to my argument, and I want to try to satisfy his mind entirely. This parliament has exclusive jurisdiction in certain matters, and the provincial legislatures have exclusive jurisdiction in other matters. I think my hon. friend will agree with me on that. If we have jurisdiction to pass legislation giving the railway company the right to operate buses, then we also have the right to regulate the rates to be charged on those buses.

Mr. HANSON: If it does not interfere with provincial rights.

Mr. POULIOT: No. I want my hon. friend to listen to me. I have not finished, but I am on the eve of finishing my remarks. If we have jurisdiction to grant to the railway company the right to operate buses, then we also have the right to regulate the rates charged for travel on those buses. That is clear and evident. If, for the sake of appearance, we add the words "subject to provincial and municipal regulation," that means that the provincial and municipal regulations are intra vires of the province and the municipality and we have no right whatever.

Mr. HANSON: I do not think the committee had any jurisdiction to decide what are provincial and federal rights. They were just considering a bill, and an amendment was accepted to provide that we should not interfere with provincial rights.

Mr. POULIOT: I was there when the vote was called, and I said "on division." I did not want to hold the bill in committee; I wanted it to come to the house. I am explaining this as clearly as I can. If the provinces have power to make regulations as to rates, then we have none. If we have the power, they have none.

Mr. HANSON: That is not for the committee to decide.

Mr. POULIOT: The committee of the whole can decide whatever it wants to. I am here to express my views, and I shall express them. It takes some time to understand a legal question of this kind, but the more complicated it is, the more interesting it is. Why have we to rely upon provincial authority for regulations in this matter? If we have no authority, what is the use of passing vague legislation like this to deceive the people and to embarrass all concerned? The people in Quebec are bound to use these buses because there is no competition. There is bound to be plenty of trouble because the company will rely upon the fact that there is no jurisdiction in the board of transport or the Quebec utilities commission to deal with complaints about rates. I would thank the sponsor of this bill to give us a little more explanation about the matter.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. CHARLES PARENT (Quebec West and South): Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). First of all, let me assure him that it is not our intention to operate autobuses in his constituency. All we are asking by this bill is the right to clarify a certain clause in the original charter granted in 1895. At that time there were no buses and no one had foreseen this new method of transportation. We claim that the original charter covers whatever forms of transportation science may discover. There has been a demand in the city of Quebec for an improvement in the transportation system. The same is true of many other cities. The people are asking for motor-buses.

The CHAIRMAN: Would the hon. member mind speaking a little louder? I think the Hansard reporter is having difficulty in hearing his remarks.

Mr. PARENT (Quebec West and South): That shows the necessity for some amplifying system in the chamber.

There are in the city of Quebec at the present time some autobuses which have been used there for a few months, running out to a little suburb about three miles outside the city. That territory was actually covered by the Quebec railway with a tramway line, but under the pressure of the population of Sillery the tramway service was replaced by autobuses. The company is bringing this bill forward under pressure of public demand. In my own county of Quebec West and South we have a tramway line which was laid thirty-five years ago and is still in operation, but some people have to walk ten or fifteen blocks before they can get the tram.

It is easy, when a company comes to parliament asking for certain powers, for someone to raise the cry of trusts and make all kinds of charges, but anyone who is familiar with local conditions would not be opposed to this bill. It has been submitted to the civic authorities in the city of Quebec, and I do not see why there should be so much blowing of bubbles over such an insignificant amendment, because we have all the protection that is afforded by our committee on railways and canals. There is nothing in this bill to confer an exclusive franchise or to interfere with the rights of anyone else who wants to start some other transportation system or autobuses.

The Quebec Railway is a company that has invested about $20,000,000 in the tramway system in the city of Quebec, and autobuses are being asked for practically unanimously by the people of that city. Anyone who knows how narrow the streets are in the city of Quebec, and how the tramway line obstructs traffic, will be in favour of this bill. It is all very well for the hon. member to rise in his place and say that Julian C. Smith is president of the company. Yes, he is the president of the company because he has proved that he knows something about transportation and the electrical systems of this country. He knows that what he is asking for here is to meet a public demand, and the company would not be seeking to spend money on autobuses if it were not that there is a public demand for them. After all, the money that has been invested in the system must be protected, and if the tramway line is going to be withdrawn who is going to bear the loss? The authority to operate autobuses is desired in order to give a better service to the people of the city of Quebec. That is all there is in the bill. It will benefit the labour class especially in the constituency of Quebec West and South.

The rates actually in force on the autobuses are the rates agreed to by the tramway contract of 1925. They are not asking for any higher rates for the autobuses. They simply wish to give the people a better service.

Doubt has been expressed whether the language of the act covered autobuses. When I presented the bill I told the house that as far as I was concerned I had no doubt that autobuses were covered by the language of the act, that autobuses were a product of modern science and invention, and that the company had the power to use them. Some of the other lawyers objected and contended that autobuses were not covered, and it was thought better therefore to clarify the language It was felt that it was such a small amendment that there could not possibly be any objection to it.

After all, we are just asking that the language be amended to cover autobuses, a product of modern science and invention. One might just as well call them tramways propelled by gasoline motors, but somebody happened to call them autobuses. What difference does the name make? The main thing is that this bill has been brought before the house to settle all doubts about the matter. The bill confers no exclusive power upon the company, nor does it give them the right to increase their rates or charge any kind of rate, as has been suggested. They are bound by their contract of 1925 with the city of Quebec, and we are not asking the parliament of Canada to do anything about the rates. We are just asking that the original charter, which was granted at a time when autobuses were not in existence or even thought of, be amended by adding the word "autobuses," in order to remove any doubt that may exist in anybody's mind.

There is nothing in the bill that I can see to prevent any company from being formed by anyone, even by my hon. friend from Témiscouata, to operate autobuses. In fact, I am told that there are already requests before the public utilities commission of Quebec to operate autobuses in competition with this company, and if the public utilities commission grants that power there will be the competition that my hon. friend desires.

To sum up, I say that we are as much in need of autobuses in the city of Quebec as my hon. friend from Témiscouata was in need of a railway station in Rivière du Loup.

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Outremont): Mr. Chairman, if the matter were as serious as suggested by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), I think every member of the house would agree with him. But it is somewhat different. The question was studied in the standing committee on railways and canals, and I should like to explain to the house in a very few words the question that arises.

The Quebec Railway is a corporation incorporated by a statute of the dominion parliament. Therefore the Quebec Railway must seek in its charter, which is chapter 59 of the statutes of 1895, 58 and 59 Victoria, all its powers and authority. A statutory corporation does not possess any other authority than that which is conferred upon it by statute.

Since 1915 the world has continued to move and a great many things have been improved upon, in Quebec as elsewhere, because there is some progress being made from time to time even in Quebec.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Order.

Mr. VIEN: In Quebec it has come about that autobuses are desired on certain streets and in the suburbs. In the city of Montreal, autobuses have replaced street-cars in certain districts. The city council have directed the Quebec Railway to substitute autobuses for street-cars.

We are not concerned at all with the contracts which were entered into between the Quebec Railway and the city of Quebec. This is not within our jurisdiction. The question arising out of the bill which is before this committee is not that at all. The chairman of the board of transport has expressed a certain doubt as to the power of the Quebec Railway Company to operate buses, and as regards the jurisdiction of the board of transport with respect to buses. Section 2, subsection 21 of the Railway Act, defines a railway. The word "autobuses" is not included. Therefore it was deemed advisable for the Quebec Railway Company to come to parliament to seek authority to operate buses. The committee is not asked to determine the contracts or the privileges or the exclusive franchises of the city of Quebec, in connection with buses. This is not within our jurisdiction, and parliament and this committee are not asked to determine that point. Parliament is asked only to grant to the Quebec Railway Company authority to operate buses if the city of Quebec in its wisdom desires to substitute buses for street cars.

My learned friend, the hon. member for Témiscouata suggested that there was an amphibious jurisdiction. This must be the offspring of his fertile imagination. There is no jurisdiction. Parliament has created a corporation. In any statutory corporation there must be distinguished the authority and the power. Authority and power are not the same thing. I have the authority to buy any real estate in Montreal, but I may not have the purchasing power to buy it. I am entitled to buy it if I like, but I may not have the power. When parliament created the Quebec Railway it gave it the authority to operate but it did not give it the power. Section 10, subsection 4 of the act, stated:

> No power or authority granted or authorized under the provisions of this section shall be exercised within the limits of the jurisdiction of the city of Quebec, the Quebec north shore turnpike trustees or any municipality respectively, except with the prior consent in each and every case of such city, trustees or municipality respectively, and upon such conditions as they may severally consent to and agree upon.

Therefore there is no exclusive power. There is only the constitution or creation of a corporation with the authority to operate provided they get power from the municipal authority. So to-night we are not called upon to determine whether there will be exclusive jurisdiction or exclusive power or exclusive privilege and franchise; we are simply called upon to give the authority to the Quebec Railway to operate autobuses or other buses—trolley buses—if the city of Quebec desires to have buses in lieu of the street railway.

I should like to draw the attention of the committee to this point. In committee we added to the end of section 1 the following words:

> Subject to all provincial and municipal enactments in respect to highways and motor vehicles operated thereon, and applicable thereto.

[Mr. Vien.]

Therefore no jurisdiction on the highways is being affected by this bill. If they operate autobuses they will be subject to the public utilities commission of the province of Quebec, and their rates will be subject to the regulations of that body. Moreover, provision is made in the bill as amended to make sure that there is no encroachment on provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Was the city of Quebec represented before the committee?

Mr. VIEN: The city of Quebec was represented before the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: By the chief counsel.

Mr. VIEN: Mr. Nadeau, the chief legal officer of the city of Quebec, appeared before the committee and stated that the company and the city had entered into a contract for the operation of buses in lieu of street-cars; both parties are quite agreeable to it, and the people of Quebec appear to be quite satisfied with the system. Be that as it may, this is not determined by this bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Was there anybody there objecting?

Mr. VIEN: Nobody except the hon. member for Témiscouata, who lives some eighty or a hundred miles, or maybe two hundred miles, away.

Mr. POULIOT: It is not a question of where I live; it is a question of what I see in the form of bad legislation, and I am strongly objecting to it.

Mr. DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. VIEN: I have no objection to the hon. member for Témiscouata objecting to the bill. He is entitled to do so. But I say that the people of Quebec appeared to be unanimous in their approval of the substitution of buses for street cars. But we are not determining that point at all. We are giving to the Quebec Railway the authority, not the power, to operate buses if they and the city come to an agreement in connection therewith. The company is bound to come to parliament. There is no authority other than that of the dominion parliament, because the Quebec Railway is a creation of the dominion parliament and it cannot seek authority elsewhere. It seems that in 1895 the question of buses was not contemplated. Now that buses are necessary and needed, this is the proper forum to come to for the necessary authority. It is an amendment to the Quebec Railway Act a statute of the dominion parliament. The standing committee on railways and canals thought it proper to recommend the bill as amended.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): When there is such agreement among lawyers as we find in connection with this bill, I am convinced. We have the solicitor of the city of Quebec, the representative of the law branch of the Department of Transport and the representative of this company, a lawyer, all agreeing, and when three great lawyers agree on a question of this kind I do not think we should waste any more time on it. I am disappointed to-night that this discussion has taken so long because I had a speech ready on the sweepstakes bill, which is an important matter.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): If this parliament passes amending legislation like this, we shall make a scrap of paper out of every provincial and municipal street railway franchise, which can be paralleled by another rival company.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. CHURCH: I say yes. By this amendment we are conferring a new motor-bus and motor-truck franchise upon this company. The company started as a provincial concern away back in 1895 when it went to the provincial legislature of Quebec and got a charter and an act passed. The incorporation of this company has been declared in eight acts not to be a work for the general advantage of Canada but a purely provincial undertaking. What do we propose to do to-night under this bill? The bill has not been submitted to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, or to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe), nor has he laid down in the house yet the policy of the government with regard to it. We are simply going to create another franchise over the head of the province of Quebec and over the heads of the many other municipalities in that province where the company operates, because the operations of this company are not confined to the city of Quebec alone. The company operates outside the city in the several municipalities which are set out in three or four pages of the statute of 1895. There is no mention of motor-buses in it.

In 1917 the municipalities had a hard fight in the House of Commons when the general Railway Act was being revised. That fight was for the municipal control of streets throughout Canada. A large number of companies had been coming to this parliament and getting statutes passed, and in that year there was a long fight for the municipal control of streets. I had to be down here to protect our streets from new federal franchises. Now that basic principle is involved in this bill—the principle won in 1917 after a long fight that no company may operate on the streets of Canadian municipalities in, on, along, over or under a highway without the consent of the municipality, yet if we pass this amendment this company may do so over provincial and municipal rights which are in jeopardy.

In connection with this bill, section 8 of chapter 59 of the statutes of 1895 does not give the company any such powers as they claim. We are told that the purpose of this bill is to clarify section 8, but I submit that a careful reading of the statute of 1895 will refute this contention. A large number of other sections of that statute must be read in conjunction with section 8 and the whole act, and marginal notes as well, to get the intention of the statute. Does this parliament propose to confer charters on purely provincial and municipal undertakings to allow the operation of motor-buses, taxicabs and so on by special federal enactment. If the national railways had been more active a few years ago, there would be no necessity for a bill such as this, and that railway would have got a bus franchise.

This bill confers a new franchise, and various provincial rights have to be considered. The Toronto transportation commission operates motor-buses in all parts of Ontario and gives a provincial service. It operates under provincial charter, using motor-buses, motor-trucks and some taxis with international affiliations and interprovincial services; it had to buy out competition. What would be the position of that concern if this parliament passed the amendment now submitted to us? To give this company an amendment would be, I repeat, simply to override the municipalities in whose territory the company would operate and give this company exclusive jurisdiction. The company would have the whole area forever for the operation of motor-buses for itself, a franchise without consideration by legislation.

This section is supposed to clarify section 8 in order to resolve doubts as to the company's powers to own and operate the necessary autobuses, trolley buses, and so on. But they have no such power by the original charter. No court of law has declared that they have that power and they know they have not. Not by the widest interpretation of chapter 59 of the statutes of 1895 can it be contended that they have any such power. But they are trying to go over the heads of the province of Quebec and the municipalities, seeking a new form of bus franchise from this high court of parliament. If we pass this amendment the transport commission of Canada will have no control over their rates. Moreover, the amendment would have the effect of giving the company radial entrances not only into the city of Quebec but also into other municipalities for motor-buses, trucks and taxicabs and power, light and buses without municipal consent. It would give the company that whole territory, without affording the municipalities any chance whatsoever to be heard before our committees or the Department of Transport.

Is it any wonder that there is an agitation in the country and that people everywhere are wondering what we are doing in this parliament when we flout the municipalities and the provinces in this manner by conferring new charters on such companies; for that is what it amounts to? I repeat, this amendment to section 8 is not a clarification but a new declaration, the conferring of an absolutely new franchise upon the company to operate in and outside the city of Quebec.

It will be seen in the explanatory note that the object of the amendment is to ensure the company's right to provide transportation "in and in the neighbourhood of the city of Quebec," and the purport of these words is set out in eight or nine pages of the parent statute. If they are to have the right to operate motor-buses they should go to the provincial legislature, which has control over highways in that province, for a new franchise. The province built the highways, and yet an effort is being made in this house to allow this company to use the provincial highways of Quebec without any reference to the provincial legislature or the municipalities who have to license these buses.

The bill is objectionable for another reason. What is the purpose of the railway committee but to consider the principle of bills of this description. In my opinion the bill is a gross infringement of provincial and municipal rights. Has the province of Quebec been asked to make representations with regard to this bill, or have the city of Quebec or the other municipalities who are vitally interested made any representations in the matter? Have they been consulted?

The CHAIRMAN: It is nine o'clock.

Progress reported.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION FOR APPROVAL SUBJECT TO REQUIRED LEGISLATION

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King that the house go into committe on the following proposed resolution:

> That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 17th day of November, 1938, between Canada and the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

Mr. GREEN: Before the house took recess at six o'clock, I had been discussing the effect of the Canada-United States trade agreement and the concessions made by Canada under the United Kingdom-Canada agreement on the lumber industry in British Columbia, which, as I had pointed out, is the greatest industry in our province. I had shown how the empire agreements of 1932 had been benefiting this lumber industry, and I think the situation with regard to these empire agreements was very well summed up by a noted old country man who visited British Columbia last summer at the head of a delegation from the British lumber trade. He was quoted in the Vancouver Province of August 30 as follows:

> Warning against any change in the present British tariff preference on British Columbia lumber was uttered here to-day by E. P. Tetsall, leader of the British lumber delegation which was banqueted by the provincial government at the Empress hotel.
> Praising the present tariff arrangement which has built Canadian export to Britain, Mr. Tetsall added: "I should regard it as reactionary and a retrograde step if any change were to take place in the conditions under which the trade has grown up and has prospered."

We now come back to the first stage of the lumber bargain with the United States, which came into effect on January 1 of this year. In this first stage Canada plays fairy godmother to the United States in several ways. In the first place, on about one-fifth of the lumber business which the British Columbia industry has built up with the United Kingdom as a result of the empire trade agreements of 1932—which one-fifth, incidentally, is worth several million dollars to British Columbia—this government gives up about three-fifths of the Canadian preference. That means, in the first place, the loss of some of our business to the United States and, in the second place, more highly competitive prices on the business we do not lose. The loss goes right back to the logger and mill worker in British Columbia. Just within the last week or two, wages in many of our leading mills were cut by ten per cent, and we find the logging business down. Then, in reference to the lumber market, we find such information as this, from the Vancouver Province of February 20, just eight days ago:

> British inquiries have been active except for "clears."

And "clears" are the type of lumber on which Canada has now given up part of her preference.

The second way in which we have been a fairy godmother to the United States is this: On the whole of our lumber business with the West Indies, which has been built up as a result of the empire agreements, involving about fourteen million feet, the preference has been cut from ten per cent to about four per cent. In the third place our business with Australia, New Zealand and South Africa is affected. These dominions were not parties to the recent tripartite negotiations in Washington, and they have yet to make their terms with the United States. Nevertheless the Canadian government has agreed in advance that no objection will be made to Australia, New Zealand and South Africa cutting our preference to the same extent that it has been cut in the British market. I would refer the house to the lumber declaration, which is a schedule to the treaty, found on page 51. I quote:

—the government of Canada will interpose no objection to the reduction by empire governments other than the United Kingdom—

As I have said, that refers to Australia, New Zealand and South Africa.

—of differential duties now levied on United States lumber to a point at which the margin of preference enjoyed by Canadian lumber will not exceed the duties and taxes now imposed on Canadian lumber on importation into the United States—

As the fourth gift to the United States, Canada agrees to cut her duty on dressed lumber coming from the United States by one-half, to ten per cent, and to keep United States rough lumber on the free list, with no quota in either case. We also agree to remove the three per cent excise tax. That adds up simply to this, that we are giving the United States a part of British Columbia's market for lumber in the prairie provinces.

In return for these gifts to the United States, in the first stage of the lumber bargain that country graciously agrees, in the first place, to remove the quota of 250,000,000 feet a year imposed on Douglas fir and western hemlock. That is the quota which Canada has never yet been able to fill. Just what value lies in that concession can be best explained by reading from an analysis of this treaty by Senator Lewis B. Schwellenbach, who is United States senator from the state of Washington. His analysis will be found in the Timber Worker, published in Seattle, under date of December 10, 1938. With regard to the removal of the quota he has this to say:

When, with all the public construction going on during the last two and one-half years, the Canadians never exceeded sixty per cent of their quota, the question of the removal of that ceiling is conclusively proved to be immaterial. Any fair-minded person must agree that in this regard no concession was made by our government.

We find a similar statement at page 51 of the United States press release on the agreement with Canada. Dealing again with the quota the United States government said:

The quota fixed in the 1936 agreement on Douglas fir and western hemlock, although representing a relatively small fraction of the domestic consumption, has not been reached by actual imports, which at their maximum, in 1937, were barely sixty per cent of the quota. This was one of the reasons for dropping the quota provision in the new agreement.

Mr. HANSON: If I may ask a question, when the hon. member is giving the figures of our exports to the United States would it not be a good idea to tell the house also what lumber Canada buys from the United States? That is reciprocity in one commodity, and I think it would be interesting to give the house that information.

Mr. GREEN: That is not in the line of my speech. If the hon. member wants to have that made clear he can make his own speech.

As the second so-called concession which the United States makes to Canada in the first stage of this lumber bargain, she has agreed to do away with the provision which required Canadian lumber to be marked "made in Canada." This marking provision was a joker put into the United States law by this same Senator Schwellenbach, in the spring of 1938; and I would remind hon. members that this government actually started to negotiate this new treaty away back in 1937. The marking provision came into force in the fall of 1938, just before negotiations were completed. An explanation of that measure will be found at page 400 of the Commercial Intelligence Journal of September 3, 1938, which points out that the law empowered the secretary of the treasury of the United States to except from the marking regulation any imported article, including lumber, subject to a proviso which apparently was put into the United States law by Senator Schwellenbach in the spring of 1938, that such power would not apply after September 1, 1938, to sawed lumber and timber, et cetera, but with this further provision:

—but the president is authorized to suspend the effectiveness of this proviso if he finds such action required to carry out any trade agreement entered into under the authority of the act of June 12, 1934, as extended.

The senator explains it all as follows:

I put this provision into the law. The house committee had refused to accept it, the house of representatives had refused to adopt it, the senate committee had refused to accept it, and I offered it upon the floor of the United States senate. I finally prevailed upon Senator Walsh of Massachusetts, chairman of the committee, to take it to conference. Those who criticized the treaty know that he succeeded in getting it accepted by the conference only upon the understanding that it probably would be removed through the medium of a treaty.

In other words, it was put in there simply for the purpose of negotiating a treaty. He sums up the value of these so-called concessions that have been given to Canada in the first stage of the lumber bargain as follows:

In the preceding two paragraphs I have outlined in full all the concessions that were granted to the Canadians so far as the lumber industry is concerned. Any honest and fair-minded individual must admit that they amount to nothing.

I think it may fairly be said that under the first stage of the lumber bargain Canada does all the giving and none of the taking. And this first stage continues in force for the life of the agreement; in other words, it is in force for three years, unless the United States congress chooses to bring the second stage into effect, by dropping the import excise tax of $1.50 a thousand. This excise tax was imposed under the Revenue Act of 1932 for a period of one year, and was renewed for periods of two years each in 1933, 1935 and 1937, so it expires at the end of June of this year. For this possible concession, which is the only one the United States makes in the second stage of the lumber bargain—and which would still leave our lumber subject to a duty of fifty cents a thousand, whereas from 1913 to 1930 it went in free—the British Columbia lumberman, logger, mill worker and employee in the dependent industries pay an added price. First of all, on the one-fifth of our lumber business with the United Kingdom, on which the Canadian preference is now cut by three-fifths, we give up the preference entirely. In other words, we let the other two-fifths go. And we also give it up entirely on a further one-fifth. This means that Canada loses her preference completely on about two-fifths of our lumber business with the United Kingdom.

In the next place, on the whole of our lumber business with the West Indies we give up the preference completely.

Mr. HANSON: I should like the privilege of asking the hon. member a question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: Read it to-morrow.

Mr. GREEN: If I have time at the end of my speech I shall be glad to answer.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. MANION: Let the hon. member make his own speech.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) has the floor, and must not be interrupted, unless he gives consent.

Mr. GREEN: I have already said that if I have time at the end of my speech I shall be glad to answer the hon. member's questions.

Mr. MANION: After the forty minutes.

Mr. GREEN: As for the whole of the lumber business which we have built up with Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, we find that in the second stage of the lumber bargain we are already bound to concur in any request from those dominions for permission to give the United States the same treatment by way of duty as that country gives to Canada. In other words, we bind ourselves to concur in a request for a reduction of our preference to fifty cents a thousand. On this point I continue from the point where I left off in my earlier quotation from the lumber declaration:

And that when, and for so long as, the United States import excise tax ceases to apply to lumber imported from Canada, Canada will concur in any request it may receive from such empire government for the extension to United States lumber of the tariff treatment enjoyed by Canadian lumber.

This business represents millions of dollars to British Columbia.

I would point out that Canada is tied down now for the second stage of the lumber bargain, while the United States is free to enter into it, or not, just as she wishes. In other words, the second stage is left entirely in the hands of the United States, and the British Columbia lumber industry is left in the air.

This is the sort of quagmire one falls into through over-anxiety to make an agreement. The government, in its attitude towards this Canada-United States agreement, and the concessions made by Canada under the Canada-United Kingdom agreement, brings to my mind the small boy who tries to play marbles with two bigger boys and gives away all his marbles just to make a good fellow of himself. I am afraid that is just what this government has done, so far as the lumber industry in British Columbia is concerned.

Mr. EULER: They do not seem to object, out there.

Mr. HANSON: The hon. member is not familiar with it.

Mr. GREEN: I thought that would make him rise. If there is to be any fairness at all in the lumber bargain for British Columbia, then this second stage should be brought into effect. Even then we shall not be compensated for the sacrifices we have made in the first stage and those we shall have to make in the second stage. But I again suggest to the government that they should point out right now to the government of the United States the unfairness of leaving the lumber bargain in the first stage, and should press for the bringing into effect of the second stage by the removal of the import excise tax, as a matter of common decency between nations. Until this step is taken, the work of this government on the Canada-United States agreement is not finished.

Now, if the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson) would like to ask a question, I shall try to answer it.

Mr. HANSON: I understand from what the hon. member has said that we should tell the United States we do not want to sell lumber to them at all.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is allowed only to put a question, and not to make a speech.

Mr. HANSON: I am not making a speech.

Mr. GREEN: If the hon. member would put his observations in the form of a question I should be glad to answer him. I did not quite catch what he was trying to say.

Mr. MANION: Continue with your speech.

Mr. EULER: He has finished.

Mr. HANSON: Does the hon. member suggest to the government that the treaty, so far as lumber is concerned, is no good? I would ask the hon. member to state what lumber Canada buys from the United States? We have a supply of lumber we want to sell somewhere, and the United States is the logical market, as the hon. member knows.

Mr. PERLEY: What is the question?

Mr. HANSON: The home market in Canada will not take our lumber.

Mr. GREEN: What is the question?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. EULER: May I ask the hon. member a question? How does he account for the fact—and it is a fact—that the British Columbia lumbermen who are most closely affected by the agreement have approved it, and have not made the objections the hon. member has made?

Mr. REID: Every one of them.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Speaker, in the first place the lumber industry of British Columbia is looking at the agreement from the point of view that the second stage will be brought into effect. In my speech I have tried to urge upon the government that it leave no stone unturned to see that the second stage is made effective. Without it I am quite certain no person in British Columbia will have any use for the agreement. One good example of what is happening in the first stage is the fact that wages have already been cut ten per cent in portions of the industry.

Mr. HANSON: Wages have not been cut.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. HANSON: We must pay the minimum wage.

Mr. GREEN: The other reasons why some of the representatives of the lumber industry have given approval to the agreement are these: They thought it was going to be a good deal worse than it is; in other words, they expected sudden death, and instead of that they are getting slow poison. Then, they realized that they might as well take it and like it. In the third place they are in the hands of this government; there are other treaties being negotiated all the time; other treaties will be coming up; why should the lumber industry antagonize the government, when the deal is closed, by saying, "we do not like it; we have no use for the government?"

Finally, let me say that the gentleman who wrote the letter quoted the other day by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) is one of the strongest supporters of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid).

Mr. H. A. McKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I had intended speaking at length in this debate in connection with the trade treaty; but after listening to the speeches delivered during the past ten days in this house, I have decided to change my tactics and I shall content myself with making only a few remarks. I believe almost every angle of this trade treaty has been covered, and any further speeches could hardly help but be repetitious.

The question of trade vitally affects Canada, and rightly so. Listening to the speeches in the house, I am firmly convinced that we all believe in trade and trade treaties. Treaties must always be made on the principle of give and take; some concessions must be granted as well as benefits received. But it must be admitted that Canada has achieved an enviable position, because we are now in fourth position among the exporting nations of the world. No one can deny that prosperity is built on trade, both internal and external, and the more business each country does, the better it will be for everyone. Many extravagant statements have been made both for and against the treaty, but I cannot see any benefit in discussing this matter any further. Time alone will tell of its merits and demerits. There has been the usual taking of sides in this debate, with parties lining up solidly either for or against the treaty. It seems strange to me that the members of one party should all oppose the treaty, while the members of another party should all be in favour. In order to prove their points they have quoted from certain newspapers. Many United States newspapers have been quoted during the debate. Those papers which were anti-government have contended that the farmers of the United States have been sold down the river, but other newspapers take the opposite view and say that the United States is going to get into the Canadian market. I contend that these references do not mean anything.

The average citizen is not particularly interested in political speeches, but he will be elated if these trade treaties bring more prosperity. I am satisfied that the government have made a comprehensive study of the probable results of this trade treaty. The three men who represented Canada in connection with negotiating this trade treaty were the best qualified men we have. I do not subscribe to the contention of the opposition that Americans are such good traders that Canada was bound to get the worst of the deal. Surely a bargain to the mutual advantage of both countries was possible.

I should like to give a brief history of the three men who carried out the negotiations for this trade treaty. Mr. H. B. McKinnon, commissioner of tariffs, was appointed to the tariff board in 1926. He was one of the officials who took part in the economic conference held at Ottawa in 1932, when the first Canadian-United Kingdom treaty was negotiated. Mr. L. D. Wilgress has been with the Department of Trade and Commerce since 1914. He has represented Canada as a trade commissioner at various points in Europe, including some years in Russia and Germany. Mr. Norman Robertson, first secretary in the Department of External Affairs, was appointed to that department in 1929. These gentlemen took part in the economic conference at Ottawa in 1932, at which time the first United Kingdom-Canada treaty was negotiated.

When the first Canada-United States trade treaty was negotiated in 1935, these three gentlemen represented Canada at Washington They were sent to England in 1936 when the United Kingdom trade agreement was revised, and they were again Canada's representatives at the negotiation of the trade treaty we are now discussing in the house. These gentlemen were ten months in Washington negotiating this trade treaty. They were in daily communication with the ministers at Ottawa and had at their disposal all the information available in the departments. They were quite able to judge the benefits or disadvantages of the treaty. It is quite true, as was stated this afternoon by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth), that these men were sent by this government to negotiate the agreement. However, from what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) says, I am satisfied that no legitimate business in Canada will be injured by this treaty. Markets for our primary products are of great consideration to a country like Canada, with only about 11,000,000 people and yet possessing vast natural resources. If these treaties give us a wider market for our lumber, fish, pulp, potatoes, minerals, live stock and dairy products, and they will, then our secondary industries also will profit, as will Canada as a whole.

If I recall correctly the remarks of the hon. member for Waterloo South, he stated that no one had spoken for the industrial worker of this country. I do not think that is a fair statement to make. I think every Canadian is interested in the industrial workers of this country, but we cannot get away from the fact that the primary producer produces and the rest of the people derive their livelihood by exchanging their goods and services for the products of the primary producer. Until the primary producer is in a prosperous state, we cannot expect to have economic prosperity in Canada.

These treaties are already in operation, and there can be no further point in discussing them in this house. I cannot see the value of some of the speeches that have been delivered during this debate. This afternoon the hon. member for Waterloo South said that this government was living in the past. I am not so sure of that. I can recall a speech delivered this week by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), and if he did not go back into the hoary past, then I do not know who did. I cannot remember back to the point at which he first started; for I do not believe I was born then, but when his forty minutes were up he was at least eight years away from the date of the trade treaty under discussion. I well recall the cry against the reciprocity pact in 1911. At that time the slogan was: "No truck or trade with the Yankees." Again in 1936 many people saw ruin and desolation because of the trade agreement which had been negotiated. I can well recall, when the $100 exemption was under discussion in this house, how the members of the opposition painted a picture of Canadians going into the United States and bringing back so many goods that all the border industries would be ruined. I looked into this matter along the St. Clair river in December, 1937, and I found that very few people brought back the full $100 worth of exemptions.

It is the same old cry of ruin and desolation that is being raised. We all remember the story of the boy who cried "wolf" when there was no wolf. Such a cry may appeal for a while, but I feel sure the Canadian people will not be unduly alarmed about the story of the terrible ruination that is going to come upon the country. It is true we criticize each other, and probably we always shall, but at heart we want the same things. We want to preserve our freedom and liberty, not only for ourselves and for our children, but for our children's children. These trade pacts have the tendency to bring democratic countries closer together as trading units. I was greatly interested in the remarks of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) when he spoke in Essex the other day. He said that this parliament had been in session for six weeks, and he wanted to know what the government had done.

An hon. MEMBER: Nothing.

Mr. McKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): Nothing was said as to who is responsible for that. I think the hon. member himself must take some responsibility for it. He knows that the government summons parliament, but the opposition says when it shall be prorogued. I am not going to debate this matter very long because I think we have talked it out. The treaty is in operation and we cannot change it. Why prolong this debate any further? If freedom of speech is one of the bulwarks of democracy, let us not play it to death in this House of Commons. I think we shall have to change our tactics if this House of Commons is to continue under our present constitution. I am quite convinced, and I am sure that other hon. members are likewise convinced, that at least half the business of the country could have been done by this time if we had not wanted to make political speeches in this House of Commons.

I am not going to be a sinner in that respect myself. We cannot change the trade pacts, so why debate the subject any longer? That is the attitude I take.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, ever since this resolution was introduced into the house I have felt the utter futility of trying to offer any suggestion that might be adopted by the government with a view to improving the trade treaty to be founded on the resolution now before the house, and I can say that, too, for every one of the 245 members of this House of Commons. Not one of us can raise his voice in this house to change by one iota the trade treaty that will be introduced as soon as this resolution is passed. I have often heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) speak about this high court of parliament. But in my judgment it is nothing but a travesty on democracy that 245 members of this House of Commons cannot say a single, solitary word to alter one line of this treaty in any shape or form.

Mr. EULER: That was the case in 1932.

Mr. MacNICOL: No, it was not the case in 1932, but it was the case in 1936 under this government.

Mr. EULER: We did not change one word of the Ottawa agreements.

Mr. MacNICOL: My hon. friends opposite may not have changed it because there was not sufficient argument put up to change it, but this treaty cannot be changed no matter what argument is put up. I call it nothing but a farce of governing that we are enduring under the present circumstances.

An hon. MEMBER: It is a good thing the hon. member cannot change it.

Mr. MacNICOL: When I have finished with what I want to tell the house, if the hon. member still thinks it is a good thing that we cannot change the treaty I shall be very sorry for him.

First, I should like to refer to the question of unemployment and the effect this treaty will have upon it. No one who was in Toronto over the weekend and saw the parade of the unemployed up Yonge street and along Bloor street to St. Paul's cathedral could not have failed to be impressed by the situation in that great city where some three hundred fine young men were out parading, perhaps because they had nothing else to do on Sunday, but for the particular purpose of demonstrating that they were out of work. It made a great impression on me.

This afternoon the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen) said something about the ballots that are at present being showered down upon this House of Commons. I have received about 4,500 of them myself, and I do not regard them lightly at all. When I see how carefully they have been clipped and how carefully the people have written their names upon them, I know the public are aroused, and they are aroused because of the inaction of this government, and particularly because of the effect that its 1935 treaty had in unemployment and in anticipation of the effects this 1938 treaty will have in throwing men out of work. I know something about employment because I have been in industry for the greater part of my life. I know what makes the wheels of industry turn, and I know what the stoppage of the wheels of industry means to men requiring employment.

May I say just a word with reference to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. McKenzie, Lambton-Kent). He spoke of the three capable gentlemen who were at Washington negotiating the present treaty for Canada, and he said they were in constant contact with the cabinet at Ottawa. But, Mr. Speaker, we should have done exactly what Washington did. We should have established contact with the manufacturers and producers of this country. That is just the difference between Canada and the United States when it comes to negotiating a treaty. In Washington they know what they are doing; in Ottawa they do not know what they are doing, as is evidenced by this treaty.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat spoke of what the 1935 treaty had accomplished, but when I get through with my statement of what it accomplished, I expect he will change his opinion materially. Let me refer to what the Prime Minister said in this house, as reported as page 897 of this year's Hansard.

> The rates of duty chargeable under the British preferential tariff on United Kingdom goods are on an average lower than they have ever been before, and the rates chargeable on United States goods have been reduced in two stages—

That is, in 1935 and 1938.

> —to a level that on most commodities is below that effective when the Liberals were last in power in 1930.

That is just the trouble, Mr. Speaker, our tariff walls have been lowered until to-day this country is being flooded with goods from all over the world, and particularly from the United States to the south of us, the majority of which could be made by Canadian workmen in Canadian plants, and it is just because these goods are made in United States plants by United States workers that the streets of this country are flooded with young men and older men out of work. I am surprised beyond measure at the Prime Minister. He knows what happened in 1911, when this mad raising of the cry of freer trade resulted in selling the Liberal party down the river. He knows what happened between 1921 and 1930 when the tariff walls of this country, which are our defence of employment, were cut in session after session for eight or nine sessions and this country became flooded with unemployed, who happily for themselves in that period could migrate to the United States, as they did to the number of several hundred thousand, as a result of a large number of our factories having closed their doors because of the tariff slashings of the previous Liberal government.

In the latter part of the paragraph I have just quoted from the Prime Minister's speech, he speaks of the tariff on United States goods entering Canada being lower, but that is not the case with the United States tariff on all Canadian goods going into that country.

Under the Fordney-McCumber tariff, clover seed going into the United States had a protection of four cents, and it still has a protection of four cents. Lumber, copper, hides, skins, leather—all went into the United States free, but they do not go into the United States free under the trade treaty recently negotiated. Under the Hawley-Smoot tariff too, our lumber and copper went into the United States free except for the excise tax; but, as has been intimated here, Canada will likely remove the excise tax from everything entering this country.

I remember very well various members of the cabinet during the time the Conservatives were in power saying that the Conservative policy was one of tariff barriers, restricted trade, trade obstruction, exploitation of the consumer, tariff embargoes, subserviency to big interests. I characterize the policy of the present government under six similar headings, only after this manner: The present policy of this government is one of employment barriers, restricted employment, employment obstruction, retardation of work for consumers, employment embargoes, and subserviency to free trade agitators.

I should like to refer for a moment or two to what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) said and carry on a little further from where the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) left off. The minister said at page 1070 of Hansard that Canada imported last year, namely, 1938—he said, fiscal year, but my figures indicate that it is the calendar year—some 307,000 pairs of shoes. That is 157,000 pairs more than were imported the year before. Those 157,000 additional pairs of shoes mean the loss of just 125 jobs in the shoe factories of Waterloo county, Toronto, Hamilton or elsewhere. In other words, had the 157,000 pairs of shoes been made in Canada, this would have meant a difference in Canadian payrolls of 125 employees, according to members of the Shoe Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. EULER: I do not care to interrupt my hon. friend, but will he permit a question?

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not want to waste too much time.

Mr. EULER: It is just this. Does my hon. friend argue that we should make an entirely prohibitive tariff, whether it be on potatoes, shoes, or anything else?

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not in favour of a prohibitory tariff, but I am in favour of the Canadian shoe manufacturer having a square deal, and that is what he is not getting under the present tariff, negotiated by the present government.

The minister said something about the importation of shoes under the $100 exemption. In the last ten months of 1938 $740,000 worth of shoes were imported under that exemption. That is a large number of shoes. It is equivalent to the employment of some seventy-five men in the shoe factories of Canada; and that is something not to be laughed at.

Mr. EULER: I am not laughing at it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I shall raise my voice at every opportunity in favour of labour obtaining jobs, and I am entirely opposed to any tariff or regulation which throws men out of work. The minister said that the quantity of shoes imported was only about 1½ per cent of the total production of shoes in Canada.

Mr. EULER: Less than two per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: But that 1½ per cent must be multiplied many times because of the nature of the shoes imported. By far the largest percentage of shoes consumed in Canada is of the ordinary type worn by persons like ourselves and workers throughout the country. The shoes imported are of another type, usually worn by ladies and girls. On Saturday I was told in Toronto that the big shoe merchants there have made a survey by sending observers to Buffalo on Saturdays and holidays to observe the purchases of shoes by Toronto women in that city. They say that these purchases are of a staggering amount and that they are not correctly reported in the numbers which come in under the $100 exemption. The last time I drove over Detroit bridge there were four cars containing a number of us who were coming back from Chicago. I drove first and went to the customs house. The officer asked me if I had anything to declare. I said no. I do not as a rule buy anything in the United States. The other three were not asked anything, yet everyone of them was loaded with articles he had bought. It was not my business to say what other people had in their cars.

Mr. EULER: The reduction in tariff does not affect that. They came in free.

Mr. MacNICOL: The $100 exemption does, and that is what they are all working on. Many people do not declare what they have bought. They say "What is the use of declaring? I haven't a hundred dollars' worth." When the minister was questioned with reference to shoes, he said some compensation might be given to shoe manufacturers by lowering the duties on some of their raw products. That is the vicious circle which runs through this whole business. This government has put one manufacturer against another. They lower the duty on one product; the person who is affected by the lower duty comes here and asks for a further concession, and so it has gone on all over Canada. The whole manufacturing fabric of this country to-day is, as was said this afternoon, jittery. They do not know what to do. If there were an election in progress I have no doubt they would say a great deal, but they are too scared and panicky as to what may be done in the course of the budget. After that is over, I imagine that these gentlemen will start to talk a great deal.

There are many things I could say about the furniture problem. Somebody referred to it this afternoon re these duties. I want to congratulate the minister upon the fact that in the present treaty he lowered the tariff a mere bagatelle on furniture. The recent tariff has been thirty per cent, and then an excise tax of three per cent.

Mr. EULER: A reduction of 1¼ per cent, I think.

Mr. MacNICOL: Duty and excise tax on $100 raise it to $133.30. For the new furniture tariff the minister deserves some credit; the schedule itself is raised from 30 to 32½ per cent, and with the excise tax taken off, $100 worth amounts to $132.50. The furniture manufacturers are told, "we are going to let machinery in for a little less duty, but there may be a reduction on your paints and one thing and another"—the same vicious circle. I protest against it just as strongly as I can. It is attacking one manufacturer through another, and by attacking one manufacturer after another, driving men out of work in the factories which manufacture these lines of materials. For instance, last year $742,000 worth of furniture was imported from the United States. That is equivalent to the labour of 350 men, I am told. It would look pretty good to have 350 men working in the factories at Kitchener. If they had work for 350 men in Strathroy, it might be possible to re-start the factory which went out of business; or if they could find work for 350 men in the McLagan factory at Stratford which is stopped, it might be started up again.

In addition to the importation of $742,000 worth of furniture last year, a considerable amount—it is hardly distinguishable how much—came in under the $100 exemption. Furniture, I notice, is linked up with household appliances, of which some $756,000 worth entered Canada in eight months; it will probably amount to a million dollars in the twelve months. Probably that would mean the importation of half a million dollars' worth of furniture. A large number of men will have lost their jobs on that account. As I said a moment ago, the government proposes to try to fix matters up by lowering duties on other lines, and here, too, we have a vicious circle. One form of production after another is attacked from one end of the country to the other. Is it any wonder that we have unemployment in Toronto and other centres? Just wait until the weather improves, and I have no doubt that the unemployment parade which will come to this city of Ottawa will stagger everyone and will outdo anything that has ever occurred in that line.

The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) gave four reasons for supporting this treaty. I shall not mention them all. The first is, that it is to facilitate rather than to obstruct the making of the agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States. The next two reasons are along the same lines; the fourth one does not say anything about labour, either. I would say that when the government makes a treaty, the thing it should keep before it above anything else is what that treaty will mean in the matter of unemployment in this country. The government has not done that. That is one thing it has entirely forgotten. In by far the majority of cases the provisions of the treaty will affect the labour market from one end of the dominion to the other. The Minister of National Revenue also said that we are not directly affected by Great Britain's protectionism to any more than a small extent because she lets most of our products into her markets free of duty. He might have added that now she is going to let United States wheat into her markets free of duty. This country gets it from every angle and gets the wrong end of the angle every time.

When the Minister of National Revenue was speaking on February 21, something was said about apples. On Saturday last I overheard an interesting conversation on this subject. The minister said that he had no complaints from his province, Nova Scotia, with reference to the tariff on apples. At that time he did have complaints. Last Saturday I came down in an elevator in a Toronto building with two gentlemen, one of whom knew me. He called me by name, and then he said, "we were just discussing the tariff schedules in connection with apples. This gentleman," he said, "comes from Nova Scotia and is an apple packer." I said, "Don't give me his name because I might be asked in the House of Commons what it is." Not having his name I cannot give it. He told me, however, that representations had been made to the government, and on that date the minister must have known all about the representations. I assume he did know because in his speech he makes a statement with reference to compensation. He does not use that word and perhaps I had better read what he says:

> . . . on some of their supplies, particularly on spraying and dusting materials and fertilizers, and upon agricultural implements, including spraying and other orcharding machinery from which the 3 per cent special excise tax is to be removed.

He intimates that the apple producer will receive some concession, and I say again that we have the same vicious circle. You attack one producer and in trying to compensate him you attack another; that is why from one end of the country to the other employment is diminishing all the time.

I wish to discuss for a moment the remarks of the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean), because I interrupted him when he referred to the policy adopted by the Conservative party at its convention. At page 1208 of Hansard he is reported as having said:

> When the Conservative convention was held in Ottawa and the new leader was chosen, they adopted a resolution stating that the party stands by its old principle of high protection.

I interjected that it was not so, and I think it would be in order to read the policy of the Conservative party in connection with protection, as adopted at the national convention:

> This national Conservative convention declares its continued adherence to its traditional policy of fostering and sustaining by fiscal protection Canadian labour and Canadian industries, and especially the primary industries of agriculture, fisheries, forestry and mining, all of which are essential to the maintenance of a well-balanced national economy, while, at the same time, guarding against undue advantage being taken of the protection so afforded.

That was one means of protection that the last Conservative government took in connection with the tariff. They did not write it on the basis that the height of the tariff was the whole concern; but the object was to prevent the exploitation of the consumer, and therefore they made agreements with the manufacturers not to enhance prices if they were given an opportunity to manufacture in this country. In my opinion that principle should be embodied in any tariff policy adopted in this country. It goes on:

It also affirms its adherence to the underlying principles of that policy, which have served to stimulate the development of the natural resources of Canada, to preserve and to enlarge the domestic markets for Canadian products, to promote interprovincial trade, and, generally, to provide a diversified economic life which will serve to retain Canada's sons and daughters within our own boundaries.

That is one of the bases of the Conservative party's policy, whereas one of the results of the trade treaties which this government has now negotiated has been to cause unemployment in very large measure, and the unemployed remain in Canada only because they cannot enter the United States.

This convention affirms the policy of having tariff schedules under scientific investigation by a permanent tariff commission and that, in case it is ascertained that unfair advantage is being taken of any customs duties imposed by such schedules, the tariff commission shall make recommendations, to which effect shall be given by the government, for reducing such rates of duty or for removing them from the tariff schedules.

This convention affirms its firm adherence to the policy of preferential trade within the British commonwealth of nations, by which Canada obtained the boon of tariff preferences in the markets of the United Kingdom and of other dominions, and which have served to mitigate the severity of the trade depression during recent years, and which were approved by parliament, despite the bitter, determined and prolonged opposition of the Liberal party.

This convention is convinced that the permanent interests of Canada are best conserved by enlarging our markets—

I have heard someone say that we do not want markets. Our platform says:

—by enlarging our markets in the United Kingdom and other British dominions, whose products are more complementary than competitive with those of this country, and with which our trade agreements are more likely to be durable and beneficial.

This convention believes that the external trade of Canada may also be increased advantageously by the negotiation on a fair and equitable basis—

That is what we say the present treaty does not do. It is not fair to Canada, certainly not to the Canadian manufacturer and the Canadian workmen in the factory.

—of trade agreements with countries which are outside of the British empire, but that in negotiations with foreign countries, the terms agreed upon should not be such as to impair the benefits derived by Canada under existing agreements between Canada and the United Kingdom and between Canada and other British dominions.

That is the Conservative platform. The hon. member for Prince made this statement, which I shall also take time to explode:

I tell my hon. friends that the prohibitive tariff imposed by that government—

That is the Bennett government.

—threw more people out of jobs than any other thing that ever happened.

Other hon. gentlemen who are not familiar with industry and employment have made the same statement. What are the facts? Under the Bennett government from January 1, 1933, to January 1, 1935, the index of employment rose as follows, 1926 being 100:

Year	Index number
1933	78·5
1934	88·6
1935	94·4

I suggest that we should continue to January 1, 1936, because the present government did not come into office until October or November, 1935. On the first of January, 1936, the index figure of employment was 99·1. In other words, there was a gain of 20·6 that is 26·2 per cent. Now take the present government. What has been the gain, taking January 1 in each case?

Year	Index number
1937	103·08
1938	113·4
1939	108·1

That is to say, there was a gain of 4·1 per cent.

Mr. EULER: Why not go back to 1930 instead of beginning with 1932?

Mr. MacNICOL: My hon. friend in speaking of shoes was not fair, nor was he fair in regard to furniture. The suggestion he has just made is an unfair one because he knows that from 1930 to 1932, during the first two years of our term of office, the world was in the middle of the greatest depression it had ever known. But from 1932 conditions began to improve, though I am sorry to say they have started to recede under the agreements of 1935, and the recession may be still greater under the present treaty. The Canada Year Book for 1937 states that, from 1932 to 1935, 159 more establishments were started in Canada, principally as a result of the Bennett tariff, and 88,971 more persons were employed. Breaking that down, I find that in the textile industry from 1933 to 1935 there was an increase in personnel of 14,464; in the iron and steel products industry an increase in personnel of 24,479; and in wood and wood products in the same period, an increase in personnel of 18,243. My hon. friend is evidently not familiar with industry and employment when he tries to make out that during our term of office there was not an increase in employment. There was a recession until 1932 or 1933, but after that there was a continuous increase. I could give other figures.

The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) said something about employment increasing in Windsor. I wish it were, but I am sorry to say it is not. The figures for employment for Windsor as at January 1, 1937, showed an index of 152·9; and as at January 1, 1938, 148·9. In December, 1937, it was 153·1, and December, 1938, 142·2, or a loss during 1938 of from 148·9 to 142·2.

I was talking to a motor-car manufacturer in Toronto on Saturday—and he comes from Windsor, by the way—who told me that if the treaty affects the industry as they are afraid it will, within a very short time the motor-car industry of Canada will be reduced to three or four plants, at most.

I should now like to submit some further figures to show the reduction in employment that has resulted from the 1935 trade treaty, in order to give an idea as to what will happen as a result of the 1938 treaty. During 1938 unemployment figures were as follows:

May	400,000
June	387,000
July	407,000
August	368,000
September	346,000
October	378,000
November	398,000
December	472,000

That does not speak very well of the trade treaty negotiated in 1935.

I should now like to show the increase in the number of unemployed wage earners in comparable months of 1938 and 1937, taking 1926 as equalling 100. The figures are as follows:

	1937	1938	Increase in unemployment per cent
May	327	400	22·3
June	294	387	31·6
July	277	407	46·9
August	245	368	50·2
September	225	346	53.7
October	242	378	56·2
November	291	398	36·7
December	381	472	23·8

I would ask anyone who may speak from the government side to tell us why they should negotiate another trade treaty after the first treaty caused such a disaster in regard to employment. I think that should be brought out. I could continue with many other figures to back up what I have said, but my time is passing and I want to say a word of praise in regard to one item. This is brought to my mind by what I thought was a contemptuous statement made by the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) in regard to employment in connection with the pitting of dates. The government has reduced the duty on unpitted dates to one-half cent a pound, which should increase employment in this country. For the benefit of my hon. friend from Huron North I may say that as a result of the original attempt to provide employment in the pitting of dates in this country almost a thousand girls were employed at that work, earning twelve, thirteen or fourteen dollars a week. Employment is rather low now, but I hope that as a result of this reduction some further employment may be given.

I should now like to say a word about the piano industry. I know a number of people engaged in that business, and in discussing this matter with them on Saturday one of them handed me a letter he had received. I believe the minister has a copy of it, and perhaps he has in mind some regulation which will overcome the difficulty to which I am going to refer. The government has reduced the duty on pianos and in addition has taken off the safeguard whereby, no matter what may have been the actual price, for duty purposes a piano was estimated to be worth at least $75. Through the slashing of and tinkering with the tariff by Liberal governments the piano industry has been so reduced that now there are only about six plants remaining in Canada, in New Westminster, Toronto, Clinton, Kingston, Montreal and St. Therese. Formerly there were a great many piano factories in this country, employing large numbers of men, but the industry has been shot to pieces because our market has been flooded with goods from other countries. Listen to this letter to piano dealers in Canada from a firm in New York:

> For instance, we will furnish twenty-one pianos, harnessed to the car, at $500 or $600 for the entire lot. In both cases the pianos would be unrepaired uprights and the difference of one hundred dollars allows for the quality of the instruments, by which we do not mean to infer that you would not be getting an excellent buy at the $500 price but as you know, there are all grades of pianos and one hundred dollars leeway on twenty-one would permit us to send you very excellent instruments. Similarly, we can furnish you with guaranteed good player pianos thoroughly gone over, at $55 each, in single lots—

The minister has not yet told parliament how he is going to stop that; but fancy it, twenty-one pianos coming into this country for $500.

Mr. EULER: Would my hon. friend permit me to ask a question?

Mr. MacNICOL: My time is passing rapidly; no doubt hon. members opposite would like to take up some of it, but I must hurry on. All along the line this treaty is going to bring about reductions in employment. Within the last few days I spoke to a gentleman who in 1932 had four hundred men employed in his plant. As a result of the 1935 treaty that number was cut down, and now he foresees nothing but the closing of his plant. His employees have been reduced to some 275, I believe, and he expects that within a reasonable length of time he will close the plant entirely and buy from the parent plant in the United States what he requires for the Canadian market. Any treaty that will close up a plant—and this is only one of scores and scores of plants—and throw the employees on the labour market is, in my judgment, certainly not a good treaty.

An hon. MEMBER: Time.

Mr. MacNICOL: No, my time is not up yet. Some speakers have referred to the press release issued by the United States government in connection with the present treaty, before it went into operation. I should like to quote a little from the press release issued by the United States government after the 1935 treaty was in operation, in which they say:

> These trade increases were widely distributed among many classes of American producers, and were most notable in . . . cotton and rayon piece goods and wearing apparel; furniture; periodicals, advertising pamphlets and printed matter and various paper products; automotive products, including tractors; radios, refrigerators and other electrical apparatus; electroplated ware; a wide range of machinery and implements, agricultural and industrial; and in metal products generally.

I have been associated with the metal industry for a long time, and this is one thing that gives me a great deal of concern. I want to laugh when someone on the opposite side talks about the increase in our exports of industrial products to the United States. In 1938 our exports of iron products of all kinds to the United States amounted to $4,000,000, while our imports of the same kind of materials amounted to $134,000,000. It is not of much assistance to the iron industry of Canada to enact tariffs that reduce employment in practically every iron industry in Canada and which at the same time increase employment in United States factories to the extent to which a favourable balance of $130,000,000 will provide employment over there. Much of that money should have been spent in this country to furnish employment here.

I think I have time to refer just a little further to the results of the trade treaty. What is to be charged up to your former trade treaty? Your former trade treaty had thrown many thousands of men out of work. Your new trade treaty will throw thousands more in industry out of work. In that way you reduce the market for the primary producer.

Mr. MANION: And hit the farmer, as well.

Mr. MacNICOL: What does the press say about employment in Canada, as a result of this government's tariff tinkering? I shall read only the headings, because I have not time for more. The first reads: "Youth urged to demand jobs from government." Youth will never get them from the present government, when its actions are resulting in throwing multitudes out of work.

And the next: "Youth unemployment is termed emergency by Brantford rally." Of course. And the present tariff will affect many more in Brantford.

And the next: "Youths' gaoling called terrible." Of course. The gaols are half full of youths who would never be there if they could get enough to do. How can they get anything to do when the factories from one end of Canada to the other are closing?

And the next: "Service clubs join in task. Joint committee is formed to seek immediate steps by government to meet unemployment problem." They have a fat chance of having this government do anything in connection with the unemployment problem.

And the next: "Relief cost shows jump—"

Mr. PLAXTON: What did you do between 1930 and 1935?

Mr. MacNICOL: If you were in your seat—which you are not, very often—

Mr. PLAXTON: I came in particularly to listen to you.

Mr. MacNICOL: —you would have heard me say a short time ago that in various lines of business many thousands of men were given additional employment between 1930 and 1935. If you had been here you would have heard that.

Mr. PLAXTON: I heard it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I might say, since you have said that, that if the present government wishes to do anything for unemployment, let them make, in the John Inglis Company plant, $6,000,000, $8,000,000, or $10,000,000 worth of the tractors they are importing.

Mr. PLAXTON: The plant which you wanted closed down.

Mr. EULER: Who took the duties off tractors?

Mr. MacNICOL: That is not the point. If I were the Minister of Finance I would put a duty on.

Mr. EULER: The Conservative government took it off.

Mr. MacNICOL: And I would see that the price was not enhanced, either. Different manufacturers tell me, if they could get a market for them, they can make tractors by the thousands for less than people are now paying in the United States.

Mr. EULER: Who took the duty off?

Mr. MacNICOL: The duty is meant to give employment. The government can regulate the price just the same as the Bennett government did.

To continue with the clippings: "Extra 1,000 sought relief at Owen Sound last year."

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but he has spoken for forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have just about finished.

Mr. CRERAR: Finish it.

Mr. POWER: This is good stuff.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Only with the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. MacNICOL: All right, I shall not proceed; I do not wish to impose.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Unanimous consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, I have just about finished. I was going to add that on January 29, 1939, the Reverend Doctor Peter Bryce, well known to a good many welfare workers in Toronto, had this to say, after making a survey:

> I assert that the situation in Toronto at the present moment is the most serious I have known in my thirty years' residence.

That is the truth.

What has this government done for employment? What did the treaty of 1935 do for employment, when we know that conditions in Toronto to-day are worse than they have been for thirty years? It is all wrong for members to talk about conditions improving, when they cannot back up their statement with figures.

Then, what did the premier of Ontario say?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacNICOL: I knew my hon. friends would like to hear that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MacNICOL: He said:

> I see no relief from the burden in sight. I am frank in confessing I don't know just where to head in on this problem.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: You don't want to hear from him.

Mr. THOMPSON: Can't take it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. J. C. LANDERYOU (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I listened to the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen) and heard him make the statement that social credit was not doing so well in Alberta. May I suggest to the hon. member that it is the Liberal party that is not doing so well in Alberta, and that there had been a greater reduction in unemployment in Alberta than there has been in the province from which the hon. member comes. There has been more money invested in industry and in building in Alberta than has been invested or spent in building or in construction in the hon. member's province.

Mr. HANSON: What kind of money?

Mr. LANDERYOU: And not only that, but the cash position of Alberta is better than that of the province from which the hon. member for Marquette comes.

Many references have been made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and other members of the government to the success of the Liberal party in the elections of 1935, and to their success in the by-elections which have taken place since that time. But may I remind the Prime Minister and his government that their success has been very much limited in Alberta, both in the general election and in the by-elections which have taken place since. We can recall the by-election which took place in Edmonton East, where it was impossible for three cabinet ministers to put on sufficient pressure to defeat the hon. member who now represents that constituency in the house, and is attached to the party to which I belong. As a sage of old said, "That which is not good will not last." The Liberal party is through in Alberta.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is through all over.

Mr. LANDERYOU: They have read, no doubt, of the last of the Mohicans. Well, we now have the last of the Liberals in the person of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. MacKinnon), who has been honoured by his party, and rightly so. I say that because of all the Liberals who ran for office in Alberta he was one of the fortunate ones who saved his deposit. So I do not think much satisfaction can be derived from the success of the Liberal party in Alberta.

Of course, the Conservatives did not fare so well either—but they did just as well as the Liberals. At that time there was one Conservative returned to the house.

An hon. MEMBER: Are there any left now?

Mr. LANDERYOU: There is still a remnant of the Conservative party left in Alberta, but they are trying to join up with the remnant of the Liberal party to form some sort of unity league. I believe the Liberals and Conservatives should unite federally, because they have this in common at least: They are both determined to take no fundamental step to change existing conditions in Canada. They are both satisfied to sit and do nothing. Neither one of them is prepared to make the far-reaching changes which are so essential to get us out of the financial mess in which we find ourselves.

Mr. POTTIER: What is Aberhart going to do?

Mr. LANDERYOU: Before dealing with the observations of the Prime Minister, I believe I should refer to a statement made by the hon. member for Marquette in regard to the application of social credit principles to dominion affairs. He felt we should wait until such time as the whole world would adopt those principles. May I remind the Liberal party that they still advocate free trade, and yet the whole world does not seem to have adopted it. And, as an hon. member to my right suggests, neither does the Liberal party. I believe the record will bear me out. That is exactly the position taken by the Liberals in regard to our movement. They suggest that nothing can be done provincially or federally, that we must wait until the whole world accepts social credit. All we are suggesting is that we should abolish poverty in the midst of plenty, but they say to us: "Do not attempt to abolish poverty in the midst of plenty until the Chinese have taken the same steps, until poverty has been abolished in India, Africa and Afghanistan." They tell us not to establish just prices until the whole world has done so. What sort of reasoning is that? Let me read what the originator of this great movement once said, speaking from the world point of view. Major Douglas was asked this question:

> Since under the Canadian constitution control over banking, finance, trade and commerce rests entirely with the dominion government, is it not desirable that advocates of social credit centre their main efforts upon the dominion rather than the provincial field?

The SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is getting away from the subject matter of the resolution, which has to do with the trade agreement with the United States. The quotation being given by the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I agree with what you say, Mr. Speaker, but I am simply replying to a point which was raised by the hon. member for Marquette. The answer given is not mine; it is the answer of one of my colleagues and co-workers in this great movement of social credit.

Mr. HANSON: I suggest to the hon. member that he speak from his own seat.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I do not care where I speak; it makes no difference to me.

Mr. SPEAKER: Provided the hon. member keeps within the limits of the resolution before the house.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The answer given by Major Douglas is as follows:

> Well, the answer to the first of those questions I gave a short time ago, that if you have no powers you cannot do anything; but I feel fairly certain that the logical result of saying, "we must refer this thing to Ottawa," would be in effect, if not in words, "we must refer this thing to London." We are so interlocked with the international finance system that we cannot do anything in Ottawa. We must do it through London. And when you get to London you would be told, "Ah, yes, but we must do this in conjunction with Wall street."

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask the hon. member to discontinue his quotation. It is irrelevant to the subject matter of the present resolution.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I shall not read any more from the statement by Major Douglas. That has been the attitude taken by this Liberal government to prevent the province of Alberta from attempting anything. I imagine that they will suggest that we should go to London, England. I suggest to my hon. friend that he read part of a speech delivered by the Prime Minister of New Zealand, as referred to in the following report:

The Prime Minister (Hon. M. J. Savage) said the leader of the opposition had accused the government of having made arrangements with the Douglas credit organizations. Now, what were the Douglas credit organizations trying to do? They were trying to get for the people the things that the people were capable of producing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should confine his remarks to the resolution before the house, which has to do with a trade agreement with the United States.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I have sat in the house and listened to addresses made by hon. members on both sides, and I have heard them fight out every election since 1911 and discuss every subject from soup to nuts; yet I am prevented, as I understand it, from answering the points raised by the hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have rendered my decision and the hon. member should abide by it. I am simply doing what I did a few days ago when the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) was speaking. I called that hon. member to order on the very same point. I think the hon. member should confine himself to the resolution before the house. There will be other opportunities given to him to discuss the question of monetary reform.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The Prime Minister painted a rosy picture of what he expected from the trade agreement. He declared that it was the fulfilment of all the promises made by the Liberal party in regard to trade before the election of 1935. I recall the Prime Minister and other members of the Liberal party declaring that their promises in regard to monetary reform had been fulfilled, and then shortly afterwards bringing in an amendment to the Bank of Canada Act. Those were strange proceedings. If the people of Canada do not receive any more benefits from the fulfilment of the promises of the Liberal party with regard to trade than they did from the fulfilment of the promises of the Liberal party in regard to monetary reform, then God help the people of Canada.

Mr. HANSON: You may be sure they will not get any help from the Alberta government.

Mr. LANDERYOU: We say that the prosperity of Canada should not depend upon the height of a tariff wall. Our prosperity should depend less and less upon foreign trade. If we depend too much upon foreign trade for our prosperity we are likely to become involved in national and international complications which will create problems and hard feelings at home which may eventually lead to war abroad. Why should we bring dairy products and wool from New Zealand into this country in exchange for automobiles, when our farmers have to walk and when we keep on producing a surplus of dairy products and wool?

The Prime Minister declared that the nations of the world are endeavouring to practise what he termed economic nationalism, that they were trying to get into isolated compartments. We have never suggested that, and I challenge the government to name one nation that has stated their policy to be one of economic nationalism, which means virtual isolation as far as trade is concerned. I ask them to name one nation which has refused to trade with the world. I know that after the revolution many countries refused to trade with Russia and enforced economic nationalism upon that country, but what country of any importance has declared to-day that it refuses to trade with other nations of the world?

I listened to the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) state that Italy and Germany did not want to trade with the nations of the world. I suggest that he read something in addition to the speeches of his leader. Just the other day Germany stated that she must trade to live, and England replied that she must trade or die. We hear that Germany wants to trade $30,000,000 worth of machinery for $30,000,000 worth of wheat and other commodities. How can anyone say that we as a party, that the Conservatives as a party, or that the people of any nation as a nation refuse to trade? Why should they condemn social crediters or others who advocate that our own people should be supplied from our own natural resources? We want to utilize our natural resources for our own people. Why try to blast our way into foreign markets when we cannot get into our own?

Mr. HANSON: The Liberals never said that.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Nobody knows what the Liberals have said.

The trouble with the world to-day, and nobody knows it better than the Prime Minister himself, is that every nation wants to sell and does not want to buy, or wants to buy and has not the necessary purchasing power. I hear laughter from the benches opposite.

Mr. MARTIN: Your own leader is laughing.

Mr. LANDERYOU: He is laughing at you. Let me read from the report of the world conference of agricultural economists, and maybe this will wipe the smile off the faces of those on the treasury benches who are now laughing. These are men who have made a study of world problems, unlike those who occupy the seats opposite. The problems of the consumption of agricultural products were dealt with by various speakers at the conference, and I quote this from the report:

The general feeling expressed in the discussion was of the need for increased consumption both from the standpoint of solving the agricultural marketing problem and from the sociological point of view. Means considered for bringing this about included: (1) increased real purchasing power for the masses; (2) decreased costs; (3) social measures.

So we find that the world conference of agricultural economists recognizes that there is a shortage of purchasing power in the various nations of the world, which precludes any possibility of getting rid of the surplus commodities.

I quote next from the Economic Annalist for February, 1939, which states:

The decline in the volume of world trade, which became apparent in the fall of 1937, continued during the first six months of 1938. This resulted in an accumulation of world stocks of foodstuffs and raw materials and an accompanying decline in the wholesale prices of primary products. Further, it tended to stimulate in many countries the use of quotas, exchange controls and clearing agreements—methods restrictive to world trade, which had shown some signs of being at least partially relaxed during 1937.

So there go all the hopes of the Liberal party for free trade—blasted once more, and the surpluses are still in the world.

I should like to refer to the situation in New Zealand. Listen to their Minister of Finance speaking, but first I shall read the reference he makes to the United States before making any observation on his references to New Zealand:

I was in Washington about August, 1933, and I met one of the most competent economists there who had been administering the Agricultural Adjustment Act. An order had been given to destroy six million pigs. They had been burned, and the government were watching that the residue, the fat that came from the burning of the pigs, did not go on to the market in such a way as to spoil the price level for fats, etc. I went across the road in the same city of Washington to meet a lady who was in charge of the child welfare department. She gave me a report that she had just received from New York, and that report showed that of the 300,000 children examined in the New York schools in the previous three years 21 per cent were certified by the doctor as being short of food. I looked at it with astonishment—between 60,000 and 70,000 youngsters were short of food, while the government were burning pigs, and paying people not to grow wheat, paying them not to grow tobacco, and letting oranges rot by the million because it was not profitable to market them. I mention that because I want to press the point home as far as I can, and I hope the discussion will centre round this point. I want us to visualize economic cooperation to the full within the empire and commonwealth, but at the same time to visualize that there is one purpose for cooperation, and that is to see that the people in the countries cooperating have access to the resources that are available.

Between 1929 and 1933 we in New Zealand, and I think the people in every other country too, had to take into account particularly the agricultural interests. Our farmers in New Zealand were bankrupt.

May I interject, the same as our farmers in Canada!

They had produced twice as much—

The same as we in Canada!

—and yet they had received less in money for their doubled production. For instance, in 1934 they sent to the old country something like 120,000 tons of butter as against 60,000 tons of butter in 1924, and for those 120,000 tons they got £10,000,000, whereas for the 60,000 tons they got £11,000,000. They were told to produce more, to make up in volume what they were losing owing to the fall in values. They did produce more, and half of them became bankrupt.

The same situation obtains in Canada in relation to our agricultural products, our timber industry, our fishing industry, and every other primary industry in this dominion. We double, treble and quadruple our production, and the net result is that we get only half as much or one-third as much for it, and the farmers have just enough money left to pay this overhead.

Mr. HANSON: If my hon. friend will permit me—

Mr. LANDERYOU: I have only five minutes left, so will my hon. friend please take it like a gentleman?

Let me refer to a statement made by Sir John Orr in his book, Food, Health and Income. I quote:

Sir John Orr, in his book, Food, Health and Income, proved that in Britain, out of the population of forty million, there were twenty-two million and a half not getting enough food to eat. In the poorest group, representing four million and a half, the weekly income was ten shillings or less per head and the sum spent on food four shillings per week. Those conditions existed whilst the farmers of Britain and of other countries were in difficulties because they could not find markets for their produce.

Possibly there was not a Liberal government in power!

Sir John Orr estimated that the total increase in consumption necessary to bring the whole population up to the standard of diet necessary for health was about £200 millions a year.

My hon. friends may say: "Oh, you are giving us conditions as they exist in other parts of the world." But let me refer to some conditions that obtain in Canada, and they are not so rosy either. Some articles have appeared in the Halifax Herald. Of course, we have to go outside Alberta to find things like this, but I feel I should draw to the attention of the house conditions in other parts of the country where people are not so prosperous as they are in the province I represent. Here is the headline: "Bleak and hungry future faces hundreds of Thorburn children—Farmer Smith tells of visit to mining town schools." The article goes on to tell of the terrible conditions that exist in these mining districts.

Here is another heading in the Halifax Herald: "A challenge to Christianity—Stark poverty and despair grip this fishing village—Disgrace to humanity." The articles go on to describe conditions in two villages in Nova Scotia. I quote from one article:

> I selected Thorburn, a mining town, and Terence Bay, a fishing village, because both of these places had been prominently brought before the Canadian people within the past few weeks.
>
> What I have written, I have written after observing with my own eyes. I have not been influenced in any way and my only interest in presenting these facts is from a humanitarian standpoint and in the hope that we, as a christian people in Nova Scotia and Canada, will speedily take action to improve conditions in Thorburn, Terence Bay and similar places within the borders of this province.
> I am not suggesting that there are not scores of fishing villages along the Nova Scotia coast where the conditions I have described in this article do not exist. There are fishing villages where the people have a plot of land for gardens and can secure other forms of employment when fishing is scarce or when prices are low. I maintain, however, that the daily life in many homes in Thorburn and in Terence Bay is a disgrace to humanity and a challenge to Christianity.

The government contend that they are going to do a great deal through this trade agreement for these fishermen, that this agreement holds out a solution of the problems of the government. I recall listening to a statement made by an observer, over the air, some two months ago. He said that three men went out in a fishing boat, and after fishing all day and loading up their boat with fish, when they got to market they received a total of $2.81 for their catch. Is that supposed to be a solution of our problem—to give $2.81 to three men for a day's work and a boatload of fish?

Mr. MARTIN: Why not twenty-five dollars a month?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Why not?

[Mr. Landeryou.]

Mr. LANDERYOU: My hon. friend says, "Why not twenty-five dollars a month?" I agree with him, and I ask him, why not? And he cannot answer me, or at any rate he has failed to answer me. If my hon. friend will be patient, I shall deal with that point. I remember that just the other day the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) agreed with me when I said that the most urgent problem in Canada to-day was the need of increased purchasing power to the consumer. I believe that even the Liberal party would agree to that. I have no doubt that my Cooperative Commonwealth Federation friends would also do so. So we find general agreement among all hon. members that we must have increased purchasing power for the consumer. But we differ as to the method, and so the people do without, while we argue over the method. I know the Liberal party will never find the way to do it, because they put too much confidence in their theories of world trade. We know they have no solution. The consumer should be financed. There is plenty of money for production. Hon. members have said that we have in Canada an ample amount of money for productive purposes. But I ask them this question, what is the use of investing money in increased production when we cannot buy that which is produced to-day? Factories are working part-time; the goods come out; and what do the retailers do? They sell them at a dollar down and a dollar the next time they can get it.

Mr. MARTIN: What is money? What is the value of money?

Mr. LANDERYOU: We have suggested that we should finance the consumption of goods.

At this stage I wish to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

SUPPLY

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): I understand that this motion is simply for the purpose of getting into one item of the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I have no objection; indeed, so far as I am concerned, I quite agree. At the same time I should like to point out to the government that this is the second time recently that we have permitted the movement into supply at this late hour of the evening. This will mean, I think, that we shall have brought in four different departments. In justice to the house, I suggest, next time the government wants to move into supply it should move earlier in the day, say Tuesday if it so desires, so that if any hon. member has any grievance he wishes to have redressed he will have an opportunity of bringing it up. Eleven o'clock at night is, of course, too late to bring up any matter and deal with it at all satisfactorily. I wish it to be understood that we expect that the next time the government wants to go into supply, it will make the motion at the ordinary time of day, that is some time in the afternoon. I think we have already advised the government that in all probability one of our party will be moving a motion to deal with a certain grievance.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My hon. friend will admit that the government is not entirely responsible for this state of affairs. Of course it is only on Tuesday that we are able, at this stage of the session, to move into committee of supply to open up a new department. It is true that we have already introduced two or three other departments. We hope that the flow of oratory will dry itself out soon, and that we shall be able to do some more business. I thank my hon. friend for agreeing to go into supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

376. An act to place Canadian coal used in the manufacture of iron and steel on a basis of equality with imported coal—administration, $600.

Mr. MANION: Will the minister explain this item?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): It is an item of only $600. This amount may be required temporarily to pay the expenses which may arise in connection with the subsidy on coal production, and it is refundable later on to the government by the steel company. Last year the amount was not required. Probably it will not be required this year.

Item agreed to.

Mr. EULER: If my hon. friend desires, we can leave it with that one.

Mr. MANION: I think we might let it stand at that. There was to be only one item. We have got into the department.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Tomorrow we intend to take up some of the government measures on the order paper. There seem to be quite a number of speakers on the trade treaty, but we are really anxious to do some other work.

Mr. MANION: I hear that there are twenty-two speakers on the Liberal side, still waiting.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Oh, no; unfortunately they are coming from the other side.

Mr. MANION: No, my hon. friends have more than we have, and rightly so. They have the numbers and they need the defence.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Hon. members on this side of the house have been exercising a good deal of restraint.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 1, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING COMMITTEES

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—CHANGE OF PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. MacInnis be substituted for that of Mr. Rowe (Athabaska) on the standing committee on public accounts.

Motion agreed to.

SWEEPSTAKES

PETITION OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RESIDENTS OPPOSING LEGALIZATION IN CANADA

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a petition from the residents of O'Leary, Prince Edward Island, in opposition to any measure to legalize sweepstakes in Canada.

WAR MUNITIONS AND MATERIALS

MONTREAL CONSTRUCTION SUPPLY AND EQUIPMENT SHELL CONTRACT—REFERENCE TO PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, having given the notice required under the rules of the house, I wish to move, seconded by Mr. Rowe (Athabaska):

That a copy of the agreement between the government and the Montreal Construction Supply and Equipment Limited, Montreal,

Quebec, for the machining of billets and forgings in the manufacture of shells, together with all related orders in council, documents, correspondence, minutes of the interdepartmental committee, and statements of claim, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts.

I consider it my duty very briefly to explain my reasons for requesting the reference to the standing committee on public accounts. I desire to make it very clear that I am actuated only by the conviction, which I hold very strongly, that the manufacture of armaments, or at least the primary implements of warfare, should be manufactured under national auspices. It is also my earnest desire to eliminate all forms of profiteering in the manufacture of armaments. I have had abundant evidence in recent weeks that this desire is shared by a large number of ex-service men across the Dominion of Canada.

The reasons for suggesting that the house should refer this contract to the committee are found in the form and substance of the contract itself, which has been tabled in the house. It presents features very similar to those of the Bren machine gun contract, which necessitated a judicial inquiry, and which were found objectionable by many hon. members in this House of Commons.

The contract was placed by the government with the Montreal Construction Supply and Equipment Limited, Montreal, the president of which company is Mr. A. Janin. The contract was executed on November 17, 1937, and is for the machining of billets and forgings in connection with the manufacture of 20,000 quick-firing 18-pounder shell bodies, and 10,000 quick-firing 4·5-inch howitzer shell bodies. Although this contract was approved, I notice, by the interdepartmental committee, it was awarded on the basis of selection and not on the basis of competitive bids. I refer to the answer given by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) as it appears at page 627 of Hansard for February 3, 1939. According to that answer, this is the only contract which has been placed for the manufacture of shells in Canada, in Great Britain or any other country. In his answer the minister indicates that deliveries have not yet been made.

I believe the onus rests upon the government to explain fully, either in the house or before the public accounts committee, just what was involved in the negotiations leading up to the execution of this contract. I would remind the house that the government of Canada was committed at Geneva to a policy of the public manufacture of armaments, and on former occasions the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of National Defence assured the house they would endeavour to follow such a policy. They also stated that the next best alternative would be manufacture on the basis of competition, under a suitable regulation of profits.

I ask the government to explain, either now or before the committee, why in the giving of this contract there has been such a marked deviation from a policy enunciated in the house and accepted by hon. members in good faith. I ask that, and propose that the committee should examine why the contract was awarded to this particular company.

I find, on reference to a directory issued by the Engineering Institute of Canada, that it is not listed as one of the companies in possession of facilities for the manufacture of products of this kind. Other companies are listed, and it is made abundantly clear that they have such facilities. I refer, at random, to companies included in the directory—five, for instance, named by the interdepartmental committee, with reference to the Bren gun, and companies such as Canadian Vickers, Limited; Montreal Locomotive Works, Limited; Ingersoll-Rand Company, Limited; Allis Chalmers Company; Dominion Engineering Works, Limited; Canadian Locomotive Company; Canadian Car and Foundry Company, Limited, and many others. These companies are established and actually in possession of the machine shop facilities required for the manufacturing or machining of the billets and forgings used in the manufacture of shell bodies.

I say that the committee should scrutinize closely the reasons why this construction company, a company interested mainly in the construction of buildings, with a machine shop which I understand is used chiefly for the overhauling of equipment used in construction, should be selected for this contract. I think the committee should find out to what extent the public interests were safeguarded when the responsibility was assumed by the department or by the interdepartmental committee for the selection in this way of a favoured contractor. The committee should examine carefully the terms of the contract itself.

Under the provisions of the contract the government, the party of the first part, has undertaken to supply free of charge to this company, Montreal Construction Supply and Equipment Limited, all billets cut to length, forgings, base plates and driving band rings, special paint and varnish, and packages and boxes required for the said shells. These are all provided without charge. I believe the onus rests upon the government to explain to the committee or to the house from what source the billets and forgings will be obtained and if in that connection other contracts have been awarded. If other contracts have been awarded, we should be told upon what basis.

In another clause of the contract provision is made whereby the government shall supply such machinery as is set out in exhibit B of the contract, together with any additional machinery as may in the opinion of the said party of the first part be considered desirable. Referring to exhibit B, I find listed therein the type of machinery that one would expect to find in any well-equipped machine shop, and particularly the shops of those companies to which I have referred. There are listed heavy duty turning lathes, heavy duty boring lathes, ordinary lathes, rivetting machines, production drills, shaping and milling machines, universal tool and cutter grinder, and so on. Such machines are in common use in all well equipped machine shops. The question immediately arises: If the government already had any such equipment, why was it not used for government manufacture in connection with this order?

I believe there will be a responsibility upon the committee to examine closely the cost clauses of this contract, particularly in view of the answer given by the minister on February 3. At that time he said:

> The contract was placed on a cost-plus basis at an upset manufacturing cost of $4 per shell for 20,000 shells, quick-firing, 18-pdr. high explosive, and $6.75 for 10,000 shells quick-firing, 4·5" Howitzer high explosive.

Clause 4 of the contract states:

> The price to be paid by the party of the first part for the machining of the said billets and forgings shall be as follows:
> (a) The cost of electric current necessary for proper and healthy lighting of the shop, offices, corridors, lavatories, men's rooms and yard, which is hereby fixed in the sum of $1,270 per annum, commencing March 15th, 1938.
> (b) The cost of providing comfortable heat in cold weather, which is hereby fixed in the sum of $1,067 per annum, commencing March 15th, 1938.
> (c) The proportionate amount of all taxes, business, real estate and special, other than income tax, which amount is hereby fixed in the sum of $900 per annum, commencing March 15th, 1938.
>
> (d) The cost of the water supply in shop, yard, offices, men's rooms and lavatories, which is hereby fixed in the amount of $100 per annum, commencing March 15th, 1938.
>
> (e) The cost of maintenance and repair of railway siding, hereby fixed in the amount of $300 per annum, commencing March 15th, 1938.
>
> (f) The cost of power supplied from the machine shop of the party of the second part for the ammunition ship compressor, in the maximum of 50 h.p., fixed in an amount at $1,500 per annum, the party of the first part hereby agreeing that any power in excess of that herein mentioned which may be required shall be paid by it on a meter basis, commencing March 15th, 1938.
>
> (g) The cost of four telephone connections and signal system from office to shop, fixed in an amount of $360 per annum, commencing March 15th, 1938.
>
> (gg) The cost of maintaining railway siding yard, roof and entrances clear of snow during winter, fixed in an amount of $1,200 per annum, commencing March 15th, 1938.
> (h) The cost of premiums in respect of fire and riot insurance on buildings, on shops, and of a night patrol, fixed in an amount of $1,200 per annum, commencing March 15th, 1938.

And also the cost of rentals, depreciation on buildings, heating and plumbing, repairs, administration charges, assessments or payments made to the province of Quebec under the workmen's compensation act, and any expenses incurred in or imposed by the observance of provincial or dominion labour legislation. The contract then goes on to say:

> (m) Subject to the provisions of clause (o) of this section, the wages and salaries to be paid, with the prior written approval of the party of the first part, for labour employed directly on—

The various types of labour required are then enumerated. Then the next paragraph reads:

> (n) Ten per centum (10 per cent) of the amount of wages and salaries paid for labour as mentioned in clause (m) of this section.

The next section then deals with restrictions. I would direct the attention of the house to the fact that although this section specifies $4 for the 18-pounder and $6.75 for the 4·5 inch howitzer shell bodies, it refers exclusively to the wages and salaries to be paid. The $4 and $6.75 mentioned as the upset manufacturing prices are somewhat misleading, as it is impossible, in the absence of comparative prices, to estimate what will be the cost of these shells. In addition to the wages and salaries paid in connection with their manufacture, there must be added the cost of the material and other overhead charges, as mentioned in the contract, and to which I have referred.

I think it rests upon the government to explain why there has been delay in connection with the delivery of these shells. The contract states that delivery must begin, in one instance, within nine months of the date of the installation of the machines and commencement of the machining of the shell bodies, and, in the other instance, the 4·5 inch shells, within twelve months. The items of cost have been fixed and are stated in the contract as beginning on March 15, 1938. Almost an entire year had elapsed on February 3 when the minister indicated that no deliveries had been made. Upon computing the charges which are fixed, and which the minister can best explain, I find that the government of Canada apparently is now liable to pay approximately $12,000 in this connection.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Absolutely incorrect.

Mr. MacNEIL: I have totalled the charges for electrical current, heating, taxes, water supply, maintenance and repair of railway siding, telephones, snow clearance, insurance premiums, rentals, depreciation and administration charges, all of which were to begin on March 15, 1938, and I find they total $12,209. I make it that that is approximately 8·27 per cent of the total maximum cost of labour, plus ten per cent. In addition we must take into consideration the expenses under the workmen's compensation act and other dominion and provincial labour legislation, the cost of the material used by the company which is to be furnished free by the government, the cost of wages and salaries—for only wages are fixed by the schedule—and ten per cent of such wages and salaries.

As I say, no deliveries have been made. As I read the contract the government is under an obligation to pay ninety per cent of the costs so stipulated, upon presentation of a claim by the company. I think the minister should take this opportunity to offer to the house an explanation as to the rumour which is in circulation that there is some dispute with regard to this matter, which accounts for the serious delay in delivery.

I refer also to section 9 of the contract which states:

> The party of the second party hereby agrees that the machining of said billets and forgings into shell bodies shall commence immediately following the complete installation of all necessary machinery tools, dies and equipment, and that delivery of said shell bodies shall be made as follows—

In the case of the 4·5 inch, within nine months, and in the case of the 18-pounder, within twelve months.

It is not necessary perhaps at this stage to go into further details with regard to this contract, but I think I have indicated why it should be thoroughly examined by the public accounts committee.

There is one other point that occurs to me upon an examination of this contract and other contracts awarded under the auspices of the Department of National Defence. In view of the fact that they are adopting a policy of assisting in the equipment of these plants —for after all in this particular contract the government has agreed to pay the costs of installation, the costs of conversion of equipment loan, the cost of transportation of equipment and the cost of additional equipment that may be required—I think the government should explain why they are establishing a virtual monopoly among favoured contractors for the manufacture of armaments in Canada. To pursue such a policy means, I contend, the establishment of a virtual monopoly; for it is to be assumed and expected that the government will be strongly influenced to place further orders with companies which have been established in this way.

I wish it understood that I am fully aware of the fact that Mr. Janin, the president of this company, is an engineer of repute. There is no question about his professional standing, but there is no evidence yet produced to show that at the time of the execution of this contract he was in command of the necessary facilities to manufacture the munitions in question.

It is also known that Mr. Janin is a staunch supporter of the Liberal party. I have no objection to his political convictions, but I contend that that in itself is not sufficient justification for placing a vital contract with regard to defence with a favoured contractor. I submit, Mr. Speaker, in view of the seriousness of the situation, that contracts particularly of the Department of National Defence should be placed with regard only to the national interest and without regard to considerations of political advantage.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I accept with the utmost pleasure the resolution moved by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) to have this contract referred to the standing committee on public accounts. All hon. members of the house who were here a year ago will recall that on two different occasions I offered to have all contracts of the national defence department referred to this same standing committee. If the only desire of the hon. member for Vancouver North had been to have a fair investigation and examination of this contract all he had to do was to indicate this to the committee or to the minister. But he was absolutely compelled in the interests of propaganda and for the sake of creating distrust in the country to make this matter the subject of a debate in the house.

I should like, Mr. Speaker, to leave with the house very briefly the essential details of this contract, and in giving the reasons for the contract I should like, with the permission of the house, to lay upon the table two documents from which I am going to quote:

first, a report made by the then master general of the ordnance to the deputy minister, and thence to myself, on October 4, 1937, which gives comprehensive reasons why this particular contract should be effected; and second, the recommendation to council which was signed by myself on November 1, 1937. As I shall quote from these documents I should like, under the rules of the house, to lay them on the table, and I am sure that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) and any other fair-minded member of the house upon reading them will be convinced that this contract is definitely in the public interest.

May I first quote three brief paragraphs from the recommendation to council:

The method of acquiring such a plant has been the subject of careful consideration as it is realized that in an emergency very large quantities of shell of different types would be required with the least possible delay. In order to develop the industry of shell-making in Canada, orders have been placed for shell steel and other raw materials required in the manufacture of shell, and deliveries are now being made.

My second reference is this. I quote again from the recommendation to council:

A practice of the war office in connection with such types of plants is to provide special machines required for machining operations and to install the machinery in the plant of a selected firm for operation.

We in this case, Mr. Speaker, followed exactly the practice of the British war office, but evidently that is not good enough for our critics at this time. I quote further:

After full consideration, it has been suggested by the technical officials of the department that the war office practice be followed and that the Department of National Defence purchase the machines necessary for the manufacture of steel billets and forgings into shell bodies, and install the machinery in a plant suitably located for use as a model and auxiliary plant in close proximity to the source of supply of raw material and having available satisfactory transport facilities by road, rail and water, and located in a district where ample skilled labour of the type required is available.

My last quotation from the recommendation to council is this:

A proposal submitted by Montreal Construction, Supply and Equipment Limited, to operate such a plant on a cost plus basis in accordance with the provisions set out in the draft agreement attached hereto, has been considered fair and reasonable by the interdepartmental committee on the control of profits on government armament contracts.

We had the reasons there for taking this step; and we had the safeguarding supervision of a very eminent body of the ablest civil servants in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MANION: May I ask my hon. friend a question? I know nothing about this matter except what I have learned in the last hour or two, but may I ask, did the interdepartmental committee recommend Montreal Construction Company for this contract?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What probably happened was this, that the suggested agreement with the Montreal Construction Company was referred to the interdepartmental committee, and they referred it back with a recommendation as being a fair and reasonable contract.

Mr. MANION: If I may ask a further question, did any other companies submit a form of agreement such as this which was later submitted to the interdepartmental committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There were two other companies investigated by the departmental officials from the point of view of contiguity to supervision by the superintendent of the dominion arsenal at Quebec, but the propositions they advanced were not considered satisfactory, while this one from Montreal was considered financially and in every other way satisfactory to the department.

As I do not want to detain the house I shall now summarize the various points.

Mr. COLDWELL: Satisfactory to the Department of National Defence, or to the interdepartmental committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): To the officials of the department from the point of view of the preliminary proposals made. I do not think they had the necessary facilities to justify a report being made to the interdepartmental committee.

Mr. COLDWELL: There was no representation or report from the interdepartmental committee to the government on this contract?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should be very glad to answer my hon. friend in the public accounts committee; but my recollection at the moment is that there was none.

I want to refer to an editorial which appeared two or three days ago in a local journal, and which suggested profiteering in regard to this contract. I do not blame so much the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), who believes in the socialization and nationalization of everything. That is the gospel of his party. But I tell him, from the point of view of practical administration, that although I am a believer in national ownership and public ownership so far as it is possible to apply it, there are occasions when one must combine the principle of national ownership with the principle of government cooperation with private industry in order to obtain effective and immediate results. That is what happened in this case.

The total amount payable under this contract in respect to actual machining costs is $147,500, and the maximum profit available to this company is $13,410, for six months' work. Is there anyone in this house who would say that that is profiteering? The company install the machinery free of cost, without a single cent of charge to the government, and they have already produced over 700 shells; seven hundred and forty will be completed to-day. Those shells have been tested; they are equal in quality and workmanship to the very best ever turned out by the dominion arsenal. They are the product of our own Canadian workmen, and results are being produced for the Department of National Defence. I say that the machinery was installed at cost, without profit. The contract is mentioned as a cost plus, but the ten per cent profit is only on wages and supervision costs; no profit is paid on overhead expenses. The rate of wages is controlled by the department. I may tell my hon. friend that that has had something to do with some of the delays in commencing production. Machining operations are subject to supervision by the superintendent of the dominion arsenal at Quebec. The contractor is required to maintain a cost accounting system the records of which will be checked periodically by the superintendent of the dominion arsenal. Resident national defence inspectors under the direction of the chief inspector of arms and munitions inspect and gauge the shells in the various stages of production. A penalty wastage clause is provided in the contract, so that poor workmanship will reduce the profit.

Coming to the question of prices: a suggestion was made the other day in a journal of this city—not in the Journal, in a journal—that there were unfair prices. On the 18-pounder shells the difference between Canadian and British prices is as follows: the price of an 18-pounder shell in Great Britain is about £1, and when you add to that the various charges which it is necessary to add before you could deliver that shell in Canada, even could we acquire them, the price in Canada would be $5.85; and the price under this contract is $6.14. In other words, it costs twenty-nine cents more to produce them in Canada, giving work to our own Canadian workmen, than to import them from England. That is the contract which my hon. friend from Vancouver North would seek to condemn.

With reference to 4·5 inch shells, the British price, landed in Canada, has been estimated by the former master general of the ordnance at $9.25. The cost of shell forgings, as many hon. members will know, is $1.36 more per forging in Canada than in England. So that if the order to this or any other company had been 30,000 shells, instead of the small order of 10,000 which they received for the 4·5 Howitzer shells, the cost would be in Canada $9.89, or an increase of 63 cents over the cost of the British shell delivered in Canada.

In the article in question I find this, that the cost of machining came down during the war to $1.20 per shell. If that were true I should not be surprised, as a resut of the organization and the mass production of that very strenuous period. But I happened to read the presidential address of Mr. A. H. Vaughan, president of the Engineering Institute of Canada, delivered on February 10, 1919, on the manufacture of munitions in Canada. It indicates that the lowest cost reached on machining and assembling 18-pounder high explosive shells was $1.50—not $1.20—per shell on a production of 1,200,000 shells. I am sure that an order to-day, not only to this plant but to any well organized plant in the Dominion of Canada, of 1,200,000 shells, would enable them to be produced for $1.50, the same as they did towards the end of the war. On the 4·5 inch Howitzers the lowest price reached was $3 per shell—on what? On a production of just under 3,000,000 shells. And here you have 10,000 shells. Can you compare the conditions? Can you compare the prices? Can you compare the circumstances? Yet editorials accuse us of profiteering.

The sole desire of the department was to establish a basic price so that if an emergency arose we should know how cheaply these things could be done; and we did it to prevent profiteering, not to assist it.

The article in question says that the government plants are being stripped of machinery to equip private manufacturers. That statement is not based upon fact. In this case two small machines which were not in use were transferred to the plant in question. Their combined value is $1,500. That is how we are "stripping government factories to equip private manufacturers."

With regard to the Lindsay arsenal I may be asked, why did you not use Lindsay? Well, the answer is this. It was a cardinal and considered feature of departmental policy two years ago, when this contract was entered into, that the Lindsay arsenal should be preserved as a reserve base for the manufacture of small arms munitions. Hon. gentlemen will recall that during the war, whereas many companies were able to manufacture shells, only one in the dominion was found to manufacture small arms ammunition. To-day, with a greater development than ever of machine gun and infantry fire, there is nothing in the whole service equipment so necessary as is small arms ammunition. I want to say frankly that if my wishes should prevail, and I hope they will, Lindsay arsenal will be developed either in regard to the production of small arms ammunition or possibly for the production of shells such as are being made in this private plant. This was intended to be entirely a model pilot plant, and one of the clauses of the contract is that every manufacturer in Canada shall have complete access to it for inspection purposes. All the new machinery which is there belongs to the crown. It may be removed, if it is considered necessary to do so, either to another plant or to a government owned factory after this contract is completed.

The entire object of this contract, Mr. Speaker, was to place an educational order. It was not in any sense of the word a commercial order. I want to tell my hon. friend from Vancouver North that, so far from there being profiteering on this contract, the sole desire of the department was to see how efficiently private industry—we knew already what the dominion arsenal could do—could cope with the situation, so that if we had once again a crisis such as occurred last September, or others which have developed since, and if we were compelled as a result of the free judgment of this parliament to meet an emergency of national magnitude, we should know what fair prices would be so far as private industry is concerned, in regard to these contracts.

Last year I offered to refer all these contracts to the public accounts committee. If my hon. friends across the way wish to have any more contracts referred to the committee they can take my assurance now that any contract ever passed in connection with national defence is at the disposal this year of the public accounts committee. Let them desist from making speeches here for purposes of propaganda and let them go before the standing committee on public accounts. I deem it a duty to myself, to the government of which I am a member, to hon. members of this house and to the country to have the real facts of the case ascertained; and when those facts are brought out all this scurrilous propaganda will be dissipated once for all.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to say a few words regarding this matter. I have listened attentively to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). As a matter of fact, I was not entirely familiar with this question until about noon when I began to look over the contract and I saw the terms of it as the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) has laid them before the house. I must confess that they do seem rather extreme; practically everything is paid by the government and a price is made—a price which certainly, according to the minister, is very much higher than the price of any such shells would be under mass production. I admit, of course, that in this regard the minister has an argument, because the commencement of production of this sort would naturally be more costly than mass production which would come later. I tried, however, to listen as closely as I could to the hon. gentleman as he read selections from the order in council which he put before the government, and if I understood him rightly he indicated that this company was a selected firm—the term he used in his answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver North. By order in council the Department of National Defence selected this firm. I understood him to say that it was passed upon by the interdepartmental committee, and yet in reply to my question—he will correct me if I am wrong—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Just the contract itself.

Mr. MANION: The Montreal Construction Supply and Equipment Company was chosen by the Department of National Defence, then, and not by the interdepartmental committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is correct.

Mr. MANION: That is what I understood. In other words this company was selected by the department itself just as the company which was awarded the Bren gun contract was selected—in exactly the same manner. It is true that this contract is not a large one. It is true that it might be termed a pilot plant, as the minister has suggested. Nevertheless there are a number of points about the contract that puzzle me.

I understand that the Montreal Construction Supply and Equipment Company is the same concern that is building the new Ottawa post office under a contract amounting to $632,500. It is the same concern that is carrying out this work, under another name. Well, why should that company, of all companies in Canada, be chosen to manufacture shells at this time? As the hon. member for Vancouver North has pointed out, there are in this country many companies which are in possession of much more suitable plants for the purpose here intended than the Janin company or the Montreal Construction Supply and Equipment Company, and I do not understand why the Department of National Defence, and through it the government, should lay itself open to the statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver North, justly I think, that it is choosing political friends to carry out contracts of this kind. Why should the government lay itself open to that charge unless it had some motive that is not disclosed in the contract?

In Canada in the years to come, I hope in the very near future, undoubtedly there is going to be construction of munitions on an enormous scale. Why, therefore, should the Department of National Defence select, for the manufacture of shells, a company which, so far as I know—and I presume so far as the government knows—has not in the remotest degree any experience in the production of shells? Why should the government choose this particular company to manufacture the first shells that are to be produced in this country at this time? It strikes me as a most extraordinary procedure.

The minister rose and in a rather indignant manner—he was not as indignant as he was on the last occasion when he discussed a similar subject in this house, but he was indignant nevertheless—he attacked the hon. member for Vancouver North because that hon. gentleman brought out some points which, to use the vernacular of the street, would hit anybody in the eye on reading the contract. The minister attacks the hon. member for bringing out these points, and very vehemently he assures us that he is only too anxious to have all these contracts investigated by the public accounts committee. Yet this very contract to which he is referring was let on November 17, 1937, and tabled here only on January 13, 1939, a year and two months afterwards. Why is that? Why was this contract not tabled sooner?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There was no obligation to table the contract.

Mr. MANION: Of course not; but since the minister gets so heated about the questions asked by the hon. member for Vancouver North, I now ask him why all these contracts should not be tabled.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If that is the will of the house it shall be done.

Mr. MANION: So far as I am concerned it is the will of the house. Personally, I believe that any contract of this sort should be tabled—I am speaking of munitions contracts. These contracts are in a class by themselves; they are in a different category from any other business of the government. It is my desire, at any rate, that every contract let, dealing with munitions or armaments, be tabled at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be glad to oblige my hon. friend.

Mr. DUPUIS: Was it done during the last war?

Mr. MANION: I was not here during the last war, and I do not care now what was done then. If we did things wrongly during the last war, then that is all the more reason why we should do them properly now. I am not going to stand here and say that everything was done properly during the last war. I presume there were mistakes and irregularities. I say that now, with the experience of the last war before us, we should play the game and inspire the confidence of the people of the country, and not allow them to think of the Liberal party and the Conservative party, if you like, as nothing but money collectors endeavouring to win elections. That is what the paper which the hon. gentleman quoted suggests. If I understood him correctly, he quoted from the Ottawa Citizen. That newspaper has made certain statements in the last two or three weeks and I suggest right now to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that the editor should be brought before the bar of the house and be required to give, what I know he cannot give, one tittle of evidence that either the party opposite or this party has collected money improperly. He has made that statement, and I thought a few times of saying what I have just said. I might as well "get it off my chest" now. The Ottawa Citizen has been making these statements and I have wondered why the Prime Minister did not stand up on a question of privilege, not only on behalf of the whole house but on behalf of the government of which he is the head, and demand that the editor of that newspaper be brought to the bar of the house and required to give proof of the filthy charges he has been making against the right hon. gentleman and against the Conservative party.

I invite the Prime Minister now, when he gets up, to back me up and I will back him up, to have the editor brought here to prove his charges.

An hon. MEMBER: Nobody pays any attention to him.

Mr. MANION: I am not so sure. I believe that one of the things that damage democracy in this country to-day is this very type of irresponsible statement that is being made. I believe in democracy; I believe in the present economic system. I am not a socialist and I do not agree with my hon. friends to the left who are socialists. I repeat, I believe in democracy and in the capitalist system, but I also believe that we must correct its imperfections if we are to maintain it. Indeed, I have intended for some days to go across the floor to the Prime Minister and make the suggestion that I have just made. I am making the suggestion in all seriousness. I should like to see the editor of the Ottawa Citizen brought there and invited to prove what he has been charging. I do not think he can prove anything against my right hon. friend; I know he cannot against me, and I do not think he can against my predecessor or the party I am leading. If he can, let him come and do it.

Because of that statement in the Ottawa Citizen, charging the very things that the minister is defending himself against, for that if for no other reason I say that these contracts, all of them, the minute they are awarded, should be laid on the table of the house. During the discussion of the Bren gun contract I took the position, and I repeat now, that in this country there is nothing that should be dealt with with cleaner hands than munition contracts. They should be so dealt with that the government cannot be charged with partisanship or favouritism or improper procedure. They are in a different class from anything else.

I said here in the debate on the Bren gun contract that I understood that there would be a certain amount of political patronage. I suppose it will go on; I do not believe that my hon. friends in either group to my left, if they were in power, would be entirely free from political patronage. It would be a queer group, whether Liberals, Conservatives, Social Crediters, Cooperative Commonwealth Federation or anything else, who would not, where everything else was equal, give a little favour to their friends. I am not hypocrite enough to take any other attitude. Some of that is legitimate. I do not want one sentence from my remarks taken out and used against me, as some of my friends have been doing in connection with that book I published—picking out one sentence from its context. I do not care about it; it does not interest me. I have not read the infernal book since it was printed. I have never bothered even checking up the statements which have been made with regard to it; I do not care anything about it. I am sure I could bring up more charges against the right hon. Prime Minister in connection with his two books than he can against me for mine—

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. gentleman ought to be proud of it.

Mr. MANION: I am glad the hon. gentleman thinks so. My hon. friend was one of the first to congratulate me. I almost imagine I must have praised him in the book, though I do not think I did.

However, coming back to this serious discussion—because to me this is a serious matter—I submit that, as the minister has agreed, in future all munitions contracts should be tabled as soon as they are made. We had the same experience in regard to the Bren gun contract. I asked the minister why it had not been tabled, and he said no one asked that it be tabled. Suppose we do not know anything about it. Until the hon. member for Vancouver North put this motion on the order paper I did not know there was a contract with the Janin people; how could I ask to have it tabled? I say it is the duty of whoever is in charge of the Department of National Defence in the future to table all contracts of the kind.

Again I ask, why should a building contractor, a man who to-day is erecting the post office building in Ottawa, who is not an industrialist—why should he, of all contractors in the country, have been chosen? The hon. member for Vancouver North has very good justification for suggesting, as he did, that it was because Mr. Janin is a strong supporter of this government. I do not say that in the way of finding fault with Mr. Janin; I presume even if a man is a contractor he has to take some side in politics. But I do not think the minister or the government should have left themselves open to that suggestion.

I will tell the house why I am particularly anxious about this. I need only refer to what I said outside the house last Friday and Saturday in Toronto and Ottawa, with no political suggestion. I pointed to the chaotic conditions in the world, not only with two wars actually proceeding, but with the fundamental struggle that is going on between democracy and dictatorship. I pointed this out in my remarks in the Bren gun discussion, and I point out again to-day that there could be no greater prize for any world conqueror, such as Hitler if he should become one, than this great dominion. Therefore as far as I am concerned I supported the right hon. gentleman in his statement placed in the mouth of his excellency in regard to defence. We must have defence forces in this country; we must be ready to defend ourselves. We have no right to depend on either Great Britain or the United States to defend us if we get into trouble; we should defend ourselves. I am told—and the minister can correct me if it is wrong—that for the $70,000,000 spent for defence in the last year or two we have almost nothing—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is not correct.

Mr. MANION: Well, the minister will have a chance to deal with that. I am stating what I have been told by competent military men in this country, men who are much better qualified to speak than the minister or myself —I am not a military man at all and the minister is about the same kind. That is the statement made to me by outstanding military men for whom I have the utmost respect, that we have practically nothing in the way of equipment for defence in this country. We have $63,000,000 in the estimates at the present time for the Department of National Defence, which in a sense is the biggest spending department in the government except the Department of Finance, and that is not really a spending department, because it is paying the interest on the national debt. Therefore the business of the defence department should not be handled in a slipshod manner. There should not be any of this business of picking out some friend and giving him a contract.

The minister admits that in choosing this company the proposals of other companies were not submitted to the interdepartmental committee. I ask my right hon. friend when he is on his feet—apparently he is going to speak—to tell me if he thinks it is right that one company, I do not care whether Liberal, Conservative or what, should be chosen, as the Inglis company or as this company was, to the exclusion of all others. After all everyone who has any possessions at all in the country is paying taxes, and many who have not; therefore all who are capable of doing the work should have a right to look into these possible contracts. In the future there should be no more of this hole and corner business—I say that upon consideration—of picking out one company; let us give a fair deal to all. We must have better methods than anything shown in the Bren gun discussion in connection with the purchase of munitions in this country.

Having listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver North, I think he has done a service to this house in bringing this matter up; he does not deserve abuse for it. He drew his conclusions as he would have to and as I did. From about 12.30 to-day, except when I was at my lunch, I was looking over this contract and I found a number of things, some of which the minister has explained. But how can an hon. member know what these things indicate until they are explained? This matter should go to the public accounts committee, and I know that the government is willing that it should; but instead of abusing the hon. member the minister should thank him for giving him an opportunity to explain. I do not wish to be unfair or supercritical, but the minister's explanation is not good enough, nor is this method good enough to be followed in future purchases of munitions. A better system must be instituted very quickly if confidence in democracy is to be preserved in this country.

Mr. BOTHWELL: May I ask a question of the hon. leader of the opposition before another hon. member proceeds? I should like to ask whether it has not been customary to table these contracts, and would it not have been reasonable to ask for the tabling of this one without a political speech being made such as was made this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), particularly in view of the statements made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) last year?

Mr. MANION: As I said, I do not see how anyone can ask to have contracts tabled until he knows about them. I think the hon. member's motion is perfectly proper. Until the minister spoke this afternoon no one could have known the details of this contract. I think the hon. member for Vancouver North drew conclusions some of which perhaps are not right. But he had nothing to base them on, except what he read in the contract. I say that personally I believe he did a service, and drew conclusions which were just, in view of the information which he had.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I say on behalf of the group with which the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) is associated, that we object to any hon. member endeavouring to impute motives when we place a matter of this sort before parliament. After all, the people of this country are interested in what is being done with munitions contracts.

Mr. DUNNING: Not in what my hon. friends say about them, but in the facts.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, in the facts. Recently we had a long discussion about the Bren gun contract. The contract at present before the house was entered into fifteen months before it was tabled, and to complain that the hon. member for Vancouver North might have spoken to the minister is, in my opinion, entirely beside the point. Moreover, while I was not in the house during the last parliament, I read Hansard, and I think the very last member in the house to make any protest against matters being raised in the house, as this was this afternoon, should be the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). I am objecting to that air of injured innocence which he has exhibited today.

We are anxious to know why it is that the government, which through the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has laid down a policy, has departed from that policy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: We want to keep that continually before the house and the country, because we believe, rightly or wrongly—and I believe rightly—that there is no more sinister force in the world to-day than the private armament industry. We are determined, so far as we can, to arouse public opinion against that danger. This contract, as the hon. member for Vancouver North has rightly said, does in effect begin to set up a monopoly in the making of munitions in this dominion.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, yes; oh, yes. The equipment is placed in the building. It is there; and when new contracts are to be made, these companies established through government cooperation will have the equipment and be able to have, as it were, an inner track in any competition for such contracts which may follow.

The minister says he is following the British war office practice. I wonder whether that is always a recommendation? When I think of the policy of the present national government in Great Britain in other fields, I would seriously question whether we are right in following blindly that lead. In connection with munitions contracts may I point out that only last week in the British parliament members of the House of Commons criticized the government for such contracts. Charges were made that some of the contractors in Great Britain supplying the government with aeroplanes, and all sorts of war equipment, were making profits as high as forty per cent. Should we follow the British war office practice in that regard? I certainly think not.

Moreover, as a result of the debate in the British House of Commons a week or ten days ago, the government has been compelled to reduce the amount of some of those contracts. Then we are told that of course there is no political patronage. I hold no brief for the editor of the Ottawa Citizen, or for that newspaper; but I am going to say this on his behalf, that I sat in my place in the house less than one year ago and heard the leader of the opposition of that time discuss political patronage and make statements which, in my opinion, ought to have been investigated. But neither side of the house moved to make such an investigation.

Mr. DUPUIS: Did the hon. member?

Mr. COLDWELL: We suggested that they should be investigated. May I also say that these suspicions regarding campaign funds are, in my opinion, well founded. When I add up the amount of time used by hon. gentlemen opposite and the cost of that time over the radio, and when I add to that the cost of their newspaper advertising, and add to that the cost of their billboards—

An hon. MEMBER: Stick to the subject.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am sticking to the subject, because it has been said—

An hon. MEMBER: The hon. member is not imputing motives now!

Mr. COLDWELL: —because it has been said there is no political patronage, and the outrage of campaign funding—if I may put it in that way—is unfounded. When I see all these millions of dollars expended for the election of members to parliament, I come to the conclusion that there must be substantial funds coming from somewhere, and that he who pays the piper calls the tune.

I have, of course, not forgotten the Beauharnois story, and the descent to the valley of humiliation by hon. gentlemen opposite. So I say that when we have this sprouting of angels' wings in connection with campaign funds, I look a little beyond the statements that are made here.

Now we have this contract. I agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) when he says that the hon. member for Vancouver North performed a public service this afternoon. The minister spoke about the cost of these shells in Great Britain. He led the house to believe that the cost there was £1, and that we are paying just the trifling sum of twenty-nine cents more than if the shells were imported from England. The general impression in the house, I would take it, would be that $4 for the smaller shell and $6.75 for the larger shell is the maximum cost. Yet, when we look at the contract, what do we find? We find that is a cost, but there are certain things to be added, which were enumerated by the hon. member for Vancouver North, making a gross cost for those shells higher than the amount placed before the house this afternoon.

Mr. VIEN: There is nothing hidden; everything is disclosed.

Mr. COLDWELL: Everything is disclosed, but in the argument presented there was placed before the house a conclusion which, even under the terms of the contract, I say was not warranted. More costs are to be added on account of the overhead and the administration specified in the contract itself. So I am supporting the hon. member for Vancouver North.

If we look at the summary of the contract we find the government is to supply the company with all billets, forgings, base plates and driving-band rings, special paint, varnish, packages and boxes required for shells, machinery and tools, dies and other equipment. That is to be found in sections 2 and 3.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the company to supply?

Mr. COLDWELL: The government is to supply these materials without charge to the company. Then, the government is to pay for the installation of all machinery, tools and equipment. The government is to pay for such conversion of the company's plant as may be necessary for the purposes of the contract. The government is to pay the cost of dismantling and moving the machinery, et cetera, and of replacing the plant in its original condition, when and if the government does not require the company's services any longer. The machinery, tools, dies and equipment are to be the property of the government. The government is to make all minor repairs to the plant and equipment.

Mr. MacNICOL: Worse than the Bren gun contract.

Mr. COLDWELL: The 10,000 Howitzer shells are to be delivered within nine months, and the 20,000 18-pounder shells within twelve months of the date on which machining commences.

We have been told of the urgent necessity for this kind of equipment, and for munitions. This afternoon the minister tells us that to this date how many have been delivered?— between 700 and 800. I believe he said 780 had been delivered, although I may have forgotten the exact figure.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think it was 740, with an additional 1,860 in process of being completed.

Mr. COLDWELL: According to the minister's answer in the house, none had been delivered prior to February 3 of this year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think tests were made after that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then we have the fixed amounts, read by my hon. friend, amounting to $12,209.80. As he pointed out, that amount equals 8·27 per cent of the total cost of labour, plus ten per cent. Some one to my left has asked what the company supplied. I should not care to answer that question until the matter has been investigated by the public accounts committee. I think we may say that the government pays for all supplies, machinery, tools, equipment, materials, installation, repairs, dismantling, overhead costs, depreciation, administration expenses and all labour and salary costs. In addition, the government pays ten per cent profit on all labour and salary costs.

We of this group are anxious that the business of Canada should be done to the best advantage. The minister says that we desire socialization of everything. That is not true and he knows it. I agree with him that there are circumstances under which the government is justified in entering into an agreement with a company for the provision of certain equipment. When we embark upon the expenditure of many millions of dollars for equipment of this type, the government's own policy requires us to manufacture these articles in government institutions as far as possible.

I am not going to discuss the Bren gun contract any further this afternoon; but I should like to point out that when the British government obtained the right to manufacture that gun in the dominion, it specified that they must be manufactured in government institutions. We find here at the very outset of this great program a deviation from that policy. As far as I am concerned, I support the hon. member for Vancouver North and all other mon. members who think as I do on this particular problem. I know this, that if it were not for party divisions we would find in all parts of this house men who thought exactly alike in relation to this particular problem. I urge on those who sit in other sections of the house to bring pressure to bear—

Mr. VIEN: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to say what he has just stated. He has said that hon. members in some parts of this house were actuated by partisan politics when voting here. The hon. gentleman has no right to say that, and I ask that he withdraw.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not say what the hon. gentleman says I said. If I imputed motives, I would withdraw the statement that imputed those motives.

Mr. VIEN: I insist on a ruling. The hon. gentleman has said that if we did not belong to a political party we would not vote as we do.

Mr. COLDWELL: If I may state again what I said, I said that I knew there were hon. gentlemen in all parts of this house who thought on this particular matter as I think myself. That is my opinion which has been formed by discussing these matters and having conversations with hon. gentlemen.

Mr. VIEN: A gratuitous assumption.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, not an assumption. an opinion based upon my knowledge of what has been expressed by hon. gentlemen in all parts of this house. All I did was to urge such hon. gentlemen to forego parties and to join with the rest of us in bringing to the attention of the government the necessity for eliminating private profit and the granting of private contracts in connection with the manufacture of munitions of war. I am glad that this contract is to go to the public accounts committee. I am glad that this discussion has taken place this afternoon. The minister says that the contract should have gone to the committee without discussion, but I say that this House of Commons is a democratic institution. It is an institution for precisely what it has been used for this afternoon. The more airing that can be given to opinions of members of this house—

Mr. DUNNING: Street rumours.

Mr. COLDWELL: This is a contract.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) spoke of street rumours and he has disseminated them all across the country this afternoon.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. gentleman's interruption—

Mr. DUNNING: Scattering suspicion.

Mr. COLDWELL: —is not well taken, because it is a contract we are discussing, not street rumours.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, but it was.

Mr. COLDWELL: Ever since I have been speaking I have not mentioned street rumours.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member for Vancouver North did.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member for Vancouver North based all his argument on the contract. He suggested that in view of certain street rumours it was well that we should look into this matter in order to stop them. I submit that it is in the interests of the government that these matters should be investigated publicly and discussed publicly in this chamber.

Mr. W. A. WALSH (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, this contract was let to a firm in Montreal, and I come from that particular district. Without wanting to cause any offence to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), or to bring about any violent eruptions on his part directed to myself at a later date, I should like to give my support to the motion moved this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). This particular firm was not in the machine-shop business prior to obtaining this contract. When we have so many machine-shops in Canada so well equipped to carry out work of this kind, I cannot see why a contract for shells should have been given to a firm not regularly engaged in the machine-shop business and not equipped in any way to carry out such work. I do not think there is any particular need to get all "het up," as the Minister of National Defence did. This is a matter of business. The hon. member for Vancouver North placed before this house certain information which would lead anyone with an unbiased mind to feel sure that the Department of National Defence was not being run in a businesslike manner at the present time.

This is one instance where business principles should be put into effect. Such a policy would save the ratepayers of Canada much money and would also give us a more effective and businesslike administration. I am not speaking disparagingly of the minister himself. I made that abundantly clear when I was discussing the Bren gun contract. I recognize the ability of the Minister of National Defence and that he is a man who should have the respect of everyone in the house. I am not gainsaying that point in any shape or form, but I do say that we in this parliament should give the Canadian people a clear understanding that we are proceeding in every respect in a businesslike manner in conducting the affairs of this country. Recently we have been flooded with ballots. We read daily in our newspapers the suggestion that the conduct of business in this house is not as it should be. The blame is attached to the government where it naturally belongs, because they are the ones who are conducting the business of this house, and it is just such contracts as this that are undermining the confidence of the Canadian people and making them feel that as we are now constituted we cannot give Canada a lead in so far as business administration is concerned.

If there is one place where competitive bids could have been obtained, it was in the manufacture of these shell casings, because there is nothing at all complicated about them. In the Bren gun inquiry we heard a great deal about the delicate machinery required for the manufacture of this complicated weapon; but here is something that requires simply machine shop-skill and precision, and any machine-shop is in a position to tender on the production of shell casings and on complete shells or parts of shells.

I feel that the government in this instance should have established the principle, of which they have frequently boasted, of competitive bids for work of this kind, and then they would have been able to establish what has been referred to in this house as a basic price. It is a generally accepted principle of business that the best means of establishing a basic price for any article in any industry is to have competitive bids on that article, and there were at least seven firms in eastern Canada and there might have been other firms in western Canada which could without any difficulty have submitted competitive prices for the manufacture of these articles.

What do we find? We find no competitive prices. We find no firms invited to give prices or submit suggestions. We find one firm given the contract without any competitive bids. It might have been just a coincidence —I cannot say whether it was or not—that the head of this firm happened to be Mr. Janin, a well known and recognized Liberal in the district of Montreal. I say it might have been merely a coincidence that the contract went to a company whose president happened to be a Liberal in politics. But, coincidence or otherwise, the Canadian people are again going to say with regard to this contract: "Here is another case of political advantage operated through the Department of National Defence"—when the Department of National Defence should be endeavouring to get the best possible equipment at the lowest possible price so as to give the people the maximum service in connection with the defence of our country.

[Mr. Walsh.]

I should like to urge that point because I have heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of National Defence say on more than one occasion that which is quite contrary to the principle involved in the letting of this contract. I should like to see them get back to the competitive price system so that we may be able to establish a business in this dominion of manufacturing armaments without having every contract of the national defence department brought up and debated on the floor of this house. What a black eye it is for this government to have debated in parliament contract after contract let in the same way by the Department of National Defence! The government are not withdrawing one iota from the privileged contractors. They are setting up this man and this firm in business, and equipping his plant to turn out this initial delivery of shells. That company is now in a preferred position when it comes to submitting a bid in the future against other firms which are in the field now and are willing to submit prices.

I hope, Mr. Speaker—and here I am directing myself more particularly to the Minister of National Defence—that he will table immediately all contracts that have been let in the past two years, so that we may have a complete investigation into them all, and then consider them a closed book; and from then on start on a new basis with a business-like administration given by the Department of National Defence, so that the Canadian people will be warranted in having a certain degree of confidence in the manufacture of armaments for the defence of their country.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, since the departure of the former leader of the Conservative party and official leader of the opposition, I have felt at a great loss, that somebody was missing from this house, and I was looking for someone to replace the right hon. gentleman in my affections. I think now I shall choose the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh), who has just spoken, to be my pet colleague, and whenever I have an opportunity to listen to him he will remind me of his dear, illustrious leader, although my hon. friend was not one of the three members of the official opposition who accompanied his late leader to the Union station on the day he left.

Mr. WALSH: Mr. Speaker, may I disclaim the high and distinguished honour that my hon. friend is planning for me.

Mr. POULIOT: I see, Mr. Speaker, that my choice is appreciated, and if it is not accepted, it will be imposed on the hon.

gentleman. If his former illustrious leader had tears in his eyes when he felt at the station that he was like an orphan abandoned there, it was because only three of his former supporters were at the station to see him off.

Mr. SPENCE: Why bring that up?

Mr. POULIOT: And the hon. member for the west end of the city of Montreal was not one of them. Then his former leader mumbled a few words, which were understood by those around to be the English equivalent of "Et tu, Brute."

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is not speaking to the motion before the house.

Mr. POULIOT: No, sir, I am expressing my deep feelings, and now this matter having been settled by agreement, I come to the motion before the chair.

The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) has found something wrong in the fact that the company was chosen by the department itself instead of by the interdepartmental committee. As a member of this house, I do not believe in any interdepartmental committee. I do not see why any group of civil servants should have to do the work of the government. Whenever any contract is awarded, the government has no reason to lean upon the shoulders of any departmental official or upon any group of departmental officials. The government must come to the house and take responsibility for what the government has done.

I do not see who were the experts, and what they were, in that interdepartmental committee considering the profits to be made in the manufacture of armaments. Any one of these gentlemen might have been an expert in his own particular branch; but very few of them were experts in the manufacture of munitions, and the only one of them who knew anything about the manufacture of munitions belonged to the Department of National Defence. Therefore I do not see why one should rely upon such an interdepartmental committee to decide whether a contract should be awarded either to Mr. Janin or anyone else. In fact it was noted by Commissioner Davis that the delays with regard to the signature of the Bren contract were as much on account of the interdepartmental committee as on account of the evident incompetence of Colonel Orde, the judge advocate general. I hope that when this contract is submitted to the committee, the first witness to be heard on the contract as well as any other gun contract will be that same Colonel Orde, and then it will be illuminating to members of the committee to learn what is the trouble in the Department of National Defence. My contention is that whenever a man is incompetent, another man should be put in his stead. Any incompetent man in the civil service should either be superannuated or should remove himself gently from the picture, but he should be replaced at once by a competent man, and then we would need no interdepartmental committees of any kind.

There is another statement which was made by the leader of the opposition. He asked, "Why pick such a company? It is an extraordinary procedure." Why is it an extraordinary procedure? What was there wrong about the fabrication of the guns by that company? Nothing at all. In this house we have the reversal of that well known and elementary principle of British justice, that no one shall be considered guilty until he is found guilty. From the able speeches which have been delivered by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh), the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and others, it is apparent that they assume there is something wrong although they do not prove it. Of course they want to know about the matter, but why put the blame on the minister until everything is made clear to them? The leader of the opposition said, "So far as I am concerned it is the will of the house." Probably that was a slip of the tongue, because it was the practice of his illustrious predecessor to assume that his own will was the will of the house. I know very well that the hon. gentleman who now performs the high functions of leader of the opposition is, as has been said of him, a man of human characteristics, and the expression was probably a slip on his part.

But who is to blame if the contract has not been placed before the house until within the last few days? Every one of us; those sitting to your left, Mr. Speaker, as well as those sitting to your right. Nobody asked for the contract. The minister has many things to do. He complies generally with every reasonable request which is made to him from any section of the house. Whenever an hon. member wants information, he has only to put his motion on the order paper, and very seldom is his request refused. Until now only one minister in the whole cabinet has refused me reasonable information or has objected to my statements about civil servants. All the others, including the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), the new Postmaster General (Mr. McLarty), the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), have always complied with my requests. Very seldom has the government refused any information which was asked for. Of course they have not a faculty apparently possessed by some hon. members; they are not mind readers, and they do not know what is behind the heads of hon. members. But when a member wants any information which can be reasonably disclosed, he has only to ask for it. Then why blame the government for not having produced the contract before? That is something I cannot understand. That is my first point.

My second point is, that as soon as an hon. member gets any information from the government, whether in the form of a copy of a contract or any other material, he looks at it with the idea that there must be something wrong in it, even though on the face of it there is nothing to support his suspicion. That is all wrong. I hope that in all our dealings together we shall come to accept the elementary rules of British practice. They are very easy to understand, and everyone knows them.

Now, sir, is it so wrong to favour our friends? It means in the first place one thing, that we have friends. Then it can be wrong only when that friend does not justify the amount which is paid to him either for work or for services. Moreover, we know our friends better than we know our opponents, because our opponents keep away from us, and we do not have the advantage of knowing them as well as those who support us.

One thing which surprises me very much is the way in which the fabrication of munitions is publicized, not only in the house but in the press. A distinguished soldier told me that it was easy for spies to cable very secret news about the armaments of this country and the United States, merely after having read the columns of some important papers which are published in New York, Montreal, or even Ottawa. I am surprised to see how readily news is released to the effect that a certain kind of gun, which most of the time is described in technical detail, is to be made at this or that particular place, and that this particular kind of shell is to be manufactured at such other place. The same is true with regard to aeroplanes and other kinds of military equipment. Because of this. I would suggest to the committee which will study the Bren gun contract or any other contract regarding the manufacture of munitions, that it should sit behind closed doors when it comes to the specific details of any piece of armament—not to prevent the press from being informed of what has been done by any statesman or politician, but to prevent the press from knowing intimate technical details about the construction of armaments.

For all these reasons, sir, it seems to me that it is not so bad to award contracts to those we know and to those we trust, in order that no secrets shall go outside. Of course there are many supporters of the leader of the opposition, of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group, and of the social credit movement, who can be trusted as regards the fabrication of armaments. On the other hand I have a very strong objection to the publication of tenders, thus giving specific technical details about the production of armaments to anyone who sends a cheque with his tender. This is another suggestion, by the way, but it explains in my humble view, although I have not discussed the matter with any member of the government, why at times it is decided to award such contracts to responsible business firms who are well known to the party awarding the contract. It seems to me, therefore, that this is a tempest in a teacup, and, of course, there is much exaggeration about it.

There is one thing that we must not lose in this house and that is a sense of proportion. It is most interesting to see anyone building a skyscraper on the head of a pin, but the skyscraper will not stand long because the foundation is not very solid, though it may look nice. Nothing is more beautiful than castles in the air, but we see them in dreams and not in reality. Therefore, as my hon. friends to your left. Mr. Speaker, as well as to your right, are practical men, I assume that we shall not attach too much importance to the statements that have been made this afternoon unless any one of those gentlemen, after having heard witnesses, can substantiate any insinuation and prove that something has been wrong in the awarding of the contract to the Janin construction company or any other company.

Mr. C. B. HOWARD (Sherbrooke): I shall take only a few minutes in this debate, but it is only fair to give the members of this house on all sides from a business point of view something in connection with this contract.

During the great war from 1914 to 1918 the manufacturers of Sherbrooke, in efficiency of manufacture, were second to none in any part of Canada. This contract calls for 10,000 18-pounder shells. The Ingersoll-Rand company in Sherbrooke, which was cited by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), produced 10,000 of these shells per day; in other words, the contract would represent on that basis one day's work.

This is what I want to say to the house. When there is a question of this contract or other governmental contracts for munitions being given, Canadian industries are willing to cooperate one hundred per cent, should the time ever come, and we all hope that it never will. But they are not desirous of disrupting their natural course of production for the benefit of Canadians in order to take on government contracts at this stage of the game. In fact, when this contract and a similar one were offered the Canadian Ingersoll-Rand, or when the matter was suggested to them not so long ago, their answer surprised me as I am sure it will surprise the house. They said, "To take on a contract for the government on what basis?" I replied that it was on a cost plus basis and they said, "Never under any consideration will we touch a contract on a cost plus basis. Let the government of this country get anybody who is foolish enough to take on such a contract to produce goods on a cost plus basis, but if they want us to manufacture the goods let them tell us what they are willing to pay and we will tell them whether we will produce the goods."

If this contract had been offered to Sherbrooke, which is one of the centres of the steel industry in Canada, they would not have looked at it, and probably the reason why the contract went to this particular firm is that no one else, certainly not in my district, could be got to take it on.

Mr. WALSH: You are right.

Mr. HOWARD: The hon. member knows I am right when I say that.

Mr. WALSH: Absolutely. No one would take that contract, no reputable firm.

Mr. HOWARD: It is only a question of small production, as was stated by the minister a minute ago—practically speaking, a pilot plant to establish the cost of this size of shell.

Mr. MANION: But is it not a natural inference to draw that if the Janin company or the other company succeeded in making these shells they would be given further contracts?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not necessarily.

Mr. MANION: Not necessarily, but that is a natural inference.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is no promise of any kind.

Mr. HOWARD: I was almost addressing my remarks to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) because I was surprised at his statement. I am giving you the absolute facts. A man who is producing goods in the steel industry, or any other industry for that matter, has his plant at maximum efficiency, and if he should change over and put a thousand employees in any plant on a cost plus basis, then when the small order had been completed and he had to go back to an efficiency basis in order to compete with industry in all parts of Canada, selling to the trade, who buy at the lowest price, he would be out of luck.

I say, therefore, that this contract is one hundred per cent right and was properly handled. More than that, it should not have been discussed from the standpoint of publicity in the House of Commons to-day in the present situation. There are too many matters that are exceedingly pressing at the present time, there is too much agitation throughout the country in connection with many problems that are facing the people of Canada, for us to spend our time as we have been doing lately, discussing these things when the proper course is to refer such matters to a committee and there have them discussed. They should not be discussed on the floor of the House of Commons with a view to publicity.

To those who think that the profiteering element enters into contracts of this kind I say this: Do they realize—and the hon. member sitting beside me happened to be a member of the munitions purchasing board at the time—that the price paid for the first contract for the manufacture of shells in those terrible days from 1914 to 1918 was reduced on the second issue and further reduced on the third issue? On the first contract at the highest price I do not believe any manufacturer made a dollar. On the second contract there was a reduction in price of about forty per cent and they did not make very much money, and on the last contract, when the price was below cost of producing the first contract, they made money. When you talk about profiteering in private industry and it is a question of the government fixing the price, Canadian efficiency alone will decide whether there are profits in the contract or not. It is not based on either of the other assumptions.

I think we should not discuss this matter now. I am in favour of referring it to the committee. But I congratulate the minister on the way he has handled the matter. Remember that Canada is not at war. The position would be entirely different if we were at war; then there would be cooperation on the part of the people all over this country. But we are not at war, and the government should not disclose these munitions contracts when they are only test contracts, in order to determine our position in case anything should happen.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) said he thought I should say something in this debate. If I speak very briefly it will be because I do not wish to follow my hon. friend in a course for which I think he is to be criticized rather than commended, that of speaking on an important public matter without either knowledge or reflection. I take the hon. gentleman's own introductory words; he said he had not seen or heard of this contract until just before the luncheon hour; he had combined his lunch time with thinking over it, and admittedly without knowing anything about it, he has spoken at some length and gone pretty far in criticism of the administration. That course of procedure is entirely wrong, it is against the public interest, it not only wastes the time of parliament but creates suspicion and disbelief where no ground for either exists. And what I have said concerning the leader of the opposition I think may be said in part with respect to the hon. member who introduced the motion (Mr. MacNeil). If the government were opposing his motion, then I could see why hon. gentlemen opposite should come forward with every argument they could urge in criticism of the government for trying to prevent the hon. member from obtaining the fullest possible information and light.

There are times and places for all things in the arrangement of the business of this house. That is the point I wish particularly to make this afternoon. Parliament has itself laid down certain rules for the conduct of public business, and has appointed certain committees to facilitate intelligent discussion in this house. Where there are special committees and standing committees appointed, the purpose is obviously to give to hon. members who may be members of such committees, and through them to the house generally, the fullest knowledge of all material and relevant facts, and to avoid wasting the time of parliament on matters which should not be discussed at all because they are not relevant.

What is the motion of the hon. member? It is:

> That a copy of the agreement between the government and the Montreal Construction Supply and Equipment, Limited, Montreal, [Mr. Howard.] for the machining of billets and forgings in the manufacture of shells, together with all related orders in council, documents, correspondence, minutes of the interdepartmental committee, and statements of claim, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts.

The government is prepared to grant that request. My hon. friend knows it. But may I point out that the motion, if made in accordance with the motive which we would naturally assume, is for the purpose of supplying hon. members with information before we begin to discuss the particular matter here. It asks first for the agreement. I question whether six hon. members—in fact I doubt whether more than two hon. members have read that agreement. The minister himself undoubtedly has read it, and possibly the hon. member who moved the motion, but I doubt whether one other member of this house has read it.

Mr. MANION: I have read it.

Mr. HOMUTH: I have read it.

Mr. POULIOT: And the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey).

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are four hon. members who have read this contract. Yet we are all expected to listen to a discussion of its merits or the reverse before we have had opportunity of perusing it carefully; it is brought up unexpectedly without adequate notice or without any hon. member being in a position to prepare himself to discuss it—

Mr. WALSH: May I ask the Prime Minister to include my name among those who have read it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Coming to the next request, the motion asks for all related orders in council. Has my hon. friend who introduced the motion read these orders in council? I venture to say he has not. He asks for the documents; has he seen all the documents? I venture to say he has not. He asks for the correspondence; has he seen the correspondence?

Mr. MANION: How could he?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He asks for the statements of claim; has he read the statements of claim?

Mr. MANION: How could he possibly have seen them?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what I am asking.

Mr. MANION: Does the right hon. gentleman suggest—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MANION: —that I can ask questions only about things I already know, or that a motion should be put and we should never discuss it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will allow me to proceed I think the public will reach their own conclusions very quickly.

Mr. MANION: They are reaching them about my right hon. friend pretty fast.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will allow his good nature instead of his ill nature to govern him he will be all right.

Mr. MacNEIL: I am sure the right hon. gentleman does not wish to misstate my position. I did place on the order paper a series of questions and asked for the production of papers some time ago. I have taken advantage of all the opportunities provided to obtain the information.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But my hon. friend is asking now for the opportunity which the rules of this house afford to those who wish to get the fullest information, and the government is ready to give it to him, but he is not prepared to wait; without getting the information he makes his speech condemning the contract, or if he does not condemn he has done his utmost, and the leader of the opposition the same, to create suspicion in the minds of the people of this country that there is something wrong with the contract, and this without any investigation whatever. Hon. members opposite are constituting themselves not only prosecutors but judges and jury before there has even been consideration of the matter. That is entirely wrong from every point of view. It is not in accord with the judicial way in which any matter of public importance should be dealt with; it is wrong with respect to the parliamentary method of proceeding as set forth in the rules of this house; it is wrong from the point of view of the interests of the department and the position of the minister. Moreover it is entirely unfair to the country itself that unwarranted suspicion should be created in the minds of the people with regard to one of the great public departments of this country.

This afternoon some hon. members referred to the fact that the press is commenting upon the circumstance that a great deal of time is being taken up in discussing some matters here when we ought to be proceeding with other and more important business. With respect to this afternoon's proceedings I think such criticism would be wholly justified. Parliament has provided means whereby the fullest information can be obtained by hon. members in regard to a public matter of this kind before it is discussed on the floor of the house, and those means should have been availed of before this discussion took place. If, after the matter has gone to the public accounts committee, and hon. members have had all the information and facts laid before them, and the committee has reported, there is the desire to discuss the committee's report and bring out relevant facts, hon. members are at liberty and it is their duty to do so. That is the time and occasion afforded by the procedure of parliament itself. Now I appeal to hon. members on all sides, having regard to what we must see only too clearly, a desire on the part of some people in this country, who really ought to know better, to create distrust in our democratic and parliamentary institutions, that they give their help to the government by seeking to make the debates in this house what they should be in accordance with the rules of the house.

Hon. members say the government can control the situation. Control? Last night we discontinued the debate on the trade agreement in order that to-day and for the next two or three days, before the senate returns, we might forward to the other house some of the measures on the order paper, so that they might consider them when they meet. What happens? To-day pretty much the entire day has been taken up in discussing a motion which I contend should not have been discussed at this stage at all, unless the government were refusing to grant the request of the hon. member who made it. I see my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) ready to start up, and I know what is in his mind. It is a criticism which is coming from him all the time, and I wish hon. members to see the significance of it at a time like the present. He is ready to say that the Prime Minister is trying to shut off debate.

Mr. REID: That is what they want.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think something of that kind is in his mind; he will say hon. members ought to have the fullest opportunity for discussion. I am not trying to shut off debate. I am trying to put debate into its proper place. There are times and seasons for all things, and unless we observe those times and seasons we shall be here for a very long time in getting through with the public business.

I now come to the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition, in regard to an editorial which appeared in one of the Ottawa papers, the paper which has been mentioned this afternoon.

Mr. MANION: Not one, but many editorials.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. gentleman referred to one in particular; I shall come to the "many" in a moment. I agree with my hon. friend the leader of the opposition that that kind of journalism serves no public purpose, and certainly does credit least of all to the publication which lends itself to that kind of unwarranted criticism.

One of the things I think there is reason to deplore in some of the journalism of our country to-day is that some papers which heretofore have been a guide to the country generally and a help to members of parliament, by their fair comment with respect to public matters, are losing all their influence because they are coming to be recognized not as journals standing for fair comment on public matters but as the instruments of certain powers, interests and forces which wish to present only a point of view of their own contrary to some of the views which others may hold.

I come back to what my hon. friend said. He suggested bringing to the bar of the house the one who was responsible for the particular editorial referred to. I think the place to have him appear is before the public accounts committee, because the matter has been referred to that committee. And I hope the members of the committee will see that the paper in question has an opportunity of substantiating there some of the charges which have been made in its editorial columns.

But to suggest that we should bring anyone to the bar of the house—well, what would be the effect of it? So far as I can see it, it would simply be playing into the hands of the publication itself. Make a martyr of anyone, whether it be a newspaper, a newspaper publisher, or an editor, and you begin to serve probably the one great purpose he may have in view. I know what would be said in regard to myself. It is this: "Here is the Prime Minister again, trying to suppress public opinion! Here is the government asserting its power and authority to silence criticism of itself!" That is what would be said, in a minute.

Unfortunately in dealing with public affairs the choice is not always between the one course which is going to be wholly right and the other course which is wholly wrong. Too often the choice is between the lesser of two evils. And that is something I am obliged to ask myself every day as I consider what attitude I should take on certain public measures, or what I should say in the house. I must ask myself whether it would be better to allow some things to pass altogether, and say nothing about them, or whether I should rise in my place and say a word which perhaps would occasion debate which would take up the rest of the day.

So far as concerns trying to keep the press of the country in control, I shall say to my hon. friend that that is a job which I should not like to undertake.

Mr. MANION: I was not suggesting that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the sense in which my hon. friend meant it, I am agreeing with him, in this particular. If I began to raise questions of privilege with respect to statements I see in the different newspapers, or in some of the newspapers of this country, from day to day, I would be on my feet every afternoon in this House of Commons pointing out where in editorial columns or in news columns there are statements which are absolutely untrue, the government's position misrepresented, or the position of other hon. members misrepresented. I put some of it down to a lack of an understanding of the question on the part of those who have been writing about it, or reporting concerning it.

I think in the long run the people will judge for themselves—and they usually judge pretty correctly in these matters. Where occasionally some slip takes place in a public journal, and it is noticed, the public understands that it might well be a slip. But when day after day the administration's point of view is misrepresented in news or editorial columns, the public very soon judge for themselves as to whether or not the purpose underlying it is that of fair comment, or whether there is some other objective in view. I say if one does not take exception to much that appears in the press it is for the reason, that one does not wish to take up time unnecessarily in questioning matters, which, as a result of such action, it would probably be impossible to remedy.

May I now for a moment come to the question of these contracts. I must say it is extraordinary to hear different members suggest that this or that should be done, as if it were some new course being proposed, and something the government had refused to do. The minister has told this House of Commons that he was prepared not only to put all contracts on the table, but, as he said last session, to have them all referred to the public accounts committee. That statement is on record in two places in Hansard of last year. Every hon. member knows that to get any contract he wishes, or all the contracts he wishes, all he has to do is to put a notice of motion on the order paper asking that such contracts be tabled—and unless there are good and sufficient reasons to the contrary they will be tabled immediately. The fact that any particular contract has not been tabled up to the present time is probably because it has not been requested. Is it to be assumed that the government has some clandestine motive in refusing to table things, just because they do not put on the table every contract signed in the different departments of government?

Mr. DUNNING: Hundreds of them have been tabled.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has pointed out, hundreds of these contracts have already been tabled. But to criticize the government for not tabling something which has not been requested is a criticism which I think is wide of the mark, altogether. The minister has indicated and I wish to emphasize the government's intention in the matter by endorsing what he has said, namely, that we are quite prepared to have these contracts, individually or collectively, go to the public accounts committee, and the government wants nothing other than the fullest and completest investigation in regard to any matter with respect to which there may be the slightest ground for suspicion.

I ask hon. members of the house this question: Could greater evidence have been given of the government's wish in the matter than that when that scurrilous article appeared in Maclean's, with the insinuations and suspicions it was creating, without losing a day the government ordered an inquiry by a justice of the supreme court into the whole business—into everything that was set out by way of insinuation or otherwise in that article. We referred the thing in its entirety to a judge of the highest court in Canada, and gave him the fullest powers. If that step had not been taken I could have understood the suggestion being made that we were trying to conceal something. But when the government instituted an inquiry of the kind it gave the strongest evidence possible that so far as this administration is concerned we are anxious to have everytihng relating to munitions, armaments and the like —and in fact, all public contracts—just as clean and wholesome as it can possibly be made.

Let me say this: When I caused to be placed before council the order in council recommending the appointment of a commission I had just the same motives that every hon. member in the house has with respect to questions relating to the Department of National Defence, namely, to see that there should not be the slighest suspicion of wrongdoing in any particular with respect to any contract with which it might be concerned. Had the commisioner named any member of the department or any individual, had he found any wrong-doing in any particular, I would have been the first to take action that would have satisfied every single member of this house with respect thereto. I want to say the same with respect to all contracts existing at the present time. I welcome, and the government welcomes, the fullest inquiry by the public accounts committee. Call every member of the department of defence before that committee and question him as much as you like. If you find any evidence of wrong I will give you my word at once on behalf of the government that we will see whoever has been guilty of wrong is immediately dealt with in the appropriate manner.

I do wish to say, however, that at times like the present it is important not to create a want of confidence in any department of the government, and least of all in the department of defence, unless there are good grounds for so doing. It is very easy one or two years after a step has been taken to say that we should have done this or we should have done that, but I ask hon. members to put themselves for a moment in the frame of mind in which they were one or two years ago with respect to appropriations for increased armaments and munitions and ask themselves what they would have done. I remember the difficult task the administration faced in persuading the house that there was a necessity existing in relation to international affairs which made it obviously desirable and necessary that this country should increase its defences and that some additional appropriations should be made for munitions and armaments. I remember how strongly that program was opposed, and I think hon. gentlemen diagonally opposite remember quite well. It was not opposed on the ground that there was going to be wrong-doing with respect to it, or that it was going to be made an instrument for securing campaign funds and the like; it was opposed on the score that it was not necessary.

Let me put this question fairly to hon. members. It has been suggested with regard to one contract which has been discussed that the work should have been undertaken in the arsenals instead of being given to a private firm. I ask hon. members if at the time that other contract was being considered the government had begun to open up one of our arsenals, to put in machinery costing a million dollars or more for the purpose of manufacturing munitions and armaments, what would have been the effect upon the minds of the people from one end of this country to the other? Would we have been helping a situation which was extremely critical if we had unduly alarmed the people of Canada by opening up our arsenals for the manufacture of arms and munitions? We all hoped that what was threatening would pass. It is only because we are not yet secure enough to feel that we can afford to do other than make provision for increased defence of this country at this time that we are asking for additional appropriations to-day. We did hope, when we first brought in our increased appropriations, that within the next year or two at least the situation which was becoming extremely critical in other parts of the world would have passed. We found out last September that we had not been far wrong when we took the steps we did one or two years before, and that the information we had been receiving had justified the action we were taking. The information necessitated pretty prompt action in some things, and we are fortunate to-day in having given the information we obtained the attention we did.

I just wish to present this point of view with regard to the whole question of the discussion of munitions and armaments from now on. I ask hon. members—and here I hope I am not to be accused of trying to intimidate the house; that will be the next thing I suppose, because I as Prime Minister have pointed out that there is a critical situation still existing in the world—to realize that we are as yet far from having a clear sky overhead. I think all of us would be well advised to get on with the business of this parliament as rapidly as we can because we may at some moment be called upon to consider questions larger than any we have discussed thus far. I pray that moment will not come, but who can say it will not in the light of the knowledge every man has who reads the press from day to day or from hour to hour? I say, in the light of the world situation being what it is let us have any inquiry we like, but do not for goodness sake, unless it is obviously necessary, let us do anything to create more in the way of suspicion and distrust in the minds of the people of this country in connection with defence affairs and a department which is seeking to do its utmost to make the defences of our country what they should be.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Just this one word in conclusion with regard to profiteering and the like. I hope it is not necessary for me to say that anything in the nature of profiteering would be wholly repulsive to every hon. member in this house. I hope I may be believed when I say that this government can be trusted to do everything within its power to prevent anything in the nature of profiteering. There has been talk about campaign funds. Why bring that matter into this particular discussion? Is there any single member who believes that my colleagues and myself would knowingly lend ourselves for one moment to any contract being given to any man in order that we might get some money out of it for purposes of a general election? I do not think there is a single hon. member in this House of Commons who believes anything of the kind. Why say it? Why raise suspicion with regard to it? Unfortunately campaign funds are necessary.

Mr. MacINNIS: It happened before.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend make the charge that it is happening now?

Mr. MacINNIS: No, that charge was made before.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I want to say to my hon. friend that when he speaks in this house, while we know who he is, while we know he is prepared to make statements without having authority for them, there are people in other countries who do not realize that the member who has spoken may not be speaking with the same authority as would some member of the administration.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the Prime Minister did not mean to say what he said. He said I would make statements for which I did not have proof. Have I ever made such a statement in the house?

Mr. MARTIN: Insinuations.

Mr. MacINNIS: I suggested there were campaign funds before.

Mr. MARTIN: The inference is quite clear.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no desire to impute any motive to any hon. member. If I have said anything I should not have said with respect to the hon. member, I withdraw it at once. What I wish to say, not only with regard to him but with regard to other hon. members, is that things may be said here in the course of discussion which those of us who are in this chamber from day to day fully understand. We know who may be saying certain things, we know the extent of the knowledge he may have and we know what reliance can be placed upon his word; but when words are cabled to Germany, Italy and other countries as coming from a member of the House of Commons of Canada, they create a very different impression there from what they do in this country.

At times like this we have to be very careful of what we say and of the discussions that take place. Here again I hope I am not to be accused of intimidating the house. I am only stating what I think is very much in the public interest to be stated, that is, that in dealing with questions which relate to peace and war and to the attitudes of countries toward the great question of defence, hon. members should view with the utmost care every utterance which they make in this house.

Campaign funds are necessary for the purposes of an election. Is there anything wrong with securing funds to help to propagate the principles in which one believes? How are we going to carry on an election unless we get some financial support? Unfortunately the country does not pay all the expenses of an election. I wish it did, and I think a good many others feel likewise. But until we change our laws so that our parliament will provide the money to carry on elections—elections are a necessary part of the business of government because there could not be a parliament without an election—some means must be found of getting money from different sources to enable an election to be carried on. How is it done? It is done by asking those who believe in certain principles and policies to support the party financially in defraying the legitimate expenses of a campaign. Every party does that and must do it. Why, then, should we always seek to decry the necessity of having the wherewithal to carry on a general election, and endeavour to link that up, that necessity, with some question of a public contract?

I want to make this one observation in conclusion. With respect to profiteering, with respect to anything that savours of corruption, with respect to any government contract whether it is in connection with the department of defence or any other department of the government, so far as this administration is concerned we will do all in our power to prevent anything of the kind. If anything of the kind is proven to exist, we will do all in our power to make an example of those who are responsible, in the manner in which the country will expect.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to say just a few words. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) suggested I was about to rise in my place to accuse him of shutting off the debate. I want to suggest to the Prime Minister that he and the Liberals are just as responsible as anyone else for the prolongation of debate, even this one.

Mr. MANION: More.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: A few minutes before the Prime Minister spoke, one hon. member, a supporter of the government, in a cynical defence of patronage, said it was quite right that the government should favour their friends, that when they did favour their friends they were sure of having their friends. Apparently they would not have them unless they took that course. We all know perfectly well that there has been political corruption in Canada before. We all know that. It is all very well for members to rise in their places and say that every party is guilty and that if we had the chance we would be guilty. That gets us nowhere. I urge that while the government has its responsibility—and it is a heavy responsibility—under our system of responsible government every member of the house also has his own responsibility.

An hon. MEMBER: But some do not take it very seriously.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Maybe, but some of us are trying to take it seriously, and we do not propose to be laughed off simply because we are taking advantage of the opportunities provided by this house.

My colleague the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) was quite within his rights in bringing forward his motion to-day. The Prime Minister rather suggested that it was sprung without notice, but his motion was regularly placed, as it had to be, on the order paper on the 23rd of last month, and I have no doubt the Prime Minister has facilities for knowing what the business of the house will be, just as every member has. So I submit that the hon. member for Vancouver North is quite within his rights. Further, he was not sure what the attitude of the government would be until the government announced it.

Mr. DUNNING: He was told in the previous debate, and the minister stated repeatedly that he would table and refer every contract.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It has been said generally that the contracts could be seen; but the fact is that we have not had the public accounts committee meeting in past years, and it was only because of the most vigorous exposé we had of the Bren gun affair that we got action from the government.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no, it was volunteered.

Mr. BRADETTE: The hon. member is not sincere.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am sincere.

Mr. VIEN: It is not a correct statement of fact.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am sorry if I am not correct.

Mr. VIEN: From the very beginning—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has the floor and cannot be interrupted except with his consent.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My judgment is that had we not had the very serious challenge of the policy of the government by my colleague who introduced this motion today, I doubt very much whether this matter would have been referred to the public accounts committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is my opinion.

Mr. VIEN: And that is a fact that we challenge.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is my opinion, and I am sincere in giving it.

Mr. DUNNING: You just don't believe what we said with respect to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to the hon. member's observation, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) replied to the member who made the motion, and said at once that this contract and every contract could go to the committee.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: When?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To-day, in the debate.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, after the speech of my colleague.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: You say you got the committee only after long debate. The hon. member knew beforehand he could have his committee.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I went back to the Bren gun just as an illustration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say in regard to the Bren gun, that if my hon. friend looks at Hansard he will see that I stated, before there was any debate at all, that that motion would be accepted by the government.

Mr. REID: And that if the member would not proceed with it the government would.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If we are going to go into the history of the matter, it will be recalled that my colleague spoke on the Bren gun in the debate on the address, and it was, I think, necessary that his indictment should have been made then or the subsequent developments might not have taken place.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend will find on the votes and proceedings of this house a motion by the Minister of National Defence himself to refer the Bren gun contract to the public accounts committee before the motion was even put and before any debate.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: After the hon. member for Vancouver North had made his statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, no, before any statement.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As my colleague suggests, after the notice of motion was placed on the order paper.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is my position. As I understand the matter, it has taken all the force which we had to secure the action that the government has now taken.

Mr. DUNNING: Absurd.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Prime Minister a few minutes ago went back to what he called the scurrilous attack in Maclean's magazine and suggested that the government was desirous of having the utmost publicity. I have no desire to go back over that ground, but I would remind the Prime Minister that had his own Minister of National Defence given us a little fuller information last year, and a little more accurate information—information in harmony with the real situation—some of us would not have felt so much like bringing the matter up this year. But information was not given last year, or what was given was wholly inadequate. Under these circumstances it is perhaps quite natural that my colleague to-day should feel that he should make a fairly full statement before the matter came to a vote, if it did come to a vote in this house.

Mr. DUNNING: He knew perfectly well that the government had accepted the motion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Let me say that the hon. member for Vancouver North based his whole argument not on rumours on the street but on the contract itself. He did refer in one instance to rumours on the street, but let me say to the Prime Minister that while there is danger of the public to-day losing confidence in democratic government, one reason for its losing confidence in democratic government is the failure of the government to deal with the great problems before the people to-day. That is the serious menace.

Mr. HOWARD: It has had no chance.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No chance? The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) does not really mean that!

Mr. HOWARD: This session.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No chance this session?

Mr. BRADETTE: What have you done? Mention your own leadership first.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: With regard to the Bren gun, the fact is that we did not get full publicity until that so-called scurrilous article appeared in Maclean's magazine. I have no responsibility for that at all, but I doubt if we would have had full publicity and the reference to the public accounts committee or even the appointment of the commission had not that article appeared. The fact is that the opposition and other groups in this house have their responsibility to the public, and simply because the government is well entrenched and has a large following, is no good reason why we should not take advantage of the opportunity afforded by the rules of the house to discuss these matters.

The Prime Minister has told us that if there was anybody in the wrong in connection with this matter they would be dealt with. But some of us are not particularly interested in tracing down some wrong act to one individual. What we are interested in is in exposing what we believe to be wrong methods of doing things. Those wrong methods will sooner or later, almost inevitably, lead to particular abuses. I for one—and I think I can appeal to those hon. members who have known me for some years—am not particularly interested in individuals and individual actions, but I am interested in certain methods and policies. Take our attitude with regard to the armaments program mentioned by the Prime Minister. One reason why our group has been steadily opposed to the armaments program of the government is that the government has distinctly refused to state its foreign policy.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perfect nonsense.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We shall again have to oppose the armaments program until the government tells us what its foreign policy is. We cannot get this information. There are perhaps other reasons for our opposition, but that is one reason I wish to bring before the house. I have no desire to enter into a general discussion on the motion before us, but reference has been made again and again in this discussion to profiteering. I do not know just what profiteering is. It is, I assume, undue or wrongful profit-making. But I wish to go further than this and ask: Why should we have any profit making at all in the supplying of armaments?

Mr. SPENCE: How would we eat, if we didn't make a profit?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As far as the people who manufacture these munitions are concerned, they get their wages, whether they are in private factories or government arsenals or wherever they may be. What I object to is the making of profits out of this kind of manufacturing. I believe that most of the people of Canada have some sort of conscience in that matter. What are these armaments for? For purposes of killing. Some of us are bitterly opposed to war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: For purposes of preventing killing.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Prime Minister may assert that it is to prevent killing. I am not now going to discuss the whole question of war and armaments. But I would say this, that if war comes—and in this I agree with the Prime Minister—"heaven forbid"—the ordinary man in the street would be either asked to enlist or forced to go to war. There would be no profit in it for him. He risks his life at the call of his country, or is forced by the state to do so. For the life of me I cannot see why any private manufacturer should be allowed to make any profit out of war muntions. If we expect the common man to risk his life in war, the very least that the big manuacturer, the technician, and the big organizer can do is to give his services free to the state.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Some hon. members laugh at that. We all may very well laugh at that, because we know that persons of that class do not usually come forward and offer their services.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes, they do. Very many of them did in the last war. That is unfair.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Some of them went to the front; a few of them offered their services; and a great many of them, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) knows very well, stayed at home and profiteered.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend does not want to be unfair.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There were some—

Mr. DUNNING: There were a great number of industrialists, experts and technicians who did give their services free in the last war. That is well known. The hon. member's remark is unfair to them as a class.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have not the knowledge that the Minister of Finance has of these cases. I accept his word that there were some.

Mr. DUNNING: I have reason to know that there were.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I say that such a practice ought to be made the rule in this country.

Mr. FRASER: Why does the hon. member take his $4,000 a year?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If that remark is all we can get from the Liberal benches in answer to a serious statement of what I believe the policy of this country ought to be, then I almost despair of parliamentary institutions. Now that this matter has come up, while I am not so much interested in whether there should be a little more or a little less profiteering, I would to-day urge upon the government that the only possible way by which in the long run we can avoid profiteering is to see to it that, especially in this particular kind of manufacturing, so closely allied with war, there is no profiteering or profit-making out of what would involve human lives.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF REFRIGERATION

Mr. MARSHALL:

1. In what year was the first grant paid to the international institute of refrigeration in Paris, France?

2. Under what dominion statute is this grant authorized?

3. What amounts have been paid from year to year?

4. What material benefits accrue to Canada from such affiliation?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. 1910.

2. None; authorized by order in council.

3.

Year	Amount
1910..	100 francs	$ 19 00	(approx.)
1911..	100 "	19 00	(approx.)
1912..	500 "	96 46

The differences in the amounts listed are due to the fluctuations in the value of the franc.

4. The principal objects of the International Institute of Refrigeration are as follows:

(1) to stimulate investigations for the purpose of finding solutions of scientific, technical and industrial questions, of international scope, relating to the refrigerating industry;

(2) To examine measures for the best solution of questions relating to the conservation, transit and distribution of perishable produce;

(3) To publish all information concerning the world's frozen food situation, compiled from a triple standpoint: origin of production, circulation, consumption;

(4) To centralize, for the purpose of immediate publication, all technical, economical and statistical reports and documents related to the production and use of refrigeration;

(5) To concentrate, in view of finding remedial, administrative measures, all existing laws and legislative data that in any way affect international exchanges of produce that can derive benefit from refrigerated transport;

(6) To organize international congresses of refrigeration;

(7) To be in constant communication with adherent professional or scientific bodies in order to determine the practical value of conclusions issued and propose suitable measures for their realization;

The department receives a monthly bulletin on the activities of the institute; also copies of any special reports of congresses on refrigeration.

QUEBEC TERMINAL ELEVATOR WHEAT STORAGE STATISTICS

Mr. PERLEY:

1. What amount of wheat of all grades was held in store in the Quebec terminal elevator, in the city of Quebec, as at January 1, 1939, and weekly to date?

2. By what companies was the wheat delivered to the elevator?

Mr. HOWE:

The following information is furnished by the national harbours board:

1.	bushels
January 1, 1939	1,895,359
January 7, 1939	1,894,359
January 14, 1939	1,890,210

2. It is not in the public interest or in accordance with government practice to disclose this information.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—SOUTHAM PRESS CONTRACTS

Mr. AHEARN:

1. Does the Southam Press Limited, of Bleury street, Montreal, receive orders from the Canadian National Railways for printing tickets, time-tables, folders, etc.?

2. If so, how many contracts were awarded to the Southam Press by the Canadian National Railways during the years 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936, 1937 and 1938?

3. What was the amount of each contract awarded during this period?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2. The management of Canadian National Railways take the position that it is not in the interests of the railway to make public information of this sort.

3. Answered by No. 2.

DROUGHT AREAS—FOOD DONATIONS IN 1938

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River):

1. Were any donations of vegetables, fruit or fish, made by the dominion government during the year 1938, to drought areas of, (a) Saskatchewan, (b) Alberta?

2. Did the dominion government assume any of the costs in connection with such shipments to drought areas in, (a) Saskatchewan, (b) Alberta?

3. If so, how were such costs made up?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. (a) Yes. (b) No.

2. (a) Yes. (b) No.

3.

	Cars
Apples	85	$ 47,102 80
Beans (dry)	11	16,995 00
Cheese	22	99,567 11
Fish	31	58,450 75

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—ATLANTIC REGION EQUIPMENT SHOP REPAIRS

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Were any locomotives or railway cars belonging to the Canadian National Railways shipped from the Atlantic region to their shops in other regions for repairs during the year 1938?

2. If so, to what shops were such locomotives or cars sent?

3. How many locomotives and cars were sent to each such shop?

4. For what reasons?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No locomotives were shipped from Atlantic region to shops on other regions for repairs during 1938.

Of twenty-five colonist cars which were selected for conversion to first-class coaches at Winnipeg, two were located on Atlantic region and moved to Winnipeg. To offset this, two mail cars were sent from central region to Moncton shops for repairs.

No freight cars were moved from Atlantic region to shops on other regions for repairs, with the exception of steel coal cars, which were sent to Leaside shops.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Two passenger cars as mentioned above. No record has been kept of the number of steel coal cars which have been sent to Leaside, but this would be a very small number.

4. Steel coal cars form a small proportion of Canadian National freight equipment, and in order that the work may be done economically and efficiently it is necessary to concentrate it at one shop. For many years this work has been done entirely at Leaside, which shop has been specially equipped with overhead cranes, etc.

BOARD OF TRANSPORT COMMISSIONERS

Mr. KENNEDY:

1. What are the names of the members of the board of railway commissioners?

2. What is the date of the appointment and salary of each commissioner?

3. Do all of these commissioners give their full time to the work of the commission?

4. Have the said commissioners any other business affiliations?

Mr. HOWE:

1. The board of transport commissioners is composed of the following:—The Honourable Hugh Guthrie, chief commissioner, William Hugh Masson Wardrope, assistant chief commissioner, François Napoleon Garceau, deputy chief commissioner, John August Stoneman, commissioner, George A. Stone, commissioner.

2. The dates of orders in council covering above appointments, and the amount of salaries, are, respectively, as follows:—August 12, 1935, $12,500; November 8, 1938, $9,000; September 16, 1933, $8,000; March 12, 1929, $8,000; December 16, 1931, $8,000.

3. Yes.

4. No information.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES—HAMILTON-TORONTO AIRPORTS SERVICE

Mr. MARSH:

Has the Minister of Transport considered any plan relating to the conveyance of passengers between Hamilton and Malton airports, or between Hamilton and Toronto island airports, for the trans-Canada air service? If not, will he give the matter consideration?

Mr. HOWE: No. Arrangements for passenger traffic are entirely in the hands of the Trans-Canada Air Lines Corporation.

UNITED STATES WHEAT SHIPMENTS TO CANADA

Mr. PERLEY:

1. What quantity of United States wheat was shipped into Canada each week since October 1, 1938?

2. How much of said wheat was shipped in bond?

3. How much of said wheat was milled in Canada?

4. How much went into domestic consumption in Canada each week?

5. What was the duty paid on same?

6. What was the price paid for the wheat by Canadian millers?

Mr. EULER:

1. Weeks ending	Eastern elevator figures (bushels)
October 7, 1938	434,891
October 14,	230,320
October 21	106,785
October 28	....
November 4	....
November 11	....
November 18	229,826
November 25	....
December 2	209,827
December 9	....
Total	1,211,649

2. Canadian customs and elevator figures, 565,203 bushels.

3. Canadian flour milling figures, 266,039 bushels.

4. Canadian customs figures, an average of 35,527 bushels, or a total of 603,954 bushels for the period from October 1, 1938 to January 30, 1939 (17 weeks).

5. Canadian customs figures, $72,474.48.

6. Not available.

*BREN MACHINE GUN CONTRACT—COPIES OF EVIDENCE HEARD BEFORE ROYAL COMMISSION

Mr. MacNEIL:

1. How many copies of the evidence heard before the royal commission on the Bren machine gun contract were prepared?

2. What was the cost per copy?

3. What disposition was made of each copy?

4. Will the government make available three additional copies for the use of the members of the House of Commons?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to answer this question orally.

To the first question, how many copies of the evidence heard before the royal commission on the Bren machine gun contract were prepared?—There were twelve complete copies, plus one extra copy for the last seven days.

What was the cost per copy? $474.32½ per copy.

What disposition was made of each copy? One copy was the official record; one was for the use of the Commissioner; three were for the Department of National Defence; two were for Colonel Drew and Mr. Hellmuth; three were for the government counsel; one was for the Department of Finance; one complete and one partial copy for the Department of External Affairs.

Will the government make available three additional copies for the use of the members of the House of Commons? My reason for answering this question orally is, that it appears on inquiry that the copies which were made available to the different persons mentioned have been either marked up or cut up to a considerable extent in the course of the inquiry and it would therefore be difficult to get many complete copies. I have found it possible to get two complete copies and will be glad to see that they are placed at the disposition of the committee; but if more copies are required it will involve a considerable expense, because the stencils themselves, unfortunately, have been destroyed. Perhaps we might manage to secure parts of other copies of the report if they should be required.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN INVESTMENTS IN CANADA—CANADIAN INVESTMENTS ABROAD—AMOUNT PUBLIC DEBT HELD EXTERNALLY

Mr. HAYHURST:

1. What is the value at December 31, 1938, or nearest available date, of: (a) British investments in Canada; (b) foreign investments in Canada?

2. What is the value of: (a) Canadian investments in the British Isles; (b) Canadian investments in the United States; (c) Canadian investments in all other countries?

3. What is the total foreign public debt of Canada, and how much of this debt is held in: (a) United States; (b) Great Britain; (c) other countries?

Mr. EULER:

1. (a) British investments in Canada, $2,684·8 million; (b) Foreign investments in Canada, $4,080·2 million; Total, 6,765 million.

The above estimates are as at December 31, 1937.

2. Estimated Canadian investments abroad as at December 31, 1937. (a) Canadian investments in the United Kingdom, $40·9 million; (b) Canadian investments in the United States, $1,097·6 million; (c) Canadian investments in other countries, $619·4 million; Total, $1,757·9 million.

3. Estimated funded debt of Canadian governments and corporations held outside of Canada as at December 31, 1937. (a) Funded Debt held in United States, $2,031·4 million; (b) Funded Debt held in United Kingdom, $1,382·6 million; (c) Funded Debt held in other countries, $18·8 million; Total held outside of Canada, $3,432·8 million.

FEDERAL INSPECTORS IN SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. PERLEY:

1. How many inspectors are now employed by the federal government working in the province of Saskatchewan, in connection with the Department of Agriculture, the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and relief?

2. What are their names and home addresses, salaries and nature of their work?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Agriculture, 65; Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, 4.

2.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

KING'S ORDERS AND REGULATIONS—APPENDIX 6

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

For a copy of appendix 6 king's orders and regulations and any orders in council which may have been passed modifying the terms thereof.

ONE PARTY SYSTEM

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL REVENUE THAT IT COULD BE ESTABLISHED ONLY BY FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) a question growing out of reports of a speech he made last night in Toronto at the Toronto board of trade young men's association. It is headed:

Ilsley warns force is the price Canada is to pay; ruthlessly exerted in the fascist style is the only way.

This is as reported in the Ottawa Journal and the Toronto Globe to-day.

Inasmuch as England has had one hundred years of constitutional reform without force, I should like to ask the minister if he is correctly reported; if this is authentic, and if he made the same speech on the radio last night.

Hon. J. L. ISLEY (Minister of National Revenue): I am correctly reported, but I did not speak on the radio.

Mr. CHURCH: Force will not be needed. They will say it with ballots next time.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION

AMENDMENT OF ACT TO EXTEND AVAILABILITY OF BALANCE OF APPROPRIATION FOR NEXT FIVE FISCAL YEARS

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Technical Education Act to make available, for the purposes of the act, any portion of the unexpended appropriation during the period of five years succeeding the fiscal year ending March 31, 1939.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not wish to discuss this resolution because no doubt a bill will be introduced, founded upon it. Would the minister give some information regarding the provinces that have used the appropriation and those provinces in which there is a balance unused in their appropriation? Has he received any application from the board of education of Toronto this year for a building grant in connection with the work that is being done by thousands of students in aeronautics in the Central technical school? Did he hear their request, and if so, what action was taken? The committee ought to know, before the resolution is passed, what balances of appropriations are unexpended and to what provinces they belong. How does Ontario stand? Will the minister bring in other aids to technical education and grants this year?

Mr. ROGERS: This resolution precedes the introduction of a bill which is intended to renew for another five years the Technical Education Act of 1919, as previously amended in 1929 and 1934, for the purpose of permitting the province of Manitoba to take up its original allotment under the act of 1919. The earlier amending acts of 1929 and 1934 were designed for the same purpose, namely, to permit those provinces that had not taken up their allotments under the original legislation, to do so. Manitoba is the only province that is now enabled to take advantage of the legislation, and the amount which may still be claimed by that province under the act is $286,037.59.

As to Ontario, it was the only province which took up its full allotment during the currency of the original legislation, between the years 1919 and 1929. As regards the request made by the board of education of Toronto, it related to some special assistance for the purpose of enabling the board to extend its technical school in order to give courses in aeronautical engineering. I received a delegation from the board and we discussed the matter fully. We canvassed it from their point of view and our own, and I believe they were fully persuaded, at the conclusion of the interview, that there was no fund available from which the dominion could grant assistance for the construction of a building for technical education in Toronto, the province having exhausted its allotment under the original legislation.

Mr. CHURCH: Surely the minister, in respect of this matter will pay some heed to the royal commission's report away back in 1913 that it is a federal problem with regard to technical education and youth technical education, in view of the large number of men and youths out of work. Does the minister contemplate any more resolutions along this same line to help education, youth and unemployment?

Mr. ROGERS: This matter has been discussed on various occasions. When the Technical Education Act was renewed in 1929 and 1934, it was not contemplated that the provinces which had taken up their original allotments would be enabled to receive further allotments under the succeeding legislation, and under the legislation which will be brought down when this resolution is accepted it is not proposed that grants for technical education shall be made to any provinces apart from the one which has not taken up its original grant.

Mr. MASSEY: Is it possible without enabling legislation to introduce a bill similar to the Technical Education Act of 1919.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. ROGERS: I am not sure that I understand the question.

Mr. MASSEY: Technical education is, of course, a matter for the province, and the Technical Education Act of 1919, the full appropriation under which was taken up by Ontario and other provinces, has now been exhausted except in so far as Manitoba is concerned, so that this legislation is to complete the original design of the act of 1919 in relation to that province.

Mr. ROGERS: That is correct.

Mr. MASSEY: When Manitoba takes up the $288,000, the act is virtually completed and there is no more act. The introduction of a new act to function along the lines of the Technical Education Act of 1919 would invade, if one wishes to use that word, the educational rights of the provinces. Could such an act be introduced without enabling legislation?

Mr. ROGERS: If that were the policy of the government, I see no reason why such legislation could not be introduced in this house. That aspect of the matter was considered carefully when the act of 1919 was introduced, and I believe it was the view of the Department of Justice that it was possible for the dominion parliament to assist education in the provinces through grants in aid. It was through this method that the act of 1919 was put into effect.

Mr. MASSEY: The situation has not changed from 1919 to the present day, and therefore there is no handicap or hazard in the way of introducing an act such as the previous one. Am I clear in that?

Mr. ROGERS: Subject only to possible interpretations that might be put upon the decision of the judicial committee of the privy council in the unemployment insurance case.

Mr. WALSH: I had previously discussed this matter privately with the Minister of Labour with a view to considering technical education and the possibilities suggested by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey), but I realize that the time is short and the government is anxious to have this resolution adopted this afternoon. I refrain, therefore, from discussing technical education at this time. No doubt an opportunity will arise when the bill is introduced, or when some other measure is brought in bearing upon the subject. If I understand the rules correctly, and if I can have another opportunity to urge upon the government the necessity of something being done along the lines already suggested by the hon. member for Greenwood, I shall refrain from discussing the matter further this afternoon. Have I correctly interpreted my position; shall I have such an opportunity if I am present in the house when the matter comes up?

Mr. ROGERS: Following the acceptance of this resolution the bill will be introduced. It is a very short bill; but, it will have to go through the usual stages in this house, and I would think that such an opportunity would arise on the second reading of the bill.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it the intention of the government at this session to extend the provisions of the act by making further appropriations possible for the other provincial governments which have already exhausted the benefits of the act?

Mr. ROGERS: That is really a matter of government policy and, as my hon. friend is aware, government policy is disclosed from time to time as the government sees fit. But when we were considering the program for youth training we had to consider where the expenditure of money for purposes of this kind could be made most efficiently and with the best immediate results. We reached the conclusion at that time that under a program of youth training, a large part of which consists in technical training, results will be accomplished more efficiently and more quickly than by renewing grants for technical education. I should add that the annual amounts made available under youth training plans are double those made available under the Technical Education Act.

Mr. MASSEY: Have any communications of recent date been received, other than from the city of Toronto, asking for grants similar to those made under the Technical Education Act of 1919?

Mr. ROGERS: From time to time the Department of Labour receives communications from boards of education supporting the view that the earlier grants for technical education should be renewed. I have no doubt that similar requests were received by the preceding administration. I recall a request from the city of Ottawa along lines similar to that referred to by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). The city of Ottawa through its board of education asked special assistance in connection with a building for aeronautical engineering. The same answer was given to them as to the city of Toronto, that there was no appropriation from which such assistance could be given.

Mr. NEILL: Has British Columbia exhausted its grant under the act of 1919?

Mr. ROGERS: British Columbia exhausted its grant in the second period of the act, that is between 1929 and 1934.

Mr. CHURCH: The board of education of Toronto met the minister, and the Toronto members do not like the reception which they received. The government collects nearly $100,000,000 revenue from the city of Toronto—

Mr. ROGERS: Is my hon. friend taking exception to the reception they were given?

Mr. CHURCH: They have thousands of students there day and night, and with the growth of aviation for commercial, domestic and defence purposes, surely the government can give some money to help put up a building and start work in cooperation with the municipality. But they are not doing it. The people will be very much discouraged with the answer given this afternoon and the answer given to that deputation, although they were received quite politely. Surely the government should do something. In view of the growth of aviation as an industry, these student mechanics and others are needed, and employment can be found for them as fast as they graduate.

Mr. ROGERS: I am sure my hon. friend is not expressing the view of any member of the delegation when he complains of the reception accorded them. We did have a thorough discussion of the representations they made on behalf of assistance to their school of aeronautical engineering, but it was impossible to give them any answer other than the one that was made. Although they were disappointed, certainly they made no complaint to me that they had not had a friendly reception or that their representations had not been given proper consideration.

Mr. PELLETIER: Has Alberta exhausted its grants?

Mr. ROGERS: Alberta exhausted its allotment in the second period, between 1929 and 1934.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rogers thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 33, to amend the Technical Education Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 2, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

WAR MUNITIONS AND MATERIALS

PETITION OF MONTREAL WEST UNITED CHURCH FOR EMBARGO AGAINST SHIPMENTS TO JAPAN

Mr. W. A. WALSH (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege and pleasure to receive a communication from the Reverend Clarence Halliday, chairman of the session, and Thomas McLaren, clerk of the session of the Montreal West United Church, enclosing a copy of a petition to be presented to parliament and to the government in connection with the placing of an embargo against shipments of war materials to Japan. I desire now to present this petition to the house.

PRIVILEGE—MR. SLAGHT

ADDRESS DELIVERED BY HON. W. D. HERRIDGE IN OTTAWA ON MARCH 1

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I desire to direct the attention of this house to an address purporting to have been delivered last evening in this capital city by a man named W. D. Herridge, and published in a newspaper known as the Ottawa Citizen, a paper to whose subversive activities it was necessary for this house to refer yesterday. I shall explain in a moment my question of privilege. Let me say, sir, that it affects the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) and his entire group, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) and our entire group, the leaders of the other two groups opposite, and every one of the 245 members of the House of Commons.

This newspaper contains what purports to be a verbatim report of the speech, and among other things this gentleman said this:

> The first thing that Canadians have to do is to give their country a free parliament. Because to-day the parliament of Canada is not free to serve the people.

The second vile slur he cast upon this parliament and every member thereof is contained in this language:

> You must choose between the old parties and democracy. If the old parties are left in control of parliament, I believe they will unite. After the next election, or perhaps before—

That affects the members of this house.

> —the Liberal and Conservative parties will become one party. Its government, in name, will be a national government. In fact, it will be a fascist government.

Those are ugly words in Canada to-day. Lest there should be any doubt as to his charge of conspiracy—

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. LANDERYOU: How about McCullagh?

Mr. SLAGHT: If my hon. friend will bear me out in this matter of grave importance, I believe he will agree with me in what I propose.

So that he might leave no doubt in the minds of the people of Canada that he was charging conspiracy of a criminal type and character, he used this further language:

> When this conspiracy for national government is a little more advanced, the element of crisis will be introduced. There will be a good deal of imperial flag waving. Elder statesmen will be uncorked to take their part in it, little understanding that their venerable voices will be urging empire destroying practices.

That indicates to me, Mr. Speaker, that this gentleman, a new found Moses in his own eyes, a gentleman who is in my view a political mountebank, has charged every member of the House of Commons with being ready to conspire to form a fascist government. He has said that every member of the House of Commons is serving here not in a free parliament, and he abuses all parties and groups alike.

My friend who interrupted will find that he is taken care of in the course of the address. I quote further:

> This is not the proper time to deal with that or refer to it.

This gentleman who joined the Conservative party in the year 1930 goes on to say that when he joined it he was sentimental about it, and then he rails at contributions for political purposes, and he rails at the evil of patronage. Let me ask this house whether there is a greater patronage monger in the Dominion of Canada than W. D. Herridge. He joined the Conservative party in 1930 for the first time, and he was a fast worker. He had been there but a few months when he received what is perhaps the greatest plum in the gift of Canada. I have taken the trouble to see what amount of patronage and public money he drew from our treasury. I find that from June 1, 1931, when he was appointed until October 23, 1935, when he resigned—

Mr. LANDERYOU: What about Colonel Ralston, who received $200 a day and expenses?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): You do not like your fascist friends being exposed do you?

Mr. SLAGHT: I wonder if I had better suspect the hon. gentleman and say that there are 244. This gentleman who decries patronage in this country was appointed on June 1, 1931, and resigned on October 23,

1935, and if my arithmetic is correct—I have gone to the auditor general's report, which I have here for verification—he was in office in that important position, described in the Parliamentary Guide as His Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at Washington—

Mr. McINTOSH: Extraordinary, all right.

Mr. SLAGHT: And his views are extraordinary, if I may be permitted to say so. This gentleman, in the first ten months of his office, to March 31, drew salary amounting to $10,000.

Mr. MacINNIS: On a point of order Mr. Speaker, I should like to know where is the question of privilege that the hon. gentleman is raising. There may have been a question of privilege at the beginning, but there is none now. I would ask, sir, for your ruling.

Mr. SLAGHT: Altogether he drew over $100,000 from the public treasury.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Do any other hon. members wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. LANDERYOU: Yes, Mr. Speaker. If it is right for a member to make reference to the salary that may have been paid to an individual, and if we are going to discuss these matters, we might as well give the salaries paid to all officials of the government and show the patronage given under the Liberal party.

Mr. SPEAKER: I consider that there is no point of order.

Mr. SLAGHT: I shall take only two or three minutes more.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my hon. friends did not hear the Speaker say that he does not consider there was any point of order.

Mr. SLAGHT: Let me conclude by saying that this fastidious gentleman, who criticized the representatives of Canada as a whole in this house, the members whom the people from every riding sent here to represent their views, drew down from the public trough—ate the bread paid for by the taxpayers, drank the wine paid for by the taxpayers in his house in Washington for four and a quarter years at the expense of this country—in excess of $125,000.

Mr. LANDERYOU: So has the Liberal party.

Mr. SLAGHT: Let me suggest that if there is a gentleman in this house who approves of his subversive, vile, slanderous imputations on Canada and our parliament, let him rise in his seat and support it.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Right here—I do.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I did not want to raise a question of privilege, but since the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) has done so, may I say this. There was a sentence in the speech as it came over the radio last night—I had the misfortune to be indisposed and I heard the speech—which struck me at the time, and which I read now in the Citizen:

> You will never get prosperity until you get into parliament men who love this country better than themselves.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a mean, slanderous statement, and I repudiate it for all my colleagues in this parliament.

Mr. DUPUIS: Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my word of protest against the address of last night. Allow me to say to that new Moses that he will not be able to cross the Red sea without drowning himself.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, rising to a question of privilege about this unfortunate incident, may I remind you of what happened one day in connection with a former postmaster-general who was supposed to be very mean. He went to a tailor to have his coat turned, and the tailor said, "It is most unfortunate, sir, but I cannot turn it because it has already been turned." That is what happened to Mr. Herridge, who is a false prophet.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. PELLETIER: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The incident is closed. The house will proceed with questions.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

LINDSAY ARSENAL

Mr. MARSH:

How many people were employed at the arsenal at Lindsay, and what was the amount of the yearly payroll for 1938?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The answer is: (a) Twenty-five in 1938; (b) $5,934.70.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. NEILL:

How many people in Canada are presently receiving the old age pension and who are: (a) over the age of 90 years, male and female; (b) over the age of 80 years, male and female?

Mr. DUNNING: This information is not available. The administration and granting of old age pensions is under the jurisdiction of provincial authorities and the lists submitted by the provincial authorities are pay lists only for audit purposes. Detailed information regarding age and sex of pensioners is on file only in the offices of the provincial authorities.

FISHERIES VESSEL "MARMAT"

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Is there a boat in the service of the Fisheries department called the Marmat?
2. If so, is she owned or leased by the government?
3. If leased, from whom, and what are the terms of the lease?
4. Has there been any increase in the amount paid under the lease since December 1, 1935?
5. If so, how much?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Yes.
2. Chartered.
3. Chartered from McKenzie, Irish and MacDonald of Pictou for approximate season May first to October twentieth at charter rate of $300 per month, department supplying men, gasoline, oil and fuel.
4. No.
5. Answered by no. 4.

WHEAT IMPORTS AND EXPORTS

Mr. THOMPSON:

1. How many bushels of wheat did Canada import from the United States during each of the years 1936, 1937 and 1938?
2. How many bushels of wheat did Canada export to the United States during each of the said years?

Mr. EULER:

1.

Calendar years	Bushels
1936	98,053
1937	1,077,071
1938	5,637,644

2.

Calendar years	Bushels
1936	23,952,478
1937	1,160,408
1938	20,144,466

DISTRIBUTORS' DISCOUNTS

Mr. LAWSON:

Have any general distributors' discounts, cancelled since January 1, 1939, detailed list of which is set out on page 2 of sessional paper No. 166, tabled in the House of Commons, on February 22, 1939, been reinstated or temporarily reinstated after cancellation?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

[Mr. Neill.]

TORONTO PARCEL POST SERVICE

Mr. LAWSON:

1. Has the contract for carrying parcel post in the postal district of Toronto expired? If so, when?
2. Was such contract extended at the date of expiration?
3. Were any tenders called before such extension, if any, was granted?
4. If such contract is to expire at an early date, will tenders be called before a new contract is awarded?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. Yes—14th January, 1939.

2 and 3. It is being carried on temporarily, pending the drawing up and printing of specifications preparatory to the invitation of public tenders.

4. Yes.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

OKA SAND AND GRAVEL COMPANY

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Did the dominion government grant to the Oka Sand and Gravel Company the right to dig sand from the shores of Lake of Two Mountains, near the property of Reverend Trappist Fathers, Mr. Laurent Desjardins and others?
2. If so, on what date and in what year was such right granted, and for how long?
3. If not, will the government protect the shores of riverside owners against damages or possible damages from the digging of sand from such shores?

JAPANESE INTERESTS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. MacNEIL:

1. Have interests in Japan acquired control of extensive timber limits on Malcolm island, on the Queen Charlotte islands and on Vancouver island, south of Cowichan lake?
2. Have interests in Japan acquired control of mines at Sidney inlet, Louise island, and at Ikeda bay?
3. Have dredging operations with construction of tunnels suitable for oil storage been undertaken at the Surf inlet mining camp, Vancouver island, under the supervision of a former officer of the Japanese navy?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As it will take some time to procure the information necessary to answer this question, I suggest that it be made an order for return.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—PHOTOGRAPHIC EQUIPMENT

Mr. PERLEY:

1. Did the Justice department or any other branch or department of the government during the years of 1935 to 1938, purchase photographic equipment for the Royal Mounted Police in Regina, or for any part of Saskatchewan?
2. If so: (a) from whom was the equipment purchased; (b) what was the nature of the equipment; (c) through what dealer was it purchased, and (d) what was the price paid?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, as this is a very long answer I desire that it be made an order for return, now tabled.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REDIVISION OF WORK OF COMMONS AND SENATE TO MEET MODERN CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the government a question, and this is the only way I can bring it up excepting upon a motion to go into supply. In view of what has been said in and outside this house and in the other house, will the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the government and the house give consideration to a redivision of the work of the two houses so as to increase the efficiency of parliament to meet modern conditions? I do not like to bring this question to the attention of the hard working Prime Minister in this way, but it is the only opportunity I have to do so.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think the best way for me to answer is to say, yes.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. PELLETIER

QUESTION RESPECTING RULE AS TO QUOTATIONS FROM NEWSPAPERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I have no desire to revert to what the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) was discussing, but I should like to point out to your honour that some time ago one of our members spoke on a point of privilege concerning a newspaper, and I simply desire to say this: I hope that what has been done to-day will be taken as a precedent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CARRIAGE OF TEXAS VEGETABLES FROM CHICAGO TO MONTREAL AT UNITED STATES RATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, it has been brought to my attention that Texas beets, cabbage and carrots are being carried by the Canadian National railway from Chicago to Toronto and Montreal at a cheaper rate of freight than from Windsor, Ontario, to these points. The railway rate on Texas beets, cabbage and carrots has been established by the United States railways on a package weight of 34 pounds, although the actual weight is around 60 pounds, without ice. This means that the Canadian National railway is carrying these products from Chicago to Montreal on the United States rate. If this is correct, will the government take immediate steps to eliminate this unfair competition?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): We are getting from the sublime to the ridiculous when it comes to asking a question of this kind on the orders of the day. I suggest that it be ruled out.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

WAR MUNITIONS AND MATERIALS

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CONTRACTS AMOUNTING TO $5,000 OR MORE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) if he will shortly table any other contracts which may have been made with contractors by the department for the production of munitions or armaments within Canada.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): Yes, I shall be glad to do that. Last year the leader of the opposition confined his question to contracts over $5,000. Do I understand—

Mr. MANION: That will be quite satisfactory.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Up to the 13th of January I have tabled 283 contracts, and I shall be glad, as soon as the copies can be prepared, to table the rest of them. I want every one of them to be referred to the committee on public accounts.

Mr. LAWSON: Lest there be any misunderstanding of the definition of the word "armaments," may I ask whether contracts for gas masks and other materials of the kind will be included among those tabled?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Certainly —any equipment of any kind of a value of over $5,000.

Mr. POULIOT: And life savers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I inform my hon. friend that all departmental contracts of over $5,000 up to a certain date have already been tabled.

PENITENTIARIES

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION WITH POWERS OF ADMINISTRATION AND CONTROL

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish a commission with power under the Minister of Justice to administer, control and manage the penitentiaries; to provide for salaries of the commissioners and assistant commissioners; and, generally, to repeal and reenact with consequential amendments the Penitentiary Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Chairman, this resolution is to precede the introduction of a bill which will be similar to the one which went through this house last session, and which could not be adopted in the other place because of alleged lack of time. The legislation had been introduced only at the end of the session because the report of the commission did not come in until after the Easter recess. I suggest that I should be allowed to introduce the bill, and if any hon. member wants details, they can be discussed when the bill is before the house. It will be the Penitentiary Act substantially as it is today in the statute, except that it provides for the establishment of a commission of three to replace the superintendent of penitentiaries; the inspectors become assistant commissioners; and in the various sections of the act where the word "superintendent" has to be replaced by "commission" the necessary amendments are provided for.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are any outstanding amendments of the Penitentiary Act to be provided for by this measure?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No—just for the establishment of the commission.

As I stated last year, amongst the recommendations of the commission there are some which may be carried out by way of regulations, and no legislation will be necessary. There are others where legislation will be necessary. But my purpose is that the commission which will be appointed under this law should get acquainted with the conditions, and that any necessary legislation be approved by them.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, under this resolution the responsibility for the solving of this problem is on the government of the day, and not on the opposition. Four years ago this matter came up in the elections and in this house. When the present government was returned four years ago it appointed a royal commission, which toured the world and made its report late last session. The matter went to the senate, and the bill was laid over because, they said, they had not sufficient time to deal with it.

This social and domestic problem is probably one of the most important of our national problems. Just recently the minister's department issued a blue-book containing prison statistics and showing how large is the number of young people who are in these institutions owing to the failure of parliament to help solve the economic problems of unemployment and many other domestic problems. These young people are roaming the country; many of them are high school students who have never before been in such institutions. Some are sent to the county gaols for vagrancy, and then escape, and finally they land up in the federal institutions. I invite attention to the figures concerning these young people to be found in part II of the departmental statistics recently issued in blue-book form by the bureau of statistics. The number of young people in these institutions, many of them through no fault of their own, is surprising. Here one sees the cause and effect of unemployment in this country.

In England about half of these institutions have been closed. They have learned modern ways of prison reform. I have here reports which were made by the secretary of state for the home department in Great Britain, where they have been investigating this problem for the last four years in numerous ways. Here are four government books dealing with this matter. One has to do with the problem of youth and unemployment. Another relates to summary jurisdiction reform concerning the non-payment of fines and other sums of money, because in Canada there is still imprisonment for debt. The report shows that a large number of people were sent to these institutions because of non-payment of debt, and that some of them were put there without bail—an evil which was supposed to have been abolished years ago. Here is another report of an interdepartmental committee in Great Britain on the employment of prisoners inside and outside the institution, the care of their families, prison reform on a large scale, and the Borstal system. Why do we not do something? There is a national service program for youth in England; why not here?

As regards those who suffer through the delinquencies of persistent offenders, the wives and children at home, what have we done to meet the problem of taking care of these unfortunate people? Absolutely nothing. I pass one of these institutions in the train every week—I refer to the one at Collin's Bay—and I have been wondering what steps have been taken to improve conditions there. I do not blame the present minister at all. He is a humane man and like his predecessors, has done the best he can to better the conditions that exist in our federal penal institutions. The responsibility is not altogether on the minister; it is very largely on this parliament. This is a problem that must be dealt with.

I suggest that those who sit in the chamber at the other end of this building should have some work to do. If they followed the practice in the senate at Washington they would be up and doing and not on holidays all the time. They are the body that threw out the bill last year and they should be here now to deal with this matter. Why are they on holiday? They can find lots of work here. It seems to me they should be studying this problem. I should like to see the bill introduced over there first.

We find in the provincial institutions the same state of affairs that exists under the federal department. There is also there an enormous increase among those who are classed as youths. We have had no results from the $4,000,000 spent since 1900 on commissions appointed to deal with various national problems. I am opposed to the appointing of any more such commissions. As I say, the responsibility is on the minister and on parliament. I have faith in the minister and I believe that he would administer the affairs of his department in a very satisfactory manner if he were given a free hand. I have no doubt that he could get along very well without commissions. It is a social, not a political question, of real importance.

Owing to the increase in the number of inmates some of the institutions in the province are overcrowded, with the result that last month, in the depth of winter, 131 men had to be taken by train from Portsmouth to the west, under conditions which should never have been allowed to exist. This is no time for any such policy as that. If the department has not the necessary buildings in the province, then those buildings should be immediately erected. The conditions that are reported in the newspapers—helpless men being shackled and tied to railway seats—are not conducive to law and order. These conditions are subversive of good government; they cause criticism and resentment. It is not fair to the wives and children of these men. If the country can spend $3,500,000 on a federal supreme court building in Ottawa—so far we have spent some $8,000,000 here on new buildings—surely some money can be found to carry out the recommendations contained in the report of a commission that has cost so much.

I believe that the minister himself would have carried out some of the suggested reforms had be been given a free hand, because I have every confidence in him. Most of the reforms could be effected without delay. The minister is the dean of the House of Commons and has taken a great interest in this problem. May I offer him another constructive suggestion. Why is not something done in regard to first offenders who are sent to these institutions? A great many of them are sent there for insufficient cause. For instance, a man was found selling magazines on King street, Toronto, and was picked up and charged with vagrancy. He said to the magistrate, "Do I look like a vagrant?" The magistrate replied brusquely, "Yes, $30." One wonders whether there is any Magna Charta left. No wonder there are so many such trials in our courts. More care should be taken in appointing magistrates.

It seems to me that there would be fewer men in these institutions if the government took steps to reduce unemployment. The time has come when men should no longer be herded into gaols in Canada as they are to-day. I am surprised that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) is not here, because the problem we are discussing at this moment is largely wrapped up in unemployment. It is simply a matter of cause and effect. As to turning it over to a commission, I suggest that we have had enough of commissions in Canada. We have had a radio commission, a railway commission, a coal commission, and others, and I fail to see how this problem can be solved by passing the buck to a commission, because that body would be largely political. The commissions that have been appointed since confederation have merely prevented the House of Commons from dealing with problems that are thus sidetracked. We have almost entirely divested ourselves of responsibility in this house in respect of many national problems, yet when the reports of these various commissions are submitted they are pigeon-holed.

Is it any wonder that there is a decay of parliament and a decline of the House of Commons? The only branch of government that has increased in popularity in the past thirty years is the crown, as unquestionably it has in the dominions and in the old country; but the decay of the House of Commons is evident all along the line, simply because we have divested ourselves of authority. High school teachers, clergymen and others have been asking for reforms in our penal institutions; they have urged that the problem be dealt with in a comprehensive national way. I do not subscribe to any of the "sob stuff" that we read in some newspapers on certain aspects of this problem. I believe that the minister wishes to have these institutions conducted in an efficient humane manner for the benefit of the community as a whole and I hope that he will be given a free hand. Men should be trained and equipped for this work. I am sure that some really practicable solution would be found if the minister took the matter into his own hands and had power to act at once. Value would be given us for the money expended. I venture to say that if the minister looked carefully into the records of the first offenders in provincial, municipal and federal institutions, at least one-third of the first offenders would be let out on parole and sent home. I hope this will be done during the royal visit, as has been done in England on different occasions. Certainly some steps should be taken to relieve the congestion by restoring to their families those first offenders who have got into trouble largely through riding the rods, and for less serious infractions of the laws respecting motor cars, petty thefts, escapes, and so on; and this should apply also to minor offenders who reform.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I regret very much that the resolution is so restricted in scope. It is a very good thing to appoint a commission, but the royal commission which reported made a study of a great many reforms and brought in a large number of recommendations, and it seems to me that this would naturally be the time to give effect to a good many of those recommendations. I regret that apparently the Minister of Justice does not propose to bring about any very radical changes in the legislation. I do not think anything useful could be accomplished by my spending half an hour covering the ground already covered by the royal commission or directing attention to some things to which they directed attention; but I should think that this commission, however able the personnel, will not be able to do all that should be done under the existing statutory arrangements. For example, I think of just one matter which I might mention now. Representations have been made to me recently with regard to the adoption of something in the form of the indeterminate sentence. I am not sure—perhaps the minister could enlighten us—that this commission once it is appointed would have discretionary power to decide on questions of indeterminate sentence, something which I think a great many social workers have now come to regard as very desirable, especially as applying to younger boys and girls and those who cannot be regarded in any sense as hardened criminals.

I wonder whether there will be opportunity, when the act is open, for the introduction of other changes that the house may consider to be desirable.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am following the course which has been recommended by the commission itself. With regard to any changes which might involve new legislation, they recommended that such legislation should first be carefully considered by the penitentiaries commission, and further that the progress of reorganization should proceed gradually and in accordance with a well planned program. I really believe that what my hon. friend has at heart, and what I also have at heart, will be better served by taking the first step, which is the appointment of the commission, a step which the investigating board not only recommended but insisted upon. Of course some of the recommendations have already been put into force. I shall be pleased to give details when the bill is before the committee or the house.

The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) complained that this bill had not been introduced in the senate. I am sure he will admit that it was at least safer to introduce it first in this house; or I may be excused for having thought that the bill would have a better passage in this chamber, having regard to the fact that it was refused there last year, although I admit that there was reason for the complaint that they had no time to consider all its provisions and the changes that were made. But speaking generally as to the complaint which has been made not only in this house but in another place with regard to government measures not being introduced in the senate, I believe every hon. member will agree that it is only human nature that a government which has measures to introduce which it considers important should prefer to introduce them in a house where there is a sympathetic majority rather than in a house where the majority is on the other side.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister is pretty nearly out of order. He is skating close to the edge.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am only on the fringe of being out of order. Perhaps there are some measures which could be introduced there, but generally speaking government measures ought to be introduced in the House of Commons where the representatives of the people are.

My hon. friend referred to the fact that 130 convicts were transferred from eastern to western penitentiaries a few weeks ago because of overcrowding. This happens occasionally. I suppose there may be strength in the argument of my hon. friend that we should have a larger penitentiary in Kingston to receive all those from Ontario who are convicted. On the other hand when there is space in other penitentiaries, where we have an efficient personnel, I suppose it is more economical to use it. Under the conditions as they are, at any rate, it is the best way for the administration to solve the problem.

I was not surprised but rather pleased to hear the hon. member for Broadview suggest that we should release on parole at least one-third of the present penitentiary population. It so happens that in the legislature of Quebec yesterday we were accused of having released too many persons on parole. The two statements cannot be reconciled. We are doing our best to serve the needs of society, having regard to the possibility of rehabilitating young offenders who are not in the class of hardened criminals. When this can be done my hon. friend may be sure that I and my officers would rather err, if at all, on the side of humanity.

As I said at the outset, I shall be pleased to give any details which hon. members desire when the measure comes before us in the form of a bill.

Mr. NEILL: How many penitentiaries are there in Canada, and what is the approximate number of employees in them?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If my hon. friend does not object I will take note of all these questions so that I may give an accurate answer when the bill comes in. As far as penitentiaries are concerned, there is one in Dorchester for the maritime provinces; St. Vincent de Paul for Quebec; Kingston for Ontario; Stoney Mountain for Manitoba; Prince Albert for Saskatchewan and Alberta; and New Westminster for British Columbia. As to the number of employees, I should prefer to give the details later and be accurate.

Mr. NEILL: The answer the minister has given is sufficient for the moment. There are six penitentiaries. I suppose the number of employees at each would not exceed thirty or forty?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): More than that, particularly at Kingston and St. Vincent de Paul.

Mr. NEILL: At any rate they would not come to a very large number. In that regard, or partly because of that, I agree with the views expressed by the hon. member for Broadway—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Broadview.

Mr. NEILL: That is more characteristic of him. He says he does not want any more commissions, and I am heartily in accord with that. We have too many commissions in Canada to-day; there is an ever-rising tendency to adopt that form of government. They are expensive; they immediately start to build up a large body of officials under them. These positions are not filled by the civil service commission; they are to all intents and purposes political appointments. That is not so important. What I do say is that this is a ready means of avoiding responsibility. How often have we seen this happen here: we have a grievance concerning some department and the minister in charge, apparently with the best intentions in the world, says, "I am sorry, but that is run by a commission and I am not responsible. I am only the mouthpiece of the commission. I will tell the commission what you say, and if they care to pay attention to it they will do so; if not they will not."

I do not want to see the government lose its responsibility. Why do we not have a commission for each of the fifteen or seventeen portfolios, if we are going to develop along these lines? As the hon. member behind me said, the present Minister of Justice has conducted his department for many years with credit and distinction to himself; his administration of the penitentiaries, the parole board and so on, which I have had some occasion to look into, has been excellent, and the same could be said with regard to the previous minister, Hon. Mr. Guthrie. Then why do we want to get away from that system and put in a commission, certainly not as able as the present minister and more or less political in character? Above all, why should the government evade the responsibility of dealing with the matter? The minister is perfectly capable of handling this branch of his department; why not let him do it? Why not a commission to administer the Post Office Department, which, instead of having only six offices, has hundreds and thousands of post offices to deal with? The Department of Public Works employs far more people and expends a great deal more money than the Department of Justice. Why not put a commission in there?

Since I have been in this house I have noted a growing tendency to appoint commissions of this kind, and with one or two exceptions they have all resulted in lessening the authority and freedom of parliament, about which we heard just a few moments ago from an hon. member on the opposite side. If we continue to hand over our duties and responsibilities to a commission here and a commission there, soon we will not be a free parliament; we will be a parliament run by political boards calling themselves commissions. Even if I am the only one to vote against the bill I will oppose it for that reason.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not rising to offer any objection to this measure or to criticize the minister particularly, but I do think there are a few things that should be said. Some of them have been said already, but I should like to add one or two observations.

The resolution before us provides for the establishment of a commission. While we have not the details of the bill before us, from the observations of the minister I gathered that he contemplates only such amendments to the act as will erect a commission which will in turn work out a policy for the improvement of general penitentiary conditions. If I am too restrictive in my definition I wish to be corrected at this stage. If that is the case I think parliament would be evading its responsibility at this time if it did not take cognizance of present day conditions, which are undoubtedly aggravated conditions having in mind misdemeanours by the youth of the country, and lay down at least in theory some principles which would guide this commission in the discharge of its duties. I say that, Mr. Chairman, because if the commission is only to manage the penitentiaries I think we are wasting our time here and, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has said, I would far rather see the penitentiaries remain under the Department of Justice. On the other hand, however, if the duties of the commission include studying the causes of crime and the alarming increase in crime, there may be some justification for its establishment, although I am not too enthusiastic about it even under those conditions.

It appears to me that parliament is taking notice of the congested condition of our penitentiaries and of the much advertised need of some reform in the method of dealing with criminals after they are convicted and incarcerated. That, it seems to me, is what parliament has focused its attention upon to the almost entire exclusion of any consideration of the causes of crime. I have before me a statement by Hon. Leslie Miller, governor of Wyoming, in which there are one or two things to which I think it would be profitable for me to refer and for the committee to hear. This gentleman, obviously recognizing his responsibility, made a careful study of crime in his locality, and he makes this observation:

> The essence of criminality is an anti-social attitude on the part of the criminal. This is something that is acquired slowly, over a period of years. Case histories of thousands of prisoners reveal that invariably the criminal, not counting those imprisoned for crimes of passion, slipped into their criminal habits by degrees, with a long procession of crimes, each progressively worse.

This observation is not new but it is pertinent to the present situation. Criminals do not become such in an outburst of passion, except in a minority of cases. They grow out of a procession of habits or practices due largely to condition or environment. If that is true, my point is that parliament will not be properly discharging its duty unless it takes cognizance of that fact and of present day conditions, and at least attempts to make some provision for the correction or prevention of crime rather than merely an improved method of dealing with the criminal after he is created. There is an old adage which says, "Satan finds mischief for idle hands to do." I can remember that from my earliest childhood. The point, of course, is that idleness breeds crime. Of that there can be no doubt.

In the same article there is quoted an eminent French authority on criminology, Henry T. F. Rhodes, professor in the institute of criminology at the university of Lyons, France. He makes this pertinent observation:

> It is modern industrial society which produced the modern slum, that worst of all mass-produced articles. We have mass-produced slums and education at the same time.

Then he goes on to point out this fact, which I think also is pertinent, that millions of dollars are spent on improving educational facilities for youth; children are given airy, healthful schoolday surroundings, but they go back from those surroundings to live in the slums. Then he continues with this observation:

> They sleep night by night with three or four others in a stifling room. Often the living room is used for sleeping also. But overcrowding does not breed only the stunted and the anaemic. It breeds murder, sexual crimes and other abominations, things which are not mentioned at the public schools or in the homes of the subscribers to charity. The slums, plus an education fitting slum-dwellers for something better in a world which cannot afterwards give it, are the root of this dark problem.

What I want to emphasize is that parliament ought to recognize that the increase in crime in Canada, as in other countries like the United States, France and Great Britain, is largely due to the economic conditions which have prevailed during the last ten or fifteen years. I should like the minister to give heed to what I am saying.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not want to delay the committee, but it does seem to me that this is an important phase of the matter.

Mr. REID: Has the hon. member any figures to show that our penitentiary population increased during the years of economic distress as compared with when times were good?

Mr. STEVENS: If the hon. member will direct his question to the minister, he will get accurate information. However, I will hazard the opinion, without having the figures before me, that our penitentiary population has increased during the period of depression. As a matter of fact, during the last ten years crime has become a racket. While this has not been caused solely by the depression, it has been aggravated by it. Crime has become organized in our great cities, as was evidenced by the recent murder in Toronto of a man named Windsor. Crime is an organized racket, but I would go even further and say that it is an organized business. Those at the head of these rackets practise skilful business principles in their administration, and of course use criminal methods to enforce their will. This condition has been aggravated by the unemployment and idleness of so many young people, and it causes me a good deal of alarm. Perhaps later on when the bill has been brought down the minister will give us accurate figures for Canada, but the figures for the United States—I am not holding up that country as a horrible example by any means—show that one out of thirty-seven of the population is in the criminal class. I think the percentage is much less in Canada, because we have not the congested areas they have in the United States, but the incident in Toronto, to which I referred, and the other incident in Windsor about six or eight months ago, indicate that this condition has spread into Canada in the same organized form as it has in the United States.

Perhaps the minister will favour the committee with particulars of the ages of our criminals. I again speak from more or less superficial knowledge when I say that the youthfulness of our criminal class is something appalling. I know from observation that there are many very young men in our penitentiaries to-day. It is a startling, an appalling situation, arising largely, although not wholly, out of idleness, out of lack of opportunity to work. Parliament must take cognizance of this phase of the situation. As the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) said a moment ago, the Department of Labour might very well be cooperating with the Department of Justice in an effort to eliminate the economic causes which lead to crime. These departments should try to present to parliament measures which would serve not only to improve the condition of the criminal after he is convicted but also to prevent the making of criminals through lack of employment and other causes.

It is not my intention to speak in a critical sense. Along with other hon. members I have a good deal of satisfaction in saying that my long acquaintance with the minister has demonstrated to me that he has desired to administer this very difficult matter in a fair, just and I think humane manner. But we dare not disregard the preventive as well as the corrective side of the question.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has objected rather strongly to the appointment of a commission to replace the superintendent of penitentiaries. He says that we have too many commissions and too many officials. But may I say to him—probably he knows this already—that if there is a grievance in that regard, it certainly cannot be directed to the Department of Justice, which is undermanned in every branch. There have been no additions to the staff of the department, although the business has increased tremendously. Whether we call them commissioners or otherwise, these men are certainly needed to do the business which has to be done. This is a very important branch of the administration. I have the following on the authority of the commission which, as the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) has said, made an investigation throughout the world:

> In our present system the problem of penal administration is too large in scope and too serious in results to be left in the hands of one man. It is noteworthy, as a matter of record, that Canada is practically the only country where the penal system is not administered by some kind of commission or board.

Then at page 362 of its report, the commission states:

> It is of first and immediate importance that legislation should be enacted to make provision for a prison commission.

They have had a prison commission in England since 1877, and they have had a federal prison board in the United States since 1930. As I have stated, the only difference will be that instead of one man there will be three. I can assure my hon. friend that these men will not be selected because of political affiliations. We will try to have men who are expert in this work. It has been urged for some time that there should be a medical man on the staff of the penitentiaries, an expert in mental diseases and that sort of thing. The idea is to have three men at the head of our penal system whose names and abilities will be a guarantee to the people of Canada that this very important branch of the administration is being looked after properly.

The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) has taken the broader view of the matter. He has said that we should look into the causes of crime and methods of preventing crime and improving social conditions. Of course, penology, which is the subject matter of this bill, is only one branch of criminology, which itself is a branch of sociology, all having to do with human nature. Penology has to do with prison management. I am not sure that my hon. friend's remarks having to do with unemployment and the various temptations that come to young men who are idle, while most appropriate, should not be made part of a different study from that which should be conducted by the heads of penitentiaries. This legislation is to take care of prisoners. Of course the heads of penitentiaries are vitally interested in anything that would tend to cure existing evils and help reform the men committed to their charge, as well as to protect society against them. I assure my hon. friend that I am noting every one of his remarks, and he may be sure that anything that can be considered by the penitentiary commission or the officers of the penitentiary branch in connection with the points he has raised will be most carefully considered. The statistics he has asked for with regard to the age of criminals in Canada and the number of prison inmates in various periods of prosperity and depression I shall be pleased to have prepared and give them to the committee when the subject is up again.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, the members of the committee will probably agree with me that the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is one of the best and most conscientious ministers of justice we have had since confederation, and it is because I am firmly of that opinion, which is generally accepted by the committee, as we have just noticed, that I ask the minister not to insist now upon presenting a bill based upon this resolution.

Everyone knows that the Archambault commission was appointed mostly for sentimental reasons. One of those who advocated its appointment was a very dear friend of mine, a good Canadian and a prominent journalist, the late Harry Anderson, formerly of the Globe of Toronto. It is wrong I believe, to consider penal matters from the point of view of sentiment. Gaol should not be made too attractive, although undoubtedly prisoners should be treated not only with justice but with humanity.

The Archambault commission, as the minister said, travelled throughout the world, mostly like Isaac Laquedem, the wandering Jew. They visited several countries and inspected several penitentiaries in the United States, when they could have got the same information by reading books published by the warden of Sing Sing and by other people.

In the last portion of the report we have twenty pages of bibliography, which means that the members of the commission must have read at least four hundred publications before they produced one. A well known book, My Prison, by Sylvio Pellico, published in Italy at the end of the eighteenth century, before Italy was a fascist country, unfortunately is not included in that list.

There is a reference note at the bottom of page 389 of the royal commission's report which takes away a lot of the credit from the report itself. At the foot of the first page of bibliography appears a reference note and I want the members, if the minister decides to go further with this legislation, to read these twenty pages of bibliography; then I am sure they will wonder whether any member of the commission read all these books. The reference note says:

> This material is, by no means, a bibliography of penology, nor does it include all the printed material studied by the commission. Much of the reference material studied by the commission has come from private sources and public libraries and is not included here.
> This bibliography lists only such books, pamphlets, and other material as is at present in the offices of the commission and which will be available for the use of those who are to be entrusted with the administration of Canadian penal institutions. It is hoped that this collection will form the basis of a reference library on penology and criminology in the offices of the prison commission.

Well, I do not believe any more in penology as understood by these gentlemen than I believe in phrenology and technology. It is a splitting of hairs. Of course phrenology is an interesting science. It is based on the lumps a man has on his head. But penology is a different matter. It is the study of crime. There are detective stories that are very interesting—Sherlock Holmes, for instance. I wonder if the adventures of Sherlock Holmes could worthily be included in the alphabetical list of publications appearing at the end of the commission's report. It is surely more interesting than all the books mentioned there.

Another interesting book which does not appear in the bibliography is one which was written by a man who has given his life to improving the character of youth. I refer to Magistrate McKinley, who lives here in Ottawa. He is a very capable man, and I am surprised that his book, which is a small one, does not appear in this list.

I agree fully with the minister that the penitentiaries branch is one of the most important branches of his department. He said that Canada was one of the few countries in which there is no penology board to look after penitentiaries, and he suggests experts. It has been the practice of the dominion government since I have been a member of parliament that when a commission is created the men who are appointed to it are considered experts, whether they are or not. Judge Archambault was the chairman of the commission. He was a good lawyer. He is an ordinary judge, neither very good nor very bad, just the average, and a jolly good fellow. I suggest to the minister that if it is decided to appoint any other commission he select judges who are superannuated, because they are gentlemen of leisure; so long as they have their wits they can do that work very easily, and without delaying the hearing of cases. There are complaints that many lawyers, because of the lack of judges, have not the opportunity to have their cases heard; and when judges—I mean active judges—are on commissions of this kind it creates trouble in the administration of justice. I should like to see passive or superannuated judges selected to act upon commissions of this kind.

The two experts who were joined with Mr. Justice Archambault were distinguished lawyers —Mr. McRuer of Toronto and Mr. Craig of Winnipeg. I have looked in Who's Who to see what was the peculiar experience of those gentlemen in criminal matters. Both have been for short periods of time crown attorneys, one several years ago and the other lately. They may be good lawyers but they cannot be called penologists. Who is the best penologist? He is a man who has started young in an administrative capacity in the management or supervision of penitentiaries, and who has learned that profession little by little until finally he has become acquainted with the whole thing. I must congratulate the minister upon having appointed as acting superintendent of penitentiaries Mr. Sauvant, a very modest gentleman who is no less able than modest, and who is doing exceptionally well. I should like him to be appointed superintendent of penitentiaries under the present able Minister of Jutice and he should be given full authority. That is my first suggestion.

When the commission is appointed, its members are regarded as distributors of words which are to be received on a silver tray. These men have the science of the matter on which they are to make suggestions. Of course the government is no more bound than is parliament by any suggestion or any recommendation made by any commissioner or by the three together. That is my humble view. They are experts. If the bill passes, the minister intends to appoint to the commission men whose names and abilities will be a guarantee to the people of Canada. He has some of them already; he has Mr. Sauvant; he has others.

For one reason or another Colonel Piuze, who was a very good appointee as warden of the penitentiary of St. Vincent de Paul, left that position and now is head of the Quebec provincial police.

Mr. HEAPS: He looks after the enforcement of the padlock law in Quebec.

Mr. POULIOT: He is well known. I see that the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) knows him very well. He did quite well as warden. He left the service, and now he has another position. The title of his position is a matter of indifference to me, provided that he does his work well. On the other hand I wish to point out that the report is unfair to him. He made a personal study of the Borstal system when he was a delegate to a conference in Europe, and his travelling expenses were very small compared with those of Judge Archambault and Mr. McRuer and Mr. Craig. I should not be surprised if Judge Archambault has had to cut down the amount of his bill, because the figures were larger when they were first mentioned by the press than they are as they appear in the last report. I assume therefore that he reduced his charges as the result of some wise and sound recommendation. I do not know why these three gentlemen saw fit to abuse Colonel Piuze as they did. Is it because his report, although very small in size, was better than theirs?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I venture to ask the hon. gentleman if he suggests that these judges cook, or falsify, their accounts?

Mr. POULIOT: I suggest to my hon. friend (Mr. Woodsworth) that he should be just as industrious as I am and put that question to the minister, who will surely be glad to give him the information. There is a French proverb which is kown to all: Dans les petits pots les bons onguents—in small tins, good ointments. I never judge a report by its size. This is a big one, and I wonder if it is better, because it is big, than another smaller one.

Of course it is interesting reading—upon one proviso, that you read it all, to find the oases in the desert. I have found not only oases, but the Dead Sea, a dead sea in which there is not the salt of wisdom. Here it is, at page 323, where it speaks of Lieutenant-Colonel H. W. Cooper, warden of the Saskatchewan penitentiary—not precisely of him, but of the administration there:

> The discipline in this penitentiary is poor. The guards do not appear to respect the senior officers, and the attitude of the senior officers toward the guards does not appear to merit respect. The effect on the prison population is bad. The whole institution seems to be seething with distrust and intrigue. Members of the staff appear to believe that they are constantly being spied upon, both by their associates on the staff and by the prisoners, and that senior officers are willing to accept the stories that are told by prisoners about them. The prisoners are convinced that a system of espionage exists among them, and that certain prisoners are rewarded for bearing tales to the senior officers and that they are punished as a result of such information. The deputy warden admitted that he had received tales from prisoners and had accepted them, but he contended that it was his duty to do so. The warden also admitted that in certain instances he took action against prisoners on the strength of information conveyed to him by other prisoners.

And so on. This is very bad if it is true. I take the word of the commissioner on this point, although I candidly confess that I have not read the evidence. It seems to me that if those grave charges are substantiated, the only thing to do is to fire that warden at once and replace him with a man who has never failed to maintain order within a penitentiary.

I am not opposed to government legislation. I am such a staunch supporter of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that I will not vote against his resolution, or his bill if he presents one. On the other hand, I adjure him in the name of the principles in which we both believe to abandon the idea of submitting a bill based upon the resolution. We have enough commissions. I am against commissions. I am against commissions on principle and I am against this proposal in particular. If you appoint an investigating commission it is all right provided that those who sit on it do not try to make it a permanent institution in order to ensure jobs for themselves for life. Of course, when someone is appointed temporarily in any capacity—I am speaking from my experience as a member of parliament—he is notified that his job will be temporary, that it will last six months or one year or two years as the case may be, that it will cease some time; but he is never convinced that it will. He expects it to be everlasting and he expects a superannuation besides. Every member knows that.

Who, therefore, is the nigger in the woodpile? Who has been so insistent upon the commissioners recommending the appointment of a penal commission composed, not of phrenologists, not of technologists, but of penologists? Is not the nigger in the woodpile one of those who received a fabulous amount of money—relatively of course; it is not a million dollars but quite a substantial sum—when the investigating commission was carrying on its work? And then did not the minister—I assume this; I may be all wrong—receive, from anyone who had served on the previous commission, an application for the position of secretary to the new commission? Was anyone who served on the investigating commission recommended by someone else to any member of the government to serve on the managing commission? Since those who were acting as commissioners on the previous commission have read so many books that none of us can digest, are they not by that very fact penologists and therefore entitled to be called as experts on the new administrative commission? I would not be surprised at all, because probably there is no one in Canada who has read that quantity of literature; and I would not be surprised if many of those who have written these books are, not in prison, but in other asylums of peace.

I therefore reiterate my request to the minister not to insist upon this proposal. I tell him in advance that I will not vote against it, but I warn him that we have enough commissions in Canada as a whole. There are many commissions and they become irresponsible bodies. I believe in responsible government. I believe in the old policies of responsible government, in virtue of which the minister is responsible for the expenditure of money under his authority. If the Department of Justice is under-manned, let the minister choose good men, and if in his department there are incompetent men, whoever they are, let him fire them and replace them with good men.

If the charges made by the commission against the warden or the authorities—not only the warden but the officers—of Saskatchewan penitentiary are substantiated, then the only thing to do is to dismiss those who are unworthy of the confidence of the Minister of Justice and replace them with good men. There are good men in Canada. The Minister of Justice is one of them; the acting superintendent of penitentiaries, Mr. Sauvant, is another. There are many of them. But if there are outbreaks in the penitentiary at Kingston and in other places, they are on account of the fact that those in charge were incompetent.

Now, what am I told? What is the rumour? I want to warn the Minister of Justice about it. I want to tell him what is being said in Kingston, where there is a penitentiary. They say that the commission is only a smoke screen to fire some people and replace them with others. It was said at the time that General Ormond was fired, it was said by no less a man than the leader of the Conservative party in the senate. It is beyond my comprehension, and I do not believe it. But, because the Minister of Justice is thoroughly familiar with his own department, and because he is one of the most brilliant parliamentarians and a good Liberal, he will understand that I do not speak as I do to-day in order to displease him. At times we see that policies are enacted to please someone or to displease someone else. The great mistake is that in pleasing someone, one may do wrong; and one may be right in displeasing somebody else. Therefore in such grave matters as this, the main and, indeed, the only consideration should be not to try to please or to refrain from displeasing, but to do what is right and not to do what is wrong. That is all.

I know the Minister of Justice will not do what is wrong, in order to please anyone or to impart to the commissioners the importance which they believe attaches to them, by agreeing with their report, which only justifies the expenses that were paid to them by the country, but he will do what is right and will proceed without instituting a new penitentiaries commission.

Mr. LACOMBE: (Translation) Mr. Chairman, I avail myself of the opportunity offered by this discussion to make a few suggestions which I believe to be in the interest of the administration of justice.

As St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary is situated in my constituency, I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to the legitimate claims of the officers of that institution.

The time has come, in my opinion, to change the method of paying the salaries and wages of penitentiary staffs. They should be paid twice a month in the same way as other Canadian civil servants. For many years I have been repeatedly urging that this act of justice be done. In addition, our penitentiary staffs should be granted an eight-hour day, and in the interest of good administration their remuneration should be brought up to a reasonable level having regard to the type of service performed. Indeed, a recommendation to that effect appears on page 353 of the Royal Commission's report, in the following words:

> That the pay of officers be brought up to a reasonable level having regard to the type of service performed.

The Royal Commission also recommends that permanent status be granted to officers having one year of service or more. Indeed, why should penitentiary officers not enjoy the same privileges and the same protection as other civil servants?

Another aspect of penitentiary administration which I desire to emphasize is the important problem of the reformation and rehabilitation of the inmates. The staffs should never lose sight of their all-important mission of promoting the moral restoration of their charges. To rehabilitate without breaking should be the watchword of every penitentiary officer worthy of the name. In the performance of his high functions, the warden should never forget that firmness is often disastrous if it excludes charity and kindness. The combination of these virtues can work wonders with the most refractory convicts. Experience, moderation and sound management will enable our penal institutions to rid themselves forever of false conceptions of authority and achieve the fruitful results which the community is entitled to expect from them.

In closing, I desire to urge upon the committee the necessity of improving the training and education of penitentiary inmates, so that when released they may become useful citizens. The teaching of trades in our penitentiaries cannot be too greatly encouraged. Given capable and active instructors, prisoners will be able to learn carpentry, machine work, blacksmithing, shoe-repairing, clothes-making, binding, printing and numerous other trades which will enable them later on to earn their living respectably. However, I cannot over-estimate the importance of the theoretical and practical teaching of agriculture in penitentiaries. Discharged prisoners who go in for farming will be less likely to return to evil ways. The justice department has already achieved commendable results in the matter of education, training and reformation of prisoners. Some of our penitentiary officers have shown considerable ability in that regard; there is still room for improvement, however, as whatever is human is perfectible. In offering these few suggestions in the interest of penitentiary officers and inmates, I believe I am serving the community and the country.

Mr. McIVOR: I should have been well content to have had this resolution pass upon the explanation of the minister, because when the bill comes down there will then be opportunity to consider it, and also because the proposal is very much like the one we had last year.

I have had some experience in connection with criminals and criminology, and I do not think "criminals"—those convicted—are much worse sinners than those who were too smart to get caught. I do not agree with the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) that crime is due to economic conditions.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not say that it was due to economic conditions. I said that present day economic conditions largely contributed to the increase of crime.

Mr. McIVOR: I am sorry; I put down the word "due." But I would even say that present economic conditions are not largely the cause of crime. I would quote Judge Hamilton of the juvenile court of the city of Winnipeg, as well as James Mutchmore and James Shaver, social workers in that city. Judge Hamilton said that in sections of Winnipeg where boys and girls were trained in the four-sided life, by Christian leaders, crime was practically absent. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) will bear me out in that, because he knows something of it. Judge Hamilton has given his time and work to the upbuilding of the youth of the city of Winnipeg, in which work he has been very successful.

To me the cure for crime among our youth is organized Christian leadership among our boys and girls, training them in the four-sided life. There are hon. members who say that it is not the business of this house to deal with questions concerning morality and spiritual life. I say that if the cause of crime can be removed by training and Christian leadership, then we should take a hand in it, as I think every hon. member of this house does in one way or another. Therefore I am for Christian and moral rearmament among our boys and girls. I shall have more to say on this later on. I hope this will be the last speech at the present stage.

Mr. THOMPSON: I rise to protest against any further commissions being appointed by this government. The appointment of commissions has come to be quite a popular mode of evading responsibility that should be taken by members of this house. These commissions have also come to be something of a racket. We find judges coming down from the bench to act as commissioners. I object to that, and I think the people of this country object. We want to keep our judiciary on a very high plane; they should not be constantly leaving the bench and going out on political investigations. I am sure it detracts not only from their dignity but from the high respect in which they should be held. If commissions are necessary someone other than judges should be appointed. The fees that are charged by lawyers, generally friends of the government, are altogether out of keeping with the value of the services rendered. These commissions are expensive luxuries, and they have not been very successful in finding solutions for the problems that they were appointed to investigate. In the last three years the present government has spent almost one and a quarter million dollars on these commissions, largely in order to evade responsibility that should be taken by this government.

I was surprised to hear my good friend the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) state that he was opposed to the appointment of this commission, as well as that of other commissions. With this I heartily agree, but the hon. member went on to say that even though he was opposed to the appointment of this commission he would support it because his good friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) was introducing the requisite resolution in this house. I do not think it is conducive to the enactment of good legislation when hon. members will speak against a bill and then vote for it.

I rose, Mr. Chairman, only to register my protest against the appointment of any further commissions by this government. I agree with the other speakers who have said that the Minister of Justice himself, with his adequate staff, is quite capable of giving good service to this country in regard to any penitentiary reform that may be necessary.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have just a word or two to add, Mr. Chairman. I must say to the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) that in spite of his fervent appeal and request that I withdraw this measure, I cannot do so, because conscientiously and on my responsibility as head of the Department of Justice I think this measure is not only important but essential for the good administration of that department. My hon. friend adjured me not to do anything wrong in order to please anybody, and it is just for that reason that I cannot do wrong even to please my hon. friend from Témiscouata, that I am unable to withdraw this measure. I can only add that he certainly has been misinformed if he believes that any of the members of the royal commission are candidates for appointment to the projected board. None of them is aspiring to that, and I can assure my hon. friend that none of them will be appointed.

With regard to the commission which investigated this matter, and for the appointment of which we were blamed by my hon. friend (Mr. Thompson) who has just resumed his seat, perhaps he will remember that for a number of years the government has been asked by various public bodies, by members of this house and by people interested in this branch of sociology, to investigate conditions in the penitentiaries of Canada. I well remember when my fellow townsman Archdeacon Scott, the good padre, came to see me and besought me to join my efforts with his in order to try to persuade the government of the day to appoint a commission to investigate conditions in our penitentiaries, which I did at that time. Even during the campaign of 1935 the pledge was given that such a commission would be appointed, and that is at least one of the pledges which have been redeemed.

The work of the commission itself of course is open to criticism. It is not perfection; there is nothing perfect in this world. I see my good friend opposite who represents Westmount, the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. White). I once heard it said that perfection was in Westmount, but I do not think that is true. In regard to the work of this commission I may inform the committee that I have been in receipt of resolutions and letters from people and associations interested in criminology, including many who had been constantly in contact with the Department of Justice formerly, approving the work of the commission and endorsing most of their recommendations. I may assure hon. members that I would not feel I was carrying out my duty if I did not try to implement the recommendations of this commission. We shall, however, be able to discuss the matter further when the bill is before the house.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 34, respecting penitentiaries.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

LOAN COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PENSION AND INSURANCE FUNDS FOR EMPLOYEES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 27, to amend the Loan Companies Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the explanatory note contained in this minor bill I think fully deals with the purpose of it. I should say again that this bill has nothing whatever to do with small loan legislation, but deals with the regular Loan Companies Act of the dominion. The purpose is to make it quite clear that such companies have the power to establish pension funds for their employees; and that furthermore, when they work in conjunction with trust companies, they may establish joint pension funds with respect to employees who are jointly employed by the two companies. That is the whole purpose of the measure.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

TRUST COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PENSION AND INSURANCE FUNDS FOR EMPLOYEES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 28, to amend the Trust Companies Act.

He said: The effect of this bill is to convey to trust companies the undoubted right to establish pension funds for their employees and to cooperate with loan companies, when persons are employed jointly, in establishing joint pension funds.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE A. TOUCHE AND COMPANY AS AUDITORS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) (for the Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 22, respecting the appointment of auditors for National Railways.

He said: This is the annual bill necessary to appoint auditors for the Canadian National Railways. The firm of auditors, Messrs. George A. Touche and Company, are the present auditors, and this bill is intended to reappoint them for another year.

Mr. MANION: They were appointed in 1936, were they not?

Mr. DUNNING: At the session of 1935 or 1936.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Before this motion is adopted, I should like to say I regret that hon. members of the House of Commons do not get all the information that is available to the auditors. When the auditors inspect the books of the Canadian National Railways they see everything, but hon. members who are asking for information do not have the same advantage. I lodge my protest with the house now, but there will be other opportunities for me to say more when the minister in charge of this department is present. I hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) will not insist upon advancing this bill another stage until his colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) is in the house.

Motion agreed to, on division, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Appointment of auditors.

Mr. DUNNING: May I say to the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) that ample opportunity will be afforded on the estimates of the Canadian National Railways and on other occasions for him to raise the question to which he referred a moment ago. In the meantime, I submit that the appointment of auditors should not be held up by an hon. member requesting information.

Mr. POULIOT: Have the auditors already started their work, or will they start only after this bill is passed?

Mr. DUNNING: The audit is continuous. They were appointed a year ago, and this bill is for their reappointment. I cannot state offhand the precise date at which their year of appointment terminates, but in any event they continue their work until parliament appoints their successors.

Mr. POULIOT: I comply with pleasure to the request of the Minister of Finance.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CITY OF OTTAWA AGREEMENT

AUTHORIZATION OF PAYMENT OF $100,000 FOR THE YEAR ENDING JULY 1, 1939

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works) moved the second reading of Bill No. 25, to authorize an agreement between His Majesty the King and the corporation of the city of Ottawa.

Mr. J. A. PINARD (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, may I inform the house about certain questions in connection with this agreement. Certain criticisms have been made, both inside and outside the house, as to this $100,000 which is to be paid to the city of Ottawa On one occasion an hon. member from one of the Winnipeg seats told the house that we were not good sports in Ottawa. I should like to give some figures to show that this is not true. According to the last available figures for 1937, the value of government tax-exempt property in Ottawa was approximately $44,000,000. I understand that at the present time the value is approximately $53,000,000, but I shall take the previous figures.

Mr. HEAPS: Does that include the parliament buildings?

Mr. PINARD: Yes, and the hon. member should know that. He should have found that out before he spoke. This tax-exempt property is divided as follows:

Land, $8,332,375.
Buildings, $35,609,209.

The average tax rate is 42·5 mills. Public school supporters pay 39 mills, and separate school supporters, with many more children, pay 46 mills. This averages, as I said, 42·5 mills.

If this government were paying taxes like those our ordinary citizens have to pay, we should be receiving from the government $1,320,000 a year, whereas actually we receive only $100,000. Surely every hon. member knows, and, if not, I intend to make them aware of the fact, that every time this government—and the same is true of any other federal government in the past—expropriates buildings, it is not to help the city of Ottawa, but for the purposes of improving this capital city of the dominion. Hon. gentlemen know very well that we give federal government property every protection possible.

Let me cite a few figures. From 1918 to 1937, the government took over property in the city of Ottawa assessed at $3,711,255, on which we lost in taxes $137,692. From 1909 to 1937, expropriations by the government amounted to $5,659,555, which meant a loss in taxes to the city of $177,618. It must be remembered that these figures do not include properties owned by the federal district commission, which properties are also tax-exempt, and contribute no revenues whatsoever to the city. That is why I thought I would take time this afternoon to say a few words to inform hon. members on both sides of the house of the conditions that exist in our city.

During 1938 the government decided to expropriate practically all of Wellington street and Sparks street from Kent street, except the church. It costs so much for a church that they left that out. The properties expropriated were assessed at $920,720, and on these expropriations alone the citizens of Ottawa lost $36,000 in taxation. It has been contended that these expropriations and the construction of new government buildings increase the value of property in the city, but may I say, Mr. Speaker, that is not the case. I have lived in Ottawa for sixty years; I know what has been happening here for the last fifty years at least, and whenever there was an expropriation, as on Sussex street, for instance, business went down to nothing; stores became vacant. When the government expropriated the north side of Wellington street the same thing happened. Every store on the south side of the street became vacant or profitable to nobody. The few who kept their buildings kept them because it was cheaper to keep them than to lease them.

Mr. HAYHURST: It would not enhance the beauty of the city to have stores near the parliament buildings or the new administrative buildings.

Mr. PINARD: If my friend knew conditions in Ottawa he would not build a store on Wellington street or anywhere in Ottawa. The only buildings that have been erected on the south side of Wellington street in recent years are the United States legation; the Victoria building, owned by Edwards and company, and, of course, the Bank of Canada building. Outside these one cannot find another building that was erected following the expropriation of property. The situation was the same on Sussex street.

I am not making a plea here for myself, or making a speech for votes at all. I do not need them because my seat is safe, much safer than that of many of my hon. friends; and even if I am not here in another parliament, some other member for Ottawa will be. I am making a plea simply for what is right and for what should be done, and in my opinion Ottawa has always been too generous towards all governments, because we have had all kinds of governments in the last twenty years.

What about the water service? We all know that Ottawa has probably the best water in the country. The city corporation has installed the most modern filtration plant, probably the best on this continent, at a cost of $1,500,000, and I have never heard a single complaint since then by any member that Ottawa water was not the best. It is better than one gets in Windsor. The ordinary business enterprise in Ottawa pays a flat water rate of 16·8 cents per thousand gallons, while the government enjoys a special rate of thirteen cents per thousand gallons up to two hundred million gallons, and ten cents per thousand gallons after that. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps), when he told the house that we were not good sports, must not forget that our water tax is 16·5 cents, while in Winnipeg it is 38 cents.

Let me give a personal instance. I am not making a political speech at all. I am simply pleading for fairness from the government to the city of Ottawa. When I bought a property in Ottawa thirty years ago my assessment was $3,500, and the taxes amounted to $68.90. At present my taxes on that property amount to $310 a year. So am I a good sport or not? Hon. members may call me something else, if they like, and I admit I am probably foolish. With conditions as they are, it is not profitable to own property in Ottawa. Property is a white elephant.

Here is another consideration. Everybody knows that the city gives the government fire protection, police protection, and the government uses our streets, yet no government has ever given the city a five cent piece for the maintenance and repair of our streets. We have to look after all that ourselves.

Furthermore, the city purchased properties on Elgin street from Albert street to Laurier avenue four or five years ago, and for that purpose had to issue twenty-year debentures amounting to $875,000. So the government has received back many times the $100,000 that is granted to the city. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) may say that the government has spent $200,000 or more in the city of Ottawa. That is all right. They can spend what they like. That is not my lookout; that was for the beautification of the capital city. It was not for me, not for the city of Ottawa, but for everybody in Canada.

So I ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), and the Minister of Finance as well, not to press the bill any further. Give us a chance. We lose every year $200,000 by the fact that through these expropriations we do not collect taxes, they are exempt every time. I believe it is only right that I should not have to pay to be a citizen of Ottawa, to be a resident of the capital city. I could go across to Hull, where I would be nearby; but I am considered to be a citizen of Ottawa, as I am, and when I speak for myself I speak for all taxpayers within the municipality. It seems to me that there is a certain lack of courage on the part of hon. members in not finding out what the country desires so far as the city of Ottawa is concerned. In 1912 a plebiscite was proposed to the citizens of Ottawa for the setting up of a federal scheme. It was voted upon and carried. At that time my hon. friends on the opposite side of the house, now the official opposition, were in power. That project never materialized; the old order has continued until to-day. If Ottawa were a federal district, nobody in this house will deny that our taxes would be reduced. It is common sense. That is all I ask. It is useless to say any more.

I have been accused of not being in the house very often. I happen to represent a seat which keeps me elsewhere. If I were the member for Winnipeg North or the Yukon territory, I should be in this chamber all the time; I might be sleeping, sometimes, through some speeches in which I am not interested, but I would be here just the same. But it happens that I am busy outside the house, not in my own behalf but for the sake of those who are suffering. If members of the Social Credit party will listen to that they can make a good argument for themselves. I am trying to help the people, whether they are in the east or the west. I help them whenever it is possible.

After all, I repeat, why should the government not give us a fair deal? A fair deal would be to give us for ten years at least an annual grant of $200,000; and when I come here ten years from now I shall be ready to ask for more.

Mr. W. A. WALSH (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I want to lend my support to the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Pinard). Since 1925 the amount of this grant has remained at $100,000; but I believe that if hon. members have listened attentively to what the hon. member for Ottawa East has had to say, they will have found convincing arguments in his statements. He has pointed to the expropriations which have been made, and which have meant a loss of revenue to the city of Ottawa. As this administration well knows, governmental costs have risen materially since 1925, and yet we are paying the city of Ottawa the same sum as we commenced to pay in that year. I think the hon. member's point is well taken. The only thing I would ask of him is not to press the suggestion that this matter be held over, but to allow it to go through, with the suggestion that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), and the government take into consideration what he has said and see whether they cannot bring forward next year a measure which will commend itself to all those who are interested in Ottawa, and particularly those who are ratepayers of this city.

We all enjoy the benefits and amenities of Ottawa. As a member, of course I find myself frequently in the position of opposing government expenditures, but I never oppose government expenditures in Ottawa for the purpose of beautification or the erection of beautiful buildings in this capital city. It is one place where they should be built. The only thing I do oppose is not getting one hundred cents on the dollar for expenditures on improvements. I believe the citizens of Ottawa, and not only they but all the citizens of Canada and those who come into our country and find an opportunity to visit the capital city, are quite satisfied with what this government and other governments have done to help make Ottawa attractive.

I did not rise just to place a few words on Hansard. I rose without any solicitation on the part of the hon. member for Ottawa East, to give him particular support, because I felt that the arguments he put forward were sound and should be persuasive as far as this government is concerned. If there is one point for which I can commend the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), it is his desire to do his very best for Ottawa. I believe he has done so and is still doing it, and I know he has the support of every hon. member in trying to realize the ideals which he holds before himself for the capital city.

I hope the Minister of Public Works will take into account the debate this afternoon and will give consideration to the possibility of some increase in the grant to Ottawa, to be brought down at the next session of this house or the first session of the next parliament.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): The hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Pinard) has made certain accusations against myself which I think, upon a moment's reflection, he will find are unwarranted.

Mr. PINARD: Not serious.

Mr. HEAPS: Not exactly serious, but he made certain statements as far as I am concerned which I think he should never have uttered. He has said that I accused the people of Ottawa of not being good sports. I never used any such language in this house. I did say, I believe, on one occasion, that they were lacking in a certain sense of civic pride—a statement which I think I would repeat this afternoon.

Mr. PINARD: I wish to correct my hon. friend. If you did not say it, who said it? And if you said it—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. PINARD: Wait a minute. I—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should not address another hon. member.

Mr. PINARD: Very good, sir. But I just want to make a correction. If the hon. member said it he had it corrected in Hansard before it was published.

Mr. HEAPS: I think, when I make a statement in this house, the hon. member should accept the statement.

Mr. PINARD: I do.

Mr. HEAPS: He can go through Hansard as much as he likes, because on occasions of this kind I do not even go into the office of the editor of debates to read my statements. What I said was that Ottawa was lacking in a certain amount of civic pride, and I need only remind the hon. member and other hon. members of the time which was spent in pulling down that old ramshackle building which they called the tourist bureau of this city. Anyone walking up and down Elgin street knows what an eyesore that was to any individual who had in his mind the thought of making Ottawa a much nicer city to live in than it was then. I have always supported the government in its expenditures on Ottawa and in its beautification schemes. I remember that when the old Russell hotel was being pulled down, and money was appropriated in the house for that purpose, there was plenty of opposition in this chamber, but I was one who rose in my place and supported the government in its efforts to make Ottawa a finer and more beautiful city to live in.

When the hon. member tells this house about the vast amounts of money which have been lost through expropriation proceedings, he is showing only one-half of the picture. I was sorry that the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh) was so easily convinced by what the hon. member for Ottawa East said this afternoon.

Mr. PINARD: He is intelligent. That is why.

Mr. HEAPS: For instance, when the Russell hotel came down, what happened? For many years efforts were made to erect a new hotel in some other part of the city. Finally, because no organization would come forward with an offer to build a new hotel in the city, the Chateau Laurier built a large addition, on which the city of Ottawa now receives a considerable amount in taxes.

Mr. PINARD: How much?

Mr. HEAPS: As much as it got from the old Russell hotel; perhaps more.

Mr. PINARD: Oh, no.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not want to engage in any personal dispute in connection with this matter. The facts are a matter of record. While it is true that, when the federal government expropriates property, the city of Ottawa may lose taxes on the property expropriated, there is very often an enhancement in the value of adjoining properties. One cannot ignore that fact. Take Elgin street. Since the government expropriated properties there, other properties have become enhanced in value and the assessment has increased. If statements such as we have heard are to be made ex parte in this house, there should be a full and complete statement showing on the one hand what the government expropriated, and, on the other, the extent of the enhancement in values of adjacent properties.

We are told further by the hon. member for Ottawa East that this government should exist partly for the benefit of the people in the city of Ottawa—or words to that effect.

Mr. PINARD: I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. HEAPS: I said, words to that effect.

Mr. PINARD: The hon. member is dreaming.

Mr. HEAPS: We should pay for the privilege of walking the streets of Ottawa—and things of that kind.

I suggest that my hon. friend should read Hansard and see what he really did say.

If it were not for the parliament and other government buildings in Ottawa there would not be very much of a city of Ottawa. The parliament buildings alone are assessed at probably $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 by the city. How much in the way of tourist traffic comes to this city by reason of the fact that these buildings are here? Is it fair for the hon. member to say that we should pay taxes on these buildings? Can he show me any provincial capital that pays taxes on its legislative buildings? If this government is to be expected to pay taxes on the property it owns in Ottawa, then every other city in Canada has the same right in its own municipality.

I do not know of another city in Canada which to-day is financially any better off than Ottawa, if as well off.

Mr. PINARD: Because we have a good administration.

Mr. HEAPS: When it comes to municipal financing, Ottawa is much better off than practically every other city in Canada, because when you take the unemployment situation you find that Ottawa has been able to finance it mostly out of revenue, whereas nearly every other Canadian city that I know of has to finance its unemployment problem out of capital expenditure. The unemployment situation has been adding enormously to the capital expenditure of other municipalities.

I could deal with this matter at considerable length from the point of view raised this afternoon by the hon. member for Ottawa East. Let me assure him and other citizens of Ottawa that I have no objection to these grants being given to the city. All I want is some degree of equity between Ottawa and the federal government. I spoke a moment ago of the capitol buildings being here. In addition to that, there are other undertakings that are an asset to the community. For example, the government maintains the federal district commission.

Mr. PINARD: They do not pay taxes.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the hon. gentleman seriouly suggest that because the government maintains parks and boulevards for the people of Ottawa, and in addition to maintaining them provides capital expenditures, it should also pay taxes on them? I have never heard such a suggestion made in this house before. We maintain these parks and driveways, open playgrounds and other places of the same sort, and there is no other city in Canada where the government provides the same service for the people. Have I ever objected to these expenditures? Never. I have always supported them and I will continue to support them. I say to my hon. friend, however, that if we took away from this city all the work that has been done in beautification and so on, initiated and carried through by the federal government, there would be hardly anything that he could show to the credit of the city. Practically everything has been done by the federal government.

I am in favour of this grant; and if it can be shown that it is not sufficient, that the city of Ottawa is suffering a hardship because of expropriations, that it is losing vast revenues, then I am prepared to consider that aspect of the matter sympathetically. I have never objected to doing so, but I want to be shown first that the situation is as has been suggested before I can support an increased grant. But so far nothing has been shown that would warrant an increase even because of expropriations by the government. I am, however, in favour of this grant going through, and if Ottawa has anything further to submit—I hope it will be published if that is the case—and if it is shown that the grant is inadequate, I am prepared to consider the matter sympathetically.

Mr. J. J. McCANN (Renfrew South): The argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) is entirely beside the point with reference to the vote for services in Ottawa. I commend the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Pinard) and associate myself with him in the plea that he has made for this city. I do not agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North in his statement that the expropriation of properties for government purposes enhances the value of adjoining property. That is certainly not so in connection with Elgin street. Elgin street was primarily a business street; now if it is to be used for any purpose at all it will be used for residences.

I think Ottawa is entitled to greater and more generous consideration by this government in payment for services rendered. It is true that this city is not an industrial centre. It is a capital city, and for purposes well known to those in charge of civic government in Ottawa it has never been intended, nor have they made any concerted effort, to make Ottawa an industrial city. The largest employers of labour in Ottawa are the government of Canada. They have practically 12,000 employees here. If there were an industrial concern in Ottawa employing 12,000 people, would such a vast corporation get away with $100,000 in taxes a year?

It should not be forgotten that Ottawa supplies the employees of the government with all those services which an up-to-date city renders to its citizens. We have in Ottawa, hospitals, schools, fire protection, police protection, water services and all the other things which in a city go to make up the public service rendered to the employees of any great organization. I submit that Ottawa loses thousands of dollars every year in rendering this service to the government and government employees and is not compensated fifty per cent therefor. This matter should receive more consideration. It has taken the form of a bill introduced from year to year, and I doubt very much whether the services rendered are given any more consideration than they were a few years ago when they cost considerably less. I agree with the hon. member for Ottawa East that Ottawa should get at least twice the amount it is receiving now. And I think it is up to him and the local civic government to press for further consideration.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): There is one question I wish to ask, notwithstanding what the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Pinard) has said—because he is a member for the city as well as for the constituency. There has been nothing said in this debate this afternoon or in the discussion the other night which would alter the fact that these municipal services which the city of Ottawa is giving to the government of Canada—fire protection, police protection, water—are exactly the same as are given free by every other large municipality in Canada. I hope something will be done by the government to deal with this problem, which has been dealt with in the United States, England and Australia by grants and subventions as compensation for loss of taxes on government tax-exempt property, for services given to the federal government by the municipalities. The government has at present a program for the expenditure of some $8,000,000 on public buildings in this city, and in connection with these votes revenue and income should be considered. With all due respect to the federal district commission—we seem to have commission government in Canada now, and federal affairs seem to be administered somewhat at provincial capitals instead of at Ottawa—many buildings have been torn down in this city, a procedure which is interfering with the continuity of business streets and depriving the municipality of revenue.

In connection with the program which the government have for the unveiling of the great soldiers' memorial next May, they will surely have to consider a re-location of the various monuments on parliament hill to the fathers of confederation. Some are away in the back-yard, for example, D'Arcy McGee, Alexander Mackenzie; and even the great founder of our national system, Sir John A. Macdonald, is down at the end of this building. His monument should be moved to the forefront of the grounds, and the minister should take up the problem of re-locating on these grounds all the monuments of those who have done so much for this country. I hope he will also consider the matter of some payment to the larger municipalities which are giving to federal government buildings the very same service that the city of Ottawa is giving here.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. HEAPS: Before this bill is carried, I asked the Minister of Public Works the other day for certain information in regard to this matter. Has he that information now?

Mr. CARDIN: The information I promised to give my hon. friend the other day has been given by the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Pinard).

Mr. HEAPS: I listened attentively to what the hon. member gave; it was only one or two items. I asked for an itemized statement showing the land and buildings in Ottawa belonging to the federal government, which are exempt from municipal taxation.

Mr. CARDIN: According to the assessment commissioner of the city of Ottawa the figures as of March, 1938, the latest we have, were:

Land	$ 8,332,375
Buildings	35,609,209
	$43,941,584

That is the total assessed value of government properties in Ottawa. I am informed unofficially that this valuation will shortly be increased substantially.

Mr. HEAPS: What does the $8,000,000 land assessment comprise. There must be a number of parks and playgrounds included in that.

Mr. CARDIN: I could not give that information, because the federal district commission is not under the control of the Department of Public Works but comes under the Department of Finance. Probably when the estimates of the finance department are before the committee the information can be obtained, but as far as my department is concerned, we do not have that.

Mr. HEAPS: I assume that included in the figures which the minister has just submitted is property under the control of the federal district commission.

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. HEAPS: Is that figure exclusive of property held by the federal district commission?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Then could we have also the value of federal district commission property which is exempt?

Mr. CARDIN: That can be ascertained.

Mr. HEAPS: What I am trying to ascertain for my own benefit and perhaps that of others interested, is what the federal government is doing for Ottawa. Until I have a fairly accurate statement showing what these exemptions are, whether land or buildings, and what the assessment on the adjoining buildings is, I am not able to judge properly as to the claim made on behalf of the city that $100,000 is not sufficient.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit, me, instead of suggesting that the question be left until the estimates of the federal district commission are before the house, I would suggest a more expeditious and perhaps more complete way of getting the whole matter clarified, that is by means of a question on the order paper, which could be answered by both departments concerned, either on an order for return or an answer to the question; giving (a) the assessed value of land and buildings owned by the Department of Public Works in Ottawa, and (b) the assessed value of federal district commission properties in the city, which are exempt from taxation. There are, of course, some properties of the federal district commission outside Ottawa, but I take it my hon. friend is speaking only of those within the city.

Mr. HEAPS: Within the city.

Mr. DUNNING: A question on the order paper will bring that information, and it would be then a matter of record.

Mr. HEAPS: I shall follow the suggestion of the minister, but we want more than that. When we get the figures before us, I shall want to know what use is made of these lands, and perhaps we can get that only when the estimates of the Minister of Finance are before us.

Mr. FACTOR: The hon. member could go to the assessment department of the city.

Mr. HEAPS: But I think our own department should have that information. I know that the federal government has laid out a number of parks here, and open spaces used for playgrounds. To get a fairly accurate understanding we should know what use is being made of these open spaces in order to find out whether or not Ottawa is receiving a square deal from the federal government. We cannot get it entirely from the figures.

Mr. DUNNING: We can give only what we have. Assessment values are the only values available. Take for example, certain properties of the federal district commission surrounding Dow's lake. What was their actual value before the federal district commission built them up and turned them into the beautiful park which now exists?

Mr. HEAPS: That is why the figures do not tell the whole story.

Mr. DUNNING: The only basis of value we have is the value assessed by the city. I might not agree with it, or my hon. friend might not agree with it; but if he asks for facts, that is the only approximation of fact we can possibly give. It is quite impossible to arrive at the present day commercial value of the properties of the federal district commission. The question of the value of a park has been a moot question in connection with assessment in many cities and many countries for many years. I do not believe we could get any better figure or any more accurate data upon which to form conclusions than the city assessment.

Mr. PELLETIER: If that is the case; if that is the only figure the minister has, how was it possible to arrive at the figure of $100,000 and to know whether it was either too little or too much? There must have been some method adopted.

Mr. DUNNING: Because the $100,000 bears no relationship whatever to the assessment.

Mr. HEAPS: Was that amount not arrived at by agreement between the government and the city of Ottawa?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FISHERIES ACT, 1932

ASSESSMENT UPON OWNERS OF OBSTRUCTIONS TO ASCENT OR DESCENT OF FISH IN STREAMS

The house resumed from Thursday, February 16, consideration in committee of Bill No. 15, to amend the Fisheries Act, 1932—Mr. Michaud—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. MICHAUD: On the last occasion this bill was considered, it was approved and reported, but there was some question as to the legality of the procedure adopted by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni in trying to amend other provisions of the Fisheries Act by adding to the bill a suggestion which he called an amendment. Since then I notice the hon. member has introduced a bill of his own which apparently covers what he intended to accomplish by the amendment he had offered, and I thought he intended either to abandon or to withdraw his amendment in view of the fact that he has introduced a separate bill.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, the minister is mistaken when he says this bill was reported previously. What actually happened was that someone moved that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. Had it been reported, the next step would have been the third reading.

With regard to the suggestion that I should withdraw my amendment, that would put me under a handicap, because "to-day is ours and to-morrow is not". We have before us a government bill, on which I maintain—and I think the authorities bear me out; I should like an opportunity to argue the point before a ruling is given—that it is fully competent for me to introduce an amendment such as I have suggested. If I should drop my amendment and trust to the vague, distant, fortuitous possibility—for that is all it is—that a private bill, or a public bill introduced by a private member, to be strictly accurate may be reached, I may find myself in the position that my bill may never come up. Private and public bills can be considered only twice each week, for an hour at a time. Private bills come first, and no doubt a large number of these, in the form of divorce bills, will soon come from the other house. In addition, the order paper indicates that, in any event, there are quite a number of bills ahead of mine, and it might well happen that under the conditions I have mentioned my private bill would never be reached. I introduced it only in order to do what a good general does, prepare a position to which he may retire if he is driven from his present one. Since I have looked into the merits of the proposed amendment and its relation to the bill now before the committee, I have become fully satisfied, from the best authorities, that my amendment is in order, and I should like to be allowed to go ahead with it.

I suggest that it is six o'clock, Mr. Chairman. If it is your wish I can go ahead and debate the point of order; it is up to you.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, at six o'clock I was giving my reason why I preferred that my amendment should be discussed now rather than in connection with the bill of which I have given notice. Being half dead with the popular epidemic which has decimated the membership of the house, I missed giving the most succinct argument for haste in this connection. The legislature of the state of Washington is now meeting at Olympia, and in that state the vested interests which are behind the use of traps are moving heaven and earth, and some other places as well, to have repealed a law which was passed by initiative and referendum some four years ago to prohibit the use of traps in those waters. That action was not taken by legislation; it was done by what is called initiative and referendum, that is, any one can have a certain action taken by obtaining a sufficient number of votes. That action would never have been taken by the legislature. The vested interests have been laying for this legislation in order to have it repealed. They failed two years ago, but the matter is up again.

One of the greatest arguments that they advance is that the Dominion of Canada has not kept faith with the written agreement and understanding between our fishermen and theirs. They contend that they have taken out 219 traps, while we have not taken out our four or five. This is the reason for the urgency. The scope of this matter is comparatively small, but I do not know of anything that has provoked so much ill feeling in the western states and British Columbia. It has become a matter between the common people and the vested interests. During the last few weeks the feeling ran so high, according to the reports in the press, that they had to bring in the equivalent of our sergeant-at-arms to clear the galleries in the legislature. That is why I am so urgent and insistent that we should pass this amendment to-night rather than wait for six, eight or perhaps twelve weeks hence, even though the bill might pass at that time, in order to get action. If we pass it now, the argument of those who want traps restored to United States waters would be gone. The opponents of traps would be able to say that now the conditions are fair. If we do not do this, the chances are considerable that they will put back their 219 traps as against the four or five on this side.

For the sake of some of the new hon. members, I should like to explain how this thing works. The largest and most valuable run of salmon in our waters is the sockeye salmon run, the greater portion of which approaches our shores from the southwest corner of Vancouver island. Then, for some unknown reason, the fish proceed across to Puget sound, which is United States waters and where there are no spawning streams. They circle round Puget sound and many of them are taken there before they can come back into the tributaries of the Fraser river. They go up the Fraser river for a thousand or fifteen hundred miles to spawn in all the creeks and rivers. We breed the fish and the Americans capture them. Prior to the passing of this initiative legislation, they took seventy per cent of the run. The proportions could be easily calculated because the fish are coming from one place and going to one place. Since the Americans removed their 219 traps, our share of the catch has run as high as eighty-six per cent. It would pay us as sharp-dealing people, let alone for reasons of fairness and humanity, to pension off the forty-one employees who are engaged to operate these traps, although I think the number is less than that, in order to retain such a high proportion of the salmon. This is quite apart from the extra employment that would be given if these traps were removed.

I should like to explain just how a trap works. I have a sketch of one which I exhibit. The fish come round a headland and make for the Fraser river. The instinct of the homing salmon is just as great as that of the homing pigeon, and they cannot go anywhere else but around that headland. They go along the shore-line and they come up to a lead, as it is called, which may be 600 feet or 6,000 feet long. It is stretched out to a trap. They cannot get through there and they cannot get out on the shore, so they nose along until they come to the mouth of the trap. There are wings on each side of the mouth. They go through the mouth, and finally they reach a place with a little hole like the neck of those ink-bottles which you cannot upset. Once in there, they cannot turn round. They are then brailed out.

The law is that for forty-eight hours in the week this mouth or gate here must be closed. The gate may be closed; but as the fish come along on Friday and Saturday nights and find they cannot get through, they simply mill round and round. You or I would go down round one side or the other and get past the trap, but that is not fish nature. They simply mill round, and their instinct guides them until they start up again, when they again hit this lead. Then they mill round again. On Monday morning there are just three times as many fish as there were on Friday morning. Ninety per cent of the fish stay there. That is what the wing is intended for.

Then what is the net? The net has what is called a two-inch extension. It is two inches when it is extended. Consequently, the square of the mesh is exactly one inch each way, and that is the measure of the fish that can get through there. Anything which is less than an inch can get through. Last year or the year before we kept track of it. They caught everything—whales, barracuda, rat fish, porpoises—all down the line. I think they stopped at shrimps. We did not get any shrimps, but we got everything else. Nothing escaped them—mature, immature, day and night, in season and out of season. It is an enormously destructive method of fishing, and the whole idea that one man or two men should be allowed such a particular privilege is against all sense of common decency and what we call public policy. The people who advocate a thing like that are in line with the people who, if not to-day, not so long ago thought that the whole of Canada west of the great lakes—

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. HANSON: It is about forty years since they started that. It is about time it was changed.

Mr. NEILL: They have had forty years of it and have made fortunes out of it. As I was saying, people who advocate a thing like that are like the people who advocated that all Canada west of the great lakes belonged to the Hudson Bay company, or that India belonged to the East India Company because at one time it had huge territorial rights. But we are living in the present age, not in the past.

To cut a long story short, I shall try to meet the minister half way. This is a matter which will be settled only when it is settled aright. It will ring down through Canada's political record for a long time to come until it is settled. It is now becoming a provincial matter, though there is no need in the world for that; before we know where we are, it will become a national matter.

During the dinner recess I considered my position carefully, and in the interests of those whom I ostensibly represent I am going to take a great chance, which I am not authorized to take, on behalf of them, and make this proposal, which would almost impel, I hope and think, acceptance by the minister. I am going to move the following amendment, which is entirely different from the one I had the other night, and therefore should be in order. It cannot be held to be anticipatory.

The CHAIRMAN: Do I understand that the hon. member is going to withdraw his amendment of February 16—

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: —and substitute the following? Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member have leave to withdraw his amendment?

Amendment (Mr. Neill) withdrawn.

Mr. NEILL: The one I propose to insert is this. I might as well say, just to contrast the two, that the previous amendment was that:

No one shall use a salmon trap net in any of the Pacific waters of Canada.

That is withdrawn. The amendment I now propose is:

After the calendar year 1939 no one shall use a salmon trap net in any of the Pacific waters of Canada off the southwesterly shores of Vancouver island.

That will have the great advantage, if it passes to-night, that it will be telegraphed to Olympia and it will save the situation there. That is the all important thing. The general principle, too, is urgent, on account of the work it will make for individuals—seiners, trollers, gill netters.

The cannery men with the exception of one, are in favour of the elimination of these licences. This is giving them another year of life, and one year of a privilege of that kind is valuable. It has been suggested that there is vested capital involved which should not be rudely dispossessed, but the whole fishery law is based upon the fact that you get a licence for one season only, and you are liable to lose it: even in the middle of the season you can lose it if the Department of Fisheries says, "We are not going to allow any more fishing in that area." You may have a cannery there, but you are out of luck; that is all. And it is all done in the interests of conservation.

The same thing applies here. No injustice will be done to these people. They knew their licence was an annual one. The traps are taken out every year. They are not yet put in for this year, and now is the time to tell these people they will not be given a licence this year. This is 1939. They cannot say they have not been given notice or warning, because in 1936 they were told in writing—I have it here—that their licences would not be renewed after 1936. This is 1939, and they are still being renewed. Can any great injustice be done to people who have had that amount of warning? I do not think so. So they will have had ample warning if they get a licence this year as well. They are being treated with more than leniency; they are being treated with favour. After they have had this privilege for some thirty or forty years and have made several fortunes out of it, I think they might well give way in the interests of conservation, in the interests of allowing employment to our fishermen, and above all in the interests of encouraging the Americans to keep their traps out—which means so very much to us.

At this stage I propose to stop, and hopefully suggest to the minister that he might accept that position. I have some other data on the subject; but it will be needless to give it if the minister can see his way, and I earnestly hope that he may do so. If it were necessary I would go down on my knees in sackcloth and ashes, humbling myself to the minister to urge him to undo this great injustice, not of his doing, but of his perpetuating. I know that the people of British Columbia, with very few exceptions, and those entirely of people who have got a very gilt-edged axe to grind, would be in favour of the course I suggest. I pause here to ask the minister if he can see his way to accept this very much modified amendment which I have proposed.

Mr. MICHAUD: The first matter to be decided is whether this amendment is in order and whether under the rules of the house we can discuss this matter at this time. The amendment which the hon. member has moved is to a bill which has reference to—

The CHAIRMAN: Will the minister permit me first to read the amendment. It must be read from the chair:

> That the following be inserted as a new section. Section 32 is hereby amended by inserting the following as subsection 2 thereof:
> 2. After the calendar year 1939 no one shall use a salmon trap net in any of the Pacific waters of Canada off the southwesterly shores of Vancouver island.

Mr. MICHAUD: The first point I want to raise is that this amendment anticipates a matter which is already before the house by way of a bill introduced by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), Bill No. 30 on the order paper. The hon. member suggests that section 12 of the Fisheries Act be amended by the insertion of the following:

> 12A. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this act or regulations thereunder, no person shall use, for the taking of salmon, any salmon trap net in any Canadian tidal waters of the coast of British Columbia.

Although the wording of the amendment now suggested differs slightly from the provisions of the bill which is on the order paper, the principle is the same, and I submit that, under standing order 31, paragraph (d) of section 6, no motion shall anticipate a matter which has been previously appointed for consideration by the house, or with reference to which a notice of motion has been previously given and not withdrawn.

Second, this is citation 398, under standing order 48:

> An amendment cannot anticipate a notice of motion on the order paper.

It is all the same principle, Mr. Chairman, namely, that a matter cannot be brought up by amendment anticipating any other matter which is already down on the order paper and which may come before the house for discussion during the session. On this ground I feel that it would be out of order to accept the amendment or to discuss the matter at this stage.

Further, the amendment, I submit, is contrary to the rules and to standing order 76 because it seeks to add to a bill before the house a matter which is not dealt with by the bill. Bill No. 15 which is now under consideration is to amend section 57 of the Fisheries Act. The proposed amendment seeks to add a new provision to the Fisheries Act, and to change altogether a section of the Fisheries Act that has not been brought before the house. Citation 781, under standing order 76, provides, with reference to amendments in committee:

> An amendment must be relevant both to the subject matter of the bill. . . .

The amendment is not relevant to the subject matter of the bill because the subject matter of the bill is to amend section 57 of the Fisheries Act. Further, to quote from the same citation 781:

> It must not be based on schedules or other provisions the terms of which have not been placed before the committee; it must not be beyond the scope of the bill.

The scope of the bill under consideration is the amending of section 57 of the Fisheries Act, and the proposed amendment seeks to amend section 12 of the Fisheries Act. It is, therefore, altogether beyond the scope of the bill now before us, and I submit that we are violating the rules of the house in proceeding in this manner.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, the hon. minister has raised two separate points of order. I think it would have been better if we had confined ourselves to one at a time, but possibly he is going on the well known doctrine that two weak arguments are better than one sound one, because taken separately there is absolutely nothing in them. But there is strength in union, just as it is more difficult to break a bundle of sticks tied together than to break the sticks singly, one by one.

As to the first point of order he raised, that I was anticipating a matter which has already been set down for the consideration of the house, he lightly passed over the obvious fact that the two matters are not related to each other except in a stepfatherly manner. I may be cautious and that is why to some extent I changed the amendment to this bill in order that it could not possibly be open to the objection which the minister raises. The original proposal was as the minister read it, to forbid once and for all, and forever more, all salmon fishing traps in the Pacific waters of Canada.

Mr. MICHAUD: Of British Columbia.

Mr. NEILL: The waters of the Pacific coast of Canada I think was the wording, but it does not make any difference. This is all-comprehensive, all-including, so to speak, and beginning from the moment this bill becomes law. But the amendment which I have now proposed, and which I do not think the minister could have thoroughly studied is wholly different; for it says, "After the calendar year 1939." That is a whale of a difference. If some one is getting thirty or forty thousand dollars a year from a privilege, it makes a big difference to him whether he is to be cut off now or a year from now.

The second point of disresemblance, so to speak, is that the original amendment said: in all the Pacific waters of Canada—or it may have been British Columbia. The amendment I have proposed to-night is limited to a strictly small area off the southwest coast of Vancouver island, a distance of probably eleven to fifteen miles; I think it is eleven miles, as a matter of fact. There is surely a big difference there, Mr. Chairman.

As regards the second point of order which the minister dealt with, I was going to say that it was even more inappropriate, but there can be no degrees; for if a thing is out of order it is out of order. He said that my present amendment is not in order because he has introduced a bill to amend section 57 of the Fisheries Act, and therefore, if I move an amendment to his bill it must be relevant to and in some way connected with the subject matter of section 57. That is fine and dandy, if it were so, but it is not so. He did not introduce a bill to amend section 57 of the Fisheries Act at all. I ask you to look at it, Mr. Chairman. It is "An act to amend the Fisheries Act"—that, and that only.

I have right before my eyes an illustration that I have just picked up. The hon. member for Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Mallette) introduced Bill No. 10, to amend the criminal code (sweepstakes). In other words, the criminal code is an act that applies to a great many things; to particularize and narrow his amendment down to the matter of sweepstakes his bill is entitled, "An act to amend the criminal code (sweepstakes)," and under that bill I could not bring in any amendment that was not connected with sweepstakes. Had he merely said, "an act to amend the criminal code," I or any other member could have brought in an amendment to do away with capital punishment, had it so pleased us. The distinction is clear, and what the minister has quoted refers to a case like that. He says that the amendment is beyond the scope of the bill—"scope and title of the bill," those words which are found in the section he did not quote. Now the scope of the bill is to amend the Fisheries Act, that and that only. It is not my fault or his that he did not particularize it in the way the criminal code amendment bill did with reference to sweepstakes. The fact remains that he did not, and it is therefore the privilege of any member to amend the act, provided he keeps within the scope and title of the bill which is to amend the Fisheries Act.

Let me quote from Bourinot. Some hon. members quote from May; but I prefer Bourinot as a Canadian authority, and at one time clerk of this house. The English authorities are not so familiar with our customs. Bourinot says:

The committee of the whole have now power to make amendments not within the scope and title of the bill.

The power goes further than I do. It covers even cases where the amendment is not within the scope of the bill:

But if any amendment be not within the title of the bill, the committee are to amend the title accordingly.

They can even do that if it is necessary, and there was a case in point. At page 534 of Bourinot this rule is laid down:

It is irregular to propose an amendment which is irrelevant to the subject-matter of a clause.

If I stopped there, as the minister did, it would be said I am introducing an amendment which is irrelevant to the subject-matter of the clause. But listen to the rest of the sentence—because one cannot take one's law piecemeal, reading half a sentence and leaving out the other half:

—but it—

That is the amendment.

—should be submitted to the committee at the end of the bill, as a separate clause.

That indicates clearly it is contemplated that such action might be and can be taken. We have precedents, and lawyers love precedents. Let us look at them. Here is Bourinot again:

The house went into committee on a bill "to amend the general acts respecting railways"—

Just like the general title of such enactments as the act to amend the Fisheries Act.

—and a question arose whether it was competent to add a clause requiring the government to purchase goods for the use of dominion railways upon public tender and contract only; and the committee having arisen for the purpose of receiving instructions from the house upon the point at issue, Mr. Speaker Anglin—

A celebrated speaker.

—decided that such an amendment would be regular without an instruction.

That is, a definite instruction. There is no question that it is held to be legal to amend a bill within the scope and title of the bill. The only condition imposed is that if you go outside the title of the bill you must amend the title as well. That is not what I proposed to do. I hold that the point of order is entirely wrong. I have already quoted Bourinot. Further on he states:

A committee of the whole have now power—

Many years ago the situation was different, but we are living to-day not before confederation.

—to make amendments not within the scope and title of the bill.

But the amendment proposed was within the scope and title of the bill. I need not argue that point because obviously the amendment is within the scope and title of the bill. If it were not, my case would be gone. Now he is trying to build up an argument on something he wishes he had done but did not do. I submit that on both points the objection is out of order.

Mr. MacNEIL: Anyone who is familiar with conditions on the Pacific coast will recognize the merit of the argument advanced by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. There is a distinct difference between the terms of his amendment and the terms of the bill that now stands in his name for second reading. I say, there is an essential difference, and in that respect it cannot be held that the amendment which the hon. gentleman has just read and which is now before the committee anticipates in any respect the bill that stands on the order paper. Furthermore, I refer to citation 769 under standing order 76, page 221 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms:

It shall be an instruction to all committees of the whole house to which bills may be committed that they have power to make such amendments therein as they shall think fit; provided they be relevant to the subject matter of the bill; but that if any such amendments shall not be within the title of the bill they do amend the title accordingly and do report the same specially to the house.

The adoption of the amendment moved by the hon. member would not necessitate a change in the title of the bill, "An Act to Amend the Fisheries Act," and it is therefore properly within the jurisdiction of the committee to consider the amendment.

May I go a step beyond that and appeal to the minister not to press his point of order at this stage. This matter is of great public interest at the coast, and any attempt to block discussion at this time by invoking any rule of order might be misconstrued there as an effort to obscure public discussion of a question which is of such vital consequence to the fishing industry of British Columbia.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I rise to support the minister in his point of order, and I do so definitely by calling attention to citation 781 on page 223 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms under standing order 76:

781. An amendment must be relevant both to the subject matter of the bill and the clause to which it relates.

"The subject matter of this bill"—it is not a question of the act—and the bill is that which is now before the house.

Mr. REID: As one representing a district that is greatly interested in this matter, I would point out that the hon. gentleman overlooks the fact that this is not a bill in the strict sense of the word. The bill to which he refers is a new bill that is being introduced, whereas the bill before the house is an amendment to a certain act which is already on the statute books. I would say to the hon. member who introduced the amendment in committee I was sorry that he weakened his argument, as I thought, by offering to wait one year. If his bill had come up for discussion, ample opportunity would have been afforded hon. members to go into the whole matter of traps, which I heartily agree should be done away with. But even the statement now that they will be removed next year is no guarantee they will be.

Mr. NEILL: I did not hear that.

Mr. REID: I said that the statement now that they will be eliminated next year may be no guarantee that they will be. I would rather have the bill proceeded with and discussed in the house so that we might have ample opportunity to express our views upon it.

Mr. HANSON: A statement from the minister to the effect that the government will not favour the issuing of any more licences would, in my opinion, be satisfactory. Like the hon. member for New Westminster, I should like to see these traps abolished on the Pacific coast, and I would support a bill which had that purpose in view. I am strongly in accord with the argument of the hon. member, and I think they should have been abolished long ago. If, however, the minister declares that he will issue no more trap licences after this year, that should be satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN: The Minister of Fisheries referred to Bill No. 30 now on the order paper, sponsored by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). I read from that bill:

The Fisheries Act, 1932, chapter 42 of the statutes of 1932, is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 12, the following section:

"12A. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this act or regulations thereunder, no person shall use, for the taking of salmon, any salmon trap net in any Canadian tidal waters of the coast of British Columbia."

The amendment moved by the hon. member to-night reads:

That the following be inserted as a new section:

"Section 32 is hereby amended by inserting the following as subsection 2 thereof:

After the calendar year 1939 no one shall use a salmon trap net in any of the Pacific waters of Canada off the southwesterly shores of Vancouver island.

I quote from Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, page 225, citation 792:

A new clause will not be entertained if it is beyond the scope of a bill, inconsistent with clauses agreed to by the committee, or substantially the same as a clause previously negatived.

And Bourinot says, at page 523:

In the session of 1875 the house went into committee on a bill "to amend the general acts respecting railways," and a question arose whether it was competent to add a clause requiring the government to purchase goods for the use of dominion railways upon public tender and contract only; and the committee having arisen for the purpose of receiving instructions from the house upon the point at issue, Mr. Speaker Anglin decided that such an amendment would be regular without an instruction.

After giving this matter careful consideration, since the first amendment was moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and refreshing my memory to-night on that amendment—which is now withdrawn by the hon. member—I am of the opinion that the amendment moved to-night is in order.

Mr. NEILL: I regret very much that the minister took the point of order which he did, thereby suggesting that he would in that way evade the responsibility of meeting the situation, and the more so because it will be within the recollection of the committee that a few weeks ago when this question of the action in the legislature at Olympia first came up, I brought it up on the orders of the day, asking whether he was prepared to take the responsibility of continuing the traps on this side; and he said on that occasion—I will not take the trouble to read it—that the matter of reciprocity, that is keeping out our traps as long as they kept theirs out, was still under consideration. I could think of no more appropriate moment than the present to make an announcement of his policy. Not only has he not seen his way to give a favourable decision, but he apparently lacks the intention to make that decision at all. Now time goes on. The minister has apparently not yet made up his mind. I wonder when he is going to have it made up, because the preparations for building the traps have already begun. We are told here that the matter is being considered, but work is already going on in preparation for putting in these traps. Are they doing that with some whisper in their ears, "Go ahead, it will be all right"? I have a letter under my hand dated February 22, which reads:

Perhaps you do not know that they have started the usual procedure a week ago putting piles in the water off the spit where they keep them in the winter. I live here 250 yards from where they are working and it seems that they are sure of putting the traps in. I understand they are putting in five traps this year.

So now it comes down to the one brief moment that the advocates of freedom in this matter can have to discuss the merits of this question. I have put it before the committee at some length already, but I am going to clinch it by an indisputable and most reliable authority. I hold in my hand six letters, five of them signed by the deputy minister of fisheries and one by the minister himself. I may have put the case badly, ignorantly, incompletely, and lacking the eloquence which it requires, but I will take the written word of the minister himself as to whether or not these traps should be taken out. I will read only one letter, the one addressed to myself, but there were five others to different fishery associations and others. The one addressed to myself is dated February 7, 1936, three years and almost one month ago. It reads:

Dear Mr. Neill:

I wish to revert to your letter of June 25 last—

That is 1935, when this matter was brought in its immediate form to his attention.

—endorsing a petition by the Kyuoquot Trollers' Cooperative Association, urging that licence for salmon trap-nets in the portion of the southwest coast of Vancouver island be discontinued.

The question has been receiving careful consideration and, in the light of all the circumstances, it has been decided to continue such licences for 1936. Notification is being given the licensees, however, that thereafter such licences will not be granted. If trap nets are reintroduced in the state of Washington—

Which is what I have been talking about.

—the question of reallowing them in the above area will again be considered.

That is signed by the deputy minister, and the minister now assumes the responsibility. Substantially the same letter, except that the name was different, was addressed to W. R Gray, secretary of the British Columbia Fishermen's Protective Association, New Westminster, and the Fishing Vessels Owners' Association of British Columbia, Vancouver, and a letter to the chief supervisor of fisheries, giving him orders to carry it out.

The last letter, from which I want to quote briefly, was addressed by the minister to J. H. Todd & Son, one of the owners of these traps. Evidently Mr. Todd had telegraphed a protest when this notice was served on him by the chief supervisor. I shall not quote the earlier part of the letter unless the minister asks for it, but this is the pertinent part:

Your company may rest assured that the above decision—

That is the unfavourable decision against them.

—was reached only after carefully weighing all factors in connection with the matter.

The important part is, the minister states that he felt it was necessary to take the steps he had taken, but this is the postscript:

There is the further very strong argument, that the continuance of traps on our side will operate as an incentive for rescinding the prohibition of traps in Washington state.

Is that not what I have been preaching here? That is his own opinion. The minister says that:

In the light of these conditions, the urge was very strong that trap licences should be renewed by my department for the present year—

That was 1936.

—but in view of the investment in these traps and the preparations already made for their operation for the coming season, it was finally decided that in the public interest—

"In the public interest."

—the traps should not be discontinued then but should be allowed for the present year so that fair notice should be given to the owners and operators thereof; and it was stipulated that should traps be reintroduced on the United States side their prohibition in the Sooke area would be reconsidered.

That is no ex parte statement by me; that is the statement of the minister himself. He says that his department have carefully considered it, and that was their serious and considered decision, but as a concession to the vested interests they would be allowed to continue for 1936 but the licences should not be renewed thereafter.

We had this matter up before a committee of the house, and I remember very well one member of the committee said, "Mr. Minister, you changed your policy, you refused to issue these licences beyond 1936, and you have now changed your mind or your policy or both; will you explain the reason for this change of mind." But we have not heard that reason yet, and I hope we may get it to-night. It will need to be a pretty sound and substantial reason to combat the decision, carefully arrived at, as the minister himself says, after full consideration and in the light of all the circumstances, backed up by his officials, that these traps must not be permitted after 1936, that they would be allowed until that year as a concession to the vested interests. In that committee I made the same suggestion that I made to-night, that they should be permitted to continue for 1937 as well, in order that there might be no possible chance for the vested interests—always so dear to the heart of any government—to say they had not been fairly dealt with. Now we have the attitude the minister has exhibited to-night, that he is not going to accept any suggestion or compromise at all, that the traps are going to continue and will continue, I suppose, as long as he has control of them.

I can tell the minister that this is a very unpopular move in British Columbia. It is not a question of thirty, forty, fifty or two hundred fishermen; it has become an issue between the common people and the vested interests—and in this case the vested interests are very small. It is not a question even between the fishermen and the cannerymen, who themselves are against these traps, with the exception of this one man. One hon. member of the house rose in the committee and said: "Gentlemen, I am getting a little tired of this. As most of you know, I am a canneryman, and if I could have a trap at my door, as this man has, I could get all the fish I needed with fifteen or twenty men. But I am quite willing to do without a trap and use between two and four hundred men in order to preserve the fish, in order not to have them taken out at all stages of their development, and in order to make work for the fishermen." But he very properly added, "I cannot see why, if thirty-six canneries can get along without traps, the thirty-seventh cannery cannot do the same thing."

There is the issue. It is not the fishermen versus the canneries; it is the common people versus one gigantic, firmly entrenched, all-embracing monopoly. The people of British Columbia will call their members and the government of the day to account when this question comes before them in the next election.

Mr. MacNEIL: I should like to support the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. My experience since this matter was last discussed in the house has strengthened my conviction that traps should be abolished. These traps always were a menace to the fishing industry in British Columbia and, by reason of the situation that has developed in the state of Washington, they are a still greater menace to-day. I believe it is in the public interest that no further licences be issued for the operation of stationary fish traps.

[Mr. Neill.]

It is not to-day so much an issue of threatened unemployment in the fishing industry or violation of the principles of conservation. The issue is that the policies pursued by the minister will result in turning over to United States operators the business that properly belongs to Canadian operators. The fishing industry along the coast of British Columbia is important to those of us who reside in that province. The minister is well aware, as are other members of the house, that certain legislation is now pending in the state of Washington, sponsored by Senator Edwards who has openly stated time and again that it is his purpose to restore the fish traps in United States waters immediately south of Point Roberts and the international boundary. He intends, he says, to rehabilitate the ghost town of Blaine, Washington.

It is well known that, prior to 1935, United States operators had something like 219 traps, and that by reason of the fact that they operated traps in those waters they obtained an average of between sixty and seventy per cent of the Fraser river sockeye salmon pack. For reasons of conservation, and because there was a gentleman's agreement in this respect between the Canadian and United States authorities, the state of Washington abolished their traps by legislation which became effective in 1935. What was the result? The average Canadian share of the Fraser river sockeye salmon pack prior to 1935 was about thirty per cent. In 1936 our average rose to fifty-three per cent; in 1937 it was about eighty per cent, and I am reliably informed that last season it was over sixty per cent. Surely that is an important point. The chief reason for the agitation in the state of Washington in favour of the proposed legislation is that the Canadian government has continued to permit the operation of stationary fish traps at Sooke, in disregard of the gentleman's agreement and, may I say, in disregard of well established principles of conservation.

I do not wish to traverse all the ground covered by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, but the house should fully understand the position in which the government finds itself in regard to this issue. These traps have been operating under licence since 1918 at the southwesterly tip of Vancouver island, where they may intercept the main migration of the sockeye before they pass through United States waters to the mouth of the Fraser river. It is an extraordinary monopoly; these people are permitted to operate under conditions that are denied thousands of commercial fishermen who stake their livelihood on the operation of their vessels and gear in the coastal waters of British Columbia. These traps, as the reports of the department indicate, catch everything from herrings to whales while they are fishing, and usually they fish from April to November. They catch sockeye before the ordinary gill netter can put out and catch sockeye. They catch immature fish. It is true they say that they donate the immature fish to the hospitals of Vancouver; but surely that is no justification, and certainly it does not cover up their crimes in that regard. When I think of all the restrictive regulations imposed upon the ordinary commercial gill netter, purse seiner and troller in the waters of British Columbia, I think I have a right to feel indignant at the extraordinary privileges enjoyed by the operation of the Sooke traps. The ordinary fisherman is penalized if he attempts to moor his gear to shore or to the bottom. He is prohibited from operating a drifting trap-net. He is compelled to observe certain stipulated closed seasons. It is true that the regulations in regard to closed seasons apply to the Sooke operators as well, but it is a well known fact that on account of the type of construction of the traps which, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has explained, extend two or three thousand feet out to sea, the fish are held under favourable tidal conditions, waiting until the apron of the trap is lifted at the expiration of the closed season.

There is a marked contrast between the conditions under which the ordinary commercial gill netter, purse seiner and troller operate and the privileges extended to the Sooke operators. At Sooke they employ something like forty-one men; they can winch up large quantities of fish in nets of close mesh into waiting barges for convenient transport to the Empire cannery at Esquimalt. According to the evidence given before the committee, that was the number of men employed; but it was never clearly or satisfactorily explained why they could not put that many or more men in employment if they were willing to adopt the same type of vessels as those used by the United States operators who fish further out in that area.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has made it clear that the minister promised the organized fishermen of British Columbia that he would discontinue the issuance of these licences in the public interest, and the fishermen have been at a complete loss to understand why the minister has not fulfilled his promise. I have taken pains to meet the organized fishermen. I think all the organizations on the coast, with two exceptions, discussed this matter this season when they met in convention, and they say this amounts to nothing but a double-cross on the part of the dominion government. They say, "We have been double-crossed. We were promised that the traps would be wiped out, but they are still being operated, and we have evidence that it is intended to continue them in operation for the season of 1939." We all know very well what happened. After the minister gave his promise, some officials of the British Columbia government, the operators in question and their financial backers organized a high pressure, costly lobby, to which we were exposed in the Canadian House of Commons.

The minister indicated clearly to the committee which sat on this matter that it was his intention, no matter what the report of the committee might be, to issue licences. No one can understand clearly the minister's attitude in this matter, unless he is determined to protect the profits of the privileged interests at Sooke and disregard completely the interests of the large fishing industry of British Columbia. It is now clearer than ever before that the fishing industry of British Columbia is menaced by the continued operation of the traps at Sooke.

I cannot be too emphatic with regard to the traps. They violate the regulations under the act, as was shown in evidence; they violate the principles of conservation, particularly with regard to catching immature fish and the mutilation of fish which are held when milling round within the spiller and the heart of the trap. Piracy is sometimes described as an act of depredation on the high seas, but these traps are committing acts of depredation on the fishing industry just as much as if they were boarding Canadian fishing vessels and looting them. It is piracy on the high seas. I think at this time the minister should make clear his intention to discontinue the issuance of licences for the stationary traps at Sooke.

Mr. REID: Mr. Chairman, I rise to join the other two hon. members in protesting against the use of traps on the southerly point of Vancouver island. Most of the points with regard to this matter have been covered, but there are one or two matters I should like to draw to the attention of the minister and the committee. It is true that the Americans use traps in some of their fishing grounds, but they are up in the north. In the great areas on Bristol bay where the salmon run, no salmon traps or power boats are allowed, so great is the care taken by the Americans to preserve the salmon run. We should take similar care in connection with the salmon fisheries of the Fraser river. The last speaker referred to the traps catching anything from herring to whale. I have before me a list of the varieties of fish caught in the traps, and I know it will surprise some hon. members to be told that some twenty-two varieties of fish are caught. However, the most striking thing is the catch of sockeye salmon which is taken early in the month of May and the beginning of June, before the sockeye fishing really commences on the Fraser river.

For a moment I can speak as a member of the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission, which is doing everything possible to rehabilitate the great salmon runs on the Fraser river. The one variety which we are endeavouring to rehabilitate is the early run of the sockeye. Immediately upon leaving the strait this run heads for the waters of the Fraser, but the fish are caught long before the fishermen on the Fraser river have commenced fishing operations. The traps do catch immature fish and in that way are destructive. Every fishermen's organization that I know of, with the exception of perhaps one in Victoria and Nanaimo, are in favour of the elimination of traps.

Last fall I took occasion to go down to Bellingham with a view to finding out what the United States fishermen thought of the Canadian traps. I found the opinion of the United States fishermen was similar to that expressed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). They felt that the retention of traps in Canadian waters was being used by the United States interests as an argument to again have traps in the United States waters. That fight is going on at the present time. I say in all seriousness that if traps are again brought into use in United States waters they can point to the traps in Canadian waters as something that helped to bring that about.

I do not intend to traverse the ground which was covered last year and again to-night. I rise in my place to join with other hon. members in protesting as strongly as I can against the operation of fish traps at Sooke. I thought we would have had a better chance to discuss traps when the bill introduced by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni was before the house for discussion, but as the matter has come up to-night I feel it incumbent to place myself on record as being entirely opposed to the operation of traps at Sooke. I ask the minister to reconsider the amendment offered by the hon. member, which at least contains a loop-hole for the minister, in that it asks that they remain this year, but that notice be given that no traps will be allowed next year in the strait of Juan de Fuca.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman, I should like to remind the minister and the members of the committee that this somewhat vexed subject was considered some two years ago by the standing committee on marine and fisheries. The resolution which was referred to that committee reads:

> That the question of the advisability of the government issuing trap fishing licences in British Columbia waters be referred to the standing committee on marine and fisheries for study and report.

In other words, that the committee deal with the whole question of whether or not there should be traps, not only in the Sooke area but anywhere on the Pacific coast. The committee held fourteen sittings and heard several witnesses including representatives of the Department of Fisheries, the trap owners and the fishermen. I quote from the report:

> In considering this question the committee has had in view the great importance of the salmon fishing industry in British Columbia waters, and the necessity for the conservation of the fish supply, the preservation of the quality of the pack and the furnishing of the greatest measure of employment.
> Further, being satisfied of the great need for conservation of the fish and the avoiding of all wanton and useless destruction of this great food resource, your committee recommends that the Department of Fisheries continue to work in cooperation with the authorities in the United States with such object in view.

Right here let me say that I think the Department of Fisheries should know exactly what is being done in the state of Washington. If they have not kept in touch with the situation they should be censured. They should find out at once what the position is. The committee then went on to say:

> We also submit the following recommendations:
> 1. That no more trap licences be granted in British Columbia waters except in the so-called Sooke area, and concerning which we are unable to come to a decision as to whether they should be continued or not, without the opportunity of securing further information.

I think the minister will agree that in principle the committee were against fish traps. They felt that there should be no fish traps on the Pacific coast and there was strong feeling against them in the Sooke area. The committee then went on to recommend:

> 2. That, if the said traps are allowed in the so-called Sooke area, the licence fee for each trap be $500 per annum for each trap licence, commencing with the year 1937.
> 3. That an opening of suitable size be made in the lead of such traps in order that the fish may have a better opportunity of passing on towards the spawning grounds when the trap is closed.

4. That the department should be careful to see that the regulations providing for the closing of traps in use, for forty-eight hours per week, be rigidly enforced, and that the traps be subject to the same regulations as regards opening and closing seasons as prescribed for all varieties of fishing under the Fisheries Act and regulations.

5. That all inspectors or guardians employed by the Department of Fisheries be independent of all fishing companies or fishing plant owners.

6. That for the next year or two the check made in connection with the catch, as well as the escapement of sockeye and other varieties of salmon in the Sooke area be made with great care and detail so that the records expressed in both cases and numbers may be as accurate as possible.

That was the unanimous finding of the committee. Two years have passed, and I suggest that at the present time the government should know just what is the position in that area.

Personally I think the traps should be abolished. I do suggest to the minister that the question should not be left in the air. The government have the power by regulation to prevent the use of traps to-morrow, and I submit that the problem should not be allowed to drift along any further. Apparently there has been nothing done in the last two years. If anything has been done, the minister should explain to the committee to-night just what steps have been taken. If the government will not act now to stop this fishing by traps, I suggest that they at least send this bill to the marine and fisheries committee this year for consideration in detail.

Mr. PELLETIER: Mr. Chairman, I desire to associate myself with the hon. members who have already spoken on this question. I was a member of the committee which considered this matter, and I feel it is necessary that our stand should be made quite clear. Although we may not know very much about the technical details of fishing traps, there is a principle involved that should not be ignored. It is quite clear that licensing to operate these fishing traps must to a certain degree discriminate against the fishermen of British Columbia. Although we are not so much concerned with the technical details of these traps, we do insist as a matter of principle that the government should live up to the policy laid down by the minister in 1936, and I join with other members in urging the minister to state clearly and definitely why he has found it necessary to change the attitude he took in 1936. As a member of the committee I desire to take this opportunity to make it plain that I am in entire support of the attitude taken by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and other hon. members who have spoken, because there is a principle involved, the protection of the fishermen of British Columbia.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, since the introduction of this bill into the house I have been tempted many times to rise in my place on a question of privilege to draw attention to an outbreak of a peculiar disease in British Columbia. One form of this disease it is quite true is endemic everywhere among fishermen, wherever one type of fisherman finds himself in competition with another type. The gill netter gets a fever the moment he experiences contact and competition with the purse seiner, and both of them are very much disturbed when they have to come into competition with a trawler.

But this particular disease which is rampant in British Columbia is epidemic; every type of fisherman appears to be in a state of fever against one particular type, and it is that to which I want to draw attention.

Fishermen, their whole families and friends, will join together and become afflicted with this disease, infected from one to the other. The strange thing about this peculiar disease is that it creates high fever, foaming at the mouth, and an absurd desire to run around signing petitions whenever the word "Sooke" or "fish-traps" is used. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this disease should be called "fishtrapitis." Though it is not a very infectious disease, it does have allergic reactions, and I have noticed in British Columbia that a group of woodworkers in the centre of Vancouver island who know nothing about fishing except that a few of their number take to fishing during the season —this group of woodworkers, affiliated with the International Woodworkers of the World, a communist guided Committee of Industrial Organization, have suddenly caught the fever and babbled against the hon. member for Nanaimo in a way in which they would not have attempted to do had they realized his attitude towards organized labour.

The whole trouble is that people not connected with the fishing industry have also become suspect. The people in the interior of British Columbia find themselves suddenly seized with fever the moment they hear the word "trap." To many people "trap" has a sinister sound. They cannot recognize the similarity between the word "trap" and the word "net." It has a sinister connotation in their minds, and they are consequently apt to become infected with this peculiar disease. As a matter of fact, they pity the poor fish and try to put themselves in its place, and by considering the tragic death of these fish in the Sooke fish traps they lament that the fish should come to the dinner table from that direction.

The whole thing is something that has to be taken very lightly. The light of truth must be brought into this whole matter, and the breezy air of a common sense understanding of the situation must solve this question and bring relief to this terrible fever. But we have had this thing so often, one time after another, that I want to refer to a petition that was introduced into the house at this time last session.

As reported at page 683 of Hansard for last year the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) presented a petition signed by one man and 9,594 other persons. If every item in this petition were true, we should have to take serious account of it; but I submit, Mr. Chairman, that many statements in this petition are exaggerated just sufficiently to make an emotional and effusive appeal, and I said so at the time.

The petition begins in poetic fashion:

Since time immemorial large runs of sockeye salmon have passed the southwest coast of Vancouver island thence passing into American waters in Puget sound and then back to Canadian waters to spawn in the Fraser river.

From time immemorial! These people know exactly that since beyond living memory these fish have been doing this thing. As a matter of fact, the Fraser river is a comparatively young river, geologically speaking, and we do not yet know how the spawning of fish in the Fraser river acquired the peculiar conditions attaching to it which we know to-day. The petition goes on:

That for many years we have maintained in the neighbourhood of Sooke on the southwest coast of Vancouver island four or five fish traps and the Americans maintained in their waters in Puget sound several hundreds—

That is not correct.

—with the result that our percentage of the joint catch of that run would run about 30 per cent, while theirs would be 70 per cent.

That, three years ago, the Americans took out all their traps in Puget Sound numbering 219, while we retained ours, with the result that our proportion of the joint catch jumped from 30 to 50 per cent and even 80 per cent.

I want to challenge those statements definitely. Much of the material which I have obtained for the refutation of these claims of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and his other friends are found in official records, the Department of Fisheries report 1937-38, and bulletins of the Department of Fisheries, Washington, Nos. 37 and 38.

The moment this matter was brought up in the house I referred it to Mr. Charles F. Goodrich, president of the Sooke Harbour Fishing and Packing Company, Limited, and I told him that if he had any matter to bring before me he should do so immediately. I did not do this to bolster up a monopoly. I did it to acquaint a gentleman conducting a legal business in British Columbia with the conditions that were obtaining in this house as concerned his business. Therefore, if I make quotations from the letters that he has sent me, I trust it will be understood that I personally believe every statement to be correct, and in any event they are open to the judgment of hon. members. He states:

As to Puget sound having sacrificed 219 pound nets, it should be understood that this number represents the number of licences issued, not the number of trap nets or pound nets actually in operation. Under the state of Washington regulations, it was only necessary to construct a trap net once in every four years. Consequently there were always many more licences issued than trap nets operated. In 1934, the last year traps operated there, there were some 215 licences issued and about 75 traps actually operated.

For the sake of accuracy, therefore, we should use the number 75 instead of 219.

Were the statements included in Mr. Neill's question correct, can anything be more absurd than to suppose that the continuation or the discontinuance of the five traps at Sooke would be any material factor in deciding the question in the state of Washington of whether they do or do not amend their Initiative No. 77?

Now, then, as to the question of thirty per cent having crept up to fifty and even eighty per cent, as has been repeatedly stated by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, let me quote from official sources showing the pack of Fraser river sockeyes caught in Fraser river, Sooke trap nets, and Puget Sound for the years 1935, 1936, 1937 and 1938:

Pack of Fraser River Sockeyes Caught in Fraser River, Sooke Trap Nets and Puget Sound

* Pack—regardless where caught; † pack—regardless where canned.

We have had the plaints and the complaints of hon. members here that the Sooke traps are absolutely destroying the sockeye fish for the Fraser river. Nothing could be more ridiculous in face of the actual figures presented.

A great plaint has been raised that if we give the United States the chance to put in traps again, they will not hesitate to do so and take back from us eighty per cent. But there is at present an international sockeye commission, a fact-finding commission intent on discovering—

Mr. HANSON: And they have recommended the abolition of traps.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): —the actual circumstances surrounding the passing of sockeye salmon from the waters of the north Pacific.

Mr. HANSON: The hon. member knows nothing of what he is talking about.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity of speaking when I have finished.

Mr. HANSON: I say the hon. member does not know what he is talking about.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I should be glad to listen to the hon. member when I have finished. That fact-finding commission is at present gathering facts for the purpose of making recommendations in connection with the rehabilitation of the salmon industry on the Pacific coast, and any interference with their activities can only prejudice the case beforehand. I want to assure hon. members that very free use was made last year of the Sooke traps in tagging live salmon and setting them free in order that the commission might discover where these fish ultimately found their way.

But we come back to the petition:

The fact that we have not taken out our traps has been used and will be used as a very strong argument by the American trap owners for permission to reintroduce traps on the American side.

Let me counter that by reading a statement from Mr. Goodrich under date February 21, as follows:

We have tried to keep in touch with this situation and so far as we can learn the decision does not hinge in the slightest degree upon whether the five trap nets at Sooke are continued or not. Up to the present time they have scarcely been mentioned. It is possible, of course, that they will be mentioned, and that it will also be mentioned that the United States federal congress after thorough investigation decided that there was no good ground for discontinuing the trap nets in Alaska.

The outcome, however, does not hinge upon the action of either the Canadian fishery department or the United States congress. The governor of the state of Washington and the state supervisor of fisheries both favour the restoration of trap net fishing, at least so far as the area in which sockeyes and pinks form the principal part of the catch. The only thing which may deter them is the attitude of the purse seiners, who are seeking to monopolize the business of commercial fishing of sockeyes and pinks, and the attitude of the sport fishermen who are willing to sacrifice all forms of commercial fishing and canning in order to make Puget sound a sportsmen's resort. The strange thing about the situation in the state of Washington is that the state supervisor of fisheries clearly shows in the annual reports of his bureau that it is the trollers, not the trap nets, who have in the past taken the major part of the springs and cohoes.

Again we turn to the petition:

There is no truth in the allegation that traps are the only means by which salmon can be taken in our waters in that neighbourhood, as it has been demonstrated that it can be fished by seines, gill nets and trollers, to which the Americans would have no objection as they use the same gear themselves.

It is rather a sinister comment on this, that the hon. member for New Westminster should bring in a bill designed to prohibit the purse seiners from interfering with gill netters at the mouth of the Fraser river. The fact of the matter is, as I have already indicated, that one type of fishermen is continually fighting against the other types.

To continue the quotation:

The above refers to the sockeye run of salmon, but traps are as undesirable as regards the spring and cohoe runs. These fish are heavy in spawn making their way to their spawning ground, swimming in shoals, following the coastline, keeping in shallow water and close inshore, so that they fall an easy prey to the traps, and comparatively few get by.

And yet in 1938 only a trifle over one per cent of the total catch in United States and Canadian waters were taken by traps.

The whole fact of the matter is that it is entirely incorrect to make the statements as made in the petition. The salmon do not hug the shore. They do not run in tight shoals. They come in from the Swiftsure banks some eighteen miles away and swim along the broad line of twelve miles of open water in the strait of Juan de Fuca, and the portion that find themselves on the left hand shore are naturally closed in by the southerly reach of Vancouver island. What other conditions drive them into Puget sound waters I am not in a position to say, but if any member of this house will travel by boat in the daytime from Vancouver to Victoria he will see the amazing extent to which the fresh waters of the Fraser river penetrate into the salt waters of the strait of Juan de Fuca. It is entirely possible that the fish, recognizing that they are not yet ready for the biological urge that drives them up the fresh water rivers to the spawning grounds, keep away from the fresh water and travel down into the salt water of Puget sound, where there are not many big fresh water rivers. The petition continues:

Traps are the most destructive form of fishing known, as they are open day and night and catch every species of fish, large or small, that comes along whether they happen to be out of season or not. Nothing escapes them or gets through.

And I make this solemn declaration that there is not a single net of any kind that is free from that castigation. The purse seine catches everything it can possibly get hold of. It surrounds every fish within a certain area. Gill netters and all the others do precisely the same thing, and when we talk about immature fish, it has not yet been determined why immature fish run with mature fish. But the fact is that immature fish do run with mature fish, and, doing so, they are bound to be caught with them.

As to the Sooke traps being more destructive, I should like to find out what proportion of fish caught by the trollers leave their jaws on the hooks, having their bodies torn off by the force with which the trollers pass through the water. Trolling is known to-day as the most destructive form of hook-line fishing.

The petition states further:

The abolition of traps would lead to the revival of fishing and employment of many local fishermen as was formerly the case, but who, finding their livelihood gone, have had to find other work, often on relief.

I defy anyone to say that the community of Sooke is a relief community. These people are self-respecting workers and have been for years, many of them owning their own homes, and if every fishing community were like it we should have little relief difficulty in British Columbia.

I could warn the committee about those who act as carriers for this disease I spoke of earlier in my remarks, who consciously or unconsciously infect others, but I sincerely hope the warning is not necessary.

May I read something that has to-day come into my hands. We have been pleaded with to settle this matter, because in Washington they are now sitting to determine whether they should place traps again in the waters of Puget Sound. I quote from the Victoria Times of February 28, and lest anyone should wonder how that newspaper of February 28 could reach me to-day I will tell the committee that it was sent by air mail. It reads:

Fish Traps Voted Down in Washington.

Fate of Governor Martin's three fish bills hung in the balance to-day as a result of action of the Washington state legislature late yesterday in voting 69 to 27 to kill house bill 193, permitting return of fishing traps to the Columbia river and Willapa harbour.

The vote on the bill was regarded as a test of the legislators' attitude towards the fish measures and administration leaders to-day refused to say whether they would bring the remaining two bills on to the floor or permit them to "die en route."

Let me quote from Mr. Goodrich:

The state legislature has voted down the first of the three fish trap bills, and the other two will probably never come up at this session at least. The legislature adjourns on March 9 and will not reconvene for two years. We understand that the fact that Canada had five fish traps was deemed of so little importance that it was not even mentioned.

We have heard the plea of the hon. member that it was the one thing that would return 219 traps to Canada. I have proved that the 219 had dwindled down to seventy-five.

The action of the legislature was not a surprise. The purse seiners were well organized as were the sport fishermen, and the trap operators were very much disorganized through jealousies and petty politics.

However, now that the legislature has acted finally it is obvious that nothing Canada does either way will affect the result.

I want to read one word further before I deal with the bill. Mr. Goodrich, criticizing the statement of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, as reported on page 215 of Hansard, has this to say under date of January 30:

As a matter of fact it is safe to say that the minister does not know that the result of continuing to issue our five (not four) trap licences will be to reinstate the pound nets on Puget sound. Indeed, the precise contrary is true. The state of Washington may or may not reinstate this mode of fishing. The purse seiners of course are well organized—

This was written long before the statement in the Times of February 28.

—and are opposing the repeal or amendment of initiative No. 77 as they wish to retain the monopoly they have at present of the supply of sockeyes and pinks. However they frankly admit that their catches have dwindled since the abolition of the traps, due to the fact that the fish do not school up as well as they did when the traps were in use. For that reason they are asking permission to build dummy traps in the vicinity of Point Roberts to assist them in making better hauls.

The governor is also much perturbed over the loss sustained by the abolition of the pound nets in the way of loss of employment by fishermen and cannery workers alike.

The director of fisheries finds his department hampered through loss of revenue and is urging amendment to the act.

The cannery men have so far failed to come to any agreement among themselves as to the distribution of the licences in case the pound nets are reestablished.

Sport fishermen are as a rule opposed to all forms of commercial fishing.

It is therefore problematical what action, if any, the legislature will take; but one thing is sure, and this will be apparent to anyone discussing the matter with those most vitally interested, that whatever action they take will be based on what will best serve the interests of the state of Washington and not whether five fish traps at Sooke, B.C., are continued or not.

That I consider to be the crux of the whole situation. We have had plenty of talk about the trade agreement between ourselves and the United States. The United States is entirely justified in looking after its own interest, and Canada is entirely justified in looking after her own interests. If our interests are joint then we have done the right thing in bringing together the international sockeye commission and in being content to rely on their findings. Only by such methods of give and take can we ever reach any satisfactory conclusion on this problem. I say now, without having discussed the matter with anyone, that if it is found that Canada is receiving more than fifty per cent of the fish that come through the strait of Juan de Fuca, then arrangements must be made by which the United States shall get the same quantity as we do, unless they are willing to recognize that the Fraser river is the breeding ground of these fish, and classify the pack accordingly.

Coming to the bill itself, I find that in the seventy-six sections of the Fisheries Act every section is general and common; not a single section is particular and proper. This amendment sought to be placed in the act is a particular amendment. Provisions are made whereby the governor in council and through him the fisheries overseers have power to deal with that act as to administration. Consequently I consider that the essential feature of this amendment is out of order in its application to the general act, and for that reason I am definitely opposed to it. The matter should be left, as it was intended to be left after the finding of the standing committee on fisheries in 1937, at the discretion of the minister. If the minister will use his discretion I am perfectly satisfied. This is a legal business, and just as a department store is able to transact a great deal of business with few people, so in the general apportionment of the industry of the people, one type of fishing is less costly in the way of labour than another. If we are to destroy the fish traps it would be an excellent reason for destroying purse seines and still more for destroying trawlers and gill netters; and ultimately we should have to go back to the single hook and line, but for the fact that the sockeye salmon will not take the hook.

The CHAIRMAN: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but he has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not intend to speak on this matter. I had listened to other hon. members from British Columbia who are more familiar with fishing than I am, and who have made an excellent case against the continuance of these fish traps at Sooke. But when I heard the last speaker (Mr. Taylor, Nanaimo) refer to all who oppose fish traps as having contracted some pernicious disease, I decided that I would say a word in opposition to the traps even at the risk of being considered as one who has that disease.

The salmon fisheries of British Columbia are of great importance to that province. They are one of its natural resources. Many years before I went to British Columbia I used to see in the schoolbooks pictures showing that the rivers of British Columbia were teeming with salmon. But that is not the case to-day. A great deal of work and study has been given to the question how best the salmon fisheries in the province can be preserved. Through various causes, sometimes accidental and sometimes arising from ruthless exploitation, the salmon fisheries have been largely depleted. But in recent years vigorous action has been taken to try to re-stock the rivers of British Columbia and to make it easier for the salmon to reach the spawning grounds.

The hon. member for Nanaimo knows a great deal more about fish than I do. I do not know know whether the fish hug the shore or whether they hug anything else; but I do know that the traps at Sooke are so strategically placed as to intercept the greatest number of fish possible.

The hon. member for Nanaimo thinks hon. members may wonder how he got the Victoria Times of February 28 so quickly. He did not tell the committee that Mr. Goodrich, one of the partners in the company that operates the fish traps at Sooke, supplied him with that part of the issue of the Victoria Times. When the hon. member came to this house, I understood him to be representing not the exploiters of labour but the working fishermen who took the fish out of the sea. At that time he was not in such close cooperation with the owners and operators of the fish traps.

All the fishermen in British Columbia are opposed to the fish trap, not because of the fact that it is a trap but because it is an unfair way of fishing, because it takes an undue share of the fish, and because it operates free from regulations which other fishermen must observe. As a matter of fact, I think it was fairly well substantiated in the marine and fisheries committee a few years ago that employees of the company were appointed as inspectors to see that the rules were observed. I see no reason in the world why this one company should be given an opportunity that is not given any other company or any other individual in the fishing business in British Columbia. If the amount of fish they catch is so small, so insignificant, as the hon. member for Nanaimo would have us believe, that is no argument for keeping the fish traps in operation and fostering envy and hard feelings among the fishermen of British Columbia. Rather it is an additional argument in favour of discontinuing the traps, and I hope the minister will see his way clear to put a halt to a method of fishing which is opposed by ninety per cent of the people of British Columbia.

Mr. MICHAUD: Mr. Chairman, the importance of this matter is shown by the great interest being taken in it by hon. members representing constituencies in British Columbia. It is a somewhat complicated problem, but it is not a new one. Fish traps, so called, have existed for a long time and have been licensed by the dominion government continuously since 1904. No government and no minister of fisheries has ever wanted to assume the responsibility of exercising the discretion that he has under the Fisheries Act by refusing to grant licences when they were applied for. There are at present, as there have been during that number of years, from three to five licences. These traps which are licensed are stationary fixtures which require quite an investment. I understand that it costs $15,000 to instal each trap, and the people who have been operating these traps and supplying their fish canneries in Victoria have done so for a long period of time and have been successful in placing a superior product on the market.

It may be said that the minister, who has the discretion to refuse or grant the licences, has been protecting the vested interests. I accept either the compliment or the reproach contained in that statement. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has tried to show that I have changed my mind since assuming the responsibility which I am now discharging. I admit that I have done so. When I came to the department towards the end of 1935, I found that an agitation had been going on for some time in British Columbia seeking to remove these traps, and that the officials of the department had considered recommending that this be done. Representations were made to me; I looked over the records, and on the representations that were made and the evidence that was before me I thought they were right, so in the early part of 1936 I wrote to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni the letter which he has read this evening and which was before the committee.

In the summer of 1936, however, it was my privilege to visit British Columbia, and I attempted to become acquainted with the problems which existed on that coast, and which were new to me. I studied the various methods of fishing—trolling, purse seining, gill netting and catching fish by means of traps. I walked all over those traps; I covered the whole territory, I believe. I inquired from people in Victoria and Vancouver who I thought were capable of giving advice on the matter, and I found that the agitation arose from competition between those practising the various methods of fishing. Naturally the largest number think they are entitled to rule. The traps are operated by the capitalists, those who have invested, I understand, over a million dollars in an industry which is a credit to the country. They have kept that industry going and have developed around it one of the most creditable villages that can be found on the coast of British Columbia. I visited that village, which depends entirely upon the fish traps at Sooke. I interviewed the fishermen. I received a delegation from the returned men and another from the wives and daughters of the returned men. I interviewed the clergyman, and after listening to all the representations that could be made I came back convinced that if that industry were interfered with, the village at Sooke would have to go on relief, because they had no other means of support.

That was in the summer of 1936. When I returned to Ottawa I decided that I could not conscientiously exercise any discretion, but that I must renew the licences for 1937. In 1937 the matter was referred to a committee of this house, and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) has quoted the recommendations of the committee which have been lived up to in every instance. As recommended by the committee, the licence fee has been increased and there has been no increase in the number of licences granted. We have seen that those operating traps shall observe all the regulations, and that no employee of a company operating a trap shall be appointed as supervisor or inspector on the trap. We have kept in close contact with those interested in these traps and in the conservation, development and preservation of the fishing industry on the Pacific coast. No representations have been made which I thought were sufficient to justify me in changing my mind and refusing to grant from year to year the licences which were applied for.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has stated that when he made an inquiry in this house not long ago I replied that I had not made up my mind as to what was to be done this year. Of course I had not, because at that time no applications for the renewal of licences had been received. These licences are issued each year, and the decision in the matter is arrived at when applications are before the department. At that time no applications had been received from trap operators, and I had not made up my mind or reached a decision. That goes to show that I am not prejudiced in connection with the issuance of these trap licences.

It has been stated there is grave danger that if we continue to allow traps to be operated, the state of Washington will revert to that method of fishing. That may or may not be so. We have information that the fact that we allow five traps in our waters had no effect whatever on the decision reached on February 28 in the legislature of Washington to turn down the proposal to renew that method of fishing. No representations have been made, either officially or unofficially, by those interested in the state of Washington.

Mr. NEILL: Did the minister say that no application had been made by the state of Washington?

Mr. MICHAUD: No, I said that no representations had been made to me, either officially or unofficially, by the state of Washington.

Mr. NEILL: The minister hardly expected that, did he?

Mr. MICHAUD: No, but some hon. member, I think the hon. member for Vancouver South, asked me to state if any representations had been made since the report of the committee of 1937 had been received.

Mr. GREEN: I did not ask if representations had been made; I asked the minister to state whether or not the department had been cooperating with the state of Washington, as was recommended in the report of the committee.

Mr. MICHAUD: We have been cooperating with the state of Washington. Last year a delegation of representatives of the state of Washington and the government of the United States came to Ottawa and we had a pleasant conference. No representations were made that we should help them by refusing to grant trap licences for Canadian waters. Not long ago I had occasion to meet officials from the Department of Fisheries in the city of Washington, and no representations were made. Since then this government has appointed a commission known as the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries commission to study the best methods of conservation. One hon. member of this house, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), is a member of that commission. The commission is made up of three members from the United States, two of whom I believe, are from the state of Washington, and three Canadians. The commission has already commenced its work of studying the best methods of conserving sockeye.

Mr. MacNEIL: Has the commission jurisdiction over the types of gear used in Canadian waters?

Mr. MICHAUD: They have no jurisdiction over the types of gear used in Canadian waters, but they can make representations to their respective governments as to what they feel should be done in the matter. No representations have been made as yet by the Canadian commissioners that traps should be removed. The hon. member for New Westminster, speaking as a representative of the fishermen on the Fraser river, has stated that in his opinion these traps should be removed, but the commission as such has not made any representation to the department or to the government. I am sure the work of the commission has not advanced sufficiently to justify it making any such representation.

Further, I understand that the people operating the traps at Sooke have offered every facility to the joint commission to make a study of the effect of these traps on the conservation of our fish in the Fraser river. It has been stated that the removal of these traps would save our fish, but figures speak for themselves. The sockeye is the most valuable salmon on the Pacific coast, and the percentage of sockeye caught last year in the Sooke traps was 1·2 per cent of all the sockeye caught in the Fraser river. The percentage of sockeye caught by Canadian fishermen by other methods of fishing was 54·1 per cent, and the percentage caught by fishermen of the state of Washington was 44·7 per cent. There is not much danger that the operation of these traps will cause the destruction of our fish when the percentage of fish caught by that method last year was only 1·2 per cent.

Mr. MacNEIL: Does that percentage relate to the total pack on the Fraser river or merely to the Canadian pack?

Mr. MICHAUD: The total pack on the Fraser river. My hon. friend will understand that if it referred to the Canadian catch only, the percentage would be practically nil. After all, last season there were only 3,652 cases of sockeye salmon packed from the fish caught in these traps. Looking over the statistics, I find the percentage has not been over five per cent, except in the year 1919, and was varied from six per cent down to one per cent.

I have been told that I should exercise my prerogative and refuse to renew the licences for the operation of the traps this year. But one has only to take into consideration the effect of such action on my part, and then I think hon. gentlemen can well understand why I should hesitate. On the other hand, we have an investment of over one million dollars there made by people who have supported this community for many years. We have a community of good people depending on that industry. We have also the good name of our canned salmon fishery at stake, because these people put up the best grade of goods on the market. Then we have also the right of these people to enjoy their privileges just as other people do.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, on the facts that have been presented so far, that I cannot, just to please one set of fishermen because they are more numerous than another set, take the responsibility that I am being asked to take to-night. I have no personal interest in the matter, nor has the government any. The people who operate these traps are no friends of the government. I am looking at the question purely from the point of view of justice and equity. It is possible that some facts which I have not been able to understand or which have not been placed clearly before the government may exist; but I am sure that no one in this house who does not come from British Columbia and live close to the coast, and who is unfamiliar with the local situation, would take upon himself the responsibility of accepting this evening the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and making it the law of the country. I feel that if in the public interest these traps should be removed, more information should be given to members of the house in order to enable them to come to a decision in the matter.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that this matter be referred again to the committee on marine and fisheries; and if any sound reasons be advanced beyond what has already been advanced, there is every disposition on my part and will be on the part of the government to weigh them as carefully as possible. I would accordingly suggest that this bill be not passed in a hurry but be referred to the committee on marine and fisheries where it can be looked into thoroughly, and where every member will have an opportunity to find out the facts upon which to come to a decision in the matter. For that reason I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. NEILL: Before the chairman puts the motion, may I say a few words?

The CHAIRMAN: The motion is not debatable.

Mr. NEILL: It has not been put yet, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think the hon. member is in order, Mr. Chairman, because I understood the minister had not finished his motion.

The CHAIRMAN: I understood him to finish it.

Mr. NEILL: The suggestion of the minister to send this matter to a committee has in it this promise at least, that it gives us a further opportunity to debate the question, but I am entirely unhopeful of any good coming out of his suggestion unless the minister accompanies with it his assurance that he will take off the government whip and let the matter be discussed on its merits, and not on its political aspects.

The minister spoke about the little settlement of Sooke being put out of existence. That is not so. The employees of that company signed the petition. It is admitted to be signed by them all, containing forty-one signatures. They include the employees of the cannery as well as the trap fishermen, about half and half. But the cannery will go on, even if the traps are taken out, so the men absolutely thrown out of employment would be from twenty to twenty-five people employed on the traps. But it would take two hundred fishermen to fill their place using seines and gill nets, and so these twenty men will easily and readily get more extensive employment.

I do not want Hansard to go out to-morrow without some word of contradiction or correction of the remarks of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Taylor). I want the committee to know what we in British Columbia understand, but which the committee generally does not, that Mr. Goodrich, the gentleman from whose statements he quoted so fully—he practically read his letter—was one of the partners in this transaction, and naturally his statements are very, very much ex parte statements. I could make even better statements than Mr. Goodrich made if I were going to lose $35,000 a year graft. I would certainly make a better stab at it than that. The committee saw how quickly the hon. member for Nanaimo got his information. It came here in only two days' time. He is simply the mouthpiece of that gentleman.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I am here representing the people of British Columbia of the federal electoral district of Nanaimo, and the whole of the citizens of Canada, and if I cannot see the justice of my case I do not want to be heard. If the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is going to make insinuations, then I am going to oppose him definitely and directly.

Mr. NEILL: I do not know if that is a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I attended a meeting of fishermen in the constituency of the hon. member, and I had a little difficulty in persuading them not to burn the hon. member in effigy.

I was going to say about Mr. Goodrich that he is a party to the deal; he is one of the partners, and he swore before our committee two years ago that he paid income tax every year over a period of nineteen years; it might have been twenty-nine, which suggested, because you know a man's income tax gives a vague idea of his income, that he must have been getting an income of $30,000 a year net profit. Some member of the committee, not myself, asked him what his total investment in the company was, and he swore it was $24,800 altogether, and the gentleman who had asked the question sat down with the remark, "Kind of sitting pretty, aren't you?"

Just to finish up the record of the hon. member for Nanaimo, I might quote a letter. I quoted it before, but there are new members here. It is a letter that he himself wrote. It is a record of the house, brought down in correspondence, and cannot be denied, although the hon. member tried to deny it in the committee. I shall not read it all, but I shall read the pertinent part.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Again I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I did not deny that letter.

Mr. NEILL: I will refer the committee to that Hansard record wherein hon. members will find that he did seek to deny it and I said, "Here is the record," and he spent the remainder of the sitting trying to explain it away. I will read it. He does not deny it now. It was addressed to one of these men at Sooke who had evidently written to him protesting against the traps being stopped, at the moment that the government and the minister had ordered the traps stopped:

> You see, therefore, that the anomaly of the trap situation at Sooke must be grappled with from the general public interest. If the Sooke traps are allowed to remain, excellent excuse can be advanced by the United States fishermen for the reestablishment of American traps.

That is not I saying that, that is the hon. member who has been talking ex parte for Goodrich this evening.

> The Sooke workers appear to be falling between two stools, and I say in all kindness there is no commercial justification for my advancing any arguments to destroy the position taken by the fisheries department.

At that moment they were against traps. Now listen to this:

> They are—

That is the fisheries department.

> —manifestly doing their plain duty when they protect the larger interest in the community, and it would appear—

That is his remark.

> —that the economic necessity of 48 men at Sooke cannot weigh against the economic necessity of 5,000 fishermen definitely affected by the elimination of the trap system.

"Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings hast Thou ordained strength," says Scripture. Out of the mouth of the hon. gentleman himself have I condemned his argument this evening.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I do not deny that letter. That letter was the reply to the Sooke community, pointing out that the minister had made his decision to eliminate the traps. It was a fait accompli, and as such I had to justify the condition. But when I went into the whole situation afterwards and discovered that there was a real reason for this; when I found that it was a legitimate business acting in a legitimate way under the regulations of the government, I turned right round and acted for the Sooke community and for the Sooke traps—

Mr. NEILL: "Turned right round" is right.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): —not caring one whit whether they burned my effigy in Nanaimo or anywhere else. If I have an opinion about a thing, anyone is welcome to know it, and my opinion about the Sooke traps is that they are filling a real purpose in the community of Sooke and in the industrial and commercial life of British Columbia. If they are doing wrong it is up to this parliament to see that they do right. If the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) is not acting according to the instructions given to him; if the governor in council has not told him things concerning this business which ought to be corrected, then it can still be done. But I understand that all the regulations imposed against this company have been kept. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has always adopted the argumentum ad hominem, and I detest it. I want to tell him here and now that it is not good business to use it. If he cannot argue about the thing itself, then let him leave the argumentum ad hominem alone.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I protest. Only two languages, English and French, may be used in this house.

An hon. MEMBER: And Scotch.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): If and when I am privileged to sit in the house as long as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has done, I hope I shall be equally facile in the use of my tongue, but I do hope above all things that I shall use my arguments against the thing itself and not against members of the house.

Progress reported.

Mr. Michaud moved that the bill with the amendment (Mr. Neill) be referred to the standing committee on marine and fisheries.

Motion agreed to.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

AMENDMENTS TO BROADEN SCOPE AND CLARIFY CERTAIN FEATURES OF THE ACT

The house resumed from Friday, February 10, consideration in committee of Bill No. 13, to amend the Food and Drugs Act—Mr. Power—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 2—"Medicine," "cosmetic," "manufacture."

Mr. POWER: On the last occasion on which this bill was before the house, some objection was taken to a number of clauses beginning with clause 2. The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Taylor) was not quite satisfied with the definition of "medicine" as found in section 2 (j). The definition as laid down in the section is:

"Medicine" means any substance or mixture of substances that may be used in restoring, correcting or modifying organic functions.

[Mr. J. S. Taylor.]

The hon. member for Nanaimo suggested that we use the word "stimulating" instead of "modifying." The officers of the department and I have had some discussion with him about it, and I understand that he now withdraws his objection to the clause and is prepared to allow it go through as it is.

With respect to paragraph (l), the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) objected to the definition of "manufacture" as meaning "manufacture for sale." On the other hand, the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) suggested the other night that the word "manufacture" should be used in its fullest dictionary sense. The reason for putting in the definition "manufacture for sale" was to permit persons engaged in scientific research to dispose of their products gratuitously in order that experiments might be carried on. I do not think we could reasonably accept the amendment of the hon. member for Essex East, who suggests that we say "manufacture for sale to the public." That would permit of manufacturers disposing of these articles direct to the medical profession without the department having any control. A large number of products which it is intended to cover by this bill are those which really need some scientific analysis, and medical men generally, particularly in the rural parts of the country, have not at their disposal the apparatus or the laboratories which are necessary for them to assure themselves that the products which they receive for distribution are absolutely non-deleterious. My technical officers advise that it is preferable that the words "manufacture for sale" be kept in the bill.

On the other hand, should I follow the advice of the hon. member for Brandon, who, as is known in this house, is a medical authority of the highest standing, I would strike out altogether "manufacture for sale" and we would be back to the dictionary definition of "manufacture," which would cover a very much wider range than is proposed to be covered by this bill. This bill, I should point out, deals with food, drugs and cosmetics. If we took "manufacture" in its dictionary sense I should be forced to inquire into the gastronomic concoctions which are made in the householder's kitchen, which, after all, would be to some extent a process of manufacture. I might even have to look into the subtle art of mixing cocktails and other concoctions of that kind which, however, pleasant they might be, would perhaps keep the department pretty busy. Under those circumstances I suggest that we allow the definition to stand as it is.

Mr. MASSEY: Has the minister received representations from various manufacturers with regard to the point on which he has been speaking?

Mr. POWER: The corner-store druggists of Canada have descended upon me to make representations with respect to section 5 of the bill, paragraphs (j), (k) and (m), and I hope to be able in a degree, probably entirely, to meet their wishes and the wishes, I am sure, of a large number of hon. members who have also been circularized by this propaganda. I do not believe, however, that there have been any serious objections to this section.

Mr. MASSEY: What degree of authority does the minister think this act gives the department in this matter?

Mr. POWER: In regard to manufacture for sale?

Mr. MASSEY: Yes.

Mr. POWER: My hon. friend is referring to the numerous letters that have been received by members of parliament protesting against undue powers of regulation being given the department. Those powers are assumed in other sections of the act. At present in the matter I am discussing the department is actually limiting itself to the control of certain articles manufactured for sale.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Some of these articles for experimental purposes might be sold to doctors, and they would be manufactured just the same.

Mr. POWER: We do control the sale to doctors and hospitals.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Regulations.

Mr. POWER: It is with respect to section 5 that the most serious objections were raised. As regards paragraph (j) I have an amendment which meets the representations made in this circular, but before I come to that I should like to revert to section 3, which was passed, in order to add a section 3A at the suggestion of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. In the course of his observations he stated that the powers conferred upon the department to make regulations were perhaps rather wide and that it might be well if all these regulations were published in the Canada Gazette. At the present time, under the Food and Drugs Act, only certain regulations with respect to a limited class of products must be published in the Canada Gazette. I stated at the time that I had no objection to all our regulations being published, and I would therefore ask the Minister of Mines and Resources to move an amendment in this regard.

Mr. CRERAR: I move.

That the bill be amended by adding thereto another section, 3A, to read as follows:

"3A. Subsection 2 of section 3 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

'(2) All regulations made under the provisions of this act shall be published in the Canada Gazette'."

Mr. BARBER: I have had some correspondence in this regard, under paragraph (b), respecting the declaration of net contents of any package containing cosmetics. What arrangements are being made with regard to cosmetics already in retail stocks throughout the country?

Mr. POWER: In order that there be no serious disturbance in business, it is provided that the act shall come into force on a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council. It is not proposed to bring it into force immediately, and I can give an undertaking that stocks now in the hands of retailers will be protected.

Mr. LAWSON: Was section 3 carried as printed in the bill?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 5—Regulations.

Mr. POWER: The first objection to section 5 was in connection with paragraph (j). The objection was raised by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens). This paragraph reads:

Providing for the licensing of manufacturers of cosmetics specifying such terms and conditions as may be deemed advisable in the public interest and prescribing a tariff of fees to be paid for any such licence.

The hon. member for Kootenay East suggested, very properly I think, that there should also be some control over importers. Whatever control we have over Canadian manufacturers should be extended to other manufacturers, and in order to meet his suggestion I have had an amendment prepared, that this paragraph be amended by inserting after the word "cosmetics" in the twenty-ninth line the following:

whether such manufacturers carry on business as such within or without Canada.

The paragraph would therefore read:

(j) providing for the licensing of manufacturers of cosmetics, whether such manufacturers carry on business as such within or without Canada, specifying such terms and conditions as may be deemed advisable in the public interest and prescribing a tariff of fees to be paid for any such licence.

Mr. CRERAR: I move that amendment.

Mr. LAWSON: I understand that the minister has an opinion from the Department of Justice. Possibly it is not on the point I am about to raise. I cannot hold up the section unless I raise it here. By that amendment the minister is purporting by order in council to require a foreign subject carrying on business in a foreign country to take out a licence in Canada. Now it is not sale that you are licensing; you are licensing the manufacture. To me it is an unheard of thing for any parliamentary jurisdiction to undertake to do that beyond its own territorial limits. Such a suggestion is anathema to my legal mind.

Mr. POWER: My own opinion was absolutely that of my hon. friend. I suggested to my officers that we add the word "importers"; in fact that was the suggestion of the hon. member for Kootenay East. But the officers of my department were not quite satisfied with the word "importers" because they feared that some injustice might occur, in that an importer might have a fairly good sized shipment of valuable cosmetics in his possession and for some reason we would turn them down because they had not satisfied all our requirements in regard to health. So they said, "We had better licence the foreign manufacturer." I could not quite agree with that view and suggested that the matter be referred to the Department of Justice. I have received from them a pretty long opinion, which perhaps I had better read into Hansard because, as I say frankly, I am not quite convinced myself. But as the Department of Justice is the legal adviser to the government and, therefore, to all departments, I suppose I must accept its opinion. The statement reads:

To eliminate any doubt that parliament intended paragraph (j) to extend to manufacturers without as well as within Canada, I would suggest that there be inserted in the paragraph after the word "cosmetics" the words "whether such manufacturers carry on business as such within or without Canada."

The words of the amendment.

I am given to understand that if the power contained in paragraph (j) set out in section 5 of the bill be given, resultant regulations, following the practice of your department in other similar matters, will require the label attached to the article to carry the licence number of the manufacturer. If so, any articles not so labeled will be misbranded within the meaning of the act by virtue of paragraph (g) of section 7 of the act. Section 10(3) prohibits the admission into Canada for use as a food or drug of any article seeking customs entry of import which is reported to be misbranded. I am further given to understand that the close cooperation enjoyed by your department on the part of the customs authorities assures, as far as can be reasonably expected, the prevention of admission into Canada of articles of food or drug misbranded within the meaning of the act.

I may say in passing that we have that close cooperation, and we do check a large number of importations at the border.

I gather from the discussion on pages 830-831 of Hansard—

That is the point raised by the hon. member for Kootenay East.

—that those questioning the proposed paragraph desire to see the legislation cover articles of foreign manufacture as adequately as it covers those of domestic manufacture. In my view the proposed authority to license foreign as well as domestic manufacturers of cosmetics coupled with the provisions of the Food and Drugs Act above referred to and the cooperative effort of the customs authorities will not only prevent admission of misbranded goods into Canada but will furnish to the department authority to require and secure information as to ingredients that an importer, other than the manufacturer, is not in a position to give.

So far as power to license foreign manufacturers is concerned, Canada's right to say what shall come into the country indubitably carries with it the power to set down conditions under which a given article shall enter. Consequently I think that adoption of paragraph (j) as set out in section 5 of the bill, changed as above suggested, would vest power in the department to license foreign as well as domestic manufacturers of cosmetics.

That is signed by the acting deputy minister of justice. In face of that opinion I do not think I can do much except propose the amendment which I have proposed.

Mr. MANION: Does that mean that the foreign manufacturer would apply for a licence?

Mr. POWER: He would have to. As a matter of fact, I am informed by the officers of the department that with respect to drugs they very often do. In fact, they even go so far as to allow us to visit their factories. The point is that unless the package is properly branded with the licence number of the manufacturer it could not come in here at all. Apparently the officers of my department and the justice department are satisfied that this will be an effective way to prevent foreign manufacturers or importers from obtaining an advantage in this market, and with that I have to be satisfied.

Mr. LAWSON: I speak just from having heard that opinion read once. Down to the last sentence or two I can readily agree with the opinion, and I assume that the minister as a lawyer could also do so, namely, that by a back-handed method you can force a foreign manufacturer to come to you of his own volition and ask for a licence. But that opinion winds up by saying that by putting those words in that paragraph of this act you vest in the department power to license a foreign manufacturer.

Mr. POWER: It does not quite say that.

Mr. LAWSON: Even though it be the opinion of the Department of Justice, with great respect I wish to record my disagreement with that opinion, because I dislike to see something going on our statute books which I am firmly convinced will not stand up in the courts.

Mr. POWER: The criterion, I suppose, is that they think it is going to work.

Mr. LAWSON: I think it will, by a back-handed method.

Amendment (Mr. Crerar) agreed to.

Mr. POWER: There is another amendment, to paragraph (k).

Mr. LAWSON: The amendment to paragraph (j) is carried, but not paragraph (j) itself. I want to ask the minister something before paragraph (j) is carried.

The CHAIRMAN: Paragraph (j) was carried.

Mr. LAWSON: No, it was just the amendment that was carried.

Mr. POWER: Go ahead.

Mr. LAWSON: What I am getting at is that, as the minister said, quite a number of letters of protest were received in regard to the extraordinarily wide powers—

Mr. POWER: That is under paragraphs (k) and (m).

Mr. LAWSON: I was going to ask the minister, when we come to them, to tell us his views in connection with that matter and whether he proposes any changes by reason of those representations.

Mr. POWER: I do; I am now about to move an amendment. I will read one of the letters, which is the type of letter sent; they were nearly all the same. It says:

> Paragraph (k) gives the governor in council the power to make regulations "prohibiting the sale or defining the conditions of sale of any substance . . . etcetera." Now since the adjective "any" is used, regulations could at any time be passed by orders in council prohibiting the sale of a substance which is quite harmless, just as one could when it is dangerous.
> The explanatory notes accompanying this section give as the reason for this inclusion in the bill "certain substances . . . may be dangerous to life." We therefore desire that the words "dangerous to life" be inserted immediately following the word "substance" in this paragraph, or if preferred, "deleterious to health" could be inserted.

I am not proposing to insert the words "dangerous to life" except perhaps in conjunction with something else. I might be obliged to go to the graveyard to prove my case, and I do not want to wait until someone is dead in order to be able to say a substance is dangerous to life, but the amendment I am proposing would be "which may be injurious to health when used as a food or drug," which will come to the same thing. If any hon. member wished to insist on the words "dangerous to life" I could add them, but it would not be of much value. But I must at least keep the words "injurious to health." It would be impossible to operate the act as efficiently as we should like if the criterion were to be that something was dangerous to life, as that would be difficult to prove in any court unless someone actually died, and I do not think it is the intention of this committee that we should allow the manufacturers of these products to go ahead making guinea-pigs of the people of Canada until a fatality occurs. So I think, by the amendment which I have asked my colleague to move, I have met the objections which have been suggested; in fact I have practically adopted the phraseology suggested in all these letters.

Mr. LAWSON: "Injurious to health" seems satisfactory.

Mr. POWER: It seems as good as "deleterious to health." So I would ask my colleague to move that paragraph (k) be amended by inserting after the word "substance" in the thirty-fourth line thereof the words "which may be injurious to health when used." The section would then read:

> (k) prohibiting the sale or defining the conditions of sale of any substance which may be injurious to health when used as a food or drug or restricting in like manner its use as an ingredient in the manufacture of food or drug;

Mr. CRERAR: I so move.

Mr. KINLEY: Why say "may be injurious?" Why not be definite?

Mr. POWER: There are many things about which we are not quite sure. Since I have not my technical advisers before me, perhaps my hon. friend the leader of the opposition

(Mr. Manion) would tell me if I am right in my medical terms, but I think there was a glycol substance which we refused someone the right to use in flavouring extracts because we feared it might be injurious. While negotiations were going on and I was being bombarded with representations about it, two people, one in Nova Scotia and one somewhere else, died as a consequence of using this substance. Well, at the time the officers of the department were not in a position to prove that this substance was injurious, but the deaths indicated it definitely was. I think we should be given some leeway, because with the advance of science we cannot say definitely that these substances are dangerous, but we may have reason to suspect that they are.

Mr. MANION: I think that is true; I think the matter should be left open.

Mr. KINLEY: There is this about it. You say "a substance which may be injurious to health." Why not say "a substance that is injurious to health"? Some substance might be injurious in one instance and not injurious in another.

Mr. LAWSON: Is that not the very reason why there must be some discretion left with the officials? This section merely gives power to prohibit by order in council the use of something which may be injurious to health. In other words, they may wish to prohibit the use of this glycol product in an edible food and not prohibit it in something else.

Mr. POWER: In antifreeze, for instance.

Mr. LAWSON: I think we have to leave them some discretion.

Amendment (Mr. Crerar) agreed to.

Mr. POWER: Representations were also made with regard to paragraph (m). I am reading now from one of these circulars I received:

> Paragraph (m) as it reads would allow the regulation of any claim whatsoever. We desire that the words "false, exaggerated or misleading" should be inserted before the word "claims," as this is obviously the intent of this clause, and we do not feel that power should be given to prohibit true statement of fact.

I will ask my colleague to move that paragraph (m) be amended by inserting after the word "respecting" in the forty-first line thereof the words "false, exaggerated or misleading," and deleting in the same line the words "which may be made."

Mr. CRERAR: I so move.

Mr. MANION: What is the purpose of taking out the words "which may be made"?

Mr. POWER: I think it is better English. If it is a claim it must be made in some way or another, in writing, verbally or otherwise.

Mr. BARBER: Who determines that this is misleading; the officials of the department?

Mr. POWER: I would imagine so.

Mr. LAWSON: If it came to court there might be a question. If it were not misleading the department would have no power.

Amendment (Mr. Crerar) agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 6—Department may require declaration by manufacturers.

Mr. POWER: I think this section was held over in consequence of the discussion with the hon. member for Kootenay East in regard to manufacturers and importers. The section reads:

> The department may order that the manufacturer of any article of food or drug shall furnish a declaration in prescribed form asserting that the article in question—

And so on. It also states that if importation is sought, a similar declaration will be obtained. I think, in view of the amendments to the previous section, this section might carry now.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Offence.

Mr. POWER: The hon. member for Vancouver South thought the section as drafted was possibly a little too wide. I am inclined to agree with him. Section 32A, which is the offence section, reads:

> Every person shall be guilty of an offence under this act who advertises any food or drug in a manner which is in any respect misleading—

My hon. friend thought the words "in any respect" should come out, and I am quite willing to meet him in that respect. I will ask my colleague to move that section 7 be amended by deleting the words "in any respect" in the twelfth line thereof.

Mr. CRERAR: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. LAWSON: What is the penalty prescribed for an offence under the act?

Mr. POWER: Section 23 of the Food and Drugs Act itself reads:

> Every person who by himself or his agent or employee manufactures for sale, sells, offers for sale or exposes for sale, any article of food or any drug which is adulterated or misbranded, shall be guilty of an offence, and . . .

liable upon summary conviction to a fine not exceeding two hundred dollars and costs, and not less than fifty dollars and costs, or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three months, or to both fine and imprisonment, and for each subsequent offence to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars and costs and not less than fifty dollars and costs, or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months, or to both fine and imprisonment.

Mr. LAWSON: That is for that particular offence, but in section 32A you are prescribing an offence for which there is no penalty. I am wondering whether there is a general penalty section in the act.

Mr. POWER: I am quite sure there is, though I cannot point it out at the moment. I am under the impression that it is section 32, which says:

Every person who

(a) attaches to any article or package of food or drug sold or offered or exposed for sale any label or mark containing any untrue or misleading name, device or statement; or

(b) neglects or refuses to label or mark any article or package of food or drug in accordance with the requirements of this act; shall for a first offence be liable, upon summary conviction—

Mr. LAWSON: That makes it a rather dangerous section, because it reads, "every person shall be guilty of an offence under this act who advertises any food or drug in a manner—"

Mr. POWER: There is another section which I have found now. Section 33 states:

Any person failing to observe any requirement of this act for which a specific penalty has not been provided shall for a first or subsequent offence incur in each case the penalty provided in section twenty-seven of this act.

Then section 27 provides for a fine not exceeding $200 and costs and not less than $50 and costs.

Mr. LAWSON: Fifty dollars is a rather large minimum fine for doing anything "likely to create erroneous impressions regarding its value, composition, merit or safety." "Puffing," using the word in the legal sense, for purposes of sale would be an offence under this act. We are getting away from the old maxim of caveat emptor. I do not like that kind of legislation.

Mr. POWER: This is the last section of the bill.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacNEIL: Will the Minister of Pensions and National Health proceed to-morrow with his bill to amend the Pension Act, or will he allow it to stand until a decision has been reached with regard to other recommendations of the organized ex-service men?

Mr. POWER: I shall not be bound by any suggestions, but I shall not go on with the bill to-morrow.

At 11.05 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, March 3, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

LOAN OF $750,000,000

TO MEET LOANS OR OBLIGATIONS, TO PURCHASE UNMATURED SECURITIES, AND FOR GENERAL PURPOSES

The house resumed from Thursday, February 16, consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Sanderson in the chair:

That the governor in council be authorized to raise by way of loan under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, an amount not to exceed in the whole the sum of seven hundred and fifty million dollars for paying or redeeming the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada, and also for purchasing and withdrawing from circulation unmatured securities of Canada, and for public works and general purposes.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the resolution because I am opposed to the financial policy of this government, a policy which in my opinion is forcing the people of this country further and further into debt, resulting in increased taxation and a steady lowering of the standard of living of the people.

Some members appear to believe that the present system has operated satisfactorily in the past and that there is no reason why it cannot continue to operate satisfactorily in the future. But, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Landeryou) the other day, the present system is a debt-creating system, and so long as we operate under it our debts are bound to increase steadily until eventually our fixed debt charges may well be in excess of our total revenue.

What is the result of this system? In the field of physical accomplishment it is no doubt one of which we may well be proud. But in the economic field it is one which must be a matter of concern to every thinking individual. The record of the present system has been that of building up enormous unrepayable debts, federal, provincial, municipal and private, resulting in default on bonds and mortgages, in bankruptcies and wholesale cancellation of debt, this very often taking place in the face of tremendous self-denial and long hours of overtime on the part of the people. Perhaps the greatest condemnation of the present system is that it creates an artificial scarcity in the face of potential abundance, and restricts production in the face of actual want, thus causing starvation and destitution.

We find many people in their smug complacency telling us that the system has operated satisfactorily in the past. I would say that the present system is a dishonest one; because what moral right have we to mortgage the production of future generations? What right have we to place a debt against unborn generations? To my mind the present financial system is nothing more or less than a gigantic racket, wherein the Minister of Finance has been placed in the position of acting as a collector for these financial racketeers. We are told that this system is highly efficient and that it has operated satisfactorily, but I would say, satisfactorily from whose point of view? From that of the bankers, certainly. But a system which has operated so as to force the people of this country steadily further and further into debt can hardly be considered from their point of view a satisfactory system.

The motion is——to raise by way of loan under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, an amount not to exceed in the whole the sum of seven hundred and fifty million dollars for paying or redeeming the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada, and also for purchasing and withdrawing from circulation unmatured securities of Canada, and for public works and general purposes.

We are opposed to the policy of the government as exemplified by this resolution, because we feel it is a policy which is largely responsible for the poverty that exists throughout the country; and it is our intention to move an amendment. I had hoped that this amendment would have been moved before I spoke, but it will be proposed, after I have finished, by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Landeryou).

We hear a great deal about the dangers of communism and fascism. The greatest protection against communism or fascism is a happy and contented people. Both these "isms" thrive on discontent, and discontent is rife from one end of this dominion to the other. The failure of this government to bring about any really progressive policy is responsible, more than any other single factor, for the growth of fascism and communism. For several years we have been told that the major problem is unemployment. The Bank of Canada report points out that unemployment must be regarded as a long-term problem. But I would point out that employment is merely a means to an end; that end is economic security for the people. The real problem therefore is not so much one of employment as of providing social security for the people.

Have we any reason to believe that this resolution will help to bring social security to the people? I am afraid that all we can expect is that it will help to bring about better conditions of a temporary nature, but eventually it must mean an increase of debt, resulting in more poverty. For generations the best brains of the world have been endeavouring to find ways and means by which the productivity of mankind could be increased, and to-day we have at last reached the position where we have actually created a surplus productive capacity both of man-power and of machine-power. We have emerged from an era of scarcity into one of abundance. We have now reached the stage where it is not only possible but logical that the people of this country should be able to enter an era of greater leisure. It is a picture of which we might well be proud. But what do we find? We find at the present time the Minister of Labour pitting his puny weight against the combined brains of the scientists. They on the one hand are making it possible for more and more people to be relieved of the heavy and long toils of labour; he on the other hand is trying to put more men back to work. Unquestionably he is fighting a losing battle, and I would say it is a good thing that he is, because his policy is one of reaction.

What is the situation in Canada to-day? We have a great productive plant in the form of factories, farms and mines, working at only a small percentage of their capacity; great natural resources barely tapped; great reserves of energy, a large surplus of unused labour in the form of the unemployed; and, in addition, a favourable balance of payments in the neighbourhood of, I believe, $185,000,000. It is a glorious picture, and one of which we might well be proud. I suppose that if anybody who was unfamiliar with conditions in Canada were confronted with that picture he would immediately say, "Undoubtedly there cannot be any poverty in Canada; for you must be enjoying a very high standard of living". He would be justified in coming to that conclusion, because there can be no excuse for having a picture of that kind on the one side, and on the other approximately a million people on the verge of starvation, with thousands upon thousands suffering from a very low standard of living.

We hear hon. members and people outside the house criticize industry for not having more confidence, for not expanding; but how can industry expand when it is already in the unfortunate position of having difficulty in selling its products? It is true there is a large physical demand for goods in Canada to-day, but what good is that physical demand unless it is backed up by money? We therefore contend that steps will have to be taken to put money in the hands of the general consumer so that it will be possible to make that great physical demand effective against the production of the country. Until this is done it is useless to talk about industry expanding.

The reason for this condition—we have stressed it in this chamber many times, and I do not wish to labour the point—is that industry is not in a position to create, except in times of excessive capital goods construction, an effective demand for its own production. When, on March 14 of last year, I spoke in this chamber, I dwelt at some length on this subject, and I do not intend at this time to go over that field, but in passing I would merely mention what I believe are three of the main causes: (1) the practice of charging profits into prices without distributing purchasing power to pay those charges; (2) the practice of saving and the reinvestment of savings, which increases production without bringing about a corresponding increase in the effective demand of the people; and (3) the repayment of old debts, which results in a certain charge being put into prices to recover those debts, without a corresponding issue of purchasing power to pay them. As these deficiencies are occurring concurrently with production, and as production goes on continuously, it is quite obvious that a deficiency must occur continuously as well unless, as already stated, there is a certain definite volume of capital goods construction. I call that point to the attention of the Minister of Finance because when he spoke last year he said that we had absolutely ignored the question of capital goods construction; and yet when most of us have spoken on this point we have mentioned that there must be a certain definite volume of capital goods construction, or in other words you must maintain a definite relationship between capital goods construction and the production of consumption goods.

Mr. DUNNING: What relationship?

Mr. QUELCH: The very first time I spoke in this house at the first session I laid down the premise that industry could not create an effective demand for its own production unless you had a sufficient volume of capital goods construction, so that the salaries, wages and dividends paid in that production were equal to the deficiency of purchasing power that existed as between total prices of consumer goods and the purchasing power distributed in their production. You have to maintain that relationship; otherwise there will be a lag in the demand for consumer goods. It must be obvious that there is a definite limit to the amount of capital goods production, that can be carried on because there is no use in building factories if you cannot sell the goods produced by the factories already in existence.

This resolution proposes the borrowing of money for capital goods. That is a very fine thing and in that way the deficiency might be made up temporarily. But, I repeat, inasmuch as the deficiency occurs continuously with production it stands to reason that you cannot make it up by borrowing money on a permanent basis. That money will have to be issued debt free if you are ever to make up the continuously recurring deficiency. It must be obvious that borrowing money to make up a continuously recurring deficiency can only result in steadily increasing debt. If, as we have done in the past, we can have the banks create money for our use, without that action resulting in inflation, then I say that there is no reason under the sun why under similar circumstances we cannot use the Bank of Canada for the purpose of creating money without any greater danger of inflation, thereby saving the people of Canada millions upon millions of dollars in interest.

With some members the term "inflation" has become an obsession; it is like waving a red rag in front of a bull. They are afraid to feed starving people for fear that those people will eat so much that they will burst. In other words, they are afraid to give money to starving people to buy the goods that are available for fear that they will buy so many that there will be a resulting shortage. Now, we fully realize that there is a well-defined limit to the amount of money that can be issued in any period, and so long as it does not go beyond that limit there need not be any fear of inflation.

Mr. DUNNING: What is the limit?

Mr. QUELCH: The limit is the amount of money necessary to make the great physical demand of the people effective against the production of the country; that is to say, if you have on the one hand goods unsold and on the other hand people requiring those goods, you can give them enough money to buy those goods without any possible danger of inflation. There may be a danger of exploitation. Industry might say, "Seeing that there is more money in circulation we will take advantage of that fact to raise prices." But that is a matter for government control. In England during the war it was necessary for the government to exercise such control. The day that war was declared prices started to go up without any increase in the money in circulation, simply because industries wanted to exploit the people. The government therefore took action. That is not inflation but exploitation, and the government will always have to take the necessary action to avoid it if prosperity is to be brought about by an increase in money.

Some members contend that if our argument is sound the system would have crashed long ago. I would point out that the system has been kept in operation by the creation of enormous unrepayable debts, bankruptcies and unnecesary starvation. I should like to give briefly two examples to show how the system has been kept in operation in the past. First, I would take a highly industrialized creditor nation, England, and secondly, the Dominion of Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: What about Scotland?

Mr. QUELCH: This will apply to Scotland as well as England. At any rate I am going to quote a Scotsman.

Mr. REID: Be fair; call it Great Britain.

Mr. QUELCH: Very well, though he calls it England. I quote from Reginald McKenna, who I believe is a Scotsman, in a speech he made to the American Bankers' Association on October 5, 1922:

> For over two centuries British capital, that is, credit, had been lent to other countries; year by year England produced more than she either consumed herself or could exchange for the products of other nations, and she could not obtain a market for the surplus unless she gave the purchaser a long credit. Foreign loans and foreign issues were taken up in England and the proceeds were spent in paying for the surplus production. British factories and workshops were kept in good employment, but it was a condition of their prosperity that a part of their output should be disposed of in this way.

That is to say, for over two hundred years England consumed only a portion of her production.

Mr. DUNNING: Are you quoting McKenna now?

Mr. QUELCH: No, that is what I say. Reginald McKenna says that that action brought prosperity to the people, but I would point out that while that action may have brought prosperity to a certain class of society in England, nevertheless, during that period, there was terrible starvation and poverty in many parts of England. The greatest condemnation of the system operating in England at that time was the fact that notwithstanding that there were millions and millions of people upon the verge of starvation, England exported more than she imported back. She exported a certain amount and refused to accept wealth in return for it. What happened to the wealth exported abroad? It would be interesting to follow it up to see whether there was any justification for keeping millions of people on the verge of starvation while English industries shipped wealth abroad, accepting none in return.

Now let me quote from a book by P. C. Loftus, a member of parliament in England. The title of this book is A Main Cause of Unemployment, and on page 7 he writes:

> Sir Arthur Samuel, M.P. (formerly Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury in the Conservative government), writing in The Times trade supplement of the first November, 1930, states:
> "During the last sixty years fleets of ships have carried abroad millions of tons of merchandise, shown in the board of trade returns as exports, but the nation has lost an important portion of their total value. That can be proved by the fact that our surviving oversea investments prior to the war amounted to only £4,000 million. Of that amount we parted with £1,000 million owing to the war. That total ought, however, in my opinion, to be very much larger—not less than £6,000 million at the very least. Therefore, at a cautious estimate, I say we have lost not less than £2,000 million in overseas investments during the last sixty years. . . . It is not unlikely that our loss has been much heavier, perhaps even £4,000 million.

In other words, owing to the exports of wealth abroad, England lost in the neighbourhood of $16,000,000,000 worth of wealth. The people who were kept starving during those sixty years could have had available to them $16,000,000,000 worth of wealth. I would especially commend that statement to our friends on the right, because they so often tell us that it is not a question of money but of goods. There is an example—$16,000,000,000 worth of goods available to the working people of England; but what does the government do? Instead of making those goods available to the people, instead of financing consumption at home, they finance foreign consumption, giving the money to foreign nations to buy the goods that the people of their own country could not buy. England could at that time have given that money to the people of England and the people of England would have been richer by $16,000,000,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Might it not have been given in the form of wages and services?

Mr. QUELCH: I am not saying it could not. It could have been used to finance public works, but if it had been given as wages for producing goods there would have been that many more goods left unsold.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I mean higher wages and increased public services.

Mr. QUELCH: If you have higher wages you immediately increase costs; prices would rise, and the discrepancy between goods and prices would continue, unless you controlled the prices.

Mr. HAYHURST: And better homes.

Mr. QUELCH: I will refer to that. But this article in the Times supplement says—

Mr. DUNNING: Who wrote it?

Mr. QUELCH: It is an editorial in the London Times.

An hon. MEMBER: What date?

Mr. QUELCH: It does not give the date. It is quoted in this book. It must have been shortly after November, 1930, because it is a comment on this statement of Sir Samuel Martin. It reads:

> Exporting is commonly referred to as though it were a thing desirable in itself; in fact, as we have often urged, the object of exporting is to create a credit abroad that can be used for the purchase of commodities, for permanent investment abroad, or for some other purpose; otherwise it is clear that the same need would be achieved if the goods were sent to sea and sunk in the Atlantic.

Yet that action, according to Reginald McKenna, brought prosperity to England. How much greater the resulting prosperity would have been if the money had been issued in the form of wages for public works, or in dividends, so that the people could have bought those goods, instead of giving the money to foreign nations to buy the goods and then having the debts repudiated.

I quote what Loftus has to say referring to this article:

> It is difficult to bring home to the reader what this great loss of wealth has meant to the country. One may perhaps point out that all our great cities, London, Liverpool, Glasgow, Manchester, Birmingham and twenty or thirty more, could have been pulled down and rebuilt with wide streets, open spaces, parks and commodious healthy housing for all, with a portion of the wealth now as utterly lost to the nation as if, (to quote the Times,) it had been "sunk in the Atlantic."

This, I say, is a great condemnation of the system. But that is how it is kept in operation—by creating artificial scarcity in the country in which the goods are produced, and exporting to foreign nations. I contend that charity should begin at home.

I wish now to refer to what has happened in Canada under this system, going back prior to the war. Prior to 1914 there was in Canada fairly general prosperity, far better than we have now; men could always get a job. That prosperity was mainly due to the tremendous capital development that was taking place—the building of railways, highways, towns, and so on. The money so distributed in capital production was made available to the people to buy consumer goods. Prosperity was thus brought to Canada, but that prosperity was built on debt. To-day the people are being asked to pay in current prices not only the cost of production of current goods but also for the goods consumed prior to 1914. The wages, salaries and dividends paid out on current production cannot possibly by themselves pay for the production of former years, therefore the effective demand of the people against production to-day is being destroyed. The only way that can be made up is by issuing debt free money. If it is made up by borrowing, when the loan is repaid it has to be included in the price of the goods, and the same condition will result. We cannot pay debt with debt. We can transfer a debt from one place to another—

Mr. DUNNING: Will my friend permit a question there? He uses the phrase "debt free money." Does he thereby mean money which does not have to be repaid to anybody?

Mr. QUELCH: I mean money issued by the Bank of Canada; if you like it would not make any difference whether it be issued as permanent non-repayable debt, because remember—

Mr. DUNNING: Just a minute. I am asking, purely for information, whether the term "debt free money" as used by my hon. friend means interest free money, or money which does not have to be repaid to anybody by anybody?

Mr. QUELCH: I mean both—debt free and interest free. Under our proposals, if at any time too much money was in circulation, it would be taken out of circulation, either by taxation or through the price discount factor. But this is the point we make: that that money would not be taken out for the purpose of providing revenue for the government. It would be taken out in order to avoid inflation, and could be cancelled or burnt as soon as taken out. This government taxes in order to get revenue for itself; we do not believe that is necessary. This government can issue what money is needed through the Bank of Canada. If too much money is in circulation, that money can be taxed out for the purpose of avoiding inflation, but not to provide revenue. This government ties its activities down to the amount it can take from the people in taxes. The minister said that the only money available is what is taken from the people; we say that is a major factor in creating poverty, and absolutely unnecessary.

Mr. DUNNING: I am trying to get an understanding. Will my hon. friend permit me to ask—

Mr. QUELCH: If the minister will be good enough to wait, I shall be dealing at some length with the question of issuing debt free money, and probably his questions will be answered as I speak.

As I have already stated, to avoid this difficulty the Minister of Finance proposes that we must misappropriate the funds of the future. That is the only word I can use. We have no right to use the purchasing power of future generations for that purpose. What right have we to tell unborn generations: You have to pay a higher price for the goods you want in order that we may buy more goods to-day? It is rank dishonesty, a straight case of misappropriation of other people's funds.

Mr. MOORE: Order.

Mr. QUELCH: There is nothing out of order in that.

Mr. MOORE: Is the word "dishonest" a parliamentary word?

Mr. QUELCH: I am not accusing any hon. member of being dishonest.

Mr. MOORE: I think the hon. member said it was a dishonest policy.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes, absolutely, but I am not saying that any hon. member of this house is dishonest. I do not want anyone to think for a moment that I am suggesting that the Minister of Finance or anyone else is dishonest. I say we are operating under a dishonest system; that is the distinction I draw. When I attack the banking system as being a gigantic racket, I do not want anyone to think I am attacking the bankers, or accusing them of being dishonest men. I agree that the general run of bankers are as fine a body of men as any; it is not their fault that they are operating under a dishonest system. We maintain that so long as we continue to operate under this debt creating system our debts are bound to increase steadily year after year, resulting in increased taxation and increased poverty.

We therefore believe that internal expenditures can be met by national money, without any danger of inflation, provided that we are only stimulating the demands of the people up to the capacity of industry to satisfy those demands.

Last year the Minister of Finance stated that an issue of money by the Bank of Canada might cause inflation, due to the practice of the chartered banks of expanding their loans up to ten times the amount of their cash. The minister used that as an argument against the issue of money by the Bank of Canada. I ask the minister, has parliament to-day established effective control over currency and credit?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. QUELCH: The Minister of Finance answers yes. Speaking in this house on February 28, 1938, he said, as reported at page 891 of Hansard of that year:

> Parliament through instruments which it has created and which are now in operation does control currency and credit in Canada day by day, week by week and month by month.

He is still of the same opinion. It is rather strange, though, that a few days after that statement was made the deputy governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. J. A. C. Osborne, speaking before the junior board of trade of Ottawa, should say:

> No respectable central bank would accept from its government a policy with which it differed fundamentally.

In other words we control it only provided that our policy is acceptable to the Bank of Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. QUELCH: Then Mr. Osborne was not stating the facts.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no.

Mr. QUELCH: I will repeat what Mr. Osborne said:

> No respectable central bank would accept from its government a policy with which it differed fundamentally.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course any man who was asked by this government to do something which in his opinion was wrong or bad ought to get out of the service of the government rather than do it. That is what is meant by a statement of that kind. No man who was responsible and who had a due regard for his responsibilities would remain in the position of carrying out a policy which he believed to be fundamentally wrong.

Mr. QUELCH: It does not say "no respectable servant of the Bank of Canada." It says "no respectable central bank."

Mr. DUNNING: Quite; the same thing.

Mr. QUELCH: In other words the bank would need to be demolished. If he had said "no self-respecting governor or deputy governor of the bank" I would have agreed with the minister, but he said "no respectable central bank." So I do not think the argument is well founded.

Mr. DUNNING: The bank is the instrument which this parliament has created; and the bank, used in that sense, is of course the governor and other officials of the bank. It is very plain.

Mr. QUELCH: The Minister of Finance told us last evening, and he has told us again, that he considers that this government has control of currency and credit; yet last year in this house he made a statement that showed absolutely beyond any shadow of doubt that we have no effective control of the issue of currency and credit in this country. Speaking on March 8, 1938, and referring to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) that we should issue some $350,000,000 for public works, the minister said:

> An increase of say $350,000,000 in chartered bank holdings of Bank of Canada notes would increase their cash reserves from the present figure of about $250,000,000 to $600,000,000, and their cash ratio from about ten per cent to roughly twenty-four per cent.
> The sponsor of the suggestion contends that no inflation is intended or would result by thus increasing bank cash, so long as the gold cover of the Bank of Canada did not fall below the twenty-five per cent minimum. This factor, however, is not a test of inflation. If the banks use their increased cash in a normal way, as a basis for the extension of roughly ten times as much in loans to the public, or for the acquisition of ten times as much in investments, bank deposits would expand by approximately an equal amount until the cash ratio was brought down again to approximately ten per cent. This would mean an increase in bank deposits from the present level of about $2,387,000,000 to something like $6,000,000,000, or more than 2·6 times the level of December 31, 1929.

Then he goes on to say:

> Am I merely old fashioned or orthodox when I say that this would mean a colossal measure of inflation?

Mr. DUNNING: That sounds better now than it did when I said it.

Mr. QUELCH: Let us go on. The minister says we have absolute control over the issue of currency and credit. If we considered it desirable to have another $350,000,000 in circulation for public works, the Minister of Finance points out that we would not dare do that because—these are not his words—owing to the fact that we have no control over the chartered banks, they would expand that ten times over, and instead of having $350,000,000 in circulation you would have $3,500,000,000. That inflation would not result from the action of the government; it would be the deliberate result of the expansion of credit on the part of the chartered banks, which shows conclusively that we have absolutely no control over the expansion of credit by the chartered banks. I think it is high time—

Mr. DUNNING: The limit of expansion is clearly stated in the law.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes; up to twenty times their cash holdings. Every action taken by this government can be multiplied twenty times over by the chartered banks. If we issue a certain amount of money they can expand it twenty times. As I have said before, the sort of control we have in this house is like the control you would have over a high powered car with a worn out steering gear. If you gave it a little turn to one side the chartered banks would shove you into the ditch on that side. Then, if you got out of the ditch of inflation they would shove you in the ditch of deflation on the other side. It is absolutely impossible to hold this country to any definite line of action, because you always have to take into consideration the fact that the chartered banks have power to expand by ten or twenty times the amount of money we put into circulation, or to deflate by twenty times the amount we may draw out of circulation. I think it is quite obvious that to regain that control might entail quite a severe battle in this house. Is that not the very thing the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) led the people of this country to believe would be done, when after the last election he said:

> Canada is faced with a great battle between the money powers and the powers of the people, a battle that will be waged in the next parliament.

We have yet to see any sign of that battle. Personally I cannot help feeling that the Liberal party has adopted the old slogan, that he who fights and runs away will live to fight another day; and I believe it is becoming harder and harder for them to find some place to run to. I do not believe the people will be satisfied to let them run to their arms in the next election.

We believe the government should utilize the Bank of Canada to create the necessary funds to meet government expenditures, placing the full responsibility upon the Bank of Canada to see that no undue inflation occurs. That is their duty. If the chartered banks refuse to govern their actions according to the recommendations of the Bank of Canada, then steps can always be taken to enforce that action by increasing the cash reserve requirements of the chartered banks.

Now I come back to the question of the control and issue of credit. On several previous occasions when speaking in this house I have referred to what is very often described as the one hundred per cent money system.

The CHAIRMAN: I must inform the hon. member that he has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. QUELCH: Very well; I will finish this another time. It is just the question of one hundred per cent money, with which I will continue later.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, may this count as an interruption which will give the hon. member the privilege of going on for another forty minutes?

Mr. DUNNING: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me there are a great many members of this committee who may wish to speak on this matter. If you recognize a subsequent speaker who deliberately rises merely for the purpose of providing an interruption in order to permit the original speaker to continue, and who in fact so states, I submit that other speakers are being denied their right to speak. The hon. member for Calgary East was on his feet; he is straining at the leash.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I am prepared to allow the hon. member to go ahead.

Mr. DUNNING: There may be others who desire to speak.

Mr. QUELCH: Does not this all count as an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think the point raised by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) is well taken. I know there have been occasions in this house during the last few years when members who have spoken for forty minutes in committee of the whole have been notified that their time was up and another hon. member would say something not particularly relevant and immediately sit down again, after which the hon. member who previously had the floor would rise and continue. In my opinion that is out of order. The forty minute rule never provided for that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question? We are looking for information. As soon as we learn how to play according to the rules of the house, believe me we will do so. But we want to know how to do it. The Minister of Finance rose and delivered a little speech in the midst of my hon. friend's speech. Was that not an interruption by him?

The CHAIRMAN: But the hon. member who had the floor allowed the minister to interrupt. That is the course followed in debate.

Mr. BOUCHARD: It was to help him.

Mr. J. C. LANDERYOU (Calgary East): As the hon. member who has been described by the minister as straining at the leash, I shall proceed to let him know what I feel about this whole matter of finance, and about these indirect and complex financial manipulations which have so befuddled his mind that, according to his own words, the more he studies the less he seems to know.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say that at all.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The less he is sure of.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I ask for an absolute withdrawal of that statement. It is not a correct statement of what I said, and the hon. member purports to quote me. It is a well known rule of the house that he who purports to quote a member must quote him correctly, or not at all. I will stand by anything I have said, but not by what my hon. friend says I have said.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I recall that he said the more he studies the less sure he is.

Mr. DUNNING: No, I did not say that, either.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What did he say, then?

Mr. DUNNING: You will have to look it up.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The resolution we are—

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend should withdraw.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Landeryou) should conform to the rules of the house, and withdraw.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I withdraw, and accept the explanation.

The CHAIRMAN: Without reservation.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I withdraw, and accept the statement as made by the hon. member.

The resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, that the governor in council be authorized to raise by way of loan under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, an amount not to exceed in the whole the sum of seven hundred and fifty million dollars for paying or redeeming the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada, and also for purchasing and withdrawing from circulation unmatured securities of Canada, and for public works and general purposes.

I should like to know just when we borrowed this sum of $750,000,000, just how the money was spent, and whether any reserve has been set aside to retire the sum in a measurable period of time. To whom do we owe this money? Has the government any plan of eventually paying off this sum? Is there any way, outside of borrowing and taxation, of raising a fund to meet the expenditures of this government?

I am familiar with many of the promises made by the Liberal party in this regard.

An hon. MEMBER: Why don't you read your own?

Mr. LANDERYOU: At the moment I wish to refer to one of those promises. I do so because the people of Canada are becoming alarmed over the rapidly increasing burden of private, municipal, provincial and federal debt. These are the words of the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) as they were reported in the Toronto Daily Star of July 6, 1935.

Mr. MacINNIS: That was an election year, was it not?

Mr. LANDERYOU: He said:

Government control of the Bank of Canada and a reorganization of the financial structure, with reduction of interest rates should be one of the primary tasks of the Liberal party should it attain power, according to Hon. Ian Mackenzie, who left for Vancouver last night. He intends to fight his election campaign on these issues.

"The control by the government of the central bank is imperative," he said. "Once this has been regained the government, by increasing the note issue to the 25 per cent metallic coverage agreed upon by the world monetary conference, would have an additional half billion dollars which could be devoted to the reduction of the national debt. This would not be inflation," he insisted.

The Bank of Canada holds $110,000,000 in gold. By the new valuation this becomes $180,000,000. Using it as a 25 per cent, coverage, notes to the extent of $720,000,000 could be issued as against the present issue of $259,000,000.

The national debt which remains after the half billion has been paid off would be refinanced by substitution of non-interest bearing securities for the present interest bearing bond. This would unfreeze vast reserves which would then be diverted into commerce and industry, he held.

There have been occasions, and particularly during the war years, when the government and the commercial banks issued more money than they had gold in reserve. There was also an occasion when $35,000,000 was raised by the Conservative administration under the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, when the money was secured at the rate of one per cent. As I have said before, this system of money is nothing more than a system of figures which has been used to swindle primary producers, workers and others out of everything they figured on. It is nothing but a bookkeeping system. Here is an article which has reference to Great Britain:

Regarded as a warning to any trade war adversary against attacking the value of the pound sterling, Britain last week revalued the gold reserve of the Bank of England, creating a "profit" of about £100,000,000. The effect of this was to place that additional amount of gold at disposal of the exchange equalization account and give the treasury a potential cash reserve.

The authorities stressed that the revaluation had no effect on current banking or monetary policy. It was neither inflation nor deflation, simply a question of bookkeeping. This was borne out by the open market price of gold, which remained unchanged at 148 shillings 7½ pence an ounce.

The Bank of England held gold worth £126,000,000 ($589,176,000) at a statutory valuation of 84 shillings 10½ pence an ounce but the statutory price will be raised to the current market price when a bill introduced last week in parliament becomes law.

That will increase the bank's gold to a value of around £226,000,000, all of which really belongs to the government, which controls the equalization account directly and the Bank of England indirectly. It has the power to use the £100,000,000 of hitherto "hidden" gold to help finance rearmament if it is not needed elsewhere.

That simply means that by the expedient of revaluing gold, billions of dollars have been created.

I wish at this time to move:

That the resolution be amended as follows:

"Provided that the loan authorized shall be reduced by an amount equal to that portion thereof representing all payments or redemptions mentioned in this resolution which can be made in Canadian funds, and provided further that the Bank of Canada be authorized to issue debt free a sufficient amount of currency to the government for such payments or redemptions."

At this point I shall refer to a promise made not very long ago by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), when he said that any citizen had only to represent that changes should be made in the banking and currency law, and that the only body which has due authority would immediately give the matter prompt attention and efficient direction. Speaking for the Social Credit party, of which I am a member, and speaking for the tens of thousands of social crediters in Alberta and the further tens of thousands of social crediters throughout Canada and the British empire, I plead with the government and the Prime Minister on behalf of the debt ridden and poverty stricken people of this country to take immediate action along the lines he has indicated, and to fulfil the promise made by him, the Prime Minister.

Speaking last year in the House of Commons the Minister of Finance said:

I hope on some future occasion, if opportunity serves and hon. members will give me sufficient time, to demonstrate to the house that this parliament through instruments which it has created and which are now in operation does control currency and credit in Canada day by day, week by week and month by month. The only question is whether the proper methods of control of credit and currency are being used by the instruments which this parliament has created and which are under its own control for that purpose. On some future occasion I shall attempt to demonstrate that this function is being performed by the instruments which parliament created for the purpose, and that the control is real and continuous.

I hope that the Minister of Finance will seize this opportunity to demonstrate to the house just how the control of the issue of money and credit is effected in this country, and answer the questions we have asked.

Mr. DUNNING: I did that last session in a subsequent speech.

Mr. LANDERYOU: How can the minister explain away the fact that, shortly after that statement was made, the deputy governor of the Bank of Canada said that no respectable central bank could accept a policy with which it differed fundamentally?

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Is it not the duty and responsibility of parliament to declare what policy shall be carried out and what shall and shall not be done?

Mr. DUNNING: Absolutely.

Mr. LANDERYOU: And is it not the responsibility of this instrument we have created to carry out that policy?

Mr. DUNNING: Or to get out.

Mr. LANDERYOU: How are we going to get out of the mess we are in now, how are we going to reduce debt and taxation as long as we have a continuance of what I call this hoary fallacy under which we can secure money only from the pockets of the taxpayers? Is there no other way of raising money in this dominion except by debt and taxation?

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. LANDERYOU: That is the only way the minister has. But how about the Liberal promise of issuing money and credit in terms of public need? All they do is borrow credit, and not in terms of public need. There is great need in this country of increased purchasing power. "Usury once in control will wreck any nation." That is the declaration of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King).

The Prime Minister said:

Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to government . . . all talk of sovereignty of parliament is idle and futile. To regain for the nation what has been lost and to secure a properly constituted national central bank will continue to be the first objective of Liberal effort.

Usury has a strangle hold on private citizens, on municipalities, on provincial governments and on this federal government. From thirty to fifty per cent of the revenues of municipalities and of provincial governments and of this federal government goes to meet debt charges on the obligations we have incurred in the seventy-two years since confederation.

The London chamber of commerce says in respect of usury:

Humanity can have good will and peace, but it cannot have usury and peace.

Martin Luther says:

Whosoever eats up, robs and steals the nourishment of another, commits as great a murder as he who carves a man or utterly undoes him. Such does a usurer, and he sits the while on his stool, when he ought rather to be hanging from the gallows.

That will be found in Elliott on Usury, at page 71. Calvin in English Economic History, Ashley, volume 2, at page 459, says:

For if we altogether condemn usuries we shall impose severer restrictions upon consciences than the Lord himself desired; while if we make the least concession, many will use it as a pretext, and will snatch at a bridleless licence, which can never afterward be checked by any moderation or exception.

I also quote this:

The laws of King Alfred, about 900 A.D., directed that the effects of money lenders upon usury should be forfeited to the king, their lands to the lords under whom they were held, and they should not be buried in consecrated ground.

By the laws of Edward the Confessor, about 1050 A.D., the usurer forfeited all his property and was declared an outlaw and banished from England. In the reign of Henry II, about the close of the twelfth century, the estates of usurers were forfeited at their death and their children were disinherited.

His successor, Richard I, was yet more severe, forbidding the usurers attending his coronation, nor would he protect them from mob violence.

During the thirteenth century the severities against the usurers were not relaxed. King John confiscated their gathered wealth without scruples.

In the fourteenth century, under the three Edwards, the taking of interest was an indictable offence and Edward III made it a capital crime.

Attorney General Noy, in the reign of James I, thought the taking of money by usury was no better than taking a man's life. He said, "Usurers are well ranked with murderers."

Aristotle in 350 B.C. said:

Usury is most reasonably detested, as the increases arise from the money itself and not by employing it to the purpose for which it was intended.

Cato the Second, at the time of these persecutions, was asked what he thought of usury, and he replied by asking the question: What do you think of murder? That will be found in Cicero de Officiis, Peabody, book 2, section 25.

In the English Economic History, by Ashley, in part I, at page 149, third edition, we find this:

Among the canons of the great Lateran council held by Alexander III in 1179, one ran as follows: "Since in almost every place the crime of usury has become so prevalent . . . we ordain that manifest usurers shall not be admitted to communion nor, if they die in their sin, receive christian burial, and that no priest shall accept their alms." . . . "The Pope in letters to the Archbishop of Salerno and the Bishop of Piacenza, had pronounced that usurers, and even the heirs of usurers, ought to be compelled to restore their unjust gains under similar penalties."

The same authority says:

It was at another great council, that of Lyons in 1274, that Gregory X ventured to make a fresh advance in both these directions. In one he ordains that "no community, corporation or individual should permit foreign usurers,"—local usurers seem to have been under control—"to hire houses, or indeed to dwell at all upon their land, but rather should expel them within three months;" and he forbids anyone to let houses to them.

And again:

The next canon ordained that the wills of unrepentant usurers, of usurers who did not make restitution, should be without validity.

And again, from the same authority:

"We therefore decree, with the approval of this sacred council of Vienne, that whatever authorities, captains, rectors, counsels, judges, councillors or any others presume to make in future any statutes, either that debtors shall pay usury, or, that a usurer is not bound to restitution, shall incur sentence of excommunication."

Shcaff-Herzog says, "All apostolic fathers condemned the taking of usury." The Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge declares the same. Chrysostom said, "Nothing is baser in this world than usury, nothing more cruel."

Nehemiah rebuked nobles and rulers of Jerusalem for exacting usury. People had been forced to mortgage their land and vineyards and their houses to buy corn because of a dearth. Many had borrowed money to pay the king's tribute and found themselves with their sons and daughters brought into bondage. Chapter 5, verse 7, reads:

Then I consulted with myself, and I rebuked the nobles, and the rulers, and said unto them, "Ye exact usury, every one of his brothers. And I set a great assembly against them."

Also I quote Ezekiel, chapter 22, verses 12 and 13:

12. In thee have they taken gifts to shed blood; thou hast taken usury and increase, and thou hast greedily gained of thy neighbours by extortion, and hast forgotten me, saith the Lord God.

13. Behold, therefore I have smitten mine hand at thy dishonest gain which thou hast made, and at thy blood which hath been in the midst of thee.

And here in the Dominion of Canada people are losing their homes. The mayor of the city of Niagara Falls pleaded with the people to vote only for those candidates who would take steps to prevent the seizure of homes in the cities of this country. Hundreds of thousands of homes are in danger of being lost, and many have already been lost because of the usury we charge one another. The Liberal party said, "Usury once in control will wreck any nation," but they have done nothing to lessen the great burden of debt and taxation or the interest charges on private mortgages. They have done nothing to lessen municipal indebtedness or the indebtedness on provincial and federal obligations. On the contrary that burden is still increasing in Canada and the world over. No wonder that Arthur Kitson said of this gold debt-creating system that it is like a prison gate that only opens inward, and "its victims are permitted to enter but never to escape." He says:

Gold creates debts and then prevents men from settling them. It places mankind in perpetual bondage. It is a prison gate that only opens inward. Its victims are permitted to enter but never to escape.

Not only are the factors of well being and of progress rendered impotent by the gold standard but the factors of evil minister to its exploiters. Wars, state extravagance and political corruption all serve to build up this pyramid of irremedial debts which almost every nation is now adding to and upon which the gold octopus feeds.

Repudiation is inevitable. Let us clearly see this. It is not a threat. It is an inevitable result. It cannot be avoided. Nations must strangle this monster or it will strangle them. The gold debts of the world can never be redeemed. In vain men toil, in vain they produce, so long as this tapeworm of society exists. All our surplus wealth which should go to form a national store, all our surplus creations we must sacrifice. In vain science prosecutes her voyage of discovery and art labours to convert the discordant and hostile elements of nature into a system of usefulness and harmony. In vain temples of learning are reared and libraries founded. All these institutions, all these achievements that have for their object the advancement of learning and the raising of labour to a higher state of efficiency serve but to strengthen this octopus and give it a firmer grasp and a stranglehold on society. The gold standard means inevitable war. Nations cannot possibly exist under it.

"The children born of it are fire and sword, Red ruin and the breaking up of laws."

In New Zealand, it was stated I believe by the Prime Minister, that away back in 1879, in order to raise cash, the government had borrowed to the extent of £4,364,000, and fifty years later they owed £5,599,000. They had been paying interest on the original sum for over half a century, and they owed more at the end than at the beginning. I ask the Minister of Finance to tell the people of Canada, who are carrying this great burden of debt and taxation, just when he expects to lighten that burden, just when he expects to fulfil the promises of the Liberal party; to let them know, when we borrow this money, whether any reserve has been set aside to pay it off, whether he has any plan by which to pay it off, instead of keeping them in darkness and ignorance in regard to these money matters. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) said, let us get out of this quagmire of financial ignorance. Surely there is some way, other than that of borrowing and increasing our debt burden, to solve the financial problems of this country.

Let the minister explain what are the fundamental policies which he and this government are pursuing. Let him explain how these policies are going to reduce and eventually pay off Canada's national debt. Let him tell us the methods by which he is pursuing these financial policies, who is responsible for those methods, and whether they are bringing the results that he expects. After all, we want to know what is the purpose of our financial policies, what eventually he hopes to achieve by pursuing the policies and methods which he is so anxious to defend.

I submit that the present financial system is responsible for the poverty, want and misery which abound in this country. We have developed this great nation over a period of seventy-two years; we have stretched ribbons of steel from coast to coast; we have founded great cities and institutions of learning and industry. Having thus carved an empire from this wilderness, why should we find ourselves burdened down with debt? The richer we get in real wealth the poorer we get financially. Why is it that, the easier we can manufacture goods because of technical advancement, the less purchasing power we have, the greater our debts and taxation? Is it not because prosperity is impossible without the creation of debt? This great country was built on debt. Is it not time that we began to reform the financial system which places these tremendous burdens on the people, and took steps to release them from that financial bondage? We are no better than the slave traders of old who sold people into physical slavery; for we have sold generations into financial bondage. The Hazard circular reads in part as follows:

Slavery is likely to be abolished by the war power and chattel slavery destroyed. This, I and my European friends are in favour of, for slavery is but the owning of labour, and carries with it the care of the labourer; while the European plan, led on by England, is capital's control of labour, by controlling wages. This can be done by controlling the money. The great debt that capitalists will see to it is made out of the war, must be used as a measure to control the volume of money. To accomplish this the bonds must be used as a banking basis. We are now waiting to get the secretary of the treasury to make this recommendation to Congress.

I notice that in other countries changes are being made in financial policies. W. T. Anderton, seconding the motion in reply to the speech from the throne in the New Zealand parliament, stated this, under "Financial Policy: Seddon's Ideals of State Money":

In his excellency's speech they found a reference to a change in the financial policy of the country. The wealth of the nation could be measured only by what the nation consumed. The late Mr. Richard John Seddon in 1900 said: "I am looking forward to the time when we shall get rid of this circumlocution by issuing state money against the people's production and thus obviate the payment of interest to the banks and, instead of going cap in hand, as we do now, to ask the banks to issue money to us—paper money, which is issued against something which the people, and not the banks, have produced—we shall issue our own money."

Issue it, not borrow it out of the taxpayers' pockets.

President Lincoln declared:

It is peculiarly the duty of the national government to save the treasury from payment of interest by securing to the people a uniform national currency and a sound circulating medium by furnishing a currency as safe as their own.

We should like to hear the Minister of Finance explain the policies of this government and the methods by which he intends to implement those policies, and tell us just what his objective is. I should also like to hear from the Conservative party, particularly from the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), who has declared that a certain official who was president of the Canadian National Railways did not understand the value of money. I should like that hon. member to give us a full explanation of the financial policies which he would pursue. He is very anxious to declare his policies in regard to other matters; let us hear from him on this subject. He agrees that purchasing power is one of the greatest needs of the Canadian people. Let him declare the policy he would pursue to put purchasing power into their hands.

I hope also to hear from the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party in respect to these matters. They advocate that we should control the means of production. I ask them this question: Granted that they have control and that they socialize the means of production, how are they going to distribute the goods without the money mechanism? Socialization of the means of production is not what the people of Canada want. What they want is the goods which industry produces. Let us socialize the products of the machine; for we know that there are all kinds of goods and services in this country awaiting buyers, and those buyers are short of purchasing power. Yet we talk about forcing our goods on foreign nations, and blasting our way into foreign markets, when we cannot distribute at home the wealth of goods and services which we can produce in our own country.

I am not going to be dogmatic or insistent with regard to this resolution. I plead with the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance to consider the suggestions I have offered. If the Minister of Finance believes that the money involved, which is a matter of about $600,000,000 is too much; if he is afraid of the immediate effect of the issue of that amount, I am prepared to reduce it, and even to reduce it substantially. The minister is afraid of inflation, although he says that we control the currency and credit issue in this country day by day, week by week, and month by month. Surely there would be no difficulty in having the officials or instruments which we as a parliament have created develop some method of preventing inflation of credit on the part of the commercial banks, by increasing the reserves of the commercial banks in the central bank or by some other method. I plead with the government on behalf of the debt-ridden, poverty-stricken people of Canada to take immediate action to alleviate the tremendous burden of debt and taxation.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I do not intend at the moment to reply at any length to the statements that have been made by hon. members, nor shall I deal in detail with what I conceive to be the proposal of the amendment. I think it important that an amendment should be in order, and in accordance with the rules of the house. I have no desire to avoid meeting, head on, the proposal that we should authorize a crude inflation to the extent of $600,000,000, which is approximately what is involved, as the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Landeryou) has just said, in the proposal contained in the amendment. I submit, however, that we should proceed in order.

The amendment reads:

> Provided that the loan authorized shall be reduced by an amount equal to that portion thereof representing all payments or redemptions mentioned in this resolution which can be made in Canadian funds, and provided further that the Bank of Canada be authorized to issue debt free a sufficient amount of currency to the government for such payments or redemptions.

I submit that the amendment is a substitution and is out of order, because it makes no provision whatsoever for that portion of the original resolution which reads, "and for public works and general purposes." Let me say that I am quite prepared, indeed pleased, to have this house, the members of which have now listened for four sessions to the advocacy of inflation by my hon. friends of the Social Credit party—

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman? We have not advocated inflation. I know that the minister would not wish to say something that is not true. At no time since coming to this house have we advocated inflation in any shape or form.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, let me put it this way. My hon. friends deny on all occasions that they advocate inflation, but they propose resolutions similar in terms to the one we now have before us, which does mean the issue of currency by the Bank of Canada to the extent of from $500,000,000 to $750,000,000 more currency than is now outstanding, which would mean an increase in the total currency available in this country of from two and a half to four and a half times. Now, my hon. friend says he does not advocate inflation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUNNING: I am unable to describe in any other terms action such as that contemplated by the amendment. In his address, the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) described the manner in which the principle would work from the point of view of hon. gentlemen in the corner, and I gathered from him that all taxation is to be abolished, that it is wrong for governments to tax. Then he proceeds to tell us where the money would come from to carry on the essential services of government. Whenever the government needed money it would print some more.

Mr. QUELCH: I did not say that there would be no taxation, but that there would be no increase in taxation.

Mr. DUNNING: I will look up Hansard. At any rate, in order to carry out my hon. friend's ideas logically, taxation ought to be abolished altogether; because if you can safely print unlimited sums of money, and the government has the power to do so, why not print enough instead of bothering to tax people?

Mr. LANDERYOU: I suggest that the minister read Hansard to find out what was said.

Mr. DUNNING: I was following the hon. member for Acadia a little further in order to demonstrate the accuracy of my statement of his policy. He says that the government should print enough money—

Mr. QUELCH: I did not say print money—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the hon. member rising to a point of order?

Mr. QUELCH: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: Then I would ask him to state the point of order.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister is putting into my mouth words I never used.

Mr. DUNNING: It may be a confusion of terms, but I am in the judgment of the committee whether my hon. friends, all of them, who steadily and consistently advocate what they describe as the issuing by the government of purchasing power—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUNNING: Hon. gentlemen say, "Hear, hear." Well, I do not know any other form of purchasing power than that which is expressed in terms of money or of credit. Why get angry because I say that hon. gentlemen want the government to print more money? It seems to me that is the only, the easy and simple way of carrying out what they advocate; and as a matter of fact the amendment now before the committee provides for precisely that being done by the Bank of Canada. And it must be debt free. I asked my hon. friend from Acadia when he was speaking a question or two that brought out this view from the Social Credit party: that they recognize that such a policy would involve too much money getting into circulation, too great a possibility thereby of the evils of inflation which I have described in this house more than once. Then my hon. friend went on to describe the means whereby the Social Credit party would prevent that happening. I asked the question whether the term debt free money really meant interest free money or money which did not have to be repaid, either principal or interest, and the answer was "both." That is to say, any money emitted—I will not say printed because he will say that he did not say that; but any money emitted or issued under this social credit scheme might conceivably be too much. It would be issued without the obligation on anyone's part ever to give value for it; and the means of taking it out of existence, should there be too much of it, as stated by my hon. friend from Acadia, would be to tax it out of existence.

Mr. QUELCH: The just price factor would automatically absorb surplus effective demand.

Mr. DUNNING: Following a dollar bill issued by the Bank of Canada, you must recognize that if the currency of this country is to have a consistent and steady buying value, that dollar bill cannot be put out of existence without someone supplying a dollar's worth of value for it. The assumption inherent in the thinking of so many, that the government can issue money and have it perform its function, and by and by, when it comes back to the Bank of Canada, it can be destroyed without hurting anyone, is all nonsense, because the last man who held that bill and paid it into the Bank of Canada would be entitled to one dollar's worth of value from the Bank of Canada for it. There is no escape from that.

Mr. QUELCH: May I ask—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. QUELCH: I have asked the minister several questions but he will not answer one.

Mr. DUNNING: We are in committee and I expect, judging by the indications, that we shall remain in committee for a long time on this matter. My hon. friends in the corner can speak as many times as they like, and doubtless they will. What I have just said stands, that when the government of this country through its central bank issues a dollar bill, that dollar bill cannot go out of existence without the last holder of it receiving credit for its full value. My hon. friend himself recognized that principle when he said that excess currency, if it existed, would have to be taxed out of existence.

Mr. QUELCH: Provided it became surplus to physical demand.

Mr. DUNNING: Provided it became surplus to physical demand, whatever that means. I would put it in this way: provided the effects of inflation, which have been the same from time immemorial, become evident; then the remedy would be to impose taxation to take out of circulation a sufficient sum of money to bring matters once more to an even keel. That is the principle we are asked to adopt. But no information is given as to how that taxation is to be levied, how it is to fall equally on the just and the unjust; we are simply told that there is too much money in circulation and consequently we have the evil effects of inflation,—undue rise of prices, speculation, gambling, which throughout history have always resulted from too great an emission of money by the ruling authority. My hon. friends acknowledge it by what they say as to providing the machinery to control it—they say they will tax the excess out of existence.

Mr. MacNICOL: And burn the bills.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, burn the bills.

Mr. JAQUES: What about deflation?

Mr. DUNNING: That would be the rankest kind of deflation, which always follows excessive inflation.

Mr. JAQUES: We have had it for ten years.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friends provide for both. In effect they say we must have a system of inflation, but we recognize that inflation brings certain evils, therefore we must provide in advance for a method whereby we can deflate the inflation which we have brought about.

Mr. JAQUES: You brought it about. We have had it for ten years.

Mr. DUNNING: And we are told that that is to be an improvement on what we have.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DUNNING: Could we have a little order? I listened very patiently to lengthy extracts read by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Landeryou). I did not interrupt except to ask a question when the hon. member permitted it.

Mr. QUELCH: You will not even permit a question.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must insist on order in the committee. The disturbance is coming largely from the Social Credit quarter of the house. I ask hon. members to assist the chair in keeping order by obeying the rules.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, Mr. Chairman, we are in committee; the discussion will continue. I shall not attempt to make any longer statement just now, but I wanted to touch the high spots of the proposal. I think the committee can see it. It is a proposal to inflate the volume of existing currency two and a half to four and a half times its present volume, and to use that currency to pay off the obligations of the dominion as they mature within the next two years. That in my judgment is absolutely uncontrolled inflation of the crudest possible variety. In my judgment it would ruin the credit of this dominion, would bring misery and suffering, particularly to our poorest people, would give opportunities to the speculatively minded to make and lose fortunes, would bring about precisely what has happened all through history whenever that kind of thing has been tried, whether by kings of old or in more recent years in some of the countries of Europe. It seems a pity that each succeeding generation has to learn the lesson afresh. It is indeed bitter experience. We do not find similar measures being proposed in any country which has had recent experience of them.

For the moment I shall confine myself to questioning the order of the amendment, in that it changes completely the scheme of the original resolution. I do not deny that my hon. friend can alter his amendment and put it in order, and I shall be glad to have him do so; or he can withdraw it, as he wishes.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I should like to have it redrafted in proper form, and it can then be presented.

Mr. DUNNING: Very well. I should like this committee to go on record in this matter. We want to make known to the people of Canada and the people of the world whether we want to embark on crude and uncontrolled inflation, or whether we will maintain that measure of scientific control which has been made possible by the creation of the Bank of Canada and by the various statutes of this country dealing with the control of currency and credit. I said last year that in my opinion we have now under our present statutes an ample measure of control of currency and credit. The only question is, and it is a difficult and serious one: How shall we use the degree of control which we have, from day to day, from week to week, from month to month? We take the view that the control must be used carefully, having regard at all times to one interest only, the best interest of all the people of Canada; taking into account all the various conditions which must be considered in connection with this most difficult question of control of currency and credit. It is more difficult to-day as a world question than it has ever been before, because of the abandonment by most of the nations of the world of that standard which rendered things a great deal easier to manage during a long period of years. We have now, as I said the other day, management of credit and currency in all countries, not by an agreed-upon gold standard, but management by men's minds, by the thinking of those who are placed in control of credit and currency. The standard which worked for so many years of agreed-upon international value for gold is for the time being suspended, therefore we have the variable factor that in each country groups of men entrusted by government with the task are endeavouring to manage their credit and currency in the interests of their own people. Under these circumstances how much greater is the difficulty of bringing about that international understanding which makes trade relations between nations possible and sound.

I say again, as I said the other day, that for Canada—fourth exporting nation in the world, fifth in total trade in the world, with the relations which she must have with other countries—for Canada to embark on uncontrolled inflation of credit or currency or both, would in my opinion be national suicide.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: I think in order to keep the record clear, as this amendment has not been read from the chair, I shall read it now. It was moved by Mr. Landeryou, seconded by Mr. Elliott (Kindersley)—and I may say it does not require seconding:

That the resolution be amended as follows:

"Provided that the loan authorized shall be reduced by an amount equal to that portion thereof representing all payments or redemptions mentioned in this resolution which can be made in Canadian funds, and provided further that the Bank of Canada be authorized to issue debt free a sufficient amount of currency to the government for such payments or redemptions."

Do any other hon. members wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Are we going on with the discussion, or not?

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order. First I draw the attention of the committee to the terms of the resolution. It reads:

Resolved, that the governor in council be authorized to raise by way of loan under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, an amount not to exceed in the whole the sum of seven hundred and fifty million dollars for paying or redeeming the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada, and also for purchasing and withdrawing from circulation unmatured securities of Canada, and for public works and general purposes.

I quote from May, page 544:

Proposals for the variation or modification of taxation can therefore be made in the committee; but these proposals must be granted upon the financial scheme submitted by the government, and must not affect the balance of ways and means voted for the service of the year.

In my opinion the amendment is out of order.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Is it in order now, Mr. Chairman, to discuss the main motion?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member proposes to speak on the main motion?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes; I should like to make a few remarks while the hon. member for Calgary East is redrafting his amendment. I am not sure, but it looks as though after three and a half years this is to be the first time we have really been able to come to grips; and, Mr. Chairman, may I say that if we all play the rules and keep our heads we may get quite a little way with this discussion.

In the first place I wish to point out one or two things as we see them. The Minister of Finance insists on declaring on every occasion that the Social Credit party advocates inflation. I say we do not.

Some hon. MEMBERS: What is it?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Manifestly the first thing to do is to define "inflation," because I believe there exists in this parliament and throughout the dominion the wildest degree of uncertainty, inaccuracy of information and, I may say, prejudice concerning the word. What is inflation? Not only is it inflation; it is called crude inflation, though not one member from this group has ever advocated either inflation or crude inflation. Time and again the minister has also used the words "uncontrolled inflation." One cannot advocate the creation of ten dollars of dominion money without its being called uncontrolled inflation, crude inflation or simply inflation. What contemptible piffle! All one needs to do is recall that between 1915 and 1917 the Dominion of Canada printed $26,000,000 of bills, of which $10,000,000 had nothing behind it and $16,000,000 had only worthless railway securities behind it. Apparently those bills were used for government purposes, and they did not cause inflation or disturb the exchanges. They were sound money then, and they have been sound money ever since. All one needs to do is remember that fact to see how absurd are some of these contentions, when people call any issue of government money inflation, crude inflation or uncontrolled inflation. So I hope we shall not have to spend any more time talking about inflation, crude inflation or uncontrolled inflation, because this group advocates none of the three.

There is one other point I wish to get quite clear. As far as I can remember, never since we came to this house have we refused to answer a question which has been put to us.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Yes, you have, many times.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I can say that personally I have never done so; I defy any member of the house to point to any occasion when I refused. Time and again I have tried to secure the privilege of asking a question in order to correct a false impression which was being created in the course of a speech; in over half of the cases I have been refused, many times with insults from the opposite side. I just ask if that is what they consider fair play. We will permit any number of questions and try to answer them. If we cannot answer them, it is evident that we simply do not know the answers, but we should like the privilege of asking questions in turn. If we are to be denied that privilege, let it be known; let the country know that here is a group that is not allowed the privilege of asking questions. We are supposed to be ignoramuses; we are not supposed to know what we are talking about. Why be afraid of answering any questions that we can devise?

Now I am going to spend a few moments on the subject of inflation. What is inflation? I am going to quote two authorities in that regard, and I think it will take a good deal to explain them away. Before I do so, however, let me say this: You do not have inflation in a country until you have more money coming into the markets of that country to buy than there are goods and services to be bought with that money, without a rise in prices.

Mr. EVANS: What are you going to do with all your wheat?

Mr. BLACKMORE: One thing at a time, please. That is a definition of inflation; just as soon as you get more money in circulation than you have goods and services to be bought with that money, without a rise in prices, then you have inflation. It matters not whether the government creates that money, whether a banker creates it, or whether it comes in from outside the country. Let us get that laid down solidly as a fundamental principle.

Before I quote the authorities I mentioned a moment ago, I should like to point out something in which I believe all hon. members will be interested. On November 13, 1933, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) delivered a speech in Toronto, of which I have a copy in my hand. One thing he said has a bearing on this subject. In the course of his remarks the hon. member made clear to his audience that between 1929 and 1933 the banking fraternity in the Dominion of Canada withdrew from circulation some $932,000,000. There is no question that this was a most colossal deflation. The people after that were without the money that was necessary to carry on business, and as a result prices fell and disaster reigned generally throughout the country. But, according to the definition of inflation which apparently is in the minds of most hon. members, if the government of the day had undertaken to put $100,000,000 of that huge amount back into circulation it would have been inflation, crude inflation, uncontrolled inflation. What nonsense!

Mr. DUNNING: No; that is not so at all.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad to hear it is not so; we will have a discussion on that later on.

I quote these facts so that we may come to grips with the problem in a general way. It is not likely, Mr. Chairman, that a whole province of this dominion would go completely crazy over an idea so fallacious as the Minister of Finance would lead us to suppose this is.

Mr. MARTIN: The province has not, but its politicians have.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In all probability it will be found that the people of Alberta could give some very good reasons for the hope that is within them.

Now, first of all, with respect to inflation I am going to quote a passage from Planned Money by Sir Basil P. Blackett, published in 1932. This very short quotation appears at page 106. I would ask hon. members to note it carefully:

> The right amount of currency in circulation at any given moment is that amount which will do the work required of it at a given level of prices. If it is too much, prices will rise. If it is too little, they will fall.
>
> The minute you get more money in circulation, let me repeat, than enough to do the work of distributing goods and services which are abroad in a country to be distributed, then you have inflation, and not a minute before.

Mr. DUNNING: That is correct.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It matters not who creates the money, or where it comes from. This idea of trying to foist upon the people of this country and the world the idea that a dollar of dominion money backed by the credit of this dominion is inflation, while a dollar created by the most insignificant bank manager is sound money, is nonsense in the highest degree.

I shall quote another statement by a man who surely is respected in his country—whether in this country, or not. I refer to Senator Owen, who is prominent in monetary affairs in the United States. His ideas are not entirely popular, but neither were the ideas of the great inventors, the great reformers or the great leaders of times past in other great movements. But they were right, just the same. Here is what Senator Owen said when giving evidence on June 9, 1937 before a committee of the United States senate in connection with a discussion on "Farm Commodity Prices":

> Inflation does not occur until maximum employment and production is achieved. If it should occur, the volume of money could be immediately reduced by selling bonds, by sales tax and other taxes, and retiring such excess money from circulation.

I ask any hon. member of the house: After the $932,000,000 was withdrawn from circulation in Canada, do you suppose there was enough money in the country to do the business of the country? Certainly not. The government at that time could easily have created money and put it into circulation without getting into circulation more than enough money to do the business of the country. That is abundantly clear. Never from that day to this has there been a sufficient restoration of the money that was withdrawn in those four years—never yet. Until enough money is restored to circulation you cannot speak of inflation with any degree of understanding or sincerity.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my hon. friend permit an interruption?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: I know he does not wish to create a wrong impression. There never was $932,000,000 withdrawn from circulation. The hon. member's words would bear that interpretation. There never has been that much money in circulation. My hon. friend's last words would leave the impression that it was actual cash money to which he was referring, whereas it was really credit, not cash, to which he referred.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Has the minister finished?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, I grant that,—and that is just the sort of question and answer I welcome. I shall gladly answer questions from hon. members. It has been the contention of this group steadily that purchasing power is of two kinds, both currency and credit. So far as its ability to buy and do other work is concerned, I think my hon. friend will admit that every dollar of the $932,000,000 could do just as much work as a dollar bill. The result was that when that credit was withdrawn the country was short of money, just as definitely as though it had been dollar bills. I am glad the minister raised that point, and let me get it straight.

Now, dollar bills might be replaced by either credit or currency. The minister made much of a further point—and he is sincere when he makes a statement. I am just as sincere when I say he is wrong. The clash between the two of us on the issue is there, and perfectly honestly. He says that when one dollar is drawn from circulation somebody has to pay for it. We do not doubt that. Every dollar he withdraws by taxation now somebody has to pay for. Surely. But if the dollar he withdraws from taxation happens to have been borrowed out of a bank, and then withdrawn by him through taxation, there are at least two people paying that dollar, the man who has to pay it back to the bank and the man who has to pay it in to the government. There is no escaping the truth of that statement.

There are a great many people in the country who have the idea that you cannot have a dollar unless it is a debt dollar. I ask any hon. member: What about that $26,000,000 that Canada created? Was that debt money? Did anybody do anything for that money? Did it cost this dominion one cent? Was it paid back? The answer in every single case must be no. There was some debt free money and there was some interest free money, beyond any question.

The minister implied that every time in the world's history a government has issued money it has gone awry. He did not use those words and, while I do not wish to overstate what he has said, yet on the other hand wish to be perfectly honest, I believe I have interpreted him correctly. His implication was that whenever a government has created and used state money we have had crude or uncontrolled inflation and disastrous consequences.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, if to excess.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have in my hand what I believe is an authentic book which deals with the situation in Guernsey Island. In 1905 the people of that island had in circulation £41,318 of notes on which they were paying no interest. That information is given at page 60 of this book by J. Theodore Harris, entitled An Example of Communal Currency. The book is written in scholarly fashion, and the references are to authentic documents to be found on file in the archives of Guernsey island. There was a case of state money which was debt free and interest free, and is today interest free.

This much has been said in an effort to clear the air and to get together on certain matters. I know there is great suspicion in the minds of hon. members concerning our understanding of money. I hasten to urge upon them that men of the type who have led the movement in Alberta were not going to "jump off the deep end" without taking care to examine where they were going. If hon. members knew better about those people, they would not be so sceptical. We are not asking anyone to accept our opinions without a struggle. We are here to make the struggle, in good part, honestly, straightforwardly, man to man.

So much having been said, I can say that ever since we have come here we have been trying to place our views before the house. As I have said, we have been treated with a great deal of courtesy—much more than we expected. We want to be courteous, and to continue to be courteous and to be good friends, because we are all Canadians, and interested in the welfare of our children and our children's children.

Let me say once more that we are going to lay further details of this system before the house this year, frankly and straightforwardly, and we shall be ready to give and take and to answer any questions that are asked honestly and straightforwardly.

In a general way let me lay down this principle. The state can to a certain extent create money, and it will be safe money. But it cannot create money to the point at which it is getting more money into circulation than goods and services and the productive and consumptive power of the state will justify. The Guernsey island experiment is a good example of that. After twenty years of a most illuminating experience with state money, they discovered that that little island, nine and a quarter miles long and five and a quarter miles wide, roughly triangular in shape, could support £90,000 of money.

Mr. DUNNING: Just as we found we could support two hundred and seventy millions of dollars. That is monetary management.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Quite so, and the question then at issue between us would be: Shall the banker create all that money and own it and make us pay interest on it, or shall we own it, and make him pay interest on it if anybody has to pay interest.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not reasonable. When I mentioned the two hundred and seventy millions of currency presently outstanding, it was issued by the Bank of Canada which is owned by the government and controlled by parliament; and whereas that issue was two hundred million dollars three years ago, it is now two hundred and seventy million dollars. I do not say for one moment, because that issue of currency has grown by seventy million dollars in three years, that that is inflation. That is management, management in accordance with the demonstrated needs of the country from time to time. The difference is between management and uncontrolled inflation—that is all.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Following up what the minister has just said, I should like to know this: Did that seventy million dollars come into the possession of the Dominion of Canada as debt-free money, or was it created by the bank with power to lend it to somebody, so that in effect it belonged to the bank? For instance, can the Dominion of Canada get ten million dollars of that money to run dominion affairs without going into debt for it?

Mr. DUNNING: We go into debt to our own bank, of course.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is the principle to which I object. The Guernsey island people did not do that. I shall speak further of that experiment when I have a little more time, and it will likely be in this debate. The first move of the Guernsey island people was to create three thousand one-pound notes, and with those build a market house. Then it collected the three thousand one-pound notes as yearly dues on the market place, and no one owed anybody for the money. The state created it and the state spent it.

Mr. DUNNING: And the taxpayers paid it back.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Surely. Very fine. But the difficulty is that if Canada had been doing that, Canada would have borrowed the three thousand pounds from a banker and then would have taxed the people enough to pay it all back to the banker, and to pay the interest on it as well, and still the people and the government would have owed the bank the three thousand pounds. That is exactly where the difference lies. I think that is quite clear Without discussing money further now, I am going to say a word or two about the debt situation in Canada. I expected to say something about that, but I was not quite sure whether I would be allowed to speak on it. Until recently I thought I knew a little about the rules of the house, but now I find I know practically nothing about them.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Why not wait for the budget debate?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then we would not have time to discuss this matter. I may seem over-earnest in discussing money, but it is the most important thing that you can discuss to-day; for this proposal will work out a solution of your problems, which otherwise are unsolvable. To relegate the discussion of this vitally important matter to some little corner does not appeal to us as common sense. Let me say that we have deliberately refrained from participating in many of the discussions of this house so that in the time which might justly be allowed to us we could set forth the message that we came here to deliver. All we want is an opportunity to set it forth and an attentive, patient hearing such as we give to those who are speaking of other matters.

Now just a word about Canada's debt.

Mr. LAWSON: Before my hon. friend goes to debt—

An hon. MEMBER: Goes into debt.

Mr. LAWSON: Before my hon. friend goes into the subject of debt, may I ask him this question? If he were putting into effect in Canada a new monetary system along the lines he is advocating, would it still be a principle of that system that I could go to a clearing house or some other institution and obtain there a credit which I, in turn, could use for the purpose of acquiring goods without my giving to that institution, in exchange for that credit, either goods or services or a promise to deliver goods or services at some future date? I ask that sincerely because I am anxious to understand.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That, of course, is a sincere question. In order to be able to understand it, I must first lay down this principle, that social credit has two great objectives in the financial system. The first one of these is to see to it that there is adequate production of all kinds, sufficient to the needs of all the people of Canada. The second of these is to bring about consumption. The money which is advanced for production goes, as it does to-day, in the form of a debt, and it must be repaid.

Mr. LAWSON: If my hon. friend will permit me, is it not conceded by all people that we have all the production that we can possibly need in Canada, and that our need is not greater production but the power to consume what we are producing and an equitable distribution of the profits of that production? I am trying to follow the hon. member.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, but the reason I stated that principle first for my hon. friend is that if we said, first of all, that we will issue money for consumption, then we would be met at once by the very thing that popped up when we first came to parliament, when an hon. member who is now in the chamber said: We cannot produce enough.

An hon. MEMBER: Still true.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There, do you hear that? You see how it directly opposes what the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) said. So we say the first thing is to make sure that you will have all of the production that all of your people can use in so far as your resources and the industrial equipment which you possess can produce that abundance; and you govern that by lending, perhaps at two per cent or one and a half per cent interest, whatever amount is necessary to bring down the cost of production where it ought to be, instead of where it is to-day. That is the first principle to be grasped. That money continues to go out as a debt; but still, so far as the government is concerned, it is not a debt. That is, the government does not borrow it from anyone, does not owe anyone for it.

Some people may say: We do not understand that. Perhaps in this very discussion I will bring to the attention of the committee the treasury note, the Bradbury, in England, and will point out the way in which the British people managed to get into circulation over three hundred million pounds of paper that did not cost the British treasury one cent beyond the cost of printing the notes.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Certainly.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I would ask the hon. member if he has answered the question put by the hon. member for York South in the affirmative or in the negative.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Just as soon as we can get to it. Let us not rush along. As the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) so well pointed out, the social credit concept is this. There is at the present time in our financial and productive system a deficiency of purchasing power. This is well illustrated by the figures which record United States production and income in 1918. In that year, as is shown in Income of the United States, volume 2, pages 242 to 248, there were sixty billion dollars' worth of consumers' goods produced, and into the hands of the consumers in wages, salaries, dividends, bonuses and every other form of purchasing power, there went only forty-five billion dollars. The result was that there were fifteen billion dollars' worth of consumers' goods which there was no purchasing power in the hands of the people to buy. The result was that either the goods had to be sold on time or credit, putting the people of the United States into debt, or they had to be sold to foreign nations, putting them into debt. That is the very principle about which the hon. member for Acadia was talking a few minutes ago. It was considered sound finance for the government of the United States to advance credits to foreign countries—let us say, for fifteen billion dollars, although of course that is too much—to let them buy those goods on time; but to advance the credit to their own people has never yet entered their minds.

Mr. LAWSON: If my hon. friend will pardon me—I know what he is telling us, because I have taken the trouble to try to make a study of the social credit system—if the United States lends money to a foreign nation it gets that nation's promise to pay, be it good, bad or indifferent, and that is in effect a promise to deliver future goods and services. If the social credit monetary system is put into effect, do I understand that the hon. member advocates the advance of credit—which according to him is as good as money—to people without those people in turn delivering, in exchange for that credit, goods or services, or without their promise to deliver at some future time goods or services?

Mr. BLACKMORE: We are coming right to the answer.

An hon. MEMBER: You are a long time coming.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, I may have to be.

Mr. LAWSON: Not for me.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It so happens that the hon. member for York South is a little keener than a good many other hon. members. I have had some experience with some of them. I come now to the direct answer to my hon. friend's question. Suppose we keep in mind the situation in the United States. If the United States, with sixty billion dollars' worth of consumers' goods in 1918, realizing it has only forty-five billion dollars with which to buy the goods, wishes to balance its economy to enable its producers to sell their goods, what must it do?

Mr. LAWSON: Issue more medium of exchange.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Now we are on the right track. Exactly. That is the social credit contention. Just as an illustration, let me come back to Canada and the twenty-six million dollars.

Mr. MacNICOL: A minute ago the hon. member said "billions," and now he says "millions."

Mr. BLACKMORE: If I made a slip I stand corrected. I am listening to all these questions at the same time and trying to get through a speech.

An hon. MEMBER: We are trying to follow you.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is all right. We will get there. At least I hope so, in the interests of Canada and the British empire. When Canada created that twenty-six million dollars, was it necessary that that money should be lent out only to somebody who agreed to pay it back, or could it have been used to pay soldiers' pensions or widows' pensions or pensions for the blind or the aged? There is no conceivable reason why it could not have been used as a gift to the people. It would have been just as good, just as sound money.

Mr. LAWSON: Oh, yes, but—if my hon. friend will pardon me—surely he will agree with me that if we take this money or currency or credit and use it as a gift to somebody, that simply means that we are arbitrarily taking from somebody else something which is theirs in order to give it to another class.

An hon. MEMBER: Not necessarily.

Mr. LAWSON: We are redistributing goods and services without something being given in exchange.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let us keep right to the point. I appreciate greatly the interest; that is what we want. I want to answer the first question, and I am going to put the matter straightforwardly. I say unqualifiedly, yes, the government will create the purchasing power which is necessary to market this fifteen billion dollars' worth of goods in the United States. It will distribute that purchasing power to the people, who will buy the goods, and thereby enable the producers to have a market and assist their economy to go forward, and equate consumption with production.

Mr. LAWSON: Without the people who receive it giving goods or services in return?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, unquestionably.

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot quite hear.

Mr. LAWSON: The answer is. "yes, unquestionably."

Mr. DUNNING: The money would be given without any return?

Mr. LAWSON: Without goods or services?

Mr. BLACKMORE: In a way it seems queer. This is new to us, I know; but Mr. Chairman, I ask you, can we expect a new system which will solve our problems to be devoid of something which is new and strange to us? Everything else about us is new and strange; why shall we not expect the solution of our problems to involve and embody principles which are new and strange?

Mr. POULIOT: If my hon. friend permits me, we all admire his system, but what we want to know is how it will work.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I go back to the question of the hon. member for York South? I had not expected to talk along this line, so I am speaking quite extemporaneously. I trust I do not make a slip which will be reported in Hansard, it is easy to do so when one is speaking extemporaneously.

Mr. LAWSON: The hon. member is making himself perfectly clear.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I want to make myself perfectly clear. I think I can do so without making statements which can be distorted. But I am anxious to make myself clear at this point although just now I had not been thinking it through. I have gone through it scores of times, but not upon the floor of the house before such an interested audience.

As the hon. member for Acadia pointed out, what did Great Britain do? She advanced millions of pounds on credit so that she could sell her goods, and she thought it was good business. She lost money.

Mr. DUNNING: But she had the promise to pay.

Mr. LAWSON: She got in exchange the promise to deliver goods and services of an equivalent value in the future.

Mr. BLACKMORE: She got nothing for the promises. But she was not ruined. What she got was a market.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. DUNNING: She got or expected to get her money back.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They could not pay. As the hon. member for Acadia pointed out, they have never paid. There has been lost perhaps as much as £4,000,000,000, which has never been paid.

Mr. DUNNING: Those are losses over a long period.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Exactly. But the money never came back.

Mr. DUNNING: Not that particular money. But other money did.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Perhaps, but a great deal has not come back. To continue point by point; this is a new idea; we grant that. I wonder if I have answered the hon. member for York South?

Mr. LAWSON: You have answered my original question completely, in the affirmative.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Now we are dealing with the logicality of the proposal. Is it logical; is it sensible to give money to people to buy with? That is the next question. Let us refer to the fifteen billion dollars of surplus goods. Is it logical to let fifteen billion dollars' worth of goods be destroyed?

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is it logical to let those goods stay on the shelves until they decay? Is it logical to let the factories which produced them close up and to turn men out of work so that they can no longer produce goods?

Mr. POOLE: Monetize the goods.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is it logical to issue millions of dollars of debt which will never be paid? That is what we are doing. Is it logical to engage in a trade war with other countries, trying to elbow other countries out of foreign markets so that we can sell our goods, against—for instance—the competition of the United States, thereby engaging in an international trade war which may ultimately lead to armed conflict? These are things which have been done up to the present time. Social crediters say that such foolish and wasteful practices are all absolutely illogical, absolutely insane, and that they must be changed. What the United States needed above all other things, when they had sixty billion dollars' worth of goods and only forty-five billion dollars' worth of purchasing power, was another fifteen billion dollars' worth of purchasing power, fifteen billion dollars' worth of markets whereby those goods could be put into the hands of the people. The thing we are suffering from is simply this, that after we have installed the machine to produce shoes, for example, without the use of manpower, the men who are displaced are unable to obtain shoes. We cannot get the shoes into the hands of the poor fellows who, because they have been displaced, are unable to earn wages.

Mr. LAWSON: It is easy to get the shoes into their hands. All you have to do is give it to them, and that is more simple than the hon. member's scheme. What I say sincerely is that, having tried to study his scheme, I have come to the conclusion that that is exactly what he proposes to accomplish, namely, to give the shoes away for nothing. They give nothing in exchange. They do not give any goods or services in exchange, and if they do not, what are they going to give?

Mr. BLACKMORE: In exchange, they are giving consumption. Men are coming to realize that a person who can consume is an asset to a country. Let any agent to-day, representing any company, go out and try to sell his product. What is the first thing he does in the community in which he is trying to promote sales? He looks for men who might be able to buy.

Mr. LAWSON: Effective buyers; that is, those who have something to give in exchange.

Mr. POOLE: That is why we need purchasing power.

Mr. LAWSON: But when someone is not an effective buyer and consumes anyway, he is not an asset but a liability.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let us study the question calmly—

Mr. LAWSON: I did not mean to interrupt the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We welcome interruptions. That is what we want. Let us take the questions point by point, answering one at a time even if we have to stay here all night—because we can answer all these questions.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What about the resolution?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Suppose the dominion government creates a five dollar bill and puts it into the hands of a widow, enabling her to buy a pair of shoes. The government is not exactly compelling the shoe factory to give her a pair of shoes.

Mr. LAWSON: But we are making the people of Canada give it to her, the people from whom we take five dollars by way of taxation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: You are not making the people of Canada give it so long as you have not created more purchasing power than there are goods and services to justify the giving of that five dollars.

Mr. LAWSON: I cannot agree with your premise.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is true whether you agree with it or not. When you have in the United States $15,000,000,000 worth of consumers' goods which you cannot sell, those goods are a justification for the creation of more money, and the state can create more money up to the extent to which it can enable the people to consume or distribute the $15,000,000,000 worth of goods. And there will not be any inflation, according to the definitions of that word which I have read from Sir Basil Blackett. If there is no inflation you take nothing from the people because there is no rise in prices as a result of which there is any indirect taxation. If new money results in a rise in prices, creating an indirect tax, then you are taking something from the people. But if you create a new dollar bill, which does not cause inflation, and put it into the hands of a person who has to consume, you have created a market in your own country and distributed the product in your own country, and you have blessed both your own consumers and your own producers.

Mr. DUNNING: Then why should anyone work if he can get something without working? Why should any man work if he can get purchasing power for what he needs without having to go to work? And what would happen to production if everybody said, "There is no need to work because we can get purchasing power without doing so?"

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is an excellent question.

An hon. MEMBER: Answer it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hon. members will notice that we have changed our point of discussion from inflation to an altogether different aspect of the subject.

Mr. LAWSON: I was never on inflation; that is not a bugbear to me.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Now we are on the question, how to get the people to work under the system that we propose. My time has already gone, and the chairman has been considerate enough to give me some latitude. I must hurry. That is a legitimate question and it must be answered. Suppose the government gave $25 a month to everyone—I mention that figure because everyone hears about $25 to-day—and that there were jobs to be had. Now take any young couple, a married couple, say. The young woman gets $25 and her husband gets $25.

Mr. DUNNING: For nothing?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, simply because they belong to society. Let me say right here that to-day we are giving something to all the people who are on relief, so that when we balk at this supposition about giving $25 to everybody we are simply straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. We are allowing thousands of returned men who should be receiving munificent treatment from the country, who have already earned it, to go on suffering in misery—

Mr. LAWSON: That is not fair.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am prepared to modify that statement to the extent that is necessary.

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. member that he has exceeded his time, and the questions and interruptions have not counted in his time.

Mr. LAWSON: I will talk for a couple of minutes and you can start again.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I just finish the point I was making about the supposititious married couple? Does anyone here suppose that if a young married man had a chance to make $25 a month in addition to the $25 that he was receiving he would not take that chance? I venture to say that if he were disinclined to take it his wife would very soon make matters so uncomfortable for him that he would be willing to change his mind. The point that we overlook is that under our relief arrangement when a young man is energetic enough to get a job we take away his relief. Under social credit we propose to continue giving him his relief so that he will have an additional incentive to obtain work if work can be had at all.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT: (Témiscouata): I have listened with deep interest to the last part of the speech delivered by the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Blackmore). There are some points in his speech which I do not understand, and I will try to give him an explanation of what I gather from his remarks. I will try to be just as courteous as he has been, and to answer to the best of my ability any questions that may come from his group. I am not a mathematician and I will not deal in large figures—billions or trillions. I will speak only of millions. That is large enough for concrete examples of what we understand.

In the first place, at a time when the happiness of man was unclouded, in the garden of Eden, there was no mint to make currency. Man was happy just the same. After Adam and Eve were expelled from the garden of Eden, it was a penalty imposed upon them, to earn their own living. But for several centuries there was no coinage. It was the wonderful age of the patriarchs; they had no coins although they exchanged goods. It is just on account of the fact that our great-great-great-great-great-grandparents were expelled from the garden of Eden because of their sin that man has to work and to receive money for his services or his work. Therefore coinage is the result of sin.

Mr. LAWSON: And sin is the result of an apple.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, and the eating of the apple was the cornerstone of all mints in all countries of the world. Of course some hon. members may think I am joking in speaking like that; but I am serious, and I am sure that if all hon. members do not understand the seriousness of my argument, some at any rate realize that there is something in it.

To speak in another vein, of course there is only one Christmas in the year. In order to give money freely to people there should be beforehand a very important reform, a reform of the calendar. Instead of one Christmas only, we should have Christmases every day of the year.

Mr. BLACKMORE: A good idea. Why not?

Mr. POULIOT: Therefore Santa Claus would not have time to go to the north pole; he would have to stay away from the snow during the spring, summer and fall.

Mr. HAYHURST: You still believe in Santa Claus?

Mr. POULIOT: Well, I believe in Santa Claus as much as I believe in social credit.

Mr. JAQUES: You prefer Black Friday.

Mr. POULIOT: I know my hon. friends are sincere; I do not mistrust their sincerity. But when people have no money, I wonder whether it is wise to speak to them of millions without giving millions to them. Those who are thirsty it makes more thirsty, and those who are hungry it makes more hungry. It is dangerous to show bubbles to the people. They are brilliant, but they disappear very soon.

There is the question of the creation of purchasing power. What is it? It is power to purchase, or the power to get some other goods. For what consideration, or how shall we get it? There is a Latin line which is known by all: Quis, quid, ubi, cur, quibus auxiliis, quomodo, quando? Whenever there is an argument of some kind one can ask, Quis—who said it? I know it is Major Douglas who first said it, and he had some eminent disciples in this country, including the premier of Alberta. They are highly respectable people, we know, and they say it. Then there is quid; What do they say? On that point I am not sure because I do not understand very well. Then there is quod; Why? I do not impute motives to anyone, and I shall not say that it is for political motives. Quibus auxiliis? With what help, what assistance? Is it with the assistance of the provincial government of Alberta, or people of goodwill throughout this country who are ready to subscribe any amount of money to see the result of experience? It may be possible. Then there is also quomodo? by what means; and quando? when. I know of course that the theory is expounded to us and explained very ably, but to my mind not absolutely satisfactorily. Therefore the main points are: What is it, how will it be done, and when? I leave aside the other questions.

It is a law of nature that man has to work to earn his living. In the first place there was no coinage; there was no money; man worked and he received clothes and food from his employer. Those who were rich exchanged cattle for other goods, until trade became more widespread and cities came into being; then every man could not have a herd of camels or sheep or other animals to dispose of in order to obtain other things that he required, and people becoming more civilized got some form of coinage, which as my hon. friends know was first a piece of stone, which was supposed to have value. At that time the population of the world was not so big, but when the population became larger it was understood by tradesmen that they had to exchange a certain quantity of metal for other goods that they required for their living.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the hon. member like to have me answer his questions one by one as he asks them? Then we should not be confused by too many questions.

Mr. POULIOT: I am ready to do anything. If my friend prefers to ask me questions right now, I am ready to answer them. If he prefers to ask me questions afterwards, I am at his disposal just the same. I warn him that I am not an expert in those matters; I speak as an ordinary individual who has read a little—very little—of the history of the world and who is open-minded in all these matters. If my hon. friend has a question to ask, I am ready to answer him.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wish to say here in public that the behaviour of the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) in the past has convinced me beyond any question that what he says about himself is true. He is a sincere, earnest man who really wishes to find the truth. I think it would be better in the interest of elucidating the truth that I should answer his questions one by one.

Mr. POULIOT: That is not my understanding. It is that I speak earnestly, candidly and I express my views, which of course may be all wrong, but I want my hon. friend to tell me where I am wrong. I ask him questions in order to have an opportunity to understand his system.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I thought that would be what my hon. friend wanted, so I believe I will ask him—

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member is going to ask a question, I wish he would do so and not make a speech.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Perhaps I had better put my answer in the form of a question, in order to be entirely within the rules.

Mr. SLAGHT: In the interests of all the other hon. members of the committee I suggest that the two hon. gentlemen ought to hire a hall for themselves.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. member for Lethbridge warmly for his kind words. Perhaps he would tell me how A or B may be given any purchasing power in the form of money by the state for services that are not rendered, except by way of a gratuity voted by both houses of parliament and sanctioned by the governor general?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think this will cover that point. The dominion government to-day is granting relief to the extent of millions of dollars and is getting no services in return. If the dominion government can borrow money or raise money by taxation and give that money to people without getting a return for it, is there any reason why they should not be able to create money and do the same thing with it? If by borrowing money now the government are able to give a man $25, $30 or $40 a month—which is not enough—is there any reason why, if the production of the country will justify it, they should not create enough money to give that man $50, which might be somewhere near what he ought to have?

Mr. POULIOT: The government subscribes some money for the relief of a certain group of good Canadians who unfortunately have no means of earning their livelihood. That is true, but that group does not include all Canadians. Those who receive this assistance form only a fraction of our population, and this relief is paid by the taxes which come from the pockets of the rest of the population, as my hon. friend knows. On the other hand, if every Canadian is to receive $25 or $50 a month, who will pay for it? That is my point. If the Canadian parliament has decided, on humanitarian grounds, to give assistance in the form of relief or relief works to that portion of the population which is unemployed, my hon. friend must remember that this is only one part and not the whole population. Furthermore, as my hon. friend knows very well, if everyone were assisted by parliament there would be no more relief. It would be a kind of superannuation for everyone in this country, by means of money voted by parliament.

Suppose we have a group of one hundred people forming the whole population of the world. Of the one hundred two are sick and five are unemployed. These seven are assisted by the remaining ninety-three, out of charity.

Mr. JAQUES: What about the machines?

Mr. POULIOT: I am answering the hon. member for Lethbridge. If any other hon. member desires to ask me a question he may do so. Seven of the one hundred are assisted by the ninety-three remaining. But suppose each of the one hundred receives $25 a month. Would that come from the pocket of A to the pocket of B and from B back to A? Is it just an exchange of money that comes from somewhere else? And if these one hundred people, forming the population of the world, were all unemployed, how would they get $25 or $50 a month or a week?

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is a sincere question, and I think I can bring the answer forcibly to the hon. member's attention in this way: If we continue at our present rate we shall arrive at the point where all the goods and services people can possibly use will be produced by about two per cent of the population. So that really the people who are getting the $50 a month are getting it from the work of the machines, which have so tremendously increased the productive power of our people that it is almost as though we had these hundred people in a lovely valley where all the fruits, all the fishes and everything of that kind were produced in abundance. We know such conditions could exist. We have virtually made this world into such a valley now where we can produce plenty; for we have learned to produce more of every kind of food, clothing, shelter and amusement, than we can use. But we cannot use the labour of all the people; we use machines instead. The question is, shall we let the machines work and let the people have the results of that work, much as one would allow people to pick fruit from the hillsides and catch fish in the streams; or shall we deny all the people who cannot get at the machines the privilege of enjoying any of the benefits derived from the machines which put them out of work? That is the vital question confronting us.

Mr. FAFARD: Is my hon. friend speaking to the amendment or to the resolution?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am just answering the question of the hon. member for Témiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: I was dealing with a world population of one hundred. My hon. friend said that at the rate the machine age was progressing, in the more or less distant future only two per cent of the population would have work.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Probably, I just supposed that.

Mr. POULIOT: Therefore, of the one hundred only two would work, and they would have to provide that $25 a week for the ninety-eight others. This would mean that these two men would have to provide over $100,000 for the support of the ninety-eight others. Each man would require a salary of about $50,000 to give away for the benefit of the others.

Mr. BLACKMORE: My hon. friend is overlooking the work done by the machines; he has not allowed for that. There are just two men managing the machines, and the machines are doing the work. You can get an illustration of that by going to a power plant. After the plant is completed, two or three men can run it and produce all the power needed over a wide area. The power plant is there and is producing this service out of the resources of the country, and the resources and machinery of the country belong to the state, to the people as a whole. That is beyond any question, just as our highways, churches, schools and universities belong to the people, even though those who built and paid for them may be dead. Do I answer the question?

Mr. POULIOT: I do not think my hon. friend has met the point. There are a hundred men together. Only two of those men have purchasing power. In other words, two have to support ninety-eight others. My hon. friend mentioned that there could be a creation of purchasing power. I should like to know how we would increase the purchasing power of the ninety-eight people who have no money at all and no means of getting it?

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is where the state comes in. If the machines operated by two men are producing enough shoes, food and every other kind of goods to feed all of the one hundred, then it will be the state's task to turn the goods into money; for while goods ought to be purchasing power, to-day they are not purchasing power unless they can be sold. The goods must be changed into money before they become genuine purchasing power. The state, using goods, creates purchasing power, tickets, and distributes them to the men, and then the men are able to take part of that supply of goods. That is the kind of situation we are going into, beyond doubt. It is not a question of the amount of income each of the two men can win running the machines. It is the fact that the products of the machines are enough to supply everybody's needs and are changed into purchasing power in the form of money or tickets, as though the machines were creating a great heap of all kinds of goods, and all the people around were enabled to have a share out of the pile. The tickets are made and distributed to the people so that they can buy goods out of the pile. If that is not done you will find this peculiar thing happening: With the two men doing all the work and apparently having all the purchasing power, your machines will run just long enough to feed the two men, while all the others will starve and the machines will stand idle—which would be absurd.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not quite understand the explanation the hon. member has given.

The CHAIRMAN: The questioning between the hon. member for Témiscouata and the hon. member for Lethbridge has been going on for some time. When the hon. member for Témiscouata continues, I would ask him to address his remarks to the chair.

Mr. POULIOT: I will tell you, sir, that I have always addressed the hon. member in the third person. In fact, while I looked at him my observations were addressed to the chair. The matter has been discussed since three o'clock and, seeing that it is now five minutes to six, I hope the chair will not object if we continue until six o'clock. The discussion is regular, provided no other members wish to ask questions. They in their turn may rise, provided each does not speak more than forty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. member proceed with his discussion of the resolution.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. Of course, according to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I shall not ask any more questions of the hon. member for Lethbridge.

Mr. DUNNING: Would the hon. member for Témiscouata permit me to ask a favour of him?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: I would prefer not to continue this discussion this evening, and before six o'clock had intended moving that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. I should think the hon. member would prefer not to break in on his own remarks five minutes from now.

Mr. POULIOT: No; but if the Minister of Finance does not mind I would ask him for some information.

Mr. DUNNING: Very well.

Mr. POULIOT: I should like, first, a tabulation showing the deposits by the public payable on demand in Canada; second, deposits by the public payable after notice or on a fixed day in Canada, and, third, the total monthly clearings of all chartered banks for the last two or three years.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: It seems that that could be done easily.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister. Then, I should like to have a tabulation for the past five years showing the amounts of dividends paid twice a year by each of the chartered banks, and also the total amount of interest paid on deposits twice a year by the banks.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not sure of the latter, but I shall make every effort to get it.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

QUEBEC RAILWAY, LIGHT AND POWER COMPANY

The house again in committee on Bill No. 8, respecting the Quebec Railway, Light and Power Company—Mr. Parent (Quebec West and South)—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Declaratory.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, the other day we had very able explanations of this bill given by two or three hon. members. At page 1412 of Hansard the hon. member for Quebec West and South (Mr. Parent) is reported as having said:

> We claim that the original charter covers whatever forms of transportation science may discover.

I wonder if the hon. member was accurately reported in Hansard?

Mr. PARENT (Quebec West and South): I have not a copy of the Hansard before me, so I cannot answer my hon. friend.

Mr. POULIOT: Does the hon. gentleman say yes?

Mr. PARENT (Quebec West and South): I have not the Hansard before me.

Mr. POULIOT: I will repeat my question. At page 1412 the hon. gentleman is reported as having said:

> We claim that the original charter covers whatever forms of transportation science may discover.

I wonder if the hon. member was accurately reported.

Mr. PARENT (Quebec West and South): To the best of my knowledge I may have said what the hon. member has quoted. I was interpreting section 8 of the original charter of 1895 which provides for the use by the company of "any approved mechanical power or other means, agency or force for such purpose that science or invention may develop." I certainly used the words "that science or invention may develop," if that is what my hon. friend is referring to, because those are the words used in the original charter of 1895.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank my hon. friend for his explanation, but if he is correctly reported there is no need for this bill. He is proposing that the original charter be amended to permit the company to use buses, but if the original charter covers whatever forms of transportation science may develop the present bill is useless.

I should like to summarize what has happened in this case. It is to be regretted at times that the evidence which is given before all the committees of the house is not recorded. Able counsel for the Quebec Railway company, after numerous questions had been put to them, admitted in the committee that the company was operating buses; that it was also operating taxis, and further, that it controlled the majority of shares in the Quebec Cartage Company. The Quebec Cartage Company is a taxi and truck company, and therefore they do not need this legislation at all. In other words, the Quebec Railway Company comes here just to be in a position to state that the Quebec utilities commission has no jurisdiction over the rates that the company may charge the travelling public, and this bill is just a smoke-screen. I do not see how the committee can approve it. That is my first point.

But there are other considerations. The agreement between the railway company and the city of Quebec is one that apparently requires approval by the dominion parliament. At least six or eight times there have been previous agreements between the city of Quebec and the Quebec Railway company, but at none of these times did both parties come to parliament for approval. They went to the Quebec legislature, and I do not see why they do not follow the same procedure now. There is no reason for changing their procedure, because we have no jurisdiction whatever in such matters.

May I remind the committee of another statement which was made by Mr. J. A. Nadeau, chief counsel for the city of Quebec, before the railway committee. He was asked if it was the intention of the city to have the same exclusive franchise for buses as they have already for trolley cars for a period of thirty years from 1925 to 1955, and he answered affirmatively. That, of course, is outside the knowledge of hon. members who have not attended the sittings of the railway committee.

Therefore, sir, because this parliament has no jurisdiction over buses that operate within one province only, and because the purpose of the city of Quebec is to secure by this disguised legislation an exclusive franchise, it seems to me that this committee should not approve the bill.

Section agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report this bill?

Mr. O'NEILL: Mr. Chairman, there were some remarks that I wanted to make on this bill. I tried to make them on the former occasion on which the bill was in committee, but I was told I was too late then. I do not know whether I am too late again now, but if I am in order I should like to say a few words. The company contend that conditions have changed since they obtained their franchise and they now wish to operate trolley buses and auto buses. I am quite prepared to grant them that privilege, but they also wish to operate in addition "all kinds of public or private conveyances." I think that takes in a little too much territory. I do not understand why they should want to provide now for some sort of conveyance that may be operating five or six years from now under some different name from trolley bus or auto bus. It seems to me that if they get what they are asking for now, the right to operate trolley buses and auto buses, they should be quite satisfied with that. Then, in five or ten years' time, if there is some other sort of public conveyance for which they wish to have a franchise, they can come and get it. They have not offered me any reasonable excuse why they should ask for that. It is that to which I want to object, and to be on record as objecting to that clause: "all kinds of public or private conveyances."

If they are willing to delete that clause, I am quite willing that the bill should pass; otherwise I want my vote registered against it.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. POULIOT: Carried on division.

Bill reported on division, read the third time and passed.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION

AMENDMENT OF ACT TO EXTEND AVAILABILITY OF BALANCE OF APPROPRIATION FOR NEXT FIVE FISCAL YEARS

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 33, to amend the Technical Education Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Disposition of unexpended balances.

Mr. LAWSON: Is this the general clause which provides for the continuance of the grant? It is perfectly apparent, from the fact that the full grant was taken up by most of the provinces within the time originally limited, that technical education is regarded very highly in many provinces. In addition to that, the national employment commission apparently recommended the continuance and extension of technical education as a means of youth training. Would the minister have any objection to advising the committee whether or not the government is giving serious consideration to the matter of extending grants for technical education, or, in other words, creating a new grant such as the original bill of 1919 provided in order that it might be furthered? I quite realize the minister may say that at this time he is not prepared to make any announcement; but I suggest to the minister that it is a live subject of discussion, particularly in the industrial centres, and the people of those centres are very much interested in knowing whether such a scheme is contemplated.

Mr. ROGERS: The question asked by my hon. friend is an entirely relevant one. As a matter of fact, the bill before the committee simply provides for a continuance of the old grants, and only one province, Manitoba, is in a position where it may take advantage of the original grants under the act of 1919. As to any extension of the policy which was given expression in the original act of 1919, my hon. friend is aware that the government must naturally choose its own time for any statement of policy.

Mr. LAWSON: Quite right.

Mr. ROGERS: We had to consider this whole question rather carefully when we undertook certain responsibilities in connection with youth training. The specific recommendation of the national employment commission was that this government should, in cooperation with the provinces, make technical training available for unemployed young people. We have been doing that under the youth training plan. It has already been announced that at this session of parliament a bill will be introduced to provide for a continuance of youth training over a period of three years, so that I should feel that in very large measure the government had responded to the opinion which, I agree, is prevalent in the country, that there is a need for technical education. We did accept the view that the need was most urgent with respect to unemployed young people, and as I have said, we are seeking to meet that need through the youth training program.

Mr. LAWSON: I have no desire to condemn this government for the provision it has made to implement a recommendation of the national employment commission. As a matter of fact, I commend this government for the extent to which it has gone. I wish it understood I am not speaking in a political sense.

Mr. ROGERS: Quite.

Mr. LAWSON: I think this question is above mere partisan politics. I understand that the youth training projects which this government contemplated and for which money has been voted have been sabotaged—I do not use the word in an offensive sense—by lack of cooperation on the part of the government of Ontario, and my information is that there is about $135,000 now available through the department which might be taken advantage of for youth training in technical education in Ontario. If I am in error in the figure the minister can correct me. It is obvious, it seems to me, that for some reason best known to themselves the government of Ontario are not receptive to the idea of using that money in the form in which it has been given for the training of youth in technical education in that province. I am confident that the minister is sincere in his desire to advance youth training and technical education, and I suggest that as an alternative to his present scheme, which apparently is resisted in Ontario—I do not know about the other provinces—he might very well consider the idea of going back to the original scheme of providing a fund on the basis of the original Technical Education Act, which might be taken advantage of in the provinces, and which, I believe, would be made use of in Ontario.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wonder if any of the money which the minister appears to have on hand under the vote for technical education could be used for aviation purposes. The Toronto board of education are anxious to extend their facilities for instruction in aviation. In 1932 or 1933, or earlier, the board commenced teaching matters pertaining to aviation in a branch of the technical school on Bathurst street. They now desire to branch out considerably because, as the minister knows, there is a large number of young men who would make first-class aviators, but unfortunately it is too expensive to teach them. A few days ago the board sent a letter to Ottawa asking the Toronto members to support their request for an increase in aviation facilities under the technical school grant. I assume that the minister has seen that communication and has been in touch with the board.

In the branch of the technical school located on Bathurst street the facilities are altogether inadequate for further advance in the subject. Is it possible to use some of this money to assist the board not only in the development of an aviation curriculum in the city but for the purpose of promoting cooperation in some way with one or more of the flying schools located in the vicinity of Toronto? If that is not satisfactory, perhaps they could start flying courses themselves outside the city where students could finish their education as aviators. I do not know whether that conflicts with what the government is doing at present. I understand that a few years ago a number of students who had obtained initial education in aviation in the Toronto technical school graduated either to Camp Borden or to Trenton. If some of the money could be used by the government for these purposes two very useful purposes would be served. In the first place, an opportunity would be afforded a good many young Canadians to learn aviation from the beginning, as I suppose they do now—that is, all about the machines, engines and so on. Second, provision would be made for turning out well trained young men for commercial aviation or perhaps for another form of flying which we hope will never be necessary.

Mr. ROGERS: It is quite true that the government has received requests from the board of education of Toronto in connection with an enlargement of their facilities for aeronautical engineering. I met a delegation from the board some time ago and discussed with them what might be done to assist their efforts in that direction. I was obliged to inform them that there was no appropriation from which a grant could be made for the construction of a building for that purpose. Even under the old Technical Education Act of 1919, as my hon. friend is no doubt aware, only twenty-five per cent of the annual grants could be expended for capital purposes; the balance was to be spent rather for purposes of actual instruction given to students in the technical schools.

I fully agree with the hon. member in regard to the importance of aeronautical engineering at this time. As a matter of fact, through the Department of Transport and the Department of National Defence, the government is giving a measure of assistance to instruction in aviation and aeronautical engineering. That is done not only through assistance given to municipal airports but also through encouragement and assistance given the flying clubs. In addition to that, Trans-Canada Air Lines has established a school of its own in Winnipeg for the training of its own pilots and mechanical staff.

As to any money being available under the legislation now before the committee for the purpose mentioned by my hon. friend, he will be aware from the previous discussion that the only amount made available by this legislation is for Manitoba. No portion of the money could therefore be made available for technical education in Ontario.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The minister will agree with me, I think, that Alberta has cooperated with his department to the fullest extent in the youth training projects.

Mr. ROGERS: That is correct.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I do not know whether the other provinces have cooperated as wholeheartedly. Could we at this time direct a question or two to the minister regarding the success of these projects?

Mr. ROGERS: I have no desire to restrict discussion, but there will be ample opportunity to discuss youth training in all its aspects when the legislation providing for a three year program of youth training is before the house. I suggest that it would be preferable to wait until then.

Mr. LAWSON: That is not yet on the order paper.

Mr. ROGERS: No.

Mr. MacINNIS: Will the minister say how much of this $10,000,000 is still available for Manitoba and whether that province has ever taken advantage of any part of its share of the fund?

Mr. ROGERS: The total amount available to Manitoba was $719,746.56. The amount paid to Manitoba, during the entire period from 1919 to the present date, is $433,709.17. The amount still available to that province is $286,037.39.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What about Alberta?

Mr. ROGERS: Alberta exhausted its grant in the second period of the act from 1929 to 1934.

Mr. HANSON: Is anything available for British Columbia?

Mr. ROGERS: British Columbia has also exhausted its original allotment under the legislation.

Mr. HAYHURST: How much of this $10,000,000 is left to be expended?

Mr. ROGERS: The total amount to be expended is $286,037.39, and that can be expended only by Manitoba. All other provinces have taken up their full allotment under the original legislation and the later amending acts.

Mr. POULIOT: What was the allotment and expenditure for Quebec?

Mr. ROGERS: The allotment was $2,569,655.53, which has been fully taken up.

Mr. POULIOT: During what year?

Mr. ROGERS: The province of Quebec exhausted its allotment in the second period, that is, from 1929 to 1934.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Has the minister a table showing how much was allotted to each province? If the whole statement were put on Hansard we would have a record.

Mr. ROGERS: With the consent of the committee I am glad to put on record a statement of the total allotments under the original legislation, and the amount outstanding for Manitoba.

Statement showing disposition of funds under the Technical Education Act as at the end of September, 1938

	Amount available during period of act	Amounts paid by federal government as at September 30, 1938	Balance

	$10,000,000 00	$9,713,962 61	$286,037 39

Mr. LANDERYOU: Could the minister give the number of youths dealt with in each province?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not that information, and I doubt very much whether it is available in the Department of Labour. The federal government paid grants in aid to the provinces under the legislation, but the number enrolled in the various courses would be in the provincial records, not in the records of the Department of Labour.

Mr. POULIOT: What will happen to-morrow when young men read that this committee has passed a bill for the purpose of spending some part of $10,000,000 appropriated under the Technical Education Extension Act? Most of them will think that members of parliament can distribute part of $10,000,000 for education, and many of them will want a slice of that for their own education. They will tell us, "You voted $10,000,000, I hope personally to take advantage of that." It is embarrassing for members of parliament to whom such requests are directed. In our province we write to a gentleman who is in charge of this scheme, and he always answers very nicely the letters of recommendation which are sent for anyone who seeks to take advantage of that act. But to my knowledge very few, at least from my constituency, have derived any benefit from it.

Before going any further, I should like to know from the minister if this act applies only to the sons of those on relief, or if it applies to any young man who is willing to learn a trade.

Mr. ROGERS: Perhaps I have not made it sufficiently clear that the legislation now before the committee is not designed to carry out the objects of the youth training program. This is merely a continuation of the Technical Education Act of 1919 in order that one province, Manitoba, which has not taken up its full allotment, may be permitted to do so. The form of the bill is similar to the amending acts of 1929 and 1934. I agree with my hon. friend that it would be unfortunate if the impression went out from this house that we are dealing in this bill with an appropriation of $10,000,000. But I am sure that we may rely upon the press to put the position correctly. The whole purpose of this bill is to permit one province, Manitoba, to take up what portion of its original grant under the act of 1919 may still be claimed under the provisions of that statute.

Mr. POULIOT: I understand that the federal government has nothing at all to do with the distribution of that money? Grants are made to the provinces, which decide to what individuals the money shall be awarded; is that the idea? Or does the dominion government give scholarships from that amount to private individuals?

Mr. ROGERS: The hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) may be confusing this bill with the youth training program. As I explained earlier in this discussion, legislation dealing with the youth training program will be introduced later in this session. The present bill has one object only, which is to permit Manitoba to take up its remaining portion of the allotment under the legislation of 1919. Under that legislation the dominion government made certain grants available annually for the assistance of technical education in the provinces. The procedure was that an agreement was entered into between the dominion government and the provincial government respecting the expenditure of the federal grant. That agreement, of course, was bound by the terms of the statute, which stated that not more than twenty-five per cent of the annual grant payable to any province should be used for acquiring land or erecting or improving buildings or supplying furnishings or equipment. I suggest to my hon. friend that the other matters to which he has referred would properly, and most usefully be considered, when we have before us the measure dealing with the youth training program.

Mr. POULIOT: Have the amounts which the minister has already mentioned, and which will appear on Hansard, been paid to the provinces, or to individuals?

Mr. ROGERS: To the provinces, not to individuals.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Would it not be possible to extend this bill? It has been very satisfactory in its operation in connection with technical education in Toronto—I am speaking of Toronto particularly—and the minister has seen Doctor Butt of the department of education in respect to his request for money for aeronautical training. Since this scheme has worked so well, would it not be possible to have more money appropriated so that the department might be able to meet the request of the Toronto board of education to carry on this excellent work, especially in view of the times in which we live?

Mr. ROGERS: I doubt whether on that point I can add anything to what I have already said. There is no lack of appreciation of the importance of aeronautical engineering, nor has there been any disposition on the part of the government not to do its part in supporting aviation. But as I have suggested, that is done through the Department of Transport and the Department of National Defence. Under the present measure it is not proposed to extend the Technical Education Act apart from the one purpose indicated, namely, to permit Manitoba to take up its full allocation under the legislation.

Mr. MacINNIS: I fully appreciate that this bill could not be extended beyond the specific point with which it deals. But I do not think there should be any misunderstanding either in the house or in the country as to the Technical Education Act itself, that is, the act by which assistance was rendered to the provinces for the purpose of technical education. I feel quite sure that most of the allocation to British Columbia was spent in the city of Vancouver. I happened to have something to do with the school board there during part of the time when this money was being expended on technical schools and furnishings for those schools. But there is a great deal in the point that has been raised by a number of hon. members, particularly those from the city of Toronto, that the time is opportune for the passing of another technical education assistance act, because I doubt if the demand on the school boards of the various cities for technical education was ever as great as it is now, and I do not believe the youth training projects will meet that demand in its entirety. That again, I think, is something separate. I believe the time is opportune for the government to give consideration to the extension of aid of this kind to the educational authorities in the various provinces.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not like to repeat what has been said already. The minister no doubt has seen this brief from the board of education of the city of Toronto, and I think he will realize that there is not sufficient space in the main building of the school in question. They went to the extent of renting a garage, or something like that, as a temporary arrangement, because the building is so badly crowded. I should like to point out the success they have had in their endeavour. One hundred boys have graduated from this four year course, and ninety per cent of those boys are employed at the present time, most of them, I understand, by firms engaged in aircraft production. Some have obtained positions with firms that put a premium on a high degree of efficiency, accuracy and care. Thirty-six boys graduated from the aircraft course, of whom twenty-one have secured employment.

As I understand it, this act had the dual purpose of making grants for the education of the youth as well as providing accommodation for the education of these boys. When we think of the number of young boys walking around these days who have never had jobs, it seems to me that the government might take into consideration the further extension of this act, because it has worked very well so far. I believe, too, that these men who are giving of their time in the city of Toronto, the board of education, an excellent body which is doing such great work, should have their efforts appreciated and that they should be allowed to carry on this work. They are the people who have most to do with the education of these boys, and I believe it would be a splendid thing if these people had the money to spend on the necessary buildings and equipment. So I would ask the minister to consider extending this bill to serve further the purpose that it has served previously.

Mr. LAWSON: Supplementing what I said a few moments ago in favour of consideration of the introduction of a further technical education act providing new and additional grants, I should like to leave a thought with the minister, which in turn he might present to his colleagues when dealing with the matter, in a light which probably has not occurred to him. We are all agreed that it would be a real contribution to the solution of the unemployment problem, particularly among the youth of the country, to provide further technical education in certain lines of mechanics. We are also aware that a terrific handicap is at present placed upon boards of education, certainly in urban centres, by the burden of municipal taxation. Within its jurisdiction this government probably cannot very well make a contribution towards the direct relief of that burden of taxation, because the municipalities are creatures of the province. I suggest to the minister, however, that this government might make a contribution to the relief of that burden in an indirect way. That is, they might further advance technical education, thus helping to solve the problem of unemployment among our youth, by making new grants for technical education which could be taken advantage of by the municipalities without imposing a further burden of municipal taxation upon property owners in the municipality.

If the government does not consider that a wise and feasible suggestion then might I suggest to the minister, in view of the fact that Ontario has not cooperated in taking advantage of the money already granted for youth training projects, and in view of the fact that the minister has intimated that later in the session there will be introduced a youth training project which will be a three year plan, that before the introduction of that new legislation he might advantageously confer with the minister of labour of Ontario in an endeavour to bring down in this house a plan under which the government of that province will cooperate, so that Ontario youths may obtain the benefit of these training projects. In any event, if agreement cannot be reached, when that bill comes down in this house the minister will be able to advise us as to why it is not possible to get that measure of cooperation which we all so much desire.

Mr. ROGERS: Dealing first with the observations of the hon. member for St. Paul's, I agree entirely with him as to the value of the work done by the technical schools of the city of Toronto. As a matter of fact I was greatly impressed by what was presented to me by the delegation from the board of education of that city. On the other hand, I was obliged to tell them that there was no federal appropriation from which a grant could be made for the construction or enlargement of the technical school in which aeronautical engineering was being taught. I believe they went away persuaded that this was the case, though naturally they were disappointed and would have been pleased if they had received word that they could be given some direct financial assistance.

As to the point raised by the hon. member for York South, under the youth training program provision is not made for capital equipment. We do contribute to rentals of buildings and equipment, but our thought was that those who were enrolled for training should receive the maximum benefit of the various training projects. At the same time we felt that most of the provinces would be able, through their schools, to provide facilities for training purposes. We did not wish to duplicate those facilities, and in that I believe we were following a sound and economical course.

As to Ontario not having taken up its full allocation under the youth training program, I can say only that in the present year, according to my present knowledge of the amount actually expended, there is still available for that province the sum of about $220,000.

Mr. LAWSON: That is more than I had thought. I believe I mentioned the sum of $135,000.

[Mr. Douglas G. Ross.]

Mr. ROGERS: I shall ascertain the exact figure and see that it appears correctly in Hansard to-morrow. However, the full amount has not been taken up in Ontario, as it has in all the other provinces. It is, of course, for each province to determine what projects shall be established. Naturally any government in dealing with these matters is governed by consideration of what expenditures are most urgent. It is not a case of doing this and that, but rather a case of doing this or that. We did feel, and it is still my view, that the most urgent need comes from unemployed groups, and that is why through the youth training program we have been attempting to give special assistance to unemployed young people. Under a renewal of the Technical Education Act we would be assisting unemployed groups only in a limited degree—a much more limited degree than we are assisting them under the youth training program.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What measure of success has been secured in providing employment for youth under these past projects?

Mr. ROGERS: Upon that point we have not the figures available as to placement of those who have received training in the various technical schools of the provinces, but I shall have that information in respect to youth training when the measure is before the house.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): May I say the deputation from the board of education went away quite happy in their minds. I was wondering whether the minister has suggested to them some way in which they might overcome this difficulty, particularly in view of the success they have had. They were very happy about it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I understand Manitoba is the only province which has not drawn its full allotment.

Mr. ROGERS: Correct.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Has the minister the approximate dates when the other provinces drew the last of their allotments? Have they been going for a number of years without any further grants from this sum of money?

Mr. ROGERS: Eight of the provinces were unable to earn their full appropriations during the ten years contemplated by the statute, that is during the years 1919 to 1929. The act was extended at the 1929 session for a period of five years, in order to give those eight provinces a further opportunity to earn the balance of the funds to which under the provisions of the act they were originally entitled. Ontario was the only province which had earned and received its entire allotment at the termination of the ten year period. Between 1929 and 1934 five other provinces, namely British Columbia, Alberta, Quebec, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island received the balance of their apportionments. Two other provinces namely, Nova Scotia and Saskatchewan, continued in the period 1934 to 1939 to take up their allotments. The purpose of the present legislation is to permit Manitoba to take up its full allotment.

PENITENTIARIES

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION WITH POWERS OF ADMINISTRATION AND CONTROL

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 34, respecting penitentiaries.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Perhaps at this point I might give some information which was asked for yesterday during the debate on the resolution. I should like to place on record first the information as to the number of penitentiaries in Canada, the staffs in each of them, and the convict population. There are eight penitentiaries, counting the three at Kingston. They are as follows: Dorchester; St. Vincent de Paul, Kingston—and at that point there is the women's prison as well as the new penitentiary at Collin's Bay—Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. The following table will serve to show the convict population and staff at each penitentiary:

Penitentiary	Convict population	Staff (guards and officers)
Dorchester	457	114
St. Vincent de Paul	1,033	223
Kingston (main penitentiary)	702	169
Kingston (women's prison)	31	6
Kingston (Collin's Bay)	250	101
Manitoba	364	103
Saskatchewan	463	117
British Columbia	328	101
	3,628	934

I was also asked by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) as to the increase in the penitentiary population during the period of the depression. The prisoners in custody in federal penitentiaries were as follows, on March 31 of each year: 1930, 3,187; 1931, 3,714; 1932, 4,164; 1933, 4,587; 1934, 4,220; 1935, 3,552; 1936, 3,098; 1937, 3,264; 1938, 3,584; and on February 10, 1939, 3,598: So it is gratifying to note that the fears of the hon. member for Kootenay East were not quite justified, because the population in the penitentiaries is not greater than it was nine or ten years ago.

Other encouraging statistics are as to the number of younger men in the penitentiaries. The hon. member for Kootenay East thought the number of younger men in the penitentiaries had increased in an alarming way, but that is not so. I will give the number of young men under twenty-one, in the penitentiaries for a certain number of years. In 1929 the number was 322. That is a good deal too many but the number has not increased compared with later years. In 1930 the number of young men under twenty-one in the penitentiaries was 377; in 1931, 484; in 1932, 527; in 1933, 467; in 1934, 409; in 1935, 325; in 1936, 280; in 1937, 317. I am sorry I have not the figures for 1938, but the numbers in 1936 and 1937 were smaller than in 1929, in a period of great prosperity.

The number between the ages of twenty-one and thirty is perhaps a little larger. In 1937, there were 1,515 men between those ages in the penitentiaries, while in 1929 there were 1,270. On the other hand, in 1932 the number was 1,900; in 1933, 2,052; in 1934, 1,916. So the number has been decreasing rather than increasing since 1933. The figures for men between the ages of thirty and forty are in about the same proportion. I suppose the committee is not interested in knowing the numbers between forty and fifty, and between fifty and sixty, because it was rather with regard to the younger men that questions were asked.

Those figures, Mr. Chairman, show the vastness of the problem, and I feel that those who thought a commission of three was unnecessary to administer such an important branch of the affairs of our country did not grasp the magnitude of the work to be done or the contact, supervision and control which the heads of the penitentiary branch must exercise over this considerable population of convicts and in the management of every one of these institutions. There is, of course, this other feature, the great importance of improving in every way possible not only the management but ways and means of reforming those who are susceptible to reformation, and to give to that branch of social service in every way the consideration and attention which it deserves.

Mr. MacNEIL: I would suggest to the minister that in order to get a complete picture of the criminal problem, although perhaps this does not definitely relate to the bill under discussion, we should have statistics of the prison population in provincial institutions. I do not know whether that information is in the possession of the Department of Justice.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No, those records are absolutely outside our control, and I am sorry I cannot supply that information.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, I had expected the minister to tell us in a general way something about the improvements that are proposed. Not having received the bill until a few minutes ago, I have had no chance to look through it, and it is difficult to discuss the clauses unless we have some idea of what is proposed to be done. I understood the minister to say that we are going to have a commission.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is all.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am opposed to any more commissions unless they are of civil servants under the department. But if we are to have an independent commission with full power to do what it likes in the matter of employing people—and I see this commission has the right to select guards and all that—I never saw a commission yet that, in the spending of money, did not go away beyond the expectations of those who created it, and unless some limit is imposed upon the power of employing anyone and everyone it wishes to employ, I am not in accord with this commission idea.

Apart from that, I remember very well that when the minister was speaking on this question a year ago, something was said to the effect that other methods would be introduced to cure the evils that had apparently grown up in our penitentiary system. If the bill has in it anything in that regard I should like the minister to let us know. If it has, I shall have some further comments to make.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I wonder whether my hon. friend was in the house when the resolution was being discussed.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, I was.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Well, I cannot say more than I said at that time. This bill, although it seems to be a voluminous document, is really a reenactment of the Penitentiary Act as it was, in all its provisions, except that a commission of three, instead of a superintendent, is to administer the penitentiaries.

As to the reforms to be made, some of them, as I said yesterday, are merely changes in the regulations which do not necessitate waiting for the appointment of the commission. But the recommendations of the investigating commissioners will be given effect by means of legislation. My purpose—and it was also one of the recommendations of the commissioners—is that such legislation should be scrutinized in the light of the conditions which the new commission will find, and approved, before it is submitted to parliament by the Minister of Justice, under whose control the penitentiaries branch will continue to be.

So I cannot give my hon. friend more details about the bill. He says that he is opposed to a commission because he does not know of any commission which has not spread and has not expanded its activities. My hope is that the penitentiaries commission will expand its activities in this momentous part of the civil service. There are reforms which have been suggested which may be commendable—the Borstal system, for instance, which is one way of attending to the young offenders; and there are other ways. But the Borstal or any other system cannot be put into operation without the proper buildings, without the accommodation necessary for that purpose, so that a pretty large expenditure is involved. As I said, this will have to be carefully studied and considered by the commission which will be at the head of this service and will, I hope, consist of men of ability and experience who will help myself, the government and parliament to do our duty in this regard.

Mr. MacNICOL: I certainly hope that the objective the minister has in mind will be carried out. As was said the other evening—and there is no harm in repeating it—the house has confidence in the minister himself, and perhaps the system would have done better under his direction.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I thank my hon. friend, but some people do not think so.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have had some experience in investigating prison reform. I spent some time two years ago in investigating Wakefield, near Leeds, looking into the Borstal system.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Which prison?

Mr. MacNICOL: Near Leeds. Wakefield is about eight miles or less from Leeds. I had the good fortune to meet, in the city itself, a gentleman who, I believe, was the original proposer of the idea that humane treatment of prisoners would work a marvellous reform, and be much more effective than ill treatment.

Mr. HARRIS: How long did the hon. member serve there?

Mr. MacNICOL: I will state that in a few minutes. At Wakefield I learned that the official who had introduced the system there had been transferred to Barlinnie prison at Glasgow; in fact I got a telegram from the home office suggesting that I could proceed to Barlinnie and discuss the subject with the man who, more than any other I was told, was responsible for making the Borstal system a success. The minister will not mind if I tell him that I spent seven hours in Barlinnie, not of course as a prisoner. I wanted to understand thoroughly how the reform plan was being carried out. After reading the report through, what I have been wondering is if it is the intention of the department—I believe it is—to instruct the commissioners to carry out to the best advantage, of course under Canadian conditions, the means and methods which have resulted in such a reduction in the old country of second offenders, third offenders and so forth. Certainly they have had great results over there; compared with what I have observed here in Canada the results they have achieved are remarkable.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, but my hon. friend realizes our difficulties in Canada, because of the provincial gaols.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, I was just coming to that.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We cannot do what they are doing over there, because we have no control over a very large number of prisoners.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was just coming to that matter, and further, to the fact that conditions of administration and taking care of offenders are much more difficult here than in the old land because over there, if an offender escapes, he cannot get off the island, and the effect is that the incentive to try to escape is not one-two-three in the old country what it is in Canada and the United States where escaped prisoners can go such long distances and move from one country to another.

In reference to what the minister has just said about the difficulty of administering prison affairs and reforms in Canada compared with England because of the amount of control retained by the provinces, on reading over the report I noticed that the second of the eighteen recommendations made by the commission is:

> An immediate conference between the federal and provincial authorities should be held with a view to obtaining the full cooperation of the provincial authorities in putting the recommendations of the commission into effect.

I should like to know whether that conference has been held. It has not been held?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No. As I stated last year when I tried to get the immediate appointment of that commission, I desire the commission to take over and study the whole problem before we communicate with the provinces.

Mr. MacNICOL: The whole problem, as I said, is one of reducing the number of second and third offenders and so forth; in other words, of improving by proper administration the mentality and the inclination of the prisoner himself to really reform. I assume that is the main objective of the report. There is nothing I can add in view of what the minister has just said.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister has given the convict population of the eight penitentiaries in the nine provinces. I wonder if he would explain how the distribution of those convicts is carried out. I do not think, for instance, to take the one in British Columbia, that the number 328 necessarily means that they are all prisoners convicted in British Columbia, does it? They are moved about from province to province in accordance with certain views of the superintendent. Will that distribution now be in the hands of the commission?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Generally speaking, the population of the British Columbia penitentiary is composed of prisoners sentenced in that province. In Prince Albert they are the prisoners sentenced in Alberta and Saskatchewan; in Manitoba there is Stoney Mountain; in Ontario, Kingston; in Quebec, St. Vincent de Paul; and in the three maritime provinces, Dorchester. It happens occasionally that for the good of the management—and the minister has power in this regard—transfers are made from one penitentiary to another, but that is because of exceptional circumstances. For instance, as was said yesterday, a certain number of men were transferred a couple of weeks ago from Kingston to the western penitentiaries. That was because of overcrowding in Kingston. We hope that with the improvements which will be made and the necessary enlargement of the buildings in the various penitentiaries this will be avoided in the future, and there is actually in Kingston extension work being carried on which subsequently will provide the necessary space. These transfers are made with great care and there has been no trouble of any kind. The convicts have suffered no ill effects as a result, and as a matter of fact they are much better off in a prison in which there is adequate accommodation than they would be if they were crowded, as they were in Kingston, owing to an increase in population. Generally speaking, each penitentiary serves a certain section of the country.

Mr. STIRLING: The female convicts are all congregated at Kingston?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They are all at Kingston, and I am pleased to say the number is very small. There are at present thirty-one female convicts in Canada, which speaks well for the weaker sex.

Mr. BROOKS: I have read quite closely the report of the royal commission and I must say I was much surprised at it. There seems to be, according to the report, hardly any penitentiary in Canada, which has been conducted properly in the past. The commissioners found fault with the guards, with those in charge, with the commissary, with the stewards in every penitentiary, with the recreation and schools. In fact, there was no branch of the penitentiary service that was not severely criticized in the report. What particular qualifications had these commissioners to pass such severe censure upon the penitentiaries of the country? Unfortunately we have had penitentiaries in Canada for a good many years; but surely the majority of the men in charge of these institutions must have been better qualified for the work they were doing than this commission has given them credit for. I consider the report a severe criticism of the administration of our Canadian penitentiaries. Have any changes been already made in the administration of the penitentiaries, on the basis of the commission's report?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): As regards the first question, I may repeat what I said yesterday. The commission to investigate penitentiaries was appointed because of public demand which had been heard for many years and which had become increasingly difficult to resist, and more particularly because of troubles in penitentiaries prior to the setting up of that commission. At one time there was considerable trouble in some of the penitentiaries, and the press of Canada had been insisting upon an investigation.

When it came to the appointment of the commissioners there was difficulty, just as the appointment of a permanent commission will be a difficult task to perform. The three commissioners first appointed were these: There was Mr. Justice Archambault, who is a judge of the high court of the province of Quebec, who had great experience in criminal matters, having been crown prosecutor for the district of Montreal, which I suppose was the largest in the country for many years. Then there was Mr. Anderson, then editor of the Globe. The press had taken such an interest in this matter that it was thought advisable to have from among its number a permanent member on the commission. Unfortunately my good friend Mr. Anderson died almost immediately after he was appointed. Mr. McRuer, K.C., who was appointed to replace him, was recommended more particularly by those who had been very much pleased with the appointment of Mr. Anderson—I refer to that section of the community which was impressed with the idea that some improvements ought to be made and some changes effected. The same element, more especially those who are interested in prison reform and who had recommended Mr. Anderson, were also recommending Mr. McRuer. Mr. McRuer had had a wide experience not only in legal matters but in criminal law, having been counsel on commissions concerned with some penitentiary troubles and other matters. As regards the other commissioner, we thought we should have a western man, and Mr. Craig, K.C., of Winnipeg, who was also crown counsel, having been attorney general of Manitoba for some years, was appointed. Of course it is always possible to criticize any appointment, but we try to get the best men possible. Others might prefer other names, but we thought we could not do better than appoint these three men. My hon. friend may not be satisfied with all they say in that report, but one thing he will admit, that the report evidences a great amount of work on the part of those commissioners.

As to the other question, I repeat what I said last year—and that is why I was very sorry that the bill did not become law last year. I do not want those recommendations put into effect before this commission is appointed and before those men, who are expert and who devote their ability to this service, have an opportunity to consider carefully every one of those recommendations.

Then I as Minister of Justice, on their report, will submit to parliament any legislation which is necessary.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am concerned about the long delay in getting something done along these lines. I notice the summary of recommendations of the commission contains some eighty-eight clauses. This is a pretty wide program, and while it is true that in making the recommendations the commissioners did urge that a commission should be appointed at once, they also recognized that there would have to be a well planned program. Two questions occur to me in this connection. A number of these recommendations deal with much more than the care of people in penitentiaries. The other night the minister said:

> This legislation is to take care of prisoners. Of course the heads of penitentiaries are vitally interested in anything which would tend to cure existing evils and help reform the men committed to their charge, as well as to protect society against them.

Evidently this bill is intended primarily to take care of prisoners, but what is to be done about the larger program of crime prevention? Is that to come specifically under the charge of these commissioners to be appointed?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The prevention of crime is as much my hon. friend's responsibility as my own; that is, the work of all men who are interested in social matters, not specifically the work of the management of penitentiaries.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But that is part of the work that must be undertaken, according to the report of the commissioners. We live in a scientific age, and I do not think most of us believe that people commit crimes because of native depravity. We recognize that there are certain conditions of environment which tend to foster crime. Some people may be born better and some worse, but in practice I think people with decent environment have a much better chance to live a decent sort of life, and will do so; whereas if people have to live in slums, half starved and subject to temptation on all sides, they are more likely to go wrong.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I quite agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am very glad; I thought the minister would. My first question is: Who is going to be charged with this special task of trying to discover those causes which lead to crime, and setting to work in our communities those remedial agencies which at least help to prevent the production of criminals? So far as I have been able to learn by glancing at the bill, there does not seem to me much in it that would provide for that. Are we to have nothing in the way of implementing that broader program?

Then there are a number of recommendations which seem to call for pretty definite legislation. I mentioned one the other night, that of the indeterminate sentence. There is a suggestion or recommendation of a somewhat extensive revision of the criminal code, and new classifications of prisoners. My second question is, these commissioners having been appointed—and I was delighted that the minister came out in such a forthright way and said there would be no political considerations in their appointment, but they would be men who would commend themselves to the public generally—I should like to know whether these new commissioners will have the machinery at their disposal so that they can carry out this program without waiting another year, thus delaying action long overdue.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The prevention of crime of course is a matter in which we are all interested. My hon. friend suggested the abolition of slums, which are hotbeds of crime; he is quite right, but of course this will have to be dealt with in conjunction with other branches of the service and with the provinces. Here again there are certain spheres or domains on which we cannot very well trespass. But we all have the matter at heart, and I have no doubt that the men who will be at the head of this penitentiaries commission will do their best to cooperate with any other authority in any measures which would lead to the suppression of crime.

The treatment in prisons may have much to do with reforming men. There are two schools of thought in Canada as elsewhere; there is the one that thinks criminals are criminals anyway, that they are born so and that we should not try to reform them. I think that school is wrong. At the other extreme are those who would have them pampered, and released as soon as possible. But the protection of society must always be considered. Those two points of view have to be taken into account in dealing with this matter. For the benefit of the first school, those who say we should not do anything for the criminal, I point out that in a study made before that royal commission it is shown that on January 1, 1938, 188 prisoners confined in Canadian penitentiaries had been convicted more than ten times, and have cost the public of this country approximately $4,500,000, or $25,000 each. So, if we look at the question only from the point of view of cost in dollars and cents to the taxpayer, without any regard to the humanitarian aspect, the answer is still the same; society and the country are interested in trying to prevent this recidivism which costs the people of Canada so much, as well as making those men a danger to their fellow men, and derelicts without hope in this world.

That is where the question of the young offenders comes to the fore, and it ought to be taken care of and dealt with in the best possible way. There is no doubt that to send to the penitentiaries young men who may have made only one mistake, and to mix them up with hardened criminals, makes those young men lose what they had in the world in the way of opportunity and hope. It is our duty and the duty of all those who want to improve conditions in this country to try to bring about the best possible conditions not only in prison management but in the other, larger questions which my hon. friend has mentioned.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then there is the second question. Is the minister convinced that we have sufficient machinery, that is, are sufficient changes being made in the law, to permit these commissioners to go to work immediately? Can they make the classifications and do the other things that are recommended by the royal commission?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Of course we have the whole branch, which is a pretty effective machine at the present time. The commission will have the present staff. The inspectors will become assistant commissioners; they will change their title, but they will be the same officers, and of course there will be need of additional officers if we carry out all the recommendations. But as the commission itself stated, the changes will have to be made gradually, by stages or instalments, if you like. That is the only way to achieve real and lasting progress.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: For instance, there are changes that will have to be made in the criminal code. The commissioners would not have the right to alter the criminal code, yet the royal commission suggested that changes should be made at once.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This all goes together. I should like to make the changes in the criminal code in cooperation with the commission, when it is appointed.

Mr. HAYHURST: I think the measure respecting penitentiaries is a distinct improvement, according to my understanding of the methods followed in the past and the methods that will be followed in the future, so I would congratulate the minister upon this improvement. But as far as I have been able to learn from reading and speaking to people, the charge has been made frequently both by newspapers and by individuals that the greatest waste was in connection with repeaters, that is, criminals who repeat from time to time. Could the minister give us any information as to the number of repeaters in the last five years, we will say? We notice, for instance, that in that time there has been some diminution in the number of criminals, and I should like to get the figures with regard to the number of repeaters during that period of time.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have here some statistics with regard to those who were sent to the penitentiaries during the last fiscal year. The total number was 1,447, of whom 349, or 24·1 per cent, had no previous commitment reported. The total with previous commitments was 1,098, or 75·9 per cent. Of that number those who had gone to gaol only numbered 371, or 25·6 per cent. Those who had gone to reformatory only numbered 100, or 6·9 per cent. Those who had previously been committed to penitentiary only numbered sixty-one, or 4·2 per cent. Those who had been committed to gaol and reformatory numbered 127, or 8·8 per cent, while those who had been sent to gaol, reformatory and penitentiary numbered 132, or 9·1 per cent. I suppose that will give my hon. friend an indication of the proportion, which must have been about the same in previous years.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I wish to congratulate the commission upon the splendid report which has been submitted to parliament. I believe the minister holds humanitarian and sensible views with regard to this question of our penitentiaries and the matter of crime in general, but I would say that at least ninety per cent of crime is due to the conditions of poverty that exist throughout the country. This poverty, which is so manifest throughout Canada, is the result of our inability to provide people with the standard of living which they realize is possible with the technical developments and tremendous resources that we have in Canada. After all, it is the duty and responsibility of this parliament to eliminate poverty and thereby reduce the number of criminals in the country. Has the minister any figures in regard to the salaries paid the officials and employees of the penitentiaries, that is, the guards and supervisors?

Mr. BOUCHARD: The hon. member thinks ninety per cent of our criminals committed crimes because they were poor. I should like to ask the minister what is the proportion of poor people in the penitentiaries.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am afraid I could not give any definite proportion.

Mr. MacNEIL: Could the minister indicate the percentage of ex-service men employed on the staffs of the penitentiaries?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am informed there is quite a proportion of ex-service men among the employees of penitentiaries. According to the information my officers give me I believe the proportion would be about twenty-five per cent. The guards, who form by far the largest proportion of employees of penitentiaries, are paid salaries varying between $100 and $125 a month.

Mr. LANDERYOU: In respect of the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) to the effect that complete revision of the criminal code was recommended in the report, can the minister—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Not a complete revision.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I thought there was reference to a complete revision of the criminal code. However, I congratulate the minister upon introducing the bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The matter is being considered.

Mr. LANDERYOU: It is being considered?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have a little more to say. A year ago, just before prorogation, this matter was brought up, and at that time, while I will not say the minister was annoyed, yet he did seem rather disappointed that he did not get his bill before the house.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have looked carefully through the bill, and so far I have not been able to see anything of consequence, with the exception of the appointment of the commissioners.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That was the first step.

Mr. MacNICOL: After reading the report of the commission, a commission which went all over this country, and visited Europe, I had hoped that we would be told what the department proposes to do to deal with the problem of second and third offenders, and its intention with respect to young offenders. There is nothing in the bill in that regard.

Paragraph (f) of section 2 refers to "penitentiaries." May I point out, however, that in the old country first offenders are sent to special penitentiaries or prisons. In this country are we going to continue to send to the penitentiary the first offender who has committed a crime which calls for a term in a penitentiary, but which might be a first offence? Is such offender to be sent to Kingston, Stoney Mountain or St. Vincent de Paul, or is there to be a special penitentiary for that class?

Some observations by Sir Samuel Hoare, to whom I listened in London encouraged me to spend a great deal of time in a survey with respect to prison reform. Prior to that time I had not taken much interest in the subject. I had heard it debated in this house, but I was enthusiastic over Sir Samuel's observations respecting the results of what had been done in England in connection with the reform of first offenders. Remarkable achievements have been accomplished in that connection. Of course some criminals cannot be reformed, and on them the police keep a close check; but a large percentage can be reformed. The home office has issued a report, a copy of which I have no doubt the minister has, in reference to the return of first offenders to prison in England. I find that in 1932, 769 were discharged, and that after several years 196 had been reconvicted two or more times. In 1933, of 883 discharged, 185 had been returned two or more times, and of the 900 discharged in 1934, there were 117 who were reconvicted two or more times. Sir Samuel Hoare has pointed out the remarkable results which have been attained in the reform of prisoners. On the other hand, I notice in an article published in the Toronto Star in 1937, out of 4,036 prisoners there were 2,662 repeaters—a very high percentage, indeed.

I should have liked to see something in the bill along the lines I have mentioned. Probably the commission will do something. I hate to think of a big bill like this which provides only for the appointment of three commissioners, something which could have been provided for in one paragraph.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No.

Mr. MacNICOL: Apparently the department wishes to have the appointment of three commissioners who are going to do all the work. That is not the way it is in the old country.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Oh, yes, it is.

Mr. MacNICOL: They prepared a bill over there.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister knows more than I do about it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I know a little bit about what they did.

Mr. MacNICOL: As I understand it, in England the administration is under the home office, whereas in Canada it will be administered by a commission.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It will be exactly the same thing. In England they have a central board under the Home Secretary. Here we will have a board under the Minister of Justice.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is the same administration as they have in the old country?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Exactly the same, yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: And in the old country did a board under the home office prepare all the regulations?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: And that is what the minister has in mind here?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is what I was going to tell my hon. friend.

Mr. MacNICOL: The purpose is as nearly as possible to follow out the rules and regulations which have brought about such remarkable achievements in the old country?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: That being the case, I have nothing more to say.

Mr. McCANN: The purpose of this bill is to appoint a commission with power under the minister to control, administer and manage the penitentiaries of the country. We have been criticized by our Tory friends for appointing a commission for this particular purpose. On former occasions there has been criticism of the government with respect to its not carrying out the recommendations of different commissions. The chief recommendation of the commission which investigated the penitentiaries and made a study of the penal system in Canada was to the effect that under our present system the problem of penal administration is too large in scope and too serious in results to be left in the hands of one man.

In his criticism yesterday, when speaking on the resolution prior to the introduction of the bill, the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) said the commission was being appointed for the purpose of shifting responsibility. To any one who has read the report of the commission on penal institutions it must be evident that one man was not capable, as superintendent of our institutions, to carry on the work. No country in the world lags as far behind in penology as does this Dominion of Canada. I am not a penologist, a criminologist or a sociologist, but I have read the report, and have made a study of it. I have made it my business to visit one of the largest penal institutions in Canada, and have spent some time therein viewing conditions and studying problems in the hope that when the bill came before the house I, looking at some of these problems from the point of view of the medical man, might be in a position to make to a commission some recommendations tending to bring about a betterment of conditions in our institutions.

It is remarkable that the public has always shown an absorbing interest in criminals. Newspapers devote much of their space to the subject, even to the prejudice of law enforcement bodies, to such an extent that J. Edgar Hoover, chief of the United States federal bureau of investigation, has protested again and again that the publicity given criminals encourages crime. The tendency of recent years, expressed in tabloids and in the moving pictures, has been to give the hero role to the police rather than to the criminal, and the shift is said to be obtaining results. But whether the neighbourhood boys play G-man, mounted police or gunman, adult interest is still centred in the criminal, as it has been from Homer to Dickens, Zola and Hugo. This interest has, of more recent years, sold thousands of crime and detective stories, and has proved a gold-mine to publishers and authors of such works.

A noted criminologist, J. L. Gillin, attributes this phenomenon to public interest in human conduct, which is greater in proportion to the unusualness of such conduct. In so far as most citizens lead lives which do not violate the standards approved by society, the unusual person stands out the more clearly. Psychologists explain also that until fairly modern times man has been constantly subjected to danger, and that danger has two reactions: cowardice and courage. Danger still provides a thrill to be met with appropriate activity, and in following the careers of criminals, the honest citizen vicariously experiences this thrill without the accompanying activity and danger. Unfortunately this interest does not extend beyond the apprehension, trial and conviction of the criminal. Just as books of romance end with wedding bells, books of crime usually end with the clanging of prison gates.

So much for the general public interest in crime and criminals. There is, however, another and more serious approach to the subject —interest in crime and criminals as a social phenomenon—a social disease to be met and, in so far as is possible, eradicated by scientific study and scientific treatment. This scientific study, which includes the process of making laws, breaking laws, and reacting toward the breaking of laws, is directed to the end of protecting society. Any scientific study of criminology must have this objective constantly in mind, whether it is to be attained by prevention of crime, apprehension of the criminal, punishment or reform.

We should keep in mind, Mr. Chairman, that the main purpose of any penal system is, first, to protect society, and, second, the regeneration, education and rehabilitation of criminals.

It may be redundant to quote the axiom that "prevention is better than cure," but in our methods of crime control this precept is far from being adequately observed. We are too prone to stint expenditures at the outset in preventive work through schools, boys' clubs, and juvenile courts, and to spend large sums in the apprehension and imprisonment of adult criminals when cure is all but hopeless. At the same time we regard soaring costs of crime with dismay.

It has been estimated that the total cost of criminal justice in the United States costs that country in excess of three hundred and fifty million dollars a year, and estimates of the total cost of crime have run as high as thirteen billions. While these figures, particularly the latter, are far from accurate, they give some indication of the enormous expense which is thrown upon the general public by criminal activities. In the report of the royal commission to investigate the penal system of Canada, it is estimated that the cost of 188 recidivists in Canadian penitentiaries at the date of the investigation had cost Canadian taxpayers over four and a half million dollars, or $25,000 a man. That is a figure which was also given by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) when he was speaking. These figures show us that money spent in the prevention of crime would be money well spent. If, by the provision of, say $1,000 in juvenile crime prevention, we can prevent a juvenile from becoming a hardened recidivist, who will cost the taxpayer over $25,000 before his useless life is ended, we shall be saving $24,000 rather than spending $1,000.

Crime prevention begins in the home and may be attacked from the general angle of correcting undesirable social conditions—the clearing of slums, better housing, a higher standard of living, health control, employment opportunities, and adult education—or from the particular angle of family or domestic relations courts, boys' club activities, and the school.

Students of criminology assign the main social condition causing crime to deficiencies in the home life of the child, manifested by poor training, lack of discipline and emotional instability. This may occur in the homes of the rich, where the parents have other interests and leave their children to the care of servants or to their own devices, or in the homes of the poor, where adverse economic conditions press upon family life. But when heredity influences are also present, and the parents are emotionally unstable and temperamentally maladjusted, the child, in addition to lack of proper discipline and care, will inherit the disordered emotional system of his parents, requiring the best, rather than the worst, of care to correct. Broken homes, where there is divorce, disharmony or a step-parent, or where the child is reared by disinterested relatives, will also provide a favourable breeding place for juvenile delinquency.

The preventive approach to such problems is through the family court, where broken homes come to the attention of the authorities. Let me mention here that perhaps no city in the whole of Canada is more to be commended than Ottawa for the introduction and the carrying on of the family court which investigates the conditions which underlie crime in this city.

The preventive approach, as I was saying, is through the family court; second, through the school, where emotional, physical or mental deficiencies may be detected, and third, through boys' clubs where lack of parental training and discipline will become apparent. When, through any of these agencies, character deficiencies or undesirable environmental influences of the juvenile are detected, immediate action should be taken through social agencies to correct the dangerous trends that have been discovered. It is here that society should spend without stint some portion of those many millions that will later have to be spent if preventive measures fail.

There will always be cases in which dangerous trends are not discovered in time or where preventive measures will fail. There will also be those cases where no criminal or anti-social attitude is present but where emotional strains will prove too much for the emotional control of the individual, and manslaughter or murder will result. There will also be cases where temptation exceeds powers of resistance, and embezzlement or other form of theft will be committed. For these cases special adult treatment will have to be provided.

The question of this adult treatment is one which is engaging the best thought of penologists in every civilized country, and no general panacea has as yet been evolved. Human behaviour being individualistic, it is improbable that any general theory will ever be entirely successful.

Canada, as the report of the royal commission has demonstrated, is lagging behind in penological matters, and the bill before us at this time is the first step in a program to bring this country abreast of the times.

The lag in our development is not an unmixed evil, because it gives us an opportunity to study the methods of those countries which have outdistanced us and to select from their systems the best features already proved to be successful, as well as to profit by their mistakes.

That development in modern penological treatment which has met with the most outstanding success has been classification, segregation, and the special treatment of special types of prisoners. Such classification depends upon the buildings available and the distances to be overcome, but in so far as these considerations have permitted, classification has been the most successful treatment which has been yet evolved.

The types which require to be classified and segregated are: First, the insane; second, the subnormal; third, drug addicts; fourth, young offenders; fifth, hardened recidivists; sixth, first offenders and accidental criminals. The remainder of the criminal population will form a final class which will be the largest of all.

The treatment of insane persons and drug addicts is one for specialized medical attention.

With reference to subnormals, those who cannot be certified as definitely insane within the meaning of the Penitentiary Act, but who have obvious deficiencies, should not be permitted to mingle with the general prison population, because they cannot appreciate the necessity of observing prison discipline and because they are victimized by the more intelligent and troublesome prisoners who may aggravate their mental condition or urge them into rebellion and revolt in which the instigators do not participate. That, Mr. Chairman, I submit, is one of the principal reasons why we have had in Canadian penitentiaries throughout the last number of years a great number of riots and insurrections.

Hardened recidivists should be subjected to preventive detention. It is known that their period of freedom on release will be limited to a vacation and that they will surely revert to crime, which is the only occupation they know or will follow, and will surely return to prison. These men are like lepers. They are unfit to live in society, and should therefore be segregated from it, not as a form of punishment but as the least expensive and most effective form of treatment. Their routine should not be onerous. They should have proper exercise, proper food and clothing, and some recreation, but they should not again be released to prey upon society.

I might remark here that I think well of the regulation in the United States whereby a criminal who has a number of convictions against him is finally sent to prison for life.

This applies also to the so-called sex criminal, who should be subjected to curative or corrective treatment and should never be permitted to advance along the well beaten and easily predictable path from indecency to murder. Let me say here that the vast percentage of indecency cases in the penal institutions of this country are cases of crimes which have been committed by men over fifty years of age. To the medical men that cannot point to anything but some type of physical disability which may be cured by modern surgical methods.

With regard to the accidental offender who has been overcome by a temptation too strong for him, or by the stress of an overmastering emotion, his sentence can be justified only by its deterrent effect upon others. This man is inclined to look upon his imprisonment as just retribution for his crime or as a penitence to be performed. There is no need of imprisonment or training for him; its only effect can be to deter others. He has learned his lesson before his sentence has commenced, and he is less likely to repeat a criminal offence than another is to commit one. His penal treatment should be so designed as to keep him from becoming bitter, while preparing him for a resumption of his normal life. With regard to this type of offender it can be truly said, "There, but for the grace of God, go I"; for who knows what he may do under pressure of circumstances when confronted by some immediate and compelling emotional crisis.

With regard to young offenders, special individual treatment must be given. These youths are still in their formative years. Wrong ideals can still be corrected. The influence of early environment and associations can be eradicated. New and worthwhile objectives can still be made attractive. But the task is a difficult one, and failure will but confirm the youth in his anti-social point of view.

One of the things which struck me on my visit to the Kingston penitentiary was the great number of young men who were in that institution. I happened to be there about the time they were coming in for their noonday meal; and one would think, from the appearance of the men who were entering in file at that particular time, that one was looking upon the campus of Queen's university rather than a penitentiary. I was told by the warden of Kingston penitentiary that the average age of those within that institution is twenty-four years; and the day I was there there were 783 prisoners. It is a sad reflection on our present sociological system, when so many young men coming from broken homes have to start off their career in the penitentiaries.

Youths at this age revolt against the humdrum routine and irksome responsibilities with which the world confronts them. They crave adventure, romance, admiration, and the immediate realization of their dreams. They are thoughtless, reckless, animalistic, not yet socialized. It is not surprising that the slow and plodding road of honest endeavour should repel them, and that lawlessness, with its apparent quick result, should attract them. They must have their heroes, and if these heroes are big-shot gangsters they will take pride in being tough and hard, and will be sullenly resistant to any attempt to influence them. It is necessary to substitute a more desirable hero, and the man who can do so must possess their confidence and something of their admiration before he can succeed. That is why the Borstal system, which is dependent upon the Borstal staff, has shown such satisfactory results. To deal with this type of offender we must develop a type of prison officer that is individually exceptional.
