I ask you, Mr. Chairman, what makes young men in this country want to join the mounted police? Because it offers them a career. There is a glamour, something about it which appeals to them. When this prison commission is set up, one of the first things it should do is attempt to have guards of a higher quality and of a higher classification than the present guards at our institutions. I would suggest that our universities give a special course to young men who would take up this particular career. After training along the lines of penology to a limited extent with a high type of man has been given, you will have the men in the prisons look up to these men who are their guards and their trainers, and they will have beneficial effects on the men who are confined. That is exactly why the Borstal system has been the success which it has. I have heard it said on several occasions that the Borstal system should be introduced into this country. I do not think it is any better system than we have in Ontario in what is known as the parole system. That system could be adapted to advantage to the whole of Canada; instead of introducing a new system we could have a further extension of the parole system which we have for the penal institutions of Ontario.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Borstal system operates in the prison or in properties adjacent to the prison.

Mr. McCANN: My contention is that the parole system is as good as the Borstal system, although I readily understand that the two have separate functions.

With regard to the large remaining class, the ordinary second or third offender, who is neither mentally deficient nor addicted to drugs, who is neither a first offender nor a hardened recidivist, we must give them moral hospitalization and treatment. In this we can look to the medical profession for guidance.

What would we think of a physician who, diagnosing typhoid fever, said to his patient, "I am sending you to the hospital because you have typhoid fever. You will remain there for two weeks. During that time, food, shelter and a bed will be provided, but no treatment will be given for the disease. At the end of two weeks you will be discharged whether you have recovered before that time, at that time, or not yet." We would regard such a physician as a madman; yet we do exactly that with our morally sick. It is long past the time for us to change this procedure. We must diagnose the criminal's condition and prescribe his treatment. From what contaminated source did this condition arise? What incubated it? Only by understanding the particular case can we prescribe the proper treatment. How long should the man be hospitalized? Obviously, until he is cured. Some conditions can be cured immediately; some require time; some may be incurable, and a man is fit to be discharged only when he is cured. At that time hospitalization should cease and convalescence should commence. If the man has a relapse it does not mean that we should be discouraged. We must resume the cure and make more certain that next time it is effective.

During convalescence we cannot expect the man to compete on an equal footing with people in robust health. He must still be under the supervision of his physician, who can give him necessary treatment, and who can watch for indications of a relapse.

We have passed the age when torture and beatings were prescribed for the cure of the insane. We no longer permit those with contagious diseases to mingle with surgical or other medical cases. We must progress with those who are morally ill as we have already progressed with those who are mentally or physically ill.

In this progression our greatest obstacle, as was the case in psychiatry and medicine, will be public indifference and public ignorance. If we give offenders in our penitentiaries special treatment and training we shall be accused of pampering the criminal. If we give him assistance and supervision after release, we shall be accused of discriminating against the honest man who is suffering economic hardship. We shall be asked why we assist ex-convicts to obtain employment when honest men are without jobs. We might as well be asked why a sick man, recently risen from a sick-bed. should require convalescence and treatments. The answer is the same in both cases: The treatment is to overcome a handicap and to place the man in a position to compete with those who are fit—not on a preferred basis, but on as nearly an equal basis as we can achieve. To do otherwise—thus ignoring the handicap of the discharged convict—is, whether his sentence be for thirty days or thirty years, to condemn him for life.

We must make up our minds to one of two courses: that dictated by reason and founded upon our experience in medicine and psychiatry and in most advanced and successful penal systems, which is the scientific curative method; or that dictated by ignorance and prejudice, which is barbarous and destructive. If the people of this country, misled by embittered cynicism or by indifferent stupidity, choose the latter course, they must be prepared to abide by the inevitable result —mounting law-enforcement costs and increased viciousness in crime.

I think that we might at this time say a word or two with reference to some other matters with which the commission will have to deal. Let me say something first with regard to the personnel of the commission. It cannot be a personnel of supermen. There are no such things as supermen; supermen exist as such only in their own minds. What we do want is a commission of men who have the humanitarian point of view. Our penal system has been run for years by men who have had entirely the militaristic point of view. We want men of education, learning, culture and some experience, but especially men who see the human side of things. It has been said that there should be a medical man on the commission. I do not agree with that suggestion. The commission should receive the advice of medical men; every man who is sent to a penal institution should be given the advantage of a proper physical examination, and his case should be studied individually with a view to seeing whether or not he has physical disabilities, the removal of which will improve his moral condition.

In visiting the institution at Kingston I find that the facilities there for medical work are altogether inadequate. We have a makeshift hospital. I do not want to be too critical of the past administration or of the institution; but if we are to get anywhere in the treatment of those in our penal institutions, then we must improve the physical conditions under which they live. For instance, the whole outfit of buildings at Kingston is antiquated. The warden of that institution, showing me around, pointed with pride to the date-stone of one building, which said "1830." The remark which I might have made on that occasion but did not like to make was, "Your system is just as antiquated as are your buildings." They undertake to teach these prisoners a trade, but they have nothing like proper workshops. Their whole commissary department is antiquated. One gets the odour of it as soon as one enters the institution. All these things added together will make a criminal, even when he is within the prison, highly incorrigible, and embitter him against society, and it is to my mind one of the causes of many of the riots that we have had.

Another department which ought to undergo revamping is the remissions branch. Under the present system the remissions officer makes a recommendation to the minister with regard to any remissions of cases that are brought to his attention. In my opinion, instead of a remissions officer and remissions branch, the commission with their inspectors should constitute a parole board, and prisoners should be given an opportunity to appear before that board to present their particular case. I am sure there is not a member of this house, and very few clergymen in the country, who have not been requested by friends of those who are in these institutions to use their influence with the remissions officer or with the Minister of Justice with a view to obtaining some remission of sentences imposed.

I have said something with reference to training. The present guards, as they are called, who are the officers in charge of the prisoners, are taken from here, there and everywhere. They should be men especially adapted to that particular kind of work, and given some training for it. Schools should be established for the training of these people. Let me say in passing that in the city of Kingston there is another institution which houses almost twice as many inmates as are in the Kingston penitentiary, that is the Ontario Institute for the Insane. In my experience of twenty-five or thirty years observation of that institution I have never heard of any insurrections or riots or irregularities, and I attribute that to the fact that the inmates are supervised by people who are trained for that supervision. There could not be a better exemplification of what in the one instance, trained officials can do, and what takes place when officials are without training.

Then, in connection with all these institutions, not enough consideration is given to what shall become of a man after he is discharged. Efforts should be put forth to rehabilitate him, restore him to society and make him a useful citizen. I suggest that the commission should give serious consideration to the appointment of a trained rehabilitation officer in every prison, who will give consideration to the individual cases, and months before the discharge of a prisoner will seek ways and means whereby that man will be rehabilitated and restored to the community.

However, I believe that the greatest progress that will be made in penology in this country in the next twenty-five years will be along medical and surgical lines; giving men a complete and thorough examination, seeking to classify them on the advice of trained psychiatrists and to remove the physical defects which so many have that aggravate their mental condition and make them go morally wrong. If a commission is to be set up in this country just for the purpose of having something new and transferring the work from the superintendent, without the Minister of Justice and his department having in the background a fixed determination to improve the condition of our penal institutions and the people in them, we might just as well not bother enacting this bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Minister to have control.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: It appears to me that section 3 is in conflict with section 5, and is not in line with the object of the bill. The explanatory note states that the general object of the bill is to establish a commission with power to control and manage the penitentiaries, under the Minister of Justice. Section 3 reads:

> The minister shall have the control and management of all penitentiaries. . . .

Section 5 reads:

> The commission shall under the minister, have the control and management of all penitentiaries. . . .

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Under the minister.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: Yes, exactly the same wording, except that the words "under the minister" are added. It seems to me that the object of the bill as explained by the minister is to give the primary responsibility to the commission, and section 3 still gives, as in the old act, not only the primary responsibility but the final responsibility to the minister, while section 5 gives the primary responsibility to the commission and the final responsibility to the minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It was the same in the old act.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: I say the object of this bill is different from that of the old act.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: I understood the primary responsibility is to be placed on the commission.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, under the minister.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: But I mean the primary responsibility. The final responsibility was always upon the minister, and still is, under this bill. But under this bill the primary responsibility is on the commission, and the final responsibility is with the minister. Section 3 gives the primary responsibility to the minister, as under the old act. To my mind it should not. Section 3 is unnecessary, and not in line with the object of the bill. Section 5 is the section we should have in the bill, and section 3 should be deleted.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—The penitentiary commission.

Mr. MacNICOL: In regard to remuneration,—is the minister able to tell what the salaries will be?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No, I really could not.

Mr. BROOKS: What is to become of all the officials that we have in the penitentiaries now? Under this commission they could all be dismissed. Is there no way of looking after them?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They are all under the Civil Service Act, and they are going to be retained unless they are incompetent. It is not proposed to dismiss men who are in the service.

Mr. BROOKS: There are now a superintendent and three inspectors. What will become of the three inspectors?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The three inspectors will become assistant commissioners under another clause.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Commission may perform other duties.

Mr. MacNICOL: What other duties?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The provision is inserted just to give more power to the minister to impose upon the commission certain duties. I cannot name any special duties.

Mr. MacNICOL: I hope it does not mean carrying out one proposal of the report, namely to manufacture in the penitentiaries all the canned goods required by the prisons of Canada. That would be nothing short of ridiculous. One insignificant factory could manufacture in a week all that all the prisons of Canada use in ten year's time.

Mr. BROOKS: Are there any penologists in Canada; and, if not, where would you get penologists for your commission? I assume you would have the best penologists you could get. What is a penologist?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Perhaps we have not developed that extremely technical branch of sociological science, but I hope we shall in due time. There are people who have devoted much time to that subject, and we have good psychiatrists and that sort of thing. We shall do our best with the material at our disposal.

Mr. GARIÉPY: Reverting to section 4, I notice that under subsection 2, a commissioner may be removed from office by the governor in council at any time for cause, although subsection 1 says the appointment is for a period of ten years. Is that provision for removal for cause not very dangerous? It means that with a change of government—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No; "for cause" does not mean that.

Mr. GARIÉPY: —you could have the governor in council removing these commissioners for any cause whatever so long as it was satisfactory to the government, which would mean a disturbance. This provision does not exist in other acts. We have railway commissioners appointed for ten years straight, and members of the civil service commission are also appointed for ten years. There is no such removal at pleasure, because that is what it amounts to.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Oh, no.

Mr. GARIÉPY: Well, the governor in council will be the judge, and any cause satisfactory to them—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No, no.

Mr. GARIÉPY: —will be sufficient.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have more confidence in governments than my hon. friend has, even under my opponents in politics.

Mr. GARIÉPY: Well, I am surprised to hear the Minister of Justice speaking in that way, because I could give him a list of removals made in 1930 which were not to the honour of this country at all. There were general dismissals throughout the country—

Mr. BROOKS: And in 1935.

Mr. GARIÉPY: —and the same thing may happen in the future. If we are going at this work seriously and desire a commission that will be able to do its work efficiently, it seems to me there should be some tenure of office which would permit the commissioners to feel safe in their positions. Then they will be absolutely independent; they will not be under any threat from any government. Even if there is no change of government; if by any chance a commissioner happens to displease by his independence of character; if he chooses to make recommendations which are not satisfactory to some of the ministers or possibly some members of parliament, then he may be in danger of dismissal. It seems to me this provision is dangerous, and I direct the attention of the committee to it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I do not know whether I should reply to the remarks of my hon. friend, but there are standard rules which cover this matter of "for cause." There are even legal decisions. A commissioner who was removed merely because of a change of government certainly would have a claim against the government. The words "for cause" mean something which makes him unfit for office, not merely political opinions or things of that kind. Those words appear in most of the legislation appointing boards, and it has never been considered that there was danger in inserting that provision. I think they are rather a protection. Otherwise the government would be forced to keep in office for ten years a man who, for instance, might be unable to fulfil his task for physical or other reasons. I believe this is a protection for the country.

Mr. GARIÉPY: That is what is done in regard to judges. We have several judges now who are physically unfit, but they are appointed for life and they remain in their positions.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That would be a bad thing.

Mr. GARIÉPY: Those judges are still retained in office.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The Judges Act provides for that. If a judge, even of a high court, is mentally or physically unable to do his work, the Minister of Justice may appoint a commission to investigate and retire him compulsorily.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Commission to make rules.

Mr. LANDERYOU: In connection with paragraph (b), could the minister tell us what type of work is carried on and what wages are paid the convicts?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Blacksmithing, tinsmithing, and so on; the manufacture of mail bags for the Post Office Department; tailoring, shoemaking, the manufacture of brooms, stonecutting and so on.

Mr. LANDERYOU: This paragraph mentions wages or remuneration, and I was wondering what remuneration they received. Is there any difference in the remuneration for different types of work, or do they all get the same?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They are not union wages but only a few cents a day. I think five cents a day is the average, but they may sometimes get more because of good conduct.

Mr. MacNICOL: Under the management of this commission will they engage all employees themselves or will the employees be selected by the civil service commission?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That question is dealt with in sections 10 and 11.

Section agreed to.

Sections 8 and 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Appointment of wardens, etc.

Mr. MacNEIL: Would the minister explain the procedure to be followed in making appointments? As I read the bill, the governor in council will appoint wardens, deputy wardens and other administrative and executive officers, while under section 11 the commission may appoint such guards, trade instructors and other officers as may be necessary. It seems clear that this bill does not provide for open, competitive examinations under the civil service commission. If this penitentiaries commission is to be established to correct the conditions which were disclosed by the report of the royal commission, I see no reason why it would not stabilize the service and remove influences tending to corruption if all appointments were placed under the civil service commission. I would ask the minister why this bill has disregarded the merit system with regard to such appointments.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The appointment of these officers was under the civil service commission while I was Minister of Justice previously, prior to 1930. In 1933 the then Minister of Justice introduced a bill placing the appointment of these officials under the governor general in council. I was on the opposition side at the time, but I must say that I gave the new legislation my full support. I have myself experienced the troubles caused by the former system. I cannot understand why the civil service commission should have the responsibility of appointing wardens and deputy wardens, men who have convicts under their supervision, men who have most delicate work to do and carry tremendous responsibility. In the end the Minister of Justice is the one responsible for what happens in the penitentiaries. But there are troubles, and when those troubles develop they are of an extremely serious nature. There have been riots, rebellions and all sorts of disturbances. How can the civil service commission, rather than the one who in the end will bear the responsibility, appoint those who will be at the head of those institutions? The present system is working well. I assure my hon. friend that so far as I am concerned—and any Minister of Justice would do the same—I have to take the greatest possible care, because of the serious consequences. I know that in connection with that special work I have more confidence in myself than in the civil service commission.

Mr. BROOKS: I find myself in accord with the hon. member for Vancouver North. We find that the commission criticized more strongly wardens and deputy wardens than they did other officials of the penitentiaries. If we are going to improve the system it would seem to me there must be some way by which we can get a better class of wardens and deputy wardens. Under this bill we are simply keeping the same old class we had before, and I cannot see how there can be any great improvement in our penitentiaries. It must be realized that the warden and deputy warden are the men primarily responsible for the discipline in their particular institutions. It seems to me that the bill is very weak in this section.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): What does the hon. member suggest?

Mr. BROOKS: I think it should be placed under the commission.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But not the civil service commission, as the hon. member for Vancouver North has suggested.

Mr. BROOKS: No, not the civil service commission. I mean the three men appointed under the minister to conduct the affairs of the penitentiary.

Mr. MacNEILL: I thoroughly agree with the minister that we must have first-class men in these institutions. We must have a very high type of men to act as wardens and deputy wardens, and thoroughly reliable men to act as guards. But I am not certain that under the present system of political patronage we get a good type of men, and I feel that much of the trouble exposed in the report of the royal commission has been due to the influences of political patronage. It would be difficult to persuade me that the minister has time personally to supervise all such appointments. It would be difficult to persuade me that the members of the new commission should devote much of their time to the appointment of guards.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Under section 11 the guards would be appointed by the commission.

Mr. MacNEIL: I was asking the minister a moment ago to explain the procedure. It is my understanding that the wardens, deputy wardens and other administrative or executive officers are to be appointed by the governor in council, and that the guards and other officers and instructors are to be appointed by the commission. But it will still remain that these appointments will be made on the basis of political patronage. And the men who are Liberal members or defeated Liberal candidates in the districts adjacent to penitentiaries will make recommendations with regard to appointments.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No, no.

Mr. MacNEIL: Appointments will be made not so much on merit as on the basis of reward for political service. That does not result in the appointment of the best type of men. Furthermore, it does not result in ex-service men getting the preference which the government has assured. That preference does not apply when the position is not openly advertised. I recognize the intention of the government that the preference should apply, but the ex-service men, who perhaps are best qualified for that type of work, if they are physically fit—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Has the hon. member read section 12?

Mr. MacNEIL: Yes. But my point is that unless the position is advertised, ex-service men who may be qualified do not have an opportunity to apply. When these appointments are made through political patronage, they are made in secrecy. Statistics show that under patronage ex-service men do not get as fair a deal as they do under the civil service commission, where the merit system and open competition prevail.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If my hon. friend is under the impression that the commission which will be appointed will make appointments of guards and officers in the penitentiaries under political patronage, then he is altogether wrong. I would withdraw the bill immediately if it were to be so. My hon. friend must have some confidence in those who are responsible, and I give him my word that it is not the intention and it will not be done. We shall try to have men who will not be absolutely subordinate to political exigencies, as the hon. member seems to be afraid. There are still some good people in the world, despite what my good friends in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation seem to believe. Trust us a little, sometimes. In this matter I am sincere. Why do you not trust us a little—some of you fellow members?

Mr. MacNEIL: I am not expressing a lack of confidence in the minister. I am expressing a lack of confidence in the policy. Only a few days ago the government declared itself as being in favour of the merit system.

Members of the government declared that this administration stands solidly behind the merit system. Since the time when these appointments were taken from the jurisdiction of the civil service commission, the facilities of that commission have been extended. I submit they are fully equipped to-day, by open competitive examination, to secure wardens, deputy wardens and guards. I submit we can now make appointments on the basis of merit under the civil service commission.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I believe the civil service commission itself thought this class of appointment in the penitentiaries should not be under them. They have not the requirements. I do not see how this may be done through examination, and all that sort of thing, under the civil service commission. When the change was made in 1933, the whole house agreed that this should be done, and I do not think the civil service commission would like to undertake the work.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I am absolutely in accord with section 10, but I believe there is some confusion between sections 10 and 11. We have been discussing section 11 under section 10. May I say that I disagree with section 11.

The CHAIRMAN: We are not discussing section 11. We are discussing subsection 2 of section 10.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I find myself in accord with the Minister of Justice in this respect, and will reserve my observations until section 11 is called.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall subsection 2 carry?

Mr. MacINNIS: No.

Section stands.

WAR MUNITIONS AND MATERIALS

REFERENCE TO PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE OF ALL CONTRACTS TABLED

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): I desire to move, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power):

That all contracts entered into by the Department of National Defence and tabled in this house be referred to the standing committee on public accounts.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

OPERATIONS AND SELLING POLICY—TABLING OF WEEKLY REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler). On February 24 last, at page 1278 of Hansard he stated he would give further consideration to a request I had made that the weekly reports of the wheat board be brought down and placed in the sessional papers office and there be made available to hon. members. Would he give a statement to-day as to whether he proposes to see that these reports are tabled accordingly?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My hon. friend has reminded me of something that perhaps I should have spoken of before. My recollection at the moment is that when we agreed to place the reports among the sessional papers there was at that time no wheat for sale, and there has never been tabled or put amongst the sessional papers any of the weekly reports of the sales of wheat of the current year's crop. That practice will continue to be observed.

Mr. PERLEY: I think that last year, following the procedure of bringing down the weekly reports, which shows the standing—

Mr. EULER: There was no wheat for sale.

Mr. PERLEY: No wheat for sale?

Mr. EULER: Very little.

Mr. PERLEY: I think there was wheat for sale until the thing was finally wound up.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. PERLEY: I am not at all satisfied with the position the minister has taken. I think we are entitled to the information I have asked for. There is provision made for it in section 8(e) of the act. I would ask the minister to give further consideration to the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. EULER: I just want to lay this down as a very definite principle. It is not regarded by the wheat board as being in the public interest to divulge any information with regard to the sales of wheat; and that has been government policy. Never has there been given to the house any information in any sort of detail as to the sales of wheat of the current year's crop. That position, I think, will have to be maintained.

SUDETEN IMMIGRANTS

RESPONSIBILITY FOR SETTLEMENT IN CANADA OF FAMILIES FROM CZECHOSLOVAKIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask if the government intends, as reported in Saturday's press, to place responsibility upon the colonization departments of the railway companies for the settlement of families from the Sudeten area of Czechoslovakia.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The Minister of Immigration (Mr. Crerar) I have no doubt will wish to make a statement with reference to the matter to which my hon. friend has referred. Perhaps he will allow it to stand until the minister is here.

RADIO BROADCASTING

METHOD OF APPOINTING RADIO LICENCE VENDORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): A week ago I asked a question in the absence of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) as to the method of appointing radio licence vendors. It had been stated that there was to be a change in the method. Is the minister now prepared to make a statement in that regard?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): The principal change was that returned men were to be employed exclusively. I have not reviewed recently the correspondence that took place with the organization of returned men, but I shall be glad to table it in the house to-morrow. Perhaps that will be the best explanation I could give.

Mr. MANION: That is all right, but the statement was made to me that the matter had been put distinctly on a direct patronage basis. I should be glad if the minister would deal with that to-morrow, if he does not wish to do so to-day.

Mr. HOWE: It always was.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps so; I do not know whether it was or not, but I should like to know whether or not it is at the present time. I should be glad if the minister would deal with it to-morrow, or to-day, if he wishes.

[Mr. Euler.]

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—TORONTO APPOINTMENTS

Mr. LENNARD:

1. How many non-residents of Toronto have been appointed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at Toronto?

3. Who were the staff at Toronto during 1938, and what were their salaries?

Mr. HOWE: This question is obviously out of order. It refers to the internal management of an autonomous corporation.

TREASURY WARRANTS

Mr. BLACKMORE:

At what times, in what amounts, and for what purposes have treasury warrants been used by the dominion government in the past ten years?

Mr. DUNNING: It is not clear from this question just what the hon. member wants. He speaks of treasury warrants, which is a meaningless term. If he means governor general's warrants, that information can of course be supplied. He is not in his seat, so I suggest that in the meantime the question be dropped and redrafted in terms of what he desires.

Mr. SPEAKER: Question dropped.

ALBERTA WHEAT SHIPMENTS

Mr. MacNEIL:

How many bushels of wheat were shipped from the province of Alberta during the current wheat marketing year: (a) via the eastern route; (b) via the western route.

Mr. EULER:

The Canadian wheat board considers that it is not in the public interest to divulge such figures during the course of the marketing season.

IMPORTATIONS OF UNITED STATES CANNED BEEF

Mr. THOMPSON:

1. How many pounds of canned beef did Canada import from the United States during each of the years 1936, 1937, and 1938?

2. What was the rate of duty per pound paid by the United States upon importations of canned beef?

There is an error in the drafting of this question. I ask that it be dropped so that I may redraft it.

Question dropped.

ROYAL VISIT TO TORONTO

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Did the government receive on January 25 last from the Ontario government the plans and details of the king's visit to Toronto?

2. Have such plans and all details as yet been approved by the government?

3. If not, what is the cause of the delay in approving of the plans and when will an announcement be made?

4. Will a copy of all papers be tabled?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member has asked to have the question dropped.

Question dropped.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD SALES

Mr. PERLEY:

Does the Canadian wheat board sell wheat direct to representatives or agents of foreign countries who are not members of the Winnipeg grain exchange, or do they insist upon all sales being made through, or by, members of the said exchange?

Mr. EULER: The Canadian wheat board has sold its wheat exclusively through members of the Winnipeg grain exchange and members of the Vancouver merchants exchange. Representatives or agents of foreign countries have never made any effort to purchase wheat from the board.

BUTTER PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION, 1934-38

Mr. BLANCHETTE:

1. How many pounds of dairy butter were produced in each of the provinces in the calendar years 1934, 1935, 1936, 1937 and 1938?

2. How many pounds of dairy butter were consumed in each province during each of the said years?

Mr. EULER:

1. Dairy butter production in Canada, by provinces—

	1934	1935	1936	1937	1938
Prince Edward Island	1,950,000	1,872,000	1,862,000	1,732,000
Nova Scotia	6,277,000	6,591,000	6,500,000	6,455,000
New Brunswick	7,456,000	6,710,000	6,674,000	6,260,000
Quebec	14,765,000	14,174,000	14,099,000	14,494,000	Not

Saskatchewan	21,500,000	24,330,673	24,400,000	24,200,000
Alberta	13,400,000	15,922,735	16,000,000	15,600,000	able
British Columbia	2,615,000	2,720,000	2,751,000	2,778,000
Canada	109,918,000	114,161,999	114,026,000	113,084,000

2. Butter consumption figures include both creamery and dairy butter. Separate estimates cannot be made without knowing the quantities of each kind exported and imported; but since very little dairy butter enters into commercial trade channels, it may be assumed that practically all the dairy butter produced in Canada is consumed in Canada.

CROP INSURANCE

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER A WORKABLE SCHEME FOR THE PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Mr. G. W. McDONALD (Souris) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, a special select committee be appointed to investigate and report on the possibilities of endorsing a workable scheme of crop insurance for the three prairie provinces, such scheme to become operative for the 1940 crop season.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the hon. member proceeds with his motion it is my duty to direct the attention of the house to the scope of the resolution. I do not know what the hon. member wishes to discuss with reference to the motion, but last week there was a debate in which the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) discussed all matters pertaining to the wheat situation. A declaration of policy was made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). The rule with reference to questions of this sort is to be found in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, citation 304, and also in May, thirteenth edition. I quote from May, page 316:

It is a wholesome restraint upon members to prevent them from reviving a debate already concluded; and there would be little use in preventing the same question or bill from being offered twice in the same session, if, without being offered, its merits might be discussed again and again.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Before you give your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that crop insurance has been discussed at any time during the present session. We have been discussing the price of wheat and a number of other matters involved, but the question of crop insurance is entirely new.

Mr. SPEAKER: I was afraid that the debate might take on a wider scope and that we might have a repetition of what had been said before.

Mr. GARDINER: I think it would be well to hold them down to crop insurance.

Mr. McDONALD (Souris): During the past ten years agriculture in the western provinces has suffered very severely from drought and from crop failures. These failures were due principally to drought, rust, grasshoppers and other handicaps; in fact, everything that could happen to crops has taken place in those three western provinces. The question might very properly be asked, why do you not include all crops? I can easily understand that, and I do not intend that crop insurance should apply to any province or section that does not wish to have it. I have been asked, however, by the United Farmers of Manitoba in the constituency which I represent, to bring this resolution before the house, and accordingly I do so.

Naturally we in the west talk a good deal about our wheat, wheat prices and crop failures. Wheat occupies a very important place in the agricultural life of this country. It was perhaps news to many who attended the western wheat conference in Winnipeg last December that there were 58,000,000 acres of land under cultivation in Canada, of which 40,000,000 acres are in the three western provinces. That shows the importance of crop insurance as far as western Canada is concerned.

I should like to give a few more figures to illustrate the importance of wheat growing in the west in the economic set-up of this country. It has been stated from reliable sources—it was so stated at that conference—that the revenues of the western provinces during those years dropped by over $2,500,000,000. Hon. members can easily understand the impossible position in which western farmers are placed by severe crop losses accompanied by the lowest farm prices ever known. In 1929 the farmers of those three western provinces were able to buy $384,000,000 worth of goods, but by 1933 they were able to buy only $80,000,000 worth. Surely the effects of that decline were felt all over the country. Ontario and Quebec would certainly know that there was something wrong in the west.

We could paint a very dark picture of conditions in western Canada; in fact it would be only honest to say that some of us were beginning to despair of conditions in those provinces; we felt that we had grown wheat and other grain in that part of the country so long that the time had come that we could no longer do so. But that is not true. We had produced 540,000,000 bushels in one year; in another year the crop dropped to 169,000,000 bushels, and we had almost come to believe that western Canada had seen its best days. But last year we grew over 350,000,000 bushels. As one who has gone through the depression and seen Manitoba and the west at its worst as well as at its best. I am sure that with the rehabilitation scheme which this government is carrying on there this country will yet produce great crops of grain. Some sessions ago I heard the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett tell this house that in the growing of wheat wealth can be produced much more rapidly than by any other industry, not excepting gold mining.

Mr. SENN: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does he not intend crop insurance to apply to other grains as well as wheat?

Mr. McDONALD (Souris): I mention wheat because it is the principal product of the west, and because in the little study I have made of crop insurance it was advised that we should first take one particular commodity. In the west it would be wheat; in the east it might be tobacco or corn or some other commodity. I should have made that explanation earlier. This resolution could apply to any crop, any farm product to which any section of the country might desire to apply it.

Farmers in the west during this depression have received much advice from every section of this country—from bankers, railwaymen, manufacturers; and there is nothing wrong about that, because the subject is important enough to deserve the most serious consideration. Anything that affects the income of more than half the population of Canada certainly deserves the serious consideration of this house. We believe the time has come to try to safeguard or stabilize in some measure the revenue of the farmers. It is good business for this house and the country to study any possible method of improving conditions on the farm. With my hon. friends who champion the cause of industry I have no quarrel whatever. We have splendid industries in this country, but what good will it do to build up the finest industrial machine if back in the country the great masses of the people are not able to buy manufactured goods? There is at present very little buying power in the place where it should be. There never was such a potential market as there is now in this country if the people only had the buying power.

I am not going to introduce the money question; I do not think it belongs here, although it could very well form part of this discussion. There are two sides to the question: there is that of trying to safeguard the production, and that of doing something to stabilize prices. To-day in parts of western Canada capable farmers know that even if they sow good seed in well cultivated land there is no assurance of a crop, and if they get a good crop they are not sure of the price. That is the impossible position in which the western farmer is placed. What are we going to do about it?

It may be asked, why does the farmer not move out? Well, it cannot be done; people have built their homes there. Settlement in the west was encouraged; for many years it was the settled policy of this country to open up the west. The gates were thrown open and great numbers of people were encouraged to go to western Canada. During the war we urged those people by every means to produce, produce, produce, as a patriotic duty. They did so. Western Canada produces the finest wheat in the world, as well as other grains and farm products.

If we are going to discuss wheat at greater length when the Minister of Agriculture brings down his bill I shall not take the time of the house now to speak further of the value and importance of wheat growing in this country. But I should like to give a few figures relating to Saskatchewan. Comparing the years 1929 and 1933, the decline in farm production was only six per cent, but the decrease in prices was 63 per cent. For purposes of comparison let us take other commodities closely allied with the buying needs of the farmer. For example, the decline in the price of farm implements was only 16 per cent, but production dropped 80 per cent. In cement the volume of production dropped 80 per cent, but the price dropped only 18 per cent. Iron and steel prices dropped only 20 per cent but volume of production decreased 83 per cent. Is it fair, is it honest, that the farmers of this country should be compelled to go on producing with a decline of 63 per cent in the price of their product, when the manufacturer of farm implements takes a reduction of only 16 per cent, iron and steel 20 per cent, and cement 18 per cent? Of course I know that in respect of some other commodities the decrease in price was greater.

Let us look at some of the conditions applicable to good crop insurance. The people of Manitoba are studying crop insurance at the present time. Saskatchewan has given considerable study to the question; the United States has made an extensive study of it, and we in this house must do likewise in view of what the Minister of Agriculture has announced, because I feel certain that the government intends to bring in something in the nature of crop insurance, we hope at this session.

We should not continue the present policy, because it has placed the farmers of the west in such a position that they see very little hope for the future. The effect of the paralysis of the purchasing power of the west will be felt in every part of the country; it cannot be confined to the west alone, any more than a disease which may attack one part of the body can be confined to that part only. For that reason we should do what we can to correct this situation. I believe we should look into the feasibility of crop insurance in an endeavour to safeguard the farmer as far as possible against factors which are beyond his control. Certainly the farmer cannot control the weather, which has so much to do with the production of crops. Certainly he has very little to say about the fiscal policies of any country other than his own, in order that he may maintain a decent standard of living through the sale of the goods he has produced. Industry has been able to safeguard itself by insurance. We have all kinds of insurance—life, automobile and hail insurance—and by the way that is the only crop insurance we have ever had in the west; any other crop insurance plan ever tried has failed because we have not had sufficient information to give the insurance companies a proper basis on which they could fix the cost of such insurance.

As I mentioned a moment ago, industry is able to protect itself through insurance, and the farmer will have to do the same thing if he is to survive. It is expected that some time in the future this government will introduce a system of unemployment insurance, which I feel reasonably sure will not apply to the farmer, if we are to judge from the legislation that was introduced by the previous government. For that reason the farmer has every right to ask for crop insurance in order that he may receive the protection that industry will receive by way of unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation and other insurance plans that have been devised to safeguard industry and the workers in industry.

In the beginning we should have the simplest possible crop insurance plan, because that is the only way we can gain practical experience; and I think that insurance should apply to some principal crop. We cannot have it apply to every crop; we must take the most important one, wheat. The contracts should be very clear and simple, and should not be open to dispute. In addition, no form of crop insurance should encourage poor farming. We have no right to introduce into this house a bill that will have the effect of making the farmer look more to his crop insurance than to better methods of farming. We must avoid that very real danger. The amount of insurance should be arrived at scientifically; we should have all the information as to the type of soil, what it has produced in the past, what kind of farmer the man is, and all the rest of the data necessary to show the physical value of each farm, and we should not insure to the extent of more than seventy-five per cent of that amount.

Then there is the question of the collection of premiums. From the resolution I have introduced it might be surmised that we wanted the government to do this free for the three western provinces. That is not the idea of crop insurance, though in view of the present position of the western farmer the government at first would have to do that. We have many farmers in the west who would be pleased to pay their own premiums, if they could once get started; but in instituting such a scheme I suggest that the government take at least a portion of the premiums, if not all, in the form of wheat or some other farm product, particularly in a year when there was a large crop. That would have the effect of taking a large part of the surplus off the market, and would help stabilize prices. It would have a double benefit; it would help the farmers finance themselves and would help the government put the farmers in the position of being able to pay their own premiums. After all, any industry that is worth while should stand on its own feet.

I have touched only a few of the principal features of crop insurance. There is one other point I should like to mention, however, and it is this. In years when we have large crops, such as we had this year in many parts of western Canada, the municipalities could do a great deal to help themselves if they would build municipal elevators in which part of the crop could be stored. Why do I advocate a scheme of that kind? I do so because every year we have had a crop failure the farmers have had to come and ask this government to provide seed and feed, and in almost every case when the farmer came to pay back the advance it has taken three bushels of wheat in the fall to pay for one bushel of seed obtained in the spring. That being so, I believe something should be done by way of storing grain, not in commercial elevators, so that it may be available in time of need. The cost of providing feed, seed and direct relief in western Canada has brought bankruptcy to most of the municipalities, placed a heavy burden on the provinces as a result of which they are unable to finance themselves without the help of this government, and placed a heavy strain upon the finances of the federal authorities. At the conference held in Winnipeg last December it was stated that $900,000,000 had been spent on relief. We cannot continue under present conditions, and it is for that reason I now bring the subject matter of this motion to the attention of the government.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL HEALTH

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE HEALTH EXAMINATIONS AND TREATMENT FOR DISEASE

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government of Canada should try to secure amendments to the British North America Act, to provide periodical health examinations and provision for suitable treatment for all those suffering from disease.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the resolution appears in its present form so that it may not be called by a false name and debated under some other head. We realize that as a dominion government we cannot go ahead without the cooperation of the provinces. Therefore we want to tell them, in the words of Dickens, that "Barkis is willin'."

I bring the resolution before the house, first, for the sake of the doctors, and, second, on behalf of the sick. I speak not from hearsay but from personal information and from what I have seen in Saskatchewan, Manitoba and around the head of the lakes. The worthy hon. member who has seconded this motion (Mr. Howden) used to take me out under his wing, especially on a Sunday night when he had a few calls to make, and in that way I was permitted to see and to understand for myself. I saw both sides of the case. I can see that doctor, on my advice and invitation, visiting the home of a man, the father of five children, who could not pay five cents to the doctor. The father was suffering from a severe foot infection, and as a result part of it had to be cut away. I can still see that man sitting with his foot in a pail of hot water. I can still see that worthy doctor taking the foot from the water, and handling it as if it were a tender baby. Who would pay him? I say that sort of thing is not fair. It has been said of that doctor that at one time the community in which he lived owed him $75,000, and, if I may be permitted to use the doctor's own plain language, he would not "get a blamed cent of it." No doctor whose services may be worth $50 to $70 a day should have to give them free of charge. We have great wealth in Canada and, as I said on another occasion, there ought to be enough for everybody. But there is not sufficient for all, because of the greed of some. Selfishness is perhaps one of the greatest causes of much of our suffering.

I can remember an occasion in northern Manitoba when a young doctor took me with him on a forty-mile drive. Taking his kit, he expected to perform some surgical work. When we arrived at our destination conditions were not very comfortable for him and were especially uncomfortable for the patient. However, working under difficult conditions, the doctor did the best he could, and the operation proved successful. Following his work we drove home, shooting some wild ducks and having our lunch on the way. I was present at an interview between that doctor and the farmer. The doctor's fee, to cover a forty mile trip and a surgical operation, was $17.50. When he was informed of the amount, the farmer objected. Then, as one might expect the doctor sat back and permitted the sky pilot to do the talking. I informed that man that for the type of operation which had been performed the doctor should receive $150. I said to him; "The doctor will not take a cent for his services because you have not appreciated what he has done in saving the life of your wife. Perhaps you think your wife was not worth very much." Some time after that however the man had a good crop and was able to make a payment.

I am sure there are medical men in the house who come from centres where during the depression—and the same may apply even now—they received very little for their services. That would be true especially in relief cases. I could take hon. members to a home in Fort William where a doctor had been called to attend a sick child. As it was not expected to live, I, too, had been called. As one might expect, the minister beat the doctor to it. I can still see that doctor—and I do not mind giving his name; it was Doctor McCartney, a very fine type of returned soldier—attending that child as if it were the most valuable thing on earth. Yet he could not get five cents for his work. I say, therefore, that the resolution is worthy of support, first, for the sake of the doctors.

May I point out, too, that it should be supported for the sake of the sick. I heard of a farmer in O'Connor district, near Fort William, who refused to go to the hospital for treatment because he did not expect to live much longer anyway, and did not wish to leave his family in debt. Undoubtedly he should have had treatment.

To my mind the two reasons I have submitted are sufficient to warrant the support of the resolution. I know the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) will give it his fatherly approval just as soon as the means are at his disposal. Prevention is the best kind of cure. Our doctors tell us that if patients could be treated in the early stages, the cost of illness would not be so great. We know however that the surgeon or doctor is called in only as a last resort, and that in many cases surgical operations are performed when it may be too late. The people hardest hit in this way are the greatest producers of wealth, namely the toilers, and especially the farmers. In some communities great difficulty is experienced in getting a doctor. For some time in a district east of Port Arthur the people have been trying to obtain the services of a doctor. They would pay part of the expense, and would find some other way to provide the rest of his salary, but so far however they have not been able to secure the services of a medical man. Under present circumstances medical attention costs them far more than it should.

I do not want to take much time in a discussion of this motion, because we want to hear from members in different parts of the house. I would say that one of the outstanding needs of our time is that of health examination, especially for those who are contemplating marriage. I believe the absence of such examination is one of the greatest causes of divorce. The doctors know more about that than I do, and they will be able to speak with authority.

I leave the matter now for the consideration of the house, because to my mind health examinations and treatment for those suffering from disease represent one of the outstanding needs of our time. From Cape Breton on the east to Vancouver on the west, and extending up into the northern country, periodical health examination and proper medical treatment are very necessary. I know it is difficult to get the money, but under present circumstances it is costing the country far more than it otherwise would.

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, during the session of 1931 it was my privilege and pleasure to bring before the house the following resolution:

That, in the opinion of this house, a measure of federal state medicine would be in the best interests of the Canadian people.

It will be seen that I asked only for a measure of state medicine. Thirteen hon. members took part in the debate on that resolution, and, with the exception of two, I am happy to say that they were all favourably disposed. In fact one member on the government side, since deceased, sent me over a note asking me not to withdraw the resolution but to allow it to go to a vote. However, the leader of the government took exception to the resolution and set his face quite definitely against it. He indicated that if the resolution were accepted by the government it would mean that the government would be obliged to bring in state medicine in some form, and that the resolution, in the terms in which it then appeared, meant practically the sweeping away of all existing medical services in the country. In the following year I moved another resolution in the following language:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into immediate consideration steps which would: (a) provide for periodic medical examination of the Canadian people; (b) afford medical relief for those suffering from disease.

This resolution was substantially the same as the one moved to-day by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor). Under the circumstances it is not difficult for me to come to his assistance and support his contention by seconding his motion.

It is not my intention to spend a great deal of time in a discussion of the resolution; it speaks plainly enough for itself. It asks that the government secure authority to provide for periodical health examinations and to afford relief to those suffering from disease.

I would proceed first by asking the house: Is it desirable that we should have periodical medical examinations? We are told that thousands of people, in fact hundreds of thousands of people in this country die yearly from preventable diseases. We are told that between three and four per cent of the population of Canada are constantly sick and under medical care, and that medical services cost the people in the vicinity of $300,000,000 yearly.

What would be the advantage of periodical medical examinations? Speaking generally, I say that periodical medical examinations would discover, in the case of children, bad teeth, diseased tonsils, defective hearing and eyesight, scrofula, chorea, tuberculosis, and many other forms of disease which would have disastrous results in a short time or lead to more serious trouble later. Then in the case of adults, periodical examinations would discover tuberculosis, heart disease, the greatest destroyer of human life; hyperarterial tension, and many other conditions. So far as children are concerned, if these conditions are discovered in time, about ninety-five per cent of all cases can be corrected. The child may then go on in its healthful way, strong, intelligent, and rejoicing, whereas if the condition is not discovered in time, we may have a feeble youngster who has difficulty in fighting life's battles.

As far as adults are concerned, I think we are all indirectly familiar with the conditions which I have mentioned and realize that periodical medical examinations would be of decided benefit. This whole matter was summed up quite well in a pamphlet put out some years ago by the health league of Canada. It started off by stating what I have said, that many thousands of people die from diseases that could be prevented. It then goes on:

> There is one solution. Periodic health examination—a periodic and thorough overhauling by a competent physician. To induce people to adopt this solution is a task demanding prompt and constant attention of health authorities, thoughtful citizens, and statesmen.
> Disease strikes from coast to coast. It is a national menace and combating it a national problem. Dominion leadership is needed, because at present there is no uniformity of health management. In some places health is well safeguarded, in others, deplorably neglected. Cooperation between the dominion and the provinces in a concerted attack upon venereal disease has proven the value of maintaining a united front against disease. Not until this unity is achieved in attacking all diseases, can we expect a rapid change in the present unsatisfactory disease and mortality rates.

This deals at least in a brief and inefficient way with the first part of the resolution. Surely no one who considers the matter seriously can help but realize the benefit of health examinations, at least once a year or, even better, twice yearly. The people of all countries, particularly the people of the United States, are becoming more alive to the need of state help in the matter of health relief. In 1935 the United States government passed the social security act. I am not familiar with its provisions, but I understand it is a measure which affords relief in many forms to the people of that country. I believe it provides relief for the unemployed, relief by way of public and health services, relief to expectant mothers, child relief, and so on. The President of the United States, realizing that many of the services provided by this act as emergency measures would become permanent once the act had been put into force, created a so-called interdepartmental committee and instructed it to coordinate the health and welfare activities. The chairman of the committee is Miss Josephine Roche, formerly assistant secretary of the treasury; the other members are the undersecretary for agriculture, the assistant secretaries of interior and labour, and the chairman of the social security board.

The social security board, in assuming its duties, asked the technical committee on medical care to investigate health and welfare conditions in the United States. The technical committee on medical care made an intensive study of health activities and summarized its findings in a report which was presented to the interdepartmental committee, which in turn passed it on to the president. The president recognized the urgency of the needs described in the report and suggested that the interdepartmental committee lay the technical committee's report before a public health conference. As a result, a national health conference was called, which assembled at Washington in July, 1938.

Five recommendations were laid before the health conference at that time. I believe those five recommendations are well worthy of the consideration of hon. members of this house, and with your permission, sir, I am going to quote some of them.

The first recommendation was that the existing federal-state cooperative program for general public health services and for maternal and child health services be further extended through enlarged grants in aid to the states. Under this recommendation the committee first proposed an expansion of general public health services. Prevention must always be regarded as the first step in health programs. The expansion of the preventive health service means the strengthening and expansion of organized public health services which are furnished primarily in the states and in local communities. Federal participation should be increased with a view to equalizing the public health services throughout the nation by strengthening such services where they are weak.

The committee further proposed that there be increased federal participation in public health services particularly in promoting an attack on certain important causes of sickness and death, for the control of which we already have effective weapons. I do not know that I need dilate on these various forms of sickness. Although they are not specifically stated, they are definitely hinted at. Certainly tuberculosis is one of them, and transcending even tuberculosis in importance I think is venereal disease, particularly syphilis. Members of this house are probably aware that last year the United States congress passed a bill providing for a federal expenditure of $5,000,000 the first year and $7,000,000 the second year, and such further sums as might be required for the balance of a ten-year period, for the purpose of fighting venereal disease alone.

The committee's recommendation calls for a careful but steady expansion towards a ten-year goal, when an adequate program of expanded public health services would require additional expenditures by federal, state and local governments of about $200,000,000 a year, or about $1.50 per capita. So that the first part of the first recommendation of the national health committee involved in expansion of public health services alone the sum of $200,000,000 a year.

The second part of the first recommendation deals with the expansion of special maternal and child health services. The committee proposed an expansion of the federal-state cooperative program already developed under the social security act. The goal is to assure to the mothers and children of all income groups and in all parts of the United States at least the minimum medical services which are essential to a reduction of the needlessly high maternal mortality rates and death rates among newborn infants, and to prevent diseases and conditions which occur in childhood and lead to serious disabilities in later life. If all of this were undertaken the program would require by the tenth year a total additional expenditure of about $165,000,000 a year. That is to say the first recommendation entailed an expenditure by the United States of $365,000,000 a year for public welfare and maternal and child welfare.

The second recommendation was this—and my reason, Mr. Speaker, for discussing this program in some detail is that it is such a comprehensive program of national health; if by any far-off chance we could embrace such a program in this country, we should indeed be considered a very fortunate people. The second recommendation was concerned with federal grants in aid for the construction of needed hospitals, and for the provision of temporary maintenance grants in the first three years after these new hospitals are built, in order to assist the local communities in taking over the responsibility for using and supporting them. The committee's studies show that the states need about 360,000 additional beds—taking into account beds needed in general, tuberculosis and mental disease hospitals, in both rural and urban areas, and that they need at least 500 health and diagnostic centres—no doubt comparable to our district health units in Canada—in areas not readily accessible to hospitals or not sufficiently populated to require or to be able to support fully equipped hospitals. Improvement and modernization of existing facilities is, of course, included. Averaged over a ten-year period, the total annual cost of this program, including both construction and temporary maintenance, is estimated at a little under $150,000,000.

The third recommendation calls for federal grants in aid to the states to help them meet the costs of a medical care program, and this is the one I wish particularly to emphasize. It is a medical care program for recipients of relief or public assistance and other persons with low incomes who are able to meet the ordinary costs of living but not the extraordinary costs of illness. That to me, Mr. Speaker, is the hub of the whole thing. I believe that about sixty per cent of our population in Canada receive incomes of less than $1,000 a year. While I do not wish to rehash what has been said before, it must be evident to every hon. member that the family man who is not earning more than $1,000 a year will need to use every cent of his income to provide for his family and himself, and naturally he does not put away any money for sickness. When sickness comes it is a burden which he is little able to face, and if he is an honest man and insists upon paying his way, it certainly leaves him in a sad financial condition for a long time to come.

The facts brought to the attention of the committee show that the one-third of the population which is in the lower income brackets is receiving inadequate medical service in the United States. I think the same holds here. This applies to more than 20,000,000 persons who are supported by general relief, work relief, old age assistance and other forms of public aid, and to about 20,000,000 other persons and families with incomes of $800 a year or less. These 40,000,000 are doubly handicapped. They have higher rates of sickness and disablement than prevail among groups with larger incomes, and they have less capacity to buy and pay for the services they need. Current provisions for medical services are inadequate to meet their needs. The committee recommended that the federal government assist the states from grants in aid to strengthen medical services for these two particular groups of the population.

The fourth recommendation, presented as complementary to the third, called for grants in aid to states to enable them to set up a general program of medical care, either by the use of taxation or by state health insurance programs, or by a combination of the two.

The first three recommendations took account of general or special preventive services, hospital construction and modernization and services for the medically needy. The fourth recommendation turns to the problems of persons who are ordinarily self-supporting. The committee directed attention to the economic burdens created by sickness, especially among low income groups, and concluded that there is need for measures which will enable people to anticipate and to meet sickness costs on a budget basis.

Without great increase in total national expenditure, the burdens of sickness costs on families and on the public can be greatly reduced through arrangements to distribute these costs among groups of people and over periods of time. The more adequate prevention and care thus made possible would lessen both individual disasters and the public burdens arising from dependency.

The committee recommended consideration of a comprehensive program designed to increase and improve medical services for the entire population. To finance the program, two sources of funds could be drawn upon: general taxation or special tax assessments, and specific insurance contributions from the potential beneficiaries of an insurance system. The committee recommended consideration of both methods, recognizing that they may be used separately or in combination.

Though this fourth recommendation deals primarily with medical care for self-sustaining persons, the committee recognized that it would be unsound for the states to develop for the self-supporting population medical care programs which are separate and apart from whatever the states might develop for needy persons. Accordingly, the committee proposed that while the fourth recommendation deals primarily with state medical programs for self-supporting persons, a sound state plan should make provision for the care of the needy persons under the same system that is developed for the self-supporting.

I think the fifth and last recommendation is also worthy of notice. The fifth recommendation proposed that federal action be taken toward the development of disability compensation—that is, benefit payments to insured workers who are temporarily or permanently disabled. This recommendation contemplates insurance against loss of wages on account of disability.

Under the present social security program, millions of workers may count on some continuance of partial income in lieu of their regular wages when they become unemployed and are able to work. Under the workmen's compensation laws, most of them are protected against wage loss resulting from accident or injury arising out of employment. But generally they have no protection against wage loss resulting from non-industrial sickness or accident. A limited number of workers do have some such protection through voluntary insurance schemes, commercial or non-profit, but they are a small minority in the total.

There is good reason to believe that insurance against disability can best be treated not by a single insurance system but by two systems closely coordinated. There is, first, the problem of the temporarily disabled worker—the worker who has an acute illness and for whom there is every reason to expect that, after a few weeks or a few months, he will recover and return to work. There is, second, the problem of the permanently disabled worker—the worker who, by reason of crippling or chronic illness, will probably never again be able to enter gainful employment.

Temporary disability compensation, with a substantial waiting period—seven, ten or fourteen days—with benefits calculated at fifty per cent of wages for a benefit period of at least twenty-six weeks, would cost approximately one per cent of wages. The cost should probably be divided between employers and workers, though a share of the cost might be carried by general taxation. Such an insurance system would normally be financed on an annual fiscal basis, involving no reserves other than for operating and contingency purposes.

Permanent disability insurance, with benefits geared to old age and survivor's benefits, would probably cost two-tenths to three-tenths of one per cent of wages in the earlier years, but as time went on the cost might be expected to rise, depending on the extent of the benefits provided and numerous other factors. This type of insurance could be established by liberalizing the present federal old age pension system.

There we have a comprehensive system of national health insurance. It provides for an extension of public health services and maternal and child welfare work; the building of needed hospitals, the institution of district health units in various parts of the country; health service for those on relief and families which cannot afford to pay for it. It offers a form of health insurance to families which would have great difficulty in meeting the cost of large and extended medical services. Lastly it provides protection for workers who are unemployed, and for people who through chronic illness, crippling or old age will be permanently unemployable. It is an important, comprehensive and complete system of health insurance. It has been submitted by the President of the United States to the various states and organizations throughout the states. It has in fact been the subject of heated and vitriolic debate in that country. But there can be no question in the mind of any sane and honest individual who has the welfare of his country and his fellow citizens at heart that the adoption of a program of this kind would be eminently desirable and to the advantage of us all.

Inasmuch as the motion of the hon. member for Fort William practically requires state health insurance—for it is useless to provide for periodical health examinations if relief is not provided where sickness is found to exist—it is not necessary to abolish the health service we have at the present time. We have an excellent health service, extensive hospitals, and a sound and efficient practice of medicine. A large majority of the medical practitioners are philanthropically inclined; they are serious and able. We have health units pretty well spread over the provinces of Quebec and Ontario and finding their way through Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Health and medical services are provided by many fraternal societies; the Kiwanis and other service clubs are doing an excellent work in supplying needed measures of medical relief. Sickness and life insurance companies provide a measure of nursing service in time of illness. The value of ordinary municipal health service is not to be ignored: school nurses examine the children from time to time and ascertain the nature of the illness that is keeping children at home. School children fortunately have the benefit of more than an examination, because according to law in most of our provinces the children are required to submit to inoculation against diphtheria and typhoid and scarlet fever, as well as vaccination against smallpox, and any disease from which they may be suffering is attended to immediately in order that they may return to school as soon as possible. The examination of school children therefore is a valuable service to the country, and we may look forward hopefully to the day when diphtheria, typhoid and scarlet fever will practically cease to exist, just as smallpox has been successfully eradicated.

This is all excellent work, but it falls far short of a general scheme of national health. The poor sick are always poor, and very often sick. They get the poorest medical attention, just as they receive the least consideration in other matters. I urge upon the federal government that they take this matter into serious consideration. All we ask is that they interest themselves in the health of the Canadian people beyond merely administering the Food and Drugs Act and looking after leprosy—which by the way I have never seen and never expect to see, and I am sixty years old—and a few other things that make no difference at all to the Canadian people. If this is all that is done, the federal health department might just as well not exist; and if it might just as well not exist, why not do away with it?

Mr. POWER: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOWDEN: I am glad to hear the Minister of Pensions and National Health say "hear, hear," for I know he is sympathetic to the health movement. I have little doubt that if he were to receive any encouragement from the government to which he belongs we should soon have a desirable system of care of national health.

In conclusion I ask the government to take the same degree of interest in the health of the Canadian people that is being taken by governments not only in the United States and Europe but in South America and Africa and every other country under the face of heaven.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): I agree in general with the purpose of the motion of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) rather than with the method proposed by him for carrying it out. Having been many years ago a medical practitioner, I sympathize with the idea of greater care of the people's health. I realize that the hon. member for Fort William is moved in this matter by his sympathy and kindness of heart. Being a clergyman by profession, he has had much experience, as all medical practitioners have, in entering the homes of the people and seeing the sickness and sorrow which is the lot particularly of the poor; and he feels that something should be done about it. With that feeling I think all hon. members will be in sympathy. One difficulty is the expense, in these times when governments are hard pressed for money, and another, which is at the present time almost insurmountable, is that of securing the necessary change in the British North America Act.

A good deal has been done towards the protection of the health of the people. I think the insurance companies, not only of Canada but of the United States and other countries, deserve much credit for their splendid work in encouraging their policyholders to undergo annual medical examination. For example, within the last ten days I had a thorough examination at the expense of an insurance company in which I have held a policy for some years.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The result was good?

Mr. MANION: Pretty fair; good enough at any rate, I may inform my hon. friend, that I think I shall be hanging around when the next election takes place.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: I am glad my hon. friends are pleased.

Mr. POWER: I do not know whether or not the applause is flattering.

Mr. MANION: Well, I will take a chance on that. Without doubt the insurance companies have carried on this work in the hope that it would pay them to do so, though so far as I know they have been unable to prove as yet that this work has brought them any financial return. Recently, however, I saw some figures which indicated that in 1938 some six thousand people took advantage of the opportunity to get medical examination at the expense of the insurance companies in which they held policies. That is a large number of people. Some of the diseases which may be discovered by these early examinations, even at a time when the patient may seem to be in reasonably good health, are cancer, tuberculosis, diabetes, Bright's disease and heart diseases. There may be others that I have overlooked, but these five came to my mind. If I may give a little free medical advice to the whole house, a complete medical examination at least every year, and I should say every six months, is advisable for all men over fifty years of age. I hope that may make a little business for the medical profession, incidentally, though it will not be any advantage to me because I am not practising. Regular medical examinations every six months or every year would in many cases arrest the progress of some malady which might carry off a man or a woman if it were not discovered in time. The diseases I have mentioned may be discovered early in their development and, by proper treatment, their progress halted. The great leader of the Liberal party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the idol of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), when a comparatively young man was discovered to have some defect in his health. I am not certain whether it had to do with his lungs or his heart, but I think he had what was described in those days as a weakness in the lungs. He was advised to take good care of himself. So well did he do that, despite the fact that he was a hard worker all his life, he lived to a ripe old age. If I may be forgiven for mentioning it, that is a good illustration of the advantage of the early discovery of an illness or disease.

So that even if a debate such as this does nothing more than stir up interest in the health of the individual, it accomplishes a great deal. At the same time it should not be forgotten that this whole question of periodical medical examinations is bound up with health insurance, old age pensions, unemployment insurance and other social services which in some countries at least are being progressively entered upon. Even England, which is far from being a socialist country, has gone in for social services to a greater degree, I think, than most other countries. Indeed, as I said in this house a few days ago, I think during the debate on unemployment insurance, we in Canada might do well to copy more of England's methods in such matters as social services. Canada is very far behind in all these matters, and we might well do more than we have been doing in caring not only for the health but also for the lives of our people.

The latter part of the resolution deals with state medicine, and I do not know that at the present time I would come out wholeheartedly for that. The last few words of the resolution are as follows:

—to provide periodical health examinations and provision for suitable treatment for all those suffering from disease.

That is really state medicine, and at the present time, as far as my information goes, the medical men themselves are opposed to that proposal. There are individuals, of whom I think the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) is one, judging from his remarks in this house on a number of occasions, who favour state medicine, but I think the majority of the medical profession do not. To their credit be it said that in the years that have gone the medical profession have always been in the forefront when any proposal was made which would benefit the public.

Mr. HOWDEN: If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would inform my hon. friend that the house committee of the American Medical Association have accepted the first three and the fifth of those resolutions, but have discarded the fourth.

Mr. MANION: I thank my hon. friend for that information. I do not pretend to be up to date in regard to medical questions at the present time, but I think I am correct in saying that a majority of the medical men in Canada at any rate, and I believe in the United States, are not favourable to state medicine.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend would permit me—I will put it in the form of a question—is it not a fact that at present any province that so desired could embark on state medicine?

Mr. MANION: Yes; before concluding I was going to mention that of course this is at the present time a provincial matter.

I was going to say that the medical men themselves have originated all the advances that have been made in regard to public health. All down through the ages the medical men have been taking away from their livelihood by discovering new methods of treatment and giving them to the world. We can look back at practically all the discoveries in medicine, such as anaesthesia, antisepsis, antitoxin in diphtheria, the treatment of syphilis and various other treatments, and with only one exception that comes to my mind these discoveries have been given freely to the world, without any profit to the person who discovered them. There is another discovery that I overlooked for the moment; that is, the discovery of the insulin treatment for diabetes by our own Doctor Banting of Toronto. It is true that Doctor Banting did receive a reward; he was appointed as head of a research institute which is doing splendid work. But men in the medical profession, all down through the ages, have been discovering methods of treating disease and offering them freely to the world. The one exception that comes to my mind, though there may be others, is the discovery of 606 for the treatment of syphilis, which was patented so that the medical profession, and through them the patients, had to pay quite high prices for the treatment. It was discovered in Germany, and I do not say that with any desire to criticize the German people. I do sometimes criticize their present leader, but I have no criticism of the German people themselves. One other treatment I could have mentioned, perhaps, is the discovery of vaccination many years ago by a country practitioner in England. All the treatments I have mentioned, with the single exception, were given freely to the public, even though it meant that in giving them the medical profession were taking away part of their own livelihood.

I mention this only because it suggests that the fact that the majority of the medical profession oppose state medicine seems to me proof that this is not quite the proper time to institute such a system.

There is another method growing up in various parts of the world whereby medical men band together and form a sort of clinic. In consideration of receiving so much per month from a number of families, they care for them. There is really nothing very new in that, because I well remember that thirty years ago I was doing the same thing on a fairly large scale at the head of the lakes, the vicinity from which the mover of the resolution (Mr. McIvor) comes. The scheme was of an industrial type. I was looking after the employees of three or four very large corporations. I remember that one of them at one time had as many as 1,600 men employed. Regularly I made my morning visit to the plant at half past seven, and held my clinic before I began what I regarded as my regular day's work. This system is much the same as that which is being developed to-day. The employees in the plant paid one dollar a month, and in return received medical and surgical attention, drugs, ambulance service, hospitalization, and all that any man would require in respect of any illness.

Mr. DUNNING: The ancient Chinese system.

Mr. MANION: Yes, to a certain extent it was the ancient Chinese system, the system under which you keep the patient well. He pays you while you are keeping him well, and stops paying when you do not. As a matter of fact I think it is a rather good system. There is this about it, that they pay, whereas to-day a great many who become sick do not pay. From the point of view of the medical men I imagine they would much prefer a system under which all would pay.

One development which has been a great boon to the working man has been the introduction of workmen's compensation boards. This system was introduced in Ontario I do not know how many years ago—it cannot be very many, because I can well remember that there was no workmen's compensation board in the early days of my practice.

Mr. MacNICOL: It was introduced by Sir James Whitney.

Mr. MANION: Yes. There was no workmen's compensation board in the first ten years of my practice. At that time if a man was injured and wished to secure damages he had to sue the company, and very often if he hoped to win he had to carry his case up through the courts. The companies worked on the principle that if an individual beat them in court they were placed in a disadvantageous position in respect of other accident cases. The operations of the workmen's compensation board have brought great happiness to the working man. It is a system which is now in force I believe in every province in Canada, although some of the provinces adopted it only recently.

As I say, the difficulty involved in the proposal of the hon. member lies in the attempt to change the British North America Act. The very fact that it is necessary to change the British North America Act to put into force a system such as this emphasizes the fact that health is really a provincial matter and not a dominion matter. While I might be very sad if the health branch were wiped out, because it is headed by a minister who is one of my very best friends in the house, and while I should not like to see him out of a job—

Mr. POWER: I shall have to deal with the soldiers for a while.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The pensions would remain.

Mr. MANION: Yes. But I have wondered sometimes if the dominion were not going outside its proper scope in dealing as much as it does with health matters. At the same time I believe it was the party to which I belong which brought the health branch into operation. I remember advocating the appointment of the first deputy minister, Doctor Amyot, and also the present one, Doctor Wodehouse.

I suppose, however, that the hon. member for Fort William does not expect the resolution to carry. I imagine he has accomplished his purpose in drawing the matter to the attention of the house. I have expressed my sympathy with the general idea. I imagine his resolution will receive the sympathy of many other hon. members, including that of the minister, and probably the hon. member will consider he has done all that he set out to do.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps the form in which the resolution is presented is not very fortunate. However on behalf of our group I should like to associate myself with the principle which seems to underlie it. I would rather take exception to the last words of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), that sympathy is about all that we need at this time. As regards a great many of these things I think the government ought to be pressed to take action.

Mr. MANION: I did not say sympathy was all you need. I thought sympathy was all you would get.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is a somewhat different matter. Recently the Health League of Canada presented an interesting brief to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations. I shall take the liberty of quoting a part of the submissions which, it seems to me, summarize the situation:

1. That the cost of illness in Canada is so great that it imposes a very heavy burden on the community and on the individual.
2. That the direct cost falls largely on the provinces, municipalities and individuals.
3. That a very large proportion of illness is preventable.
4. That the discoveries in the field of preventive medicine are not applied to the task of preventing illness as they should be and that the amount of money spent on preventive measures is inadequate.
5. That the value of cooperation between the dominion and the provinces has been proven and has proved to be effective in the field of venereal disease control.
6. That this type of cooperation should be extended to other fields.
7. That there is nothing in the British North America Act which prevents cooperation and the development of coordinated action throughout the dominion.

I shall not go farther. The last paragraph brings me to the resolution itself, which urges that the British North America Act be amended so that the dominion might more thoroughly enter into this field. I am inclined to think that the Health League of Canada was nearly correct when it pointed out that there is really nothing in the British North America Act which is out of keeping with action along this line. Here again I would read from their brief in support of the contention that "(7) there is nothing in the British North America Act which prevents cooperation and the development of coordinated action throughout the dominion:"

Under section 91 of the British North America Act exclusive legislation of the parliament of Canada is extended to all matters coming within classes of subjects listed in this section. Subject No. 11 is quarantine and the establishment and maintenance of marine hospitals.

This is the only reference to health in the British North America Act.

I noticed it was taken for granted by the mover of the resolution that the British North America Act would have to be changed. It would appear that the leader of the opposition assumed the resolution could not be carried out without changes to the constitution.

Mr. MANION: Section 92 also refers to the subject.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will come to that. I quote the brief:

In section 92 exclusive powers of the provincial legislatures are defined. Subsection 7 assigns to the provinces the establishment, maintenance and management of hospitals, asylums, charities and eleemosynary institutions in and for the province and other than marine hospitals.

That refers to institutions only.

In view of the fact that in 1867 there were no departments of health and preventive medicine was scarcely thought of, this matter is not definitely taken up in the act.

Section 91 states: "It shall be lawful for the queen, by and with the consent of the House of Commons to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces."

In other words, all residuary matters may be dealt with by the dominion.

It would seem that there is no good reason why the dominion should not enter into full participation in any scheme for the promotion of health throughout Canada.

That seems to be a not unreasonable argument. I shall not go into the constitutional question at any length, but I think we have taken some of these matters altogether too much for granted. We have failed to recognize the developments which have taken place in more recent years.

As to the position of our own group, let me say that from the very inception of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation we have emphasized the necessity of socialized health services. One of the planks in our platform is that there should be cooperation with the provinces in creating dominion-wide socialized health services. A pamphlet recently issued by the national council of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation explains this as follows:

The dominion and the provinces have their ministers and departments of health. In the main, however, health services are a matter of private arrangement with the medical profession, though there are important exceptions.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Several provinces already have some municipal doctors, free tuberculosis sanatoria and cancer and other clinics. But these hardly touch the problem, let alone solve it. On the whole, adequate medical care is still a luxury for the majority of our men, women and children. In thousands of cases serious illness and even death could be avoided if the patients had proper medical attention in time. But most workers, farmers and fishermen can only afford to go to the doctor or even hospital when they become convinced that they can no longer delay with safety. The result is unnecessary and preventable suffering and loss of life.

In this respect, too, Canada is behind most countries. Some form of state medicine is already operating in many lands such as Great Britain, the Scandinavian countries and New Zealand. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation urges the institution of socialized health services for all Canadian citizens and will endeavour to coordinate the work in the provinces on a dominion-wide scale.

That is what we propose and what we are bound to advocate on every suitable occasion. It seems to me that this resolution hardly goes far enough. It asks for periodical health examination and for the suitable treatment of all those suffering from disease. There is nothing specific in that. It is something which cannot be done effectively except by some form of state medicine. Sooner or later we shall have to come to that. The leader of the opposition, himself a medical man, suggests that a considerable number of medical men are opposed to this idea and therefore it is not a good time to advocate a measure of this kind. I am ready to admit that medical men have done a great deal to cure and prevent disease, but I do not think we should take their judgment in such a matter as this as absolute. Like all of us, they have their own professional interests to consider. For example, it was found that in Great Britain medical men were not among those who were most keenly in favour of medical reform, nor were they among those most keenly in favour of the extension of social services by the state. The same thing has recently been found to be true in New Zealand, and I believe also in connection with health services in certain provinces of Canada. I do not think we should be asked to accept as decisive the opinion of a certain group of the medical men. I realize that there are many medical men who are in favour of state medicine, but we should not take the temporary decision of certain members of this profession as final.

Like everyone else, medical men are apt to think in terms of the days when they began to practise and when individualism was more or less the rule. Times have moved on. The leader of the opposition has said that years ago we saw the beginning of a new development when many large industrial companies introduced collective medical services. That is all very well for those who are at work, but I would point out that there are large numbers of our people to-day out of work. There are also large numbers who are receiving such small wages that except in the most extreme emergencies they cannot call a doctor with any hope of paying for his services. Under these circumstances some form of health insurance or state medicine becomes very desirable. Some medical men from the narrower standpoint may be afraid of all that may be involved for themselves or for their profession in this idea, but as in many other instances I think it will be found that they will gradually fall in line with the new conceptions with regard to matters of social welfare.

Somebody has raised the question of where the money is to come from. May I suggest that unless we revert to barbarism, sooner or later the money in any case will come out of the community. It takes a lot of money to support our hospitals and health institutions of all kinds. Surely it would be more economical if we could prevent people from becoming ill. As I said the other evening with regard to crime, I think a greater proportion of the expenditures for penitentiaries and hospitals should be made to prevent crime and disease. Unfortunately we need these institutions at the moment, but we must not lose sight of the larger needs.

This brings me to the third consideration I had in mind. I have spoken about the desirability of periodical health examinations, and I have said that sooner or later we shall have to come to some form of state medicine, which would include medical health insurance. Perhaps more important than these is preventive medicine. We are gradually beginning to realize the desirability of preventing disease. It seems to me that there is absolutely nothing in the British North America Act to prevent the dominion government from going further along these lines than it has hitherto. In the old days we had to fight against smallpox, cholera and many of the great scourges of the middle ages, but even to-day there are other types of disease which take a heavy toll. I hope the government will give careful consideration to what may be done under modern conditions along more modern lines.

Mr. T. J. O'NEILL (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I think practically all hon. members will be found to be in sympathy with the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor). We hear a great deal about dominion and provincial rights, about the British North America Act and as to whether we have a right to bring into vogue a system of state health insurance, but I think in the last analysis public opinion will be found to be the force that will bring about state health insurance.

We have a hospital in Kamloops which was going behind all the time. At every annual meeting of the board of directors attempts were made to find some means to help the hospital. One of the lady members of the board happened to visit a small town in Saskatchewan where they had hospital insurance. She brought back the idea to Kamloops, where the idea was adopted and proved to be a great boon, not only to the people but to the hospital. The hospital is now for the first time in many years beginning to pay its own way, and the people are able to get hospital treatment at rates they are able to afford. They pay one dollar a month, which includes hospital care for the entire family.

In British Columbia also the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific have health insurance schemes of their own for their employees, who contribute $1.75 a month and receive free medical attention, free hospital treatment and free medicine. When these advantages can be secured by the employees of a railway I see no reason why they should not be provided in Ontario by the big manufacturing plants, where often you will find four or five hundred employees in one plant; or if you could not have such a plan in one plant, half a dozen plants could get together and make an arrangement with the doctors.

Further, in Ontario there is an organization formed by the doctors themselves, known as the Associated Medical Services Incorporated. In my opinion, a committee should be set up at this session to study this question in order to see if we cannot get the doctors to cooperate in formulating a plan for submission to parliament, which can then, if necessary, whip it into proper shape.

In British Columbia the provincial government made a conscientious effort to bring into force the state health insurance act which the legislature had passed, but it met with a great deal of opposition, and the opposition of doctors retarded the operation of the act. Therefore, I think it would be much better if we could get the doctors to formulate and submit to parliament a plan of their own, which parliament could use as a basis in enacting suitable legislation, than to have parliament initiate a plan the operation of which might later be blocked by the doctors. What I have said about the doctors in British Columbia I have said in no belittling sense. While they did not block the legislation, the objections they raised were the greatest factor in retarding the operation of state health insurance in that province.

If nothing is done by parliament at this time to bring about state health insurance, at least every member, on his return to his section of the country, can try to get his constituents to adopt a scheme of health insurance and do the best he can to bring about state health insurance on a small scale in the local community, and then it will not be very long before public opinion will force this parliament, in spite of the British North America Act, if that should prove an obstacle, to enact legislation to bring into force state health insurance on a national scale.

Mr. JOSEPH NEEDHAM (The Battlefords): I shall say only a few words because I spoke to a similar resolution last year and I do not want to cover the same ground. I am speaking at the moment not as a medical man, but as one who has had a good deal of experience in the administration of a hospital, and I approach the question from the point of view of preventive medicine. In a hospital you come in contact with the individual who has been forced to undergo treatment in such an institution, and after he has left, you will perhaps hear one medical man saying to another: "If only that man had come to me five or six years ago I could have added ten or fifteen years to his life." But the reason why people do not go for an annual medical examination is largely a financial one; they are afraid of the cost. Some may be afraid that they will be told of some condition which they hope they do not have, and that deters people quite a bit from going to a doctor for medical examination.

I am in favour of this resolution, from the point of view of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), because I believe that more effective work can be done by cooperation between this government and the provinces. I am of the opinion that health is largely a provincial matter, and I believe that the provinces have gone and are going about as far as they possibly can in instituting state medicine. They would go even further if they had the necessary funds.

We have a minister of health in the dominion government, and in that way public health becomes a dominion issue. Reference has been made to what the municipalities are doing. Most of the provincial governments are placing responsibility on the municipality, leaving the municipality to look after the health of its citizens. They too are going just as far as they possibly can with the funds at their disposal.

[Mr. O'Neill.]

There is one phase of the matter which I wish to emphasize from the dominion point of view. The dominion evidently has a responsibility to every citizen of the state because it claims the life of every citizen if needed; in case of war, for example. We are expecting to have laid before us a large appropriation for defence purposes; I say that the surest and best defence that this Canada of ours can have is a strong healthy citizenship, and if we diverted some of the proposed defence appropriation to strengthening the health of our people I think we should have better results and there would be greater satisfaction throughout the dominion.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I want to say just a few words to show that I am in sympathy with the spirit of the resolution. I think we have come now almost to the time when the people do not care whether health is a federal or a provincial matter. What they do care about is that it is a human matter. One hears people talking everywhere about the necessity for state medicine or health insurance or some way of taking care of the sick.

Everybody knows that one serious illness in a family, and not necessarily a poor family but a family that you might call between poor and well off, is enough to cripple that family for years. I know one instance in my own riding where a boy, one of two sons, contracted a serious illness last July, and that one illness will actually cost those people all that they will make for years to come. We have heard a great deal about what the doctors do to assist poor families. Nurses also help. I could not help thinking of the nurse who took care of this case of spinal meningitis and saved the boy's life and mind at a great risk to herself. If she is paid, it will be because the family will make a superhuman effort to pay her. It is a large family, some of the children being only five or six, and it will mean that they will have to do without necessities in order to pay the nurse. Nurses as well as doctors render great service to families who are unable to pay for the service.

I do feel that the federal and provincial governments should get together and decide who is responsible, and then move as rapidly as possible towards some sort of health insurance or state medicine—I do not think it matters what it is called. But I do think we have come to the time when we want to pay the doctors and nurses to keep us well. That would cost less and result in much greater happiness. There would also be an economic gain because there would not be so much interruption of work. Certainly it is the human and civilized way of going about the matter and the sooner we do it the better. No matter how much preventive medicine or health insurance we may have, that alone, while helpful, will not eliminate all the causes of sickness, because in some areas, whether in the country or in the city, where the people have not the proper variety of food, where their food is monotonous and is not the sort that is needed for healthy body-building, where they lack sunshine and air-flooded rooms, where there is no recreation or exercise of a kind to promote body-building, we are bound to have illness. So that much as I believe in doing something along the line of state medicine—and we shall not do it all at once—I suggest that there are other things that we shall have to do at the same time. We shall have to make changes in our whole economic and social set-up in order to do away with the great poverty from which so many Canadians suffer to-day.

When I was in Russia, I visited many of the free health centres, one type of which is called the mother-and-child clinic. In Canada we are accustomed to say a good deal against Russia, and I for one would not care to live there—I would rather live in Canada—but I was both delighted and surprised when I saw the care given to the health of the people. The whole of that vast country is covered by these clinics and various health centres. In one mother-and-child clinic I visited in Moscow I saw the children coming in. The mothers are taken care of through pregnancy and delivery; the child is brought to the clinic once a week until it reaches the age of four, and all this is done without cost to the individual or the family. The only cost involved is for some particular diet which the child may need, and if the parents are working and can afford it they are expected to provide it. If, however, parents cannot procure it, it is provided just the same. I went through the clinic, the house of a former prince, and at the back there was a receiving room. There were little individual compartments, something like telephone booths only larger, to which the children were taken. The doctor would look over the child to see whether it had any disease that could be communicated to children in the waiting rooms, and if it had the child was taken directly to its own home or to a hospital.

Another interesting thing I noted was that in the care of the child the same doctor followed its progress right through. In the mother-and-child clinic in which I spent a forenoon there were thirty-two doctors of whom twenty-eight were women, and the same doctor would take care of a child from birth to the age of four. It was not any doctor who happened to come along; the child's progress was watched by the same doctor throughout that period. There are many such clinics all over that vast city and over the still vaster country.

With regard to the observations of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden), I think many of these people who are ill should be getting some pay in the meantime if their minds are to be free enough to allow them to get well. In Russia when people are suffering from any illness, when workers, whether men or women, are sent to a sanatorium, they are paid the same wage as if they were at work so that they are not worried over their dependants during the illness of the bread-winner. That undoubtedly results in much more rapid cures than would result in Canada, where very often, when people are sent to a sanatorium, they do not know how in the world their families are going to get along, and they spend a good deal of time in worry which prevents them from getting well.

In connection with the great factories of Leningrad and Moscow, the majority of the doctors in the clinics attached to the factories are men, where the majority of the workers are men, and the majority of the doctors are women where the workers are women. We saw the crèche where the mother leaves the child while she is at work. There the child is brought up scientifically with the greatest of care. Its food is carefully inspected, its sleep and even the toys with which it plays are supervised.

Coming out of Russia we passed through Denmark and Sweden, and I met the deputy minister of health of Denmark, and an official of the department of health of Sweden. I learned something of the benefits that accrue to the people of Denmark and Sweden from their nation-wide health insurance scheme. The people contribute a little bit all the time, and when they are ill they receive the very best care in the hospitals for two kronen and a half, which would not be more than sixty cents, a day. They get complete care in hospital, and that is not only nursing but medicine and surgical care as well. They would not think of reverting to a condition without health insurance. It has become a part of their lives and they would not dream of doing without it.

I believe that in Canada we are in many respects away behind other countries, not only in this particular matter but in many others as well. There does not seem to be the same sort of public responsibility for the care of the sick and more particularly for the prevention of sickness, and it is time we moved. Surely we ought to be able to do something this session. If we had asked to have a committee set up to study the question it would have been better, but at any rate it is time the government moved. That is enough to give them a temperature, but still it is time that they themselves took responsibility and moved in the matter of health insurance or state medicine or some form of preventive medicine to help take care of people when they become ill.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): There is only one point on which I wish to place special emphasis. It is a foregone conclusion that we are all heartily in favour of providing more adequately for the health needs of the people of Canada, and it is also conceded by everyone that a nation can be strong only so long as its people are healthy and virile. These things should be and in fact they are taken for granted.

The point has been raised, and I think it is the only point in this whole discussion: How much will this health service cost, and how can we provide for it? There are two viewpoints from which we can look at the question. From the real cost point of view Canada can afford all the cost of providing the people of Canada with all health requirements; for, after all, what is the only real cost of providing or doing anything? It is human skill and energy, and physical material. In the final analysis that is the only real cost of doing anything anywhere. Surely it is obvious that Canada can provide all the things required to supply the people of Canada with all they need to raise their standard of health to the highest that is physically possible.

The financial side of the matter is merely bookkeeping. Surely if the people of Canada collectively can supply the real cost, it is the simplest common sense that we should set up a bookkeeping system, or so revise our bookkeeping system, that it will reflect what is physically possible for the people to do for themselves. What is the only real cost of building institutions? It is the building material—the brick, lumber, cement and whatever goes into the erection of the building—and the human labour to set it up. Certainly the people of Canada can provide all those things to erect institutions to care for the health of its people.

Furthermore, surely it is conceded that we have sufficient medical skill, sufficient doctors and nurses, or if not, they can be provided quickly. So from the real cost point of view the facilities necessary to provide for a high standard of health for the Canadian people can all be supplied. Then, why in the name of common sense should we not now arrange our bookkeeping system, our money system, to reflect these facts? That is the only real question in any problem that is raised in this parliament, or anywhere else. It would be conceded, I am sure, that physically we can solve almost any problem that faces this dominion. Every problem that is raised here eventually resolves itself into a question of finance, and until we set up an adequate financial or bookkeeping system it is in my opinion a waste of time to talk about these problems—

Mr. GOLDING: Then why talk about them?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the motion before the house.

Mr. KUHL: Yes, I am not going to get into a discussion of financial policy; I am simply pointing out what the real problem is in the resolution under discussion. I say it is physically possible for the people of Canada to provide anything that this resolution calls for, and it is the responsibility of the governing body which has control of finance to provide a financial policy which will reflect the physical capacity of the people to provide for the fulfilment of their desire. I think I need say no more in regard to that. It is painfully obvious to everyone that the real problem is the financing of such things as this resolution calls for, and it is time we set ourselves to devising a scheme which will make financially possible what is physically possible in this country in every way, shape and form.

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (Wellington North): The resolution contains the clause "to provide periodical health examinations", which I think is extremely important. The public does not take advantage of its medical health officers. They are there to serve us. We have even had members of parliament drop dead who did not know they were sick. They should have known they had high blood pressure. Especially is periodical examination necessary for smaller children and for those over fifty years of age. The medical health officers should examine the public at a reduced rate as part of their jobs. Not only in cases of sickness do people need their advice, but you find sometimes big, fat fellows who perhaps do not know they are eating too much, and the health officer should tell such a man to diet, or tell his wife to stop feeding him. Or a man might be found who shows every indication of having had, say too much beer. He should be told not to do so. Or if a man is working too hard he should be told, for the sake of his own life. This is no trivial situation, because people are dying on all sides who should not die, whose death might be prevented by a timely examination. It is generally believed that more people die from overeating than anything else, so it would be much cheaper to cut down on the diet.

I sometimes amuse myself watching the crowds go by and taking notes, and about every sixth or seventh person one sees is in obvious need of false teeth. Not having them means that these people will die that much sooner. In examining the mouths of the children in the public schools, which I have to do every year, one finds that their teeth are not attended to at all, they are growing in all shapes, the result being that their mouths are not in proper condition when the secondary teeth come in. We are not taking proper care of this generation. We do not think it is the duty of this house to take care of them.

We think there is unnecessary duplication of services. We have had travelling clinics sent out by this government going through the provinces, examining for tuberculosis, and other clinics are sent out by the provinces. That is folly. But we should have free travelling clinics for tuberculosis going through the country every year, under well organized provincial medical control and subsidized by the federal government. More attention should be paid to the services of the medical health officer, much more work should be required of him, and people should be compelled to go to the health officer so that he may guide them as best he can for their own benefit and for the purpose of prolonging their lives.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the house reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government of Canada should try to secure amendments to the British North America Act, to provide periodical health examinations and provision for suitable treatment for all those suffering from disease.

This and similar resolutions that have been placed on the order paper during past years—I may say in increasing numbers in more recent years—indicate that the people of this country are more and more taking an interest in public health, and so far as I am concerned that is absolutely all to the good. In former days, as older members will recall, when a resolution of this kind came up there was usually a doctors' field day, and those of us who were lay members of the house rarely ventured to discuss the question at issue. I am not sure whether our intervention would have been very welcome in any case. It is, I think, an encouraging feature for those interested in public health that so many hon. members who are not by profession medical men should take part in these debates and endeavour to impress their views on their fellow members and on the Canadian people. In other words, the members of this house are becoming health conscious. Whether that is as a result of pressure from their constituents or whether for once we are taking the lead is not a matter of much importance; what I think is important to the people of Canada is that whatever methods or means we may adopt to achieve our object, we are coming to realize that those things once considered purely idealistic, to which only visionaries subscribed a few short years ago, have now become almost matters of what I might call practical politics.

There has come to a very large number of people in this country the belief that every citizen is inherently entitled to as much right to protection from sickness and disease as to protection from the more violent if often less hazardous, attacks of those who wish to steal his property or injure his person. The great difficulty would not appear to be so much the acceptance of the principle. I believe we have placed behind us the view held in days gone by that sickness, disability and illness were each man's individual concern and that the calling of a doctor was something to be avoided except in the most extreme cases. In those days the doctor was one of the most unwelcome visitors to the home. Not only was he unwelcome when he came in the course of his professional duty; he was still more unwelcome later when he attempted to collect the fruits of his labour.

I think we have reached a stage where it is not difficult for anyone to obtain the undeniable sympathy of members of this house and of the country at large to almost any proposal for an increase in the amount of money to be spent on public health. The difficulty, I believe, lies first in regard to just what authority, municipal, provincial or federal, is to be charged with the responsibility of carrying out those proposals; and second, in spite of the advice we have received from some of my hon. friends in the far corner, just where we are to raise the large sums of money which inevitably will be involved in carrying out these highly sympathetic proposals.

I might digress here for a moment to deal with the suggestion of my good friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) with respect to that very point of the responsibility of the various authorities which deal with health in this country. On consulting part II of the act respecting the Department of Pensions and National Health, I find that the duties and powers of the minister are set out as follows:

The duties and powers of the minister under this part shall extend to and include all matters and questions relating to the promotion or preservation of the health of the people of Canada over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction, and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, particularly the following matters and subjects:

(a) Cooperation with the provincial, territorial, and other health authorities with a view to the coordination of the efforts proposed or made for preserving and improving the public health, the conservation of child life and the promotion of child welfare—

That was urged by my hon. friend. Some of the other duties imposed upon the minister are these:

(b) The establishment and maintenance of a national laboratory for public health and research work;

(c) The inspection and medical care of immigrants and seamen, and the administration of marine hospitals;

(d) The supervision, as regards the public health, of railways, boats, ships and all other methods of transportation;

(e) The supervision of federal public buildings and offices with a view to conserving and promoting the health of the civil servants and other government employees therein;

(f) The enforcement of any rules or regulations made by the International Joint Commission. . . .

(g) The administration of the acts mentioned in the schedule to this act—

That is to say, the Food and Drugs Act and others.

(h) Subject to the provisions of the Statistics Act, the collection, publication and distribution of information relating to the public health, improved sanitation and the social and industrial conditions affecting the health and lives of the people;

(i) Such other matters relating to health as may be referred to the department by the governor in council.

Section 12 of the act, however, considerably restricts the authority conferred upon the minister. It reads:

Nothing in this part or in any regulations made hereunder shall authorize the minister or any officer of the department to exercise any jurisdiction or control over any provincial or municipal board of health or other health authority operating under the laws of any province.

So all we can do, so far as the provincial authorities are concerned, is cooperate. We have no power and no authority over them. Let us take for a moment the proposal with respect to periodical medical examinations, with which we are dealing at the present time. May I say at once, though perhaps this carries no authority, that from the information I have been able to acquire in one way and another, officially and otherwise, I have been led to the conclusion that periodical medical examinations would be of great benefit to the community; first of all, by detecting and permitting the diagnosis in the earlier stages of diseases which might very well turn out to be fatal later on, such as cancer, heart disease and so on. It would be beneficial in observing the development of the individual and would permit us to detect the earliest signs of change from the normal and of impending disease. It would enable us to observe the effects of a hygienic daily regime; to note abnormal conditions arising from neglect of the laws of health; to recognize the benefit of following advice given to correct these abnormal conditions; to detect the early signs of focal infections and the results of their persistence; to accumulate facts regarding early symptoms of disease and treatment; to investigate the possibilities of cure in cancer, tuberculosis, venereal disease, et cetera, and to study the importance of hygienic and dietetic treatment in general. So that I do not think there is any difference of opinion with respect to the value, not only to the individual and the community but to the dominion in general, of putting into effect something like periodical medical examination, in a general way.

If I may be permitted to digress again I would say that we have in this country to some extent periodical medical examination carried out gratuitously by the insurance companies. On January 1, 1930, a system of periodical health examination was adopted for the policy-holders of four insurance companies, namely the Sun Life, the Confederation Life, the London Life and the Canada Life. The scheme was inaugurated by the Canadian Medical Association. The companies agreed to pay $6 for each examination, $4 of which would be paid to the doctor and $2 to the Canadian Medical Association for administration and education. To further the scheme the Department of Pensions and National Health, in cooperation with the Canadian Medical Association, published a booklet for the guidance of physicians making examinations. In 1931 the number of policy-holders examined was 3,797. Having inaugurated the scheme the Canadian Medical Association dropped out, and its place was taken in 1931 by the Canadian Medical Institute of Toronto, which acted as administrative body.

The Canada Life Insurance Company has dropped out of the scheme, and at the present time there are three companies which have periodical examinations for policy-holders, namely the Sun Life, the London Life, and the Confederation Life. The examinations are confined to policy-holders thirty years of age and older, and for policies of $5,000 or more. In 1938 the total number of policy-holders examined was 6,000, and it is believed that in 1939 the number will be close to 7,000. Since 1931, 36,610 policy-holders have been examined. The fee paid at the present time to the examining doctor is $5, and the per capita cost of administration is $1.42, making a total of $6.42.

It is obvious that if periodical medical examinations were made available for all the people of Canada on the basis adopted by the insurance companies above-mentioned, the cost would be practically prohibitive. It might be possible to obtain a reduction in the medical fee if the numbers examined were sufficiently large, but no one could expect a doctor to make a thorough medical examination for less than $3. Even at this amount the cost would be still almost prohibitive. The only practical way, I am advised, to adopt a periodical medical examination would be by some system of health insurance.

But to return to the question of periodical medical examination, may I point out that in order to have the greatest value there would have to be some element of compulsion or coercion in it. Unless all, or almost all, or even a large majority, of the people of this country desired the examination, or were willing to give themselves the trouble or to suffer the inconvenience of calling on a selected medical man to be examined, some form of coercion would have to be employed. If we wanted to have a good cross-section indicating the health of the people of Canada in different localities, I am convinced this compulsion would have to be brought to bear.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would be the first to agree with me that he would not expect me, at any rate—and I do not think I would expect him, if he were in my place—to go to any province in Canada and say, "I ask you to permit me, or to permit the government of which I am a part, to amend the British North America Act, so that I may impose coercion on the citizens of your province and place upon them the obligation of coming before a doctor to be examined." I would thereby be violating the elementary principle of the British North America Act with respect to civil rights. Then I would have to go one step farther. I would have to call on my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and ask him to lend me his mounted police, so that they could go forth into the country districts and round up or corral the recalcitrants who refused to have their teeth cleaned or their chests thumped. I fear very much that my right hon. friend, with all the courage he has and all the desire he has to be of assistance to his fellow countrymen, would not undertake to enter into such a campaign as that—a campaign whereby we would have to apply some system of fine, coercion or force to bring the people before the doctors for examination.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is perhaps about to say that a large number of people would wish to be examined. The statistics we have from the insurance companies lead us to the conclusion that even in those companies, where this work can be done free of charge, where it is performed on those policyholders having policies of $5,000 or more, and where it can be performed without great inconvenience or loss, advantage has not been taken of the opportunity to anything like the extent to which it could have been taken.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the minister if his objection would not apply to a considerable extent to coercion on the part of a province? The fact is we have not yet realized the importance of the matter. Would that not also apply to a province taking such drastic action as he suggests?

Mr. POWER: But they have the right to do it; we have no right.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But that is another matter.

Mr. POWER: I am answering my hon. friend's suggestion that we have the right to impose periodical examination. In the first place I say we have no right, and in the second place I say I would not have the courage to ask a province to give me the right to go into their territory with authority to fine and imprison people simply because they did not want periodically to be medically examined.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Where does the minister find the right in this instance in the British North America Act? Where does the minister find in that act the right of the province to this field.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Civil rights.

Mr. POWER: Surely it is a question of civil rights.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): How can you force me to go to a doctor? It is my civil right, and only the province can deal with the matter.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: How can the province deal with it?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The province has the authority under civil rights.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I had not intended to debate the question when the minister was speaking—

Mr. POWER: I have no objection.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —but I was going to ask whether this is not a matter expressly dealt with in sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act. I note that the residual powers seem to be with the dominion.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But it comes under civil rights.

Mr. POWER: It is the civil right of each individual, if he so desires, to be cleansed or to be washed, to have his tooth pulled, to have his chest pounded, or to be placed on a table and have a stethoscope placed on his chest. He has a perfect civil right to resist, unless we made his resistance a criminal offence. There is the objection I raise; I do not say the provinces cannot do it themselves.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They can.

Mr. POWER: Yes, the provinces can do it. But I say that under the present set-up we cannot do it, and that with the little political sense I have I will not do it. I would not like to do it, and I would not try it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Could not the dominion government go as far as the insurance companies and make this optional for all?

Mr. POWER: I am not sure, but possibly we could set up centres in which all who wanted could have medical examinations. Admitting that is possible, I come to the next objection. After all, periodical medical examination would be only part of the great problem of looking after the health of the people. I will not say it is putting the cart before the horse or that it is an unimportant part of the problem, but I do contend it is not an absolutely first essential in the general health problem. It must be included in the general problem of health insurance, whether such a plan is contributed to by the municipality, by the province or by the federal government. Of itself I cannot see that it would be of much benefit unless there were other means of looking after those who, upon examination, were found to be ill. After all, we would not be getting very far if we simply set up examination centres where we could tell Bill Jones that he had a leaky heart, and advise him where to go for treatment. Necessarily we would be obliged to coordinate our efforts with those of the hospitals, with those of the medical authorities generally in the provinces and with those of the provincial health authorities. All we could do would be to tell a man what his disability was and where he could obtain treatment.

I am speaking now to the resolution as it is drafted and am not discussing the general principle. I contend that if we adopted this resolution as it is drafted we would not get very far. If we are to undertake anything that would be of value to the people of Canada, we must coordinate our efforts with those of the provinces on a much wider scale. I would like nothing better than to be in a position to propose a bill similar to that introduced into the senate of the United States on February 28, 1939, by Senator Wagner of New York. This is entitled the national health act of 1939. For maternal and child health services it proposes:

—there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, the sum of $8,000,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, the sum of $20,000,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1942, the sum of $35,000,000; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year thereafter a sum sufficient to carry out the purposes of this part of this title.

Then, to provide medical services for children and services for crippled and other physically handicapped children, the bill provides appropriations for 1940 totalling $13,000,000; for 1941, $20,000,000; for 1942, $35,000,000, and thereafter the sums sufficient to carry out that part of the title. Then the same bill provides the following appropriations for public health work:

—for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, the sum of $15,000,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, the sum of $25,000,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1942, the sum of $60,000,000;

And thereafter such sums as are sufficient to carry out the purposes of that part of the title. Then, for hospitals and health centres the bill provides for an appropriation of $8,000,000 for 1940, $50,000,000 for 1941 and $100,000,000 for 1942.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is a real liberal government.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not a government bill, it is just a bill.

Mr. POWER: I do not quite agree with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). I think a good deal of it will be put over. Then, for grants to states for medical care the bill provides for appropriations of $35,000,000 for the year ending June 30, 1940, and thereafter a sum sufficient to carry out the purposes of this title.

Mr. DUNNING: Read the qualifying clauses.

Mr. POWER: I think in most of the sections the qualifying clause is to the effect that there is an allotment made to the states. It provides that there must be a state plan to effectuate the purposes of the act and to provide for financial participation by the state and for a state-wide program or for an extension of the program each year so that it shall be in effect in all political subdivisions of the state in need of the services not later than the beginning of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1945. Another clause provides for administration of the plan by the state health agency and for supervision by such agency of any part of the plan administered by another state agency or by a political subdivision of the state. There is provision also for the setting up of advisory councils.

Mr. DUNNING: The state has to put up a great deal of money.

Mr. POWER: Payments are made to the state provided the state subscribes something.

Mr. DUNNING: How much?

Mr. POWER: The part of the act I have been able to study does not make that quite clear. The financial resources and per capita income of the state is considered. The Minister of Finance will be glad to know that the poorer states receive more money, which is something to be said for this bill quite apart from its other provisions.

Mr. DONNELLY: Could the minister state what percentage of people took advantage of the opportunities for free examination afforded by the insurance companies?

Mr. POWER: I shall try to have that by eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. POWER: Mr. Speaker, just at six o'clock the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) asked if it was possible to ascertain the proportion, of those who could if they wished obtain periodical medical examination from the insurance companies, who have actually taken advantage of this free benefit. I have not been able within the time at my disposal to ascertain the exact numbers, but I am reliably informed that only thirty per cent of the limited number, it is true, of those who hold policies of a value of over $5,000 have up to the present taken advantage of the offer made to them by the insurance companies. In numbers it was something like 36,000 since the scheme was inaugurated in 1930, and this year it is expected that some 7,600 will take advantage of the offer.

I notice, Mr. Speaker, that I have not very much more time at my disposal. I took up rather more time than I had intended in discussing some of the proposals which are now before the United States senate with respect to health generally and health insurance.

The house will remember that as far back as 1929 this house passed a resolution referring to the committee on industrial and international relations the question of sickness and invalidity insurance, and that committee reported to the house that the department of health should make some study of the question of health insurance in order to be prepared to give the information which would be necessary whenever the house or the country should desire that health insurance be put into effect. Time will not permit my placing on Hansard anything like the quantity of information which it has been possible to collect in the department, but if the house will bear with me for a moment or two I should like to sketch as briefly as possible some of the plans for health insurance or state medicine as they exist in different countries, and also to point out, with all due respect to the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden), who wished to abolish the department over which I now preside, that we have done something at least in gathering information to be available to members of the house and others who are interested in this matter, which information will guide them in their further researches in matters relating to state medicine and health insurance.

Last year, during the course of the debate on a similar subject, I dealt extensively with the situation as it exists in Russia, which is really the only country in the world that has state medicine in all its implications, and where, so far as we are aware, owing to their peculiar constitutional set-up, it has been found practicable so to regiment their medical men and their citizens that it is quite possible and even probable that state medicine has been successful.

In Germany they have a state insurance scheme, contributory and to some extent compulsory, and 19,000,000 citizens of that country come under its provisions.

In Norway the system of state health insurance is compulsory through insurance societies, which are confined one society to one district, and the division of contributions is made along these lines: The insured pays six-tenths; the employer, one-tenth; the commune, which I take to be the municipality, one-tenth, and the state, two-tenths.

In Sweden, of which we hear a great deal these days, the system is voluntary, and here again it operates through societies with fixed societies in each region. The insured receives one quarter of the costs of medical care and drugs and has to pay for the rest of it himself. In Sweden one million persons out of a total population of 6,300,000 come under this scheme.

In Denmark the scheme is on a voluntary basis, again through societies, but the state there pays fifty-four cents a year per head for persons whose income is less than a legally specified limit. So I take it that in Denmark what we might call the medically indigent are being looked after, and the state also gives cash for lay-off periods and provides for medical and maternal care. Out of a population of 3,700,000, there are 2,100,000 so insured.

In France they have a system all their own, whereby the sick pay out of their own pockets a percentage amounting to about twenty per cent of the doctor's medical costs, and the state provides a certain amount.

In Italy, while I have not been able to ascertain just how the proportion is made up, the fascist confederation of industry and the fascist confederation of industrial workers handle together the insurance of all the workers.

In Great Britain, as is well known, their health insurance scheme has been in effect for twenty-five years. Prior to 1936 there had been expended in insurance benefits $2,825,000,000, and there are in the reserve funds $618,270,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is contributory, is it not?

Mr. POWER: It is contributory, and only recently, in April, 1938, their scheme was extended to take in younger people of school age just leaving school. The total number comprised in the insurance scheme in England is 18,000,000.

But the most interesting developments have taken place within the past year in Australia and New Zealand. I am merely endeavouring, as I said a moment ago, to give this information to the house, to serve as a reference to those interested who may wish to make a further study of these different schemes.

In Australia I understand they have come closer to real state medicine than in any other part of the British empire. In September, 1938, the Australian parliament passed a bill known as the National Health and Education Act, which was supposed to come into operation on January 1, 1939. My information—I am not quite sure of my facts, and perhaps some hon. gentlemen might be able to check me on them—is that the operation of the scheme has been postponed. In the daily press of a week or so ago I saw some reference to its postponement.

The Australian plan is compulsory and designed to cover all employees earning up to seven pounds a week, but this limit does not apply to manual workers. In other words, if a manual worker earns more than seven pounds a week he still comes under its provisions. The act is operated entirely through approved societies.

The principal benefits are: Insured persons will be entitled to the fullest medical attention possible, for life; for sickness, men will receive twenty shillings a week; women fifteen shillings a week, for six months; for disablement, men fifteen shillings, women twelve shillings and sixpence, and these payments may continue until the time that the person through age would become eligible for pension; juveniles between fourteen and sixteen years of age will also draw sick benefits to the extent of five shillings a week; married minors will receive the same scale of benefits as adults, and unmarried minors, twelve shillings and sixpence, and ten shillings, for male and female respectively.

The government's contribution to the scheme is substantial. It will (1) contribute £100,000 annually for the administration of health insurance; (2) 10 shillings per insured person to meet the liabilities for health benefits; (3) £1,000,000 per annum for five years for pensions, this contribution rising by £500,000 per annum after the first five years until by 1961 the yearly grant is stabilized at £10,000,000.

I have here a note that there has been some criticism that a fund so large would entail a heavy charge on a nation with a population still under 7,000,000. In New Zealand the charges are still heavier. In that dominion the legislative council passed the government's social security bill, which provides free medical service for all and pensions at thirty shillings weekly for all at sixty. It goes into effect on April 1, 1939. In this case it seems to me, though again I speak subject to correction, that I have read somewhere that the actual operation of the act will be postponed. According to the government's actuaries the schemes will entail an estimated expenditure of £17,857,000, or $69,615,000, annually at the start, increasing to £21,900,000, or $85,410,000, annually in five years and to £25,000,000, or $97,500,000, annually in thirty years.

The new services are to be financed in part by an increase from eightpence to one shilling in the pound in the employment tax on wages, and this will be known as the social security contribution. The money thus raised will be subsidized on a pound for pound basis out of the general government fund. In addition to the pension of thirty shillings weekly, provided for all at the age of sixty, there will be allowed an income of $1 a week from other sources in the case of either an individual or a married couple. The free medical service will include universal general practitioner service free to all members of the community who require medical attention. The scheme also embraces free hospital or sanatorium treatment for all and free care and treatment for the mentally afflicted. Medicines are provided free, and there is a further benefit in the form of maternity treatment including the cost of maintenance in a maternity home. In addition, a grant will be made through some suitable agency to allow mothers to provide an outfit for babies. The American Medical Association journal reported that general practitioners on the whole are enthusiastic about the scheme, while specialists are opposed to it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to interrupt the minister, but he has exhausted his time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Mr. POWER: As one who has strenuously and consistently opposed any member talking for more than forty minutes, and who when the rule was introduced thought it should be made twenty minutes, I hope the house will bear with me if I continue for a few minutes longer.

The Union of South Africa is proposing seriously to take up a health insurance scheme. A departmental committee has gone into the question and worked out a plan, which is contributory, 14½ per cent from the government, 49 per cent from the employers and 36½ per cent from the employees. The total estimated cost is £5,331,690 a year. It is intended that the scheme shall apply to all employed persons of all races including dependents of either sex, resident in the area of the local authorities and earning not more than £400 per annum. The benefits are to include the services of a general practitioner and of a specialist when necessary, and also cash payments in periods of illness, on the occasion of a birth, and for burial expenses. There will be also a payment towards the cost of hospital expenses.

This briefly outlines some of the schemes in force in other countries. Canada is not entirely without such social legislation, but as is well known to this house it is wholly confined either to voluntary effort on the part of individuals or to the provinces themselves. British Columbia has a health insurance act which was passed in 1936 and which was to have gone into effect on January 1, 1937. For reasons which I think are well known to most of us it has not yet become effective, but it is a pretty broad and generous act. It provides for every employee in the province—there are a few exempted classes—earning less than $1,800 per annum, becoming insured together with his dependents; and for those receiving up to $3,000, provision is made that they may become eligible for insurance benefits under certain conditions. To meet the cost of all benefits under the act, the health insurance fund is contributed to by the employer and the employee. I have all the details, but I need not weary the house with them.

In Alberta a health insurance bill was passed in 1932; but it has not yet been put into effect, and in Saskatchewan, in 1934, the public health act was amended to include a board known as the health service board whose duty it was to ascertain the needs of the people of that province in respect of hospital, nursing, dental and medical care and other health services, the advisability of providing facilities for periodical medical examination, and such other matters as the board may think fit.

In other provinces inquiries have been made as to the cost and incidence of health insurance. The Quebec social insurance commission in 1933 reported that it was the opinion of the commission that recourse should be had to the subsidized optional regime before the obligatory system, all the more because the subsidized optional regime would be easy to apply since mutual benefit insurance societies already existed, and it would be sufficient to make use of them. The report referred to the excellent work performed by the mutual societies in the province, particularly la Société national d'hôpitalisation, which in return for a premium of eighty cents a month offered members medical and surgical attendance and hospital treatment.

There are in many of the provinces and in many localities group hospitalization schemes. The one at Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, has been in existence for over thirty years. It maintains a rate, to miners, of thirty cents a week for public ward hospital care. This covers dependants also, and if a private ward is desired, there is a fifty per cent reduction. The director of one of the Glace Bay hospitals has stated that the scheme gives entire satisfaction to both hospitals and subscribers.

One of the more recent schemes has attracted a good deal of attention—the co-operative movement of the university of St. Francis Xavier at Antigonish. That went into operation on January 1, 1939, the unit being known as the mutual hospital group. There is a family rate of $2 a quarter. This will entitle members of the group to five weeks of ward treatment and a fifty per cent reduction in the rate for private and semi-private rooms, together with laboratory services, ordinary medicine and a fifty per cent reduction on X-ray and operating fees.

In New Brunswick they have the Moncton group hospitalization service, in western Ontario, the Galt hospital service society, a non-profit, cooperative hospitalization scheme, incorporated last year. A membership of 200 is the absolute minimum with which it would be safe to start. I have a note here that in no place in Canada or the United States where a hospitalization scheme of this kind has been properly thought out has it met with failure.

British Columbia has many such successful ventures. Directors of the King's Daughters hospital, Duncan, B.C., completed arrangements in December, 1938, for the inauguration of a hospital benefit scheme similar to those which are in successful operation in a number of districts in British Columbia. The scheme offers a contract whereby the contract holder and, if he is married, his wife and dependent children under twenty-one, may secure hospital accommodation and service, including stock drugs, anaesthetics and the use of the operating room and X-ray equipment for a period of three months in any contract year. The annual payment has been set at $15, which may be paid in monthly instalments. To make the scheme successful and to get it under way it will be necessary for 1,000 contract holders to sign up. Kamloops has a successful scheme now operating. Kelowna also has a similar scheme.

We also have in Canada schemes of group medicine, to which reference was made this afternoon by a number of speakers. There is Associated Medical Services Incorporated, with headquarters in Toronto. In January, 1939, the chief medical officer of the corporation stated that subscribers in Ontario numbered over 4,300. Between June 1, 1937, when the association was formed, and September 1, 1938, approximately 1,400 accounts were paid, ranging from $1 to $150 on single items, to $400 in one case. The maximum allowed anyone in need of medical services is $800 in one year. As each person is allowed to choose a doctor, the number of physicians who work with the organization grows as the membership mounts. Membership costs $2 a month, plus $1.75 a month for the first dependant and $1.50 a month for each succeeding dependant. Most subscribers are in Toronto, but the plan is in operation also in Ottawa and in Norfolk and Oxford counties. The rate of growth has been continually increasing, having risen from a low of 193 in January, 1938, to a maximum of 525 in November, 1938. The annual subscription averages between $1.85 and $1.90 a month, depending on the average size of the family subscribing during the month. The average expenditure over the twelve months' period of 1938 for those entitled to service was $1.08 a subscriber per month. In Toronto there are approximately 820 participating doctors out of 950. In Ottawa there are 139 participating out of about 150.

These schemes are also in effect in some of the western provinces, in Saskatchewan and, I believe, in Manitoba. Also in western Canada there is a scheme known as the municipal doctor scheme. Perhaps some hon. members from Saskatchewan are far more familiar with the operation of this scheme than I can be, but in theory at least the plan is that a physician is engaged by the municipality on a salary basis to give the residents of the municipality medical care. In western Canada the municipality is the local unit of government, 200 to 300 square miles in area, with a population varying from 1,200 to 3,000. This type of service has extended until in 1938 over one-fifth of all the rural municipalities in Saskatchewan either have voted favourably on the scheme or were operating under a similar plan. In Manitoba there were in 1938 nine municipal corporations receiving medical care under the municipal doctor plan, with three or four more ready to initiate the scheme.

There are a number of other schemes for attaining the same object, persons in the community grouping themselves together in order to obtain greater benefits in the way of medical or hospital care.

There has been also an agitation throughout the country to press for what is known as state medicine, the definition of which I would take to be the furnishing by the state, free, of all medical, hospital, dental and other services. It has been stated pretty freely that a large number of the members of the medical profession would not care to join in such a scheme, partly, I assume, because some of the more prominent at least would not look with favour on the suggestion that they should all be state employees or servants of the state, and partly on account of the argument which has been set forth here on numerous occasions that there should be a particular and special relationship between patient and physician, which relationship is very difficult to achieve where the doctor is an employee of the state and liable at any time to be called upon to treat any patient. The cooperative schemes to a large extent overcome that difficulty, but in some countries it is overcome by giving the patient or the insured the right to choose his own doctor.

My view—and I express it here without endeavouring to hold the government in any way responsible for it—is that sooner or later all these schemes will have to be coordinated in some fashion under state supervision. I believe I should be right constitutionally in saying that the supervising authority will not necessarily be the federal authority, unless there is some change in our present constitutional arrangements. But the tendency is that sooner or later we must see to it that every citizen of the state obtains at least the minimum of medical care and attention.

The difficulty up to the present is that each province has looked at the problem from a different angle; what would be suitable in the way of health insurance for Quebec, for instance, would not apply equally well in British Columbia. But once the provinces have themselves coordinated their efforts and come to the federal authority, I have no doubt that the pressure throughout the country will be such that the federal authority will be obliged to give leadership so that there will be put into effect a definite health program.

In passing, I may say that up to the present, although we have had our conferences with the provinces, it has been extremely difficult to bring all the provinces to see eye to eye as to what is the preferred procedure. Only recently I met the ministers of health of the various provinces. Some suggested that we should begin by attacking the problem of tuberculosis; others felt that the venereal disease problem was the one which should be handled at once; others thought that there should be full-time health units, and so on. It seems to me that the way to settle this matter definitely and to have a clear program which could be presented to the Canadian people would be by some kind of health conference at which there would be present representatives not only of the provinces as such but of social agencies interested in this kind of thing throughout the country, and medical associations, at which conference the particular interests of the provinces, of the dominion, of the medical associations and even of the welfare agencies, would be to some extent set aside so that it would be possible without prejudice to determine what is needed as a beginning for the carrying out of our plan.

Of course I must not close without making some reference to the cost, because after all that will be a factor in anything like a general scheme. It should be pointed out that just because a project is highly desirable does not necessarily mean that it is always economically feasible; and before such beneficial programs can be put into effect the cost must be counted so that there may be no subsequent regrets. I am not quite prepared to accept the suggestion, but it is often stated that just as soon as a form of state medicine is introduced the incidence of sickness will be doubled. If we introduce state medicine we will have to pay for it. Under state medicine the cost of medicine increases, and an instance is given here which I will mention, purely for the information of the house and not because I think it is what I would consider a conclusive argument. It states that in the factory districts of England medicine costs are four times as large as in the district around Oxford university.

To return to the question of cost, as far as we are able to ascertain it in the 1931 census the cost of illness in Canada is $23 per capita. The cost of absolute state medicine would be at least $250,000,000 annually, with the suggestion that this cost would increase if all the services were free.

Mr. MacNICOL: If I may ask a question, would that include or exclude contributions?

Mr. POWER: I am dealing now with the cost, the amount of money which would be expended if the state looked after all the illness in Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: That would include any contributions made under a contributory system?

Mr. POWER: Yes; that is what it would cost. As to how this cost would be allotted between the employer, the employee, the municipality, the province and the federal government is another matter. One thing that strikes me, however, is this: Someone said in this house, I think either the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) or Mr. Spencer, a former member, that the annual cost of illness in Canada converted into money is estimated to be approximately $300,000,000. To that must be added the much larger sum of the cost of postponable deaths. Medical statistics reveal that while Canada distributes in the neighbourhood of $300,000,000 annually for medical treatment—this is perhaps the saddest part of it—only $6,000,000 is actually spent in preventive medicine. I believe an essential factor in any medical program would be preventive medicine. Perhaps that is where the state could do its most useful work, in the preventive field rather than actually in the curative field.

Mr. HAYHURST: Does the dominion government make any grant to the public health bureau in Toronto, which does a great deal of educational work throughout the dominion?

Mr. POWER: I do not think that is the name of the organization my hon. friend has in mind. I believe he is thinking of the Health League of Canada, is he not?

Mr. HAYHURST: Yes.

Mr. POWER: We do make a contribution of $5,000.

Mr. HAYHURST: Then, if I might ask another question, have the grants which were given to the provinces prior to 1932 been reinstated?

Mr. POWER: Which grants; those for the treatment of venereal disease?

Mr. HAYHURST: Yes.

Mr. POWER: For some years, beginning in 1919, I believe, certain grants were made to the provinces in order to assist in combating venereal disease, on the condition that the provinces would set up clinics and contribute an equal amount. The grants continued—I am speaking subject to correction—for perhaps five years. Then they were decreased to $100,000 a year and finally, I think in 1931 or 1932, were cut out altogether. Last year they were revived in a different form when this house, as my hon. friend will perhaps remember, voted $50,000 in order to permit the federal government to supply arsenicals to the provinces to be used in combating venereal disease. So to all intents and purposes we have revived the contributions formerly made, perhaps on a smaller scale.

In conclusion I propose to repeat what I said last year, that my personal view is that state medicine as such will not, for at least some little time, be generally accepted by the Canadian people. I feel that there is in it too much of regulation and regimentation to make it acceptable to the people of this country. But I also feel that some form of contributory health insurance will have to be studied; and not only studied but put into operation in conjunction and cooperation with the provinces, before very long.

I want to thank the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) for having brought this matter to the attention of the house. We have had an interesting discussion; as I said at the outset of my remarks, we have heard the views of hon. members who are not directly connected with the medical profession but who feel that their constituents and the people of Canada generally want something to be done along these lines. Having obtained full approval of the principle of the proposal he wishes to lay before the people, perhaps my hon. friend will be satisfied to withdraw it, bearing in mind that perhaps in practice it would be extremely difficult to bring into effect exactly that which his motion, in its present phraseology, calls for.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, there are perhaps one or two misunderstandings that should be cleared up. Those who have need of these health examinations are neither the very poor nor the very rich, but rather the small wage-earners. I appreciate the discussion we have had to-day; I think it will indicate to the minister that this is a live question. For myself, whether within or without this house, while I am spared I am not going to let up in my efforts, because I see the need. When it is suggested that people will not attend for these examinations, might I say that anyone who attended the meetings of the municipal league of Thunder Bay district could not be there very long when this question was under discussion without finding out how they feel about it. There is no sham; it is a real issue. The low wage-earners and farmers are those who are in great need. I appreciated the frank statement of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), but I do not think he is altogether correct when he says the doctors do not want this. I know the specialists and the doctors who have large practices certainly do not want it.

Mr. MANION: I am afraid my hon. friend misunderstood me. I said the majority of doctors did not want state medicine.

Mr. McIVOR: Thank you, doctor; or I mean I thank my hon. friend. I am not discussing state medicine. The resolution is very simple. I took heart as I listened to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power), and I was also encouraged when I saw a photograph of the various provincial ministers of health. I thought they were human, intelligent beings, and that when they would realize the need for what I have suggested they would have brains enough to put it into practice. We have provincial police protection and we have education which is paid for by the province. I think health insurance, or something of that kind—it may be called state medicine, or whatever you like —is most important.

When I go to the experimental farm I see our specialists experimenting to develop plant and vegetable life, and they are attempting to develop horses and cattle to the highest point of efficiency. What is our greatest asset in Canada? Is it not our men, women and children? I am sure the Minister of Pensions and National Health will understand me when I say it is more important to raise healthy men, women and children than it is to have thoroughbred horses.

I appreciate very much the time the minister has devoted to the subject. He has shown that he is capable of filling in the best possible way the position he holds. We wish him the greatest success in his endeavours. I am sure that if, when he is discussing this question in conference with representatives from the provinces, or when an effort is made to revise the British North America Act—and when we went to the country we promised it would be revised—he needs any help from the humble representative of the constituency of Fort William, I shall be there to work to the best of my ability.

As the minister has indicated, I do not think any useful purpose would be served by putting the resolution to a vote. In our own consciences we know where we stand, and so does the minister. For these reasons I beg to withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

PROPOSED REDUCTION OF PENSIONABLE AGE LIMIT FROM SEVENTY YEARS

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North) moved:

Whereas it is becoming more and more difficult for older persons to be absorbed into the useful productive life of the dominion, thereby being unable to maintain themselves in decency and comfort;

And whereas Canada is a country richly endowed with natural resources capable of maintaining our whole population in a reasonably high standard of living;

Therefore be it resolved, that this house would welcome a government declaration of policy that would bring about an immediate lowering of the present pensionable age limit of seventy years, the effect of such being that the older generation would retire from industrial activity, thereby creating opportunities for the younger generation to be usefully and gainfully employed.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the third motion along these lines I have introduced in the last four sessions of parliament requesting that the pensionable age, now placed at seventy years, be reduced from that figure. Probably, on my third effort, my insistence or persistence in the matter may be a little more successful than it has been on the two previous occasions.

Before dealing directly with the motion, however, there are one or two observations I should like to make in regard to the present administration of the Old Age Pensions Act. I am receiving complaints from many parts of Canada in regard to the stringent methods being applied in some of the provinces in respect of those who believe they ought to come under the provisions of the act. I have no intention this evening of dealing with certain of those complaints, further than to say that when the estimates are before the committee, I shall place those complaints before hon. members.

There is one complaint, however, I do wish to bring to the attention of the house, and particularly to the attention of the responsible minister, and it is that in some of the provinces the pensioners entitled to the full pension of $20 a month are not receiving the full amount. That is a serious complaint to make, and represents a serious hardship that is being visited upon pensioners in certain parts of the dominion. I believe this is particularly so in Saskatchewan. I say that when the House of Commons determined a pensioner should be entitled to a pension of $20 a month, it meant $20 a month. When in the administration of the act provinces allow a maximum pension of only $15 a month, I claim that the old age pensioners in those provinces are being deprived of $5 a month. I see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) disagrees with what I am saying. I am not accusing the federal government of responsibility for the reduction in the amount of the pension. On the other hand I say, clearly, that it is being done by those who are responsible for administration in some of the provinces. In view of the fact, however, that the Minister of Finance seems to dissent from the statements I make, perhaps I should read a letter which otherwise I had not intended to read at this juncture.

The letter I have in my hand is from the commissioner of old age pensions in Saskatchewan, and is dated December, 1938. I do not wish to mention the name of the party to whom it is addressed, but if the minister wishes he may have the letter. It is as follows:

Dear Madame:

I beg to acknowledge receipt of yours of the 5th instant, and in reply thereto I would advise that as you and your husband are now receiving the sum of $30 per month by way of old age pension, and as that amount is the maximum which is being paid to married couples, there will be no increase made in the rate of your pension.

Mr. DUNNING: That is true.

Mr. HEAPS: And it is signed by George A. Beckett, pro superintendent, Old Age Pension Bureau, Regina, Saskatchewan.

Mr. DUNNING: That is true in Saskatchewan, and in some other provinces. While in Saskatchewan the pension is paid to the maximum in 4,771 cases, that province has adopted a rule whereby when two married persons, both eligible for pension, are living together, instead of receiving $20 each they receive jointly $30. That is correct, as far as Saskatchewan is concerned.

Mr. HEAPS: I claim if that is so there is an evasion of responsibility.

Mr. DUNNING: I understood the hon. member to say the province was not paying the maximum. I am pointing out that it is paying the maximum in 4,771 cases, but the hon. member's contention stands on the other point, namely with respect to the married couples.

Mr. HEAPS: I am not speaking of the whole. I am saying that in certain cases the maximum is not being paid. They have laid down the law that in certain cases married couples entitled to the sum of $40 shall receive only $30, and thereby the provincial authorities are evading the act. Any person who qualifies under the act is entitled to $20 a month. The people in question were entitled to that amount, but Saskatchewan has laid down its own law and pays them only $15.

Mr. DUNNING: In justice to Saskatchewan I should say that it is not the only province. That point has been one of difficulty with a number of provinces.

Mr. HEAPS: Then, if it is being done in other provinces I am glad I have drawn the attention of the minister and the house to it. It is a practice which ought to be stopped, and old age pensioners, whether they are single or married, ought to be entitled to the full amount of their pensions.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. DUNNING: Quite a number of provinces do not think so, and I find it rather difficult to make them.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not wish to enter into any extended argument on the point. The act specifies that a person who is in receipt of an income of not more than $125 a year, is entitled to a maximum pension of $20 a month. If those persons have qualified they are entitled to the full $20, and not to only $15. Again I claim that in Saskatchewan, or in any province carrying out this procedure, there is an evasion of the act, and I hope that in due course, with the assistance of the Minister of Finance, those old people who are entitled to $20 a month may receive the full amount of their pensions. However, when the estimates are before us, perhaps we may be able to go into that aspect of the question a little more fully than I intend to go into it to-night. I am just drawing this matter to the attention of the minister, and perhaps some good will accrue as a result of the remarks I have made on this question.

I stated a moment ago that this is the third occasion in four years that I have introduced a motion asking for a reduction in the pensionable age. I find no greater justification for my motion than the remarks made a few moments ago by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power). He gave particulars of what was being done in other countries in connection with old age pensions and referred to New Zealand, Australia, Great Britain, the United States and one or two other countries. We find that all of these countries are far in advance of Canada with regard to social legislation. I would go so far as to say that Canada is in this respect practically the most backward of the English speaking nations of the world. I do not say that with any degree of satisfaction, far from it. I would much prefer to be able to rise in my place in this house and say that Canada was the most advanced country in the world in regard to its social legislation.

I am pleased to note that to-day old age pensions are a part of the social structure in every one of our provinces. They have been accepted as a part of the economic life of the whole dominion. I do not think there is a province which would think for one moment of going back on its old age pension legislation. There might be the odd person here or there with antiquated ideas, whose mind belongs to the bygone ages, who would want to see our old age pension legislation discontinued or its advance stayed, but they are few and far between. I believe the overwhelming majority of the people of Canada are not only satisfied with the pensions we have at the present time, but extremely anxious to have the benefits of old age pensions extended to people below the age of seventy.

When this question was raised in the past two or three years, the minister expressed in a general way his sympathy with the proposal. I believe that in a sense every hon. member sympathizes with the idea of reducing the pensionable age from seventy to either sixty or sixty-five years. At first I asked that it be reduced to sixty years, but I am quite prepared to compromise with the government and accept, on the present occasion, a reduction to sixty-five years.

Mr. DUNNING: That is typical of my hon. friend's Scotch extraction.

Mr. HEAPS: I hope the Minister of Finance will not be so Scotch as to refuse my modest request. On a previous occasion the minister told us that persons over the age of sixty years were fairly well off. He stated they were receiving on an average of about $1,076 a year by way of salary or wages. If that were the case there would be very few people of the age of sixty years or over who would require pensions. But the fact is that the overwhelming majority of those of the age of sixty years or over are finding it extremely difficult to get along and perhaps do not know where the necessities of life are to come from. Despite the fact that the minister is extremely sympathetic to the proposal, I feel sure he will tell us to-night what he has told us on other occasions. He will tell us about the cost and of the necessity for taking from those who have to give to those who have not. Then he may again ask the question: Where is the money to come from?

Mr. DUNNING: I think the hon. member will agree that it has to come from the people.

Mr. HEAPS: Now that the minister has raised that question, I shall deal with it. When the minister raised this point a couple of years ago I stated that if money were required for the purpose of war, there would be no difficulty in finding funds. In 1936 the minister stated he could not find sufficient money to finance the payment of pensions at an age lower than seventy years. I would point out to him that to-day there has been an increase in the cost of our armaments to an extent greater than would have been required to pay pensions at sixty-five years. If we can find money for the purpose of armaments which will be utilized sooner or later to destroy life, I feel we ought to be able to find money for the purpose of conserving life.

It is said that this is taking money out of the pockets of the taxpayers; but where do the taxpayers get their money? Do they not get it from the goods or the wealth produced each year in Canada? I remember in 1930 when the house was called to a special session to vote $100,000,000, mostly for the purpose of dealing with the unemployment problem which was becoming worse and worse as the months went by in that year. Of that $100,000,000, a total of $20,000,000 was to be expended for purposes of direct relief. At that time we had more wheat in our granaries in western Canada than we knew what to do with. Our farmers were burning grain because they could not afford to buy coal.

Mr. DUNNING: That was only an isolated case.

Mr. HEAPS: But it happened. They were burning grain for fuel, while the miners in Alberta were wondering where their next meal was going to come from.

An hon. MEMBER: How much wheat was burned?

Mr. HEAPS: I am making my argument and my hon. friend can make his later on. The government of that day wanted $20,000,000 for direct relief when we had more foodstuffs and more food and shelter than we knew what to do with. The government went to New York and borrowed the $20,000,000, I believe from the house of Morgan, although it makes no difference. When they had borrowed that $20,000,000, our miners and our farmers could eat and obtain fuel. Could there be anything more ridiculous than an economic set-up which demands that we get permission from the bankers of Wall street before our farmers and miners of western Canada—the same thing applies all over Canada—can consume commodities produced in this country? When the minister asks: Where does the money come from—

Mr. DUNNING: I did not ask it.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister asked it two years ago.

Mr. DUNNING: I said I thought we would all agree that it had to come from the people. I was not going any further than that by way of a discussion of where the money was to come from.

Mr. HEAPS: It has to come from the people of the Dominion of Canada; but the people do not care whether they get a slip of paper or something else, what they want is food, clothing and shelter. I claim that at the present time we have in this country sufficient food, clothing and shelter to provide a reasonable state of existence to all our people of the age of sixty-five years and over. If we did not have that abundance in our midst I would state immediately that I would not feel justified in asking this house to pass a resolution calling upon the government to give to our older people the right to sweet content, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) would say, when they reach the age of sixty or sixty-five and over. After all, when a person reaches that age, the chances of being absorbed into industry are exceedingly slim. Where can a man of sixty-five or over find employment to-day? We have at the present time tens upon tens of thousands of our younger people who have not as yet been absorbed into useful productivity in the dominion. So what opportunity is there for a man of sixty-five or over to be able to find useful employment in Canada? Does it not seem absurd that our older population should be working when young men and young women in their teens and early twenties are walking about idle?

I have said that on two previous occasions I had a similar resolution on the order paper, but on both occasions it was talked out. The minister claimed that it was not possible for the government at that particular time to give to our older people a pension at a lower age than is now provided. I feel sorry for the government for the stand which it took, because the Minister of Pensions and National Health pointed out a few minutes ago that it is only a question of time before other social legislation of a similar nature will be enacted and put upon the statute books, and I think it would be a good thing from the point of view of the government for them to come forward with a definite statement that they will, if not at this session, at another session, grant the request I am now making and give to our older people some real hope that pensions will be granted in the near future at a lower age than is the case at present.

When I put that request in the form of a motion, all I am asking is that there be a fair distribution of our wealth production in this dominion. I do not want to take anything away from anybody. I do not even covet the wealth of those who have riches at the present time, because I believe that we can produce to-day in such abundance that we can give a fairly high standard of living to every Canadian within the confines of this dominion.

I shall read just a few lines from a pamphlet which may be recognized by some hon. gentlemen in this chamber. I shall not read it word for word, but will change a word here and there:

> Our party recognizes that the problem of distribution has become more important than that of production, and believes that personality is more sacred than property. Our party will devote itself to finding ways and means of effecting a fair and just distribution of wealth with increasing regard to human need, to the furtherance of social justice, and to the promotion of the common good.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that every member of our Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group, and I have no doubt my friends to my left, will subscribe to the few words I have just quoted.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEAPS: My hon. friends of the Social Credit party say "hear, hear." I wonder if hon. gentlemen of the Liberal party would be just as willing to subscribe to these views as members of the Social Credit group or of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I have not yet heard any loud shouts from the Liberal party opposite. May I say that I have just quoted from a speech which the Prime Minister uttered in this House of Commons on February 27, 1933.

Mr. MacNICOL: He was in opposition then.

Mr. HEAPS: Old age is becoming a more serious problem in some ways than unemployment. After all, when a young person in his twenties or thirties is out of work he has some hope of some day being a little more fortunate and finding employment. But when a person advances along in years and old age begins to creep upon him, we find that he is not wanted in the labour market and his opportunities for a livelihood become more and more restricted as time goes on. When we see the figures of the numbers who are in receipt of old age pensions to-day, and the vast number of people in this dominion now over the age of sixty, we realize what a complicated and difficult problem old age is really becoming.

There is another problem in connection with old age that arises out of the advancement of medical science. The expectancy of life to-day is becoming greater and greater, and as it increases and people live longer they find it more difficult to earn a livelihood. Consequently the question of old age is one that I think ought to be dealt with in such a definite way as to give some hope to the older people of the dominion.

It may be said that if we give pensions to those of sixty or sixty-five years of age we do away with the incentive of what the Minister of Finance might call that good old Scotch habit of thrift.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not only a Scotch habit.

Mr. HEAPS: No, but I thought the minister might have called it that. I mention that fact because to-day the average worker is not in a position to save very much out of the wage he receives. The average wage to-day is so low that very few people, comparatively speaking, receive what might be termed a saving wage. May I interject here that a good many of the figures we quote as to wages in Canada are not altogether as accurate as we would like them to be, for the simple reason that when our bureau of statistics gives us the annual wage, it shows what would be earned if the worker were engaged for a full year, but the great majority of our working people do not work the full year but have periods when they are on short-time.

I believe that our aged people to-day are entitled to their pensions not as a matter of charity, as some people look upon old age pensions now, but as a matter of right in just exactly the same way as a pension is granted to a judge or a general. I believe that those workers who have given of the best years of their lives to build up our social structure in this dominion are entitled to the old age pension in the same way as our soldiers and judges, many of whom to-day are in receipt of exceedingly large pensions.

My plea this evening is for economic security for our older population. When men and women have given of the best years of their lives in building up the state and providing for others in the community, I believe they are entitled, when they reach old age, to a measure of economic security which they do not have to-day until they reach the age of seventy. We have to-day at the present time, as has been pointed out time and time again in this house, an abundance of everything in this dominion. It is not a question of production; this has been solved; it is now a question of distribution. I do not think it is beyond the ingenuity of members of this house or of the government to devise ways and means whereby there can be a fairer distribution of our wealth production so as to provide adequately for people in their old age. It is often said that there is a great deal of discontent in this country, but the surest way of removing social discontent, as has so often been pointed out, is to give to our people that economic security which to-day is denied them to a large extent.

I am sorry to think that whereas in practically every part of the British empire old people are to-day receiving pensions at a much lower age than seventy—at the age of sixty-five, and in some parts at sixty—we in Canada can give pensions only at the age of seventy.

Mr. DUNNING: What countries are giving non-contributory pensions at sixty or sixty-five?

Mr. HEAPS: Australia.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. HEAPS: At sixty-five, both Australia and New Zealand.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. HEAPS: If the minister has the facts before him I hope he will give them to the house.

Mr. DUNNING: Their acts are not in operation yet.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister is not quite correct in that statement. They have had old age pensions in Australia for the past thirty years so that the scheme is bound to be in operation, and they have had them in New Zealand for about the same length of time. The new act in New Zealand is not yet in operation—that is, the act which the Minister of Pensions and National Health spoke of as coming into effect on the first of April, the act passed by the Savage labour government. But in New Zealand and Australia pension schemes have been in operation for approximately thirty years. I do not believe they have been entirely on a contributory basis. However, if the minister has the facts I hope he will give them to the house when he speaks. In New Zealand the act has been widened to an enormous extent under the new legislation which has not yet become operative. There the minister will find that provision is made for pensions at the age of sixty. However, I say this to the Minister of Finance. If he finds fault with the act either in New Zealand or in Australia—

Mr. DUNNING: I am not finding fault.

Mr. HEAPS: Oh, I thought the minister was finding fault. At any rate I am prepared to accept, so far as Canada is concerned, exactly the provision that Australia and New Zealand have made with regard to pensions. If they can give these benefits to the older people in Australia, New Zealand, the United States, Great Britain and many other countries which I could enumerate, why can we not do the same in Canada? Why should we lag behind other nations in our social legislation? There is no reason in the world, because we are in no way poorer than they. In fact, Australia carries a tax burden somewhat greater than we do, and they are prepared to shoulder their full responsibility when it comes to social legislation. If those countries are prepared to shoulder the responsibility of advanced social legislation there is no reason why we should not do the same.

There is no use in saying that this is a matter for the provinces or that the cost will be so great. I do not think that is a valid excuse. The people of Canada are prepared to-day to take a long step forward in the matter of social legislation, and I trust that when the minister speaks he will give us a more definite assurance than we have so far had, that in the immediate future the old people of Canada may look forward to having pensions at a much lower age than seventy as at present.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): In the first place I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) upon his persistence in bringing this motion before the house session after session. At one time I took exception and was not willing to lend my support to his resolution for the reason that he had scaled the age limit down from seventy to sixty, and I did not believe that Canada could afford to pension off old people at the age of sixty. However, I have almost come to the conclusion that we could do that. Perhaps I should put it in this way, that we should do that, for the reason that I am getting older myself and am looking forward to the day when I might be eligible for an old age pension.

To-night I want to say that I will support the hon. gentleman's resolution. It begins:

> Whereas it is becoming more and more difficult for older persons to be absorbed into the useful, productive life of the dominion—

I agree with that. We who knock around among our people know that is absolutely true. We find so many people out of employment. Many sturdy young men are looking for jobs which they cannot find and we sympathize with them, but we sympathize far more with the older men who are unable to secure positions. We could quite well grant them a pension of $20 a month to help them in their old age. The second part of the resolution reads:

> And whereas Canada is a country richly endowed with natural resources capable of maintaining our whole population in a reasonably high standard of living—

I agree with that also. We like to say that this is the grandest country in the world and that we have the greatest natural resources of any country. Then why not use them for the uplift of the people who live in Canada? The resolution goes on to say:

> —that this house would welcome a government declaration of policy that would bring about an immediate lowering of the present pensionable age limit of seventy years.

[Mr. Heaps.]

My opinion is that the government should lower the age limit to sixty-five. The hon. member mentioned that old age pensioners were not receiving the full $20 a month allowance. I can vouch for the truth of that statement from my own experience. I know of one pensioner who was granted only $15. On making inquiries I found that this particular pensioner, a woman, was keeping house for a relative; it was thought that her services in that capacity were worth something and so the administration at Winnipeg decided to limit her pension to $15. I am glad to say that when I took the matter up with the commissioner in Winnipeg, it was rectified.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend think it just that some person should get the services of that old lady, make her work, and not pay her? That is one of the major abuses.

Mr. LEADER: I am not saying they got her services. She was just living there.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member said she did housekeeper's work.

Mr. LEADER: I take this stand most definitely, that if she was entitled to $20 a month it does not matter where she was living.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not what the resolution advocates.

Mr. LEADER: I am glad to say that the matter was rectified and she is now getting her pension of $20 a month. I know her personally and I can say that no one in this dominion is more entitled to that pension than she is.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is taking me up wrong. I am not saying the old lady was not entitled to it. But I say that those who were getting the benefit of her services as housekeeper should be made to pay for them. And I stick to that.

Mr. LEADER: I disagree with the minister in that regard. I claim that if she is entitled to that $20 a month she should get it whether she works or not.

I want to deal to-night with two or three questions that have been asked me by my constituents. Some point out the inequality of our pensions and say that judges, if they retire after fifteen years' service, are granted pensions at two-thirds of their salaries, which may amount to $10,000 a year. They point out that these judges may live in any country in the world and still retain their right to the pension. I know as a fact that it is being paid under such circumstances, while if old age pensioners leave Canada for thirty days their pension is immediately cut off until they return. I have no fault to find with the law that compels a Canadian to live in Canada if he is drawing a Canadian pension; but that is where the inequality comes in, it should apply to every Canadian pensioner, to the judges of our higher courts as well as those receiving old age pensions. It is inequalities like that which cause so much unrest; that is why people are saying, "What is the matter with democracy?" I could tell about a certain judge who was getting a pension of $6,000 a year; his last year's salary at the expense of the taxpayers of this country was $30,000, and he refused to pay income tax on it. He was assessed $9,000 on that $30,000 gratuity as he called it, but it was remuneration; he refused to pay, and the courts of this country upheld his contention. Is that justice?

Mr. FAIR: It is democracy as it is operated to-day.

Mr. LEADER: I brought up in this house the question of the returned men, who went to France and offered their all, were wounded, buried in shell holes, and after three years' service were so anxious to get out of the army and get home that although they had a disability the dead-line was reached before they put in their application. I know one man who has not reached the age at which he is entitled to the veteran's allowance. He is able to drive a school van that takes the children to school and thus make a few dollars a month, and he is denied a pension. I am not suggesting that our pension law in regard to our returned men has not been very liberal, but that is one case and perhaps there are thousands throughout this dominion in the same position. It is so hard for those returned men, who offered their all, to get a pension, yet a judge who does not need to worry is relieved by the courts of even having to pay income tax, and he does not have to live in Canada, whose people pay the pension.

Let me come back to those old age pensioners who are perhaps destitute, yet, who, because they have some relatives who are able to assist them to a limited extent, have the amount of that assistance deducted from their pension. I say again it is not right. Those people are entitled to that $20 a month, and it is not right to oblige them to look to their families to support them. If the family have enough pride—and many of them have—to keep their father or mother from getting the old age pension, that is all right, but if they have not enough pride, or perhaps enough money, that is no reason why these people should not have every dollar of that pension which has been granted them by the laws of this country.

Another question that has been asked me is why the pension is cut off when the recipient leaves Canada. I knew an instance where a certain pensioner left Canada to visit some relatives in California, and when the authorities found out he was away, his pension was promptly cut off and he had to do without it for the time he was away. I do not find any fault with that, but I am coming to another illustration. We had a judge in my own city of Portage la Prairie who for twenty years lived in California but drew his pension of $3,000 a year. I believe he has died recently, but for nearly twenty years he was being paid $3,000 a year by the taxpayers of Canada while living in a foreign country.

Mr. DUNNING: May I suggest to my hon. friend that that is not an argument in favour of this resolution, but an argument in favour of amending the Judges Act, an entirely different statute.

Mr. LEADER: Well, I would not worry about the Judges Act, I would amend the Old Age Pensions Act.

Mr. DUNNING: That would not stop the judges from leaving the country.

Miss MACPHAIL: The hon. member is talking about the inequality of treatment.

Mr. LEADER: Well, I would not stop at amending the Judges Act. I would see that there is more equality in this country and stop driving the minds of the people to something worse.

Another question that was asked me was why the Old Age Pensions Act was changed. Formerly it provided that an old age pensioner should get his pension from his seventieth birthday; it was retroactive. If it took a year to secure the certificate of birth and other material which was required, the pension would be paid from his seventieth birthday. I was surprised to learn, two years ago I believe, that the act was amended so that the pensioner—

Mr. DUNNING: The act was never amended.

Mr. LEADER: Well, I think it was by order in council.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. LEADER: Will the minister deny that the pension is now paid from the date the application is accepted?

An hon. MEMBER: The date he makes application.

Mr. LEADER: No, the date the application is accepted.

Mr. DUNNING: The existing regulation, which was put through at the instance of all the provinces, they being partners with the dominion in this matter, provides for the application being made before the age of seventy is reached, so that the applicant has plenty of time to have his application accepted before he becomes seventy years of age. But all the provinces desired to have no retroactive provision. That is why they were willing to agree, at my request, that the time for application should be advanced to some time before the age of seventy was reached in order that it might be acted upon by the time the man became eligible. That is the present regulation.

Mr. LEADER: Well, I take it I was right in making the statement that the pension is paid from the date the application is accepted.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, quite.

Mr. LEADER: I realize that the regulation is that they should make application two months before reaching the age of seventy. But many of these people are from Great Britain, and they must send to the old country to get the records. I know one case in which it took a year to get the proper records, and the pension was granted only from the date the application was accepted. Even in parts of our own country records were not kept seventy years ago, and people have to go to a great deal of work to dig up information to prove that they are seventy years of age.

Miss MACPHAIL: It takes three months.

Mr. LEADER: And they lose the pension for those three months.

Mr. DUNNING: There is nothing to prevent them from starting to get their records two years before if they want to. They can make actual application within three months of their seventieth birthday.

Miss MACPHAIL: They do not know about it.

Mr. LEADER: Well, I think I have exhausted the ten minutes that I promised myself I would take. I have made one or two recommendations which I hope the minister will take into consideration. I say it is not right that the pension is denied them after they are seventy; I think it should be granted, if not the day they are seventy years of age, at least the day they put in their application, not when the application is accepted.

[Mr. Leader.]

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): While it seems that progress along this line is disappointingly slow, I do believe we are making some progress, at least as far as the general public is concerned, and possibly even in this house. I think back some years to the time when the old age pension legislation was put on the statute books. It was done with the greatest difficulty against the strongest possible opposition. We were told of the constitutional difficulty. Sticklers for the constitution said it was simply impossible to carry out any such scheme under the British North America Act. There was much the same kind of argument as the one we had to-day with regard to state medicine. As a matter of fact, although several of the provinces stayed out at first, one by one they came in until to-day they are all in. This notwithstanding what was said a few years ago about the constitutional difficulty, and their determination to boycott the whole scheme. Quebec, from which we have the most strenuous objections, has finally joined the other provinces.

So we were told it was absolutely impossible to finance this scheme. Well, it has been in operation for some years now. All the provinces are in; there has been a very large increase in the number of persons coming under the scheme, but this country is not quite bankrupt. Even if it is nearing bankruptcy that is not because of the claims of the old age pensioners.

Then we were told that we should not introduce this scheme for high moral reasons. I recall very well hearing it said in this house that by paying old age pensions to people of seventy we would be encouraging shiftlessness, that if they were sure of getting an old age pension at seventy no one would save. Further we were told that it would practically break up the family, because it was the duty of the children to care for their aged parents, and if those parents were looked after by the state the consequence would be that the children would not love their parents any more.

Mr. DUNNING: I hope my hon. friend is not looking at me now. I never said anything like that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, the minister did not, but others in this house did. Still others said it was the religious duty of the rich to contribute to the poor, and that if the state stepped in to look after the poor aged people then the rich people would not have any way of fulfilling their religious duties. Apparently they were afraid they would not go to heaven! We were warned of all these dire consequences, but such objections have all been swept away. Some of the people who made those objections have gone to their own reward, but still the scheme goes on.

We must remember that conditions have changed from the old days. I can remember when I was a child frequently seeing an old man sitting by the fire, or an old lady sitting in her cap and gown; my own grandmother, if you will. Many of us can recall such scenes. Who would begrudge the old gentleman or the old lady the little bit of food required or the clothes they wore? And they wore their clothes for a very long time in those days. To-day conditions are quite different, even on the farms, particularly those of the west which I know best. There are very few of these family farms where the old people can sit in comfort by the fireside. On the majority of the farms of the west that condition does not exist. Certainly when you come to the cities you find people who, in seeking work, have shifted from place to place. Most of the western people came either from eastern Canada or from overseas. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) knows as well as I do that they have moved from place to place, so that in many instances they have no long established residence. That, of course, is particularly true in the industrial centres. Under these changed circumstances we must adopt new methods. We must care for these people who did the pioneering in this country and who surely are just as worthy of being looked after as any other class in the community.

My hon. friend the member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) spoke very strongly with regard to judges. One might refer also to civil servants, some of whom get quite tidy pensions. One might refer to the senate, where many former members of this house are now enjoying a comfortable salary in their declining years. The distinction between civil servants or judges or members of the senate on the one hand and farmers and industrial workers on the other is rather arbitrary. I assume they have all contributed to the upbuilding of this country, but why is it that simply because a man belonged to one particular class or was fortunate enough to be placed in a certain recognized position he is well looked after in his old age, while other people who in their own sphere have worked just as faithfully and done just as much for the upbuilding of this country have to pass a miserable old age?

Now I should like to say a few words with regard to the present administration of old age pensions. In this instance I am glad not to have to criticize the dominion but must criticize rather the provincial governments. As my colleague said, I do not think the provincial governments are living up to the terms of the act, which laid down that under certain conditions the pension should be $20 a month. I do not believe any provincial government has the right to reduce that amount to $15. The act provided that people might have an income of $125 from other sources and still receive that $20 a month. That provision has not been lived up to in a great many instances, and it seems to me the dominion government should bring pressure to bear upon the provinces. After all, the provinces did not enact the Old Age Pensions Act.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes, they did, in each province.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, they passed supplementary legislation, but it was an act of this parliament that laid down the conditions. We passed the primary legislation and the provinces, if they came in as "partners," to use the phrase of the Minister of Finance, came in on the terms of the dominion act. It seems to me if they are not willing to come in under those terms they should stay out. Then each province could settle the matter as to whether or not that particular government should remain in office. I want to protest against the badgering of old people and against the cheese-paring policy that is so often followed in connection with old age pensions. I should like to read a letter from my own constituency, dated March 3, which has just come into my office and which is typical of scores I have received. I had not time to have this letter copied, but will try to make out the writing:

> In reference to old age pensions no doubt you are aware that a great majority are not receiving the full amount, namely twenty dollars. For instance in my case I receive fifteen and a quarter monthly. I was seventy on the first of May, 1938, but I did not receive my first cheque until the first of October, so you realize they have not given me the months intervening, a matter of five months. I have learned the fault lies with the Manitoba government. I have lived permanently in Manitoba for the last thirty-two years, had a lot of sickness and unemployment. I never had a banking account. I borrowed money on my home when my sons came home from the last terrible war. They were gassed and they were unemployed for a long time. They do not receive any pension. I really do consider this should have been the government's responsibility. I have never been able to get relief and have not been able to pay off the mortgage. . . . To further complicate matters we are obliged to give names of sons and sons-in-law for further particulars with a view to get them to support us. Possibly I see in this a move to lessen our pension. Why should these young people be further penalized? The social welfare do all the investigating, nothing but highly organized spies. I think it cruel for poor old people to be subjected to so much obnoxious embarrassment.

The letter continues, but that is the gist of it. I heartily agree with the writer of that letter. It seems to me provision could be made to eliminate this constant interference with the privacy of the lives of people who have to accept old age pensions. I do not believe the investigators should have any right whatever to attempt to force the sons and other relatives to take over the responsibility for the care of these old people.

As my colleague has said, with the productivity of this country we ought to be able to lower the age and also raise the amount that is to be paid. I believe that to-day almost all people are living under higher tension than that under which people used to live. They are not able normally to carry on as long as many of those who lived in the quieter days of long ago. They may indeed live, but they are not fit for active hard work. We all know that there are many people in business and professional life who are turned off at sixty. What is there for such to-day?

Some of us who are rapidly approaching the age of sixty-five may be still able to do intellectual work. But I think of a good many of the men and women whom I knew as children. Many of them have dropped out. Those who were engaged in physical work are not able to carry on. Those who went farming are not as active as they used to be years ago. If they are on their own or their children's farms they putter around doing chores. In industry very few are actively engaged in jobs after they have reached the age of sixty. According to the old scriptural phrase a man's allotted years are three score and ten or, by reason of strength, four score years, then he passed on. Only at three score and ten years do we give him a pension, though he is probably played out at three score!

There is a big gap between sixty years, beyond which very few are able to secure work—especially manual work—and the age of seventy years at which they become eligible for old age pension. In these years, what are they to do? I can speak with the greatest assurance about the west. There are thousands in my own city who cannot get work at the age of sixty. What are they to do during the next ten long years? A great many of them are now on relief. Why should they not have some little security for their old age. I have read already a letter which came to-day. Within the last week I received another letter from a lady of sixty-six years of age who recalled that we had gone to school together in Brandon when we were children. This lady taught school in the rural sections of Manitoba during most of her life. To-day she is on relief. At her age she cannot get a school. For one or two years recently she did go out in an extremely backward district, at which time, owing to the extreme cold and the poor accommodation she was able to obtain, she contracted physical troubles. To-day she finds it next to impossible to get a school. What is she to do? I can remember the time in the old days when she lived with her mother. Many women helped to support their old mothers, and helped to send their brothers and sisters to school.

Sometimes in the comfort of this chamber we forget the conditions under which many people must live. Here is a lady who has carried on a useful life. She is not eligible for pension. At the age of sixty-six she finds herself compelled to wait for several long years, probably on public relief. Then she will be eligible for $20 a month—another kind of charity. She will have to swear up and down that she has nothing coming in. She will be investigated and badgered by officials. This, instead of receiving an old age pension as her right, because she has helped to build up the country.

As the hon. member for Portage la Prairie has said, I think we ought not to have such great inequalities in the manner in which we deal with people. Older people ought to be dealt with as I am sure all hon. members would feel like dealing with them, if they were dealing with them personally. We would treat them with a certain dignity and recognize the work they have done in the past. We would give them a pension, not as a matter of charity, not as a bit of wretched relief, but give generously—something more than $20, something more than a miserable $15 for the one who is unfortunate enough to have a husband or a wife surviving! What after all, is $25 a month to an old man who has done his bit in the building up of Canada? How would we treat our own fathers and mothers if we had the chance? Why not act thus toward others? Why not do as much for other people, many of whom are equally worthy, but have not had as good an opportunity in life?

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, when I rise to support the motion as it appears on the order paper I hope it will not be interpreted as an endorsation of all that has been said by others who are supporting the motion. It is perhaps a little peculiar that we have wandered away from the actual subject of discussion to a consideration of real or imaginary grievances in connection with the administration of the act. Since that administration lies in the provinces I do not propose to spend any time in discussing it to-night.

This is the third time I have risen in the house to support a resolution lowering the age at which old age pensions may be given. The government have accepted the age of sixty-five as that at which we might reasonably be expected to retire from labour. Although they have accepted that in practice, they continue to deny it in principle. Consequently we have this situation of once more postponing that which is inevitable. I wish it were possible, particularly in connection with social legislation which is recognized as inevitable, that we might meet the inevitable now. I do not see why it should not be possible at this session not only to consider the advisability of immediately lowering the age for old age pensions from seventy to sixty-five years, but to give something more than cursory consideration to the possibilities of old age pension which under a contributory scheme might provide optional ages of retirement.

I am not one who thinks that by cutting a man off at the top, putting him on a form of government subsistence, and bringing in a younger man at the bottom we are creating another job. I hope I have sense enough to know we do not do that. But what is much more important is that at least we give a measure of security to a man who during his lifetime has made a contribution. We take him at a time when he is not likely to be greatly demoralized by the acceptance of what some of our proud old people still consider to be a form of relief, although I do not hold with that view, myself. We are not so likely to demoralize them by offering that form of keep. On the other hand it cancels out a much more serious loss at the other end of the labour market. Two or three years ago we talked about unemployed young persons about the age of twenty-five years. I think to-day we would be justified in placing them between the ages of twenty and twenty-eight years. I say that because I personally know many young persons of twenty-eight years who have had no opportunity of getting permanent employment.

Consequently, while we do not create new jobs by expanding the number of those who have retired upon some form of competence, we do bring in the same number of young people who need work. It is much more important, not only for them individually but for the country as a whole, that they should have work.

I am getting tired of having to go to departments of government or to business employers whom I may happen to know, to plead that a man who has reached the age of sixty-five years may have one more year to make a little more provision, so that there will be one year less in which somebody else will have to support him until he reaches the age of seventy and is able to get his old age pension. Whether or not those people should have been thrifty, whether or not fault is to be found because they are not able to look after themselves in the five years from sixty-five to seventy, the fact remains that the great majority of men, particularly those who live in our cities, are not independent when they reach the age of sixty-five years. I have talked with scores of such men in the last two or three years who have told me that they do not want to hang on to their jobs past sixty-five years of age. They told me they knew of younger men who needed work, but they wanted to know what they could do. Their families could not keep them, and they did not know where they could go or what they could do in the years between sixty-five and seventy.

I am satisfied that now is the time when something should be done about this problem. I do not believe it is an insurmountable problem, but perhaps we may have to sit down to figure out some contributory scheme which would permit of an earlier retirement. The situation for many is hopeless now, but must it go on being hopeless forever? My purpose in rising is to say that if this measure goes to a vote I shall support it in the words of the resolution. I urge the government either to do something now or to give an indication that something will be done. This should not be one of those things which is postponed until the inevitable hour.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it would be much more pleasant for me if I could take the side of this question which the hon. members who have spoken have taken. It is much more pleasant to rise in one's place and advocate the paying of money to people who need it than it is to demonstrate the difficulties attendant upon such a course. I do not think some of the speakers have been fair either to the dominion government, to the provincial governments or to myself as minister in the attitudes they have taken. However, that is part of the responsibility of government and one must accept it. Needless to say, the popular rule in these days is to advocate the paying of money to people. The larger the number of people to whom one can advocate the paying of money, the more likely one is to get sympathetic support. I say again, as I have said before in this house, that no scheme has yet been devised whereby money can be paid by the government to some Canadian people without taking that money in some way or another from all the Canadian people. If I leave out the word "money" and substitute the word "value," perhaps in that statement I may get the support even of my Social Credit friends. However that may be, it is becoming a function of government to an increasing degree, to redistribute wealth. Particularly since the war has this government taken from all to give to some and I am one of those who believe that this tendency will continue.

I consider it to be my duty to bring to the attention of the house the extent to which we do this by way of war pensions, every one of which has been richly earned, to the extent of $50,000,000 or so a year; by way of old age pensions to the extent at the present time of some $30,000,000 a year; by way of relief and so on. We do in fact redistribute five or six hundred million of the national income which comes into the coffers of the treasury. This is redistributed either in the form of payments to individuals, in the form of pensions or relief, or in the form of payments for services which are insisted upon by the community for the community.

Mr. POOLE: Or interest.

Mr. DUNNING: And interest. By the way, I should tell my hon. friend that interest is the one expenditure which has been decreasing during the last three or four years while all others have been increasing. In spite of an increase in the public debt to the extent of nearly a billion dollars in the last eight years, our interest bill this year is lower than it has been in any year since the war. I think this fact should be stated when we emphasize the payment of interest, which is the wages of money.

With respect to the old age pension system and the principle of old age pensions, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) went into the history of this matter. I sat in the house, as did he and a number of others, when this legislation went through. I am quite prepared to accept the statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as to some of the things which were said on that occasion by some of the members. I do not remember them, although I do remember quite distinctly that members on all sides of the house at that time, and indeed prior to that time, were anxiously looking for a way, within the limits of the constitution, by which old age pensions could be commenced in this country. I think that was a general desire on the part of the members of the house at that time, and for several years preceding the actual inauguration of the scheme. Many of us believed that the only type of scheme possible under our constitution would run the risk of not being adopted in some of the provinces. In spite of what our friends in the corner say, there is a real constitutional difficulty in this parliament endeavouring to promulgate something which under the constitution is within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

I say again, as I have said before, that there is no better illustration of the long term unwisdom of attempting to evade the constitution by means of agreements between the dominion, on the one hand, and each separate one of the nine provinces, on the other, than the very old age pension scheme we are now discussing. I have had experience in endeavouring to get a degree of provincial unanimity which would make possible improvements in administration in the interests of the old age pensioners, many thousands of whom are within the intent of the law bona fide entitled to old age pensions. At the same time I endeavoured, and I believe the provinces endeavoured, to reach an agreement on regulations which would prevent thousands who were not bona fide entitled to old age pensions under this law from getting them. In spite of the appeals to prejudice made from some quarters of the house to-night, I conceive it to be my duty to endeavour to carry out the law as it was placed upon the statute books of this dominion.

But there are difficulties. One of the real difficulties of abridging the constitution in this matter—because it is really an abridgement by agreement of the plain intent of the constitution that this particular form of activity should be under the provinces and within their sole jurisdiction—is that having entered into agreements with each of the nine provinces, which agreements could not in the very nature of things in connection with experimental legislation foresee all of the thousand and one points which would arise, once the provinces commenced operating the scheme in cooperation with the dominion, minister of finance after minister of finance—not merely myself—had to endeavour time after time to secure that degree of agreement between the nine provinces separately and the dominion which would make it possible to bring this scheme more into harmony with the original intent of the law as we understood the law.

It was not until a little more than a year ago that finally, at a conference, a substantial agreement was reached on many points, not by any means on all the points of difference. The provinces insist that it is their constitutional right to administer this system, that they have an absolute right of veto of any change in the regulations. Please mark that. Each province says: We have an agreement with the dominion under the terms of which ten years' notice of termination is required. The province says: We have an agreement with you and that agreement cannot be changed except by mutual consent between the dominion and each individual province. And, Mr. Minister of Justice, they are constitutionally right, are they not?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: Can hon. members who look solely at the humanitarian aspect of the matter really see the difficulties that are inherent in a situation of that sort?

Mr. COLDWELL: On the other hand we pay seventy-five per cent of the money. So should we not therefore lay down the conditions under which we pay a major portion of the pensions?

Mr. DUNNING: There would have been no old age pensions had we not agreed to pay fifty per cent. Following through my hon. friend's point to its logical conclusion, what shall we say to the provinces? Shall we say to them: If you will not agree to do precisely as the dominion wishes in this matter, we will do—what? We will give ten years' notice that we are going to terminate the agreement? My hon. friend sees the dilemma.

Mr. COLDWELL: But all the provincial governments would be defeated on that score.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not discussing the political aspect of it at all, and I am not discussing the political complexion of any provincial government. To be perfectly fair to all of them, in any conference I have been in with the provinces—and they have varied in political complexion from time to time—I have never known the political aspect to enter into the discussion, and I freely confess that the provinces with their own knowledge of their own conditions are just as sincere and are taking just as sound a humanitarian view of this question as we are sitting in this house.

I am merely trying to make the point that this question of extra-constitutionality, which was never contemplated at confederation, is very difficult to work out in practice. It is for that reason that I have advocated before to-day, and advocate again to-day, that the constitutional responsibility for old age pensions and for unemployment insurance should be federal in character.

I believe, too, very strongly that a public body which has the power to expend money should be responsible for the raising of that money by taxation upon its own constituent body. That I believe to be a vital principle of sound government, and to the extent that we abridge the constitution by agreements in the manner in which we have done in this case, we to that extent at any rate violate that principle and make sound and fair administration more difficult.

Now, having said that, may I say further in defence of the provinces that, in spite of what has been said here, Mr. Speaker, I believe that every province is endeavouring to give fair and sympathetic administration to the Old Age Pensions Act—I believe that honestly—in accordance with what they consider to be their knowledge of their own provincial conditions. We may talk as we like, but twenty dollars a month in Prince Edward Island is worth more to a man or woman than twenty dollars a month in Saskatchewan. All the theorizing in the world will not equalize the cost of living across this dominion, or as between certain urban and certain rural sections of this dominion. That is one of the very reasons why the fathers of confederation divided the jurisdictions as they did, in order that differences in conditions might continuously be dealt with in the light of the smaller area where it is much more likely conditions will be reasonably uniform.

The arguments advanced here to-night by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—who I am sorry is not in his seat at the moment, and the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, illustrate one of the great difficulties of the provincial governments—not of the federal government because the federal government has nothing whatever to do with deciding who shall get a pension or how much the individual applicant shall get. The federal government under the law and under the agreement is in the position of agreeing to pay seventy-five per cent of what the province expends, and it may surprise hon. members to know that it was not until 1931, when the amendment to seventy-five per cent was put in the law, that the dominion got the definite power of audit. At the present time we do audit, but every province insists—and the law and the constitution are with them—that it is its right and its power to determine who is qualified under the law and how much under the law that individual shall receive.

May I say that the law never contemplated that a person in receipt of an income of over $125 a year should get an old age pension. That is written in the law.

Mr. HEAPS: The full pension of $20 a month.

Mr. DUNNING: The full pension of $20 a month, subject to a deduction if the income of the individual reached $125 a year. Let me put it in another way. A person could receive up to $125 a year from other sources without impairing his right to an old age pension.

Mr. HEAPS: Of $20 a month.

Mr. DUNNING: Of $20 a month, yes. The questions raised as to whether the province has a right to determine whether, when a man and wife live together, they shall receive $15 instead of $20 each, have been the subject of conflict between law officers of the crown in the right of the province and law officers of the crown in the right of the dominion ever since we have had the act, and I assume they will continue to be. I have reams of opinions here from provincial law officers and from our own law officers of the Department of Justice upon the subject. Some of the provinces say that so far as their people are concerned their people really believe that when a man and wife live together they should not get as much as two aged persons living apart. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) may say that the province would be defeated on that. I do not know. That is what they say, and they say it to their own people. They are taking the responsibility. It is impossible for it to be otherwise in that regard.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre objected to prying into the circumstances of these old people who are applicants for pension. Well, Mr. Speaker, I could, on the basis of inquiries that I have addressed to practically all the provinces of this dominion, bring before this house cases by the hundred where these very inquiries have been the only means of revealing that the persons applying were not entitled to old age pensions at all within the meaning of the law as it passed this house. They had in fact in a great many instances considerable property and had taken means to distribute it among their families a few years in advance of becoming eligible for old age pensions, and the very families who got it were not willing to keep them. I can tell this house that the provinces of this dominion, if they could reveal it, could show hundreds of instances of undoubted collusion. Their records also show a very great number of cases where the facts only became public after the pensioner had died and property turned up.

How in the world can any provincial administration be sure that an application from John Smith is bona fide and within the law, so far as need is concerned, unless they have provision for investigation and unless they ask all those questions to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre objects? The provincial government is not endowed with second sight. The provincial authorities do not know, when John Smith applies, who he is or what his circumstances are. There is only one method of finding out and that is the method of inquiry. My hon. friend speaks of the insult to these old people in regard to the methods followed of verifying their statements. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie is righteously indignant because in a particular case the provincial government of Manitoba, finding that a woman was working as housekeeper, apparently thought the people for whom she worked ought to pay her wages. My sympathies are wholly with the pensioner in that case. I am of the opinion that when old people work they should be paid the same as young people, and I think the pension authority in any province has a perfect right to insist that anyone getting the services of an old person should pay whatever those services are worth.

With respect to the other matter which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre spoke of, the type of case in which he said children were pressed—harassed was the word I think he used—to provide for their own parents, he referred to the change that had taken place in that regard since he was a boy. There may be a change in the ability of young people to care for their parents; but I do not admit that there is a change in the moral obligation to do so. Neither do I admit that the state should take over a load which an old person's children could assume if they would.

Mr. JAQUES: Why pension judges?

Mr. DUNNING: I am not now discussing judges. The Judges Act is not before the house. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will no doubt be willing at any time to give full information with respect to judges; personally I do not have it. I am speaking of a specific matter, old age pensions, and I am trying to stick to it.

I would not advocate for a moment that children who obviously cannot contribute towards the support of their parents should be in any way compelled to do so, but I am one of those who believe that the provincial welfare workers who look into these cases are just as human as the members who have made such a parade of their humanitarianism in the house to-night, and I do believe they give sympathetic consideration to the circumstances of any of the children of pensioners with respect to whom applications come before them. But again I say that this house is not the place to advance complaints against the administration of old age pensions by any province, because of what I have before related as to the basis of the act itself and as to the right of the provinces, claimed insistently, to administer it.

I should give some information again as to what is involved in the resolution. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) has changed his resolution this year. He is not now advocating reduction to a specified age—

Mr. HEAPS: It is the same as last year's.

Mr. DUNNING: —in the terms of the resolution. He is willing, as he puts it, to agree to any reduction at all as a step in the right direction. I believe he puts five years as the minimum that would satisfy him. I think I know him well enough to be able to say without offence, that I expect that a five-year reduction would satisfy him for one year, and that thereafter, in the light of what he sincerely believes, he would come along year by year in an effort to obtain a further reduction. I appreciate that, and I am not criticizing him for it. So that in the figures I asked to have compiled for me I asked what would be the financial effect of a reduction of the age from seventy to sixty-five.

Before coming to this point, however, perhaps I should indicate that at the present time, in spite of the alleged heartless administration of old age pensions by the various provinces, just about fifty per cent of all the people of Canada who are seventy years and over—just about half of them—are receiving old age pensions. The federal expense in that regard last year was $28,500,000 in round figures, and for the present year the estimates provide for $30,500,000. Even if we continue the present basis the cost for the next twenty or thirty years will increase very rapidly, though no more generous treatment is accorded. This increase will result partly from the normal growth in population and partly from the fact that in the next twenty-five or thirty years the percentage of our population over seventy to the total population will steadily increase, because our population has been so largely built up in the generation just past by the immigration of adult persons.

Let me give the estimates of our population at future census dates together with the number over seventy years of age, and the cost of old age pensions for them, assuming the present basis, assuming the present proportion, assuming the present rate of payment—and here I must say that these wicked provinces, as alleged to-night, who are so keen to cut down the maximum pension, are in fact to-day paying an average of slightly over $200 per annum to all pensioners. When we bear in mind that the maximum they could pay under the law is $240—if they paid the maximum to every one, that is all they could pay—it certainly does not indicate a heartless chiseling administration on the part of the provinces when the average today is over $200. Assuming then the same proportion as now, the same average payment as now, the cost to the dominion in 1941 would be $46,300,000; in 1951 it would be $62,000,000; in 1961 it would be $82,200,000, and in 1971 it would be $92,800,000.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the minister explain how he arrives at that?

Mr. DUNNING: By the factors which I spoke of a few minutes ago, the estimate by the bureau of statistics of our increase in population, and estimates from the same source of the expected number of those over seventy years of age in our population at the dates mentioned, and allowing for continuation of the same proportion of those over seventy eligible for old age pension as are eligible to-day, and for that proportion receiving an average equivalent to that which is being paid to-day.

Mr. COLDWELL: And the same depressed conditions over that long period?

Mr. DUNNING: Well, one assumes that in assuming the fifty per cent.

Mr. COLDWELL: It assumes that no improvement in conditions is likely to occur.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend could assure me that conditions will be better, I should be pleased.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to. Perhaps they will be if there is a change of government.

Mr. DUNNING: At any rate one may say this, that that proportion of fifty per cent eligible, which is really the basis of my hon. friend's argument, has held fairly steady in the provinces which originally came into the scheme prior to the present depressed conditions. There is not the factor of variability there that my hon. friend would probably hope for and which I certainly would hope for.

Mr. HEAPS: But there is an enormous increase in the amount.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will look at the figures I gave last year he will find the percentages of those over seventy allowed by the bureau of statistics in making this calculation are as follows: In 1931 our percentage of population over seventy years of age was six per cent. The bureau thinks it will be 6·7 per cent in 1941, eight per cent in 1951, 9·8 per cent in 1961 and 10·1 per cent in 1971, when it is estimated that a general leveling up will have been reached unless in the meantime our age groups are further affected by large scale immigration of particular age groups.

Now, if we lowered the pension age to sixty-five, the immediate additional cost to the dominion alone would be $18,859,000 a year. The total cost to the dominion alone if the eligible age were lowered to sixty-five would be $48,621,000 as against the $30,500,000 provided for the current year. If we reduced the eligible age to sixty, the estimated immediate cost to the dominion would be an additional $44,000,000 more than we are now spending. That is to say, to reduce the pensionable age by ten years would cost the dominion immediately some $14,000,000 more than the dominion is now spending on those over seventy, or a total of $44,200,000 immediate increase. Or the total immediate cost to the dominion this year, if the age were lowered to sixty, would be $73,900,000.

To the country as a whole the cost would be still greater; for one must remember that the provinces are in this, and this house cannot light-heartedly change this act and assume that every province will accept the financial obligations involved. I know that would not bother the hon. member for Winnipeg North; he would immediately say, "Let the dominion pay the difference whatever it is." That would be an easy way to get round that difficulty.

Mr. HEAPS: I am willing to speak for myself when the time comes.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, but I venture to say that would be my hon. friend's solution.

Mr. NEEDHAM: It is a correct one.

Mr. DUNNING: If that is not my hon. friend's solution may I point out to him that there is nothing to prevent any province to-day from deciding to pay pensions itself to its old people between sixty and seventy years of age or any other age it sees fit.

Mr. POOLE: They have not the revenue.

Mr. DUNNING: But I thought my friends in Alberta came into office on the promise that they would provide all the revenue necessary to run that province and pay everybody $25 a month.

Mr. POOLE: Leave it to us and we will do it.

Mr. DUPUIS: What are you waiting for?

Mr. DUNNING: I think I have said all I want to say about the costs. I leave that part with the house. But I want to say a few words about the growing habit in this house of fouling our own nest as a country. Hardly a discussion of a humanitarian character arises but a number of hon. members state that we are the most backward nation in the world on this and on that. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it. We are not a backward people. In connection with the matter which was discussed just before this resolution, I could have instanced and I wanted to instance that the people of this dominion are not backward in caring for hospitalization and for their sick and their fatherless; they do look after them; they average up as well as any country in the world in that regard. The difficulty is that some hon. members compare what Canada is doing with some country which has either evolved a scheme which enables their national government to do what in our country is a matter for the provinces, or where, as in the case of New Zealand or England, there is a unitary government, not a federal and provincial system of government as we have here. In respect to these matters our people are developing from the bottom up, which is the soundest way.

We had some information this afternoon from the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) indicating how the people themselves are cooperating in providing a measure of health insurance to an increasing degree, which I think is an encouraging sign, and I believe the time will come when we shall deal with the matter from the point of view of dominion assistance to schemes of that sort on the basis of helping self-help. That, indeed, is the basis of the British approach to many of these questions, and is becoming the basis of the approach which is being made in Australia and New Zealand.

With respect to pension schemes, here also we are advancing in Canada every year. An increasing number of Canadian industries are evolving pension schemes. Unfortunately we have not complete details of all of them; we cannot show with chapter and verse the extent to which this movement has grown. In one branch of the government service, operated by my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), the annuities branch, a remarkable development has taken place within the last two years, through industries utilizing the facilities of the government annuities branch in working out pension plans for their industry, in connection with which also I know the Minister of Labour has been mightily criticized from the opposite point of view to that of the criticism we are getting to-night.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people, thank God, are still imbued with sufficient individualism to want to provide for their own security for their old age, as far as they can. There is plenty of evidence of that.

Mr. JAQUES: Yes; a good, thick belt to tighten.

Mr. DUNNING: No one is speaking of belt tightening. No, Mr. Speaker; I am referring to those three and a half million Canadians who are trying to provide, in some measure at least, for their own security through the medium of life insurance. I am thinking of those four million Canadians who at this moment have savings deposits in our Canadian banks. They are trying hard to contribute towards the provision of their own security, and the extent—

Mr. POOLE: What about the—

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend can make his speech. Every time I am making a point he just butts in with a boo-boo-boo-boo-boo. If social credit has nothing better than boo-boo-boo-boo-boo, it had better be quiet.

The average Canadian does not want the state to keep him. It is all to his credit that he does not, in my opinion. That does not lessen the obligation of the state to look after its own sick, its own old, its own halt and its own blind. I am not urging that for a moment; but at times, Mr. Speaker, do we not concentrate our attention rather too much on the seven or eight hundred thousand people who are on relief to-night and think rather too little of that great body of our middle-class represented by those four million of whom I spoke who have some savings and by those three and a half million—of course there would be some overlapping in these two groups—who are attempting to make provision for their own security by way of life insurance? They are the great burden bearers of this nation, the great middle-class of this country on whom, under any system of taxation, the major burden in proportion to means will rest. I am thinking of them to-night as we speak of those who ought to be maintained by the state, because in the last analysis those who are so maintained are maintained in very large degree by that great middle group of Canadians who are trying to make provision for their own security and who, out of what they do earn or make, are the great body of taxpayers of this dominion.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read what I said in this house on this question last year. Oh, I know I shall be described as reactionary and as orthodox. Thank goodness the ten commandments are orthodox, but they are still pretty good. Speaking for myself, I could repeat to-night every word I said last year, when I made this statement:

> In conclusion, I should like to give the house an indication of what I believe our objective should be with regard to old age pensions, and also some idea of the course I think we should pursue in attaining that objective. In the first place, experience in operating this type of social legislation, from the dominion point of view, convinces me that we should look towards a national scheme of old age pensions, nationally administered. I am convinced, in the second place, that the British system of making the lowering of the age limit contingent upon the contributory feature is a sound objective to pursue, and that we should look in that direction. Indeed I am one who believes that there is no limit to what can be worked out in the direction of lowering the age limit, provided we had a national scheme, nationally administered, and provided that the period below seventy years was made definitely contributory.
> I think the experience of the British scheme gives us considerable data to work upon in that regard, and I believe that broadly our objective should be, as I have just stated, ultimately to reach a place where we would have a national scheme of old age pensions, nationally administered, and with the contributory feature prominently associated with any ages lower than the age of seventy, which is the present qualifying limit.

Then further on:

> Now, as to the course which should be taken to attain them—

That is, the objectives mentioned.

> As I indicated at the opening of my remarks, at the present time we are in the position of not having legislative jurisdiction with respect to this matter. There are high constitutional authorities in this house of parliament who take the view that it is doubtful if we have the constitutional authority to pay the seventy-five per cent which we are now paying to the provinces. That view has been expressed on more than one occasion in this house, and while I do not hold with it, at least it gives an indication of the difficulty surrounding the attainment of the national objectives which I have just described.

Therefore we must somehow reach a place where the constitutional authority in the matter is beyond question, where this parliament can set up an old age pensions scheme of a type it deems to be desirable and also have the power to administer. When I say that, it must be remembered that I am not unmindful of the extra cost to the dominion that would be involved or of the fact that if this parliament assumes a burden which the constitution presently places upon the provinces, then this parliament must receive access to fields of taxation, sufficient to enable it to meet the added cost in a national way. If we undertake greater national responsibility, then we must have wider national fields from which to derive the revenues necessary to maintain those national responsibilities and national institutions.

It is well known that in the hearings before the Rowell commission the matter now under discussion was developed I think by every province which appeared before that body. Elaborate and careful studies have been made by economists and welfare workers on behalf of the provinces, and in addition the commission has had its own independent studies made of the question in its relationship to the great question of adjusting the financial relationships between the provinces and the dominion. That is the position in which we are now. In the meantime, under a system which is admittedly faulty because of that bridging of the constitutional difficulty which is involved in the agreement I discussed earlier in my remarks, we are carrying on. I believe we shall reach a point where the provinces will be convinced that the national parliament and the national government—

Mr. MacNICOL: National government?

Mr. DUNNING: Not in the sense my hon. friend has in mind; perhaps I should say the federal government; "national" is rather a dangerous word to use these days—that the federal parliament and the federal government should have the undoubted right to work out, to enact, to administer and to pay for a national scheme of old age pensions. If I had my way, in introducing such a scheme the remarks I have just made, quoting what I said last year, indicate what I think is the sound course. I am of course, not advancing that as definite government policy. At this stage it would be impossible to introduce such a scheme, but I close with this thought, that in pressing this upon this parliament, hon. members should not forget that the agreements with the provinces in no way estop the provinces from supplementing, out of their own resources, the amount of pensions now paid. It is only six or seven years ago that the provinces got fifty per cent from the dominion. When they received an extra twenty-five per cent, did any of them pass it along to the old people in the form of increased pensions? No. The extra contribution was used—as they had a perfect right to use it—in the reduction of their own expenses and their own requirements in the field of taxation.

I have tried to cover the matter as dispassionately as I can, having regard to the fact that I have just as human feelings as any of those who have spoken previously. There is nothing much more difficult than to watch the course of a motion of this kind, or to read letters, such as those which have been read to-night, from an individual who is complaining without having asked the provincial welfare bureau concerned. "What are the facts?"

I have had so much experience of that kind. I have had letters by the hundreds from individuals which I have passed along to the provinces, they having the sole right to deal with the matter. I have asked them if they would be good enough to give me an answer, and I am bound to say in fairness to the provinces that I have yet to find a case where I have not had an answer reasonable at all events, if not fully satisfactory to me.

Mr. E. J. POOLE (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I compliment the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) upon presenting the resolution to the house. I should like also to pay tribute to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). I do not think any hon. member has worked more diligently for social and economic reform.

With regard to the resolution before the house may I say that I am at a loss to know why the government should defend itself. After all, if it is in such an impregnable position it does not require defence. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) tells us that we are just as far ahead as any country in the world. I question that statement, and suggest that Sweden, Great Britain and other nations are far ahead of us in matters of this kind.

The question of money once more arises. We are asked who is going to pay. Well, who always pays? But we will notice this, that when matters of national defence are considered in the house mere dollars and cents do not enter into the debate at all. One cannot compare conditions among the people to-day with those which existed ten or twenty years ago. To-day thousands of young men are seeking employment, and the old men are hanging on to their jobs, because those jobs are their only source of security.

When I read the resolution I was reminded of an old friend of mine, an ex-service man of about forty-five or forty-eight years of age. When he looked for work he was told he was too old. I would ask the government if there is any greater social obligation than that of providing security for the aged of our nation. I suppose if anyone were to suggest ways and means by which additional pensions might be financed the Minister of Finance would suggest that we were suggesting pure inflation. How can we pauperize a nation by distributing more goods? I believe that in a debate of this kind, involving the expenditure of money, the government loses sight of the all-important question as to the purpose of an economic system. I say the purpose of an economic system is to produce abundantly and to distribute that which we produce. If it is not that, then there can be no purpose in it.

All the aged ask is the right to live. To-day thousands of them are dispossessed, not only because they are old—although that is one of the greatest contributing factors in competitive society—but because there is not employment for them. How the government can possibly justify its attitude, wherein it denies the aged the right to security, is more than the average man can understand. All we are asking is that the abundance we can produce may be the measure of security of the aged of our nation—that and nothing more.

For the first time during my experience in the house it appeared to me that the Minister of Finance when speaking lost his equilibrium. He was somewhat annoyed when some members from this corner of the house interfered with his speech. He did not like their butting in. But, many, many times when hon. members in this corner have been speaking, the Minister of Finance and other hon. members opposite have asked questions and made comments. On those occasions there have been very few objections on this side of the house. When the minister loses his equilibrium I take it as final and complete evidence that he is attempting to defend an indefensible position.

Old age pensions are not the responsibility of the provincial governments. It may be that the British North America Act would give that impression, but then we must remember that that act has been the curtain behind which both old-line parties have reneged their obligations to the people of Canada. Will any hon. member sitting to your right, Mr. Speaker, say, and have his observation recorded in Hansard, that the age for the old age pension should not be reduced? No, no hon. member to your right will say that. They are saying, "We have not the money"—but they can find money for national defence and for thousands of other things. But when they are asked for money for the aged, for the youth or for the unemployed, they have no money.

We can provide guns for the west and east coasts; we can build airplanes; we can pass millions of dollars through this house like so many cents for arms and munitions; but when it comes to the real issue of the social security of the people of this nation, then it is a different matter. It has always been the same whether it be the aged, the blind or the unemployed. They do not count; we have no money for them. All we can find money for is to build machine guns, munition factories, and provide other means for the destruction of the state. We have not the intelligence to use our resources for the production of those things which will make life happy and secure and provide a life commensurate with the ability of our people to produce.

What does this resolution ask for? It asks this house to distribute more goods, to give to the aged, to those who are less than seventy years of age, future security. People may boast about democracy, but a parliament that cannot provide security for its aged is bankrupt of progress, bankrupt of everything. It has not an idea. Time and time again sympathy has been expressed in this house for our aged, our unemployed, our ex-service men and our blind, but apparently we have not yet learned that we cannot feed people with sympathy. This matter really requires positive action; it requires the enactment of certain laws to guarantee—what? Guarantee the distribution of the goods which we can produce in a scientific age.

When I rose I said that I was not going to speak very long. There is a principle involved here. The Minister of Finance spoke far longer than I shall, and he expressed sympathy in the good old-fashioned Liberal way. But he did not do anything about it. He said he would like to do something, but we have not the money. According to him, the only way we can do anything is to take from those who have little, to give to those who have nothing at least some measure of existence. Are we living in the twentieth century? Can we produce an abundance of things and yet place parliament in a strait-jacket? Can we say, "We should like to give you these things, but we have not the money." What stupidity! I read some of the speeches delivered by Liberal members when they were in opposition, and I was astonished to see the difference between what they say when they are in opposition and what they say as members of the government. Has not the Liberal party more guts than that? Have they not the courage to fight for the most defenceless people in this nation? If they have not, they should have. I hope they will not be here after 1939, because a government that has lost its courage is no use to a democracy. Democracy demands courage. It demands that we face the facts, not fiction. It demands that we do things, not express sympathy.

Let us get down to facts. The government has said that they are justified in turning down this resolution because the economic system under which we live cannot provide security for these people. The only restriction which the members of the government place upon the providing of this security is the amount of dollars and cents which the chartered banks of Canada can provide. This government does not exist as 245 members; this government is the Minister of Finance. When he cracks the whip everybody jumps. But he is not the whole show. The main show is the Bank of Canada. They are the people who tell the minister what to do, and the government jumps at the crack of the whip. Until this government throws off these shackles of finance; until this government stops saying that nothing can be done every time a suggestion comes from this side of the house, there will be no progress. Until the philosophy of the Minister of Finance is no more; until a new philosophy is predominant there will be no release from the poverty which exists in the country to-day. This resolution gives us an opportunity to bring to the forefront those people of Canada who are so poverty stricken financially, irrespective of the fact that we have so much materially—we are saying we cannot give them more than $20 a month.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, March 7, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND PERIOD OF OPERATION OF ACT, ETC.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to extend the period of its operation and to vest in the minister authority to enter into certain agreements and to carry out and perform certain duties incidental to the operation of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE FOR GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON AND AFTER MONDAY, MARCH 13

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Monday the 13th March next to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence on Mondays over all other business except introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Is this the motion to wipe out private members' day?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On Monday next.

Mr. MANION: If this carried, Monday next would not be private members' day?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. MANION: I wish to say a few words with reference to this motion. Let me make it clear that I have no personal objection to the wiping out of private members' days if there are any important government measures to come forward, though I have no doubt that some private members will have some objections. As I look down the list of government measures dealt with so far and compare those measures with private resolutions already disposed of and other private motions still on the order paper, it strikes me that the business proposed by private members is much more important than anything the government has brought down to date.

I have been intrigued on a number of occasions this session by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) lecturing the house about the importance of getting on with government business. Last Wednesday, for example, he rose and gave us a real tongue-lashing because we dared to take up some of the time of the house in dealing with the munitions contract with the Janin company. I have been wondering exactly what is government business this year. There are the trade agreements, for instance, and we have been accused of holding them up. Are they government business? I should think they are, and rather important business. Then there is the Bren gun contract and the Janin contract, contracts involving with other expenditures an outlay of some $63,000,000 this year—that is the total amount of the defence department estimates. Yet, both we and hon. members to my left were violently attacked last week by the Prime Minister because we dared to discuss the letting of contracts, not by public tender, not even from a selected list, but, so far as I know, to pets of the Department of National Defence, or at any rate, to pets of this government. When I listened to the Prime Minister last week getting so enthusiastic on his subject, attacking us because the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) brought up the question of the shell contract, let to one who is the builder of the post office here, a gentleman who is a contractor for the construction of public buildings—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is this in order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. MANION: I am discussing the reasons relating to whether we should go into government business or continue in private business on a certain day, and I think I am quite in order.

When I heard the right hon. gentleman even bring up the phantom of war, as he did the other day, to frighten the people, I suppose without any more basis for it than there is a basis for very much that the right hon. gentleman says; when he did that, and dodged the question that was put to him whether he favoured or agreed with the letting of contracts by the Department of National Defence without competition to pets and favourites of this government or of the defence department, I could not help thinking he was taking a rather serious attitude. I doubt whether the right hon. gentleman the other day, when he stood up in this house and implied or made a statement to the effect that we are possibly on the verge of war, had anything at all in the back of his head except the idea of evading the question put to him as to whether he favoured the giving of contracts on that basis.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think the hon. leader of the opposition is getting rather far away from the subject of the resolution. The motion is to take away Monday as private members' day, from Monday next.

Mr. MANION: Well, sir, of course I accept your ruling. At the same time I say that to me the letting of contracts to spend $63,000,000 on defence is certainly of very much more importance from the point of view of public business than a number of things that have been dealt with as public business.

I am arguing that the questions which the Prime Minister submits that we should not discuss in this house at all, which he is now ruling out by proposing to take away private members' day, are more important than the matters he calls public business. I am going to deal with some of these for just a moment, to show the difference. Here is a list of matters called public business dealt with so far this session; let us see how important they are. There was of course the speech from the throne. Then, supply. Supply comes in as a sort of filler-in; it is one of the measures brought in when we have not anything else to proceed with. When the government runs out of its regular business it brings on supply. While the estimates are in a sense public business, they are not important enough or urgent enough to have everything else sidetracked in order that they may be dealt with.

Then there was a bill amending the Food and Drugs Act, brought in by the Minister of Pensions and National Health, dealing with cosmetics and making a few other little changes in the regulations of that department —just the ordinary type of bill that every department tries to bring in from time to time. I have had enough experience in government to know that every department likes to bring in, every year or two, a few amendments to the act governing that department. That is the type of government business that was.

The next item I have noted here is the legislation authorizing the raising of $750,000,000 to meet loans and obligations, brought in by the Minister of Finance. Certainly it is important, but it is in fact just one of the things, perhaps the most important, that merely give the house an opportunity to discuss the inflationary ideas of the social crediters. Then there was the bill of the Minister of Justice relating to penitentiaries, perhaps one of the most important, though to my mind not so very important. This suggests a reflection. The penitentiaries bill was to set up a commission to govern the penitentiaries of Canada. I am just as humanitarian as my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) or any other hon. member. I believe in humanitarian treatment of prisoners. But I submit—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think the hon. member is straying too far from the subject of the resolution. The resolution moved by the Prime Minister is to take away Monday as private members' day.

Mr. STEVENS: On a point of order, sir; perhaps the leader of the opposition would be diffident about advancing this point himself, but one of the most widely accepted practices in the House of Commons is that the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition be given reasonable latitude when they are dealing with questions on the orders of the day or concerning the procedure of the house. Never in my experience in the house have I ever heard any leader of the opposition called to order on such extremely narrow grounds as this. Strictly speaking there may be some slight departure from the details of the motion, but the motion concerns the business of the house and the conduct of it, and I submit on that ground that the leader of the opposition ought to be allowed to proceed, upon the precedent and practice of this house.

In the second place I invite your honour to give special attention to this point: How can we intelligently discuss the motion before us unless we are allowed to review the measures which are government measures and those which are private, and to weigh the question whether or not private members have had reasonable opportunity to present their views?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But not to debate the merits of those questions.

Mr. STEVENS: Not at all; but my leader was just reviewing the character of those measures. I do not like to use the word that has been used in the past in this house, more by my hon. friends opposite than by others, the word "gag"; it is an objectionable word, but it is very expressive. If we are to be confronted by an overwhelming majority applying restrictions of this kind, then the democratic liberties of parliament will indeed have been restricted. I submit that on grounds of practice and on a reasonable interpretation of the rules—your honour I am sure will agree that no rule can at all times be applied on its narrowest interpretation—there must be some reasonable latitude. I bespeak myself on behalf of the members of parliament that the leader of the opposition should on this occasion be accorded the ordinary latitude that has been given to the leader of the government and the leader of the opposition in this house from time immemorial.

Mr. MANION: May I say a word on the point of order, supplementing the remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens)? I am dealing with the relative importance of government business as opposed to private business, trying to show that the motions proposed by private members have to do with more important subjects than the measures brought in by this government. That is all I am trying to show. I have attempted to stay within my rights, and I hope, sir, that you will so rule.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do any other hon. members wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. LAWSON: I should like to present one point, from a purely legal aspect, concerning the rules of the house. Standing order 15 prescribes that Monday shall be private members' day. It is now proposed to take that day away from private members. The motion is debatable. The only reasonable ground that the government can advance for taking this day away from private members is the importance of government business as compared with private members' business. Therefore, the leader of the opposition is speaking strictly to the issue, namely, the comparative importance of government business as against private members' business, and I submit he is in order.

Mr. CHURCH: The motion before the house is that on and after Monday next government business shall have precedence over private members' resolutions. It is an extraordinary coincidence that the motion is made at the present time, because the opposition have had no resolutions so far. The time has been taken up largely with government business and motions by hon. members from other sections of the house. The motion at the head of page 12 of the order paper concerns any municipality in Canada, from Vancouver to Halifax. It is a motion relating to relief, municipal relief works and relief unemployment. There has been no declaration of policy on the part of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) as to what the government are going to do. The municipalities are now preparing their tax rates, but those rates cannot be struck until they know the policy of the government, which might be given in the discussion of this motion, which ordinarily would come up next Monday.

I want to direct attention to the rules of the house in this connection. If this motion is not discussed on a private members' day it remains on the order paper, and, by the rule of anticipation, it cannot be mentioned in this house on the estimates or at any other time. It is the most important resolution we have. What is to be done with these people who are on relief throughout Canada? In Ontario we get no help at all because the provincial government will not cooperate in the federal government's program of public works to relieve unemployment. It is true that the minister announced forty-forty-twenty as the division of cost between the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities, but in Ontario they chiselled that down for January, February and March so that it was away below what the government announced.

I have been in this house since 1921, and ever since that time motions of this kind have received a very wide interpretation. After all is said and done it must be remembered that the private member is the only connecting link between the government of the day and the electorate; and when he ceases to function this ceases to be a free parliament. Before this motion passes I would ask the Minister of Labour to rise and tell us what he is going to do in reference to relief. That seems to cause a little laughter as between the minister and his learned colleague sitting beside him, who said the other day that if we took certain action it might bring about force. Well, I can tell him that we will not need force; the unemployed and the people on relief soon will be able to say it with ballots.

Mr. HARRIS: Mr. Speaker, I have been sitting in this house since 1921, and I do not recall any occasion during that time when a motion of this kind was held to be not debatable. The rules of the house provide that it is debatable. Further, the motion contains the words, "government notices of motion and government orders." All the observations made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) up to the present have been strictly within the confines of government notices of motion and government orders, as these are recited in the routine proceedings and orders of the day on our desks.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon. member wish to speak to the point of order? I had no intention of saying the speech being made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) was not in order. He is quite within his rights in debating this motion, and I never had any intention of saying that the motion was not debatable. What I had in mind was that the hon. gentleman should not discuss the merits of the measures to which he was referring. Unquestionably he may discuss everything that comes within this motion, but he should not go into a discussion of the merits or demerits of government measures which are not now directly before the house.

Mr. MANION: I shall endeavour to keep within the rules of the house, as I usually do. I was not discussing the merits or demerits of the Penitentiaries Act, but I was going to say that among the resolutions of private members there are many, which I shall mention in a moment, dealing with more important matters. The Penitentiaries Act after all deals with the people in our penitentiaries, numbering some 3,500 or 4,000. A private member's resolution concerning unemployment, on the other hand, deals with the four or five hundred thousand people in Canada who are out of employment and who have stayed out of the penitentiaries. Therefore to my mind it is very much more important that we should deal with these people who are out of employment rather than with the people who are in the penitentiaries.

I should like to mention the other government measures which have been presented to the house, to show how important they are. I have mentioned the amendments to the Penitentiaries Act. The next had to do with the appointment of auditors for the Canadian National Railways, a merely formal measure of no very great importance. The next dealt with the city of Ottawa agreement, under which $100,000 is granted the city of Ottawa, which is another annual statute. Then there were the amendments to the loan and trust companies acts, permitting these companies to allow their employees to enter into pension schemes. Then there was the Technical Education Act, a little more important, but not much. Then came the act to assess the owners of obstructions to the ascent or descent of fish such annual sums of money as the minister might determine. Fisheries are important; I do not wish to belittle them, but at the same time that was not a very important measure.

I have named, Mr. Speaker, about a dozen government measures, only one or two of which are of any importance at all. But what about the ones the government are holding up? What about the amendments to the Pension Act? What about the defence purchasing board? That is another measure that has been passed over day after day. Why is it being held up?

Let me show, on the other hand, what the private members have dealt with so far this session. We had the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Finn) bringing up the loss of lobster traps and equipment on the western coast of Nova Scotia, certainly a very important matter from the point of view of the fishermen of that province. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) brought up the question of the distribution of seed wheat, an important matter for the prairies. Then there were the Bren gun contract and the Montreal construction company contract, both having to do with munitions and, as I have said, dealing with the $63,000,000 that is to be expended on defence this year. Yet those were the ones in connection with which we were particularly accused of holding up the business of the house. Then there was the question of unemployment insurance, which was brought up by my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), also a very important question. There was the matter of a fixed price on wheat, and the matter of the government wheat policy. I have forgotten who brought that up, but if I am not mistaken it was during that discussion that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) made his statement.

Mr. GARDINER: No; that was on the estimates.

Mr. MANION: Then there was a discussion on the condition of the live stock industry, and finally the debate on the Canadian flag. All these matters were of some importance. I do not mean any disrespect to my hon. friend who brought up the question of the Canadian flag, but I think that was one of the least important subjects that could have been brought up at this time, with all our other problems. However, it is a matter of some importance.

Now I am going to give a list of a dozen private members' resolutions which remain on the order paper, almost any one of which to my mind is more important than any of the government business with which we have dealt thus far. I made up this list yesterday morning, and the first item is old age pensions, a matter which was discussed yesterday. Then comes unemployment and unemployment relief, which has to do with the four or five hundred thousand people in this country who are out of work. Surely that is a very important thing. Then there is a resolution having to do with a program of flood prevention and water conservation, brought in by one of my followers, the hon. member for Davenport, Toronto (Mr. MacNicol). There is a resolution dealing with the declaration of war by Canada; another concerning the stimulation of the sugar industry; another having to do with the encouragement of the use of Canadian coal; another regarding stabilized wheat prices; another advocating national control of the armament industry; another concerning the relief of youth unemployment; another having to do with the preservation of the halibut fisheries, and finally a resolution concerning national scholarships. I would say all these are very important; more so, I repeat, than practically any of the matters which have been brought up by the government thus far.

This talk, sir, by the leader of the government on three or four occasions to the effect that we were holding up the real business of the government, when they actually bring in such unimportant measures as I have listed to-day, is one of the reasons why democracy is being discredited in this country. I do not think the right hon. gentleman had any right to complain of what he called holding up the business of the house. We have never done that. At all times he had 180 members behind him; at any time he could have moved an amendment and gone into government business, even on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, as he has done during the debate on the trade treaty. He could have done that at any time, unless he wished to abdicate his position as leader of this house. That is what the prime minister is, the leader of the house; and it is this bringing up of what to my mind are futile arguments of that sort against private members who are dealing with important subjects, while the government deals with unimportant subjects, that leads to the stirring up of feeling against democracy, to the leadership league of Mr. McCullagh and the new demagogism of Mr. Herridge. Those are the outgrowths of attempting to stifle public debate on important questions.

I say, sir, in closing, that so far as I am concerned I consider much of what the Prime Minister said on all these four times when he has got up and lectured the house about letting the government get on with public business is just so much claptrap and humbug. That is my opinion of most of what he has said about it. I challenge the government now to get down to business: to introduce, for example, legislation to deal with the great unemployment problem, or with the youth problem, or with national understanding, if you like, and with taxes and debt—to name only a few of the great problems. If he proceeds to deal with these important subjects, I think the right hon. gentleman would be well within his rights in asking the house to go on with government business, and for other hon. members to stop talking private resolutions. Until he does that, I think private members certainly have the edge on the argument, because the subjects with which their resolutions deal are very much more important than anything the Prime Minister has brought up thus far this session.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I were accustomed to addressing the house in the manner of my hon. friend I think I would say, with respect to the lecture which he has just sought to administer to me, that there was a good deal of claptrap and humbug about it.

Mr. MANION: You ought to know; you are a good judge.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have watched my hon. friend's tactics since he has taken the chair of leader of the opposition, and it has been apparent that nothing is too small to occasion a speech of some length from him, particularly if it will serve to delay proceedings a little longer.

Mr. MANION: I rise to a point of order. I would like it understood that after the right hon. gentleman speaks I have the right to speak again. This is his second speech. I have the right to say a few words after he has finished.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As a matter of fact I did not speak on the motion.

Mr. MANION: You moved it; that is the same thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I moved it, and I thought it was going to carry unanimously. It would have, but for the fact that my hon. friend got up and delivered his speech. That gave the cue to some of his following to join with him and help him to protract a little the proceedings of the afternoon.

Mr. MANION: We are not trying to protract at all.

Mr. LAWSON: I rise to a point of order. I do not think it lies in the mouth of a prime minister—

Mr. DUNNING: That is not a point of order.

Mr. LAWSON: I will proceed, and you can hear it. It does not lie in the mouth of a prime minister to accuse a member of the house of protracting proceedings, when I merely spoke of the legal aspect of the question of order which was before the house.

Mr. DUNNING: What is the point of order?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not quite see my hon. friend's point of order. However he has probably served his purpose.

Mr. LAWSON: Mr. Speaker saw it, anyway. He ruled with me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before I do say a word in reply to what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) has said, may I assure hon. members that the procedure which the government is following this session is not different from that which has been followed in other sessions, nor is it any less generous but rather more generous towards private members' resolutions. May I give to hon. members the number of Mondays which have elapsed between the opening and the dates on which Mondays have been taken as government days. In the session of 1932-33 five Mondays had elapsed; in the session of 1934, five; in 1935, four; in 1936, five; in 1937, three; in 1938, six, and this year eight Mondays have elapsed.

I would point out the relative importance of government business and the business of private members, because I hold, notwithstanding what the leader of the opposition has said, that after all, government business is more important than private members' resolutions, however important they may be. The government is the body responsible for carrying on the business of the country, and it is the best judge of what that business is. But in order that hon. members may not imagine that most of the Mondays since the opening were taken up with the debate on the address and other debates which have been mentioned, may I place on record the number of Mondays actually given up to private members' business. In the session of 1932-33 there were four Mondays; in 1934, four; in 1935, three; in 1936, four; in 1937, two; in 1938, four, and in 1939, five. This session, therefore, more Mondays have been given to private members than have been given in any of the sessions since 1932. I mention these figures because they show that in every way the government has been considerate of the rights of private members.

My hon. friend has talked about the different measures we might have gone on with. May I point out that in the debate on the address I mentioned the first measure which would be taken up as a government measure would be the trade treaty with the United States. We regard that as a very important piece of legislation. I may say I do not think a more important piece of legislation has been introduced to this parliament at any time, unless it was the treaty of three years ago, of which in part this is a continuation and in part an addition. At any rate I made that announcement at that time so that hon. members would not feel it necessary when speaking in the debate on the address in reply to take up their time in discussing matters which would relate to the trade treaty. I wanted to give them the assurance at once that they would have that opportunity when the debate on the address was over.

I thought by giving that assurance we might shorten the debate on the address. I have given one reason why the government decided to proceed next with the trade treaty.

But there was another reason, and a special one, why the government made the trade treaty the first important measure of the session. It was this: As hon. members well know, when the debate on the resolution respecting the trade treaty is completed we will then have to go into committee of ways and means to discuss the various items in the schedule. I imagine the discussion of those items will take a considerable time. Following the discussion of the items in committee of ways and means we will have to introduce a bill, the three stages of which will have to be passed by the house, including again discussions in the committee of ways and means. All that will take a considerable length of time.

I think it will be to the interest of hon. members in the house and to the country that the budget should be brought down as early this year as possible. Hon. members will know the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) can hardly undertake to get his budget in shape for presentation until this all-important measure, the trade agreement with the United States is out of the way.

I say that is the reason why at the outset we gave the right of way to the trade treaty. We knew it would take considerable time to get the measure through, so that the path might be cleared for the Minister of Finance to bring in his budget at this session at as early a date as possible.

My hon. friend has spoken about some of the lesser measures which have been on the order paper. Among the number he referred to the penitentiaries bill, which is now before us. What was said about the penitentiaries bill at the end of the last session by many who were critical of the government at that time, and by no one more strongly than by the leader of the opposition in another house, when the measure was in that place? It was stated that the penitentiaries measure was one of the most important that any government could bring forward, but that we had left it to the very end of the session, and that therefore there was not the opportunity to discuss it in the detail which its importance merited. Well, the best answer to a criticism of that kind is to make a measure of that sort one of the very first pieces of business after the opening of the session. We do attach very considerable importance to the penitentiaries measure, notwithstanding the fact that the leader of the opposition has different views concerning it. The reason for bringing it up at this time is to permit it to be sent to the other house at as early a moment as possible, so that there may be no excuse, so far as the discussions in that place are concerned, of its not having been presented in ample time. There have been some small measures, but they have taken very little of the time of the house. Time has been taken up with the debate on the address, with the debate with respect to defence contracts, with the Bren gun resolution and with the resolution moved the other day to refer another munitions contract to the public accounts committee. The remainder of the time has been taken up largely with the discussion of the trade treaty. As I have said, it was felt the smaller measures would not take up much time. It was thought advisable to have some of these measures sent to the other house so that they would be available for the consideration of members there when they assembled again, which I believe they are to do to-day. If these smaller measures, if you wish to so describe them, had not been brought forward, there would not have been as much in the way of legislation for immediate consideration in the other house as will now be the case.

The real occasion of delay this session has been the discussion with regard to the two contracts of the defence department. My criticism with respect to that discussion has been, not that there should not be full and ample discussion with respect to these particular measures or with respect to all measures affecting the department of defence, but that there is a time and place for all things. The time and place to discuss these contracts was in the committee of public accounts after they had been referred to the committee and again in this house after the committee had reported. If there had been any objection to referring them, then there would have been ample ground for opposition and discussion, but when the government was ready to refer them, the discussion that took place was I think completely unwarranted in the circumstances.

The leader of the opposition says that we have held back certain legislation. He referred to one measure which was important and which he says should have come on before this, the resolution with respect to the setting up of a defence purchasing board. That resolution was placed on the order paper on February 7, just a month ago. The intention of the government was to bring in the measure with respect to the defence purchasing board the minute we were through with the trade agreement, which we regarded as being the most important measure of all. That has been our intention all along. There would have been ample opportunity during the debate on that measure to discuss all questions relating to contracts of the defence department and hon. members knew that when they were debating the motions to refer specific contracts to the public accounts committee. The house chose to discuss those particular references when we might have been going on with government business had we not been thus precluded. We regarded the resolution to set up a defence purchasing board as one of great importance and the only reason why we have not been able to reach this measure before this is the amount of time that has been taken up in discussing other measures, including the two motions respecting a reference of defence contracts to the committee of public accounts.

Let me say this in passing with regard to some of the discussion that has taken place. I do not share the view which seems to be held in some quarters that parliament should cease to be a deliberative assembly, that it is not necessary to have the government informed by hon. members from different parts of Canada of the conditions existing in their constituencies and in their parts of the country or to have public opinion moulded in a deliberative and careful way. I regard parliament as being essentially a forum in which progress can best be made by reasoned discussion, not by snap-hasty judgment and quick decision without any opportunity of weighing the merits of measures pro and con. I regard it as being the one great bulwark that is left to a free democracy to-day, and left only to those countries where parliamentary institutions still exist. These free institutions have been wiped out largely in most parts of the world, but the essence of our parliamentary system of government is the opportunity it affords to discuss very fully the pros and cons of what has taken place or is taking place in each part of the country. Hon. members should be allowed to talk frankly and freely with respect to conditions as they know them in different parts of the country.

My hon. friend has mentioned the discussion of unemployment and other problems. I wonder how a greater facility could have been afforded by the government to every hon. member to discuss unemployment than was afforded during the debate on the address? Hon. members took ample advantage of that opportunity and they gave to the administration their views with regard to the situation as it existed in their parts of the country. There are going to be further opportunities. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition made another extraordinary remark. He said that he did not think that supply was of much concern, that it was something that came up on Friday nights to fill in. I have always thought that the voting of supply was one of the most important of all the functions of parliament. Without supply being voted government itself cannot be carried on. Moreover when supply is being discussed is the time above all times when hon. members have an opportunity to discuss anything they wish, to take up any concrete problem, to discuss any matter of public importance and to take part in debate to an extent which is not afforded to them in like measure at other times. As my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has just mentioned to me, there is not a single resolution on the order paper the main features of which could not be discussed very fully, either when the government was going into supply or when the house was in committee of supply.

The leader of the opposition probably is somewhat new to his office, but if he had the duty of leading the house—I do not think it is at all probable he is likely to have—he would then find that these matters had to be thought out, not as he is accustomed to doing by quick reasoning and snap judgment but rather by looking ahead in connection with the business of the country generally. I see my hon. friend is looking at me rather sharply. I do not know whether I have said something which has offended him. However, he has said something this afternoon to which I wish to refer more particularly.

The leader of the opposition said that I had sought to alarm parliament by talking about war. I do not think any hon. member will find the word "war" mentioned in anything I have said. I did say that I thought there were more important matters which we might be called upon to consider at almost any time and that we would do well to get on with the work of the house. I suppose there is no more difficult position in which a leader of a government can be placed than to know just how far it is advisable to go in warning members of parliament or the country of a situation as it exists, or how far it is wise to remain silent.

I remember last September that members of the Conservative party in this country were pretty strong in their attacks upon myself. They said that knowing that a situation which was coming along was going to be very critical, I should have taken the country more into my confidence and told the people to be prepared for an emergency. As I say, it is a very difficult position in which a leader of an administration is sometimes placed, because one has great responsibility. However, there are ways of seeking to meet it. While one cannot always take the entire house into his confidence, parliament has provided a means of courtesy whereby the leader of the government, should he regard a situation as being serious, may call in the leader of the opposition. I did that with my hon. friend the leader of the opposition since this house opened this year. Some dispatches which I was receiving were of so serious a nature that my colleagues and I felt that they ought to be shown to the leader of the opposition. I asked him if he would come to my room and allow me to show him what the government and I had received with respect to conditions as they were developing in Europe, and what we must be prepared for in the event of matters taking a certain turn. How my hon. friend, in the light of the information he then had, could chide me this afternoon for having made the remark that I did the other day to hon. members with respect to hurrying on with business because we might have some more important matters to consider, I have yet to understand. I say to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition that I question very much if he would have wished to receive dispatches which were more serious than those which I showed to him. Since I showed him the dispatches I did, I have received others, perhaps a little less serious, but nevertheless of a character to cause the government to view with great concern matters which were happening in other parts of the world. I am happy to say that, more particularly in the last day or two, the skies seem to have cleared very considerably. During the earlier period it was still doubtful how the civil war in Spain would end: in all the capitals of Europe there was, I believe, very great fear as to how the situation might develop over the whole of Europe. But certainly, since that situation has cleared up to the extent it has, there has been very great relief in, I believe, all the foreign offices of Europe. I cannot say more than that. I am not going to seek to influence in any way the judgment of this house. What I said the other day I still adhere to as something which I think it was proper I should have given to hon. members, all the circumstances considered.

I might go on and speak of the importance of some other measures, and let me just add this. I have never known an administration to place all of its important legislation on the order paper at once. I have noticed, following business in this parliament during the years I have been in it, that the invariable practice has been not to begin except for special reasons with the most important measures but with some of the minor measures until parliament, so to speak, got under way with its work. Apart from that, the fact that the government has not been holding back important measures is evidenced by the order paper itself, which contains more than one bill that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition says is important. I might add to those mentioned the bill to amend the Pensions Act. That bill has been on the order paper since January 18. The measure I have mentioned, to create a defence purchasing board, has been on the order paper since February 7. Another important bill, a measure of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, has stood there since February 10, and the resolution with respect to the loan under the consolidated revenue act has been on the paper since February 3. It is simply childish to speak about the government's business not being important because the order paper is not laden up with measures which there is no possibility of reaching at the present time, and which would be kept there and called day after day, taking up space on the order paper and the time of parliament in the calling of measures which it is known cannot be reached for some little time to come. I hold that the government has evidenced full circumspection as respects both the business of the house and the consideration shown private members. I am not surprised, however, that my friend the leader of the opposition, feels it necessary to seek to make out some sort of case for himself and his following with respect to the amount of time they have been responsible for wasting this session.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): I shall not take up very much more of the time of the house. I notice that, although the right hon. gentleman has a habit of lecturing us on how much of the time of the house we occupy, he talked on this occasion a good deal longer than I did, and dragged in a lot of extraneous subjects which have no bearing on this matter, besides reading me a lecture as to how I should lead the opposition. The right hon. gentleman led oppositions for quite a long time and perhaps he knows something about them. At the same time I am afraid I shall have to follow my own course as to how I shall lead the opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think we shall have to form a leadership league.

Mr. MANION: I agreed, and so stated as soon as I got up, with going on with government business, and I suggested that the government bring forward business of some importance.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What could be more important than the trade treaty?

Mr. MANION: We have been dealing with the trade treaty, but the right hon. gentleman has been shelving it for other measures. We have been led to understand since the house opened that they were about to bring in a measure for a defence purchasing board. Why have they not brought it on?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I dealt with that.

Mr. MANION: The right hon. gentleman objects to our discussing the Bren gun contract and this other munition contract which stink to high heaven of favouritism and patronage. As he objected to that, so he would have objected if we had brought forward the matter while discussing the defence purchasing board; he would have said that as these matters were to be referred to a committee we would have no right to discuss them. His tactics are to draw a red herring across the trail. That is what he did the other day with regard to this supposedly terribly critical world situation—a situation no more critical than it has been for months and months, but he knew that by so doing he would distract attention from the fact that he had not given any answer to the question whether he supported the idea of giving to pets and favourites of the government these high-priced munitions contracts.

In regard to the business, I read a list of government business which has been dealt with, and a list of private members' resolutions, and I repeat that the private members' resolutions have to do with much more important business than anything with which the government has dealt this session.

I merely wish before I sit down to touch one other point. The right hon. gentleman has told the house and the country that he did me the honour of calling me in to see some dispatches from overseas. He did call me in about six weeks ago, on January 20, some four months after the September crisis. I noticed that at the time of the September crisis in England, the Chamberlain government called in the leader of the opposition and the leaders of all the parties. He even invited Mr. Churchill, who is not the leader of any party: Mr. Chamberlain called them all in. But the right hon. gentleman waits four months before calling me in or calling on any of the rest of us, although the country was facing a crisis which might at any time have led to war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to the hon. gentleman that at the time of the September crisis he was not the leader of the opposition, and he had not a seat in this house?

Mr. MANION: I was leader of the Conservative party at that time. My hon. friend the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Woodsworth) was at that time the leader of his party and was a member of this house. The leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Blackmore) was in exactly the same position. In England it was not necessary that a man should be the leader of a party; he was called in if he was a person of prominence in the country. At that time I was leader of the Conservative party. I will now say what I intended to say on some other occasion when the question of the September crisis comes up to be discussed —and I think it should be discussed in the near future; I hope the right hon. gentleman will bring it forward as early as he likes. What I intended to say was that the right hon. gentleman neglected his duty to this country in not calling in the leaders of all parties. He should have invited the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, the leader of the Social Credit party and myself; we should all have been called in, to share the responsibility if for nothing else. In that regard I was fairer to him than he was to me. I played the game fairly and well as a Canadian and offered no criticism at that time. But he waits until January 20— I give the date from memory, but I think I am right. He called me in one day and showed me some of the dispatches. He has not called me in since. I know his tactics: he wanted to be able to stand up in this house and say that on one occasion he called me in. That is his slippery way. I know his tactics, his slippery tactics; I know them just as well as he knows my tactics.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: The word "slippery", used by the hon. gentleman, is unparliamentary and should be withdrawn.

Mr. MANION: I withdraw the word "slippery," but I cannot think of any other word that takes its place.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member to withdraw the word unqualifiedly.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the word.

As regards his leadership of the house, the right hon. gentleman has made quite a little speech to us this afternoon on the painful duties which fall to him in leading the house. But he does not lead the house. The right hon. gentleman has not been in this house ten per cent of the time this session. That is how much he has led the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I made the statement quite clearly, I think, in a previous debate that, having the duties which I have as Prime Minister, I have many things to attend to as well as to follow the debates in the house. I can follow debates in Hansard. I cannot in this chamber attend to many all important matters and follow the debates at the same time; I made it clear that I would be in my seat whenever the question hour was called and when there were matters under discussion for which it was expected I would be here. Hon. members will realize that I must have some time while parliament is in session, apart altogether from the House of Commons, to attend to the duties which belong to the office of prime minister. I made that perfectly clear, and my hon. friend knows that I cannot be expected to be in my seat here all the time. I have able colleagues who are responsible for their different departments and matters relative thereto. I may say that, in being here part of the time, and being part of the time out of the house in attending to the business of the country as prime minister, I am only following the example of those who lead the government in Great Britain as they have led it for many years past.

Mr. MANION: I point out again that the right hon. gentleman has not been in this house more than, on an average, about fifteen minutes a day. He stays until question time and then goes out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not leave this house one hour while the debate was on with respect to the defence matter. I was here throughout all the time of discussions. Nor did I leave the house during the great part of the time of the debate on the trade treaty and the debate on the address. Whenever I knew that an hon. gentleman opposite who had been a member of a former administration was to speak, I have tried to be here in order to pay him that respect, and whenever I thought the leader of the opposition would be here and would have something to say which he might wish to direct to the attention of the government, I have sought to be present to hear his remarks. I intend to follow precisely that practice from now on.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): May I be allowed to say just a word to bring back the question to our domestic affairs instead of international matters. While this discussion was going on I sent for the Hansard of the session of 1932-33, after the empire conference at Ottawa, when there had been a very important agreement which might be compared to the one that is before the house at the present time. On that occasion the session was called earlier for the purpose of having parliament ratify that agreement. As a matter of fact we were called to meet on October 6, 1932, and on October 12 the then prime minister moved the ratification of that agreement. The house sat continuously discussing the agreement and the division on the third reading took place on November 22. The house discussed the agreement continuously, and, as I have said, the session had been called earlier for that purpose. No other business was taken up or discussed, and I may say that the then opposition rather cooperated with the government for the purpose of bringing the debate to a close.

An hon. MEMBER: What?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Well, the dates are there. After one month of discussion the third reading of the various agreements took place. Now, however, we find that the house has been in session almost two months, since the beginning of January. The trade treaty is not even in committee; it is being discussed on the resolution. We have not been able to make any progress with it.

I agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) when he protests against the comments of those outside the house who claim that parliament is doing nothing when discussing the trade agreement. Those leadership leaguers should understand that on very important business such as this, parliament not only has the right but it has the duty to discuss everything that is relevant—and that is doing the business of the country. When members of the house are discussing the treaty they are doing the business of the country, and it is therefore useless to publish a blank space and indicate underneath that parliament has done nothing. Surely, however, an end must be reached in the discussion of the trade treaty as well as in any other discussion, and I say with all due deference to my hon. friend that while he protests against the statements of Mr. McCullagh and the other gentleman who criticized parliament about the business that is being carried on, he gives them material by helping to some extent to prevent the business of the house being done.

The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) the other day, when Wednesdays were taken by the government, said—and he was right—that the government is always in control of the house; the government can always control the business of the house. That is what the Prime Minister wants to do to-day, and surely the leadership leaguers ought to be pleased to think that he wishes to take all the time of parliament to carry on the business of the country.

So far as supply is concerned, I hardly think that my hon. friend is serious when he says that it is merely a matter of routine which is taken up on Friday when the house has nothing else to do. Supply, the voting of money for public business, is the main work of parliament, and as the Prime Minister has said, with respect to every one of the resolutions on the order paper, the subject involved may be discussed in supply. The leader of the opposition says that there is unemployment in Canada and that we have not been able to discuss it. Well, there are items in the estimates relating to unemployment which are there for the very purpose of curing unemployment. If the estimates are prevented from being reached and supply cannot be voted and unemployment cannot be discussed, surely under such circumstances it is not the fault of the government.

Mr. MANION: We have practically never refused to allow the government to get into supply—practically never.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We could not go on. We wanted to have the trade treaty disposed of, and surely it was only the natural and normal thing. It had been announced that the main business of the session, the business which it would be the first duty of parliament to deal with, would be that trade treaty. Under the circumstances I do not believe that there can be any objection to the motion being carried. No one would suffer in consequence of the government taking every day to dispose of the business of the country, and private members will certainly have every necessary opportunity to ventilate any grievances they may have.

Mr. WALSH: I do not want to delay the proceedings unnecessarily—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. WALSH: If that is the tenor of the house I am willing to sit down.

Motion (Mr. Mackenzie King) agreed to.

SUDETEN IMMIGRANTS

SETTLEMENT IN CANADA OF FAMILIES FROM CZECHOSLOVAKIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River): I wish to direct a series of questions to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), on the basis of an announcement by officials of that department to the effect that some 2,500 refugees from Czechoslovakia are to be established in the Peace River and in northern Saskatchewan.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is a question that ought to be put on the order paper.

Mr. PELLETIER: I believe the minister promised to answer the questions.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may proceed if there is an agreement with the minister.

Mr. PELLETIER: The questions are: (a) Has the minister been in contact with the various provincial governments concerned? (b) Are such statements allegedly made by high departmental officials to be considered government policy? (c) Under what authority will the government establish these settlers on provincial lands?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): The hon. member advised me a short time before the sitting that he intended to ask this question. As far as I am aware, no official of the immigration branch has made any statement such as that upon which he bases his question. I shall have to check up on this and will endeavour to give an answer to-morrow, but of course if I am correct in my statement, and I think I am, then the rest of his question falls to the ground.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Is the minister in a position to answer the question which I directed to the government yesterday, namely, whether or not the department intends to place the responsibility for the settlement of families from the Sudeten area of Czechoslovakia upon the colonization departments of the railway companies?

Mr. CRERAR: Unfortunately I was indisposed yesterday and not present in the house, but my attention was drawn shortly before the opening of the sitting to the question that the hon. member for Vancouver North asked yesterday. I shall look into it and hope to make a statement to the house in reply to-morrow.

VALIDITY OF ALBERTA STATUTE

INQUIRY AS TO DISALLOWANCE OF PROVINCIAL MEASURE RESPECTING MORTGAGES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. E. LAWSON (York South): On February 16 the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), in reply to a question put by me, intimated that we might anticipate an announcement from his department as to allowance or disallowance of certain Alberta legislation. Will the minister kindly indicate now when we may expect the announcement?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. KUHL: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I did not know I was out of order.

Mr. KUHL: The point of order is that if we are governing ourselves according to the British North America Act, in my opinion this house is not competent and has not authority to discuss the disallowance of provincial legislation. To substantiate my point I should like to quote a few sentences from sessional paper 116 of 1876.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. KUHL: This is since the passing of the British North America Act.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. There is no point of order in this.

Mr. KUHL: Yes, Mr. Speaker, this is a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point of order is not well taken. I do not think the hon. member can raise this question now.

Mr. KUHL: The point of order is that the house has not authority to discuss this matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not a proper way to raise the question.

Mr. KUHL: In what way has this house authority to discuss this matter?

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the point of order is well taken. If the question raised by the hon. member is to be discussed, it should be in some other manner.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The point of order being disposed of, I wish to tell my hon. friend who asked the question that I am very busy just now in preparing to give him a definite answer in a very few days.

RADIO BROADCASTING

METHOD OF APPOINTING RADIO LICENCE VENDORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Yesterday the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) asked me to make a statement with reference to any changes in the collection of radio licence fees. Having looked over the file I find a letter addressed to myself from J. R. Bowler, general secretary of the Canadian Legion, and copy of a circular sent out by Mr. Bowler to all branches of his legion setting out the agreement arrived at between the committee of returned men and the officers of my department in this connection. The memorandum makes it quite clear that there is no change in the method of collection other than that all house to house canvassers shall be returned soldiers. It was emphasized by the legion and by the officers of my department that it was not thought wise to make any change other than that, having in mind the responsibility of the Department of Transport to collect the funds required by the radio broadcasting corporation and the responsibility of the legion in recommending house to house canvassers.

I may say that only about thirty-four per cent of radio licence fees are collected by house to house canvassers, about twenty per cent are collected by dealers, and the rest is collected largely through the post offices. That being the case it has been the practice since 1932 to ask members of parliament to organize their ridings as to the number of house to house canvassers required. That practice has been maintained through the years, and discussion with the returned men indicated that they did not wish to change the practice.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister says that since 1932 members of parliament have been asked to organize their ridings in reference to the matter. I know of nothing like that.

Mr. LAWSON: Nor I.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the minister mean present members of parliament on the government side and defeated Liberal candidates?

Mr. HOWE: I think it is customary for the head of a department to call for the advice of members of parliament who are like-minded with himself.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are the defeated Liberal candidates in the constituencies responsible? In my constituency returned soldiers are being directed to the defeated candidate in the last campaign. I have never been consulted.

Mr. SPEAKER: Orders of the day.

Mr. MacNEIL: It is a fair question.

Mr. MANION: Is there any change in the percentage allowed to the collectors?

Mr. HOWE: None whatever. It was set somewhat higher in 1932, reduced to the present level in 1933, and there has been no change since.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST VANCOUVER IN GRAIN SHIPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler). According to a news item appearing in the Vancouver Province of March 2, a direct charge has been made by the mayor of Vancouver that the dominion government, through the wheat board, has discriminated against Vancouver by ordering grain shipments to move east instead of west. In view of the seriousness of the matter to the Pacific coast ports, I think some statement should be made by the minister.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I should like to make my reply to that question just as emphatic as possible. Perhaps it is unnecessary to say that the government never at any time interferes with the operations of the wheat board, either with regard to purchases or sales or the manner in which the wheat shall go forward to the markets of the world. I asked the chairman of the board as to this charge and he says that there is absolutely no favouritism in regard to routing the grain, that it is routed eastward or westward according as it is to the financial interest of the board and of the country.

TABLING OF WEEKLY REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) asked the other day that the weekly auditors' reports of the wheat board be, not laid on the table, but placed among the sessional papers so that they might be examined by members of the house. He advanced as a reason for his request that this was done last year and therefore should be done this year. I stated yesterday that while that was the practice last year it was only during the period when there was really no wheat for sale; and that now, since wheat is for sale, the practice has been discontinued. Perhaps I might read into the record what was said last year. The then leader of the opposition, Right Hon. Mr. Bennett, had asked on March 3 that there should be deposited with the clerk of sessional papers the weekly auditors' report of the operations of the wheat board. I replied on March 14 as follows:

On March 3 last the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) requested that there should be deposited with the clerk of sessional papers the weekly auditors' report of the operations of the wheat board. These reports have now been received from October 12, 1935 to February 24, 1938, and will be so deposited to-day. As each report is received from week to week it also will be deposited. Perhaps I should say that the time might conceivably arise when it would no longer be advisable to follow this practice.

I should like to direct attention to the fact that during the period when these reports were placed in the sessional papers, the board was not buying wheat. At that time we had a regulation providing that unless wheat fell below ninety cents a bushel none should be purchased, and the board did not acquire any wheat. At the present time, however, the board is purchasing and selling wheat, and in accordance with the practice followed prior to the time when no wheat was being purchased, we have not given out the information, believing, with the chairman of the board, that it was not in the public interest to give details as to the purchases and sales of wheat by the wheat board.

Mr. PERLEY: In reply to the minister's statement—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PERLEY: I think I am in order. This is a matter of considerable importance.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman may not ask questions except with the consent of the minister.

Mr. EULER: I have no objection to answering a question.

Mr. PERLEY: I should like to ask whether it is not a fact that while the 1935 wheat board was taking wheat from the farmers there was a report made of the sales, the amounts on hand, and so on, and whether that report was not made public.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. PERLEY: And the amount on hand at the end of each week.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is not the proper time for a discussion of this kind.

Mr. PERLEY: I do not know when we are going to get a proper time for this discussion.

Mr. EULER: I suggest that my hon. friend put his question on the order paper, and he will receive an answer.

PENITENTIARIES

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION WITH POWERS OF ADMINISTRATION AND CONTROL

The house resumed from Friday, March 3, consideration in committee of Bill No. 34, respecting penitentiaries—Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East)—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 10—Appointments of wardens, etc.; salaries.

Mr. CHURCH: I understand that this commission is to be under the control and management of the minister himself; that is, it is to be a departmental commission under the minister. This section is the same as section 20 of the old act, and I should like to ask the minister what is being done in order to obtain guards, deputy wardens and wardens of the proper type. You cannot learn this business in a day. The warden and deputy warden are the chief officers, and in the absence of the warden the deputy takes his place. Is any system proposed for the training of these men, or will they just be brought in from their private occupations to act as wardens, deputy wardens and so on, and have their salaries fixed by the commission?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If my hon. friend refers to the new system we want to inaugurate, the guards who will be appointed by the commission will have to undergo training and will be appointed only after their qualifications have been fully approved and recognized. Then they will be given the opportunity to show their capacity, their character, their ability to manage, and so on, and the intention is that deputy wardens and wardens will be appointed from among the men who have made good in the various services of the penitentiaries.

Up to the present nothing of this kind has existed. I know how difficult it has been in the past for ministers of justice to find the best possible men to put at the head of the various penitentiaries. When men already in the service could be appointed, after they had proved that they could assume the responsibility, they usually were appointed. Otherwise it is a difficult task for the authorities to find the best available men. As a matter of fact at the present time there are one or two vacancies, and I have the various officers of the department at work trying to find the best possible men to appoint. I believe that with the system which will be organized it will be possible to obtain trained men. It is even the intention to have a training school under the commission—of course on a smaller scale—such as they have in England, which has proved to be such a valuable institution in furninshing men qualified to administer penitentiaries.

Mr. CHURCH: In other words we may expect that the old system will be followed; that people will be appointed by the governor in council as wardens and deputy wardens with no training for the work except what they may learn by experience.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No.

Mr. CHURCH: Yes, they will have to learn in practice by experience, as they have in the past.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My statement was exactly to the contrary.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to go just a little further in reference to the appointment of guards and others mentioned in subsection 1 and referred to again in subsection 2. Do I understand from what the minister says that it will be the intention in Canada to follow the system which has been established in the old country?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is what we have in view. That is the purpose I have in mind in having this change effected, and I think my hon. friend will agree that if we succeed in doing so, it will be a great improvement.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am heartily in accord with it, if that is the intention, because it means that somewhere, probably in one of the penitentiaries, the commission will set up a school in which those who may wish to become guards, sub-wardens and so on may undergo thorough inspection, training and education. Then these men will be selected, not for permanent appointments but for trial?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I believe that system has been found very satisfactory in the old country, where I understand they have one school, at Wakefield. So I am to take it that in Canada the intention is to follow that system, which really takes the appointment of guards, deputy wardens and wardens out of the political sphere?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Absolutely.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am heartily in accord with anything along that line, because in the old country politics are wiped out, as far as I could ascertain, in everything connected with prisons.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to say a few words in opposition to the procedure adopted by the government with respect to this section. The government has decided to appoint a commission, responsible to the minister and parliament, to administer the penitentiaries. The other day, speaking to the committee, the minister said, in effect, that when appointed the committee would be composed of individuals in whom the people of Canada could have complete confidence.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is my hope.

Mr. MacINNIS: And that they would not be selected because of political bias. I am sure every hon. member appreciates that statement, and I believe the commission will be as the minister has suggested. In my opinion no one should have a greater desire than the minister that the commission be composed of men of the best possible type. But it seems to me the government is making a mistake when, after appointing a commission responsible to the government, it then undertakes to appoint wardens, deputy wardens and other administrative or executive officers who must operate under the commission. I suggest that the appointment of the wardens, and the wardens only, might be left with the commission. As the commission is responsible to the government for the administration of the penitentiaries I think it should be permitted to select the persons directly under it. But with the exception of the wardens, all the other employees in the penitentiaries should be appointed by the civil service commission.

I see no reason why we should set up a civil service commission and then leave appointments to other persons. Let me quote the words of the present Prime Minister on this subject, when he was leader of the opposition. On March 30, 1933, the then leader of the opposition was speaking to a resolution which had been introduced by the former minister of justice with respect to the appointment of penitentiary officials by the governor in council, a provision similar to that now before the committee. The right hon. gentleman is reported in Hansard for 1932-33 at page 3544, as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, this resolution involves the introduction of a bill which means a departure from the merit system and a return to the discredited patronage system with respect to appointments in connection with the penitentiaries of our country. In a word, it will make political machines out of the penitentiaries, and I want therefore to take very strong exception, at the very outset, to the passage of this resolution.

I submit that that is strong language from the present Prime Minister. But he went farther, and said:

> To begin with it will have an unsettling effect upon the whole civil service of Canada. If this important branch of the civil service is to be withdrawn from the operation of the Civil Service Act, and the control of the Civil Service Commission, it will be but the thin edge of the wedge, the introduction, in other words, of a policy on the part of the administration to withdraw other services from the control of the Civil Service Act. Hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, I believe, at the time provisions of the Civil Service Act were extended to cover some of the outside services, and they will recollect the difficulty there was in getting the measure through the house and the necessity of backing up their efforts by strong public opinion throughout Canada.

And then he goes on:

> I said that before, some time ago, and what has happened since bears out the truth of my statement. That a group of gentlemen, none of whom has any special training or the expert knowledge required in determining the qualifications of a warden of a penitentiary, should undertake such appointments, is a course of procedure certainly open to question.

It is only fair to add that with respect to the appointment of wardens he went on to say:

> All things considered I believe that concerning important technical positions requiring certain special personal and other qualifications, the minister himself is perhaps better able than the commission to make appointments. . . . I just wish to stress at the outset what has been recognized by the press of all political parties since the resolution appeared on the order paper to be a distinct step backwards and a great misfortune. I was hoping the minister was going to allow the resolution to remain on the order paper until the close of the session, since it had been there already for so long a time.

I believe the leader of the opposition of that day was on strong ground. It is my opinion that this government would be making a mistake if it were to adopt the section as it now stands.

As I said before, I believe the appointment of wardens should be left to the commission, but that deputy wardens, other administrative or executive officers and all other employees in the penitentiaries should be appointed by the civil service commission. I hope the minister will take these points into consideration before the bill receives third reading, with a view to bringing in an amendment along these lines.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): As my hon. friend and members of the committee know, I was in charge of the Department of Justice between 1923 and 1930. During that time all the appointments to the penitentiaries and in the penitentiary branch were under the civil service commission. Speaking in the house in 1925, I said the following, as reported at page 1284 of Hansard:

I am responsible for what happens in the penitentiaries of Canada at the present time. I am responsible if there are evasions; I am responsible if there is a rebellion in a penitentiary anywhere; and I think it is not fair that the wardens and the deputy wardens, the main officers, and even the guards in the penitentiaries, should be selected under a system of competitive examination. It is absurd. I think that penitentiary work should be compared with the work of the mounted police or even of the militia. In the penitentiary the work that is to be done by the guards, and very often their lives are in jeopardy, depends for its success more on the character and the temperament of the man than on what they may happen to know about geography or arithmetic or anything else. This conviction I have formed during the year and a half in which I have been at the head of the administration of the Department of Justice. I believe in control by the Civil Service Commission when it is a case of appointments in connection with ordinary departmental work, but I do not think they are qualified to select the men to conduct the penitentiaries.

Up until 1930 while I was Minister of Justice no change was made in the system of appointments. Three years after he had taken charge of the department, my predecessor in office, Hon. Mr. Guthrie, introduced legislation for the purpose of taking away from the civil service commission the appointments to the penitentiaries. That is the law as it exists to-day. My hon. friend has read what the then leader of the opposition said, but he should also read my words when I spoke on that bill. I supported the bill because I thought Mr. Guthrie was right in taking charge of the appointments to the penitentiaries. This is work of a special character, comparable to the work of the mounted police, or even the army. However, I objected to that part of the bill which dealt with the stenographers and clerks employed in the branch, and Mr. Guthrie agreed to change the bill and not apply its provisions to those engaged in clerical work. If my hon. friend turns to page 3652 of the Hansard from which he has just read, he will find that my leader agreed with what I had stated. He approved the bill as it referred to wardens, deputy wardens and those in charge of convicts in the penitentiaries.

One has only to consider the matter to realize that this is not something which could be done by the civil service commission. As I said the other day, the Minister of Justice is responsible when things go wrong in that difficult branch of the department. Under the new system which I want to establish, the permanent officers will have to go through a training period, as I told the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). They will then become specialized in their work and the prison commission will be in charge of appointments. The appointment of wardens and deputy wardens will be kept under the governor in council, but no appointment will be made without the recommendation of the commission. I would have no objection to adding those words to section 10 if it is thought desirable that they should be added.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I wish to congratulate the minister upon introducing this bill. I find myself in agreement with section 10, but I should like the minister to explain what procedure would be taken in case a complaint was laid against a deputy warden, for instance. How would that be handled if the appointment were made by the civil service commission, and how would it be handled under the section as it now reads?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): An investigation would be made by the commission.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Under section 10, if a complaint were laid against a deputy warden, the minister would have to deal with it directly?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Under section 10 the governor in council appoints wardens and deputy wardens, but under other sections of the bill the commission would have to do with administration, discipline and other matters.

Mr. LANDERYOU: If the deputy warden were appointed by the civil service commission, the complaint would have to go to them.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, and I do not know what experience they would have.

Miss MACPHAIL: If the minister is willing, I should like to have the words "on the recommendation of the commission" inserted. I am quite sure that the desire of the minister is to have the commission recommend appointments from their own trained employees to the positions of warden and deputy warden.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move that section 10, line 33, be amended by inserting after the word "may" the words "on the recommendation of the commission approved by the minister."

Mr. CHURCH: This amendment would lead to dual control and dual authority, one of the things condemned by the report of the commission. The warden or deputy warden will say, "I have no power, I am interfered with or overruled by the governor in council or by the commission." It will lead to confusion and a division of authority, which is a bad thing in institutions such as these. There should be someone in absolute control. If the governor in council is to have certain powers and the commission other powers, it will not work out. There should be someone in absolute control. It is the only way you can have efficiency and economy.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is practically no change from the law as it was approved by my hon. friend. The only change in this section is the one suggested by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail), which I have accepted. The only change in section 11 is from "superintendent" to "commission." I do not see how there can be any complaint.

Mr. BROOKS: I understood the minister to say he was following the English system. Are the wardens and deputy wardens appointed by the commission in Great Britain, or by some other department of the government?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I think in a general way the employees of the penitentiaries are appointed by the prison commission. I do not know whether the wardens are appointed by the home office or by the king in council, but I shall find out.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not satisfied with the amendment. If that is all the minister will concede, we shall have to take it and be thankful for that much; but there is a principle involved which I cannot overlook. Whether the appointment is made with or without the approval of the commission, it will be, as the section now stands, a political appointment.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Oh.

Mr. MacINNIS: If the minister recommends somebody, I can hardly conceive of the commission refusing to accept the person recommended. I do not think the minister can conceive of the commission saying that they will not have a person who has been recommended by the governor in council.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My friend then will find, if he has that in mind, that I am a pretty weak minister. I would advise him to go to the head of the mounted police and ask him if I as minister in control of the force ever asked him to appoint one man upon the force.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have not said that the minister has.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The hon. member said it would be a political appointment.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not. I was referring to what is in the bill. The bill says that the wardens are to be appointed by the governor general in council; and the governor general in council, in this case, will be acting on the advice of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: Well then, the Minister of Justice will make the appointment, and so I do not see the commission saying—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My hon. friend does not need to get excited.

Mr. MacINNIS: When the minister says that I say things which I have not said, I have a right to get excited.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The hon. member said it would be a political appointment, and I deny it again.

Mr. MacINNIS: I still say it will be a political appointment.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I still say the hon. member is wrong.

Mr. MacINNIS: The position will not be advertised. Only a small number can know that an appointment is being made. That small number will be restricted to a certain political party, and the rest of the community, where there may be just as much talent, just as much ability, will have no opportunity to make application for these positions. That is the principle involved, and that is why I insist that this should be under the civil service commission. As I look across to the government side of the house, I see a number of members who rose in their places in 1933 and denounced the bill as introduced by the former minister of justice. I should like to see them get up now and state their position as they stated it then.

Mr. MacNICOL: I feel disposed to support the clause, having heard the minister say that the intention of the department is to follow the custom now followed in the old country. I suppose it will take some little time to work it out. I am now going to speak of it as it has been in operation. I took particular interest in it while I was at Leeds, and also—and particularly—at Barlinnie prison, at Glasgow. The acting warden then in charge at Barlinnie had been deputy warden at Wakefield, and during his term of office at Wakefield had been in charge of the school. I went to particular pains to learn how the appointments were made, and whether they were in any way political, and he assured me that so far as he knew they were absolutely non-political. If a position becomes vacant in any prison, the authorities—I assume, the home office—are notified at once. Having ascertained that a position is to be filled, the home office would then communicate, as I understood, with the person in charge of the school.

Although I may be wrong, not being very familiar with that kind of administration, the inference I drew was that the appointments were wholly non-political, made on recommendation of the authorities at Wakefield, and from the school at Wakefield officers were sent hither and thither to all the prisons of England. If I am in error in that assumption perhaps the minister can correct me. If that system is followed I cannot see that there is anything political about appointments. That is what the deputy warden told me: he got his own appointment without any political pull. He had no politics; he had been trained in the school, graduated therefrom, obtained a position and worked his way up in a certain number of years to be deputy warden of one of the chief prisons of the old country. Personally I am strong for civil service commission control, but I do not see how it could control this. The administration recruits are to come from a school which the government is to set up for the training of all these officials who are required.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Exactly.

Mr. MacNICOL: If that is followed out here with the same purpose they have in the old land, it cannot fail to render satisfaction.

Mr. MacINNIS: When the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) compares the civil service in Great Britain with the civil service in Canada he is comparing two things which are not comparable, because political patronage has entirely disappeared from the civil service in Great Britain. Sir Francis Floud, when he appeared before the civil service committee last year, made the statement in answer to a question that a recommendation from a member of parliament would be an obstacle rather than an aid to the securing of a position in the civil service. This afternoon we heard a minister say that appointments in a certain department were to be made on the recommendation not of a member of parliament but of a candidate who had been defeated, in whom the electors of the constituency had showed they had no confidence. He is the person who in certain cases will make appointments. It was drawn to my attention last year in the house that the recommendation of an hon. member in another province carried far more weight than that of the elected member in the constituency in which the appointment was to be made. I heard the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) say that this could not be done under the civil service commission. There was a civil service committee appointed in 1921. An attempt was made at that time to take some of these classes from under the civil service commission, and the then superintendent of penitentiaries, General W. S. Hughes, was a witness before the committee. In reply to a query by a cabinet minister as to whether he would prefer to have the selections made by the civil service commission rather than by himself, General Hughes said:

> I would prefer they would do it, very much.
> Q. Why?
> A. Under the system in which they appoint them, it gives our warden practically full control over them, because it gives our warden an opportunity to see whether they are satisfactory to him or not, and if they are not he has only to let them go. Under the old system, if we were saddled with a bad man we would have to keep him. We had no power to dismiss him.

I am not saying that the minister would interfere with the dismissal of a man whom the commission found unsatisfactory, and I am not saying that if we had the machinery they have developed in Great Britain for these appointments, the suggestions made would not be all to the good. But we have not that machinery. Political appointments are made in all departments, and unless we provide that these appointments shall be made by the civil service commission, they will continue to be made politically, no matter what the minister or anyone else may say.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Perhaps I should rather keep silent. My hon. friend likes always to have the final word. But may I tell him that, even though the civil service commission in England is the perfect instrument he says it is, these appointments are not made by that commission. Appointments of prison officers are made by the prison commission. So that the argument of my hon. friend falls to the ground.

With regard to the former bill of 1933, the system which we shall have is quite different, because the superintendent will not be merely an officer in contact with the minister, and no evil-minded person will be able to suggest that the minister exercises influence over him. That will all be changed. The members of the board will be appointed for ten years. They will be independent of the government and will be responsible for the making of appointments. My hon. friend says that if there is a recommendation to dismiss an employee the minister may exercise some influence over the commission.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): What did the hon. member say?

Mr. MacINNIS: I have tried to tell the minister what my opinion is.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The superintendent of penitentiaries is here and I can assure my hon. friend that I have never attempted to interfere, and never will, with any recommendation of the superintendent for the dismissal of an officer by reason of bad conduct or anything else, apart from signing and approving the report. My hon. friend is wrong when he thinks of his fellow men, whether they be ministers of the crown or other persons, as having always some evil design or as being always willing to work only for party advantage. I may tell him that he is wrong. More than that, this is intended exactly for the purpose of removing the administration and management of the prisons of Canada as far as possible from any control by party government. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should put so many obstacles in my way. I am trying to organize a reform that has been asked for by many people in Canada, many reformers, and I had not expected him to put so many obstacles in the way.

Mr. CHURCH: The whole plan of this reform for the control of these institutions hinges on the principle involved in subsections 1 and 2 of section 10. It seems to me we are getting merely the form and not the substance of real prison reform. In the first place the key men in the penitentiaries will be those appointed by the commission. The men who will actually be in control of human beings are to be appointed by the commission. On the other hand, we have the governor in council, and the governor in council is always regarded as a political agency. I do not say that it will be so in respect of the present Minister of Justice, but under section 10 the appointment will be made by the governor general in council on the recommendation of the commission. The commission will be a lot of figureheads with power merely to recommend the heads and chiefs. Who are the key men the governor in council appoints? They are the wardens, deputy wardens and other administrative officers, including, I suppose, teachers and medical officers, bookkeepers and technical men. They are to be appointed by the government on recommendation of the commission. The governor in council will be in Ottawa, the commission will be in Ottawa, while the men really at the head of the institution will be on the scene of battle. In my opinion the proposal before us will lead to inefficiency, lack of responsibility, divided control and lack of proper supervision of these institutions.

The 800 men in Kingston penitentiary, for example, will be regulated and drilled by officers appointed by the commission. In other words, you will have an agency up here appointing key men whose duty it will be to maintain control over 800 men in that institution. It seems to me that the whole bill is top heavy and will soon be on its way to be upside down. I have had a great deal of experience with commissions of various kinds and I know very well what difficulties and complications are going to be met with under this bill when the commission is set up. Mr. Brockington was before a radio committee of the house the other day and he intimated that he was beyond the control of parliament and could do as he liked over the head of parliament. In the same way, if you pass section 10 of this bill, you can say good-bye to any further control by parliament of our penal institutions for the next twenty-five years, and we who sit here will be responsible twenty years from now if we find by that time there has been no progress or no substantial reform has been introduced. The same policy that has been pursued in connection with the radio commission, the railway commission and similar bodies will operate here, and you will find that this commission will be top heavy. It is going to be a sort of regular standing army with its key men, guards, teachers, mechanics and others who will be actually in charge of the inmates, and to these commissioners we are going to hand over powers which we have never dreamed of giving to our judges. These officers will be able to make rules and regulations which even a judge presiding outside in a court of justice cannot promulgate, and to give to these rules and regulations the force of statutes.

The policy itself has been condemned by the court of appeal of the province. Without this parliament's knowledge or consent, these officers and warden's courts may extend a man's term and impose penalties which even the judge who sentenced the prisoner had not the power to impose. Yet we sit here handing over to a commission of this sort the power to appoint a certain class of men to these important positions. It reminds me of Coxey's army, with all the array of brass hats. Everybody of importance will be a general or a brigadier or a brass hat, appointed by the governor in council. When it comes to the men on the ground, the captains, the lieutenants, the sergeants and the corporals, they will be appointed by some gentlemen known as the commission; and when any trouble arises in the west one of the commissioners, I presume, will travel with a staff and retinue, all over the country, just as if he were in the army, and with no results.

Nothing is said in this bill about reclamation and prevention. We all know what prevention in hygiene and medicine and public health have done; yet in this most important piece of legislation dealing with such an important problem, no provision is being made to reclaim the inmates of our penitentiaries or to prevent crime, nor are there any prevention measures in it. The hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) the other day spoke words of wisdom when he discussed certain conditions in our penitentiaries. He dealt with the social and medical problem in its relation to public health, and what he had to say in that regard might well be heeded by the minister. The minister is a gentleman in whom I have the utmost confidence and whom I respect, and I would rather see him in control. Let him appoint the superintendent and the other important officers himself and retain control. I think it would be far better. In England the Home Secretary has a central board, and he gives these people a free hand. This section may have been drafted by lawyers, but you are just divesting yourself forever of any authority.

Miss MACPHAIL: My understanding is that although the bill before us is voluminous, what it really sets out to do is to set up a commission which will have charge of the penitentiaries of Canada and which, after some experience and due consideration, will move as rapidly as possible to carry out as many of the eighty-eight recommendations made by the royal commission as they think feasible.

I agree with the Minister of Justice that in this particular the commissioners are much better able than any other person to judge whether men who have been guards are going to make good deputy wardens or good wardens. No civil service commission can know whether a certain man handles men well and another man does not; there is nothing in the examination which will show that. But the commission which is in charge and in complete control of all the penal institutions in Canada will know whether the person it is recommending will make a good deputy warden or a good warden. I happen to know that already, before this bill is passed, the government or the Minister of Justice has gone a long way to have chosen by a competent man guards from various penitentiaries who will soon be given special training, the first of them at Wakefield, and then after a time there will be a school set up here for the training of guards. So that actually the appointments to be made in the first place will be in the lowest category, people who are coming in from the bottom, and they will have to work themselves up to the top. Of course many guards will never become deputy wardens or wardens. But I agree entirely with the Minister of Justice in the matter, and I think it is unfortunate that in order to appoint a commission we have to go through this long bill, which procedure gives many opportunities of raising objections. The whole desire is to appoint a commission and give them control of the penal institutions.

I was sorry not to be able to be here the other day on account of indisposition, but I believe the Minister of Justice said that the three commissioners would be appointed for their worth and merit and not for political considerations. In my opinion the personnel of this commission is the vital factor; if you get the right men as commissioners, with such an excellent report as they have in their hands and with the sympathy of the Minister of Justice, which is undoubtedly evident, we shall have for the first time in Canada an opportunity to work out a worthy penal system.

I was very much interested to read the speech of the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann); I wish he had been in this house ten years ago to help with this fight when it was a fight, and when anyone who said anything in favour of penitentiary reform was not heard with favour in the house; it was a most unpopular subject. But I should like to see the minister get his bill through without having to fight for every section as though it were something he was trying to foist on the Canadian people contrary to the wishes of the house.

Mr. MacINNIS: I must protest against the accusations of the Minister of Justice that I am putting obstacles in his way. This bill has been before the committee to-day for less than an hour, and I have taken up possibly fifteen minutes of that time. That is all the time I have taken in speaking on this bill since it appeared on the order paper, yet the minister says I am putting obstacles in his way. Is a member of parliament supposed to state his views in this house on any subject that comes up, or is he to take it that when the minister brings forward a bill he is infallible and nothing further need be said about it? As far as I am concerned I am not taking for granted the infallibility of anyone; I am prepared to say my say when I think I can contribute something to the debate, just as the minister himself would do.

He says that by this bill he is trying to remove the administration of the penitentiaries as far as possible from political or governmental influence. Well, I am trying to assist him in doing that, and I do not like to be told that I am putting obstacles in his way. I am not. I am trying in my way to improve the bill. If he cannot accept my suggestions, then despite any obstacle I can put in his way he can carry the bill. There is too much of the high and mighty attitude, that only one or two people are entitled to speak, based, I suppose, on the supposition that only one or two have all the wisdom. If they have all the wisdom, the mess we have been in during the last few years indicates that more wisdom is needed.

Mr. MARSH: I was not in the house when this bill was in the resolution stage. If with the indulgence of the chair and the minister I may be allowed to comment on the bill as a whole, I shall doubtless take up less time than if I have to speak on it item by item.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I should be grateful to my hon. friend if he would wait until the sections are carried. Every speech made before the sections are carried has the effect of delaying the bill.

Amendment (Mr. Mackenzie, Vancouver), agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 11 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

On section 14—Annual report.

Mr. LANDERYOU: How much a month does it cost on an average to keep male prisoners?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The usual charges for food and other things required every day are from about $12 to $15 a month. That does not cover overhead, wages of guards, cost of buildings and so on; it covers merely the maintenance of the prisoner.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Could the minister give an estimate of the actual cost including administration?

Mr. McCANN: It is all in the annual report.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Perhaps we might proceed, and I will give the information to my hon. friend later.

Mr. LANDERYOU: This $12 to $15 a month includes just food and whatever clothing they may get?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Maintenance, medical care, clothing and everything of that kind.

Mr. CHURCH: This section is the very same as section 4 of the old act. It is all very well to say that these commissioners shall make an annual report. An annual report about what? We have had this annual report made to this parliament this year and for the last fifteen or twenty years. There is a recommendation at page 268 of the commission's report referring to Dorchester, where the new warden got fine reforms, but the deputy warden was said to be of the old school and incompetent. This annual report will be just the same as under the old statute; it will not contain any of this information for the guidance of parliament; it will give just the amounts received and disbursed, with such other information as may be deemed desirable. I would ask the minister whether this annual report will provide for any study, or any changes along the lines suggested, for example, by the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) regarding prevention and that kind of thing. Will it be the same type of report that one gets from the other commissions?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The hon. member will find that under section 15 the minister will receive from the commission a report which will contain all possible suggestions for improvements.

Mr. LANDERYOU: May I ask why the cost for food, clothing and medical attention should be from $12 to $15 a month when the thousands upon thousands on relief receive only half that amount for food, clothing and shelter? The figures are anywhere from $2.30 to $7.78 a month for the food, clothing and shelter of those on relief.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Here we find the cost of maintaining these criminals just about double that amount.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My hon. friend will forgive me if I do not discuss that phase of the matter. These prisoners are sent by the courts to the federal establishments. We have to take care of them, and I am simply telling my hon. friend the cost; that is all.

Mr. LANDERYOU: You have to take care of those in gaol at a cost of $15 a month, while those on relief get only $7 a month.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I suggest that the unemployed would be better treated in gaol than they are out of it.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—Construction and repairs.

Mr. MacNICOL: Under this section the construction and repairs of buildings and other works in the penitentiaries are under the control of the commission. Would that be through the Department of Public Works or under the commission itself?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The commission itself.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the commission receive tenders and let contracts?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Even at the present time repairs in the penitentiaries come under the penitentiaries branch and are done largely by convict labour.

Section agreed to.

Sections 17 to 27 inclusive agreed to.

On section 28—Duties of assistant commissioners.

Mr. MacNICOL: The assistant commissioners are to receive salaries also, I assume?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes. The assistant commissioners will be permanent officers. The commissioners are appointed for ten years, as my hon. friend will remember, but the assistant commissioners will be permanent appointments. As a matter of fact, their duties will be those performed at the present time by the inspectors of penitentiaries, and I suppose the first assistant commissioners will be the inspectors.

Section agreed to.

Sections 29 and 30 agreed to.

On section 31—Wardens to have executive control.

Mr. CHURCH: Under this new commission is it intended to retain these illegal warden's courts, which sometimes impose penalties which even assize judges or the chief justice cannot impose and which parliament has never sanctioned? These warden's courts are absolutely illegal, and I think we should have a stated case to the supreme court in regard to them. Some of the findings of these courts are made without proper trial, on hearsay evidence of some biased witnesses, a practice which was condemned by the royal commission.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): As I said in the beginning, the changes to be made in the law will be made later on the recommendation of the commission which is to be appointed; and the commissioners themselves will have power to make rules affecting these so-called courts.

Section agreed to.

Sections 32 to 44 inclusive agreed to.

On section 45—Privileged visitors.

Mr. CHURCH: This section would not permit inquiries to be made by grand juries. Surely the grand jury on the authority of the judge at the assizes should be enabled to visit once or twice a year at least, these institutions in the town where the assizes are held, but I do not see any provision for that here. The judge presiding at the assizes, which may be held once or twice a year, should be able to direct the grand jury to visit any institution and report thereon. The grand jury system is an important factor in the administration of justice in Ontario, as in other provinces, and I believe the judge presiding at the assizes should be able to have these inspections made. In 1935 a bill of mine dealing with this matter was before parliament. The grand juries have the power to visit provincial and municipal institutions, where they pounce upon a great many defects. So much has that been so that a royal commission in Ontario has condemned some of the older gaols as being unfit for human habitation. I think grand juries would be far better than some of those preferred visitors.

who never or seldom visit, who are named in this section, which gives this permission to the following:

—the governor general of Canada, the lieutenant-governor of any province of Canada, any member of the king's privy council for Canada, any member of the executive council of any of the said provinces, any member of the parliament of Canada, and any judge of any court of record in Canada or in any of the said provinces—

I venture to say that hardly any of these people have been in one of these institutions. Grand juries have had certain powers since time immemorial, and they are the bodies to inspect these places. They can summon anyone in the prison before them for information, and such visits would not interfere with the discipline of the institution at all and be no expense. This is one way in which we can find out what is going on. Do not forget that these federal prison institutions have been conducted as closed shops since confederation. The public did not know what was going on in them; otherwise we would have had reforms years ago. In England the grand juries have had these powers, so why should they not have them in Canada? Are we behind the mother country in the matter of law reform?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The grand jury is, of course, entirely a provincial organization over which we have no power, authority or control. Apart from that, in most of the provinces grand juries have been abolished. I believe in Ontario they still exist, but not in Quebec, British Columbia or several other provinces. However, I do not see why any exceptions should be made there for men who may be employed provincially in the prosecution of the assizes. There is really no justification for making them different from any other citizens. Apart from that, the commission will have power to make rules with regard to visitors. I understand in England they have what are known as visiting committees. I believe the amendment suggested by the hon. member is not necessary.

Mr. MacNEIL: Would the minister explain the limitation with respect to members of the executive council of any of the provinces. Would he consider the advisability of allowing members of provincial legislatures to visit penitentiaries during business hours and at the pleasure of the wardens, provided they are agents of inmates, and that they may have been asked to deal legitimately with some business of the inmates. That frequently occurs with regard to men in prison, and particularly in connection with violations with respect to unlawful assembly or rioting. It refers particularly to men who are without next of kin and, so far as representations to be made on their behalf are concerned, are deprived of contact with the outside world.

At the same time I would ask the minister whether, in the event of a member of the House of Commons visiting a penitentiary, any restriction would be placed upon him in a discussion with an inmate in connection with a matter such as an appeal to the crown for clemency?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is all a matter of regulation. However, I fancy a member of parliament is at liberty to talk to prisoners on business when visiting a penitentiary. It is a matter of regulation, and I should like to leave those items of detail for the consideration of the commission, in the light of their study and experience.

Mr. MacNEIL: Would the minister consider favourably the idea of extending the provision to include members of the provincial legislatures?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The suggestion will be considered.

Mr. MacNEIL: It is now limited.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I should not like to put it into the bill.

Mr. CHURCH: I suggest that the new section 45 is, with the exception of a few words, the same as the present section 40. These institutions have certain privileged visitors who rarely visit. Rightly or wrongly, these institutions are managed by the crown, and I say there should be some proper public and independent inspection of penitentiaries by grand juries.

The late Chief Justice Meredith presided at the assizes in Ontario for over forty years. Speaking to a grand jury in the county of York in 1930, he made reference to a bill which was before this house seven or eight years ago and which gave power to the grand jury to make public inspection. Reading the amendment to the grand jury he said, in effect, that federal and provincial institutions, whether rightly or wrongly managed, are managed by the crown, and grand juries as representatives of the public should during a period of the assize courts have the right to visit any of those institutions in the town where the assizes are held. They would obtain their authority from the judge presiding at an assize court.

That privilege has been in existence in England for years. Over there the grand or other jury insists upon inspection of institutions. Under the provincial system a grand jury visited an asylum and found several sane men in it. Yet there were officials of all kinds in that province. Although there is inspection by the officials mentioned in the section, in my humble opinion many of them are just figureheads, and they do not make a public inspection. It is no inspection at all.

The late Chief Justice Meredith was on circuit work for forty years, and was one of the ablest judges who has ever served in Ontario. He wondered why the principle of inspection, one which has been found in the British criminal law for many years, could not be carried out here. The section under discussion provides for certain visitors. There may be visits when the officials know you are coming. Those visitors will come by train, bring their aides-de-camp, and all that sort of thing. Under those circumstances they will learn a lot, won't they! But if a grand jury were permitted to make a visit, I suggest it would not interfere with the discipline of the institution or cause any expense. If we had had that system years ago, the deplorable conditions which are described in the report would not have existed. We learn of juveniles of sixteen years of age in those institutions, and practices which are opposed to all the known principles of proper dealing with the unfortunate.

In my opinion the minister should be prepared to accept an amendment to the bill permitting a visit from a grand jury. I see no reason why his officials should oppose such legislation. That just shows how much reform one can expect under this new commission, when the department will not accept the principle of the law of England whereby they have a central board, and further the principle whereby a grand or other jury may visit these institutions. These institutions are under the control of the crown, and the crown may do what it likes in connection with them. There are warden's courts within the jurisdiction of the institutions, and they may pass rules and regulations with which even this parliament would not have power to interfere. Yet we are denied the privilege of adding grand juries to the list of visitors.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Of course the hon. member knows there are grand juries in all the assize court districts. Does he mean that a grand jury sitting at Windsor or at Port Arthur would visit the penitentiary at Kingston? Who would pay the expenses? To whom would that grand jury, a provincial institution, report? There is a great difference in England, because over there the prisons are all under one government, and they are institutions over which a grand jury may have some authority. But certainly the grand juries in the various districts of Ontario have nothing to do with federal penal institutions.

Mr. CHURCH: Assize courts are held at Kingston twice a year, and non-jury courts three times a year, and the grand jury in attendance there should be permitted to visit the institution without any expense whatsoever to the government. That is what the chief justice meant. He was referring to a public inspection which would not involve any expense.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: Does the hon. member for Broadview know that the grand jury in England does not exist to-day? He has been saying that in England the grand jury has a right to visit institutions. I would point out to him that it was abolished some years ago.

Mr. MacNEIL: May I ask the minister under what authority are those regulations dealing with visits of next of kin or blood relations promulgated?

Mr. CHURCH: There is a jury in England of the kind I have described. It may not be called a grand jury, but there is an assize jury which visits these institutions. I have reports from Great Britain in my desk which have been prepared by the Home Secretary. Those bodies may not be called grand juries, but they are public bodies with the right of inspection, and represent persons other than the crown.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: The hon. member must have an old report.

Mr. CHURCH: I had a bill before parliament about ten years ago with respect to this matter of a jury inspection, and in that bill the law of England was laid down. I proposed then a similar inspection for Canada.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: That was ten years ago.

Mr. CHURCH: The bill was considered for two or three nights here.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In answer to the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), may I say that it is certainly somewhere in the bill. Section 7 states:

> The commission, subject to the approval of the minister, shall have power to make rules and regulations for
> (a) the administration, management, discipline and police of the penitentiaries;

Miss MACPHAIL: One of the many recommendations of the royal commission was that there should be a board of visitors for every penal institution. Would the commission to be set up under the authority of this bill have the power to institute a board of visitors?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, they certainly would.

Sections 46 to 51 inclusive agreed to.

On section 52—Warrant for removal.

Mr. CHURCH: I referred to this section the other day. This is practically the same section as is in the old bill, the change being from the minister to the chairman.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In answer to a question asked by my hon. friend I gave certain information the other evening, but he was out of the house at the time.

Section 53 agreed to.

On section 54—Commutation of death sentence.

Mr. POULIOT: Will this commission also act as a parole board?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No.

Mr. POULIOT: That will be distinct?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Absolutely.

Section 55 agreed to.

On section 56—If certified incorrigible, may be transferred to penitentiary.

Mr. MacNICOL: I would be inclined to oppose the transfer of a juvenile offender from a reformatory to a penitentiary. In the old country prisoners similar to those described in this section are not transferred to the regular penitentiaries, they are transferred to a juvenile penitentiary or to a penitentiary where first offenders are kept. It would seem to me to be a backward step to transfer a juvenile offender from a reformatory to a regular penitentiary where he would be mixed up with all sorts of prisoners. After all, the boy or girl who is found to be incorrigible may be that way because of years of the most shocking and impossible home conditions. I visited a penitentiary in Scotland to which this type of offender is sent, and I found that immediately they set out to reverse the whole training of the incorrigible person. They made an effort to bring back respect for society which he might not have had at home or in the reformatory to which he had been sent. I think there ought to be some stipulation as to the type of penitentiary to which these offenders would be sent.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is much in what my hon. friend has said. However, I should not like to make any change in the law until the whole matter has been considered fully by the commission to be appointed. I can assure my hon. friend that his remarks will be submitted to the commission and full consideration given thereto.

Mr. LAWSON: In case it should lend any weight to the representations made by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) when they are being considered by the new commission, I suggest that consideration should be given to transferring these young or first offenders to a preferred class penitentiary, if they are to be transferred from a reformatory. On more than one occasion it has been my privilege to visit the preferred class penitentiary at Collin's Bay, and I was greatly impressed with the effort being made there for the reformation of these offenders. I was impressed with the advantageous conditions that prevail at that penitentiary compared with Kingston penitentiary.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The whole question of the young offender will have to be fully considered. Still greater attention is being given to this problem in the old country. There is being presented at the present session of parliament in Great Britain a bill known as the criminal justice bill, which deals with young offenders in a special way. They have what are known as remand centres to which young people awaiting trial are sent instead of being sent to the regular gaol and thus having a blot placed upon their character. Of course, such a system would be a tremendous change from what we have in this country, but there is no doubt that great care should be taken in dealing with this phase of the matter. Young boys and girls should not be led to a life of crime because of the surroundings under which they are forced to live, or because of what may be only mistakes on their part. I can assure my hon. friend that I am entirely in sympathy with him in trying to solve this question in the best possible way.

Mr. LAWSON: That brings up another thought. The remand centres referred to by the minister are fine things, but this function is admirably taken care of in the urban centres of Ontario by the Salvation Army. It may be that the new commission could work out some plan whereby financial assistance could be given to the Salvation Army for the marvellous assistance they are giving in this regard.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The Salvation Army officers have proved useful in the suggestions they have made with regard to this question.

Mr. CHURCH: This section is the same as section 51 of the old act. I was in hopes that the minister would free the federal institutions of the care of juveniles, but apparently he proposes to adopt the old system under which it is possible to transfer a juvenile offender from a provincial to a federal institution. In connection with this we must not forget that New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have no system of provincial institutions, which means that the other provinces have to stand the cost of providing such institutions for those provinces.

The other night I referred to certain returns which had been made. The percentage of juvenile offenders in these institutions is seventy-five to eighty per cent, according to statistics to the end of September, 1937. This is a book of 248 pages issued by the Department of Justice, in which is contained information about inmates of that age. There is another return covering the provincial institutions, and yet another with respect to municipal institutions. In answer to my hon. friend who was speaking a few moments ago, it may be that the grand jury is not what it used to be in the old country; in some instances it may have been abolished. I will not here refer to the charge of Chief Justice Meredith. But I may say that I was in hopes, in view of this report, we should see an end to the incarceration of persons of that age in these institutions. The practice is condemned on page 178 of the report, where it refers to the fact that poverty brings them there, also defective family relationship—poverty resulting in overcrowding, semi-starvation, and the absence of facilities for recreation at home. These are some of the reasons why we should rid the federal institutions of this type of inmate:

> The causes of delinquency outside the home are mostly to be found in the character of the street and neighbourhood in which the child lives. They are composed of the influences that affect him beyond the circle of his family life; his companionships at school, or at work, or during his leisure hours. Such influences may be direct or indirect. The companions may be of the same age or adult companions.

Then the report goes on:

> Among the most important and direct causes of juvenile delinquency is the demoralization of the present day. The slackening of religious influences, the loosening of family ties, licentious pictures, publications, and magazines which glorify immorality or crime, are incitements to imitation by youths and juveniles.

The commission believes it is imperative that the authorities should go into these matters. It then deals with the functions of the juvenile courts.

Surely, if we are to make any progress in this particular reform, there should be some way of providing an institution like the Borstal system for this type of inmate. Instead of that, I venture to say that under the commission system it will be twenty or twenty-five years at the rate we are going before we instal the Borstal system. I believe that something should be done at once to provide a proper institution for persons of that particular age.

Sections 57 to 65 inclusive agreed to.

On section 66—Clothing. Food. Bedding. Separate confinement.

Mr. MacNICOL: Just a moment until we get a little explanation. Perhaps I might include sections 66 and 67, because they refer to the same thing, and are the old sections 61 and 62. I was hoping that the new measure, if it is going to specify conditions of work with reference to hard labour and hours and so forth, would follow the Borstal system, which we all hope is to be installed.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That will come later.

Mr. MacNICOL: Section 66 refers to clothes. I hope to goodness that the clothes for the male prisoners will not consist of a uniform of which the trousers will be one black leg and one white leg, or one yellow leg and one red leg.

Mr. SPENCE: Give them dress suits!

Mr. MacNICOL: That is not the plan they follow in the old country. Clothes in the prisons there are not, of course, the same as the rest of us wear or dress suits, but they are not so conspicuous that one can see them a mile away. I hope, since I see the minister nodding his head, it is the purpose of the commission to introduce into the operation of these two sections the same type of humane construction and human reform as is employed in the old country.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, in a general way. I would not say that they will have trousers with one leg of one colour and the other leg of another colour.

Mr. MacNICOL: No. That is not the style in the old land. In the old country the clothes are practically all the same. When I spoke of one black leg and one white leg I was referring to the uniform in this country.

Mr. HARRIS: Perhaps the minister was replying to the suggestion of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence), who suggested that they might have dress suits.

Mr. SPENCE: Why have prison clothes at all?

Mr. CHURCH: These men will probably have to work outside in severe winter weather. They should have proper overcoats, not the sort of scant clothing they have in some institutions when the weather is forty below zero as it is up north.

Sections 67 to 82 inclusive agreed to.

On section 83—Act repealed.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask one question before we get right to the end?

The CHAIRMAN: Section 83?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes. This is practically the whole act. I was going to ask the minister if it is the intention to introduce some system of making allowances to prisoners for good conduct and for merit, as they do in the old country.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We have that already to some extent.

Mr. MacNICOL: I mean, payment of money.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, even that. Of course it is not a big salary. But the commission will have full powers to increase it.

Miss MACPHAIL: Just before this passes: I am not in agreement with many of the sections which went through, but was silent, upon the understanding that when the commission is appointed such changes will be made in this act and in any others as are necessary to carry out the reforms recommended by the royal commission.

Section agreed to.

On section 84—Coming into force.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If my hon. friends will allow this clause to carry my good friend the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Marsh) might make his remarks, unless he has questions to ask. If it is a speech, at nine o'clock this evening I will move the third reading so that my friend can make his remarks.

Mr. MARSH: I have some observations to make on the bill which will take a little while. I thank the minister for the opportunity to speak.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It will be best to do so on the third reading.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If my hon. friend is here at nine o'clock, after we have disposed of the public bills I will move the third reading and he will have an opportunity to make his remarks.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

LORD'S DAY ACT

PENALTY FOR OFFICERS AND DIRECTORS PERMITTING VIOLATION OF THE ACT

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain) moved the third reading of Bill No. 7, to amend the Lord's Day Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT SWEEPSTAKES ORGANIZED BY PROVINCES FOR BENEFIT OF UNIVERSITIES OR HOSPITALS

Mr. VITAL MALLETTE (Jacques-Cartier) moved the second reading of Bill No. 10, to amend the criminal code.

He said: Hon. members will no doubt remember that this same bill was introduced at the 1938 session by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Bertrand). They will also remember that an interesting discussion followed; that great interest was taken in that bill by the people of Canada; that newspapers referred to it upon numerous occasions, that a considerable amount of correspondence was directed to the members upon its merits; but that, alas, no vote was taken on it and the session was concluded without the House of Commons and the Senate having an opportunity of expressing their approval or otherwise of this important measure. This lack of a decision last year renders it necessary that the bill be reintroduced this year, and its sponsor of 1938, having to go to England this winter, could not present the bill himself owing to the uncertainties of the day and hour when he could perform the task. Since I had strongly supported the bill last year, he asked me to take charge of it on this occasion, a request to which I readily acceded.

The arguments advanced last session in favour of this amendment to the criminal code are just as good this year. They have not been weakened in any way whatever. The hospitals and universities in Canada are still in need of funds. Without going into details, let me just remind hon. members that the usual campaigns in aid of charities were held last fall; the needs of these worthy institutions were just as great and pressing as previously, and there is no sign on the horizon indicating an improvement in that situation.

Just as I did in last year's debate, I wish to pay a tribute of deep admiration and gratitude to the thousands of generous people who have helped our universities and hospitals, doctors, nurses and others on hospital staffs, the staffs of the universities, and those great silent workers of the religious congregations whose self-forgetful devotion to their fellowmen and women is beyond description, beyond appreciation and beyond adequate recognition. In spite of the help generously extended by benefactors great and small, in spite of the support and cooperation given by the public, and in spite of the sacrifices cheerfully made by those noble souls in charge of such institutions, there is still a financial gap to bridge.

A plight of this sort is not, I assume, limited to Canada. It is not a purely local trouble. But even if other countries encounter the same difficulty, that does not improve conditions in Canada. While we are not conversant with the means taken by other countries to correct this unfortunate condition, we are aware that one country holds a public lottery called sweepstakes, for the benefit of its hospitals. That country is Eire, formerly known as the Irish Free State. We know also that tickets for these sweepstakes are sold in Canada, notwithstanding the prohibition contained in our criminal code against their sale. Let me ask whether or not we consider as criminals those of our friends and acquaintances who purchase such tickets. Of course not. I admit that some of the buyers of these tickets are possibly little interested in the hospitals themselves and buy the tickets as a sporting chance in the hope of winning something. Nevertheless the fact remains that they do buy these tickets, the prohibition notwithstanding, and therefore whatever money is risked in that way is lost to Canada and Canadian institutions. Should we not admire the wisdom and sagacity of those Irish gentlemen who understand human nature well enough to capitalize upon one of its little weaknesses and turn it to the advantage of charity—because that is precisely what happens through the operation of sweepstakes in aid of Irish hospitals. Those Irish gentlemen, with that keenness and kindness which are foremost among the many fine qualities of the Irish people, saw an opportunity of reaping benefits for the hospitals in that country in the hope of profit that lies dormant in the minds of most men and women who are prepared to take a chance. They saw that opportunity and cleverly took advantage of it. The response has been tremendous. Why should we not do the same for Canada? The answer is in the hands, or, rather, in the votes of the members of this house and the senate.

In case some hon. members are under the impression that sweepstake tickets are not sold in Canada, I quote for their information the heading of a news item that appeared in the Ottawa Journal of March 25, 1938, which reads:

64-year-old miller in Kenora wins $150,000.

Further down, referring to sweepstakes, the article itself says:

Buyers paid $13,730,010 for their chances to get rich quick.
Winners were paid a total of $8,057,600. That left a balance of $5,672,410.

I have here also an extract from La Presse of Montreal of August 16, 1938, giving a list of the winners of what they call the sole Canadian sweepstakes. They refer to the Dominion Rifle Association sweepstakes. People wonder why this sweepstake is allowed and others are not.

Again, I have here an article that appeared in La Patrie of October 23, 1938, which states:

Eight hundred Canadians have won consolation prizes in the Irish sweepstake.

There is a given list which is too long to insert in this speech, and anyway it has no bearing on my argument.

Without wishing to be personal, I believe that if I were to send a questionnaire to hon. members requesting information as to their investments of this kind for, say each year during the last ten years, the replies would be interesting provided the whole truth were told—and that from lawmakers, notwithstanding the law prohibiting the sale of such tickets. However, I will not perpetrate such a cruelty. Why should a law which is not respected, which is not obeyed and which is not advantageous to the country, be kept on the statute books?

This bill provides that such sweepstakes be permitted only when organized by the government of a province by or under a law of the legislature of such province. Any provinces that do not want to permit such sweepstakes do not have to. Where a province desires to do so, the adoption of a bill will allow the legal holding of sweepstakes. The people of Quebec, I am sure, favour the present bill, and I hope that hon. members from other provinces will give their opinion due consideration inasmuch as the holding of sweepstakes would be optional. No province would be bound to hold them, and that in itself is a valid reason for the adoption of this bill, because it would permit the willing provinces to hold sweepstakes, while it would not compel unwilling provinces to act. Surely that is a fair interpretation of British fair play.

As an example, some twenty years ago a great wave of sentiment swept over most of north America in favour of prohibition, in the hope of achieving total abstinence from the use of alcoholic liquors. The leaders of the movement were undoubtedly sincere in their ambition, and if they had succeeded the world would be different from what it is today. But they counted without allowing for human nature, and every hon. member knows the results. At that time, when governments were falling over one another in the rush to adopt prohibitory legislation, there was one Canadian province which stood aloof, the province of Quebec, home of good, sound common sense. Its government knew that nowhere can men and women be made or kept good just by passing laws. The government of Quebec adopted at that time state control of the sale of alcoholic liquors, and that policy has since been copied everywhere in Canada and even beyond our frontiers. I cite this example, in case hon. members may think this demand to legalize the sale and purchase of sweepstake tickets might be as far as Quebec is concerned a mere whim.

I have a better proof here than just my own opinion. On April 20, 1934, a law was assented to in the Quebec legislature entitled "An act to authorize the organizing of a lottery for education and public charitable purposes." At the end it states:

> The power given to the lieutenant-governor in council by section 1 shall be exercised only if a lottery of the nature of that contemplated by this act is not prohibited by statute of the parliament of Canada.
> Moreover such power shall not be exercised if the parliament of Canada authorizes the Canadian government to organize a general lottery in the whole of Canada for purposes similar to those contemplated by the preceding provisions.

And those purposes were recited in clause 2, which reads:

> The proceeds from the lottery, after deducting the amounts fixed for the prizes and those required to pay the expenses of organization and of selling of tickets and other incidental expenses, as well as the salaries of the officers and employees appointed under section 3, must be employed exclusively for educational or public charitable purposes carried on in the province and designated by the lieutenant-governor in council.

I wish to add that one of the important political parties in Quebec, L'Action Libérale Nationale, has in its platform a clause approving sweepstakes for such purposes as I am now covering in this bill.

I have discussed the principle of this bill with that well known public character, the man on the street. In every case I have had an expression of approval, coupled with some surprise that the dominion government does not recognize the absurdity of prohibiting Canadians from holding their own lotteries and the consequent disappearance from Canada of the money risked by Canadians on such ventures. The average man wants to know why the sale of sweepstake tickets is prohibited, while stock exchanges are allowed to operate and sales on margin are tolerated. Mr. Average Canadian also wants to know why the sale of sweepstake tickets is prohibited, while grain exchanges are in operation where one can trade in grain on margin, and why gambling in mining shares is permitted and betting on race tracks is tolerated. Let us be logical—just logical, but let us be logical. The average Canadian citizen objects to being stamped as a criminal because he risks a few cents in the purchase of a sweepstake ticket, or even shares in the purchase of such a ticket with members of his family or his fellow workers, while anyone can speculate in the stock market, the grain market, the mining market or horse races. He feels that there is hypocrisy about a law of that kind; he buys sweepstake tickets year by year, thereby engaging in transactions prohibited by law, and the profit on those transactions is lost to Canada. Is it to be wondered at that Mr. Average Canadian thinks this prohibition of the sale of sweepstake tickets is foolish, especially when the profits might go to Canadian hospitals? I share his views.

Some hon. members may claim that there are many ways of helping these institutions besides holding sweepstakes. Surely there are, I agree. Here is a small list of them: raffles, tombolas, dances, bridge parties, soupers d'habitant, soupers du bon vieux temps, strawberry festivals, door-to-door canvass, sales of work, bazaars, kermesses, theatricals, drawings, oyster suppers, pilgrimages, old boy's reunions, euchre parties, bingo. If hon. members want to know anything more about bingo I advise them to read one of the leading Ottawa papers, Le Droit, and every evening they will see on page 4 an invitation to go to Hull to attend bingo games for the help of a parish. I am not aware that that has been stopped. I was told around Montreal last Sunday that in some parishes they were told not to hold bingo games and bingo games were stopped. Instead of calling them bingo they called them jumbo, and the same thing goes on. In this list I have said nothing of imposts, levies, assessments, rates, taxes and other equally agreeable opportunities of raising money.

There is another element to be considered. Through the adoption of the present bill, by the sale of sweepstake tickets issued under the control of the provincial authorities, these authorities would be able to eliminate the racketeering which we suspect has been going on in the clandestine sale of tickets. We never knew positively whether the sums invested in the sale of sweepstake tickets all reached the management of the sweepstakes. Who could tell whether the tickets offered for sale, bought and sold, were genuine or forgeries? Should the law be amended in accordance with the present bill, the racketeers will not be able to compete with sellers duly authorized and doing business in the open. I have never heard of cut prices in the sale of such tickets, and tickets certainly cannot be adulterated as some other merchandise can be, such as Scotch whisky or other alcoholic liquors for instance.

Speaking of racketeers and racketeering, if hon. members will consult the Montreal papers of Thursday, February 9, 1939, they will read of a seizure of tickets having a face value of $750,000 for the Irish sweepstakes. Think of it, three quarters of a million dollars, 300,000 tickets!

I have received a good deal of fan mail in that connection, containing valuable information as well as divers suggestions. It would be too bad if these were lost to posterity. Among the contributors was L'Union Nationale des Vétérans, with head office at 4616 rue Christophe-Colomb, Montreal. They would like a lottery to be organized for granting bonuses to veterans under any arrangement fixed by the federal government. They do not object to the principle of lotteries, but would like a dominion law for that purpose. I have not the least objection.

I have also received a proposed plan for monthly sweepstakes in Canada for the benefit of public health services, the first draw to be in Nova Scotia, the second in Prince Edward Island, the third in New Brunswick, the fourth in Quebec, the fifth in Ontario, the sixth in Manitoba, the seventh in Saskatchewan, the eighth in Alberta, the ninth in British Columbia, the tenth in the Yukon, the eleventh in the Northwest Territories and the twelfth for the benefit of the sweepstakes operating costs. I am not going into the details, but I thought hon. members would be interested in knowing about that.

Then I have a letter from a gentleman in Penticton, British Columbia, strongly favouring sweepstakes. He very kindly sent me four newspaper clippings with his letter. I should like to quote these clippings, but will refrain from doing so because they do not indicate their source, and I remember that some weeks ago an hon. member quoted from a newspaper clipping in the afternoon and in the evening it was found that the quotation did not come from the newspaper to which it had been attributed.

In addition to these and many other letters, however, the Financial Post of Toronto was good enough to refer to this bill. Of course I have not the slightest objection to the Financial Post or any other newspaper referring to this matter; very much to the contrary. In its editorial columns of February 4 the Post carried its comment under the heading, "The Sweepstakes Mirage." Again, so far as the title goes, I have no objection, but I do object to the six words at the beginning of the second paragraph: "Apart from questions of public morals—"

If that does not beat the Dutch, the Financial Post talking about public morals because sweepstakes are a mild form of gambling! I ask hon. members what would be the circulation of that same publication if a large part of it were not consecrated to stock gambling. They call it "investing." Of course we must expect some lectures from Toronto on the morality of this matter, since this great city shelters a number of self-appointed keepers of the public morals.

I do not intend to mention every letter I have received, but there is one in particular which deserves special mention. It comes from Fred Howlett, J.P., city clerk of Vancouver, addressed to myself, and reads:

I beg to notify you of the following resolution which was adopted by the city council on the 13th instant:

"That whereas, on the 24th day of January, 1939, in the House of Commons of Canada, the honourable member for the Jacques-Cartier of Montreal riding, Mr. Mallette, did introduce bill No. 10 entitled an act to amend the criminal code of Canada to legalize sweepstakes, to be organized by, and under the control of the legislature of a province of Canada and the net proceeds of such sweepstakes to be utilized and divided among hospitals and universities;

And whereas such bill did receive its first reading on the 24th day of January, 1939, in the House of Commons;

And whereas the legislative assembly of the province of British Columbia did, on December 9th, 1938, resolve on motion that the said assembly go on record as being in favour of sweepstakes conducted either by the dominion or any provincial government for the benefit of hospitals, which resolution did receive the unanimous approval of the legislative assembly;

And whereas the citizens of Vancouver did express themselves most forcibly when, on December 14th, 1932, by a vote of 25,735 in favour and 9,774 against, they showed themselves in favour of provincially controlled sweepstakes and the net proceeds thereof to be devoted to hospital purposes;

Therefore be it resolved that this council do reaffirm the expressed views of the people of the city of Vancouver and humbly petition parliament to so amend the criminal code of Canada to permit the operation of such sweepstakes for hospital purposes under provincial governmental or municipal control, and that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to all honourable members of the dominion cabinet, to all honourable members of the province of British Columbia, and to the Honourable Mr. Mallette, member of the House of Commons representing Jacques-Cartier riding."

Lotteries are nothing new. Hon. members wishing further information on this important matter are invited to read a book entitled "Lotteries," by H. M. Muller, which can be obtained at the parliamentary library, when I have returned it. At page 22 thereof they will find that lotteries have been organized: first, for facilitating the raising of state loans; second, for reducing the capital of, or interest on, the national debt; third, for raising money for projects not connected with the supply or debt services and, fourth, for raising money as revenue. In 1566-69 Queen Elizabeth authorized by royal proclamation a lottery for improving English harbours and "other publique good workes." The Virginia lotteries of 1612-15 and 1618-21, for financing the settlement of Virginia, were launched under letters patent. In 1661 the royal fishery lottery was authorized by a proclamation of Charles II, and in 1694 a lottery was authorized by act of parliament. On this continent Harvard college for a while raised approximately $15,000 a year by lottery and other institutions, such as Dartmouth and William and Mary, raised somewhat lesser amounts by the same device. A tablet placed on Stoughton Hall, at Harvard, states that it was built in 1805, aided by a state lottery.

I do not want to make too many references to newspapers, but I should like to quote something which appeared in La Patrie of February 12, signed by Mr. Louis Francoeur who, if I remember correctly, was a candidate of the reconstruction party in the last election:

Il est bien triste pour la province de Québec qu'elle soit soumise en cette matière au prohibitionnisme puritain. Et l'on continue de s'étonner que l'on fasse ainsi violence à l'opinion réfléchie de la province, exprimée de la façon la plus claire possible, par ses parlementaires.

I will translate this roughly as follows:

It is very sad for the province of Quebec to be submitted in this matter to puritan prohibitionism, and we continue to be surprised that no account is taken of the considered opinion of this province, expressed in the clearest possible manner by its parliamentarians.

I do not suppose anyone would say money was not needed for education. If there is any doubt about it, let me just remind hon. members that during the last few days we have been swamped with postcards, of which I have some thirty, reading as follows:

Dear Sir:

I am convinced of the vital importance of careful attention being given during the present session of parliament to the need for a national system of university scholarships.

Canadian youth is faced with demoralizing insecurity and it is imperative that the many brilliant matriculating students be permitted to cultivate their exceptional talents. This is important not only from a humanitarian viewpoint but in addition it is indispensable that their potential insights be utilized in the solution of our pressing Canadian problems.

There are few expenditures by our federal government which would be of more value to the whole nation than would be a scholarship grant. Please be assured of my sincere support.

In French we have this, from Montreal students:

(Translation)
Dear Sir,—

Convinced of the need of national scholarships, I beg you to give serious consideration to the matter during the present session.

The complete intellectual development of many gifted young Canadians is impeded by unsurmountable financial obstacles. Permanent scholarships would permit our brilliant young men to devote themselves more effectively to the progress of Canada.

In my opinion, the government could scarcely make a more profitable investment. You may count on my whole-hearted support.

Well, if this question comes before parliament we shall be faced with two things.

In the first place we shall hear that education is a matter for the provinces, which is true; and, second, we shall be asked where the money will come from, because I believe the amount that has been suggested is $500,000. Well, the money will come from the pockets of the ratepayers, as usual, but there is a painless way of getting it; that is through sweepstakes, and I am sure sweepstake tickets for such an end would sell readily. I am convinced that it would be better to keep the money here in Canada than to allow it to either fall into the hands of racketeers or to be exported for the benefit of similar institutions elsewhere.

I have not bothered much with figures; I have spoken simply with regard to the principle involved, because to me it is a question of principle, and I know that those members with whom I have discussed the matter, whether they have been for or against it, also consider it as a matter of principle. I do not know just how much money it will mean, though others have made studies along that line. We know very well that such tickets are sold in Canada by the bushel, year in and year out, and that the profits go out of the country. I have tried to explain my point of view, with moderation. I hope it will meet with the approval of at least a majority of hon. members.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Mallette) upon the very fine speech he has made, upon the material he has so efficiently presented, and upon the thoroughness with which he has made a good argument out of a bad job. I was wondering what kind of speech he would make if he had a subject like I have.

Mr. Speaker, the first argument I have against sweepstakes is the one offered by you, sir, when you open the house every afternoon at three o'clock. In the Lord's Prayer you offer this petition: "May Thy Kingdom come." I should like to see the member or the individual who would attempt to prove that the introduction of sweepstakes would bring about the Kingdom of Heaven. If we vote for sweepstakes, and at the same time maintain that petition in the Lord's Prayer, we are making of ourselves a bunch of hypocrites.

I am convinced, from information I have had through the press, and from different social organizations and branches of the churches, that Canada does not want sweepstakes. I should like to quote one or two editorials, and with that in mind I shall begin at home and quote the following from the Montreal Gazette:

> Contrary to universal opinion, the hospitals of Ireland are not in clover because of returns from sweepstakes, to which money is contributed from all quarters of the globe. The hospital authorities complain that there has been a great falling-off in voluntary subscriptions by charitable citizens ever since the sweepstakes were put in operation. Philanthropists are giving to other institutions, in the belief that the hospitals no longer need their aid. This is deplored, but even more deplorable is the new public attitude toward the hospitals. There is an increasing tendency to demand free treatment, or partially free treatment, on the ground that the sweepstakes, with their tremendous revenues, should be more than sufficient to finance the institutions charged with the care of the sick. Arguments to the contrary are scoffed at by patients and would-be patients and their friends.
> So serious is the situation that demands are being made for a thorough investigation of the sweepstakes business. An official report recently published in Dublin discloses that, out of more than £10,000,000 available for the Irish hospitals from the sweeps up to December 31, 1936, less than £3,000,000 had been paid out to them. This report also draws attention to the decline in voluntary subscriptions to the hospitals and the increasing tendency on the part of the people to demand treatment free of charge. The government is considering this report and no doubt will discover why the hospitals do not receive their fair share, or at least the amounts they are supposed to be awarded. In the sweep on the Grand National on March 25, last, for example, the total receipts were £2,746,002 of which £1,611,520 was prize money, the hospitals' share being £503,175. Where did the other big amount go? Did nearly half a million pounds go in expenses? This is the riddle the government is asked to solve in the interest of the hospitals, which the sweepstakes are supposed primarily to benefit.

The Montreal Herald contains this:

> Medical men of Dublin, Ireland, are attacking hospital sweepstakes, declaring that they have greatly injured the voluntary hospitals of the city.
> At the annual charter dinner of the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland, prominent medical men and others attacked the system. They declared that the sweepstakes were started to help the hospitals, but the government had stepped in and was collecting a tax of twenty-five per cent of the funds, and diverting it to other causes. Out of this has sprung a demand for a municipal hospital, and the scrapping of some of the voluntary hospitals which have been useful for many years.

I have another editorial from a very fine paper. It may be somewhat Conservative, but sometimes there is a good deal of sense in its editorials. I refer to the Ottawa Journal. I do not know whether I have a right to ask that the editorial be put on Hansard, but I might point out that many articles are placed on Hansard which have not half the sense this one has.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member cannot place it on Hansard without reading it.

Mr. McIVOR: I abide by the ruling of the chair, and shall quote only one or two paragraphs:

The Ottawa Journal, convinced that sweepstakes are an economic vice, would welcome official action that would make the publication of sweepstake winners illegal and close the mails to foreign papers carrying them. Whether the dominion government has power under the present law to enforce such a ban we do not know. Probably it would require an amendment to the criminal code which makes lotteries themselves illegal—with unimportant exceptions. Such a ban certainly would reduce the present illegal sale of lottery tickets, because it would end the display of examples of sudden wealth that lead the unthinking to consider the rare winner and forget the tens of thousands who pay and do not collect.

Then, there is this quotation in the editorial:

"Any state that legalizes lotteries will have a new source of income, but must also be prepared for these consequences:

It will gain a few thousands of dollars at a cost to its people of millions. It will increase its own relief problem. It will encourage new rackets and racketeers. It will not be able to frown upon other forms of gambling. It will do incalculable harm to the morals of its children and its adult irresponsibles. It will increase public disrespect for government."

I do not need to quote more editorials. Hon. members will recognize the sentiments expressed in them. I might quote from another distinguished paper, namely the Times-Journal of Fort William. The editor of that paper is noted for character and ability second to none in Canada. I might also quote from the Port Arthur paper, which of course comes second to that of Fort William. I am sorry the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) is not in the house. I might quote from the Belfast News Letter. In addition to editorials, we know that groups of people throughout Canada have been sending resolutions to members of the house asking us to oppose sweepstakes. Those people are not foolish. They are not people who are out simply to better their own interests. On the contrary they are Christian men and women who believe that sweepstakes would be injurious to Canada.

It has been shown that the hospitals in Dublin have not received very much benefit from sweepstakes, and it is my view that sweepstakes afford a very poor way of raising money for hospitals, universities or anything else.

The biggest business in Canada, namely the churches of this dominion, have more property, more buildings, more directors, more managers, more workers than any other business—and they are better paid. I do not say they are paid in cash, but they are paid in something that is far ahead of cash. Where is this money for the churches found? It is found in the cottages and the shacks stretched across Canada from Cape Breton to the Pacific coast, from the United States border to the far north. The influence of our churches reaches to every last corner in Canada. How is this money obtained? It is obtained by free-will offerings, by duplex envelopes, by weekly envelopes and other forms of contributions. I may be asked if I have ever been up against it, if I have ever been in need of money. Let me tell hon. members that there has been many a time when I was so straitened for money that I thought of writing to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for a subscription. Then I thought perhaps I had just as much money as he. At least in the words of Ralph Connor, I had just as much money as I could properly take care of and spend.

To those who think we should raise money by sweepstakes, by lotteries and by raffles, let me say that anyone who tries to raise money by that method is slapping the face of the Great Giver who said to us, "Ask and ye shall receive." I should like to tell those who want to raise money for universities and hospitals how to do it. Many hon. members in this house came from the farm, as did I. I know how difficult it was sometimes to get water from the pump in the morning, especially if it was a cold morning. You had to prime the pump, or, as our hired man used to say, you had to soak the sucker. Let me give an example. I heard of a house-to-house canvasser who had been very successful in his work. He was asked to what he attributed his success, and he replied that it depended on the first six words he used when the door was opened. One of his opening remarks when a woman opened the door was, "Madam, is your mother in?" That is an example of priming the pump.

I call to mind that great university in Montreal, the buildings of which are still incomplete. Close by is another beautiful building, that put up by Brother André. I ask any hon. member from the province of Quebec: How did Brother André raise the money to pay for that place, to keep it in shape and to pay his staff?

Mr. WERMENLINGER: The provincial government had nothing to do with it, but the—

Mr. McIVOR: My hearing is not very good on my left side. I know how Brother André raised the money. He was able to raise the necessary money because the people loved him, because he knew how to prime the pump. They gave money to him because he gave them something which they prized more than money. Why do you give money to the church to which you belong? You give because in your heart you feel that you would like to have a hand in changing some life, whether it was the life of one who is down and out or one who is up and out.

How did Doctor Grenfell raise the money for the magnificent buildings he put up in Labrador? How was he able to equip his hospitals and pay his nurses and doctors? He was able to do that because he knew how to prime the pump. He showed the world, and especially Canada, the wonderful work he was doing. What a disgrace it would have been if he had had to resort to sweepstakes to finance that work! How did Doctor Barnardo finance his great work? He would take a boy who was down and out, with no father, with no mother perhaps, no home—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: Did he have a grandfather?

Mr. McIVOR: I was not there just then. Doctor Barnardo would take one of these boys and then show a picture of him when he started out, and another picture after he had been reclaimed. That was priming the pump. Barnardo homes are to be found all over England, and many of these boys have come out to Canada. I must admit that some of them made mistakes, just like other humans, but Doctor Barnardo did a great work.

How did General Booth raise the necessary money to keep the Salvation Army going? That was raised by voluntary subscriptions, by showing people men who were down and out, women who had gone to the devil. He showed the world the work of the Salvation Army, and he was able to get support all over the country. How do we get our money? I think of one man connected with our own church in the city of Toronto. He would make a fine minister of finance and he would carry out that work with the greatest dignity. He would know where every dollar came from, and where every dollar went to. That is a good characteristic for any minister of finance to have. That man is capable of handling large amounts of money. He knows where the need is, he sees what work must be done, and then he gets the money.

What do we need more than money? What do we need more than taxes? We need moral rearmament against the things that are spoiling us, with which we are all familiar. My time seems to be passing faster than usual to-night. I gave three reasons last year why I was opposed to this resolution and, like a youth, they seem to have grown since that time. A system of sweepstakes would be bad economics. The great concern of all sensible people to-day is the creation without violence of a sound economic order. The basis of such an order must be sought in wise planning, general productivity and a reasonable distribution of the goods produced. It is utterly impossible to build a sound economic order on anything which has the semblance of gambling. It kindles the adventurous spirit in men, it detaches them from their daily tasks and creates a fraternity of men who are not, in any real sense, of value economically. The late Ramsay MacDonald said that gambling is marked by an impatience with the slow process of legitimate accumulation and by a revolt against the discipline of steady growth and sustained action. Any one who wishes to understand must realize that when you spend $2.50 to buy a sweepstake ticket, you cannot hope to see anything come back. There may be a very, very slight hope, but it is 400,000 times deferred. Therefore, I say it is bad economics.

I should like to give the house just a word along this line from another source to show that it is bad economics. In France they tried sweepstakes for five years, and at the end of that time they withdrew them, for at least two reasons. One was that 3½ per cent only of the sweepstakes went to the purpose for which they were collected; 96½ per cent of the money raised by lottery went some other place. The French chamber of deputies saw that the boys and girls of France were being exploited; they were being used by racketeers. Therefore, they said, lotteries were not fair to the young people of France, and those lotteries, which at one time seemed to have a fine prospect of making good, have been withdrawn. Why are there not lotteries in the United States to-day? They have been withdrawn long since; the last one was in Louisiana in 1894. Why was it abolished? Because the odour of those sweepstakes became so obnoxious to the better people of the United States that they could be tolerated no longer.

I said last year that you do not find any Hebrews buying sweepstakes, because they know what good business is and what bad business is. You do not find many Scotchmen buying sweepstakes, because they see it is bad business.

Mr. REID: They sell them.

Mr. McIVOR: I know of some others who buy sweepstake tickets once in a while. I do not say that we should not do so. That is not my business to-night. But it is a different thing when it becomes a matter of public policy. I know that a couple may sit down and have a game of cards. In fact, four may sit down and play, it may be at cribbage, or—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Pinochle.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Poker.

Mr. McIVOR: —a game of bridge, and it has no nip in it unless they play for a copper a point. Those men can do that if they like. If they think it is good business for them, they can do it. But when it becomes a matter of public policy, it is different; when a fifth man comes in and says, "Put up the poker bid and give me a percentage of it," it becomes a racket, and those four men who were playing had better get out.

I say to the hospitals that they have not any business, even from the economic point of view, to try to raise money by this means. I say also that it is bad morality. Some say that our churches are busy raising money in this way. I do not know what all the churches do, but I know what mine does. There is no gambling in connection with our church. We do not need it. If our ministers and clergy are on the job; if they, with the laymen behind them, are heart and soul interested in following the Man of Nazareth, they will get all the money they need. I should like to state the opinion of our general council in 1938:

> The general council reaffirmed its opposition to gambling in any form—"whether in stocks, wheat, at the race course, the card table, in connection with sport, lotteries or raffles," and especially deplored resort to gambling devices to secure funds for religious or benevolent purposes. It expressed the opinion that gambling carnivals sponsored by service clubs and other organizations have an injurious effect upon public morals and are especially harmful to the mind of youth.

That may not be popular doctrine. All sane people welcome a bit of fun. I like a bit of fun, and I like to see a good, clean game. Unless something important is in progress on Thursday night, I might go with some other hon. members to a fine game of hockey, because I believe that "all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy." You must have fun; but fun must be clean, it must be out in the open, and it must be in keeping with the plea that you, Mr. Speaker, put before this house every day.

Again, raising money by means of sweepstakes is bad morality. The tenth commandment says: "Thou shalt not covet," and I defy any man to buy a sweepstake, for $2.50 or $5 or $25, and not want to get the increase that comes from the other man's sweepstake. When I buy a ticket, do I want nothing but my $2.50 from the fund away out yonder or down in Montreal? I want the profit which comes from sales of sweepstake tickets all over the country; I am coveting the other man's share. "Thou shalt not covet." That is the law of God, the God who is over this parliament and the God whom we are going to abide by.

An hon. MEMBER: The hon. member wants all the money to go to Ireland.

Mr. McIVOR: I say it is bad politics. It is the worst kind of politics. In 1906 an act was passed in England prohibiting bookmaking, betting and wagering in the public streets. It was found to be bad politics in the United States. It is bad politics even in Ireland to-day, where they would be glad to be rid of their sweepstakes. And it will be bad politics in Canada. If this house should stoop to the standard of morality which is set up by leaders in some other places, and pass sweepstakes, when I go back to the constituency of Fort William I would have to bow my head in shame and say that, while the government of Canada has done many very fine things—notwithstanding some people's criticisms—I would be ashamed that they had approved sweepstakes, and I would not get many votes from a certain class of people—

An hon. MEMBER: You'd be surprised.

Mr. McIVOR: —when they found I was a party to the passing of a sweepstakes bill.

There are many other arguments which could be put forward, but in closing—and I have a minute left—let me say that the university of Montreal will not need this money. According to news reports, the legislature of Quebec will pass this session a three or four million dollar capital grant and an annual grant of $600,000 for the university of Montreal. Then why bother about a sweepstake? I say that it is a disrespect of any institution, an excuse to which none of us would care to stoop, to argue that one has to go to sweepstakes to raise money. I hope the government of Canada will never sink to the level of raising money by such means to provide for our war veterans, many of whom went overseas and risked their lives. I am convinced that the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) will say that assistance for the veterans is not to be obtained along these lines. I am sorry that it is now nine o'clock.

PENITENTIARIES

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill No. 34, respecting penitentiaries.

Mr. J. A. MARSH (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this bill, with which I agree in general although I take exception to some of the clauses in it. The bill is at least broad enough to include many things, under the operation of the commission which will be the resultant creature from this bill, that are at least new to Canadian life.

Prison reform cannot take place in a day. A hundred years ago there were scores of offences for which a man could be hanged. That is not the case now. I think we have learned over a period of years to differentiate between several things; first of all, to differentiate between the anti-social mind and the criminal mind. We have learned to differentiate between punishment as a deterrent to crime and punishment as fitting the criminal to be punished. I would not say that Canada lags behind the rest of the world in penitentiary reform, for the reason that there has been evolved no right way to punish crime, no right way to deter a criminal, no right way to rehabilitate a criminal, no right way to prevent crime.

I would say, however, that we in Canada have been backward in making any effort toward solution, and I believe that this bill may be the means of our progressing as a nation towards penitentiary reform. Furthermore, I see no reason why Canada cannot lead the way. Up through the years governments have been hampered by well-meaning though uninformed, I will not say unintelligent, people. Unbridled sentimentalism born of pity, the stirring up of the emotions, the heart speaking loudly and the brain and mind not at all, have created plenty of mischief in the way of penitentiary reform.

There must be no mollycoddling of prisoners, and any action we take must not of necessity be from the sympathetic point of view but must be from the point of view of common sense. The real case against the prison system is that it is not effective. It is unproductive of results rather than necessarily too humane. Until recent years the penitentiary systems at large in Canada were, I believe, cruel. I do not think any member of this house or any Canadian would care to see us go back to the nineteenth century, when the deterrence of crime occupied such a large place in the minds of people, when very, very cruel and long sentences were imposed. Therefore it is quite natural to expect that research along the improvement of penitentiary control should be logically along humane lines. But our penitentiary system stands or falls, is a success or a failure, according to its effectiveness. The only rational alternative is a prison system that is directed towards making those who go to prison come out better men than when they went there, and with all our reforms we are still very far from that goal in Canada. But I would say that this bill may be the basis of broad treatment toward success.

There are to be appointed three commissioners and perhaps three deputy commissioners, the commission having power to add to their number; and if the commission fails to make a study, first, of crime prevention and, second, of the rehabilitation of the prisoner, with a reasonable amount of aftercare, then it will not have achieved the end that is possible. Such changes as will make our prisons real centres for the training of the law-breaker in social responsibility constitute the need.

The bill provides for the establishment of a commission to control the penitentiaries. I submit that their duties under this legislation can very well be widened to take care of those two phases of crime that I have mentioned. As regards crime prevention, they might act perhaps through the family court, the juvenile court; and the rehabilitation of prisoners should start first of all within the walls of the penitentiary and then outside.

I was surprised to learn, though I need not have been, that the family court, that timely and valuable innovation in Canadian law and justice, had its beginning in the city of Ottawa right within a stone's throw of this chamber—and when I say a stone's throw I am visualizing a throw by Babe Ruth rather than a throw by the hon. member for Hamilton West, because I could not throw so far. I have said that Canada can lead the world in penitentiary reform, and in view of the fact that the family court started in Ontario I think I can reiterate that statement.

A few days ago when this bill was in the resolution stage the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) made an observation, quoting from the report of the royal commission from which this bill has been evolved. He stated that 188 prisoners, repeating criminals, recidivists, in Canada had cost the dominion $4,500,000 or $25,000 per criminal. I suggested that, in view of this, crime prevention has a real place in the activities of this commission, and that $4,500,000 would go a long way toward such. It would be a case of a stitch in time saving nine, to quote an old, hackneyed truism.

In reading the report from Judge McKinley, who I believe is the founder of the family court—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Hear, hear.

Mr. MARSH: —I find that eighty per cent of all those found in penitentiaries come from broken homes where there has been more or less trouble between man and wife, homes where there has been friction, homes where there has been separation or divorce. I suggest, therefore, that the family court, going in as it does with its helping hand, within the four walls of the home, has a great contribution to make to Canadian life in the prevention of crime. Any program of crime prevention should take into account the evidence that most criminals show of definite tendencies of antisocial behaviour early in childhood, and while it cannot be definitely concluded that any one type of crime prevention is necessarily superior to any other, I would commend that steps be taken by the commission to study the problem of youth education and crime.

I would be derelict in my duty if I did not point out the responsibility that we as parents have in the home training of our children. We have listened to a fine sermon from the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor)—

Mr. McIVOR: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member misinterpreted what I said; it was not a sermon. But a good sermon is always better than an address.

Mr. MARSH: I had no other intention than to pay the hon. gentleman a sincere compliment.

Mr. McIVOR: Thank you.

Mr. MARSH: I was going to say that the hon. member will not disturb me at any time if he quotes from the good book. The responsibility of parents in the home is a real thing in Canadian life to-day, and we as parents are not living up to that responsibility. It has been said from platform and pulpit—and I was guilty of saying the same thing myself not many weeks ago—that the church has failed. I did not mean to say that the church has failed, but we as church members have failed to live up to our obligations to the church. Our municipalities have been quickened in the last two decades in their responsibility towards the youth of our cities. They have opened recreation places and playgrounds; they have built beautiful parks in order that our children may be taken off the streets.

The churches on the other hand have fully lived up to their responsibilities. The church has socialized itself to meet physical as well as spiritual need. It has taken the boys and girls off the streets and put them in church gymnasiums where they have opportunities to play basketball, badminton and other worth while games good for body and mind. But we as parents have neglected the training of children in the homes; we have neglected the family altar and have not lived up to the heritage which is ours, the opportunity to teach the youngsters how to live, to get along with their neighbours and to take a place in life. In that connection I should like to quote from the annual report upon prisons and reformatories, 1936, over the signature of the Hon. Harry Nixon. In that report it is stated:

> It is quite evident that many parents are not successfully training their children and the many organizations engaged in working among and assisting the youth of the province have not been entirely able to counterbalance the evident deficiency in home training.

With that idea in mind I should like to draw a comparison in respect to crime between times of affluence and times of depression. It has been said that crime increases in times of distress, that depressions create crime. On that I should like to give a few figures. In 1930 there were in Ontario 3,366,000 people. The number committed for trial in that year was 29,126. There were 21,421 persons sentenced to prison. That was in a year of great prosperity, when everyone had money, when conditions were easier, when it was easy to make a living. In the depression years of 1931, 1932, 1933, 1934, we find the population of Ontario increasing, but the number of persons committed for trial dropped steadily and those sentenced to prison became fewer and fewer. The following are the figures for persons sentenced to prison for those years:

Meanwhile the population of Ontario increased and business became worse. So it is not true to say that crime is less in times of prosperity and increases in times of distress. But despite the fact that fewer young men and young women, as well as older men and women, were working; despite the fact that our service clubs, churches, municipalities were doing everything in their power to take boys and girls off the streets, the home did not keep pace. The sanctity of the home must find a real place in the life of our nation.

I point out that modern city life intensifies opportunities for friction and crime. It increases the need for regulatory laws as well as opportunities for their evasion. Not only do these things make for increased lawlessness, but the irritation they cause also tends to reduce respect for law, which many still attribute to some mysterious ethical organ in the soul of man, but which in fact is the result of complex conditioning factors. City life tends to sharpen and dramatize economic inequalities. Side by side with the luxuries displayed in shop windows, crowded slum dwellings make wholesome life exceedingly hard to maintain, children seek the streets, gang life is stimulated. The rewards of urban criminality are very much greater than they were when you, sir, and I were boys. There is ten times the temptation for youth to-day than there was in our boyhood. Not for a moment would I criticize our merchants for their manner of displaying merchandise, or say that they should change it, but I instance the counter of the five, ten and fifteen cent stores where merchandise is displayed attractively to excite longings in the minds of boys and girls. It is really wonderful to me that our boys and girls are as honest as they are.

Let me now say a word or two about the rehabilitation of criminals. If rehabilitation and aftercare are not undertaken, the majority of imprisoned offenders will again find their way back to prison. From an economic standpoint it would be cheaper to keep habitual criminals in prison than to let them out to break the law again, be brought again before the bar of justice, be prosecuted and defended by lawyers at the cost of the taxpayer. Nevertheless we cannot sentence a man to life imprisonment for an offence not calling for that sentence. It is cheaper still to cure criminals, if it is possible to do so. If methods of prevention fail, treatment in prison should be directed towards correcting the anti-social or criminal viewpoint. I have not quite made up my mind whether men and women are more susceptible to heart appeals than to appeals to the pocketbook; but whether we regard this matter from the point of view of humanity and justice or the materialistic viewpoint of dollars and cents, we must come to the same conclusion, that care must be given to the rehabilitation of the ex-criminal.

I think it is natural for all of us, as the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) brought out quite clearly this afternoon, to be more concerned about finding jobs for the lawkeeper than the lawbreaker. That is human nature, and we shall probably continue to feel that way; but I submit—and here I hark back to the holy book—that this was exactly the point of view of the elder brother of the prodigal son, and it was not the right point of view. Strongly as we feel that we must work for the young fellow who observes the law, we must not be oblivious to the need for rehabilitation of the criminal from the viewpoint either of the pocketbook or of the man himself. The graduate from a penitentiary finds it doubly hard to get employment for the following reasons: First, he has been out of touch with world events and the progress of society, so that sooner or later he will disclose the fact that he has been absent from society for a prolonged period. Second, he has become accustomed to irresponsibility, has been told what to do, has been fed, clothed, relieved of the responsibilities of life, and therefore he is not fit to take his place in an employment line-up and get himself a job. Third, sooner or later it becomes known that he is an ex-convict. Even if his employer is willing to keep him, other employees probably go to the employer and say, "We will not work with that man;" consequently he loses his job. Here a process of education of the man on the street must be followed. Canadians must be made to realize that not only should they help in restoring that man to civil life, but if they do not, they as Canadian taxpayers are paying to keep that man in an institution. Fourth, competition is too keen in the labour market for anybody but a skilled tradesman to get employment. It may so happen that within the penitentiary walls a convict has been trained to take his place with the best of artisans, but in the main he is less well fitted to take a job. Fifth, ex-convicts have insufficient resources to keep them over the long period which is often necessary before they can secure work. Sixth, ex-convicts cannot afford to be homeless, because if they are picked up by the police for vagrancy their record stands against them. Further, the public generally will not accept them into society.

What does after-care consist of? As soon as a man has been convicted and before he is sentenced, his case should be looked into by the representative of the commission for that district, who has followed the trial, so that knowledge of the cause of his criminal action may be of aid to the judge in passing sentence. At any rate the data thus obtained should be available to the penitentiary warden, for three reasons: One, it will help the warden to determine the trade for which the prisoner is fitted; two, it will aid the warden in determining the type and amount of discipline that he needs to fit him for civil life again, and the means whereby his anti-social tendencies may be corrected. Then, of course, his mental and physical condition should be reported upon. Based upon this data, the prison authorities should plan that man's path back into society; the start should be made within the penitentiary walls and continued through an agency or a person appointed by the commission. The cost of after-care is less than the cost of the repeating criminal, the recidivist, and there will be no further cost from the criminal activities of the man who becomes rehabilitated. He will become a producer, a contributor to society, instead of a non-producer and a liability.

I should like now to say a word about the parole system and the system of remission. I think the remission board definitely and entirely should be under the direction of the penitentiary commission. I do not think there is any room whatever for dual control in that regard, and I do believe the parole system and the indeterminate sentence, as practised in Ontario, should receive the attention of the dominion government and of this commission. In Ontario ninety per cent of those paroled successfully completed their parole and were absorbed into private life without further offending the law. I would also direct the minister's attention to the fact that in Ontario two prisons have been closed, largely as a result of the parole system and the indeterminate sentence. In Ontario a man cannot be released on parole unless he has a job awaiting him. How long does he keep that job? Well, recently a check was made of those paroled within the previous eighteen months, and ninety per cent of them were found still working at their jobs. That is accounted for by the fact that the relatives and friends of that man do their best to rehabilitate him into civil life. He comes out of prison with a job to go to, and it is the particular care of these people that he be kept at work. They play big brother to him; they open up avenues that otherwise would be closed to him, and I suggest that we might well take advantage of this agency.

In that connection I should like to quote from the report on the prisons and reformatories of Ontario which I hold in my hand, over the signature of the Hon. Harry Nixon, provincial secretary. According to this report, in 1935-36 the parole board held forty-five meetings, investigated 2,339 cases and authorized parole in 1,421 cases. There were 1,067 paroles put into effect; eleven prisoners were recommended for deportation; twenty-four disappeared while on parole; seventy committed crimes while on parole and were reconvicted, while seventeen were returned to reformatory, their paroles cancelled. So it will be seen that in almost 1,200 cases paroles were granted, and only 111 failed to make good. Of those 111, some seventy were reconvicted of crimes and returned to gaol, so they were not turned loose upon society to commit further crimes. This report goes on to make this comment:

> Many of these prisoners paroled are heads of families, and too often with the breadwinner in custody the family must be dependent on charity or public relief. By the one process of granting parole the family is likely to become self-supporting and the province is saved the cost of maintaining the prisoner in the institution.

I have investigated many of these parole cases and have found that in some instances years after the man has served his sentence, years after he has been reinstated in private life, he has returned to his parole officer for advice, guidance and counsel, which speaks well for the personal element, the humanitarian element that enters into this problem.

I should like to say a word also with regard to the parole and probation system as it is operated in Hamilton under Magistrate Harry Burbidge, who has made a special study of this question and has been signally successful. The parole and probation system has worked out very well, probably because in some degree Magistrate Burbidge punishes those who break parole.

We must not, of course, lose sight of the fact that we have in our penitentiaries incurables who are a menace to society, who must be watched closely after they have served their sentences. There are also those who should suffer lifelong incarceration, but that does not excuse us from paying attention to those who may be rehabilitated. It must be borne in mind that 188 recidivists cost this country $4,500,000, or $25,000 each, so from the viewpoint of economy as well as the viewpoint of common sense and humanitarianism we must pay attention to the rehabilitation of the criminal.

To sum up very briefly what I have said, Mr. Speaker, in the first place the penitentiaries commission to be created under this act should include among its duties: first, penitentiary reform based on constructive rather than sympathetic grounds; second, the study of the family court, of juvenile delinquency and crime prevention; third, the rehabilitation of the criminal, including probation and parole along national lines; fourth, more intelligent study and treatment of chronic alcoholics. I would ask the minister and hon. members this: When a chronic alcoholic offends against the law, what do we do with him? We put him either in gaol or in an insane asylum. That is not right. He is not a criminal; he is anti-social, and some special provision should be made for his case. I am speaking, of course, of the apparently incurable alcoholic.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we should have the absolute removal of penitentiaries administration from party patronage and politics. This afternoon the minister assured us that this was to become a reality. In conclusion, if crime prevention and rehabilitation of the criminal are not undertaken by this commission, what body is there capable of undertaking that work or empowered to do it?

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Chambly-Rouville): I just wanted to add my humble contribution to the discussion on this bill. What I am most interested in is the treatment accorded the officers and employees of the penitentiaries in Canada. That does not mean, of course, that I am not interested in the welfare of the prisoners, because after all they are human beings who have had the misfortune to commit what we call crimes. I am one of those who believe that in the treatment of prisoners we should apply the laws of psychology. I sincerely believe that in these days, when there are wonderful developments of science, there should be a way of bringing these citizens back on the right path, by the application of the law of psychology. I have witnessed the cure of the bad habits of children when, while they have been sleeping, right thoughts have been introduced to their minds, and that procedure has had the effect of correcting wrong habits which, according to common knowledge, had followed them from birth.

I believe the same laws should apply to prisoners. While I am expressing my views with respect to the treatment of criminals and the possibility of bringing them back to civil life, I take occasion to congratulate the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Marsh) upon his well prepared observations. I am deeply interested in the treatment accorded officers and guards of the penitentiaries. I find at page 353 of the report of the commission a recommendation that the pay of officers be brought up to a reasonable level, having regard to the type of service performed. We find that section 11 of the bill states that:

> The commission may appoint such guards, trade instructors and other subordinate officers, employees and servants as are necessary for the service of any of the penitentiaries.

[Mr. Marsh.]

Subsection 2 is in these words:

> The guards, trade instructors and other officers, employees and servants so appointed shall be paid such salaries as are approved by the governor in council.

I am pleased to see that provision in the measure. It does not imply that the guards and other officers were ill-treated, but I am under the impression that some improvement will be highly appreciated. Nevertheless I do not see anything in the recommendations with respect to the hours of labour of guards. If my information is correct, the guards are on continuous duty for twelve consecutive hours. I do not believe that a guard who performs such strenuous and tiresome work, and who must shoulder the responsibilities they have to carry, should be bound to work that length of time consecutively. I believe the recommendation of the international labour office with respect to the eight-hour day should be in force in penitentiaries as it is in other fields of activity.

I am sure the body which will be responsible for the administration of penitentiaries in Canada will attempt to improve the situation of officers and guards in the same way as they are going to improve their wages. I am satisfied that this action will be taken when, under this measure, the commission is appointed.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish on the third reading to detain the house for more than a few minutes. What I have to say, however, arises out of what was said this afternoon with regard to inspection. About ten years ago I placed a bill before the house, and on this occasion I should like to read from page 2760 of Hansard for 1930. On that occasion I quoted Chief Justice Meredith regarding the necessity of public inspection of these institutions. At the Toronto assizes, in reference to the bill then before the house, the chief justice said:

> Such inspection is in accord with that great principle in the administration of justice which for centuries has been applied and was confirmed by Magna Carta, namely, that the people shall have a large share in the administration of justice in criminal cases.
> Whether penitentiaries are well or ill managed they are managed altogether by crown officers; and the management of them is a thing of much importance in the administration of the criminal laws, so much that assuredly the people should be entitled to some means of learning for themselves what the crown officials are doing and how it is being done.
> The grand jury, representing the people of the judicial district, can most conveniently, and at no cost, perform for the people the duty of visitation.

Right after those views were expressed, the chief justice stated:

In Hamilton, two sane men for several years were in the asylum and in one case in York county girls were found without food and shelter, in a dungeon below ground, this being a punishment for some minor offence.

These are the views which show the necessity for the grand jury to visit institutions.

Under the bill the governor general, the lieutenant governor of any province, judges, members of the House of Commons and some others are named as visitors. But that type of visitation is merely nominal, and is performed in very few instances. The suggestion of the chief justice did not involve any expense. The assizes grand jury for the county of Frontenac, sitting in the city close to which Kingston penitentiary stands, could visit that institution twice a year. I hope the minister and the commission will consider an amendment to be brought down at the next session. No doubt he has made up his mind to pass the bill, and I do not wish to detain its passage for more than two or three minutes longer. On the contrary I wish him success in his venture, because I realize the administration of his duties are a heavy burden upon him.

On April 4, 1935, the same matter was discussed in the house. These questions were asked by me:

1. The number of juveniles under eighteen now detained in the penitentiaries of Canada, where, and how many sixteen or under, seventeen, eighteen and nineteen years of age?

2. Whether it is the intention of the government to give effect to the recommendations for years of grand juries and public bodies to provide separate institutions for these cases; if not, why?

3. Whether it is the intention of the government to so readjust the rules of these institutions so that juveniles and first offenders will have preferential rules and also a better classification consideration to those of repeaters?

4. Whether it is the intention of the government in the recess of parliament to appoint a royal commission or committee of the house to go into the whole question of prison reform in Canada as suggested in the debates in Hansard, 1922; if not, why not?

Following that return no action was taken by the government, but it showed that there were sixty-four prisoners of sixteen, seventeen and eighteen years.

I have referred to what Lord Chief Justice Hewart said in his book entitled, The New Despotism, with respect to the powers to make rules and regulations. He said that, if imposed, many of the rules and regulations of this commission would have the force of statutes, and that they often go beyond the powers of parliament, and certainly beyond the powers of the officials or members of the commission. He states as follows:

But, vital as the independence of judges has always been, there never was a time when it was more manifestly important than in these later days, when the effect of so much that the executive does or permits is to render it difficult for the courts to maintain the rights of the individual.

Then he goes on to condemn these acts which give the governor in council power to make these regulations. After all is said and done, they must have men in these institutions as officials. One cannot expect a teacher to be able to teach unless he is properly trained. One cannot expect a man to run an engine without having the proper training. I know of no work that can be done without the necessary training. They say they are going to have a training school. These men will be trained for a few months, but their real training will be from experience, as the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) has said.

The Conservative party are the authors of prison reform in Ontario. We see the reforms instituted by Sir James Whitney and Hon. W. J. Hanna at Guelph, Mimico and on Yonge street, north of Toronto. They were the first administration in Canada which tried to do something along these lines. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Marsh) has referred to the Borstal system. I believe if that system were put into force, it would do a tremendous amount of good. We are handicapped in Canada because of dominion, provincial and municipal jurisdiction, which they do not have in Great Britain. Ten years ago a petition was forwarded asking for the establishment of the Borstal system in Canada. This was supported by the following:

The Primate, Church of England in Canada.
The Moderator of the United Church of Canada.
The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada.
The Salvation Army in Canada.
The Church Army in Canada (Anglican).
The director of Catholic charities.
The Catholic Big Brothers.
The Protestant Big Brothers.
The Jewish Big Brothers.
The Catholic Big Sisters.
The Protestant Big Sisters.
The Jewish Big Sisters.
Judge H. S. Mott, juvenile court, Toronto.
Four judges of the county of York.
The magistrates of the city of Toronto.
The crown attorneys of the city of Toronto.

Then, in a speech from the throne a few years ago under the present government, I find the following:

My government has under consideration the adoption, throughout the penitentiaries of Canada, of a system similar to that which is known in England as the Borstal system and is making investigations as to its operations.

That was many years ago, but nothing was done. We have heard of the hardships being faced by our youth. Practically every hon. member has seen these young people travelling round the country because they can find no work to do at home. They sometimes get into difficulties because their pride will not permit them to sit idle at home, and sometimes because support for the whole family has come from a relief agency and it has been wholly inadequate to feed the younger children properly. Evidence has been conclusive that these people are not of the hobo or criminal type. This is what I said ten years ago on prison reform here:

What is happening to these unfortunate youths is most distressing. Accustomed to decent standards of living these people go for days without taking off their clothes to sleep at nights. Through this manner of living they become dirty and unkempt. In winter they suffer from exposure and hardship.

They do not wear dress suits, as the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) suggested this afternoon. I continue:

A number of wandering families, unattached men and women and boys and girls vastly exceeds those of former years, and the make-up of these groups has changed radically.

The traditional single transient in earlier years was the seasonal labourer, the knight of the road, and the occasional runaway boy or adventurous youth. To-day young men and boys who would normally be at work or in school predominate in this migratory army. Men and boys swarm on every freight train in such numbers that the railway police are helpless to keep them off.

I hope the minister will consider these suggestions.

In conclusion, I should like to refer to what has been said by the hon. member for Hamilton West. I should like to read a letter written by the Rector of the Anglican church at Sydenham, Ontario, because it states a concrete case. It reads:

In the arrest, trial and imprisonment of the two would-be robber brothers, Owen and Gordon McNeil, I feel it to be a profound sense of duty to protest strongly the judgment meted out to them.

It is only about three years ago that I saw these lads almost daily going to and from the public school, happy and care-free. On Sunday afternoons they attended my Sunday school and my Sunday school superintendent with me taught the lesson and the divine principles upon which Christian character is founded. These two boys were always timid and shy, reserved, intellectually subnormal through no fault of their own.

For many years their father, a war veteran, was in Christie street hospital and is now in hospital in Quebec. Just over three years ago, I baptized both Owen and Gordon, and prepared them for confirmation. Of their mother I have no knowledge.

A cruel post-war world created the problem of these two lads. Personally I think they never will be criminals. It was when they departed from a Christian environment, thrust out into the world, hungry and cold, "riding the rods" to Vancouver and back in company with a criminal element, that some hereditary pressure overcame and led them into shame.

Concerning the trial of Gordon, counsel said: "These young lads present a serious problem." The magistrate replied: "All I can do is to impose sentence." Alas, here is Canadian justice lacking in mercy. What the crown requires is a Christian psychologist to support counsel in such cases; at least, that is my humble opinion.

The church council of social service, the Canadian legion and service clubs, should bring some pressure to correct the sentences imposed. These two boys should not be separated, but should in all fairness be shown mercy.

[Mr. Church.]

The minister, however, takes the responsibility in connection with this commission, and I wish him success.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be too bad to let this bill pass without saying a word or two of praise for some of those who pioneered in introducing the prison reform question in this house. The hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) gave a great deal of study to this question, and she did a great deal of travelling in order to investigate different institutions. She made her own investigations and presented her findings to the house. I believe the late Harry Anderson, a former editor of the Toronto Globe, rendered perhaps the greatest assistance outside the house in bringing about the results which we hope will accrue from the bill introduced by the minister. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has always been a staunch advocate of prison reform. I think the house should give credit to the three persons I have mentioned, as well as to others whom I have not mentioned but who have rendered assistance in this effort.

I only have a few observations to make. The greatest reform which should be the objective of any bill of this type is to keep people out of prison. But a bill, of course, cannot do that. Folks go to prison for several reasons. Perhaps the first main reason springs from the impossible homes that some children are ushered into. Those who give part of their time to surveying what it is that misdirects children find frequently that some homes are simply impossible. Some parents themselves take no interest whatever in their children. I am not going to elaborate upon what can be done in that regard. Economic conditions are another reason why so many have to go to a place of detention. Perhaps another cause is lack of opportunity for sports. In the last few years a great advance in that regard has been made in Canada, but still too many hundreds and thousands of children are compelled to play on the streets instead of having some better place of recreation. There are many parks, but not sufficient. Perhaps more along that line might help to decrease the prison population. Those who have travelled in the old land know that all over that country there are great commons. One day I went to one outside London. I am sure there must have been fifty to seventy-five thousand young people, girls and boys, who had gone there over the holiday, taking their bicycles and tents, and were staying there a day or two. In Canada we have nothing of that kind. There is hardly any place for one to park outside the cities. If one takes his car outside Toronto and parks alongside some farm, he is frequently ordered away. There is no place where a man could slip over the fence and find accommodation such as is provided on the commons of England.

The second main objective should be to eliminate the repeater. I believe the minister has that object in view. Particularly do I believe that because of his being so strong for the Borstal system. I made a fairly exhaustive investigation into the operation of the Borstal system in the old country. I have in mind one prison where it was being operated. When I was there, three or four offenders came up to the gate. The man at the gate is not in uniform. One young lad came up with his head in the air and his hat on the back of his head, in a spirit of bravado. Another seemed to be dejected. But no matter what their demeanour was, the man inside the gate would at once start to treat them as though he were their father.

After they were a number of hours in the prison I was amazed at the fashion in which they were treated. They begin at once to teach them to "play the game," and all through their prison life they are taught not to let the prison down. If they come back again, of course, they let the prison down. In their sports the prisoners themselves put the younger lads through their paces. They drill them and train them. If one young lad is out of step or does not move lively or quickly, the prisoner who is training him tells him, "Now, don't let your squad down; stick up for your squad; you are competing against another squad." They are always reminding them not to let their fellows down, with the final purpose that they shall understand before they leave for the world again that they must not let their prison down. They are lined up in all sorts of teams and play, not only inside but outside the prison walls.

After they have been there for a while they are trusted and put upon their honour not to let the prison down. About seven miles from Wakefield is a three hundred acre farm. When a first offender is approaching the limit of his detention period, he is sent to that farm with others who are in a like position. There they are under supervision, mostly of other prisoners, with only a few guards. They are put on their honour to go to work away from the prison on this big farm, not even returning to the prison at night, and if they have proved that they are faithful to their prison and not likely to let it down, when their time comes they go away quite happily.

Another prison had a very large farm forty miles distant. Here again the supervision was mostly by other prisoners, with only a few guards in attendance. That is part of the Borstal system. They had gymnasia, and to my amazement the deputy warden himself was wrestling and boxing with a number of the prisoners. I saw no firearms anywhere, and no attempt to cow or submerge the prisoners. At all times they were being taught to try to recover their manhood and not to let down the institution from which they would before long return to society.

I have just one further word to say. In 1936 there were 8,462 male prisoners in the prisons of the old land. Of these 688 had been Borstal boys. That is a very small number out of the total, approximately 13,300, that had been trained in the Borstal prisons from the inception of the system in 1908 or thereabouts. It represents only about 5·1 per cent. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Marsh) referred to the good results we are getting in Ontario from the parole system, and mentioned that only about ten per cent had failed. Well, according to these figures, only 5·1 per cent of those whom the Borstal system has tried to rehabilitate have failed.

In conclusion, let me say that I have every confidence in the minister. As long as he holds his office I will support him as well as I can towards realizing the objective he has in view.

Mr. DENTON MASSEY (Greenwood): I do not purpose delaying the passage of this bill through its third reading, but as I did not delay it at all in its second or first reading perhaps I might be permitted just a word here.

We are told in the explanatory notes that the general object of this bill is to establish a commission with power under the Minister of Justice to control and manage the penitentiaries. That is a tall order. We fully realize that as a result of the conditions of the past ten years many are inhabiting our penal institutions who would never have been incarcerated but for the circumstances under which they have been compelled to live, very often through no fault of their own.

To control and manage a penitentiary is one thing, and to control and manage or attempt to have some part in managing the future lives of those who are the inmates of that penitentiary is another. So it evolves that the commission which will be set up under this bill has given to it a serious and grave responsibility. The bill of itself is not perfect. There are phases of it which some of us would like to see slightly altered. On the other hand, in the main it is good. The report of the royal commission to investigate our penal institutions is full of recommendations, many of which are good; and as I understand it from the minister, the new commission is to consider the report of the royal commission and govern itself upon the recommendations as it sees fit.

The report of the royal commission itself had its genesis many years ago, and society in Canada owes a debt of gratitude to the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) for her excellent work in making this report possible.

Those of us who, as a result of our vocations or even avocations outside this house, have dealt with youth for the past twenty years, realize that one of the most important phases in connection with our penal institutions is the way in which the young lad is let out. He may have the advantage of being placed in one of the better penitentiaries; but after all, when he leaves, he is still in the minds of many an outcast from society. He finds it extraordinarily difficult to become reestablished, and if it so happens that the crime for which he has been put in gaol was committed in a location far removed from his home, if he had one, he is sent back to that place from which he was committed to prison, and left to drift. As a result of the interest which many sterling men and women have taken in these young men, legion is the name of those who have been reclaimed for society. But in great part this has been, not because of the penitentiary in which they were placed but in spite of it. Therefore it seems to me that one of the most important jobs that this commission has to perform is to see to it not only that it controls and manages the penitentiaries, but that it makes sure that when the man is released there are agencies as far as possible to look after his future to the fullest and best end.

I shall watch with a great deal of interest the progress which this commission makes, because my interest in this whole matter is exceedingly keen. I sincerely hope, as does the whole of Canada, that the minister will exercise that rare judgment of his in the appointment of this commission and make sure beyond any possible doubt that there cannot be even any suspicion of a political tinge in the choice of those who become its members. If there is any matter in this dominion that cuts across party lines, it is the one that we are now considering; and I am fully confident, knowing the minister as I do, that he will make sure that the commission is not handicapped at the outset by the stigma of partisanship.

There is much that I should like to say at this point. I may associate myself fully with the remarks so ably made to-night by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Marsh), and, as I have said, I shall watch with much interest and expectation the progress of the commission.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): I am sure the passage of this bill will please the minister, but before it carries I wish to say how much I appreciate the gracious words of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) and the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey). It is a triumph for democracy that the hon. member for Davenport and I should find ourselves in agreement. I can remember that many years ago, when we were both new in this house, the respect and regard, and something close to affection, which we now feel for each other, were conspicuously lacking; but through the years it may be we have changed and now we have come to the place where we are saying identical things on this great social problem. I do appreciate his kindness in referring to me. The kindness of the hon. member for Greenwood is not so remarkable, since our friendship has been so well known from the beginning.

Mr. MASSEY: I think I should rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. POWER: It is a privilege.

Miss MACPHAIL: The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has seen the struggle for reform of our penitentiaries from the time I have been here, from 1921, and I am sure that it is a great satisfaction to him to be at the point of having the bill carried, setting up the commission. We know that this is not the end but the beginning, and that much, in fact everything, depends upon the commissioners and upon the assistance we can give them, as well as the guidance that will be accorded them, in thought at least, by the Minister of Justice.

I congratulate the Minister of Justice upon his persistence in following through the subject which has interested him for many years. He has had many trying times, and I am sure he will be happy to have a commission that will carry a part of the burden for him.

In agreeing to this bill we are just starting the commission on its way with our very best wishes for its success.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

REVIEW OF GOVERNMENT FILM ACTIVITIES—INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE TO CENTRALIZE DISTRIBUTION

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to create a national film board empowered and directed to review and report on government film activities and to discharge such other duties as the governor in council may request; and to authorize the governor in council to appoint, and determine the salary of, a commissioner, to be the chief executive officer of the board. Also to provide for the appointment of an interdepartmental committee to centralize government film distribution.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain how the board will fit in with the motion picture bureau? What type of films are produced by the bureau at the present time?

Mr. EULER: The purpose of the bill which is to be founded on this resolution is fairly, if briefly, described in the resolution itself, but I might add something to acquaint the committee with the purposes of the bill. Perhaps primarily the reason for the framing of the bill is the fact that the film has become a very important and powerful factor in the dissemination of information, the production of entertainment, and for publicity purposes generally and it is growing constantly. Various departments of the government—I need not mention them particularly, but at least five or six departments of the government—have had in the past their own film activities entirely independent of one another. It must be evident that the matter of films has advanced to the stage where it may be often in the national interest to prepare films which will serve national purposes as distinct from those of any individual department.

As I have stated, various departments have been preparing their own films—and this is not a criticism of any department—but the preparation of these films has been conducted in a more or less haphazard way, no one department cooperating with another, with the result that there has been a good deal of overlapping, consequent lack of economy, and also of efficiency. Believing that, the government feel that it would be a step in the right direction to coordinate the various film activities of the different departments by creating what is called in the bill a national film board, which shall have control of the film activities of the various departments of government, not entirely assuming their responsibilities, because each department will still have power to initiate its own films, but these films will be approved by the central board.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then where will the economy come in?

Mr. EULER: If my hon. friend will allow me to proceed for the moment, I think the fuller discussion of the bill itself will come in committee. While there is no definite intention on the part of the government at the moment to enter upon a broad development of national films, that I think should be borne in mind, because of the fact that, as I stated before, the film is in itself becoming such a powerful medium for the dissemination of information and publicity. In order to bring about coordination and provide against the overlapping of which I spoke, it is proposed to form a central organization which must give its approval to every proposal for film production on the part of any department. If it be found that any one department is going through exactly the same process of preparing a film as another department, that can be checked and corrected. I might say that in the past there have been instances where two departments have been proceeding in one province to take practically the same sort of films, with consequent overlapping.

Mr. LAWSON: Two dominion departments, or one dominion and one provincial?

Mr. EULER: Two dominion departments. The purpose then is to set up a national film board, to consist of eight members, two of whom will be members of the government, one of those being the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who will be the chairman. In addition to these, there will be three members drawn from the civil service and three members drawn from the citizens of Canada. I might say tentatively that possibly one might be from the press, one from the radio and one from the schools or colleges or other educational institutions. But that is merely by the way; that has not been definitely decided.

Mr. MANION: To act with or without pay?

Mr. EULER: None of these men will receive any pay. Their expenses of course will be provided for, such expenses as may be necessary for their travelling and any work they have to do, but they will not be in receipt of any salary or honorarium of any kind. There is also provision for an executive officer of the board, who is designated in the bill as a commissioner. He will be the only paid official. It will be his duty to act under the instruction or supervision of the board in its practical work of coordination and that sort of thing.

Mr. HARRIS: Is he to be a member of the board?

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. HARRIS: Who, then, is the eighth member?

Mr. EULER: There are to be two members of the government, three from the civil service and three from outside.

Mr. HARRIS: Who is to be the second member of the government? The minister mentioned the Minister of Trade and Commerce as one; perhaps the Minister of Agriculture will be the other?

Mr. EULER: Well, that might be quite all right; they seem to work together pretty well. I did think my hon. friend was serious in his question, but I see he was not.

I have spoken then of the composition of the board, providing for a commissioner who will be the executive officer of the board. In addition, there will be an interdepartmental committee. It might not be necessary to include that in the bill, but it is thought well to give that committee an official standing. The members of that committee will be drawn from the departments which have film activities, the chairman to be the commissioner himself. Then, of course, we have the government film bureau which is operating under the Department of Trade and Commerce. I may say in passing that according to those who know, the film bureau which we have now, is as well equipped in its rather small way as any such plant in north America. It is, of course, the intention that the films which will be made for the government shall as far as possible be produced in the government film bureau now in the Department of Trade and Commerce. That, however, is not obligatory; it may be found that a department or a minister may wish to have a certain kind of film produced which could better be prepared by some private organization, and if he receives the approval of the film board that may be done.

I should perhaps add, because there seems to have been a certain amount of uneasiness in regard to this, that the bill does not provide in any way for supervision or control of private film organizations. The primary and really the only purpose of the bill is to provide for improvement and efficiency in the preparation of government films, whether prepared by the bureau or by outside film concerns.

The purpose is to provide also for efficiency in distribution. There is room for a great deal of improvement in the economic and efficient distribution of these films, both in Canada and more particularly abroad, where Canada is being advertised in so many ways.

I may add, in conclusion, that this board is not being established with the intention of providing jobs for anybody. There is really to be only one paid man in the organization.

Mr. HARRIS: How much will he be paid?

Mr. EULER: That is not set out in the bill. It is provided that the governor in council shall make the appointment.

Mr. MacNICOL: He might be taken out of the civil service.

Mr. EULER: He might, conceivably.

Mr. HARRIS: He is more likely to be taken out of the house.

Mr. EULER: That would be out of the service too.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Is the hon. member an applicant?

Mr. EULER: That has not been considered. But the only other paid official might be a clerk or a stenographer. It is not a board or organization that is going to require the expenditure of a great deal of public money. The purpose is simply to coordinate what we are doing now, to make it more efficient, perhaps less expensive, and to see that the distribution of films is done to better advantage.

Mr. MANION: Will the minister promise that this board will not be built up into a large new department?

Mr. EULER: I will promise it as far as I am concerned.

Mr. MANION: It is a hard thing to stop once it starts.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has suggested that parliament should look to the future and be thinking of national films. As I read the reports of the Department of Trade and Commerce, the films that we are producing at the present time are used largely for promotion of trade and of our tourist business. I suggest to him that provision should be made now for making and distributing national films, designed to help Canadians in all parts of Canada to understand the ways of living and the problems of Canadians in other parts. Perhaps every hon. member must have been impressed by two facts: first, that it is difficult for Canadians in one part of Canada to understand what is going on in other parts of the country, and, second, that moving pictures are having a remarkable effect on the Canadian people, particularly on the children and young men and women.

I see by "Canada 1939," issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce, that the motion picture continues to be the most popular form of amusement in this dominion. Figures for 1937 show 1,047 motion picture theatres, with a total of 134,374,061 paid admissions. We all know how the children flock to the moving picture theatres on Saturdays and other holidays and, in fact, on every occasion; I would ask the minister whether there is not some chance of this national film board, some time within not the distant but the near future, making and distributing films showing Canadian life, and making arrangements with the moving picture theatres across Canada to show these pictures once they are made.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps I have not made myself quite as clear as I had hoped. One of the purposes we have in mind in establishing the film board is the very one mentioned by my hon. friend, the making of a national film along national or perhaps instructive lines, or even by way of amusement, if you like, but for the general cultural development of the children of this country. That, I think the committee would admit, is hardly possible while the film activities remain under the control of more than one department. Cast your mind now over the various departments of government which issue films. Is any one of them qualified, or is it the duty of any one department, to prepare, issue or distribute a film along national lines? I would say not, and that is one of the reasons for the establishment of this board, which not only can concern itself with reviewing and passing upon requests for films coming from the various departments but can of itself, as the funds become available—which of course must be voted by parliament—initiate films of the national character referred to by my hon. friends.

Mr. GREEN: Will it be possible to make arrangements with moving picture theatres to show these films once they are made?

Mr. EULER: Quite so; that is one of the things in which perhaps we have not been as efficient as we could have been. These films should have been distributed much more widely than has been the case in the past, and we think that by the creation of this board that purpose will be much better served than formerly.

Mr. GREEN: The theatres will use them?

Mr. EULER: I think that is quite probable.

Mr. PELLETIER: The minister stated a moment ago that there were various government departments at present engaged in making films of various kinds. I wonder if the creation of this board and the consolidation of this work will lead to the displacement of any considerable number of workers at present engaged in that line of activity?

Mr. EULER: I think not. As a matter of fact, if we concentrate the work in our own film bureau in the Department of Trade and Commerce, it will give employment to people there. In the past, for instance, if one department has had its films prepared by some private organization, that work will be transferred to our own bureau, so where work ceases in one place it will begin in another. I do not think there will be any net reduction in employment.

Mr. PELLETIER: Then I take it from the remarks of the minister that this will not affect any large number of jobs. My next question is, what cooperation, if any, will there be between this new board and the various extension departments of the universities throughout Canada? I understand many universities make films of this kind, and I should like to know if it is the intention that this film board will cooperate with those extension departments in order to prepare films on various subjects which might be to the general advantage of the people of Canada.

Mr. EULER: The primary purpose of the bill is to coordinate government activities. Beyond that certainly there will be plenty of scope for the board itself to cooperate with any other interest, whether it be a university, a theatre, or anyone concerned in the dissemination of information and general publicity for Canada. I am afraid I cannot go so far as to say that at the moment any definite arrangement is contemplated to cooperate with the universities. That is all in the future, but I think it is quite within the compass of the activities of the board and quite within the bounds of expectation as to what the board may accomplish.

Mr. PELLETIER: I am glad to hear the minister make that statement, and I believe this will fill a long felt want in the country. My last question is this: We now have a board controlling broadcasting and another controlling the marketing of our wheat. I should like to know if this new board will be responsible to parliament. Apparently the other boards are not responsible to parliament, and their work may be, if not criticized, at least discussed in this house at certain times. I think in connection with an educational matter of this kind we should have an opportunity of discussing these questions from time to time. For that reason I am wondering if this board will be responsible to this parliament.

Mr. EULER: Any work done by the board on its own initiative, for instance in preparing a national film, would necessitate the expenditure of money. That money must be voted by this parliament, and there is no reason in the world why all the activities of that board should not be discussed here. The board itself, of course, is responsible to the government; in fact, the government can veto anything it wishes. I think it quite sufficient to say that the board will be under the control of the government and consequently under the control of this parliament, as will be seen if the committee considers the make-up of the board. Two of the members will be ministers of the crown, of whom one will be chairman. Three of the members will be civil servants, while the other three will be from the outside. I think the mere fact that the board will include two ministers and three civil servants will indicate at least that the board will be pretty thoroughly under the control of parliament and the government, and of course the funds must be voted by parliament. Therefore, discussion of any phase of the work of the board can take place here.

Mr. LAWSON: May we have the assurance of the minister that, when the bill is brought down, it will provide that parliament must vote the necessary funds? In connection with the broadcasting commission, as I understand it, we are in the unfortunate position, so far as this parliament is concerned, that we have a completely autonomous body, separate and distinct. The Department of Transport collects the licence fees from the people and deducts what it considers the cost of collecting, turning the balance over to the board without the yea or nay of this parliament, so we have no say about the matter. I do not want parliament to be in a similar situation in connection with another body.

Mr. EULER: There is no great similarity between the two cases.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I think the advantages and benefits to be gained by the distribution of films of this kind are very much to be desired. Having in mind the work that is done to-day by the national research council and the aid it has given industry in one way and another, I would urge on the government that when this film board is set up, not only should it have in mind the benefits to be derived from the circulation of films of this kind but should look at the matter from the commercial point of view as well. If these films are properly and carefully made, I am sure a demand will develop for them, and I do not see why this should not become an enterprise which not only will spend government money but may return a considerable revenue to the country.

If one were to go to the city of London, England, he might see one, or two, or half a dozen of these places where only newsreels of one kind or another are shown. Many of the pictures shown there are of national interest. I do not see why the same thing cannot be developed in Canada. At this time pictures of one kind or another are brought from other places. I believe there is no reason why, if we develop good reels of national importance, they could not be leased to these companies in a commercial way.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. LAWSON: No; I am just waiting for everybody else to finish, because there are a number of things I want to say.

Mr. MASSEY: I listened with a good deal of interest while the minister recited to us the personnel of the proposed film board. He suggested that he would be chairman, and that another minister would be associated with him. There would be three civil servants and, as I understood it, perhaps a school teacher, a pressman and a business man, or three private citizens of some kind.

Mr. POWER: In that case I shall not be on the board.

Mr. EULER: That was merely a suggestion.

Mr. MASSEY: I was going to suggest that, after all, if we are going to produce films, the presence of a showman on the board is highly to be desired.

Mr. LAWSON: No one has thought of the moving-picture man.

Mr. MASSEY: The moving-picture business is a complicated one, and, with all due deference to hon. gentlemen opposite who occupy the treasury benches I see no one who has the ability of a P. T. Barnum or a Cecil B. deMille.

Mr. EULER: That is a compliment.

Mr. MASSEY: It seems to me that political ability and the ability to produce an excellent motion picture film are two entirely different matters. Accordingly, I heartily commend to the minister the idea that among the three private citizens he selects for his film board he go as far as possible to obtain showmen for those positions.

Mr. LAWSON: I understood the minister to say that different departments of government were producing their own films. Surely that cannot be correct. Has the government, or any department of it, any facilities of any kind to produce motion picture films, other than through the motion picture bureau in the minister's department?

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend must have misunderstood what I said. Perhaps I did not make myself clear. When I say that the various departments have in some instances produced their own films, I mean they have had their films produced on their own initiative. They have given power, perhaps, to private concerns and perhaps to our own film bureau, but there was no restriction or any injunction on the part of the government that they must produce their films in our own bureau. That now will be the case. Ordinarily every film desired by any department must, if it passes the scrutiny of the board, be produced in the government bureau, except if it is thought by the board it can be produced better in some other way. It may be quite necessary for the film board itself, in the case of a national film or in the interests of any one department, to use some producing medium other than our own bureau. I do not know about that. Generally speaking, it is hoped that we shall use our own bureau as much as possible. That is only natural. But it is quite possible to go beyond that.

One hon. member made some observations with respect to our making a commercial proposition of the matter. That is not the intention of the government. As I said, it is to do our own work, and to do it as efficiently as possible. It is quite possible that when we produce good films we may receive certain revenues from them, but I may also say for the information of the committee that it is not the intention through this medium to enter into competition with private business.

Mr. LAWSON: There is one other matter—and the minister may refuse to answer if he desires. The government has the motion picture bureau. The man at the head of it has been there for some time, I believe. Is it in contemplation that that man shall be the commissioner, or is it thought that some one is going to be brought in in addition to the man already there?

Mr. EULER: Perhaps I am wrong, but it would seem that the hon. member asks his question because of a certain statement made in that connection. A suggestion as to who might be commissioner appeared in the press a few days ago. I should like to say to the committee that no consideration whatever has been given so far as to who the commissioner should be. There was no ground for the publication of the article as it appeared in the press. I am quite frank when I say that any statement as to who he might be would be quite out of order, because no consideration whatever has as yet been given to the matter.

Mr. LAWSON: Mr. Chairman, I had in mind expressing several thoughts in connection with the resolution when I saw it on the order paper. Frankly, however, the minister's statement to-night has indicated to me that when I read the resolution I may have had a misconception of what was contemplated. Therefore, in the main I am going to withhold any opposition I may have or any contributions I may wish to make to the debate until the bill is in committee. It might be well, however, if at this time I indicated quite clearly to the minister the line of thought that is in my mind in connection with this proposal. There is nothing political in it; it is just an ordinary, everyday matter of business. It so happens that I think I know something about the motion picture business—at least I should. I was in it at one time, and after I became a lawyer—

Mr. EULER: This is not an application for a commissionership, is it?

Mr. LAWSON: No, not at all. Nothing could induce me to take the job. Since that time I have in my legal activities at different times represented many phases of the motion picture industry. This is what I have in mind: In every province there is a motion picture bureau which, generally speaking, is an adjunct of or is in some way connected with the board of censors of that province. In every province the object of the film bureau is to produce pictures advertising the products of that particular province. Their objective has always been alleged to be the distribution of that film.

The first question I am going to raise when the bill is in committee, is that this is a duplication of what is being done by the provinces throughout Canada. Unless the minister can satisfy me that the board is going to accomplish something that is not being accomplished by the respective provincial motion picture bureaux, then I am going to oppose the measure on the plain, pure and simple principle that it is just another case of duplication of public services, the cost of all of which will ultimately come out of the pockets of the taxpayers. In the provinces, in the main, it comes out of the motion picture industry, because it is taxed in that way.

Mr. EULER: May I ask a question?

Mr. LAWSON: Yes.

Mr. EULER: Is the hon. member referring to the provincially operated picture bureaux in the various provinces?

Mr. LAWSON: Yes. Every province has what is known as a motion picture bureau. There is one in Ontario and another in Quebes. I am not so sure about New Brunswick, but there is one in Nova Scotia and one in British Columbia.

Mr. EULER: May I ask another question?

Mr. LAWSON: Yes.

Mr. EULER: Is my hon. friend of the opinion that when the dominion government desires to issue a film, it should go to a provincial organization to have the work done?

Mr. LAWSON: Not at all. I suggest that it should go where on at least two occasions dominion government departments have gone. They went there because they found they could get a film produced much more economically by this private enterprise. I do not want to be contentious because I know the minister is terribly sincere in connection with the affairs of his department. All I am doing to-night is to ask him to familiarize himself with the subject matter before the bill is presented, and to indicate the questions which I shall ask at that time.

Mr. EULER: The hon. member is really discussing the merits of private or public ownership.

Mr. LAWSON: I do not want to go into that field at all. Long ago, when this motion picture bureau was in its infancy, I questioned the wisdom of such a bureau. On one occasion at least, I made representations to the Minister of Trade and Commerce of the government of which I was a supporter. His views and mine did not coincide, but that is beside the point. I still hold to the same contention. I expect the minister to be able to deal with these questions when the bill is in committee, and I think it only fair to advise him ahead of time of what I am going to ask so that the necessary data and information may be available to him.

First, before I support this bill I want to be satisfied that there will be no duplication of provincial services. Should the dominion government want a film produced which could not or would not in the ordinary course of events be produced by a provincial motion picture bureau, I want to know why that could not be produced by calling for tenders from the two extremely efficient motion picture producing agencies. These companies put out news films and other films of a kind which this bureau would contemplate using.

Second, the minister has stated that the dominion motion picture bureau has the most efficient equipment. I ask the minister to satisfy himself on that point before the bill goes into committee. If they have the most efficient equipment, I should like the minister to inquire why within the last eighteen months when the wheat board, I think it was, wanted to produce a film they engaged a private company to do the work. I think it was the Associated Screen News of Montreal which was called in to take the sound effects and produce the sound record. Again I must say that I do not know whether my information is correct and I have not inquired into the situation, but I am told that this was done because that company had more efficient and up-to-date equipment for the purpose of recording sound. I am dubious that the present motion picture bureau has the latest and most-up-to-date equipment. If it has not, I warn the minister that he will have to spend thousands of dollars for the purchase of such equipment. It would be much more profitable to have any motion pictures required made by the Associated Screen News or the other concern, the name of which I have forgotten.

The next matter I am going to speak about is this advisory board. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) has mentioned this. When the minister was speaking, it struck me as most amazing that in establishing a board for the purposes suggested, apparently no thought is being given to having as a member a practical motion picture man.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps the commissioner will have that qualification.

Mr. LAWSON: Do not misunderstand me. I have no criticism to make of the gentleman who is at the head of the motion picture bureau; I cannot even recall his name for the moment. I have no criticism of any kind to offer; it is merely a thought that I have in mind. I do suggest to the minister that he should take some advice from people skilled in the motion picture business.

Some mention was made of distribution in theatres and making it a profitable enterprise. I think the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) dealt with that phase of the matter. Let me say to the minister that to the best of my knowledge, information and belief, no country in the world has ever been able to get a distribution of film on a revenue basis, that is, film which would be produced by a government motion picture bureau. It just cannot be done.

Mr. EULER: That is not our primary purpose.

Mr. LAWSON: That has not been possible, either in Canada or in the United States.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Why?

Mr. LAWSON: For the simple reason that motion picture film is distributed by organizations known as exchanges. These people distribute film all across Canada. The basis of distribution is to rent film to the owners of motion picture theatres for so much money. Naturally the owners of motion picture theatres want to rent only those films which will draw people into their theatres, which will attract people who will be willing to pay admissions at the box-office. I am afraid that the number of people who would pay to see a film about the growing of wheat, about the bottling of milk, about certain health matters and so on, would not be sufficient to pay the small weekly salary of the man who operated the motion picture machine. You simply cannot distribute this film on a commercial basis. I will admit that if you can connect up with the proper distribution agencies, they may be able to get a measure of distribution for you by sending this film out as a filler to small theatres which can afford to pay only a small weekly sum for their films for the week, whether it be two or three changes a week.

Another problem enters into the question of distribution. It is important that there should not be confusion in this matter. One must not think of distributing film in motion picture theatres in the same terms as one would think of distributing film in schools, public halls and so forth for educational purposes. The same film cannot be distributed in both cases. The film used in the motion picture theatre is what is known as 35 mm. film. This type of film is highly inflammable and powerful light must be used in projecting it. The projection machines cost at least $700, and sound equipment and photo-electric cells cost much more money. Every province in Canada has the most rigid regulations as to the type of room which shall be used as an operating room for the projection of such film. The 35 mm. film can be distributed only to motion picture theatres.

When one comes to talk about halls and schools, one must consider another type of film. This is a non-inflammable film known as the 16 mm. film. It can be projected with the use of an ordinary electric bulb, and it creates no fire hazard. If one is going to distribute to both sources, one must make two films. As a matter of fact, until within the last two years there was not any organization in this country set up to distribute the safe film or the 16 mm. film. Now there is, so I think any thought of putting this on a commercial basis might just as well be disposed of now as any other time. You can never get a demand from motion picture theatres for this kind of film, and I do not think you can ever get a revenue.

I point these matters out to the minister because, when the bill comes up, I should like him to be prepared to deal with them; and I seriously suggest to him that in the meantime he inquire as to the actual necessity of having this film board for government films, of setting up this organization with eight members of a board of governors, or whatever you want to call it, with a commissioner superimposed on top of the organization which you already have, and which I am frank to say in my opinion is just another burden of debt on the taxpayer of this country, duplicated in a large measure at the present time by the provincial bureaux. In any event, I suggest to the minister, everything that can be accomplished at the present time by his motion picture bureau and by the set-up he proposes could be accomplished, by any department which felt that it needed a film for distribution to advertise something of Canada in foreign lands, by their simply going before the treasury board and satisfying it as to the necessity of an expenditure for the purpose, and then going out and calling for tenders for making that film, from the companies now in business in Canada.

Mr. EULER: Who would initiate, for example, a national film?

Mr. LAWSON: What does the minister mean by "a national film?"

Mr. EULER: A film which might be of an educational nature intended for all the people of the whole country, and which would not touch the particular interests of any one department.

Mr. LAWSON: All right. Such a national film, I would say, might be initiated by the minister of any department.

Mr. EULER: But it would not be his particular business.

Mr. LAWSON: Well, suppose it was not his particular business; let me put it in this way. The Department of Trade and Commerce, for example, is charged, is it not, with extending the trade and commerce of the Dominion of Canada? All right. In order to advance the sale of Canadian goods, or something of that kind, in foreign countries, the department decides that the best way to do it is to have a motion picture film made. Then what on earth is to prevent the minister from calling for tenders from private enterprise, the motion picture companies, to manufacture a film, asking them to submit a scenario or what he proposes should be in it, and having received the prices, to go to the treasury board and say, "Here is the amount of money I propose to spend and here is the purpose I hope to accomplish"? If treasury board thinks it is a good idea, they authorize it; if they do not think it is a good idea, they do not. Might I in turn say to the minister, who initiates any national films now?

Mr. EULER: Nobody. That is just the point.

Mr. LAWSON: Well, then, what has the national motion picture bureau been doing during these last seven or eight years, if they have not been supporting something of that kind in this country?

Mr. EULER: It has been doing work for the various departments. It is a branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce; but the Department of Trade and Commerce has never thought that it was its particular duty to produce films that had anything to do with any activity other than applies to its own department, namely the promotion of business and sales. There might be a cultural film that the film board might think was quite proper for dissemination throughout the whole of Canada. It is not the particular duty of the Department of Trade and Commerce to initiate a film of that kind. It would not be the duty of the Department of Natural Resources or the Department of Agriculture. Nevertheless it would be in the interests of the country that it should be done. Who is going to do it; who is going to initiate it, if not a body such as this, which has a national view as well as doing the work for the various departments? That is what is in my mind with regard to it.

Mr. LAWSON: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but it does seem to me that if there existed a national necessity for a national film, there would be many people in Canada urging that it be produced; it occurs to me that there would be many ministers in any government who would be anxious that it should be produced, and it could be initiated by any minister and could be submitted to the treasury board or some similar body. I say with great frankness that I look upon this as just another one of these things that constantly increase expenditure and the burden of taxation in this country and cannot justify its existence. I am sorry if my view differs from that of the minister. I can be no fairer than to give him ample warning of what I have in my mind, and ask him to prepare his brief and submit it to the house when he brings down his bill.

Mr. EULER: I am not objecting to it for a moment.

Mr. LAWSON: I cannot do more than that. I feel we are just piling up another government organization on top of the tremendous number of organizations we already have.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In connection with this board, I have urged that if they were going to set it up they should do it so that to a certain extent they would have something come out of it; it would be commercial. For instance, in connection with the coming visit to Canada of the king and queen, who is to have the rights of taking these pictures in various places? Can private enterprise, for instance, be sold the rights, or are our own government bureaux to take these pictures?

Mr. EULER: The question has been considered, but I am not in a position to answer it to-night.

Mr. MASSEY: It seems to me highly to be desired that in connection with this board the splendid service that Mr. Frank Badgley has given to the dominion motion picture bureau should be recognized in a distinct and specific way. I had the good fortune to be associated with Mr. Badgley some years ago in the matter of the production of a moving picture, and so had occasion first hand to judge of his abilities in this regard; and when the minister made the statement he did a few moments ago in regard to the equipment we have on hand here, I am sure he was referring not only to the physical equipment but to the personnel as well. We are to be congratulated I think, upon having such a man as Mr. Badgley, and I would earnestly urge the minister that in setting up this board full consideration be given to this phase of the question.

Mr. STEVENS: There is a matter about which I wish to ask the minister. I was called out of the house while he was speaking, and he may have covered it. If so, I am sorry. As far as I am concerned I have nothing but the highest regard for Mr. Badgley and the motion picture bureau. I think they have done excellent work. It is eleven o'clock, and I think we might as well report progress because I have a few questions to ask.

Mr. EULER: It would not be possible to get the resolution through?

Mr. STEVENS: I am prepared to proceed and ask my questions.

An hon. MEMBER: It is eleven o'clock.

An hon. MEMBER: Ask the questions.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. STEVENS: If you are going to do that, Mr. Chairman, I will go on, but it is eleven o'clock.

Mr. EULER: I have no objection, Mr. Chairman. I am quite ready to move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 8, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE CONCURRED IN

Mr. W. H. MOORE (Ontario) presented the first report of the standing committee on banking and commerce, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—CORPORAL JOSEPH BOUDREAU

Mr. HÉON:

1. Were any complaints made against Corporal Joseph Boudreau, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, while he was on duty at the Seven islands, Charlevoix county?
2. If so, what was the nature of such complaints?
3. Were the said complaints found justified?
4. Is Corporal Joseph Boudreau still a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?
5. If so, where is he stationed?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East):

1, 2 and 3. Certain complaints were made against Corporal Boudreau by a former employee of the government who had been dismissed. Such charges were duly investigated and every action taken that circumstances justified.

4 and 5. Corporal Boudreau is still a member of the force, stationed at Bathurst, N.B. It is not considered in the public interest to give more particulars with regard to the matter.

REAR JUDIQUE CHAPEL, N.B., POST OFFICE

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Has any change been made in the location of the post office at Rear Judique Chapel?
2. If so, why, and on whose recommendation?
3. Is the post office in as convenient a place for the public as it was before?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. Yes.
2. Postmaster resigned. New postmaster recommended by Donald MacLennan, M.P.
3. Office slightly off main road and on a hill but, according to district director, more central than old location. No complaint received.

*WHEAT CROP OF 1938

Mr. HAYHURST:

1. What amount of the 1938 wheat crop remained on hand at February 28, 1939?
2. How much of this crop was exported from: (a) Montreal; (b) Vancouver; (c) all other ports?

Mr. EULER: This question bears on the same subject as the question asked by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) the other day, which it was thought not to be in the public interest to answer. I regret that I have to take the same position in regard to this question.

MONTREAL CONSTRUCTION SUPPLY AND EQUIPMENT SHELL CONTRACT

Mr. MacNEIL:

1. What is the value of the machinery purchased for the use of the Montreal Construction Supply and Equipment Limited, Montreal, for the machining of shell bodies?

2. With what firms were the orders placed for such machinery, and were tenders called for in each instance?

3. What has been the cost to the government for the installation of such machinery?

4. What firms secured the orders for billets and forgings as required by the Montreal Construction Supply and Equipment Limited, and were tenders called in each instance?

5. What price will be paid by the government for each such billet and forging, including transportation and delivery charges?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have no personal objection to having this question answered, but I think that under the rules of the house when a matter has been referred to a standing committee no question with reference to it can be answered in the house. I refer to Campion, page 130, rule 37.

2. How many pounds of canned beef did Canada import from the Argentine during each of the said years?

3. What amount of duty per pound was collected in each instance?

*SUDETEN AND OTHER EUROPEAN IMMIGRANTS

Mr. GARIEPY:

1. Is it true, as published in La Presse of the 4th instant, page 1, that arrangements have been completed for the transportation to Canada of a number of Sudeten people and for their settlement on farms in Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia?
2. Is the government aware of these arrangements, if such exist, or of any arrangements whatsoever for the transportation to, and settlement in Canada of Sudetens or other European immigrants?
3. What is the nature, object and date of these arrangements, and who are the persons with whom the arrangements have been made?
4. When will such arrangements go into effect?
5. How many individuals will be admitted into Canada, and where will they be located by virtue of any agreement reached?
6. What is the extent of the financial responsibility, if any, assumed by the dominion government for carrying out this settlement plan?
7. Will the government submit the proposed plan of settlement for the consideration of parliament?

Mr. CRERAR: Yesterday I stated in reply to questions asked by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) that I hoped to be in a position to-day to give a reply concerning the matter to which this question refers. The information is not yet quite complete; therefore I ask that this question stand. The statement will be made to-morrow.

Question stands.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—IMPORTATION OF UNITED STATES WHEAT INTO ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), of which I have given him notice, based partly on an item which I read in the Ottawa Journal this morning, as follows:

Washington, March 7.—Discussions with Canada have begun in an effort to iron out a number of difficulties that arose after the new trade agreement with the dominion went into effect January 1.

In view of these discussions I wish to draw to the attention of the minister the very acute and urgent situation in which Ontario wheat farmers find themselves, due to the fact that they are finding it impossible to sell their wheat through the usual channels while at the same time they claim that over 600,000 bushels of subsidized American wheat have been brought into Ontario to be used by certain Ontario flour mills. It is claimed that one of these users of subsidized American wheat is offering flour at $2.60 per barrel in Montreal, whereas flour made from Ontario soft winter wheat could not to-day be sold for less than $2.90 per barrel. That is the statement to me, and I should like to ask the minister if this matter will be discussed with the committee which is referred to in the newspaper item I have quoted.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, while the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) did give me notice that he intended to ask this question, I had not seen the article and he did not read it to me in detail. However, for his information and the information of the house I might say that so far as a United States committee discussing matters with the Canadian government is concerned, I have no knowledge of any such committee meeting any representatives of the Canadian government, and I think I should know if such a conference were taking place.

With regard to the importation of United States wheat by mills in Ontario, I have had considerable correspondence, including a good many letters from farmers and others in Ontario, complaining about the importations. There is no doubt that some wheat is coming in from the United States and being milled in Ontario, and possibly some of it is being exported. Perhaps this part of the question should be answered by my colleague the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley), but these importations are coming in under the law as it stands. I may admit, however, that the situation is giving some concern to the government, but at the moment I can only say that it is receiving consideration.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

DIVISION OF COSTS AS BETWEEN DOMINION, PROVINCES AND MUNICIPALITIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): I have received a telegram to which I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). The telegram comes from the city clerk of London, Ontario, addressed to myself, and reads:

City council of London would urge that the forty-forty-twenty division of relief costs be made retroactive to January 1st, 1939. The present basis of forty per cent payable by the municipality for the first three months of the year is more than the municipality can carry and imposes too great a burden.

I will send this telegram over to the minister for whatever consideration can be given to it, unless he wishes to make some statement about the matter now.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): This matter has already been dealt with officially in a letter from myself addressed to Mayor Cory of Trenton, who holds the position of president of the Ontario Mayors' Association. In my letter I advised Mayor Cory that it was not the intention of the government to make the forty-forty-twenty division of relief costs retroactive to cover the months of January, February and March. I also pointed out that under the arrangement as announced the municipalities of Ontario, and other municipalities in Canada, would effect a substantial saving over the entire year, inasmuch as our new basis covers the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1939, and extending to April 1, 1940.

UNITED STATES PERIODICALS

REFERENCES TO THE KING IN CERTAIN MAGAZINES CARRIED THROUGH THE MAILS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General (Mr. McLarty) and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) concerning the circulation in Canada of certain United States magazines and papers. Some time ago the Postmaster General said these magazines did not come through the mails, but I have a letter from a clergyman who informs me that he has been receiving Scribner's magazine through the post office, and I understand that in addition there are some seventeen other United States periodicals being distributed in the same manner. Now that this matter has been directed to the attention of the government, will there be a further inquiry and will the Post Office Department deny these magazines the use of the mails? Further, will the Minister of National Revenue have some of these objectionable magazines, which are attacking the king and disparaging the British empire, seized under our laws?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Postmaster General): So far as the question relates to the Post Office Department it is one that I cannot answer off-hand, but I shall be glad to give it consideration.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): If the hon. gentleman will bring to the attention of myself or my department any publication that he contends is seditious or treasonable, it will be examined with a view to determining whether or not this is the case; and if it is the case, it will be refused entry to Canada.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION FOR APPROVAL SUBJECT TO REQUIRED LEGISLATION

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King that the house go into committee on the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 17th day of November, 1938, between Canada and the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

Mr. J. C. LANDERYOU (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, just before the adjournment of this debate the other day I stated that the trouble with world trade was that every nation was trying to sell but those who wanted to buy found themselves short of purchasing power. That fact was recognized by the world conference of agricultural economists, who maintained that there was a chronic shortage of purchasing power throughout the world while on the other hand there was a tremendous surplus of commodities of all kinds. This holds true in this country as well, and I have suggested that we should increase the purchasing power of the consumer. Out of our wheat fields comes the wheat, but what do the farmers receive for it? Let me refer to some statements made by elevator agents in respect to the harvesting of the last crop:

"There is more than one farmer in this particular district who would be wiped out completely if called upon to satisfy all his creditors. However, I can't imagine his creditors adopting such a short-sighted policy. A number of them have threatened to turn back large portions of their farm lands if they are not given an opportunity to realize something on their crop this year. I know of one farmer who is actually turning back a section and a half of land to the municipality rather than pay his tax arrears. This particular farmer owes something like $7,000 in tax arrears, and he figures that he would be much further ahead if he surrendered his land rather than attempt to pay off the majority of his arrears out of this year's crop."

Another elevator agent also pointed out that many farmers were required to purchase new farming machinery this year, and these payments will also have to be made out of this year's crop in addition to the other debts piled up against it. The agent said that while the bushelage in many districts will exceed that of last year, the price of wheat is greatly reduced from last year.

"In fact it is generally admitted that it will take two bushels of grain to realize the same amount of money received for one bushel last year," the agent said.

The same situation obtains in the fishing industry. Out of our oceans, lakes and streams come the fish, but what do the fishermen receive for them?

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to have to advise the hon. member that he has exhausted his time.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I think there must be some mistake, Mr. Speaker; I understood that I had fifteen minutes.

Mr. TURGEON: I rise to a point of order. I think there is some mistake in timing, because I happened to be close at hand the other evening when the hon. member stopped speaking, and I thought he had fourteen or fifteen minutes longer to speak.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am in the hands of hon. members. Of course I have to base my decision on what the assistant clerk has told me.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Under the circumstances I think the house will listen to the hon. member for another fifteen minutes.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may proceed.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The lakes, streams and oceans give fish, but the fishermen receive very little in return for their catch. From our mines comes coal, but what do the coal miners receive? Out of the forests come lumber, but what do the workers receive?

Here is a news item which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen:

Ansonville, Ontario, March 7.—Doctor E. J. Clouthier, medical officer of health, said to-day five cases of scurvy have been discovered in this northern Ontario village three miles south of Iroquois Falls. He said the disease was the "direct result of starvation and deprivation of the essential foods."

Doctor Clouthier said one case has advanced to a stage which necessitates hospital treatment. Vigilance to prevent spread of the disease, rare in civilized countries, is being exercised by the physician who also is conducting an investigation into the cause of the outbreak.

The next paragraph is headed "Cannot Buy Vegetables", and is as follows:

The disease is caused by a lack of vegetables and fruits in the daily diet. It was said many residents of the village who are employed at paper mills in Iroquois Falls are working only part time and are unable to purchase these essential foods.

Short of purchasing power.

The municipality is in the township of Calvert, which is under control of the provincial government. It was said the township had sought to obtain increased relief quotas for welfare recipients which would enable the impoverished residents to obtain the necessary vitamins but that such requests had been so frequent recently it was impossible to expect further aid.

Village authorities said the situation was made more serious by the fact many residents were insufficiently clad and that during the first two months of this winter sub-zero weather prevailed. Some householders were said to lack sufficient fuel in their homes to withstand the cold weather.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I was pleased to ask the house to give further time to the hon. member, but I would like to know what this has to do with the trade treaty.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Simply this, that the trade treaty, regarded by the government as a solution of the economic problems of the country, has failed adequately to provide for the needs of our people.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It will fail if it is not ratified.

Mr. LANDERYOU: That is the position. May I just point out to the minister what I mean by that. Ask the farmer whether or not he is receiving all the purchasing power necessary to purchase the fish, lumber and coal that he wants. The minister and his colleagues talk about the wonderful future Canada will have because of this trade agreement. Ask the coal miner whether he is receiving all the lumber, fish and products of the farm he would like. Ask the fisherman whether he is receiving all his requirements of coal, fruit and other commodities which can be produced in Canada. The storehouses of Canada are plugged with goods. But what do we find? The people are unable to gain access to the wealth they have produced. And yet this condition exists while the government talks about blasting its way to foreign markets. As I have said before, we cannot depend very much upon our external markets. Why? Because they lead to national hard feelings and international complications which in turn may lead to war abroad.

Let us look into the situation of the province of Alberta. The following table showing the production of oil in that province will indicate what I have in mind:

Year	Oil production (barrels)
1934	1,265,940
1935	1,263,750
1936	1,320,442
1937	2,796,908

They find themselves unable to market their oil in Canada. Oil is being brought in from foreign countries. The Liberals say that if we do not trade with the world, if we get into some isolated compartment, we will endanger the peace of the world. Who would want to attack this country because we allow our own people to utilize the oil and other production of the nation?

May I now read an article published by a man who understands the oil situation in Alberta:

The efforts of Turner Valley producers to preserve and enlarge their home market continue, with three more important actions or statements taking their place in the news. The events follow announcements by major oil companies that they would displace Turner Valley oil with American oil on the Manitoba market.

To-day's first news event is an application from the Alberta Petroleum Association to the Canadian railways for a freight rate on crude oil shipments to Brandon, equivalent to the present low rates to Saskatchewan refineries of the major companies. The application requests a cut in the Brandon rate from 98 cents to 78 cents per barrel. The 20 cents per barrel saving, it is believed, would enable the Anglo-Canadian Company (with refinery at Brandon) and other independent Manitoba refiners to compete on an equitable basis with any American gasoline that might be brought into the province by the major companies, in line with their threat of a few days ago.

In Calgary a statement severely condemning the "menacing and threatening attitude" of Imperial Oil has been issued by Robert Wilkinson, president of National Petroleum Corporation, and in Toronto W. S. Campbell, former head of the Petroleum Association, has issued a report on a personal survey of the Illinois situation in which he scores the major companies for taking advantage of a "temporary chaotic condition" and calls on the government to take action.

Wilkinson states "If the independent producers and all the shareholders of companies operating in Turner Valley needed any further indication as to the ultimate fate of our promising oil industry, they now have it in the menacing and threatening attitude of Imperial Oil executives, expressed in their declarations concerning policy they intend to adopt, giving preference to foreign oil in the Manitoba market. It has been apparent that Standard Oil interests were not prepared to concede very much of the prairie oil market to Turner Valley, and that such progress in this direction as has already been made, has been made in the face of and despite powerful opposition to any plans involving the movement of Alberta crude eastward."

"In early negotiations with railway executives two years ago, the Independent producers were assured that freight rates to Winnipeg would be made effective at once, enabling the movement of crude oil east to that point at competitive rates. Apparently sufficient pressure has been brought to bear on the railway companies to prevent them from putting into effect—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LANDERYOU: May I finish—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am advised the hon. member has now exhausted his time.

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton): Mr. Speaker, after a few general remarks in regard to the treaty I should like to confine most of my observations to those parts of it which have to do particularly with the fruit and vegetable industry, because an important part of my constituency is interested in the production of fruit and vegetables. The Canada-United States and the Great Britain-United States trade agreements, in so far as they encourage a closer relationship and better understanding among these three great democracies, are admittedly highly beneficial to a world filled with misunderstanding and misgivings.

Our friends of the Conservative party are opposing the Canada-United States trade agreement solely upon the ground that, according to their contention, the price which we have paid for the agreement is too high. In plain words they say the Yankees are better traders than we are, and that we have been outwitted. Personally I have no such inferiority complex with regard to the three gentlemen who had most to do with the negotiation of the agreement. I refer to Mr. Hector McKinnon of the Department of Finance, Mr. Wilgress of the Department of Trade and Commerce and Mr. Robertson of the Department of External Affairs. For many months these men carried on continuous negotiations, and instead of expressing dissatisfaction with the results it is my opinion that parliament and the Canadian people owe those men a great debt of gratitude.

In my opinion, when viewed by actual performance instead of by politically tinged prophecies, the treaty will prove to be one of the greatest economic accomplishments in the history of this nation. In giving directions to our negotiators, and in accepting the responsibility for the final result, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his ministers have taken a leading part in and have made a real contribution to the consolidation of the democratic peoples in the world to-day. It is my opinion that had it not been for the spirit which Canada showed in negotiating the 1935 agreement with the United States, the present agreement could not have been consummated. Even though we had not been able to negotiate a trade agreement as advantageous as is the new trade agreement, it is my firm belief that present-day world conditions demanded that closer economic relations should be formed between the great democracies at almost any cost. Fortunately for Canada, we were not called upon to make any serious concessions and we have received many important advantages. It is a fallacy to suggest that trade agreements cannot be made which will be beneficial to both contracting parties. It is equally a fallacy to suggest that of necessity some interests must be injured. During this debate the Conservative opposition has roundly scored the agreement, but on looking up the record I find that the 1935 agreement was just as vigorously opposed.

An hon. MEMBER: Rightly so.

Mr. CLEAVER: Perhaps my hon. friend will not be so proud of that a little later on. On looking up the record I find that the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), made the following statement when referring to the treaty of 1935, as reported on page 770 of Hansard for 1936:

This will result in displacing from employment thousands of men engaged in industry in this country.

Then, in referring to the section of the agreement which had to do with the tariff on agricultural implements, the same hon. member had this to say, as reported on page 1115 of Hansard for 1936:

This not only will bring the price down but may wipe them out of business.

The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) is reported on page 774 of the same Hansard as follows:

. . . it is my considered opinion that Canada, with 11,000,000 people and situated on the northern part of this continent, will never be able to make a satisfactory and permanent trade agreement with the 125,000,000 people living to the south.

Then the former hon. member for Hamilton West, the late Mr. Wilton, is reported on page 791 as follows:

I see in this agreement the possibility of the American rather than the Canadian flag floating over Canada.

I should say here that the present hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Marsh) was not the one who made that statement. Then the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) said:

I make no apologies for having been opposed to every offer we have had from the United States since at least I was a young man.

That is a most helpful sort of attitude, is it not? Then the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) is reported on page 804 as follows:

I oppose this agreement entirely because I fear it will have an injurious effect in regard to employment. It will destroy many a basic industry in Canada.

[Mr. Cleaver.]

I ask the hon. gentleman to rise in his place now and tell us of the many basic industries which the treaty of 1935 has destroyed. Then the hon. member goes on to say on the same page:

I contend that this agreement gives away Canada's birthright.

And then on page 806:

If we vote for trade agreements we are voting for complete commercial union with the United States.

The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) is usually reserved in his remarks, but he is reported on page 836 as follows:

Many of our industrial plants will be forced to close.

And again:

Unemployment with all its hardships will be increased; the investment of capital in industry in Canada will be discouraged.

Then the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) is reported on page 961 as follows:

I say that this trade agreement is making a serious contribution to the economic domination of this country by the United States.

Let us look dispassionately over the record to see just what did happen to Canadian business after the advent of that trade agreement which was to bring ruin and the possibility of the United States flag floating over Canada. Trade agreements are made primarily to increase trade. Our exports of merchandise only to the United States—I have excluded gold—for the years 1935 to 1938 were as follows:

1935	$304,000,000
1936	360,000,000
1937	435,000,000
1938	343,000,000

Our imports of merchandise, again excluding gold, from the United States were as follows:

1935	$303,000,000
1936	319,000,000
1937	393,000,000
1938	487,000,000

There was a trade increase of $516,000,000 in three years, made up as follows:

1936	$ 72,000,000
1938	223,000,000

Mr. LAWSON: Was not the major portion of the total trade increase made up of increased importations from the United States into Canada?

Mr. CLEAVER: I am just going to deal with that. I think I can show to the satisfaction of the house just what did happen.

After I have covered that part of my address, I shall try to answer any questions that remain to be answered. Everything went well for the first two years and we did not hear a peep out of the opposition. Unemployment decreased sharply, revenues were buoyant, the budget deficit was substantially reduced, and then what happened? In the last few months of 1937 a serious recession struck United States business, a recession more severe in its onset than that of the great depression. By March, 1938, business in the United States had receded by over one-third across the entire business section of the country. The United States is the largest single customer for Canadian products. Taking the ten year period from 1928 to 1937, both inclusive, we find that the United States purchased on the average 40·27 per cent of our total yearly exports. Our next best customer was the United Kingdom which purchased on the average 36·91 per cent of our total yearly exports. Some may question these figures, so I would ask the permission of the house to place the details on Hansard without taking time to read them.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the hon. member have leave to have this table placed on Hansard?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. CLEAVER: The table is as follows:

Year	Percentage exports to United Kingdom to total Canadian exports	Percentage of our exports to United States compared to our total exports
1927	35·6	37·3
1928	33·3	39·2
1929	31·4	36·8
1930	25·1	46·0
1931	27·4	43·7
1932	29·0	42·9
1933	34·9	37·4
1934	43·3	33·0
1935	38·4	40·3
1936	37·9	42·4
1937	38·4	41·0
Average yearly percentage	36·91	40·27

When our best customer suffered severe business reverses, what could one expect? Our sales to that customer also suffered. At the end of March, 1938, we found our exports to the United States had fallen by $92,000,000 below those of the previous year. On the other hand, Canada did not immediately feel the effect of that recession; our recession was not as severe, and consequently our imports from the United States did not decline. The trade reaction was exactly what one would expect. What do our Conservative friends say now? If the hon. member for York South will just listen, I shall give my explanation for what it is worth.

Mr. LAWSON: I am listening.

Mr. CLEAVER: They now say that the 1935 treaty was lopsided. In 1936, when our exports to the United States exceeded our imports from that country by $41,000,000 and the balance was then decidedly in our favour, we did not hear anything at all about the treaty being lopsided. Again in 1937, when the balance was still substantially in our favour, we heard no criticism. But in 1938 the treaty suddenly becomes fraught with inequalities. Right at this point, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a suggestion: Canadian prosperity depends upon the prosperity of Canada's customer nations. So long as we have large surpluses of the field, the forest and the mine, just so long we must of necessity be a world-trading nation, whether we want to or not. It necessarily follows that just as soon as any of our customers run into hard times, we shall suffer as a result of their hard times, and for this reason I believe our system of taxation should be set up in such a way that, when hard times come, all groups of our people will bear their reasonable share of the depression according to their ability to bear it.

During the last great depression many of our people were compelled to use up their entire life-savings, and to-day are penniless, while many others of our people still have their large fortunes intact. From a truly democratic point of view this should not be permitted. Our people are reasonable and do not expect us to accomplish the impossible. and when hard times come I do not think anyone would complain if everyone shared the hard times according to his or her ability. I therefore urge that the major part of our revenues should be collected by way of income tax, because in this way taxation would be paid according to one's actual yearly receipts.

What about other calamities which were to befall us as a result of the 1935 trade agreement? Well, we still have our birthright, Lanark notwithstanding. The union jack is still flying over Canada, Hamilton West notwithstanding. And what about the agricultural implement business? The hon. member for Davenport prophesied that a reduction in the tariff to 12½ per cent, to use his own words, might wipe the agricultural implement industry out of business. But we reduced the tariff still further, down to seven per cent in 1937, and we find now that the manufacturer of agricultural implements in Canada increased his production by thirty-eight per cent over 1935. The following are the production figures:

What about the prophecy of the hon. member for Leeds, that "the investment of capital in industry will be discouraged."? If he has troubled to look up the figures he must have been simply shocked, because he would have found that instead of investment of capital in industry being discouraged in Ontario, the province from which he comes, Ontario manufacturers increased their factory construction figures from $3,645,000 in 1935 to $17,932,600 in 1937. The total industrial construction for Ontario for the three years, 1935, 1936 and 1937, was as follows:

1935	$ 3,645,000
1937	17,932,000

Does that look as if the investment of capital in industry were being discouraged? In view of all this record of prophecies compared with actual achievements, is it any wonder I suggest that the electors will not pay too much attention to fresh prophecies from these same hon. gentlemen?

I should now like to direct my remarks to the fruit and vegetable industry. First, a few remarks in regard to the size of the industry. The house may be surprised to learn that at the bureau of statistics there is no information available respecting the vegetable industry other than that contained in the 1931 census. This is an extremely unsatisfactory and unbusinesslike state of affairs, and I should like to impress upon the minister the urgent necessity of an up-to-date record in regard to this industry.

In 1931 the total production of vegetables was approximately $33,000,000. Those who have been closely in touch with this industry know what a spectacular increase in production has since taken place. In January of this year, Messrs. Davis and Ritchie presented to the Ontario Vegetable Growers Association at Hamilton a report in which they estimated that, exclusive of field crops of potatoes, Canada has 627,000 acres devoted to the production of vegetables, now producing annually $90,000,000 worth of vegetables. Doctor Hopper, of the Department of Agriculture, has prepared an estimate based upon the per capita consumption of vegetables at Ottawa and Toronto, where accurate figures are available, and his estimate of Canada's production of vegetables is $86,000,000. After carefully checking the figures and the deductions on which these estimates are based I am convinced that both of them will be found to be extremely conservative. In any event, it will be seen that production in this industry has nearly trebled in the last eight years. This great increase in volume has been brought about from several causes:

1. Trucking facilities have brought into production thousands of acres of land which previously were not accessible to large markets.

2. The medical profession has in recent years stressed the importance of fresh vegetables from a health point of view. Many of the important vitamins required in a properly balanced diet can be obtained only through the use of fresh vegetables.

3. Many farmers who, prior to the depression, were raising only grain, cattle, dairy produce and hogs, started raising vegetables to enhance their incomes. This, in turn, depressed the price of vegetables and compelled vegetable growers to step up their production in order to survive. The combined result of all of these factors has been to increase the gross production from $33,000,000 in 1931 to about $90,000,000 in 1938.

In regard to tree fruits and small fruits an estimate arrived at in the same manner as that used by Doctor Hopper in regard to vegetables would place our total fruit production at about $60,000,000. This would make a total production of fruit and vegetables in Canada of about $150,000,000 annually.

Marketing facilities have not kept pace with this greatly increased production, and as a result we find wide price fluctuations which are detrimental to consumers and producers alike. We have reached a point, Mr. Speaker, where modern marketing facilities are urgently needed, and on behalf of the growers in my riding and throughout Canada I do wish to commend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for the steps which he has already taken to improve marketing facilities, and to urge upon him the necessity for adequate central markets in all large centres in this dominion. These markets would be self-liquidating as to cost. I do not know of any greater contribution that our Department of Agriculture could make at this time to this industry than the building of fruit and vegetable markets.

I should now like to give some information in regard to the amount of capital invested in this industry and also as to the cost of production in order that an accurate conclusion may be reached as to the valuable contribution which this industry makes to our national life.

On account of the scarcity of suitable lands and suitable locations for the production of fruits and vegetables, the first major problem which a grower faces is the original investment for land suitable for his operations. In the Burlington district land suitable for the growing of fruits and vegetables has under normal conditions in the past commanded a price varying from $800 to $1,000 an acre for the bare land without buildings. If we take a fifteen acre farm as perhaps the average size farm suitable for the purpose—and there are many of our growers raising vegetables, alone, on farms as small as five acres per farm—it will be seen that a capital outlay of at least $12,000 is involved. To this amount must be added the cost of suitable buildings, which will involve at least another $6,000. This total of $18,000 is still not the entire capital outlay required, because the grower also requires quite a large quantity of equipment to assist him in (a) the cultivation of the land, (b) producing and caring for plants, (c) combating all the different pests and plant blight diseases which the grower encounters, (d) packing, storage and marketing facilities. So much for the capital outlay involved. Many of our growers have from twenty to thirty thousand dollars invested in farm, farm buildings and equipment.

Now, coming to the annual operating expense involved in the production of fruits and vegetables, I should like to read into the record the actual figures of crop production and operating cost of one twenty-acre farm in my riding. A grower in the Burlington district has very kindly supplied these figures to me:

Receipts	$8,548 91
Operating costs	8,033 29
Net profit and wages of owner	$ 515 62

The following is a statement of his operating expenses, broken down:

Wages (other than his own)	$2,925 45
Baskets and containers	892 15
Fertilizer and manure	613 25
Trucking	199 24
Storage	435 55
Hydro power	253 93
Telephone	58 92
Hay, oats, straw	145 66
Seeds and plants	311 75
Spray	84 03
Maintenance of equipment	316 25
General expense	117 11
Water	100 00
Taxes	180 00
Five per cent interest on capital investment	1,400 00
Total	$8,033 29

At this point I should like to say that some of our growers are paying for water for forcing purposes as high as $900 per annum.

From these figures it will be seen that the grower, after producing crops to the value of over $8,000, at the end of a season had a net profit of $515.62 as his total compensation for his year's work. The management ability required to produce eight or nine thousand dollars worth of produce from twenty acres of land in one year is not by any means the entire story. The grower must bring real business ability to play in the sale of his crop. From its nature it is extremely perishable. Much of it must be marketed within twenty-four or forty-eight hours, otherwise it is a total loss and there is an added difficulty here in that the grower does not know actually when his various crops will mature. He is dependent upon weather conditions. Abnormal weather conditions will often mature crops rapidly, causing periodical gluts of the market; and here again real business ability must be brought into play to prevent consequent loss. Is it any wonder that our growers are asking for marketing legislation which will provide the necessary market machinery to achieve orderly marketing?

Now, as to the Liberal policy in regard to fruits and vegetables, our policy has been that the Canadian market should be preserved for the Canadian producer, while Canadian crops are available to supply our requirements, and when our own crops are not in production in sufficient quantities to supply our needs, then to permit the importation of fruits and vegetables produced elsewhere. This policy, in so far as it can be made to function, is beneficial to our producers and consumers alike.

In regard to the present trade agreement in so far as it applies to fruits and vegetables, we have received two main criticisms from the opposition.

1. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), as reported at page 1094 of this year's Hansard used these words:

> For some reason or another, which I have never been able to understand, the Liberal government has it in wrong for fruits and vegetables.

I was amazed to hear such an utterance from an hon. gentleman who has been a minister of the crown and who is usually so fair in his language.

I want to cite the facts and leave it for the members of this house to judge the inaccuracy of that statement. From the years 1906 to 1930 there was very little change in tariff rates on fruits and vegetables entering Canada. In May, 1930, the Dunning budget provided for drastic increases in the tariff on fruit and vegetables, and for the first time the principle of seasonal tariffs was adopted. This was the first effective tariff protection granted to the industry, and it was given by a Liberal administration. Then followed the Bennett administration, when rates were drastically increased. The increases under the Bennett administration raised the hopes of the growers but did not bring about any increase in price to the Canadian producer of field crops. They did, however, artificially stimulate the production of out-of-season crops in hothouses. This principle we do not believe to be economically sound. It enhances the cost to the consumer manyfold and makes no commensurate profit for the producers. Just right here—

Mr. HOMUTH: Is the hon. member opposed to hothouses?

Mr. CLEAVER: I have made the statement, and the hon. member can read it in Hansard.

Just right here, however, I should like to say that growers who, under the shelter of the tariff, built greenhouses for the purpose of growing vegetables in midwinter under glass have, in my opinion, a just claim for compensation for plant investment which has virtually been confiscated through a repeal of tariffs which should never have been granted. Since 1935 this government has by its two trade agreements made substantial reductions in tariffs; but in no instance has the reduction in rates been below the point where our growers have been amply protected; the reductions in tariffs which have been made in other commodities through the trade agreement of 1935 have increased the general prosperity of Canada, and in this our growers have shared. From 1932 to 1935 our growers never had higher protection for their products, and I state without fear of contradiction that our growers have never experienced three worse years in the history of the industry. If any hon. member will take the trouble to inquire of any grower, he will tell him in no uncertain terms that he does not want a return of the good old high tariff years 1932 to 1935.

Mr. SPENCE: They did not tell the hon. member that.

Mr. CLEAVER: I did not hear what was said.

Mr. SPENCE: I said that the people of Burlington did not tell the hon. member that.

Mr. CLEAVER: I should like to know how my hon. friend knows that.

Mr. SPENCE: I do know.

Mr. CLEAVER: I have talked with scores of important growers and they tell me in no uncertain terms that the three worst years ever experienced by the fruit and vegetable industry were the three high tariff years 1932 to 1935.

Mr. LENNARD: That was not caused by high tariffs though.

Mr. CLEAVER: The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) gave the following schedule showing the effective tariff protection in force in 1935; rates in force after the reduction made by the 1935 agreement, and the rates which will be in force as a result of the present trade agreement. Again I should like with the permission of the house to place this schedule on the record without taking the time to read it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Only with the consent of the house.

Mr. CLEAVER: The schedule is as follows:

Vegetables	In-season period, 1935	In-season period, 1936	In-season period, 1939
Asparagus, crate 15 lbs...	$1.23	$ .89	$ .75
Beans (green), hamper 35 lbs...	1.43	.95	.67·2
Cabbage, crate 85 lbs...	2.41	1.10	.83·8
Carrots, crate 87 lbs...	2.73	1.65	.88·4
Cauliflower, crate 40 lbs...	2.06	1.04	.76·8
Celery, crate 71 lbs...	2.13	.83	.74·1
Cucumbers, hamper 55 lbs...	2.54	1.81	1.23·5
Lettuce, crate 76 lbs...	1.90	.88	.79·6
Onions, per 100 lbs...	1.50	1.08	.95
Rhubarb, box, 46 lbs...	1.50	.88	.56·6
Spinach, bushel 22 lbs...	.49½	.31	.04
Tomatoes, lug 34 lbs...	1.65	.68	.51

Take the first item, asparagus. Under the 1938 agreement the duty on asparagus has been reduced to seventy-five cents a 15-pound crate. Let us see what effect this and previous reductions had on the selling price of asparagus. This house was told by an hon. member of the Conservative opposition in 1936 that the reduction in the tariff in that year to eighty-nine cents on a 15-pound crate would lower the price to six cents a pound in Canada. Our Conservative friends must have been startled to see that no price change occurred. The following were the selling prices of No. 1 asparagus, six-inch length, for the years 1935 to 1938, both inclusive, as supplied by the Ontario Asparagus Growers' Association:

	Per pound
1937	10½c
1938	10 c

By the press of last week I notice that the 1939 price, notwithstanding the reduction under the trade agreement now coming into force, has already been agreed upon at 10½ cents a pound for No. 1, five-inch length, and 9¼ cents a pound for No 1, six-inch length.

Mr. LOCKHART: Is that for the six-inch length as quoted before?

Mr. CLEAVER: It is on six-inch length for 1935, 1936, 1937 and 1938. In 1939 the No. 1 grade was split into two sizes, and I was careful to quote both prices; 10½ cents for No. 1 five-inch length, and 9¼ cents for No. 1 six-inch length.

Any grower of asparagus knows that there are other factors governing the price, which are much more important than United States competition under our existing tariff protection, which is ample. Another factor to be considered is that during this period which I have mentioned, the production of asparagus has materially increased. Accurate figures are not available for the different crop years, but when I say that the canners' pack jumped from 128,000 cases in 1936 to 149,000 cases in 1937, this gives some idea of the way in which the industry is now expanding.

One could go down the whole list, item by item, to prove my statement that no damaging reductions in rates have been made. However, the hon. member for Fraser Valley was good enough to answer all his own criticisms in regard to rate reductions, and the criticisms of every hon. member opposite, in the concluding paragraphs of his speech, as reported at page 1260 of Hansard, which I should like to read. Apparently, when he made this speech he must have heard some of our western friends doing a little groaning. He said:

> Some of our friends, particularly members from the prairie provinces, will suggest that for instance $1.65 on a crate of berries is a high tariff. They naturally add this sum to the market value and assume that the people are going to have to pay that much more for the fruit. That is not the case. I can illustrate my statement by reference to onions. It will be noticed that in 1935 the protection on onions was $1.50 per 100 pounds, 1½ cents a pound, or $30 a ton; and I can assure hon. members that in that year onions from British Columbia sold on the market in Winnipeg at from $15 to $20 a ton.

Will any hon. member of the opposition now rise in his place and explain to the house how a reduction in tariff to $18 a ton could affect the selling price of onions selling in Winnipeg at $15 a ton?

Mr. BARBER: Why does not the hon. member give my entire statement?

Mr. CLEAVER: I have read the hon. member's criticism and findings. I am not here to propagate Tory propaganda, but I am giving the hon. member's own answer.

Mr. BARBER: But tell all the truth.

Mr. CLEAVER: I have read the entire statement—

Mr. BARBER: No, the hon. member has not.

Mr. CLEAVER: It was convincing I thought, and entirely answers the hon. member's own argument. How could a reduction in the tariff on onions to $18 a ton affect the selling price of onions selling at $15 a ton?

Mr. BARBER: Because they could not reach the Winnipeg market; that is the reason.

Mr. CLEAVER: Well, my hon. friend is able to answer that to his own satisfaction, but I suggest that his answer will not be very satisfactory to growers.

However, I should like to state that the last reductions have now brought the tariff on fruit and vegetables down to a point where perhaps there should not be much more reduction. All that we have done is to remove the hypocrisy from the existing tariff schedules and bring the tariff down to the point where there is still ample protection for our growers.

Now a word to the consumer. The effect of tariffs varies with existing conditions. In regard to an article as to which there is a combine, monopoly or quasi-monopoly, as in the automotive industry, all the tariff protection is added by the manufacturer to the price which the consumer pays. We know that to our sorrow. On the other hand, where sufficient competition exists in the industry receiving tariff protection, the amount of the tariff protection is not added, and the resulting sale price is never in excess of cost plus a reasonable profit. The onion illustration given by my hon. friend clearly illustrates my point. For this reason, as regards a tariff to protect the fruit and vegetable industry or any other industry in which unrestrained competition exists and which is economically sound, profiteering is impossible.

To come to the second type of criticism from our friends in the opposition, this was constructive criticism in regard to the splitting of seasonal dates for the imposition of the duty and the fact that all processed fruits and vegetables entering Great Britain under the empire trade agreement should be 100 per cent Canadian content. I wish to congratulate the two hon. members of the Conservative opposition who raised these two important points.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to have to tell the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. CLEAVER: As I have just reached the point where I am saying a word of praise for the Conservative opposition, I should like to have the leave of the house to conclude.

Mr. SPEAKER: Only with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. CLEAVER: I have already made the strongest possible representations to the government with respect to both of these points, and again I wish to repeat these representations in the hope that something will be done about them.

Mr. HOMUTH: With what result?

Mr. CLEAVER: I shall come to that in a moment. The following fruits and vegetables have two distinct seasons, an early crop and a late crop, namely, cabbages, carrots, beets, beans, celery, cauliflower, lettuce, pears. As to all of these the seasonal tariff period is not sufficiently long to include both crops, unless it is split up as to time of application. Under the trade agreement split periods are provided only in regard to cabbages, beets and carrots. Unless this situation is corrected, only one-half the crop as to the other five products will be protected. We were all pleased to learn, just a few days ago, that the difficulty in regard to much of the cattle quota being taken by Mexico was promptly adjusted, and I hope the difficulty in regard to split periods for fruit and vegetables will also be adjusted.

Mr. H. G. CLARKE (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I have followed pretty closely the debate that has taken place so far in regard to this trade agreement, and it appears to me that members of the government are experiencing difficulty in discovering any benefits to which they can point as being likely to accrue to Canada under this arrangement. Yesterday the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) referred to what he called the delay in connection with the consideration of this treaty, and compared the length of time taken to debate the British empire trade agreements with the time that has been devoted to this agreement. It should be pointed out that the debate on the empire trade agreements required a total of twenty-six parliamentary days while on the other hand only seven parliamentary days have been devoted thus far to the discussion of the Canada-United States agreement, and we are now on the eighth day. So it is evident that there has been nothing in the way of any hold-up or delay in the consideration of this agreement. I would also suggest that if we took into account the time occupied by hon. members on the government side during this debate, with all the quotations they have read, with each taking his full forty minutes, I think it will be found that the Conservative opposition have not taken up a great deal of the time of this house in undue criticism.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it is up to the government to establish in what way this treaty will relieve unemployment. It has been stated by some hon. members that this agreement could be judged only with the passage of time. But I would direct attention to the fact that it is now four years since the 1935 agreement became effective, and the unemployment question is still with us to a very marked degree. If the trade agreement of 1935 had lived up to all the promises which were made for it when it was passed, after four years we would not have the serious situation that prevails to-day in connection with unemployment.

I should also like to direct attention to another very important phase of this treaty, namely the tariffs on manufactured goods coming into Canada as compared to the tariffs on these same goods exported from Canada to the United States. I have given some study to the tariff schedules of Canada and the United States, and I am convinced that this indicates that we in Canada are not getting a fair deal under this treaty. I have a number of articles which I should like to mention; I could place them on Hansard, but I suppose I shall be required to read them.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I think the hon. member will have to read them.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): I know.

Mr. HEAPS: Might I point out that we have just granted that courtesy to an hon. member opposite, and I do not see why it should not be accorded hon. members on this side as well.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): I can probably read this list in the time it would take us to argue the point. The list is made up of items taken almost at random during a casual study of the tariff, and in many cases it will show that the United States duties are more than one hundred per cent higher than ours. It is as follows:

Article	Canadian tariff Per cent	United States tariff Per cent
Curtains	30	40 to 90
Silk clothing	30	65
Wood handles of all kinds	20	33⅓
Scissors and shears	30	45 plus 3½ cents to 45 plus 20 cents each, except sheep shears of certain value where duty is 22½ plus 10 cents each
Builders hardware	25	45
Electric vacuum cleaners	20	35
Hand fire extinguishers	30	45
Water meters	25	65 plus 55 cents to $4.50 each
Augers, bits and drills	35	45 to 60
Wrenches	35	45
Tools, n.o.p.	25	mostly 45
Furniture, house and office of metal	27½	45
Manufactures of silver	32½	50
Manufactures of zinc	20	45
Batteries	25	35 to 40
Gas meters	30	65 plus 55 cents each to 65 plus $4.50 each
Slide, hook or zipper fasteners	37½	66
Lamps and lanterns	27½	40 to 45
Insulators, electric	25	60 to 70
Manufactures of cement	20	30 to 40
Toys and some tables	30	70
Dolls	30	1 cent each plus 50 to 90
Fishing rods	30	55 (if valued at $10 or over, 30)
Mechanical metal toys	30	70 } few kinds } reduced 70 } to 45
Toys of all kinds, n.o.p.	30
Toilet brushes	27 to 30	Mostly 50 plus 1 cent to 2 cents each
Fountain pens	25	40 plus 72 cents dozen
Aluminum kitchen or household hollow ware	27½	40 plus 8½ cents pound
Aluminum manufactures	27½	45
Aluminum pipes or tubes	30	45

I venture to suggest that there is hardly a kitchen in this country that does not contain from thirty to forty different kinds of cooking utensils made of either enamel or aluminum, which come into Canada under this protection.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Does my hon. friend want them to cost the kitchen more?

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): No. But there would be an opportunity for us to sell our goods in the United States, as they sell theirs here. We would sell them for less, there is no doubt about it.

Mr. DEACHMAN: The hon. member is asking for higher priced kitchen utensils.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): I do not wish my remarks to be misconstrued. I will state definitely, however, that I believe in trade treaties, and I think that as a nation we should go into the markets of the world and dispose of our goods, where we can profitably do so, in order that we may build up and develop our Canadian industry. I believe it is the duty of the government to assist our manufacturers of primary and secondary products in order to dispose of their products in the markets of the world, because through that medium we could give employment to thousands of Canadians.

While I do not advocate a policy of government subsidization of industry, I do feel it would be of material assistance if our government were to encourage a system designed more materially to assist our manufacturers, in order that they may be able to provide the much needed employment in Canada at the present time. The argument is often advanced that as a result of tariffs prevailing price levels are increased. To those who advance this argument I would ask: What does it matter if the prevailing prices of goods are high, if our people have not the money or means to purchase them? It would not matter if you could buy a gold brick for ten cents, if you had not the ten cents.

Mr. DEACHMAN: You bought one in 1930.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): If we do not give employment to our people through the efforts of our manufacturers, and through our industries, how are they going to have any money? If the men and women in the urban districts of our country find themselves unemployed, and without money or purchasing power, it is only natural that they cannot be purchasers of the products of our rural districts.

I believe it is also essential that our government should give more consideration to the diversification of industry in Canada, so that the production of commodities may be increased, and our manufacturers and industrialists may assist materially in creating a greater number of skilled workers. Unskilled men, who possess no particular qualifications to fit them for employment, are to-day unemployed, and many of these men might be trained for skilled labour. I am confident a policy of this type, if given leadership by the government, would have the effect of producing a higher standard of living among the people.

I would suggest further that if the government is sincere in their endeavour to do something for Canada, that is to provide employment, to build great Canadian industries in Canada rather than in the United States, and to increase the purchasing power of our people, then it is time they put their tariff experts to work on a revision of the duty on manufactured goods coming into Canada, so as to place this country in a position to bargain with countries which are shipping goods into the markets of Canada at tariff rates below those which apply to manufactured goods in their markets. A policy of this kind, if sincerely and diligently followed, would provide our Canadian manufacturers with a means to compete with foreign manufacturers, and especially those of the United States.

I have already cited examples which indicated that, in many cases, the duties against Canadian goods going into the markets of the United States are over one hundred per cent greater than the duty we impose against United States goods coming into competition with those of our manufacturers.

I hold in my hand an ordinary room key of a large hotel in Canada, and on it I see the words "Made in the U.S.A." This is one of a large number of small articles imported from the United States, in the production of which there is considerable labour content. If Canadians insisted upon made-in-Canada goods, we would produce these commodities and thereby give employment to our industrial workers. I believe almost all members of the house have at some time or another been in the United States and have made purchases in that country, but I am sure that on very few occasions have they seen over there a manufactured commodity labelled "Made in Canada." While visiting in the United States I have looked for articles marked in that way, and have failed to find them. I believe if any hon. member had seen such articles he would remember them, because we know they are very scarce. I have made many purchases in the United States and I believe I have never bought an article in that country labelled "Made in Canada."

This is one of the points I should like to present in an effort to show that our tariffs are onesided. When we enter the shops in Canada we find all classes of manufactured articles labelled "Made in Japan," "Made in Yugoslavia," or "Made in U.S.A." I could go on enumerating the names of countries in which articles being sold over our counters are made. I maintain that to a great extent this is the cause of unemployment in Canada. If our manufacturers, through a fair tariff arrangement, had opportunities to sell their products in other countries, we should have prosperity and very little trouble with hard times.

Is there an hon. member who conscientiously believes that under the lopsided tariff schedules which now prevail we can achieve any measure of success in the development of Canadian industry, and thereby provide for the employment of our people? If there is such person I should like to know him.

It is a known fact that people of the United States, through a policy of protecting their own industry and giving employment to their own people at fair and equitable wage rates, have made that country one of the greatest nations of the world. Lincoln laid down the doctrine of government of the people, for the people and by the people. I believe we should adopt that policy in Canada. If we were to do so we should be taking an important step in the direction of lifting Canada out of the condition in which she is to-day, of placing ourselves back on the road to prosperity, of providing our youth with employment and our parents with the much desired and necessary purchasing power—which is so essential to the prosperity of the nation.

We have heard the argument advanced in the house that we must not antagonize the United States, and that in order to be assured of their friendliness, of necessity we must make trade agreements, with the knowledge that they will receive the lion's share. I do not believe for one moment that that is a sound argument. For over a hundred years we have lived as friendly nations, side by side, and I believe we shall continue to do so in the future. If we as a nation would make our trade treaties with the United States on the basis of a fair exchange of commodities, I believe that that government, instead of becoming antagonistic, would develop a greater respect for the government of this country and be more willing to cooperate than they were during the periods when the Hawley-Smoot and McCumber tariffs were applied against our producers.

I believe that this government stands condemned in the eyes of the business people of this country for having entered into a trade agreement without adequate knowledge of the results which might ultimately ensue. It is interesting to note that the concessions granted by the United States were considered carefully, and in no case was the slightest opportunity afforded to Canadian producers to obtain even a small percentage of the United States domestic market. Then as a further safeguard to the people of that country, the United States government has the privilege of applying quotas and regulations designed to restrict trade under any concession granted when it might interfere with home producers. As long as these tactics are used against us, I believe we should adopt similar restrictions in connection with the concessions we grant.

If there is one thing needed in connection with the making of future agreements it is to have our tariff experts and those who make recommendations to the responsible ministers make a survey of the potential trade advantages to be gained and the possible disadvantages which might be sustained. This should be done in order that we may at least know where we are going when we consider an agreement of this kind in this house. We should know the amount of labour involved in producing any particular commodity. It is a known fact that for eight or ten months prior to the signing of this agreement the tariff committee of the United States government consulted with United States producers in order to learn what concessions might be advantageous and what might be disastrous in connection with any changes in the protection under which American industry was operating. The record of this government is entirely different. We not only made a pilgrimage to Washington and accepted what they offered but we made sacrifices in the markets of the United Kingdom, the extent of which will not be known for some time to come.

I have endeavoured to be as brief as possible and I think it will be found that I have kept well within my time limit, without asking for any extension.

Mr. J. J. KINLEY (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the house asks our approval of the terms and provisions of a new Canada-United States trade agreement. This trade agreement replaces the agreement of 1935 and is now part of the tariff structure of this country. The 1935 agreement was supplanted before it had run to maturity, because of developments in the relations between Great Britain and the United States. These countries having expressed a desire to negotiate a reciprocal trade agreement, an important situation was created for Canada. Our government found it necessary to cooperate with our two greatest customers for the purpose of the extension and promotion of trade. To have refused would have certainly created a most unfavourable reaction which could not have been justified on any grounds. Under ordinary circumstances the government could have been required to carry out separate negotiations within the near future. The situation which was created really afforded an opportunity to Canada to negotiate a new immediate trade agreement with the United States. That new trade agreement has been signed, with the result that our favourable trade relations with that country have been amplified and extended for another three years. I believe that this new arrangement will not only maintain Canada's trade position, but improve it considerably.

As far as our trade relations with Great Britain are concerned, certain amendments were made at her request. There is no doubt that certain concessions were granted but, on the other hand, there are compensations in the United States agreement which are more attractive to Canadian business generally. I know that the new agreement appeals to the people along the Atlantic coast and to the people in Queens-Lunenburg, the constituency which I have the honour to represent. These negotiations have placed Canada in harmony with her two greatest customers, the United Kingdom and our great neighbour to the south. The amendments made in the three-way agreement will no doubt justify in the minds of the British authorities a continuance without interruption of our present imperial trade relations. I think it was a splendid thing that these matters could be considered concurrently, and thus make provision for the immediate future. It produces a tariff stability which I believe is highly reassuring to business generally. To be constantly changing the tariff is disconcerting to business arrangements, and a measure of permanence is always greatly to be desired.

If we are to judge from the comments made in this house by hon. members of the Conservative party under the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), we must conclude that they are opposed to this agreement. I think we have here the line of demarcation between the policies of the two great parties in this country. The Liberal policy is one of extension of trade and promotion of goodwill. The Conservative party preach a doctrine of economic nationalism.

Mr. STEWART: Nonsense.

Mr. KINLEY: The hon. gentleman says "nonsense." I understand that the members of his party sometimes object to the term "economic nationalism," but how else can we define their policy when they are against a reasonable trade agreement with our nearest neighbour and our best customer?

I submit that this is a reasonable agreement. It helps the primary producer to market his products and does not imperil industry in this country. In fact, in an indirect way I think it will help the industries. Business men in Canada generally have accepted it. Leading bankers have spoken of its benefits, and trade journals have not unduly criticized its provisions.

The primary producers of this country are delighted to have, through this trade agreement a larger and a more active export market, and it is agreeably surprising, in view of the diversified interests of this country that we can have a trade agreement that is so universally accepted by all interests in Canada. It shows, Mr. Speaker, not only that the agreement itself has merit, but that the trend of public opinion generally is in favour of the promotion of trade and the breaking down of trade barriers wherever possible.

The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Clarke) would give the impression that this is a bad agreement so far as industry is concerned. But I will give him this credit, that he is a good Toronto Tory, and the doctrine he preaches is what we should expect. After all, trade runs two ways; when we look at the trade returns we see that the United States buys about as much from us as we buy from them, and our goods must be finding a market in that country.

A great deal has been said about the balance of trade between the United States and Canada, and the former treaty is criticized because of an unfavourable balance of trade for Canada in 1937-38. But 1937-38 was a year in which the United States suffered a recession in business, and their buying was consequently restricted. We had a favourable balance of trade with the United States in 1935-36, and also in 1936-37. Our exports of gold, it is contended, should not be included in our export figures and in the trade balance. But, Mr. Speaker, in Canada gold is produced by Canadian workmen in our own Canadian mines, and it is well to have a good customer who will take our gold and pay for it in goods. Surely gold is an export of Canadian industry.

But there are other factors, of which perhaps the tourist trade is the most important. It must be borne in mind that our tourist trade is of great value. In 1937 there was a balance in favour of Canada on this account of $132,439,000. When this is taken into consideration, along with our visible exports, it gives us a favourable balance of trade each year with the United States.

We are told that our trade relations with Great Britain are favourable because of the heavy balance of trade in Canada's favour. The same is true of the United States with relation to Great Britain, because in the year 1937, according to the annual trade statement of the United Kingdom, the United States exported to the United Kingdom £106,075,157 worth of goods, whereas the United States bought from Great Britain only £31,418,907 worth; and that has been consistently the trend for a number of years. Great Britain is not worrying over its balance of trade with the United States, because she is steadily extending her trade relations with that country. The fact is that Great Britain is a large importer of raw materials for her factories; she is also a large importer of food supplies, and to balance her economy she depends on items of commerce that are not recorded in trade statistics.

With regard to Canadian trade it should be noted that our trade with the more important British colonies is not so favourable from the point of view of the trade balances. Imports and exports during 1938 for the more important colonies are as follows:

	Imports into Canada for consumption, 1938	Exports of Canadian merchandise, 1938
British India..	$ 9,388,687	$ 4,304,869
British East Africa..	3,287,710	921,835
British West Africa..	1,580,245	821,889
*British West Indies..	17,503,242	14,633,660
Ceylon..	6,149,515	237,788
Fiji..	2,578,271	517,790
Hong Kong..	771,290	2,024,116
Straits Settlements ..	14,586,482	2,941,655
	$56,845,442	$26,403,602

*Including Bermuda, British Guiana and British Honduras.

It will be noted that the only British colony with which we have a favourable balance of trade is Hong Kong, our imports amounting in 1938 to $771,290 and our exports to $2,024,116.

One reason why our trade balances are in our favour with Great Britain is because of the efficiency and protection given to Canadian industry. Canada is becoming highly industrialized. On the other hand, with regard to the British colonies, climate is a controlling factor. They produce things we need and they import, no doubt, to a greater extent from Great Britain than from us.

We are told, Mr. Speaker, of the hazards to which our trade will be subjected because of this new agreement. But let me quote a paragraph I saw in the press yesterday under the heading, "First month of trade pact upsets dope of its critics":

For January, the first month of the new agreement's life, Canadian sales to the United States increased by 75 per cent while imports from that country decreased by 11 per cent, and during the same period business with two of the dictator countries, Italy and Japan, shrank, even though there has been no change in the fiscal relations with them.

With regard to the balance of trade and the hazards which are supposed to be apparent in this treaty, I must refer for a moment to something that was said by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) to-day, when he addressed a question to a member of the government and said that United States grain was flooding Canada and being milled into flour to the great injury of Canadian grain. But grain does not come into this agreement at all; it is not an item in the treaty. There is a reference to grain unfit for food, on grain which the United States has reduced the duty from ten to five per cent. When the leader of the opposition on the orders of the day brings something before the house in an apparent attempt to show that this agreement is doing great harm with reference to an item that is not in the agreement at all, we see how the arguments of my friends to my left are calculated to show that the agreement will not work to the benefit of Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: As the leader of the opposition is not in the house, may I say that he did not imply any such thing. He merely asked a question of the minister on the orders of the day.

Mr. KINLEY: I think a reference to Hansard will show that he said more than that.

The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) was the first member of the house to criticize the reduction which the treaty makes in the duty on fish. Let me say that I do not agree with his conclusions; I shall presently give my reasons for disagreeing with them. I am also reminded that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan)—

Mr. BROOKS: I have not been correctly quoted. I did not criticize anything but the result of the treaty. It was not the provisions, it was the results that were being obtained from the treaty at the present time that I criticized.

Mr. KINLEY: I have Hansard here. The hon. member said first that the agreement had been of no benefit to the shipper and that it would be of no benefit to the fishermen. He finally said that he was satisfied that when the full force of these concessions to the United States are felt, our difficulties in this connection will be greater than they were before.

Mr. BROOKS: The results.

Mr. KINLEY: Well, we judge most things by results, but we must know. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is an old Nova Scotian, and one would naturally expect he would say something about the provisions affecting the fishing industry of the maritime provinces. Instead of that, he made a bitter speech, calling up the unfortunate incidents of history as between our country and the United States; and he, too, appealed to nationalism; we might say that he appealed to passion and prejudice. After I heard the speech of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George I was satisfied that in so far as the provisions in the agreement for the reduction of duties on fish were concerned, they were all to the good.

With regard to the fishing industry, for years efforts have been made to get something done to improve the industry, and the question always arose, how could this be accomplished? The unanimous answer to that question is that the fishing industry needs markets. This opinion is expressed very strongly in the report of the royal commission on price spreads, of which the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) was the first chairman.

Mr. STEVENS: Hear, hear.

Mr. KINLEY: The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." I think the need is apparent from the experience of past conditions as well as present conditions in the industry. The market value in Canada in 1933 of fish was $27,496,946; in 1937 it increased to $38,976,294. In 1933 the value of exports was $20,206,000, which had increased by 1937 to $28,833,000. It is assured that seventy per cent of Canada's production of fish finds a market abroad, of which the United States alone takes approximately one-half, and a larger percentage is indicated by the shipments from the maritime provinces. At present there is an over-production all along the Atlantic coast. But it is expected that the lowering of tariffs will greatly increase our exports to the United States and will create a much more healthy situation in the fishing industry.

The hon. member for Royal does not think that the fish schedules in this treaty are of any value; he believes that the agreement generally will be detrimental to Canadian industry. Well, there are people in the United States who say the same thing about their end of the bargain. I have under my hand the Congressional Record of Thursday, February 16, 1939, at page 2120 of which Mr. Treadway, a Massachusetts member of the house of representatives, said the following:

> The present trade treaty program goes under the name of "reciprocity," but it has no right to that name. Reciprocity contemplates mutual benefits, but the present program is a strictly onesided proposition in favour of foreign nations and against the interests of our own people.

With regard to the fish schedules, I find at page 2122 that Mr. Bates, a representative of Massachusetts, said:

> In connection with our domestic industries being affected, I wish to read a brief paragraph from a letter from Mr. E. H. Cooley, manager of the Massachusetts Fisheries Association, in which he states: "Canadian smoked fillets are quoted this morning on the Boston fish pier at from 11½ to 13 cents per pound, when the lowest cost of production in Boston is 14½ cents a pound, this being the cost of production, not including any profit whatever."

In other words, under that agreement Canadian fish are being sold in this country at less than the cost of production here.

So we see that in the United States congress there are pessimists, the same as there are in this house, who think that in a trade agreement everything must be on one side.

In his efforts to discredit the provision applicable to fish, the hon. member for Royal quoted an article which he said appeared in the Halifax Herald. Mr. Speaker, the Halifax morning papers, the Chronicle and the Herald, come to my home each day, and while the Halifax Herald prints the opinions of people regarding this treaty and criticizes some features of it, I have not seen anything in that paper from an editorial point of view which would indicate that they do not think the fish schedules are of great benefit to the fishermen of eastern Canada. Displayed in large type each day in the Halifax Herald is a list of the prices of fish at Boston. On Saturday, February 25, they were as follows:

(Ex-vessel prices are for first sales only)

	Ex-Vessel		Wholesale
	Inshore	Offshore
Haddock	$6 50	$6 00	$8 00–$9 00
Scrod	3 75	5 00	7 00– 8 00
Large cod	5 00–$7 00	6 00	8 00– 9 00
Market cod	5 00	5 00	7 00– 8 00
Hake	5 00	4 50–$4 60	6 50– 7 50
Pollock		3 75	5 75– 6 75

Comparing these prices with the prices received by the Nova Scotia fishermen does not indicate that they are very much depressed, and by comparison you can at once see the advantage of the United States market to Canadian fishermen. However, I am told it does not portray quite correctly the situation, as the prices are for first sales only. These, at any rate, are the prices quoted in the Herald.

In contrast to that, may I quote from a letter I received, dated January 5, 1939, showing the prices paid for the same kind of fish in my own riding. It refers to the trip landed by one schooner which fished on La Have. The prices paid for this trip are as follows:

	Per pound
Haddock	2¼ cents
Market cod	2¼ cents
Large cod	1½ cents
Scrod (haddock or cod)	1 cent

My informant tells me that these prices are probably higher than could be paid for large trips from the fishing banks to the eastward. Need I say more as to the value of the United States market to Canadian fishermen?

The hon. member for Royal told us a story about inferior fish being shipped to the United States. I am afraid that this story is not true. Immediately after the hon. member made his speech I wired to the largest exporters of fish in Nova Scotia a firm which does business in my constituency. They say, in answer to my telegram: "Have no knowledge of salt fish being returned." However, not being satisfied with that, I went to the Department of Fisheries and asked the deputy minister if he would wire into the field and find out the situation, as I thought this was a serious accusation against the fisheries of the maritime provinces. He wired to his chief officer at Halifax. May I quote from the reply:

> Re wire twenty-fifth have been in touch larger fish firms here North Sydney, Lunenburg, Liverpool, Lockeport, Shelburne and Yarmouth but cannot find that any shipments salt fish returned here from U.S.A. excepting one of about three hundred fifty boxes boneless cod of thirty pounds each made by Lockeport Company to A P T Company which due to Boston strike was not unloaded there Lockeport company states and it was returned to Lockeport but reshipped next boat trip and accepted.

As hon. members know, there was a strike at the Boston docks, and on that account the fish could not be handled there. They were sent back to Nova Scotia and reshipped to Boston by the next boat. But we are told because of this that bad fish is being shipped to the United States.

Mr. BROOKS: I should like to tell my hon. friend that I received my information from a reliable source, just as I presume he considers his was received.

Mr. KINLEY: Mine is official, from the Department of Fisheries. Canadian fish are of the very highest quality, naturally so. The fishing banks are about 125 miles from the port of Lunenburg, the greatest commercial fishing centre in Canada, and fish caught one day can be landed in the market the next day, whereas United States vessels fishing on the same grounds must travel five hundred miles to reach their home port. There is an old Chinese proverb that a guest and a fish never look so good after the third day. That, however, was before the days of modern refrigeration; Canadian fish has the advantage of being processed while it is still fresh. The market in the United States for Canadian fillets has been so far a quality market, and it is expected that with the reduction in duty this market will be much increased.

Mr. BROOKS: If the hon. member will permit a question, his reply was concerning salt fish only. Has he any reply concerning smoked fish?

Mr. KINLEY: Yes. Let me quote the following on that point:

> Vague rumour of two carloads frozen smoked fish returned by rail but cannot get confirmation and C.N.R. here advise no shipments such fish made from Halifax to western section province last two months. Have made inquiry through Calder re N.B. returns but he knows of none. Wire further advice if necessary. Think substantiation of statement in house should be requested.

Mr. BROOKS: Who said that?

Mr. KINLEY: That comes from an official of the department.

Let us now take, for instance, one item in the treaty—fillets, fresh or frozen. Six million pounds of these fillets were exported in 1937. Under the agreement the duty is reduced from 2½ to 1⅞ cents a pound, a reduction of ⅝ of a cent a pound. This is the only fish that is restricted to a quota, the quota being fifteen per cent of the annual consumption of the United States, domestic production plus imports, and in any case not less than 15,000,000 pounds. This means that 9,000,000 pounds more fillets, with a round fish production of about 27,000,000 pounds, can be shipped to the United States under the lower duty rates. This item alone represents a saving in duty of $41,944, and if we fill the extra quota, which naturally would be expected, it will mean a saving in duty of $114,975.

Before I pass this, the question was asked the other day, in connection with the cattle quota, whether there were any other quotas that must be shared with other countries. Yes, there are. This quota can be shared with certain other countries. But may I remind hon. members that under the present production and present exports we are entitled to 93·8 per cent of the amount going into the United States. On allocation we would be entitled to that percentage, and that is a protection for the future. For instance, there is a total importation of fillets of cod, haddock, et cetera, of 6,719,000 pounds. Last year we shipped 6,301,000 pounds. These fish were shipped in there against the tariff as it stood last year. The United States has put on a quota of 15,000,000 pounds, and it is reasonable to think that they expect us to fill that quota. It is apparent, therefore, what a great benefit that is going to be to the fishermen of the maritime provinces.

Mr. BROOKS: Are any of these fish brought in from Newfoundland and reshipped to the United States?

Mr. KINLEY: I have here the amount of fish fillets that were imported into the United States from Newfoundland last year. It was a very small amount—59,840 pounds. There is this about the fresh fish business, that our geographical position gives us a preference, because we are just overnight from the United States market. I am told that a great deal of filleted fish from Nova Scotia enters the United States by rail through the Niagara peninsula.

Fresh fish are sold by auction at the Boston fish pier each day, and by reason of our geographical position we have in the United States a natural preference over other countries in the matter of fresh fish. As their home production is their largest source of supply, and the price is controlled by the home production, any reduction in duty on fresh fish goes to the man who ships it in.

Take another item in the treaty—mackerel, fresh and frozen. On fresh mackerel the duty is reduced from two cents a pound to one cent, and on frozen mackerel from two cents to one and one-half cents a pound. This is a large reduction when you consider the price paid for the primary product. I have seen mackerel sold for less than one cent a pound. The export of mackerel in 1937 amounted to 1,805,903 pounds, a big item. But as the hon. member for Royal says, there is no provision in the trade agreement for salt mackerel. I quote his statement:

> No reduction was made in the duty on salt mackerel, although a reduction would have been of great benefit to the mackerel fisheries. This is probably due to Norway being the major supplier.

On almost every kind of fish, except salt mackerel, there is a reduction in duty, but in the opinion of my hon. friend the only thing that would benefit the fisherman would be a reduction on salt mackerel. He wants to feed the people of the United States on salt mackerel, and apparently he thinks he could do the Tory party some good by showing that there is no reduction of duty on this item in the new treaty. It is true that it is not there, because Norway is the chief source of supply, and under the most favoured nation provision the principle is that you must lower the duty first to the country which is the principal source of supply.

Mr. BROOKS: That is what I said.

Mr. KINLEY: We hope that by a circuitous route we shall get the salt mackerel in.

Mr. BROOKS: That is the kind of route you are travelling.

Mr. KINLEY: No, the route my hon. friends are travelling is this, that when every kind of fish is granted a reduction of duty, it is of no value in their eyes; the only thing that is of value in their eyes is the thing we did not get, and that is salt mackerel.

The reductions in duties on fish are very sweeping. In addition to what I have already mentioned there is a 50 per cent reduction on finnan haddie and smoked cod, hake, pollock, cusk and herring, 40 per cent on smoked salmon, 33 per cent on smoked fillets of cod, haddock, hake, pollock and cusk, of which over 3,500,000 pounds were shipped last year which means that nearly 10,000,000 pounds of round fish are caught. There is a 50 per cent reduction on halibut, salmon, swordfish, mackerel, shad, eels and sturgeon, as well as keeping free of duty for the life of the treaty such items as lobsters, scallops, oysters, clams, quahaugs and smelts, and a 50 per cent reduction on pickled and salted cod, haddock, hake, pollock and cusk. Last year the United States purchased from us approximately 25,000,000 pounds of these fish. This reduction also applies to the duty on pickled salmon and alewives, while there is a thirty-eight per cent reduction on split herring and a twenty-five per cent reduction on salted cod, haddock, hake, pollock and cusk when skinned and boned.

Some people in Nova Scotia who are enthusiastic about their own particular business, as I suppose is to be expected, complain about the relative duty as between dry salted fish with over forty-three per cent of moisture and dry salted fish with less than forty-three per cent of moisture. Here is the story. Prior to this agreement the duty on cod containing not more than forty-three per cent of moisture was 1¼ cents, which meant $1.40 on each quintal of fish; and when containing over forty-three per cent of moisture the duty was three-quarters of a cent a pound or eighty-four cents on each quintal of fish, the difference being fifty-six cents. In the trade agreement the duty on fish containing not over forty-three per cent of moisture was reduced to five-eighths of a cent a pound, which amounts to seventy cents on a quintal of fish; on fish containing over forty-three per cent of moisture the duty was reduced to three-eighths of a cent a pound or forty-two cents a quintal, the difference being twenty-eight cents. So it will be seen that the agreement is an improvement in the interests of those marketing the drier fish. It would have been very nice to get a larger reduction, but in each case the maximum reduction of fifty per cent was made. It must not be forgotten that total imports into the United States of fish with over forty-three per cent of moisture had a market value of $2,008,136, of which Canada supplied $893,524 worth. The total value of imports of fish containing not more than forty-three per cent of moisture was $150,008, of which Canada supplied $77,659 worth.

In the Mackenzie-Zwicker report, the importance of keeping the price of fish low in the foreign market, so that it will be within the price range of mass consumption, is stressed. The fact is that there is a reduction of seventy cents a quintal in the duty on dried fish, while the price of these fish to the primary producer is quoted at $4.50 a quintal for large fish and $3.75 for medium fish, so it will be seen that the duty is quite a good percentage of the primary cost.

With regard to the competition of Newfoundland, it is true that we have that competition, and they seem to have an advantage with Labrador slop fish that are sent to the Porto Rico market. It may be that Canadian and Newfoundland interests should cooperate to bring about stability in the foreign market for salted fish, because Newfoundland is much the larger producer of salted cod fish.

By reason of the British agreement we have obtained a reduction on another fish, namely kippers, from three cents to two cents a pound. The kipper is a popular fish, especially for breakfast. It will be recalled that the press, whether for the sake of advertising or as a matter of general interest, stated that President Roosevelt usually ate scrambled eggs for breakfast; but when Anthony Eden visited the United States, that handsome, stream-lined Englishman ate a kippered herring for his breakfast.

Fish is a highly perishable product; in the interests of the fishermen and the shippers I believe that with our market extended under this treaty, some provision should be made for the orderly marketing of this product, and I think this would be generally accepted as a benefit to all.

I should now like to say a word with regard to manufacturing.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but he has spoken for forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. KINLEY: I do not desire to impose upon the time of the house. I should like to have said something about manufacturing and farming, but time will not permit. I think, however, I have said enough to convince the house that so far as the fishing industry is concerned, this trade agreement is the best achievement of any government in Canada for some years. I should like to compliment the government at this time, because when the 1935 agreement was negotiated we felt rather disappointed. Now, however, after a few years of industrious endeavour on the part of members from the maritime provinces, we find that one of the major items in this trade agreement provides that fish from the maritime provinces shall have freer access to the United States market, which for many kinds of fish is our natural market, near at hand and with a large consuming population.

Mr. J. P. BARRY (Northumberland, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention whatever of taking any part in this debate; I had intended to make what observations I thought desirable when the budget was brought down, but the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) has been kind enough to extend to me a special invitation to make my maiden speech. I should like to say to the hon. member that I look forward with pleasurable anticipation to the time when I may hear him make his first speech.

Mr. BROOKS: Would the hon. member please explain? I do not quite understand.

Mr. BARRY: Very well. I have no desire to detract at all from any glory the hon. member may have gained by the very nice essays he has read to this house.

Mr. BROOKS: I rise to a point of order. I have read no essays to this house. I never read a speech, but I have noticed that most hon. members from New Brunswick have been reading essays ever since they have been in this house.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. That is not a point of order.

Mr. BROOKS: And that applies particularly to the hon. member for King's (Mr. Grant).

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BARRY: I am quite willing to leave that to the judgment of the house. I would say to the hon. member that if he will rise in his place, open his mouth and pour forth his soul untrammeled by the written word, he will find a satisfaction that he will never experience if he continues the practice he has followed in the past.

Mr. BROOKS: I will say this, Mr. Speaker; I will meet the hon. gentleman anywhere in New Brunswick or anywhere else, on any platform, and speak entirely without notes; and that goes for any other member from that province.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. That is not a point of order.

Mr. BARRY: I did not start this; my hon. friend started it, but apparently he cannot take it.

Mr. LENNARD: You went out of your way to start it.

Mr. BARRY: You read your speech. The hon. gentleman forgets that we have in this house 180 Liberal members and thirty-five Conservatives and he also forgets that we have twenty-five Liberals from the maritime provinces while he is the only one of his party to be returned from that area.

Mr. PERLEY: And he is equal to the bunch of them.

Mr. BARRY: The hon. gentleman may think and apparently his associates agree, that he can handle the case for the Conservatives by himself, as against the twenty-five Liberals. May I say to him that I have no reason for rising in my place in the House of Commons and criticizing the government, because everything it has done has met with my approval and that of my constituents. I can well understand that perhaps the hon. member feels he has some apology to make to the people of the maritime provinces for the stand he has taken. I am sure if he recalls the year 1932, when one could buy in the county of Carleton a dozen eggs, a barrel of potatoes and a pound of butter for thirty-seven cents, he will not be so free to criticize at the present time. That seems to be enough on that score.

Perhaps at this stage it might not be a bad idea, after listening to the speeches which have been made, to consider exactly what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had in mind when he went to the United States to negotiate the trade treaty. I am sure if he had any particular part of Canada in mind, then surely that part must have been the maritime provinces. Undoubtedly his prime intention was to break down trade barriers. Any hon. member who looks impartially at the trade treaty will see that undoubtedly that was one of the objects the Prime Minister had in mind. He desired to arrange matters so as to permit goods to flow out of Canada into the United States, and from that country into Canada. He desired undoubtedly to give us an opportunity to get rid of our surplus goods. He desired to allow us to get in exchange those commodities we require. In addition to that, I have no doubt he wished to destroy those feelings of enmity and ill will which had grown up between Canada and the United States and between United States and Great Britain.

Mr. SPENCE: There never was any ill will.

Mr. BARRY: As a final object I am quite sure he desired to draw the democracies of the world closer together in a bond of unity. Hon. members opposite may refer to the trade agreement as an effort towards economic appeasement, if they so desire. But call it what they may, I certainly believe, and I believe the people of Canada will agree, that was a worthy and desirable object.

There are certain things the treaty was not intended to do. May I say that I marvel at the faith and confidence which hon. members of the opposition have in the efficacy of the policies of the present government. There was no intention whatever in the minds of those who negotiated the treaty to put anything over the people of the United States. This was no horse-trading deal. Undoubtedly we desired that they should receive benefits, and that in return we should receive benefits. We had no objection to the people of the United States gaining something, and we expected that in return we would gain something. Certainly it was not the intention of the Prime Minister to prevent United States goods from coming into this country. Above all things, never for one moment did it cross his mind that the trade treaty alone would end unemployment, start the wheels of industry to run, pay off the national debt, abolish all taxation, and fill the pockets of Canadians with money taken from the pockets of the people of the United States. Nor was it the belief of the Prime Minister that the trade treaty would make of Canada a Heaven on earth.

Mr. PERLEY: That is what he said.

Mr. GRANT: That is what Bennett said.

Mr. BARRY: This is merely a step in the right direction, and it will remove the obstructions which have been damming up channels of trade and surrounding the nations of the world with Chinese walls. In other words, it was intended to break down tariffs.

I should like for a few moments to show the house what high tariffs have done to the maritime provinces. Certainly I do not have to argue in this fashion before the people of my own constituency, because they are well aware of the truth of what I am about to say. High tariffs have raised the prices of goods to consumers, for the benefit of industrial centres. That is a statement which is accepted as truth by the people in my constituency. The policy of high tariffs has undoubtedly created discontent in the minds of people, so far as the operation of the confederation of 1867 is concerned. They feel they have been discriminated against and that they, as consumers, have been sacrificed for the benefit of manufacturing centres. The belief has stirred up animosity between the maritime and the central provinces, and between west and east. I believe no person will deny that the high tariff policy has increased unemployment from approximately 100,000 persons to about a million and a half. By destroying trade it has brought the country to the verge of financial ruin. It has stirred up international ill will, and that ill will has extended even to England. It is well known by the people in my constituency that they always have hard times under Tory governments, but that under Liberal rule they always have better times.

Mr. BROOKS: Will the hon. member say that there are good times in his constituency to-day?

Mr. BARRY: I will say they are infinitely better than they were when the Tory government was in power. I believe, if the hon. member is fair, he will admit the truth of what I said a few moments ago in connection with Carleton.

What are the arguments against the treaty? I have listened to this debate since it first began, and I am sure that the general public have reached the conclusion that the arguments against this trade treaty are based on the opinions of penny newspapers, nickel magazines and other one-man opinions; they are based on claptrap and balderdash. There has been but a single idea in mind—the personal aggrandizement of the writer. These arguments have been put forth apparently with the idea that if you throw a lot of mud, some of it will stick.

The hon. member for Royal referred to potatoes. I am surprised at his mention of potatoes in view of the unsavoury connection that vegetable has with his own party in the maritime provinces. He should have followed the example of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Patterson) and mentioned the additional 12,500,000 bushels of potatoes which will be allowed into the United States market by the increased quota. Our hon. friends have picked out single items to discuss and have not considered the treaty as a whole. I do not know how one can discover its benefits unless one considers it as a unit. The trouble is that the Tories can never get out of their own backyards. Several of them, when making speeches, got lost in their own apple orchards. I wonder why it is they can never take a national view? The irony of it is that they call their policy a national policy.

I support this treaty, first, because it fulfils the intentions for which it was created. Second, it undoubtedly benefits the fishermen by fixing free entry and gives three years of stability. Third, it helps the farmer to sell his potatoes, practically the only exportable farm crop in New Brunswick. Fourth, it helps in the export of lumber and lumber products. This treaty benefits the three basic industries of my own county, namely, farming, fishing and lumbering.

Mr. A. A. BROWN (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, if I were to choose a mediator to bring central and eastern Canada together, it certainly would not be the last speaker (Mr. Barry).

I have no apologies to offer for continuing the debate on the trade agreement with the United States, because it materially affects the jobs and the standard of living of thousands of industrial workers in my constituency. For the past four years many of these workers have been out of employment or have been reduced to working only two or three days a week because of the tremendous increase in imports from the United States and other foreign countries. There has been at least one result from this debate; the cattle quota has been increased. I have no doubt that when the debate is concluded we will see messengers being sent to the United States by this government in an effort to remedy the inequalities from which Canada is suffering because of this treaty.

I feel it is my duty to deal with this matter as a representative of the industrial constituency of Hamilton East. I think I should express what I believe to be the views of the people of my constituency with regard to this agreement, which the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said would effect a major reconstruction of the Canadian tariff. In the city of Hamilton, part of which I represent, there are about five hundred diversified industries, dealing with all forms of iron, steel, textiles, fibre, rubber, wood and food products. These industries employ some 33,000 persons, produce goods to the value of $185,000,000 a year, and pay wages and salaries to the extent of $40,000,000 annually. This is purchasing power, about which some of our friends to my left are so eagerly inquiring.

Hamilton, situated in the heart of the famous Niagara fruit belt, provides a splendid consumers' market for the many hundreds of fruit, vegetable and dairy farmers who live in the surrounding districts. Hundreds of manufacturing firms are dependent upon the iron, steel and textile industries for the materials and supplies with which to manufacture their products. Hundreds of merchants, retailers, barbers, professional men, doctors and others are dependent upon the wages and salaries of these employees. Practically all of these industries are dependent for their existence upon a reasonable amount of tariff protection. That reasonable amount of tariff protection was considerably impaired by the trade treaty of 1935 with the United States, and considerable harm was done to our industries. By the trade treaty now before the house this reasonable measure of protection is further impaired. Our industries are being handicapped by the mass production competition of the United States, and the competition of low wages and standards of living which prevail in other favoured nations which are to receive the same benefits under this agreement as the United States, without their granting any concessions to Canada.

When the Prime Minister introduced the trade agreement to the house in 1936, he and other members of his government predicted that the increase in trade which would follow that agreement would bring untold benefits to Canada, would increase our revenues, would cure our taxation troubles, would solve our unemployment problem and raise our standard of living. Those predictions of the Prime Minister were never realized. While it is true that some parts of the country received temporary benefits during the three years this treaty was in operation, the fact remains that the same problems of unemployment and taxation are with us. During that three year period Canada purchased some $320,000,000 worth of goods more than she sold to the United States—and in this figure I am not including gold. These were principally manufactured or partly manufactured goods, with a high content of labour.

When the Prime Minister introduced the present trade treaty into the house with his lengthy and somewhat political utterances, which covered some sixteen and a half pages of Hansard, he ignored the fact that his 1936 predictions had not been realized. He again spoke enthusiastically, even aggressively, of the benefits which Canada would receive under the new treaty. He reiterated his belief in the policy of the Liberal party, that trade was the panacea for all our political and economic problems, that trade was the basis of industrial and commercial development, that what Canada needed was trade. Canada's need of trade was emphasized on the ground that trade means increased production, increased consumption, increased distribution, increased transportation, increased employment, an increase in the standard of living, and consequently increased prosperity.

On March 17, 1938, when the United States and Canadian governments announced the signing of the new trade agreements, both issued press releases describing the benefits received and the concessions made by each party. While the Canadian release contained a fairly accurate account of those benefits and concessions, there was a lack of detail and also a lack of frankness in dealing with some of the items, while the press release issued by the United States government gave a full and complete account of the agreement, indicated quite clearly how the United States government had protected its markets by quota restrictions and then went on to give reasons to substantiate the statement that the United States benefited a great deal more than Canada from the agreement.

During his address in this debate the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) placed on Hansard the opinions of representative people and of newspapers in support of the new trade agreement; but I noticed that the dates of those opinions and newspaper quotations were within one week of the issue of the press release, and for that reason I would not place too high a value upon them, because I do not think sufficient time had elapsed to study the effects of the new agreement upon Canadian industry. It is only now that our manufacturers, working men, farmers and fruit and vegetable growers are beginning to experience the disastrous effects the treaty has had in Canada, and I venture to say that those whose opinions the minister quoted would, if given the opportunity, revise them even at this comparatively early date.

I also should like to place on Hansard some opinions on the trade agreement that have been expressed in the United States and Canada. First, I quote from an editorial in the Labour Leader, dated December 2, 1938:

So far as we can learn, the new treaty has not been favourably received by either the east or the west. Last week a university professor from western Canada made a statement to the effect that the west had again been sold down the river. In the same week the Ontario Vegetable Growers' Association condemned the treaty on the grounds that it would be more difficult to dispose of their crops in the home market while at the same time the Canadian manufacturers were protesting that the removal of the three per cent excise tax would penalize many industries. We also learn that communications have been pouring in to the finance department from manufacturers protesting the tax on raw materials when the finished products have been relieved of taxation.

From the Financial Post I quote this:

Commercial printers were amazed, alarmed and perplexed when they learned the terms of the Canada-United States trade treaty which provides for free entry of printed matter when shipped into Canada in individual packages valued at not more than one dollar.

The Toronto Globe and Mail of February 1 last has this heading:

Japan textiles crowd Canada. A. O. Dawson defines the position of the world's textiles as desperate.

It goes on to say:

Mr. Dawson pointed out in one product alone Canada has imported in the first half of 1938 twenty-five per cent of Japan's total exports.

In the Financial Post of November 26, 1938, I find this heading:

British Columbia lumbermen speculate on the effect of the trade treaty.

The article goes on to say:

British Columbia lumbermen say it is largely a matter of opinion whether the advantages given in the United States market will compensate for their sacrifice of British preference in United Kingdom.

Again the Financial Post says:

Lifting of three per cent import excise will effect cuts in duty up to five per cent.

Then from the Toronto Evening Telegram of November 18, 1938, I quote this:

Canada pays large price to open doors of trading between Britain and the United States. Yields wheat and apple preference for cattle benefits in United States.

The New York Times of November 18, 1938, says:

Farmers benefit under trade pact. British treaty an advantage to corn, rice, hogs, apples and citrus fruit producers. At present American wheat sold abroad is marketed at prices below domestic levels and the government makes up losses by export subsidies. The wheat concessions should go far in helping the American wheat farmer to reestablish a profitable market in Great Britain. Experts predict a fifty per cent expansion in Britain purchases of lard. The agreement likewise substantially enlarges British import quotas on pork, hams, cured pork and other products.

Preferred rates on Canadian shipments removed—Canadian grain will flow once more through our port—Welcome news to the thousands of grain workers who have suffered from reduced working hours since 1932.

There is no doubt that the operation of the present agreement during the past two months has affected adversely the basic steel, iron and textile industries not only in the city of Hamilton but throughout Canada. This effect will be reflected in reduced revenue, reduced purchasing power, an increase in taxation, an increase in the number of unemployed and an increase in the number on relief. In the year ending December 31, 1938, there were 19,166 individuals on relief in Hamilton, and I attribute that principally to the imports of United States manufactured goods under the 1935 agreement and to the apprehension of employers of labour as to the terms of the present agreement.

When the present government in 1936 reduced the tariff on washing machines, the Apex washer was being manufactured in Montreal by the Robert Mitchell Company. This machine is now being imported direct from the United States. The ABC washer was also being made in Canada by the Northern Electric Company, and it is now being imported in large quantities from their United States factories. My experience and observation of various industries in Hamilton have been that when the Canadian tariff is reduced beyond what may be considered the reasonable amount of protection necessary, Canadian industries that have parent companies in the United States immediately stop making their products in Canada and import direct from their factories in the United States. A reasonable protection is the amount of protection necessary to allow our manufacturers to compete with the products of other manufacturers coming into our markets. Percentage means nothing; it is simply a matter of the amount of protection necessary to enable our industries to keep their men employed.

Mr. McNIVEN: Will the hon. member indicate what amount he thinks would be necessary to accomplish the purpose he has in mind?

Mr. BROWN: I may possibly do that later on. At the present time there are about seventeen establishments in Canada making washing machines, and most of those machines have about ninety per cent British content. Further importations, which have been increasing since 1933, will so restrict the available market that I have no doubt that some of these manufacturers will have to suspend operations and follow the two industries I have already mentioned.

Since 1933 the growth of imports of washing machines has been as follows:

Year	No. of machines
1934	3,014
1935	3,380
1936	8,428
1937	16,914
1938 (June and July inclusive)	6,545

As showing further the effects of this treaty upon our industries, let me say that I received last week a letter from the manager of an advertising concern who advised me that he was losing a contract with a manufacturing company which was making machinery, because, the head of the company stated, the present treaty was putting him out of business.

I wish to deal specifically with items which affect the industries established in my own constituency, and I think that at this stage, Mr. Speaker, if the house would not object, you might call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 9, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

SUDETEN IMMIGRANTS

SETTLEMENT IN CANADA OF FAMILIES FROM CZECHO-SLOVAKIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): A few days ago questions were asked in regard to the matter of the proposed settlement in Canada of some Sudeten German refugees. I may say at once that there has been some misunderstanding as to the actual facts. A report, originating in London, appeared in the following Canadian press dispatch on March 3:

London, March 3.—Arrangements have been completed for the transportation of 3,000 Sudeten Germans to Canada, it was reported to-night. They will be settled in the Peace River district and in northern Saskatchewan.

The Czech government has agreed to provide the $2,000,000 which the settlers will take to Canada to establish themselves in farming communities. The money came from loans and gifts made by the British and French governments after the Munich settlement.

Canadian railway companies, it is reported, have completed arrangements to take the first group of settlers early in April.

It is understood an agreement has been reached between the Canadian and Czech governments calling for each family to take a minimum of $1,500. The new settlers will be Germans who refused to become citizens of the Reich after the Munich agreement transformed their homes from under the control of Czecho-Slovakia to that of Germany. They refused to be nazified and voluntarily gave up their homes.

Since the German occupation of the Sudeten areas the men and their women and children have been living under conditions of extreme hardship, with the Czech government providing refugee camps for them.

It is understood a majority of the new settlers are experienced farmers. They will be chosen carefully on behalf of the Canadian government but the total is not expected to exceed 3,000.

Mr. MANION: Was that all a quotation?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, a Canadian press dispatch from London. A Prague dispatch of the fifth instant contained the following:

Prague, March 5.—Eight hundred families of former German socialists and democrats, cut adrift from their homes by Chancellor Hitler's annexation of the Sudetenland, have received permission from Ottawa to establish a village of their own in Canada, it was announced here Saturday.

The Czecho-Slovak and British governments have arranged for approximately 3,000 people to emigrate to the dominion. They will be led by two former members of the Czech Chamber of Deputies, Wenzel Jaksch and Siegfrid Taub.

Reports in London last Friday said the emigrants would be settled in the Peace River district and in northern Saskatchewan. The Prague government has allotted $1,500 to each family. This will come from the $75,000,000 which Britain recently granted Czecho-Slovakia, half as a loan and half as a gift, to aid refugees and assist in reconstruction work. . . .

Following the partition of Czecho-Slovakia as a result of the Munich settlement, an acute refugee problem arose in Czecho-Slovakia due to the fact that tens of thousands of Czech citizens of German racial origin in the Sudeten area, who had been opposed to the nazi philosophy, fled from their homes in advance of the occupation by German troops. Shortly after this, urgent inquiries were made, from London and Prague, not only of the Canadian but of other governments as well, seeking some relief for these refugees, and Canada was asked if she would take some part in helping to solve the problem. Inquiries were set afoot by our immigration branch to discover the type and background of the refugees, and it was found that they had been engaged mainly in agriculture and small village industries. They were described as a sturdy type, but without capital, since in their flight they had abandoned everything. There were thus two classes—those who might come as agriculturists, and those who might come to establish new industries in this country.

When the immigration regulations were amended by order in council in the autumn of 1930, under the previous government, provision was made for the admission of farmers with sufficient means to establish themselves in agriculture in Canada. There has been a movement of such families from year to year, averaging during the past two or three years about five hundred families a year. These have been settled on lands purchased with their own capital, usually farms that had come into the market at a fairly low price. All this settlement has been under the auspices of the colonization branches of our two railways. From reports that the department receives from time to time, it is apparent that the work is being well done. Many of these families have been established successfully with less than $1,500.

Early in December last a delegation from Czecho-Slovakia visited Canada to see if homes could be found for some of these refugees. The delegation consisted of an official of the Czech government and two others representing the German group from the Sudeten area. Their request was fully explored. They were told that, while we could not change the immigration regulations at present in force, no objection would be raised to their inclusion in the movement of agricultural families which has been going on for several years. It was pointed out that they would be required to meet rigid examination overseas as to their physical and mental health and their general fitness for settlement. They were further advised that each family unit—and it was estimated the average family unit was about four—would be required to have on arrival in Canada at least $1,500 of capital.

After this delegation returned to London we were advised that they had succeeded in getting capital whereby these families would be provided with the financial assistance necessary to meet the conditions laid down here, and referred to a moment ago.

Canada has not undertaken any obligation or expenditure in connection with this movement. All the costs of transportation and settlement will come from funds secured from abroad. The actual task of settlement will continue to be undertaken by the colonization branches of the railways. The statement that we have agreed to take 3,000 souls, as the London report suggests, or 800 families, as the Prague report suggests, is pure guess work. We have not agreed to take any specified number. The number to be taken will depend upon the number of those found to be physically and otherwise fit. The examination as to fitness will be held overseas, and colonization officials of the railways, together with medical doctors of the department of health, and immigration officials, will cooperate in an effort to see that those who come to Canada will be an asset to this dominion. The examinations will begin shortly. The total number of this group at present in Czecho-Slovakia itself is less than half the number mentioned in press dispatches.

[Mr. Crerar.]

It should be emphasized that such of these families as come to Canada for land settlement will be located under the auspices of the colonization branches of the railways. We have no information at the moment where they will be settled, but we understand that the railways intend putting them into small groups where suitable land is available, in order to make supervision for the first few years less expensive than if they were scattered over wider areas. The report from Prague that these people are coming for village settlement is entirely erroneous.

While the methods being followed for the admission of refugees to Canada may not be satisfactory to all, I believe we are going about the matter in the way best calculated to help some of these unfortunate people, without at the same time disturbing conditions here. Many members of the house know something of the pressure on the department to open the doors wider for the admission of greater numbers than are at present coming in. It is undeniably true that the plight of hundreds of thousands of the refugees in Europe is a desperate one and must appeal to the humanitarian instincts of all. The criticism has been made that, since Canada has vast areas either thinly settled or not settled at all, with a wealth of resources that many other countries envy, we should adopt a more generous attitude in the matter of immigration and give an opportunity to worthy people to make homes for themselves in our fortunate land. We must, however, having regard to existing conditions, recognize that there are limits within which we can assist; within those limits we are trying to deal with these problems with as much consideration as can be given.

Mr. PELLETIER: I understand the Minister of Mines and Resources to say, then, that the report about which I questioned him did not come from officials of his own department, in Canada.

Mr. CRERAR: No; the reports I have read came from British and foreign dispatches.

Mr. MANION: I should like to ask two questions in connection with this matter. First, the minister mentioned the fact that other countries had been approached. Has he any record as to the numbers accepted by other countries? Secondly, are these people being settled on railway lands, or on other lands?

Mr. CRERAR: I have no information in regard to the first question. I know that representations were made to various governments—at any rate, so we were informed at the time.

In regard to the question as to where they will be settled, this matter is under the direction, shall I say, of the colonization departments of the railways, and I presume they will follow the policy they have followed in the past in respect of these settlers. In many districts there are farms which are for sale at low prices. While I have no definite information on the point, I should think it likely that the railways will be endeavouring to settle such lands. Naturally they have a direct interest in having them settled.

Mr. CHURCH: Why not look after your own people, here, first? Charity should begin at home.

Mr. HOMUTH: Can the minister guarantee that these people will not go into the large towns and cities, and that they will all be settled on the land?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know what sort of guarantee could be secured in that respect. But I can assure my hon. friend I think the possibilities of their going into the towns and cities are very remote indeed. As a matter of fact, they are glad to get a chance to live in peace and safety.

Miss MACPHAIL: I should like to ask the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) whether any provision has been made for the admission of noted professors, scientists, musicians and other persons who are being persecuted in various countries, and who would undoubtedly prove to be a great asset to whatever country they went. Such people could not come in now, according to the statement just read by the minister.

Mr. CRERAR: If their country of origin was in Europe they could not come in under the present regulations, but they could be allowed to enter by special order in council. For the information of the house I may say that in some cases where the merit was outstanding and where it was felt a contribution would be made to Canada, permission was given to enter.

Mr. POULIOT: There are too many intelligentzia in this country already.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Is sufficient investigation being made to find out whether these persons are communists? I think it is very important that a special investigation should be made in that regard.

Mr. CRERAR: As a matter of fact every family is being investigated. The information given to us, and I believe it is authentic, is that probably ninety-five per cent of these families are Roman Catholics.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Then they could not be communists.

Mr. FAIR: Will the medical examination of these people who are coming in be any better than it has been in the past?

Mr. CRERAR: The medical inspection will be a rigid one. I cannot admit the suggestion in my hon. friend's question that this inspection has been inadequate in the past.

Mr. POULIOT: I have just one question to ask. Suppose certain of these immigrants should be found unsatisfactory; since they are refugees, to what country will they be deported?

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—IMPORTATION OF UNITED STATES WHEAT INTO ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yesterday on the orders of the day my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) made some reference to the practice of certain Ontario mills in importing wheat from the United States, presumably to the detriment of the Ontario producers. I have since been in touch with the millers and at some considerable sacrifice to themselves they have agreed to discontinue the importations.

CANADA-UNITED STATES—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION FOR APPROVAL SUBJECT TO REQUIRED LEGISLATION

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King that the house go into committee on the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the trade agreement entered into at Washington on the 17th day of November, 1938, between Canada and the United States of America, and that this house do approve of the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.

Mr. A. A. BROWN (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned yesterday I was referring to certain industries which had been affected adversely by the Canada-United States trade agreement. In the 1935 agreement only four items of the primary metal group, which would cover such products as bars, rods, plates, sheets, castings and forgings, were affected. In 1937 the imports of those four items amounted to $2,919,000. In the new agreement concessions are made to the United States on some forty items, the imports of which from the United States amounted to $23,000,000 in 1937. The United States press release states that the reduction in duty on these items will improve the position of the United States producer in competition with the Canadian manufacturer.

In 1937 Canada imported machinery from the United States to the value of over $50,000,000. These importations did not include items such as aircraft, electrical apparatus, or motor vehicles. Numerous concessions have been made in this field, either the duty being bound or the tariff reduced. In the new agreement certain concessions have been made in the electrical apparatus and machinery group. In 1937 the imports from the United States of these items amounted to nearly $7,000,000. Certain reductions on some of these items were made in the 1935 agreement, and the imports increased from $4,334,000 in 1935 to $7,425,000 in 1937. Total Canadian imports from the United States in 1937 amounted to $491,000,000. The importations of non-agricultural products in that year amounted to $237,000,000. Under the present agreement duty reductions have been made on items which were imported in that year to the extent of $144,000,000. The 1935 rate has been bound on items which were imported in that year to the extent of $45,000,000. The free rate has been bound under the new agreement on items which were imported to the extent of $48,000,000. These figures do not include imports of articles the duties on which have been reduced under the most favoured nation clause, and which were imported in 1936 to the value of $74,000,000.

It is quite obvious that the reductions of the tariff and the concessions made in the 1935 agreement resulted in an increase of importations of United States goods into the Canadian market at the expense of the Canadian producers. It is also obvious that the additional concessions and reductions in duty which have been made are going to increase still further United States imports. As the Canadian market is restricted, these importations will be at the expense of the Canadian manufacturer and the Canadian workman.

During the course of the debate on this resolution I believe that the members on this side of the house have been successful in pointing out that the government did not make the proper preparations for the negotiation of such an important treaty, and that the failure to make these preparations seriously handicapped the representatives of the government during the period of negotiation; that the government was woefully ignorant of the economic condition of the industries of this country because it did not consult those industries whose interests have been affected by the agreement; that the government did not take the same precaution to protect the markets, industries and workmen of Canada as did other countries in the form of quotas and restrictions; that the manufacturing and secondary industries and Canadian workmen have been sacrificed for some temporary and speculative benefit to the cattle and lumbering industries; that the interests of the vegetable and fruit growers have been sacrificed; that this agreement has diverted traffic from Canadian to United States ports; that the government has sacrificed productive revenue in making tariff reductions, which revenue produces purchasing power, and employment, making it necessary to replace this with a non-productive tax which will create unemployment and handicap Canadian industries; that this government has sacrificed part of our British preference in our best markets in wheat, fruits, and lumber; that this agreement will cause grievous harm to our transportation system, railways and steamships, by sending traffic north and south, instead of east and west; that this treaty is not reciprocal, because the United States tariff is much higher on items entering United States markets than the tariff on the same items entering the Canadian market; that this agreement is regarded as a purely economic agreement entered into by the three countries, regardless of the fact that the Canadian government attempts to attach considerable political importance to it in order to hide its faulty workmanship.

In the course of this debate many supporters of the new trade agreement were very much concerned with obtaining the highest possible price for goods produced in their part of the country, and they were equally concerned with paying the lowest possible price for goods purchased in any other part of the country. I do not think this attitude is in the best interests of Canada. According to the Canada Year Book for 1936, there were in Canada 25,491 establishments, employing 582,874 persons, paying out in wages $590,326,000, and producing goods to the net value of $1,302,179,000. About 63 per cent of these workers are dependent on industries that pay about 61 per cent of the total wages and salaries and produce over 51 per cent of the net value of the manufacturing production in Canada. Also dependent on these industries for at least part of their employment are hundreds of engineers, doctors, lawyers, employees of telegraph and telephone companies, railway companies, steamship companies, and those engaged in wholesale or retail distribution.

Since 1935 this government has been engaged in the policy of reducing tariff protection and granting concessions in such a haphazard manner that the industrialists of this country have not been able to make any plans for the future, and this lack of confidence is reflected in the employment problem. Judging from the fruits of the trade agreements made by this government during the past four years, I think it would be better occupied in devoting more time and energy to developing the internal trade of Canada, equalizing freight rates, and inducing Canadians to buy Canadian coal, Canadian oil, Canadian farm products, and Canadian manufactured products, thus building up a stable market which the government can control, and which will provide greater purchasing power and a higher standard of living, as well as more employment for Canadian workers.

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention until a very few days ago to take part in this debate, but believing as I do that this trade treaty is by all odds the most important item to come before parliament this session, if not the most important piece of legislation that has been presented to the Canadian people in this generation, and in view of the attitude of a number of members of the official opposition, including their leader, during the last few weeks, I felt that I owed it to my constituents and to the people of Canada as a whole to express my opinions in respect to this all-important piece of legislation.

I notice that the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) is following well in the footsteps of his predecessor in the number of speeches he is making inside and outside of this house. In his address in Toronto the other day he referred to this government as being a reactionary government. When I think of the opposition to this treaty by the official Conservative party in this house I cannot but feel that they oppose it because the government is too progressive—because we are having too much free trade, they think; because of the government's introduction of penitentiary reform; because of the government's home improvement plan; because of its youth training projects; because of its prairie farm rehabilitation, and because of its various acts with respect to housing and other measures to assist the municipalities. I cannot but think that their opposition was from no other point of view than that the government has been too progressive.

I am going to pay to two or three members of the official opposition the compliment of referring for a few moments to their addresses. I took some notes while the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Brown) was speaking. One of the things he said was that thousands of men had been thrown out of employment in Hamilton as a result of the 1935 trade treaty—because, in other words, this government had lowered the tariffs on manufactured goods. He went on to say that industries would be put out of business in the city of Hamilton because of the present treaty.

I can only reply that an industry or industries which cannot succeed under the terms of this treaty, substantial though the reductions are that it makes in the duties, is much too expensive a luxury for this country to afford. I say further that an industry that cannot thrive under the duties prevailing in this country at the present time, ranging as they do from 7½ to 30 per cent, is certainly too expensive for the country, and their failure must be due to incompetence or to the fact that the industry is not indigenous to the country. I would remind the house that two years ago the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, speaking in this house, stated that there were numerous industries in Canada which should never have been allowed to establish here, that they were not indigenous to the country and had become a very real problem because of the amount of protection they required to enable them to continue to exist.

The hon. member for Hamilton East went on to say that the city of Hamilton paid in wages and salaries $40,000,000 annually. That is a very substantial sum, and we are all proud that the city of Hamilton does provide, through the medium of its industries, that amount of wages and salaries for our Canadian people. But I would remind the hon. member that the little province of Manitoba, which was formerly regarded as the postage stamp province of this dominion, produced from its farms alone from 1926 to 1930 an average yearly production of farm products amounting in value to $622,565,000. After all, therefore, the city of Hamilton, with its $40,000,000 is a very small item in the vast aggregate production of this country.

The hon. member also told us that word had come from the west that the west had been sold down the river by this treaty. I would suggest to the hon. member that he remain in his own little back yard because all the information I receive from the west is that they are hoping that nothing will happen to this trade treaty but that it may be given an opportunity to work out fully our economic salvation, and retrieve the lost trade of this country.

The hon. gentleman also spoke of two companies manufacturing washing machines in the city of Hamilton which were put out of business by the 1935 agreement. I can say only this: If there is one item in the domestic trade of Canada where the racket of protection reached a higher degree in the last few years than any other, it was the washing machine manufacturers. I would remind the house that, through the reduction in duties on washing machines which was effected by this government, the price of power machines has been reduced from twenty to forty per cent; and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that throughout the length and breadth of this country the housewives who were previously unable to purchase power machines will thank this government for having reduced the cost of those articles.

I intend to pay the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) the compliment of a reference to his remarks. He also spoke of the industrial workers, and he told the house that forty per cent of Canada's total trade resulted from the Canadian manufacturing interests. He may have made that statement innocently; he may not have known the facts. The facts are that less than twenty-four per cent of the production of this country originates in the secondary industries. I have secured figures as to the number of people engaged in these industries, ranging from the manufacture of needles and pins to the making of locomotives. What do they amount to? From the boy who sweeps the floor to the manager of the factory, they number just 16·1 per cent of all the workers of this country. The total population dependent upon the secondary or manufacturing industries is just 1,771,000. Contrast this with agriculture, in which 3,261,000 are engaged, while in the related natural industries we have actively engaged something over 3,000,000 people. May I refer here to a pamphlet issued by one of the large Canadian grain firms, a concern not interested in the political effects of the tariff policies of any government. The writer points out that there is no hope of restoring the solvency of agriculture in this country until we secure a definite governmental policy in the direction of lower tariffs. I could give a lot more figures, but I do not intend to weary the house, and there are other matters with which I should like to deal. But I should like the hon. members for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) and Waterloo South to realize that only sixteen per cent of the people of Canada are engaged in the secondary industries of this country, and that only twenty-four per cent of the total wealth production in Canada comes from manufacturing interests.

Mr. HARRIS: Perhaps the hon. member has also the figures of the number of employees engaged in secondary industry and in primary industry.

Mr. WARD: Yes, I have them here. The number of employees, male and female, in the manufacturing industries of Canada is 631,000.

Mr. HARRIS: Just short by 200,000.

Mr. WARD: This is taken from a publication of the bureau of statistics. I believe my hon. friend has fallen into the same trap that a number of hon. members have fallen into, that of including a myriad of other industries which really have nothing to do with manufacturing—for instance, power plants, construction, transportation, etcetera.

Mr. HARRIS: How many are employed in the primary industries?

Mr. WARD: In agriculture, 1,103,899; forestry, fishing and trapping, 96,983; mining, quarrying, oil and salt wells, et cetera, 71,608. The return also gives figures about electric light and power plants, construction, transportation, et cetera, but I take it the hon. member is not interested in those.

Mr. BAKER: May I ask the hon. gentleman whether he will not admit that the best market for those 1,100,000 engaged in agriculture is provided by the 800,000 engaged in manufacturing in Canada?

Mr. WARD: In reply to that, I would say that the part of the country which I have the honour to represent in this house must export. Up to date we have had to export about sixty per cent of our production. If we do not import, there is no hope whatever of our securing a market for the surplus products of the prairie farms.

Mr. BAKER: The hon. member has not answered my question at all.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WARD: There are only eleven millions of people in Canada. We can eat only so much, and beyond that point we must export. The fishermen of Nova Scotia can consume only so much fish; the rest must be exported. Of our 400,000,000-bushel production of wheat we consume from one hundred to one hundred and ten millions, and the remainder must be exported. The same is true with regard to our cattle, our cheese, our butter, and so forth. Anyone who looks at the statements issued from time to time by the Department of Finance cannot but be impressed with this fact, that ninety-six per cent of the total trade of the world is done in the exchange of goods for goods. That goes to show that if we do not buy we shall not sell. That is why we from the west insist that we must import goods. It is not that we want to put any Canadian industry out of business, or damage any of the other industries of this country. But it is an economic impossibility to dispose of the vast surplus of goods produced in western Canada unless they are sold in the markets of the world.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): May I ask the hon. gentleman how we are going to put to work the unemployed people in our cities?

Mr. WARD: Mr. Speaker, I would remind you of the consequences of following the policy advocated the other day by the hon. member for St. Paul's. Let our minds go back to the period from 1930 to 1935. It will be recalled that step by step, as the government he supported, the government of that day, increased the tariffs, placed impositions against the importation of goods into this country, unemployment increased.

Mr. MASSEY: That is just not true.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: The hon. member cannot take it.

Mr. WARD: I have the figures here.

Mr. MASSEY: Well, look at them and read them.

Mr. WARD: I will give them in a few minutes. The hon. member for Waterloo South, addressing the house the other day, spoke of the continuous changing of tariffs on the part of this government He said:

> This continual tariff changing by the government, as I have said before in the house, is doing nothing but giving industry the jitters, and it is slowly but surely lowering the standard of living of the industrial workers of Canada. Member after member, particularly those from the western provinces, have stood in the house and demanded protection for the western wheat farmer.

I can excuse the hon. member for Waterloo South because he is a new member, but I assure the house that neither he nor any other member has at any time heard a western member ask for protection for the wheat growers. From time to time, as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), if he were here, would agree, we have asked for something in the way of a quid pro quo for the enormous cost to western Canada of bonusing the secondary industries of the country for the last fifty or sixty years. We have asked for that, we are still asking for it, and we must have it. Give the wheat grower and cattle raiser of western Canada the same freedom of market to buy in as he is compelled to sell in, and we will ask for no bonus or protection of any sort.

The hon. member for St. Paul's the other day spoke of the impossibility of Canadian industrial workers competing with those of some other countries. He mentioned no names, but I presume he was referring to Japan. Since he spoke I have looked up the figures, and I find that the average wages paid in the factories in Japan are from 22 to 26 cents a day. I also looked up the wages paid to the peon or native labourer of the Argentine, and I find that those labourers are paid eleven cents a day. Now, the farmers of western Canada must compete with the eleven cent labour of the Argentine farm worker. It is true it would be a terrible thing for Canadian workers to have to compete with those of Japan and I hope they never will compete with them directly, but I would point out that the Canadian industrialists are competing in a market that is two and a half times better than the market that the western wheat grower competes in. These are facts that we must sit down and consider calmly.

I say to the representatives of eastern Canada: The problem is not all yours, for we too are facing a tremendous problem. I have farmed in western Canada for forty years; nature has made my farm one of the finest in Manitoba. I balance my books every year, I keep accounts, and I can tell you I have never produced wheat at eighty cents a bushel. If I did not engage in other things as well, in sidelines, I never could carry on, pay my taxes, and retain solvency.

Mr. HOMUTH: Has the hon. member ever heard the head of any industry, who sat in this house, complain about anything that was done for the western producer?

Mr. WARD: That is a perfectly proper question, and in answer I say, no. I have not heard anything of the sort, and that is to the credit of the industrialists of eastern Canada. But it would be quite inconsistent for protectionists to make any such complaint. Of course they would not, and we give them credit for being magnanimous enough not to complain. Moreover, I must say the west was very grateful during those terrible years of drought, especially in Saskatchewan, for the very generous donations from Ontario and Quebec in the form of clothing, fruit, vegetables, cheese, and so on. It was a wonderful thing for the drought area of western Canada, and it saved many from near starvation.

I do say, however, that the industrialists of eastern Canada overlook an important fact. They complain about the lowering of tariffs and the consequent embarrassment of their workers, but they must not forget that when you lower a tariff you do make it easier for the agriculturist to carry on.

Mr. HOMUTH: Not in farm implements.

Mr. WARD: That is one manufacture which I made it my business to look into when I visited the United States. I wanted to ascertain whether there actually was a combine in the manufacturing of farm implements, and I found to my satisfaction—or otherwise—that in my judgment there was. There is I believe a watertight combine on this continent between the United States and the Canadian manufacturers whereby implement prices remain constant on both sides of the line. That is the one item of production in Canada in which it is possible to corner or to have a combine.

May I repeat, the treaty which is now before the house is the most important item of legislation that has come before parliament in my time, and I think we should see to it that ample opportunity is given for it to prove itself. I regret, therefore, that the leader of the opposition and others should make the statements throughout the country that they do regarding the treaty. One of his friends, speaking in Toronto the other day at a Conservative convention, made a statement to which I wish to refer. The speaker was Mr. Kelso Roberts, K.C., and I presume he comes from the constituency of the hon. member for St. Paul's. I quote:

> Kelso Roberts, K.C., president of St. Paul's Riding Conservative Association, spoke briefly, emphasizing that the King government had done nothing to solve the unemployment problem and declaring that if the efforts of a Conservative government, once elected, proved as futile, he would never again appear on the platform at a Conservative meeting.

I am sure that if he knew the facts he would never again appear on a Conservative platform, because I am going to prove before I sit down that, apart from the loss of life during the great war, the most disastrous occurrence in the experience of this generation was the advent of the Conservative government in 1930. Also a good deal has been said about the six-cent bonus on dominion wheat entering Great Britain, and I intend to prove not only that it brought no grist to the mill of the western wheat growers, but on the contrary, that it cost them many millions of dollars.

I spoke a moment ago of certain statements made by the leader of the opposition. In and out of this house we have heard some rather cheap and flippant remarks from the hon. gentleman. I did not look up Hansard in this connection, but I did take down some of his slang words.

An hon. MEMBER: What has that to do with this trade treaty?

Mr. WARD: It has a great deal to do with it, because these words were all used in the course of his address on the treaty. Some of the epithets in which the hon. gentleman indulged were: Claptrap, twaddle, hooey. humbug, ballyhoo, pipedreams, tongue-lashings. There were a great many more, but these are just a few of the terms he made use of in discussing the treaty and other matters. I suggest that the country is looking to the leader of the opposition, the leader of one of the great parties in Canada, for leadership in ethics in this house, and not for the sort of cheap, degrading stuff we have witnessed in this debate.

An hon. MEMBER: That philosophy might fit the other side of the house too.

Mr. WARD: I said that before resuming my seat I would prove that the advent of the Bennett government was the most disastrous thing that had occurred in the lifetime of this generation, and I am going to give some figures to substantiate that statement. These figures were prepared by the bureau of statistics. I have none of my own, so that if there is anything wrong with them hon. members can thresh it out with Doctor Coats.

I will start with the year 1930. Hon. gentlemen always talk about the terrible depression in 1930 when they took power. They took office on August 22, and during the first month following the election this new wrecking crew had been getting their chisels and jimmies and drills sharpened, and preparing their powder to blast things to pieces. Taking all the records, price levels, trade figures and so on, it will be seen that they remained almost constant until about September 1, when the crash came. Had trade continued throughout that year as it had gone on until September 1, our imports would have amounted to $1,088,000,000, and I hope hon. members will keep these figures in mind. One year later our imports had fallen to $628,000,000, a reduction of over half a billion dollars, nor did it stop there. One year later, imports had dropped to $452,000,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: What about the exports?

Mr. WARD: I have the exports here, too; they are coming. By 1933, our imports had dropped to $401,000,000.

Mr. BAKER: Good business.

Mr. WARD: Yes, good business destroying trade, but there is another side to this picture. One year later, by 1934, imports had risen a little, to $513,000,000, and in 1935 they rose to $550,000,000. At the time the Conservative government went out of office our imports stood at the last figure. Then what about the exports during that same period? On the basis of September 1, 1930, figures, our exports should have stood at the end of the year at $1,087,000,000. Where were they one year later? They had dropped to $629,000,000, again a reduction of nearly half a billion dollars.

Mr. HARRIS: Did not the United States pass the 1930 tariff act during that period, which cut off our exports to that country?

Mr. WARD: Is the hon. member referring to the Hawley-Smoot tariff?

Mr. HARRIS: No, the 1930 tariff.

Mr. WARD: Well, Mr. Speaker, there is in the English language the word "alibi." I do not think there is a term that could be applied more aptly to describe some of the statements of our Conservative friends.

To continue, in 1931 our exports dropped to $629,000,000, and in the following year they fell to $554,000,000. During 1933 they rose a little, to $602,000,000, and by 1935 they had increased to $838,000,000. What happened during the following year, the first year this government was in office? Our imports rose from $620,000,000 to $835,000,000 and our exports increased from $838,000,000 to $1,027,000,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Including gold which was not included in previous years.

Mr. WARD: In 1937 our imports amounted to $808,000,000 while our exports increased to $1,125,000,000, almost back to the 1929 figure.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member is away out there.

Mr. WARD: The hon. gentleman can talk to Doctor Coats about these figures, because that is where I got them.

Mr. STEVENS: Nearly a billion dollars out.

Mr. WARD: A good deal has been said to the effect that all the high tariffs of the Conservative government were necessary in order to balance our trade, that we had to shut out imports in order to get our trade balanced. Let me compare what happened in this regard during the last five years of the Liberal administration with what occurred during the five years of Conservative administration. During the five years from 1926 to 1930 inclusive our annual favourable balance of trade averaged $188,000,000. From 1930 to 1935, after the wrecking crew had destroyed a large portion of our trade, that average dropped to $168,000,000. I do not care how you measure it; you cannot explain away these figures.

Mr. HARRIS: Is it quite ethical to call some hon. members a wrecking crew?

Mr. WARD: Well, I do not want to use the adjectives that were used the other day by my hon. friend's leader. Now we come to the question of the balance of internal trade.

Mr. MacNICOL: Tell us about the increase in unemployment. That is what we would like to hear.

Mr. WARD: All right. When the Conservative government came into power, on a policy of curing unemployment—

Mr. SPENCE: And they did.

Mr. WARD: —the number of unemployed was officially estimated at 117,000, according to the figures I obtained from the bureau of statistics. When they had been in power for three years the number of unemployed had increased to 840,000. I did not intend to put that on record, but the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) prompted me to do so. If we look at the wholesale price index, taking 1926 as 100, from 1926 to 1930 inclusive the wholesale price index of farm products in Canada was 99·5. From 1930 to 1935 inclusive that figure dropped to 54·45, and during the three years this government has been in office it has risen to 76·8. Again the figures are supplied by the bureau of statistics. Now we come to the price of wheat, which, from 1926 to 1930, averaged $1.32·6 per bushel. During the period my hon. friends were in office the average price was 66·9 cents per bushel.

Mr. SPENCE: Why compare depression days with periods of good times?

Mr. WARD: I thank my hon. friend for those words, because I also have the figures for the last three years, which have been referred to by hon. members sitting near him as years of terrible depression. For the past three years the average price of wheat has been $1.16·2 per bushel.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is it to-day?

Mr. WARD: Well, we measure things by averages in this country. Then I have some further figures that are tremendously interesting. I have taken 147 items purchased by Canadian farmers and compared the cost of these items with the average of farm purchasing power, both based on 1926 as 100. For the period from 1931 to 1935 inclusive the index figure for the items the farmer buys stood at 128, while farm purchasing power was 54, only showing a differential against the farmer during that period of 74. What happened between 1936 and 1938? We find that he paid 130, or 30 above the 1926 level, but that he received 95, or within five of the 1926 level. In other words, based on average values in connection with both production and consumption, the farmers throughout Canada are 35 per cent better off than they were between 1930 and 1935.

Now, I have still another table. I said I would prove that the preference on dominion wheat entering the British market had cost the farmers of Canada many millions of dollars. The wheat policy was just like most of the other terms of the 1932 trade agreement. Let us start with the 1930 grain prices. I have figures before me, again from the bureau of statistics, which show that during 1930 we rode along on a fairly even keel until about September 1, nine days after the Bennett government took office. The trade wrecking crew hadn't got down to work before this date. They did not have their machinery started up. The blasting powder had not been assembled in the depots. They were not quite ready.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is working well now—putting men out of work.

Mr. WARD: In the 1930 crop year, wheat remained at about the dollar level until about the end of August. And then what happened? In August the price averaged 92 cents. Indeed, the figures I have show that on the day of the election, July 28, as reported in the Winnipeg Free Press, the average market price for wheat was 93 cents, for oats 42 cents, for barley 45 cents, for rye 56 cents, and for flax $1.85. Let us see, however, what the prices were four months later—just four months of the operation of the government that was going to reestablish all things in Canada. In that time wheat had dropped from 93 cents to 67 cents. Oats had dropped from 42 cents to 27 cents; barley, from 45 cents to 31 cents; rye from 56 cents to 33 cents, and flax from $1.85 to $1.22.

In the month of August, 1930, wheat sold at 93 cents, but in September it had dropped to 78 cents. You will recall again, Mr. Speaker, that this was during the time these amateurs were at work. Just one month later, namely in October, it had dropped to 72 cents. In November it was down to 64 cents, and in December, to 55 cents. In other words, wheat had dropped in December to just about half the price it had been in August when the Bennett government took office.

Now we come to the year 1932, when the preference was operating. I would remind hon. members that the treaty became effective on August 22, 1932. At the end of August wheat was selling for 56 cents.

In one month it had dropped to 51 cents; in two months, to 48 cents; in three months, to 46 cents, and one month later to 38 cents. That is what happened under the British preference, and that is why I say that the six per cent preference on Canadian wheat had a disastrous effect upon the wheat growers of western Canada, and instead of bringing them greater returns meant a loss to them of millions of dollars.

Mr. DENTON MASSEY (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may be forgiven for not following in my arguments the speech which has just been delivered by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward). I find it difficult to chase phantoms, vapourings and hallucinations. I will give the hon. member one figure, and one only. In December, 1935, the unemployed wage-earners in this country numbered 491,000. In December, 1938, three years after the advent to power of hon. members opposite, the unemployed numbered 472,000, showing a net reduction of only 19,000 in the number of unemployed wage-earners. In the last three years of the previous administration, namely from December, 1932, to December, 1935, there was a reduction of 221,000 in the number of unemployed, a reduction eleven and a half times as great as hon. members opposite have been able to accomplish. Those, Mr. Speaker, are figures from the bureau of statistics, the source of my hon. friend's figures.

I would remind the hon. gentleman, if I may, that world trade from 1933 to 1935 rose five points of index, whereas world trade from 1935 to 1937 rose twenty points of index. In other words, while world trade was rising only five points of index, unemployment in Canada was reduced by 221,000, and while world trade was rising twenty points of index, unemployment in Canada was reduced by only 19,000. These figures, Mr. Speaker, are also from the bureau of statistics.

I am not so much concerned with such figures as the hon. member has put upon Hansard, or in his use of them as I am concerned with this: Throughout the length and breadth of Canada there is deepening distress which is, I believe I may say safely to hon. members opposite, a condition which should touch the heart and mind of every hon. member of this house. We should not rise in our places and by the use of "alibis" attempt to dodge that fact. We are faced with that situation. Let us not blink the fact, and let us not make stump speeches which would do credit to "ward" politicians.

I do not purpose at length to prolong the present debate on the resolution before the house. But a sense of responsibility compels me to say a few words at this stage with respect to the ratification of the Canada-United States trade treaty. I have been elected to the house to represent some 70,000 Canadians, the vast majority of whom are dependent upon industry for their livelihood. Accordingly, if a measure is introduced to the house which tends to abridge opportunities for those industrial workers who have sent me to parliament, to say the least I should be derelict in my responsibility if I did not raise my voice in protest on their behalf. Thus I make no apology to the house for speaking in protest against the present trade treaty, at least in so far as it affects the industrial worker. Unemployment, remaining as it has at a staggeringly high figure, and the uncertainty of the future of the young would-be wage-earner, present difficulties which in many cases appear to be insurmountable to the individual. Yet we in this house are being asked to approve a treaty which will deprive many Canadian workmen, now employed, of their jobs.

I shall take as an example one of the industries which are of immediate importance to my constituency. Within a stone's throw of the border of my riding is a leather company which has prospered under reasonable protection and the advantages of the Ottawa agreements of 1932. Until recently some 150 employees have been engaged in this plant in the making of patent leather alone. I am taking this industry only as an illustration. I speak with equal feeling for the security of the jobs of the workmen in any industry, for all the men and women in my riding, yes, in the whole of Canada. I speak for all men and women whose jobs are threatened as a result of the Prime Minister's negotiations at Washington last year.

Hon. members will recall that prior to 1932 an important export from the United States to the United Kingdom was patent leather, in which commodity the United States had nearly 58 per cent of the British market. In 1932 a rate of ten per cent ad valorem was imposed by the United Kingdom against United States patent leather. In 1936 only 11·8 per cent of the British patent leather market was supplied by the United States. The greatest change took place in 1934 when the import duty to the United Kingdom was increased to 15 per cent. Prior to 1932 Canada supplied less than 20 per cent of the patent leather entering the United Kingdom. As a result of the tariff of 1932, and the increase in that tariff in 1934 against the United States, while Canada still had free entry, our share of the British market in this product rose to a total of 76·2 per cent. Under the United States-United Kingdom trade agreement, on August 1, 1939, the duty on patent leather going into the United Kingdom from the United States is to be cut in half, namely to 7½ per cent, which will have the effect of restoring the market of the United Kingdom to the producers of patent leather in the United States at the expense of the Canadian workman.

I have not taken my opinion alone in this matter. I have discussed it personally with those who, as a result of their identification with this field of industry, are in a position to know the exact situation and to make an accurate prognosis. Accordingly I state that the jobs of 150 men in the particular firm to which I refer are threatened. On behalf of those who hold those jobs I raise my voice in protest to the Prime Minister of Canada, that in this tripartite treaty our preferred position should be so sacrificed. If I were to take the Prime Minister's advice, which I have no intention of doing, I would go back to my riding and tell these 150 men and women and their families that this agreement was made in the name of patriotism in order to strengthen the ties between the United Kingdom and the United States, and that they must surrender their jobs and join the ranks of the unemployed in order to bring about a closer union between these two countries That was the advice of the Prime Minister; that is what he told this house. I regret the Prime Minister is not in his seat, but does he honestly feel that such a sacrifice of livelihood is necessary, when these men and women know and when the Prime Minister himself knows that there was not, nor had there been, anything amiss or awry in the relationships between the United Kingdom and the United States?

I wonder if it is patriotic to jeopardize the jobs of Canadian workmen, especially in a time such as this? I wonder if it is patriotic to blink facts? I wonder if it is possible successfully to mix political theories and patriotism? If the relations between the United Kingdom and the United States had been strained, if as a result a treaty had been brought forward to bring together these two nations which had been drifting apart, patriotism and the love of peace might have had to play their part. But I claim it is nothing short of fatuous to state to the people of Canada that men and women should be compelled, because of the action of the right hon. gentleman opposite, to sacrifice their jobs. Certainly his latest trade treaty will make no definite contribution to the friendly relations between the United Kingdom and the United States, about which friendly relations there is definitely not even a shadow of a doubt.

If the Prime Minister of Canada wishes to talk about patriotism, if he wishes to be patriotic; if he in the fullest sense of that noble word wishes to make a contribution to world peace, let him take steps to consolidate and cement even more closely the family of empire and give an indication to the government of the United Kingdom that Canada is still a loyal member of that family. That is the type of patriotism which Canadians from coast to coast will recognize as divorced from party politics.

I shall not take up any more of the time of the house. On behalf of the men and women whose jobs are in jeopardy as a result of this treaty I raise my voice in protest, and in accordance with what I feel to be my responsibility as their representative in this parliament I shall vote against the treaty. In doing so I place my patriotism, my love of empire, my love of peace and my desire to see friendly relations maintained between the United Kingdom and the United States second to those of no man in this chamber, not even excluding the Prime Minister himself.

Mr. V. J. POTTIER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, I have followed one speaker after the other in this debate and I am beginning to realize the difficulty the Canadian people must have in following the reasoning of certain members of this house. We have had an illustration of this in the remarks of the two hon. gentlemen who have preceded me. The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) spoke on behalf of the farmers in general and the west in particular in an effort to give their point of view. He was followed by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey). The minute that hon. gentleman rose to address the house he began to lecture the hon. member for Dauphin. He suggested that he was a ward politician and was appealing to the few people in his constituency who might help him. From that he proceeded to make a fifteen minute speech on behalf of 150 employees in his own constituency.

Mr. MASSEY: No, no. The hon. member cannot put words into my mouth. I made it perfectly clear that I was using these 150 men and their jobs simply as an illustration of what may happen.

Mr. GRAY: It is a matter of opinion.

Mr. POTTIER: My sole point is that his speech is the worst kind of ward politics.

I want to take this first opportunity to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his government upon negotiating the trade treaty that is now before the house. I propose quite frankly to deal with it from the point of view of an industry in which my people are largely and deeply interested. I refer to the fishing industry, and my remarks will deal in toto with the benefits that we expect from this trade treaty.

Perhaps I should preface my remarks with a few figures to indicate the extent of the fishing industry in Canada as a whole. The total value of our fisheries last year was $38,000,000, and we exported approximately $28,000,000 worth, of which $6,000,000 went to the United Kingdom. Some $14,000,000 worth, about fifty per cent of our total exports, went to the United States. Perhaps hon. members will recall the report that Cockfield-Brown and Company made in 1932, in which it was indicated that in Canada the per capita production of fish was 120 pounds, and the per capita domestic consumption only 20·7 pounds. The latter figure has been increased in late years owing to efficient advertising and the progress made in processing and other methods since this government came into power, so that our per capita consumption is to-day approximately 30 pounds. The per capita consumption in Great Britain is 40 pounds; Norway, 70 pounds; Germany, 20 pounds; the West Indies, 33 pounds; Australia, 13 pounds; Ireland, 9 pounds. It will be seen, therefore, that we must export our fishery products in order to live. When it is realized that on the north Atlantic, owing to salinity of water and the conditions as to depth and temperature, we have the largest food fish area in the world, with some 200,000 square miles of fishing grounds adjacent to the maritime provinces, it is easy to see that my fishermen are vitally interested in the export of their products.

We have in the maritime provinces 22,500 fishermen, who produce some 435,000,000 pounds of fish, of a value of $14,500,000 in an average year. Of this $14,500,000 worth, we export in an average year, as recent years go, $7,000,000 worth, or about fifty per cent of our total production to United States. Under present world conditions there are only three directions in which our exports can go: the United States, the West Indies and South America, or Europe. Owing to foreign competition, conditions in the West Indies and South America are such that we cannot hope in any large way to enter that market. Disturbed conditions in Europe and increased production by individual countries have shut off that market, so that there is only one direction in which we can hope for increased exports, and that is the United States. There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that so far as the maritime fishermen are concerned, their lifeline is a line of exported fish products to the United States. The importance of marketing our fish in the United States has been recognized by every commission that has investigated fishing conditions in the maritimes—the Duncan commission, the Maclean commission, the Price Spreads commission.

Before going on to the benefits we expect from this trade treaty I should like to make one point clear. Since being a member of this house I have observed a little confusion in the minds of some as to the meaning of the fishing industry. I have heard people say, and representations to this effect have been made to me, that it is simply a matter of going to sea and catching cod or some other kind of fish in the same place and getting the same price all the time. But that is not so. The fishermen catch different types of fish; they fish in different areas; they market their catch differently and get different prices. In considering a trade treaty such as this, therefore, it is well to look at it from the point of view of this group of industries rather than to concentrate on one particular detail and judge the treaty from that basis alone.

In order to see at a glance the concessions which this treaty makes on fish and fish products of the Atlantic coast, I have prepared a schedule indicating the 1930 tariff, the new treaty rate, with proportional reduction, as well as the quantity and value of our fish shipped to the United States in 1937, and the duty paid, according to the United States figures. The schedule is not a long one, and rather than take the time to read it I would ask your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, to place it on Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member cannot place it on Hansard except with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. POTTIER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have used the 1937 figures of our exports to the United States because they are the latest I could get, and it is necessary to use the United States figures because they are related directly to the tariff items.

The schedule is as follows:

We also have reductions on fresh halibut and salmon of from 2 cents to 1 cent per pound; sturgeon, fresh shad and eels from 1 cent per pound to ½ cent; frozen mackerel from 2 cents to 1½ cents; salted alewives from 1¼ cents to ⅝ cent per pound. The agreement also provides for the rebinding of free entry for fish for three years, as well as concessions for prepared and preserved fish products.

It will be seen from this schedule that the reductions have been from twenty-five to fifty per cent on practically every dutiable fish of any importance. It is important in that regard to remember that we can obtain as a maximum only a fifty per cent reduction, because the President of the United States in negotiating a trade treaty cannot go beyond a fifty per cent reduction from the existing tariff; that is the 1930 tariff. Having in mind the opposition that existed for some time in the United States to any reduction whatever on fishery items, a study of the reductions made by this treaty shows that our negotiators must have had a touch of genius to obtain the concessions they did. I well remember that back in 1933 a group of United States sea captains went aboard the Thibault, as a fishing delegation, directly to Washington to protest against any reduction in the duty on fishery items. I remember how they were met, and we in the maritimes are particularly sensitive to these things. One of the commissioners made this statement, and I have never forgotten it since the day I read it, because, as I saw it at least, it meant prosperity or depression to our Canadian fishermen. This was the statement Commissioner Page made to the delegates and to Captain Morrissey, as a result of their conference: "Our sympathies are absolutely with you. If there is anything we can do, you can count upon us". But that was a death blow to the Canadian fishermen at that time so far as obtaining concessions was concerned. Following the opposition in that country there was never a reduction of major importance up to the present time. An efficient campaign was organized by the national fisheries association, and notwithstanding all the obstacles, we obtained the concessions which appear in the schedules that have already been referred to.

The people of the maritimes understood the difficulties and fully appreciated the situation. They are thankful for the efforts which have been made and the results which have been obtained. The 1930 tariff can be said to have meant generally the protection of United States fishermen on certain species of fish during periods of abundant domestic production, permitting the marketing of Canadian products during periods only of scarcity in the United States. The reductions in the tariff as we have them to-day will, I believe, have these three effects. First, we are going to see an increased export to the United States during periods of scarcity. Second, we are going to see increased exports during periods of United States production. Third, we are going to have the benefits of reductions on the same volume of business that we had before the treaty. I do not believe for a moment that we are going to glut the United States market. Our equipment and our production are not such as would enable that to be done under ordinary circumstances. Supply and demand in the United States will, I believe, control the United States production, and we shall fit into that general picture.

It is difficult, of course, to foretell in dollars and cents how far exports to the United States will increase. While tariff reductions are the most important element, another factor is the capacity of our fish dealers and merchants and fishermen to take advantage of the reduction; also, conditions in the United States will have a great deal to do in determining the extent of our increased business. There are bound to be increases under these items, and those increases will benefit the individual fishermen, of the kind of whom I have a large number in my constituency, and whom I keep in mind at all times. Up to the present these men have been operating under great difficulties. I hope and believe that these concessions will relieve them of those difficulties and enable them to carry on with a greater profit.

In considering the effects of this treaty it is important to know something of the history of past changes in tariffs with the United States. I intend hurriedly to go over them.

The first major change between Canada and the United States was under the treaty which lasted from 1854 to 1866. We had free entry of fish into the United States, and our exports to that country doubled during that time.

The next phase was under the treaty of Washington. Again we had free entry of fish. In 1872 the value of our exports of fish to the United States was $1,336,000; when the treaty expired in 1885, it was $2,579,000. As a result of the termination of that treaty, and because of lack of the market which had been provided under the previous treaty, in the province of Nova Scotia alone 2,400 men dropped out of the fishing industry.

The next major change was in 1898, when, after the Spanish-American war, Puerto Rico went to the United States and tariffs were raised. As a result of the restriction of markets our fishing industry lost 1,064 men in Nova Scotia alone.

The next major change in tariffs was in 1914, when free entry of fish into the United States was provided for under the Underwood tariff. In the previous year our exports of fish to the United States amounted to $6,914,000; by 1919 they had increased to $18,560,000.

As a result of the Fordney-McCumber tariff of 1921 business again dropped. Our sales of fish decreased from $18,560,000 in 1920 to $16,750,000 in 1929, and 2,700 Nova Scotians had to leave the industry.

As a consequence of the prohibitive 1930 tariff there was again a fall in our exports to the United States, from $16,750,000 in 1929 to $11,430,000 in 1931. Because of these two tariffs, the Fordney-McCumber and Hawley-Smoot tariffs, in the port of Yarmouth alone a fleet of more than twenty vessels was wiped out. It was impossible for our fishermen successfully to prosecute the industry under those conditions. Generally speaking, over this period of years the up or down movement of the United States tariff has meant the decrease or increase of our exports to that country.

So far as I can see, in the maritimes this treaty has been well received, not only by Liberals but by every sincere and well meaning Conservative, by all the better thinking people, by those who have at heart the real interests of the fishing industry. Criticism comes only from three selfish groups—I think that is a fair way to describe them. They are types which can be put into one or other of these pigeonholes. The first type of individual is he who is dealing in only one kind of fish. At the outset I referred to this element in the industry. What he wants is something like Santa Claus something which would enable him to go into every market in the world free of duty and sell fish without competition from other countries. All you will hear from that sort of person is criticism of just one detail, and from a selfish standpoint.

The second kind of critics is composed of a very few fish merchants who are anxious to get cheap fish from the fishermen. There are really very few of these among the merchants carrying on a sort of whispering campaign against this treaty. They are against the treaty because they want to continue to buy cheap fish; they are afraid that, with this added market, the fisherman will command a better price and will make them pay more for his fish.

The third sort of person from whom you hear criticism is the one who, because of political malice, has lost all sense of sincerity. He is afraid that the Liberal party has negotiated an agreement which the fisherman is going to favour. We recognize that type of critic as a subtle person, outwardly concerned for the fishermen but inwardly hopeful that the treaty will bring no benefit to the men of the maritime provinces. He is the fellow who in 1935 attacked the then treaty because it did not provide enough reductions. But now you will hear him say, "We have reductions, but they are of no value." Reductions were good in 1935, but they are no good at the present time. I think I should tell the house that in the maritime provinces we designate that sort of person as just a political humbug.

There are only these three classes criticizing the treaty from the point of view of the fisherman. First, there is the individual who is dealing in one detail of the industry; then there is the fish merchant who wants to buy cheap fish; and the third is the man whose political sense has got the better of his judgment and who is against the treaty. I say I call that third class political humbugs.

While in this critical mood, perhaps I should deal briefly with the remarks of the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) a few days ago. I take them in order. Let us take the first one. He said, as reported at page 1291 of Hansard:

> I quoted certain Nova Scotia periodicals and the statements of gentlemen who are interested in the fishing industry in that province. They were almost unanimous in the view that the present treaty was of practically no benefit to the fishermen.

Criticism from that class is the criticism of one who is interested in one detail of the industry, and therefore what he says cannot be regarded as qualifying him to pass judgment on behalf of the industry as a whole. I should say that he was quoting from a newspaper which, as is well known in Nova Scotia and in the maritime provinces, is "agin the government," to put it mildly. That newspaper is the Halifax Herald.

Mr. BROOKS: It is very much in favour of the fishermen.

Mr. POTTIER: If the hon. gentleman will listen to my speech, he will learn more about the fisheries than he knew the other day. The next statement the hon. member made was this:

> The experience of the fishing industry has been that up to the present time there is no improvement, either in markets or in prices.

I take that to mean that we have shipped no more fish. Let me refer the house to what the hon. gentleman said later on as reported at page 1292. On page 1291 he says that there is no increase in markets, there are no improvements; and on page 1404 he makes the statement that the market has been crowded with Nova Scotia fish since the treaty took effect. I wonder which statement the hon. member wishes to have us believe—what he says on page 1291 or what he says on page 1292.

Mr. BROOKS: The hon. member is referring to a dispatch from a Boston paper which I was quoting. They are not my own words.

Mr. POTTIER: All I have to say to that is that if the hon. member did not think that what he quoted was right, he should not have quoted it. The two statements contradict each other. I will tell you why that condition is brought about. These three groups, this order of destructionists, are so few that they cannot meet together and arrive at the same argument. The result is that you will hear one argument in one place to a certain effect and another argument somewhere else, the exact opposite, and the contradiction between what is said on page 1291 and what we find on page 1292 is clear evidence of that fact. Next, he says that:

. . . the holders were not anxious to sell, and the United States buyers were not in a hurry to buy, each expecting to derive some benefit from the treaty. Time has proven that the American buyers won out. . . .

The treaty has been in force only since the first of January, 1939, and my hon. friend apparently wants the house to gauge it by the activities of what, in common parlance, I would call a group of United States gamblers as against a group of Canadian gamblers on the effects of the treaty. The fact is that we have had twice the amount of fish shipped in the month of January that we had in an average month last year in fillets; and yet it is a poor way of judging the treaty to take one month's performance in relation to the activities of two groups competing one against the other. The hon. member says further:

I understand that during the past month large quantities of salt and smoked fish have been returned to Canada as unfit for sale.

I wondered when my hon. friend spoke whether he was arguing that the fact that tariff items had been reduced had had some deteriorating effect on the fish, or whether the fish were being infected by some disease in consequence of the reduction, or whether he was arguing in favour of shipping rotten fish to the United States.

[Mr. Pottier.]

Mr. BROOKS: I was arguing that the Boston merchants did not wish to accept the fish—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may ask a question, but he must not interrupt the hon. member who is speaking.

Mr. BROOKS: He has no right to misinterpret my remarks.

Mr. POTTIER: I have quoted the hon. gentleman correctly, and I was placing upon his statements the constructions to which they seemed to me to be open.

Mr. BROOKS: I object not to the quotation but to the interpretation.

Mr. POTTIER: He says further:

Fresh fish, such as halibut and swordfish, are usually consigned to a commission merchant in Boston with the understanding that they will be sold at market prices which the shipper receives, less freight, duty, entry and commission. . . . My opinion is that the shipper will derive very little, if any, benefit from the treaty, and just at the present time it looks as if he might suffer a heavy loss.

The only way in which that can be interpreted, it seems to me, is that the higher the duty the more the return to the shipper. In other words, if you reduce the duty the shipper gets less money. But that is absurd and ridiculous, because if you ship articles to a foreign country the less the duty taken off the greater the return. Then he says:

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that if fifteen years ago there had been some such tariff reduction as is being made in this treaty, before the United States had spent millions of dollars on trawlers and other fishing equipment, the treaty might have been of more benefit to the fishermen of the maritime provinces.

I disagree that United States equipment is such that we cannot compete and ship fish to that country. However, in one sense I was pleased when the hon. member made this remark. In 1911 we heard the absolute opposite, that tariff reductions were injurious, and the hon. member's party carried the country on that cry. Now he says that fifteen years ago tariff reductions would have been good—of course, they are not good now. In other words, hon. members are coming gradually to the realization that the Liberals were right in 1911 when they were in favour of reduced duties, in respect of this industry in particular.

With regard to what the hon. member says, that fifteen years ago these reductions would have been good, I would remind him that his party had it in their power from 1916 to 1920 to bring about free entry of fish into the United States. If they had taken advantage of the opportunities they had in negotiations in that period, we would have had free fish fifteen years ago. The United States, under the Underwood tariff, had given us free fish. They made representations asking our government to allow United States vessels to enter our ports. The Canadian government of that day, I submit quite negligently, lost this opportunity of concluding a treaty with the United States that would have given us free entry for our fish for fifteen years and another two years thereafter if notice of termination had been given. I should like to refer to the report of the conference between Canada and the United States, dated September 6, 1918, and dealing with fishery items. After referring to a number of matters this unanimous report was made:

> In the light of these facts your commissioners feel constrained to recommend that the Canadian duty on fresh and frozen fish not including shell fish be removed and with a view to assuring stability in the industry that the two countries enter into an agreement by which such fish will be admitted customs duty free from either country into the other, and that such arrangement remain in force for fifteen years, and thereafter until two years after the date when either party thereto shall give notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same.

I have gone into this matter very carefully, and I think if the government of that day had felt towards the fishermen as the present government feels, we would have had a fifteen-year treaty between the two countries providing for the free entry of fish, and the wishes of my hon. friend, who said that fifteen years ago tariff reductions would have been good, would have been fulfilled. When I think of the pressure that was exerted by the present government on behalf of the fishermen in the negotiation of this treaty, and compare it with the lack of interest and understanding shown by the government of 1916-20, I can see what is going to happen to this treaty when the testing time comes. The fishermen of the maritime provinces will see prominently displayed on the banner of hon. gentlemen opposite the slogan "No truck or trade with the Yankees." They realize that the Conservative party is not in favour of the reductions in tariff that have been made.

I disagree with my hon. friend when he says, as his last point, that no benefits will be derived by the individual fishermen. I think we are going to have an increase in production and also, we believe, increased revenues, so that in my opinion the fishermen will benefit from this treaty in very large measure. As an illustration I mentioned that our exports to the United States amounted to $7,000,000, half of which is dutiable and the other half free. If under this treaty we can increase the $3,500,000 that is dutiable to thrice that amount or more, it will mean that the value of our production will be increased from $14,500,000 to $20,500,000, which in turn will mean one-third more revenue to the industry as a whole. When it is remembered that this will entail practically no increase in capital cost to the fishermen, it will be seen that this will be of great benefit to them.

For a number of years past I have realized the seriousness of the situation in which our fishermen found themselves. In 1937 I stated that unless something was done we would have on the shores of the maritime provinces deserted villages with gaping cellars as monuments of bygone days. I still think that was true. I have followed the gradual trend of the satisfied and self-contained community of former days to the village or district inhabited by poor, discouraged and rather hopeless individuals who had lost every sense of security and all hope for the future. In some instances there has been an improvement since the dark days of 1933. Those conditions were brought about largely by tariff walls put up by foreign countries against the products of our fishermen. I think this treaty will help. There can be no doubt that it will bring benefits to the fishermen which otherwise they would be unable to obtain. I believe that when considering the fishing industry as it exists in Canada and the United States, divisions should be forgotten. I believe each country thereby will enjoy greater prosperity; it will mean better understanding, and trade in both directions will—

> Form in heaven's light
> One arch of peace.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, when this treaty was announced some months ago I gave expression to the view that any measure that would improve economic conditions as between Canada and the United States, or that would assist in improving the relationship existing between the United States and Great Britain, would be a worth-while effort and a good move. But I qualified that by saying that it would all depend on the terms of the treaty and the basis upon which it was negotiated and consummated. It is my intention this afternoon to approach this question, I hope without too much prejudice but with a view to analysing within the brief time at my disposal the background not only of the treaty but also of the relationship existing between Canada and the United States. By "background" of course I mean economically.

Fortunately the national and social background is all that one could desire, and of it we are all exceedingly proud. It is the economic background with which I desire to deal, having regard to the possible effect of this treaty upon Canada's trade policy as a whole.

Reference has been made, particularly by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) as well as by many other hon. members, to what has been termed the prevalence of economic nationalism in the world to-day, and that has been deplored. I am not going to enter upon any very extensive discussion as to whether that is good or bad, but it has been introduced and referred to repeatedly during the debate on this treaty. Furthermore, and this is why I mentioned the first point, it also has been stated that the agreements entered into at the economic conference of 1932 contributed to or aggravated the trend to economic nationalism.

With that contention I take distinct issue, and I propose to deal with it somewhat briefly. Before doing so, however, it seems to me there is a contradiction in the attitude of many hon. members who have spoken in support of the treaty. On the one hand it is argued that Canada was justified in giving concessions—and the word "sacrifices" has been used—because that contributed to the improved relationship between the United States and the United Kingdom. That is one presentation. On the other hand it is argued that Canada is realizing very marked benefits from this treaty. It must be obvious, Mr. Speaker, that you cannot take both positions. On the one hand if we are going to claim that we have been broad-minded and generous and have made sacrifices in the interests of this international amity about which we hear so much, certainly on the other hand we cannot claim that we have obtained some rich benefits out of the thing for which we sacrificed ourselves. So obviously there is considerable inconsistency in the attitude of those who support the treaty.

Now let me deal briefly with this argument that the imperial economic agreements of 1932 contributed to the extension of economic nationalism. I do not think Canada or Great Britain can be blamed in any sense whatever for economic nationalism. For no country did more, or attempted to do more to promote international amity and goodwill in the world during the last fifteen or twenty years, since the war, than did Great Britain. And certainly Canada has not done anything towards the promotion of economic nationalism in the world. Let it be remembered that Great Britain risked everything. She risked her national existence in the interests of peace and disarmament. Year after year, and year after year, the British parliament went on participating in disarmament agreements, scrapping warships and other warlike material to the value of hundreds of millions of pounds, in the hope that the rest of the world would join in on a general policy of disarmament. And, sir, to say that Great Britain and Canada and the other dominions of the empire which joined in the Ottawa conference are responsible in any way or in any degree for economic nationalism, is a blight upon the honour, the goodwill and the good faith of Great Britain and the dominions of the British empire.

What are the facts? The facts are that following the great war—and I want to emphasize this—all down through those years, around 1923 and 1924, country after country introduced entirely new methods of international trade, forced upon them by internal conditions. Remember: I am not criticizing those countries for what they did. They did it in self defence, and out of a sense of self preservation. Those European countries—Italy, France, Germany, Austria, Poland, Roumania, Bulgaria, Greece, and other countries particularly of Europe, as well as elsewhere—learned during the war very severe lessons as to being unprepared economically to face conditions which in fact did arise out of the last war and might arise out of a second war.

And so country after country, based upon fear and experience, introduced new methods to cope with their internal difficulties. For instance, the record was placed upon Hansard by me several years ago with respect to Italy. Italy, one of our prominent customers, in 1923 put inhibitions and quotas upon a whole list of articles, and thereby seriously affected our trade with that country—a trade which used to be extensive. That trade has now fallen down to small figures. The decrease began in 1923; it was not after the intra-imperial agreements, at all.

We know what Russia has done; we know what Germany did. Germany, of course, was forced to it not only by economic conditions of the country but also by international exchange. The same is true of other countries; there has been difficulty in connection with getting external exchange to meet their obligations abroad. These are the factors which have forced such countries as Italy, Germany, Russia, the Netherlands and other central European countries to which I have referred to adopt extreme measures in dealing with their foreign trade policy. And it was the introduction of these quotas, internal taxes, prohibitions, and various strange devices, plus the necessity for exchange or, I should say, the collapse of international exchange—it was all that, based upon stark fear, that was the cause of the dislocation of external trade. And it was not, I would ask the house to remember, until more than ten years after the war that the Ottawa agreements were made. Therefore to say that those agreements made at Ottawa had anything to do with the promotion of world nationalism is a statement, I believe, without foundation.

It has been asked, and particularly by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. McKenzie)—to use his words—"What is the use of debating this treaty?" "Why should we waste the time of the house debating the treaty? It is in force, and you can do nothing about it." That is perfectly true; the treaty is in force, and nothing we can do will change it; I am satisfied of that. But, to say that that is a reason why we should be silent and not discuss this all important matter is of course ridiculous. It would be a negation of parliamentary duties and responsibilities.

I make no apologies for discussing the treaty. I believe it ought to be discussed as dispassionately and as intelligently as we can. We ought to consider the various parts of it, and we ought to discuss the major policy involved.

I want to say that in my opinion the treaty is going to have very definite and serious effects upon our external trade policy generally. Time alone will tell whether by and large, on balance, it will be beneficial or adverse. But there is no question that hon. members on either side of the house have a perfect right to express their views in the matter. That it will affect our trade with the British empire and with thirty-eight other countries, very definitely and very directly, cannot be questioned. I say that because the treaty deals with the most favoured nation proposal, or policy, which affects the trade of thirty-eight different countries to which I shall refer in a minute.

I propose to discuss the treaty from two main aspects, first as to its effect from the most favoured nation clause, and also from the financial standpoint. Perhaps before saying anything more with respect to most favoured nation treatment I might read the definition given by authorities in the customs branch. The definition of "most favoured nations" as it appears in the schedule to the customs tariff is as follows:

> In addition to enjoying the benefits of the intermediate tariff, the products of countries entitled to most favoured nation treatment shall not be subjected to higher duties or charges than those paid on like articles the produce or manufacture of any foreign countries.

That is a clear, succinct definition of what we mean when we refer to most favoured nation treatment. Probably at this time I might run over the names of the thirty-eight countries receiving most favoured nation treatment, so that hon. members will be apprised of the extent of this particular policy. They are:

Argentine Republic
Belgium (Colonies and possessions)
Bolivia
Colombia
Costa Rica
Curacao
Czechoslovakia
Denmark
Esthonia
Finland
France (Colonies and possessions)
Guam
Guatemala
Hawaii
Hayti
Hungary
Italy
Japan
Latvia
Lithuania
Luxembourg
Netherlands (Netherlands Indies, Curacao and Surinam)
Norway
Panama
Philippine Islands
Poland
Porto Rico
Portugal
Roumania
Samoa (American)
Serb (Croat and Slovene Kingdom)
Spain
Surinam
Sweden
Switzerland
United States of America
Venezuela
Virgin Islands.

These are the countries to which the most favoured nation clause in Canada's tariff applies. In other words every one of those nations will receive the full benefits of all the special deductions made in the treaty. What I am asking myself is this—and I know it is a very serious question: Did the government take care to understand and apprise themselves of the full effect of the reductions upon their trade with these other countries? It may be argued that at the present time our foreign trade is favourable to Canada. That is true. And it may therefore be argued that if we do extend the same advantages to these countries no one could complain. But there is this feature to consider: In a world which is trading to-day under bilateral agreements, in a world where nearly every country with which we deal uses quotas, inhibitions and prohibitions of one kind or another, for Canada to, shall I say, disarm itself entirely by voluntarily giving those countries access to this territory on the full list included in this and other treaties, without receiving back from those countries one single concession—I say for us to put ourselves in that position is in my opinion a decided and definite weakness.

Let me repeat. Other countries are basing their external trade largely upon bilateral agreements, that is, agreements by which one country gives a concession for a like concession on the part of the other. We, on the other hand, have made this treaty with the United States, and every last benefit in it will be given to these other thirty-eight countries, with not a single concession being granted to us in return. Not only that, but we have no concession to offer to them. If to-morrow we try to make a trade treaty with Italy, Germany or any one of the countries the names of which I have read, and ask for some concession, that country will reply, "What have you to offer?" They will tell us that they already have the full advantage of our intermediate tariff, that they already have the full advantage of all we have given the United States, France and all these other countries. I submit that we have tied our hands so that we can have no expectation of working out bilateral agreements.

Some years ago when I was still Minister of Trade and Commerce I had in mind the abandonment of the most favoured nation policy in connection with Canadian trade. Our trade is largely with the British empire and the United States, the balance being comparatively small although not unimportant.

Mr. DUNNING: About twenty per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: For us to give away all our trading advantages, to release the others from the necessity of making concessions to us, seems to me to be an exceedingly questionable policy. I have in my hand a publication issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce and dated 1938, and I ask hon. members to listen to some excerpts which I shall read. They have heard me read the list of countries which have the most favoured nation advantage. This is what this publication has to say regarding most favoured nation agreements:

> The benefit to Canadian exports of most-favoured-nation treatment in any country depends on the customs and treaty system of the particular importing country concerned.

This is the present government speaking through its own publication. Of the countries I have mentioned, eleven have a single tariff which is open to all countries. In other words, we get no advantage over any other country. With minor exceptions, Argentina applies her tariff equally to imports from all countries. Belgium has a minimum tariff which in practice is applied equally to imports from all countries. The customs duties of Bolivia are applied equally to imports from all countries. Denmark has a single tariff schedule, and the general tariff of Italy is applicable to imports from all countries. The Netherlands has a single tariff schedule without tariff preference to any country. Norway has a single tariff schedule, and the duties of Panama apply equally to imports from all countries. Sweden has commercial treaties with various countries and has granted conventional rates of duties which, however, have been incorporated into her ordinary tariff and made applicable to all countries. Switzerland operates under a single column tariff which applies to all countries, and no preferences exist under the tariff of Venezuela. This policy by these countries of attempting to give parity to all countries makes the binding of the most favoured nation clause meaningless. My submission is that we could well afford to consider again the advisability of casting aside the most favoured nation policy as far as Canada is concerned.

I dislike quoting, but for the purpose of the record I think I should read what the United States press release had to say as to the effects of the most favoured nation feature of this treaty upon the trade of Canada. I quote:

> The actual effect, therefore, was an enduring reduction in rates on a large volume of trade. The concession by Canada of most-favoured-nation treatment meant much more than the mere removal of the differentials which formerly existed against American goods as compared with the goods of most other non-British countries. A much greater gain lay in the fact that the lower rates resulting from that provision improved the position of American producers in competition with Canadian producers of the same commodities.

That is the point in this treaty that appeals to the United States government. Then they go on to say:

> There are still hundreds of items in the Canadian tariff with respect to which the United States benefits directly by the most-favoured-nation provision—items on which the rates now being paid are lower than before 1936 solely by virtue of this provision. The imports of this group from the United States in 1937 amounted to $79,000,000.

They refer there to the hundreds of items which are in addition to those specified in the schedule to the treaty. In other words, over and above all the schedules, the United States has, by virtue of the inclusion of the most favoured nation clause in this treaty, an advantage in trade which in 1937 amounted to $79,000,000.

I should like to refer briefly to the question of dumping, because the dumping provision has a part in this whole set-up. We have in our tariff law a section which was placed there by a distinguished minister of the Laurier government, the late Right Hon. W. S. Fielding, who is recognized as having been one of the outstanding finance ministers of Canada. He was a man whom I knew well and respected most highly. He introduced into the Canadian tariff a policy which I am sorry to say is scoffed at to-day by the Liberal party. It is not applied energetically by the government, and yet it is one of the soundest provisions in the tariff structure of this country. I refer to section 6 of the customs tariff, known as the dumping clause. What is the history of the dumping clause? I would invite the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) and others who talk so, shall I say recklessly, about the desire of certain industries to have protection, to study the history of this clause and the doctrine which lies behind it. If they did that, I think we would hear much less railing against importers and the policy of protection in Canada. At the risk of being tedious I am going to read this section into the record. I remind the house that I conceive it to be one of the soundest pieces of doctrine ever introduced into the customs laws of this country. Section 6 reads:

> In the case of articles exported to Canada of a class or kind made or produced in Canada, if the export or actual selling price to an importer in Canada is less than the fair market value of the same article when sold for home consumption in the usual and ordinary course in the country whence exported to Canada at the time of its exportation to Canada, or is less than the fair market value or value for duty thereof as determined under the provisions of section thirty-six of the Customs Act—> —or is less than the value for duty thereof as determined by the minister . . . or is less than the fair market value thereof as fixed under the provisions of section forty-three of the Customs Act, there shall, in addition to the duties otherwise established, be levied, collected and paid on such article, on its importation into Canada, a special or dumping duty, equal to the difference between the said selling price of the article for export and the said fair market value thereof or value for duty thereof.

That latter part is later than Mr. Fielding's time.

Now there are goods being imported from the United States at the present time—and from other countries as well, I think, but I have reference particularly to the United States—which are being sold in Canada for less than the fair market value in the United States; and they are entering this country in large quantities. It is a question of administration; it is not a question of Tory protection or any other form of Tory doctrine. These goods are coming in, as they have been for over thirty years, contrary to the laws of Canada, and contrary to the doctrine introduced into the laws of this country by a Liberal finance minister whose authority no Liberal member of this house would question. Yet these goods continue to come in here in definance of the law as it stands, and to the injury of Canadian production.

For example, there is a certain machine in common household use. I am not going to mention it because I do not wish to give particular instances here, for this is not the place. But a certain manufacturer in the United States makes a small number of cheap machines, less than ten per cent of his output, which are advertised for sale at about half the regular price of his general production. They get the advantage of low-price advertising. The aim is to attract interest in his product, and this firm will discharge a salesman if he sells one of these machines, or more than one, in a district in the United States. The salesmen must sell only the higher priced machine there. They can quote on the other, but all sorts of difficulties are put in the way of delivery, and they do not sell the cheap machine in the United States. They are, however, shipped into Canada and sold here in competition with our own products at a loss to the manufacturer in the United States, although they are listed there in an attempt to comply with this law. In my opinion, that is the sort of thing we are going to suffer from when this treaty comes into force because it covers a great many articles of that kind. I have merely cited one case as an illustration.

I should like now to refer briefly to the point I made a moment ago as to the difficulties of doing external trade in these days. I have before me an article written by the Hon. Rupert E. Beckett, and published in the Monetary Times of March 4 last, and I quote it because it is an excellent illustration of the difficulties to which I have referred and which, I warn the house and I warn the government, will, if we are not very careful, arise from this treaty because of its most favoured nation feature:

> In many other countries where British interests were well established, particularly in southeastern Europe and South America, they have been seriously jeopardized by the intrusion of political considerations and influences into the economic sphere. Fair competition British traders can meet, but to-day the destination of business is frequently decided not by competitive efficiency but by political manoeuvres and considerations of national expediency.

That is precisely what I have been referring to here. These other countries, more or less under duress, forced by fear and anxiety, have imposed quotas and other restrictions, new and strange devices rather than deal on a competitive basis. The article continues:

A new, and more subtle, form of trading has come into vogue, in which one country undertakes to absorb another's output of a particular crop or material. A primary producing country naturally finds the prospect of securing an assured market for its products an alluring one, but in practice the interchange has proved to have considerable drawbacks. The dominant partner in the agreement, whilst itself receiving much-needed raw materials, has been able to dump inferior or unwanted goods on the other.

I quote that merely for the purpose of emphasizing the dangers of the most favoured nation feature of this agreement.

I have been speaking, Mr. Speaker, for about half an hour, and I had hoped that I might have some slight influence upon the members of the government, but I notice that neither the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) nor the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has even done me the courtesy of listening.

Mr. DUNNING: We were just discussing one of your points.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the use of wasting the time of the house discussing this or any other measure in the atmosphere that prevails in this chamber and has done so in recent times? In regard to these matters I had some serious and definite views which I was prepared to offer, not in any captious or partisan manner, but simply because I am absolutely convinced that this country must face these issues. Moreover, in 1925 I pointed out to the house that if we pursued the policy we were then pursuing, and are still pursuing, in connection with our trade with the United States, sooner or later we would reach a point where we would be economically shackled and bound to that country—and we have pretty nearly reached that stage.

When this treaty was being negotiated we should have taken up with the government of the United States the whole question of our economic relationship. We should have pointed out to them that we owed the United States, as I can show, in the neighbourhood of four and a half billion dollars, on which interest has to be paid. There are heavy capital investments in Canada which must be returned to the United States in some form and at some time. And yet, Mr. Speaker, we have been frittering away our birthright year after year, and year after year.

The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) a few moments ago quoted figures on external trade.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did he know what they were all about?

Mr. STEVENS: I should not have minded if he did not, but he never quoted them anywhere near correctly. In one instance he was not within one billion dollars of the correct figure. He quoted our export trade figure at $1,900,000,000. I have figures before me now, on the authority of the Bank of Canada statistical summary, and for the very year the hon. member quoted the figure of $1,900,000,000, our exports were actually something over $900,000,000.

I want to call attention to a few figures. In the years from 1926 to 1938 we imported from the United States $6,516,000,000 worth of goods. In the same period we exported to them $4,285,000,000 worth of goods. In other words, there was an adverse balance of trade of some two billions of dollars in those thirteen years. Not only is that the case, but I want to impress on the house this fact, that while we can go on frittering away our patrimony for a long time yet because undoubtedly we have vast resources in this country, sooner or later we shall have to face this situation. I repeat, that in those thirteen years we have had an adverse balance of trade with the United States of $2,200,000,000, in addition to which we have to pay over $200,000,000 a year in interest. We cannot escape that fact.

This situation ought to be reviewed. I do not think it is saying anything unkind of the United States to say this, that they must realize that we are one of their heavy debtors and that we are among the best customers they have. As I said the other day, we are a debtor that is valuable to them, because our debts are in the form of investments which in the main are rendering them handsome returns. We have the right, as one business man talking to another, to say to the United States that the only way by which we can liquidate our position and maintain a liquid condition with the United States is to sell them more goods.

In nearly all the figures quoted in this debate in connection with exports to the United States, gold has been added. In the earlier years gold never was added. In recent years, however, gold is added. I want to say further to the house, and particularly to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), who still is not listening to me—

Mr. DUNNING: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am listening to the hon. member.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is not.

Mr. DUNNING: He cannot misrepresent me in that fashion.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is sitting there in a bored condition, reading a newspaper.

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot help it if the hon. member bores me, but I am listening.

Mr. STEVENS: All right. I am quite satisfied with the minister's attitude. He says I bore him.

Mr. REID: No wonder.

Mr. STEVENS: I am telling him and this government that unless they review this situation with the United States they are going to put this country under a more severe economic strain as the years go by. I can show that in connection with the newsprint industry. I can show it in connection with the gold mining industry.

Mr. DUNNING: If that is true to-day, was it not even more true when my hon. friend was Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. STEVENS: I would not say so.

Mr. DUNNING: And what did he do about it?

Mr. STEVENS: What did I do about it?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: I told my hon. friend a little while ago.

An hon. MEMBER: Formed a new party.

Mr. STEVENS: I told him when I was seeking with sweet reasonableness to gain his attention—which I did not accomplish. I told him at that time that when I was a member of the then government, I recognized the situation and initiated steps to study it.

Mr. DUNNING: "To study the situation!"

Mr. STEVENS: But I left the government, and I have not had any chance to carry out what I found to be necessary. I am not saying that any great condemnation should rest upon those who have been administering this department in years gone by, but I say that the time has arrived when we ought to give consideration to the matter. That is what I am urging; and it is the lack of interest in and the lackadaisical attention of the house to these problems which really annoy me, and annoy me very much.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friends may laugh. I am going to say frankly now to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) —and he is, I believe, the only man in the house who has been here longer than I have— that never before in my experience in parliament have I witnessed such an attempt by the forces of numbers and majority control to howl down fair discussion in this chamber as has been evident this session.

Mr. POWER: The hon. member is complaining that we are not listening to him, not that we are interrupting him.

Mr. STEVENS: No. My hon. friend knows what I am referring to. I am just going to close my remarks—and it is useless to talk— with this, that unless this parliament gets down to more serious consideration of these problems, the institution of parliament is threatened. That is what I have to say.

An hon. MEMBER: Tory propaganda.

Mr. GRAY: Ballyhoo.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend can say "ballyhoo."

Mr. GRAY: That is what the hon. member's leader said.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend the chief whip of the Liberal party has not the right to say very much, because he has not been here very much.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Another lecture.

Mr. STEVENS: I have been looking rather longingly to see him in his seat.

An hon. MEMBER: He has been ill.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not know that. He knows that if I knew he had been ill I would not say anything unkind about him. Nevertheless my hon. friend has not been here and does not know what has been going on. What I said was with no desire to be unkind to my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAY: Well, I have been reading the debates.

Mr. STEVENS: I am just throwing aside, as being utterly useless—which it is—any effort, or, rather, any further effort.

Mr. A. MacG. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I have been very much astonished in the last minute or two at the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens). As a rule he is a good debater; he debates in an excellent way; but the manner in which he closed the debate to-night must leave a bad impression not only upon this house but upon this country.

It is not my intention to analyse in detail the trade agreement which is at present the subject of discussion before this house. Last year I was unfortunately absent from the house when the budget was presented and debated. I was, however, able to express privately my views to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and other members of the government and, frankly, the budget of last year was disappointing to me. I believe also it was disappointing to the government itself. The government had hoped before parliament prorogued last year to be in a position to present the trade agreement, but owing to prolonged negotiations, over much of which there was no control in Canada, the date when the trade agreement was finally consummated was subsequent to prorogation. Because I was disappointed, and perhaps even somewhat critical with respect to the budget, I feel it all the more incumbent upon me now to express my views in connection with this trade agreement. I realized last year, and so stated, that it might be unwise, indeed probably would be unwise, to make some slight alterations in the tariff while at that time negotiations were under way regarding this trade agreement.

I am in complete accord with bilateral trade agreements, but as a Liberal I cannot accept the view that it is only in that way that tariff changes should be effected. If at any time it is in the interests of this country to reduce the tariff on any article entering Canada, that tariff should be reduced, whether or not there is any so-called concession given by another country. Last year the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) referred to unilateral changes in the tariff, and considered them unwise, at least at that time. While I am in perfect sympathy with bilateral agreements, I must insist that at all times when downward revisions of the tariff can be made in the interests of this country, they should be made, irrespective of any concessions received from any other country.

As a member of the Liberal party I am indeed proud of the achievement of our government in concluding what is perhaps the most extensive and favourable trade agreement which has been made by Canada during this century, indeed perhaps since confederation. I should like to congratulate the Prime Minister upon his able presentation to this house in connection with this trade agreement. I have also listened to or read other excellent contributions to the debate, but I should like to make special mention of the address delivered by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley). He made a clear, concise and convincing review of the benefits which will accrue to Canada under this agreement.

This debate reveals clearly the different points of view between the parties represented in this house. Members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, both in the house and outside it, have from time to time been proclaiming that there is really no difference between the policy of the Liberal party and the policy of the Conservative party, that they are really so much alike that they might be regarded as having a distinction without any difference. No doubt those hon. members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party were making those speeches for political effect. They tried to make the people of the country believe that, after all is said and done, these two great old parties have drifted together so closely that they are now really as one, and that now the party really opposing them is the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party.

Well, let us look at the situation as we have it before us in the house at the present time. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) and his party not only have been extremely critical of the agreement as a whole, but have picked out individual items here and there stating that they would adversely affect their part of the country, and inferentially endeavouring to lead the house and the country to conclude that the trade agreement as a whole is not in the interests of this country.

What is the history of the parties with respect to trade agreements? The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) went back nearly half a century in an endeavour to show that certain persons in the United States held views which, in his judgment, were inimical to that republic having closer trade relationships with Canada. He also quoted certain unfortunate remarks of United States statesmen in connection with the reciprocal trade agreement arranged by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding. It is true that certain men in the United States did use certain unfortunate phrases, such as, "Canada is at the parting of the ways," and others, referring to the possibility of annexation.

Mr. MANION: What is the hon. gentleman reading from?

Mr. YOUNG: It is not from your book, anyhow, my hon. friend.

Mr. MANION: But the hon. gentleman is reading it. What is it?

Mr. YOUNG: I have some notes here.

Mr. MANION: Notes! You have a whole essay.

Mr. YOUNG: No doubt these extravagant and unwarranted statements were used in the United States to help secure support from the Tories in the United States, and the same statements were fanned into a burning flame of partiotism by the Tories in Canada to prevent the passage of the reciprocal pact in 1911. The Tories have always had a great faculty of waving the flag to prevent Liberal governments from taking away some of the special privileges from the few in an endeavour to deal in a fair and just way with the masses of the people and with the consumers of Canada.

Let us look at the negotiations which took place between Canada and the United States in connection with consummating a trade agreement when the Conservative party was in power under the leadership of the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett. How far did they progress? Just to the point where it would be advantageous for political purposes. The public did not have, could not have, any knowledge, of what the proposed agreement was; it could be used in various parts of the country for political effect, and Conservative speakers would draw on their imagination as to the content of the agreement, according to the feeling of the people in the locality where such speeches were made.

But what is the important point? The agreement was not consummated by the Conservative party. Within a very few weeks after the Liberal party came into power in 1935, a reciprocal trade agreement was consummated. During the discussion of that trade agreement in this house it became abundantly clear that the Conservative party was not at any time really in favour of a trade agreement, and that was why it had not been signed the previous year.

What is the attitude to-day of the leader of the opposition? Is he for this trade agreement? Not only he, but every hon. member of this house, will be called upon to say whether he is for or against this trade agreement, and I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that at the conclusion of this debate, when the vote is taken, the people of this country will know in more certain fashion than ever before just where the parties of this country really stand on fiscal policy. Members of the Tory party have been saying in the house, and particularly outside the house in different sections of the country where they believe it would be more beneficial to them, that they were in favour of trade agreements, that they were in favour of wider trading with other countries. If that be true, they will have an opportunity in this house within the next day or two, perhaps within the next few hours, to demonstrate to the Canadian people that they really believe in a greater opportunity for the interchange of goods with other countries. The leader of the opposition said as to this agreement, that only time could tell whether it is good or whether it is not. I ask him, and I ask every member of his party, this question: Are they prepared to give this trade agreement such an opportunity, so that time will tell? If they vote against this agreement, and if by any chance their vote should prevent it from becoming law, my question is, how will time tell? If they succeed in voting down this resolution—

Mr. MANION: With thirty-eight against one hundred and eighty.

Mr. YOUNG: —then time will have lost its opportunity to tell whether the trade agreement be good or bad; time will never have a chance, and I say to hon. members opposite that unless they are prepared to give this treaty an opportunity, they are placing themselves definitely, absolutely and irrevocably on record as being opposed to freer interchange of goods or a greater opportunity for international trade.

Mr. MANION: Your party voted solidly, except for the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) against the empire trade agreements.

Mr. YOUNG: I have looked over this trade agreement and I find there benefits for farmers, benefits for lumber men, benefits for fishermen, benefits for various classes, but I find further that there are benefits for every Canadian consumer, which means benefits for every man, woman and child in this country. The Liberal party promised the people of Canada that tariffs would be reduced to the level of the Dunning budget. I am happy to say that a close study of this agreement reveals that on practically everything the duty has been reduced to the level of the Dunning budget of 1930, and, in many instances, has gone much beyond that point.

Take, for example, farm machinery. Under the Dunning budget there were certain items at six per cent, others at 7½ per cent, and still others at ten per cent. Under this agreement the tariff on all farm machinery has been reduced to 7½ per cent. There have been some who have already said, "Yes, duties have been reduced, but when they were reduced the prices of farm machinery were not reduced, they were increased." I regret to say that prices were somewhat higher. Recently these prices have been reduced to a certain extent. After the extensive investigation which a committee of this house made with respect to the farm implement industry of Canada, and the corresponding investigation made by a similar committee of the congress of the United States, it was clearly disclosed that no manufacturer of farm implements prepared his price list until the largest manufacturing company in both countries had brought down its price lists. In Canada there is every appearance that there is, if not a definite combination in restraint of trade, at least a complete understanding that prices shall not be reduced below an agreed level.

I should like to say now to the government and to this house that this is a matter which in the immediate future should receive the most careful scrutiny, and if the evidence warrants it, prosecution should be undertaken against any firms who in an unlawful combination act together to maintain unwarranted prices for farm machinery, or for any other goods.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was discussing the attitude of the various parties towards the trade agreement. I sometimes listen with interest to the speeches of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). Sometimes he makes a good speech; sometimes he talks like a Liberal, and I ask myself why he is sitting in that corner. As I have said already, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation speakers refer to the two old parties as being alike, that they are on the same road, which I might call the road of trade. It is important that we examine carefully whether or not this is true. It may be that these parties are on the same road, but let us look more closely. A couple of years ago, with my wife, I took an extended automobile trip through the United States. We travelled over wonderful roads, extremely well marked. If you followed the road bearing your particular number you might arrive at your destination, but there was one thing which that number did not give, and that was the direction. If you neglected that and went the wrong way you would end up at a point opposite to that of choice. The Liberals and Conservatives may be on the same road, but they are going in opposite directions. That is the difference which the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation speakers do not point out. The direction the Conservative party has always followed leads to the building up of impediments to international trade, to the blocking of international trade, while the Liberals have always gone in the opposite direction, that of the lowering or the removal of impediments to international trade.

Where do the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation members stand? Do they favour the Tory or the Liberal direction? My only objection, if I have one, to the course pursued by the Liberal party concerns neither the road nor the direction, but rather the speed with which they travel. I should like to get into high gear and go faster. It may be that no party is willing to travel at the rate at which I am prepared to go. If my Cooperative Commonwealth Federation friends were really anxious to see the Liberals go a bit faster, would it not be better for them to join the Liberal party and assist those of us who are trying to get as far as possible in the right direction with the least delay? The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation members come from western Canada, and all they have succeeded in doing is dividing western influence and delaying progress. Heaven forbid that I should raise an east-west issue. I do not believe in that. I believe in a united Canada. At the same time there is such a thing as a balanced policy, the best policy having regard to Canada as a whole, and western opinion should not be divided in its influence. In my judgment this division of opinion has been a great detriment to western Canada. In a democracy such as ours I do not believe it is in the public interest that there should be more than two parties in this country, and the public is beginning to share that view if one is to judge from the small number of Cooperative Commonwealth Federation members returned at the last election.

I am happy to support this extensive trade agreement. It is not only on the right road, facing the right direction; it has gone a long distance in that direction, and I congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his government upon the success of their efforts. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar says he will support this agreement, and other Cooperative Commonwealth Federation members have said the same thing. I ask this question: What part did they have in urging forward and assisting with the agreement? They have done nothing; in fact, both within and without this house Co-operative Commonwealth Federation members have rather belittled the idea that there was much advantage in extending international trade. They have advanced the notion that the thing to do is to socialize the whole state. Why will my hon. friend from Rosetown-Biggar support this agreement? He does not dare oppose it, or whatever chance he may have of reelection to this house would be entirely removed; he would not have the ghost of a chance for reelection. He did nothing to assist in bringing about this agreement, yet I suppose he will go back to his constituency and tell how he helped his people.

I should now like to say just a word to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley). Where does he stand on this question? I put that squarely to him, although I see he is not in his seat. Do the people of the constituency of Qu'Appelle believe in a better opportunity to exchange the goods which they do not require for the goods of other countries? I venture the opinion that there is not one person in his constituency who does not approve this agreement taken as a whole. The people of Qu'Appelle, together with the people of this whole country, will watch this vote more keenly than they have watched any other vote ever taken in this house. Now that we have a chance to advance the interests of our country—for this agreement is in the interests of the whole of Canada—let us do our duty as citizens and not think in terms of party. I say this to my Tory friends, who deep down in their hearts know that this agreement is in Canada's interests. It is also true that it is in the interests of the other party to the agreement, the United States; and any agreement, if it is to be counted good, must be mutually beneficial.

I commend the government also for the part they played in assisting in the negotiations between the United States and the United Kingdom. I desire to emphasize especially that part of the Prime Minister's address in this house in which he made it clear that Canada was willing to negotiate agreements not only with the United States and members of the British commonwealth but with all countries willing to trade with us on a fair and equitable basis. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) rather poked fun at the reference by the Prime Minister to the effect of such agreements on the peace of the world, and amused himself by referring to the peaceful boundary line between us and our great and friendly neighbour. He knew the Prime Minister was not thinking about any disturbance between these two countries but was referring to Great Britain, the United States and Canada pointing the way to international goodwill by means of greater international trade, and holding this out as a beacon light for the whole world to follow. If the example of these nations who have concluded these agreements were followed by the whole world, it would lead to international goodwill, to the cessation of the suicidal race to rearm, and to the removal of the causes which lead to war. It was this wider sphere to which the Prime Minister referred. It is interesting to note British public opinion in connection with the trade agreement. I quote from the London Spectator of November 25, 1938:

> In the simple but significant ceremony that attended the signature of the Anglo-American trade treaty at Washington last week the just comment was supplied, very fitly, by the Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. Mackenzie King, when he said that "it must be increasingly apparent that the stability of the civilization which we cherish depends more than ever on the friendly association of the English-speaking nations of the old world and the new."
> That assertion deserves study in some detail, for it states an important truth with singular accuracy. The English-speaking nations . . . are to-day in a special sense the trustees of the only kind of civilization their own citizens, and those of many lesser states, think worth maintaining. That is not merely apparent, but increasingly apparent, for war not merely on common human freedom but on the elemental rights of the individual is being waged over ever-widening tracts of the globe with a savagery incompatible with the survival of any liberal civilization at all.
> That tragedy has had one compensation. It has driven the custodians of this freedom into closer association in common sympathy for common protection.

Then it goes on to say:

> But mutual good will alone will not make the relations between two friendly nations what they need to be "under the strenuous conditions of the modern world," and it is the merit of British and American statesmanship—the credit is due to Mr. Cordell Hull more than any other single man—that it has set itself quietly and patiently to remove obstacles to full co-operation between the two countries and negotiate agreements which, without assuming any formal political significance, shall advertise to their own citizens and to the world their resolve to substitute practical cooperation resolutely and increasingly for economic or any other form of conflict. The fundamental value of the Anglo-American trade agreement lies as much in the sacrifices each country was ready to make as in the advantages it secured for its own traders—for till it is realized that every such negotiation must be based on the simple principle of give and take the attempt of each side to concentrate on taking must spell inevitable disaster. Hardly less important were the concurrent negotiations between the United States and Canada and the treaty signed by the union and the dominion simultaneously with the major Anglo-American agreement. That, and the fact that other British dominions like Australia had to be brought into the discussions because concessions made to America might affect their own trade with Britain, opens up suggestive possibilities.

Then the editorial goes on to speak of the Ottawa agreements of 1932, and it has this to say:

It to some extent decreased the trade and to a considerable extent increased the suspicions and antagonisms of states outside the empire, particularly the United States and Germany. Since then, and to some extent in consequence, Germany has developed a closed economy based on trade by barter, which makes the prospect of any beneficial commercial agreement with her remote. But that fact, unfortunate in itself, has had some favourable reactions, in producing the recognition among states which still prefer free interchange of the need for increasing trade among themselves. The Anglo-American agreement has gone far to meet that need, for through the operation of the most favoured nation clause it means that the tariffs of both countries are lowered not merely in relation to one another, but to all countries with which they have signed most favoured nation treaties.

It goes on to say:

In what form and by what methods the Ottawa circle can be widened, with economic consequences that would produce political results no less valuable than the economic, are matters for further thought. But Mr. Hull, Mr. Mackenzie King and Mr. Stanley have performed a service of no small value in turning the minds of all reflective men in that direction.

A quotation from the Economist—and this is worthy of note—dated November 19, 1938, speaking about the trade agreement in a laudatory way, says:

All those on either side who have worked for this agreement have the right to congratulate themselves on its successful birth. And, if bouquets are being distributed, one of the largest must be reserved for Mr. Mackenzie King. Even the briefest study of the terms of the agreement is enough to show how little could have been done without the readiness of Canada to offer her generous co-operation.

It is recognized by members of the government, by the Liberal party, yes, and by the citizens of Canada, that the central and directing figure in all these negotiations was the Prime Minister of Canada. Time will tell, and history will record this as one of the finest achievements in Canada's history, and a lasting tribute to the genius of our Prime Minister.

When British empire countries were arranging trade agreements, and having especially in mind the fact that the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett insisted on Great Britain changing her fiscal policy to one of protection, when he insisted that preferences be granted to countries of the British commonwealth by raising duties against other countries, rather than by lowering tariff barriers and other impediments to trade between empire countries, I was somewhat anxious as to the effects this would have on other nations. I still ask, what was its effect? I quoted British opinion as to its effect. In these trade agreements between Canada and the United States, and the United States and the United Kingdom, the British empire has shown its desire to trade more freely, not only with the United States, but, under the most favoured nation clause, with other countries as well; and, as I said, the Prime Minister has made it abundantly clear in his statement to the house during this debate that Canada desires to trade with all countries willing to trade with us on a fair basis. When all countries are prepared to adopt this attitude, and put it into practice, we may hope for international goodwill, and the removal of the fear of war.

Mr. Speaker, I think we have heard enough in the house during this debate to know that between parties there is a vital difference. Within a very short time we shall have an opportunity of having every party in the house record its vote as to where it stands. In this country hereafter we shall know definitely and accurately whether the Conservative party is going along the same road and in the same direction as the Liberal party. And those of us who record our vote, whether it be to-night or on another day, will have made an everlasting record as to where we stand, because in the trade agreement we have something which is beneficial not only to Canada but to the United States. We have a tripartite agreement between ourselves, the United States and Great Britain, which points the way to a solution of difficulties not only between those countries, but also among all the countries of the world.

I heartily support the resolution, and I trust that when the vote is taken we may be unanimous in declaring that we put our country ahead of our party, and that we support the agreement.

Mr. W. A. WALSH (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to the resolution before the house I would suggest to hon. members opposite that their constant glorification of the trade treaty, and their constant crowing and blowing, to use a rather vulgar expression, with respect to the effects of the trade treaty, remind me very much of the old Chinese proverb which was quoted the other day in the Alberta legislature, and which has been quoted on many previous occasions—"The crowing hen never lays eggs."

An hon. MEMBER: The crowing hen?

Mr. WALSH: I can assure hon. members that all the crowing they are doing about the trade treaty is not going to produce good effects, so far as Canada is concerned.

I am not commencing my address as most hon. members on the Liberal side do, namely, by suggesting that unexpectedly they were called upon to take part in the debate. Having been prepared since the resolution was introduced, I am ready to take part in the debate, but it is not my intention to do so. I recognize the futility of presenting arguments, to any great extent, in the House of Commons as it is at present constituted, and I do not care to waste my efforts. I would rather place the work I have done in analysing the effects of the treaty before an audience which will at least listen with some degree of appreciation and will give at least some weight to the facts presented to them.

I say this after due and deliberate consideration, considering the treatment I received when I attempted to address the house on Tuesday afternoon of this week. I want to say further that if the house does not raise itself above its present level, the people of Canada will themselves take steps to remedy the situation.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. WALSH: We have heard "order" too frequently in the house to pay very much attention to a word of that kind. Before placing on Hansard a record of what I had intended to say, I should like to make brief reference to two hon. members. I have not had an opportunity to do so before. I have great admiration for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), and it is my hope and prayer that his health will continue to improve to such an extent that he may continue to grace the public life of Canada. May I also make passing reference to a friend who sits with us on this side of the house, who is at present seriously ill, and for whose recovery every hon. member is hoping. I refer to the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Duffus). He is a man who is very much respected, and I know there has not been a member on either side of the house who has not heard with a considerable degree of regret about his serious illness. I know our thoughts are with him, and with the members of his family.

Rather than continue the debate, I am merely going to do what we sometimes do in school. Hon. members will excuse my referring to the class-room, but that is my natural habitat. At times we ask the pupils to write essays and compositions, and at other times we ask them to develop plans along certain lines. I am going to give the house the plan which I should have elaborated considerably had I spoken earlier in the debate. I had hoped that when I got through with that elaboration I should have been able to leave this treaty so stark bare that even members on the Liberal side of the house would see the hideousness of the implications involved in it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WALSH: Sometimes when I speak in this house, face the audience that I am now facing and listen to the groans and guttural sounds that sometimes come forth, I wonder whether I have not landed in the central part of Africa which is inhabited by other than human beings.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WALSH: First, I was going to say that our industries were not taken into the confidence of the government. They were not given an opportunity to submit arguments. That is quite different from the policy of the United States. I was going to refer hon. members to the United States statutes, volume forty-eight, page 943, where they would find section 4 of an act which sets out definitely the policy of the United States. That is something we have not in this country. The government of Canada do not seem to realize the seriousness of signing a trade treaty with a foreign party. They do not seem to realize that that foreign power may be hedged in by certain definite statutes, outside which they cannot go. Those engaged in commercial enterprise, those engaged in industry in this country, and even members of parliament were not informed of what the government were doing. Yet the government come before this parliament of free people with this treaty. The whole thing seems preposterous to me. It is a far-fetched procedure. We are now debating a trade treaty which has been signed and which is in effect, and yet members of this parliament did not have a word to say as to whether that treaty should or should not be signed, as to whether the various items in the treaty were going to affect their parts of the country adversely or otherwise.

We have had one glaring example of this already in the case of cattle. When this government signed the treaty they did not know the possible results of that one item and they had to get an explanation. I can see the representatives of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) going hat-in-hand to the President of the United States and saying, "We are very sorry, but we did not quite understand the meaning of that particular paragraph; we thought we were going to get so many head of cattle into the United States, and instead of that you tell us it is only so many; cannot you do something for us"? The President of the United States, seeing the meekness with which he is approached, and being in a conciliatory mood, agrees to let them have a certain concession.

The same thing is true with regard to wheat. Can one imagine a more ridiculous situation than this country with its bins filled to overflowing with wheat and yet importing wheat under this trade treaty to which the Liberal members are content to agree and to which the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) hoped we would give a unanimous expression of opinion! This country, overflowing with wheat, is importing thousands of bushels to be milled.

Mr. ILSLEY: The trade agreement does not mention wheat.

Mr. WALSH: But it is coming in; that is the difficulty.

Mr. CLEAVER: He did not know that.

Mr. WALSH: If the hon. member who has just spoken knew half as much as the least on this side of the house, he would be a credit as a member of parliament.

The second point I wanted to make is that I would take strong exception to the most favoured nation clause. I was going to read certain articles in the trade agreement in order to show that it is utterly impossible to make a suitable and practical trade agreement with foreign countries if we are going to embody in each and every one the most favoured nation clause. I realize that previous governments have done this. Previous governments have made mistakes, but it is up to this government to remedy such mistakes. Our bargaining powers would be much more effective if we could go to a country and bargain for reciprocal trade, knowing that that was not going to affect our trade with any other country with which we had an agreement.

I was going to go further into that argument. I was going to deal with the argument which the Prime Minister put forward in the supplementary edition of his speech on the trade treaty when he referred to the totalitarian states. I was going to take exception to his suggestion that we should and would make agreements with these totalitarian states as long as they maintained their present position with their dictatorial rulers and their oppression of minority races. Trade with them by all means, but do not trade with them under their present form of government and while they follow their present policy of the suppression and oppression of minority races.

As my third point I was going to read what Lord Beaverbrook had to say about this treaty. He commended it very highly from the British point of view. He pointed out what Great Britain was going to gain under the treaty signed with the United States at the same time. I was going to read what Mr. Cordell Hull had to say from the United States point of view. If we are to believe the statements of these men that Great Britain and the United States have made tremendous gains as a result of these treaties, those gains must have been made at the expense of the third party, the Dominion of Canada. If I took the time to read what Lord Beaverbrook had to say, hon. members would find that he suggests that the British dominions would have to make certain sacrifices. We are making certain sacrifices, but we do not need to make more in order to get a favourable trade agreement.

The fourth point I was going to elaborate was in connection with the effect of the 1935 trade treaty. I was going to quote what had been said by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) to show the house how preposterous were the statements they made in 1936 when viewed in the light of 1939. If the trade treaty of 1935 worked so disastrously for the Dominion of Canada, how can we believe them when they suggest that this treaty is going to be better than the 1935 one?

Next, I was going to refer to the effect of the agreements of 1932 on empire trade. I was going to show by means of figures that the agreements of 1932 were of tremendous value to this country, but they have been superseded more or less by this present treaty.

I was going to show that by the removal of the six cents preference on wheat we are short-circuiting our own traffic from our own Canadian ports, and I was going to ask the members from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia to try to justify the loss of traffic to our eastern ports of Saint John and Halifax. If they could justify the conditions that prevailed in those ports during this winter, I would give them credit for more ingenuity than I think they possess. We are short-circuiting our traffic from our own eastern ports, and I for one am going to protest most vigorously at an opportune moment, because I am interested particularly in one of our eastern ports, the port of Montreal.

The ministers of the crown do not seem to realize that there is a strong economic pull away from our eastern Canadian ports, and that we have to do something to eliminate or overcome that strong economic pull. I was going to read in support of my argument a letter addressed to the Prime Minister from Mr. W. R. Eakin, president of the Shipping Federation of Montreal, and representations from the board of trade of Montreal and from others who are interested in our Canadian ports, not only Montreal but our maritime ports and the port of Quebec.

For my sixth point I was going into the history of reciprocity and would have proved pretty conclusively that reciprocity has always been a nefarious instrument in the economic development of this country. It has always worked to the disadvantage of Canada. I was going to focus the attention of the house upon the historical development of trade treaties between Canada and the United States as they have affected this country. I was going to point out the effects of the changes made in the economic policies of the United States of America.

Some of my friends in this house will remember the wonderful trade we built up in cattle prior to 1922. The cattle of Canada passed from north to south, but in 1922 the Republican government terminated the then existing tariff in the United States, and what happened? Our cattle were stopped at the border. Our markets were glutted with cattle, and prices of beef went down to such an extent that Canadian farmers could not afford to continue in that line of business. We had to find new markets, and we found them by shipping our cattle east and west instead of north and south. Now this trade treaty comes in with a view to diverting a part of that trade.

One cannot play with trade routes the way this government is playing with them. Trade routes become firmly and definitely established, and once we have a definite trade route and are profiting by it, it is well for us to stay in that route and not to branch out of it. If we lose a good trade route we have lost something that is hard to regain, and if we are now going to sacrifice the market that we have in Great Britain at the present time, we shall have great difficulty in getting that market back again in the future. Get it back we shall have to, because if history repeats itself, and mark you, Mr. Speaker, history always does repeat itself—and always our trade agreements with the United States have only spelled ruin so far as Canada was concerned—this particular trade treaty will in turn be abrogated in due course, as always has happened because the policy of the United States government is not towards that kind of trade. Then we shall have to find new trade routes, and that is going to be rather difficult.

For my seventh point I was going to take a specific industry in Canada, the dress industry, and I was going to show by figures exactly what this trade treaty means to that business. What does it mean? It means the complete elimination of the dress manufacturing business in this dominion, and that means a tremendous loss to Montreal and Toronto. Bear in mind, too, that with that industry go all the allied industries associated with it, including those engaged in the manufacture of fabrics who supply the dress manufacturers with the materials with which to make their dresses. These goods are coming in now from the United States of America. Not only are they coming in and meeting certain restrictions by our customs, but we are actually facilitating their coming in. I know of a very large shipment of dresses that came in to the Robert Simpson Company of Toronto. They came right through to the Robert Simpson Company's store in Toronto, right up to the floor on which those dresses were to be sold, and there they were unpacked.

I was also going to show the effect of the $100 exemption on this particular trade. I was coming from New York once and there was a lady sitting opposite with three suitcases. The inspector came along and asked her, "Have you anything to declare?" She said, "yes", and he gave her a slip, upon which she wrote down so many dresses, so many hats, so many shoes, and it totalled up to probably $99.99. The inspector took the slip and looked at it and said, "Is that all you have to declare?" She replied "yes"; the inspector said, "Thank you", and that was all. He did not open her suitcases, did not look into them at all; he simply took her word and passed on. That is the way in which the $100 exemption is working so far as the dress-goods trade is concerned. I go to New York but I do not buy a suit of clothes there; but when the women go they buy dresses, hats, shoes and other apparel, and bring them back in as large quantities as the law will permit.

Mr. GRAY: Is the hon. member opposed to the exemption?

Mr. WALSH: I opposed it when it was first introduced. I am very, very glad that the hon. chief whip of the Liberal party is able to resume his place in the house, because I have missed his happy questions and his occasional cross-fire, and I trust that his health will permit him to be in his seat almost continuously from now to the end of the session.

Mr. GRAY: But that does not answer my question.

Mr. WALSH: I answered it. I said that I opposed the exemption when it was first introduced; I oppose it now because it works an injury to manufacturing industries established in my own city; and if the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) were in his seat, I would include those in the city of Quebec as well; for there is a great shoe industry established there right in his own riding, and he also should be opposing this exemption if he had the real interests of his constituents at heart.

I am going to conclude with a suggestion. I am not finding fault with every item in this trade treaty. There are good features in any treaty; there are some good features in this one. I would have elaborated on that point if it had been my desire to do so. But I just want to leave with the house this one suggestion. It came to my mind as the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Clarke) was speaking. I was sitting beside the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) and we recalled another expression by that famous United States president. I cannot quote his exact words, but he said something like this: If you buy goods from a foreign country, you have the goods and they have your money; but if you buy goods made at home you have the goods and you have the money too.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): He never said anything of the kind.

An hon. MEMBER: It was Barnum who made that statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, a few of my Liberal friends were asking for the question to be put, and put now, I suppose. But the question is not going to be put for half an hour. Some hon. members who are left in the house and who would like to go to the hockey match will find themselves remaining here if they are going to vote. The thought occurred to me as I looked round the chamber that, in so far as I wanted to say something to the ministry, perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you might page the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe), the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud), the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), and particularly—

An hon. MEMBER: That is small.

Mr. HARRIS: —the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), who should be here guiding this bill through the house. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) asked to be excused; we will excuse him. While they are coming in, I would ask hon. members to try to think not only of this trade treaty in its own terms but also of the added effect of the treaty of 1935.

I have listened with a good deal of interest to the speeches of ministers of the crown, particularly the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and of other Liberal members.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Here he comes.

Mr. HARRIS: I must say that to my mind the speakers seem to have entirely ignored all the difficulties. I appreciate very much that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has come into the chamber. I was just saying to him and to his colleagues that—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. HARRIS: The reason I spoke in such a high tone of voice was that I thought perhaps the minister might hear me up in his room or at the hockey match. The particular question I wish to put is this, what is this treaty going to do for the expansion of employment in Canada? What did the last treaty do to help out unemployment? Did it make for more employment?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS: By the time I have finished perhaps the real situation may look a little bit different.

For twenty years it has been my pleasure to trade each and every week with my friends in the United States. Not a month goes by but I consummate a deal in Great Britain. Five cars lying in Montreal cannot go to Germany, although they are properly sold there, because of the two kinds of currency which are in vogue and because they are demanding a barter arrangement before they will permit a bona fide sale of goods to that country. For twenty years Italy has received goods which I have had the pleasure of shipping, yet this year we cannot ship there. With that background I approach this question of trade, perhaps thinking I know something about how we deal with our fellow men in these other countries.

An hon. member has said that the Conservative party could not make up their minds as to what they were going to do. We studied these problems and we listened to what others in other lands were saying. I was particularly struck with a statement which appeared on November 26 last in the London Economist, page 485:

> In these cases the effect of the agreement will largely be to divert a quantity of trade from dominion (largely Canadian) to American hands without increasing the total volume of imports.

That is a startling statement. So I checked up on what the Prime Minister had to say when he introduced the last agreement. He said this:

> The government of the United States and the government of this country were actuated by one desire, namely to make an agreement that would be equally beneficial to both countries.

Then, instead of making a statement of fact, the Prime Minister—as he is prone to do—asks a question:

> Could anything destroy the agreement more effectively than that it should be shown in the course of this next three years that one country had got considerably the better of the other? Would not the effect of an agreement reached in that way be to destroy the possibility of its continuance beyond the period of three years?

Implying that if it did it would not be continued. The evidence is all against the 1935 agreement so far as that is concerned; and I call to witness the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) in his budget speech of last year, wherein he said:

> Total exports to the United States fell six per cent below the figure for the previous year to a total of $343,000,000, while imports at $487,300,000 showed an increase of nearly 24 per cent.

There, Mr. Speaker, is evidence from the Prime Minister's own Minister of Finance that the 1935 agreement did not work to the general advantage and benefit of Canada, and the implication should have been sufficient for the Prime Minister not to rush down to Washington to consummate another agreement at any cost, but to mark time and see whether or not one should be consummated.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce made a speech in this house a few weeks ago. Did he review the trade as from 1935 to date? Did he give us anything constructive or concrete upon which we could cast an intelligent vote in favour of this agreement? He contented himself with taking just the January, 1939, figures. In one short sentence he said: "Of course a month's figures are not sufficient".

But at the same time he had the audacity to quote them to this house.

Mr. EULER: Oh, oh.

Mr. HARRIS: And he went on to say, even as the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) said, that in January we had a great increase in exports from this country. I suppose he got his statistics from the bureau of statistics and under his own signature, in like manner as I have mine. But why did not the Minister of Trade and Commerce, why did not my friend who sits to my right here, read the line all the way through and show that for the ten months ended January 31, 1939, our exports to the United States shrank by 16·1 per cent, or $60,000,000, rather than use just the one month's figures, for January, which showed us an increase over the figure for January, 1938?

If he is going to stick to January, let us stick to the true facts, as the Prime Minister was wont to say when he was talking about the Canadian press release. Tell the people of Canada that there were no gold bullion exports in the figures for January, 1938, whereas in January of this year the government bolstered its figures by adding in $10,255,000 of gold bullion exports. I say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, go a little further. He knows and I know that in December, just prior to this January month, the figures for which he put on Hansard, trade was $4,235,000 against us. He knows and I know that ever since November 16, when this trade treaty of 1938 was signed, manufacturers and anybody else shipping goods to the United States held back their shipments to get the full advantage of any concessions which were given to Canada under the Canada-United States trade agreement. He knows and I know that there were quotas in this new deal, and the rush to get the quotas in before January 31 had the effect of expanding by several million dollars our January exports.

Let us look at the other side of the picture. Importers and the like, who went to import goods from the United States are not bringing in their full spring requirements now. Why? They are holding back their imports in order to take full advantage of that three per cent excise tax ruling, the million dollars a month of excise which this treaty has given away and which comes off shortly. Watch the figures for February, March, April and May and see what happens. I say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the picture which the government has put on the Canadian Hansard is not a fair picture to give to the people, if all the considerations are noted.

Mr. EULER: When I gave the figures with regard to increased exports in January, it was in reply to what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) had stated when he said time would tell. I was showing that time had already told to the extent of one month.

Mr. HARRIS: Let us go a little further. Time will tell? Time has told already. When these negotiations were consummated at Washington, they used, as the minister knows, the figures supplied by the Department of Commerce at Washington. Take on the one hand the statistics supplied at Washington, and on the other the statistics supplied by our own bureau of statistics, and you find what the minister recited, as far as total trade is concerned, when he spoke on the address. On the other hand, taking the figures from the Department of Commerce at Washington —and those were the figures used in the negotiations—you find an adverse balance of trade against Canada for the twelve months ended December 31, 1938, amounting to $196,107,000. The minister shakes his head. Well, I will read the figures from the United States government's publication.

Mr. EULER: Which publication?

Mr. HARRIS: The publication issued by the Department of Commerce at Washington, dated February 7, giving the value of exports and imports for home consumption by grand divisions and countries.

Mr. EULER: Why not use the Canadian figures?

Mr. HARRIS: The minister used them, and I refer to them to show that he did not take the whole line. He stopped when he came to an adverse trade against us of 16·1 per cent. My hon. friends on the Liberal benches did likewise. For the twelve months ended December 31, 1938, imports by Canada from the United States for home consumption amounted to $452,852,000 while exports into the United States were $256,745,000. Take the mean of the two sets of figures, and even then I say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce—I think I should call him the minister of trade for Waterloo North because he looks after only the industries in that constituency—and to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), who has just come to life and now sits behind him, that this trade balance alone means the jobs of 100,000 Canadians. If these goods could be produced in Canada in the secondary industries, 100,000 more of our people would be put to work.

Mr. ROGERS: Were they employed in 1932?

[Mr. Harris.]

Mr. MANION: That was the bottom of the world depression.

Mr. HARRIS: I will go back to 1932 and I will go back to the minister's Purvis commission, who folded up their tent and silently stole away and are now doing nothing about the unemployment situation. We find in this new trade agreement the very items that were in the 1935 treaty, showing that employees in the secondary industries, in two important groups, are out of employment. What item more than anything else in these two treaties has been seriously affected? Iron and steel and all the groups that fall into that category, including machinery, have been more seriously affected than any other group; and yet walking the streets of Canada to-day, according to the report, I have before me, there are 45,000 iron and steel workers who are without jobs. In paper products, printing and advertising there are 7,104. In lumber and the products of lumber, there are 7,445. Let me give some other figures:

Industry	Number out of employment
Rubber products	5,199
Primary coal products	3,729
Clay, glass, stone	5,526
Chemicals	1,136
Electrical apparatus	5,261
Other industries	22,760

In other words, we have a total of 86,610; and when one takes transportation services, hotel services, trade and commerce, the retail trade and so on, we can add another 30,000. These are the people who should be employed now but are not.

Of course my hon. friends will say that I am giving only one side of the picture. Let me give them the other side. There has been some increase in employment in Canada in some branches. But will any hon. member rise in his place and say that in the textile industry, which since 1929 has had an increase in employment, that increase was not made possible by the Bennett emergency session? They know that the Bennett emergency tariffs reestablished the textile industry, and reestablished it to the extent, as the Minister of Labour is well aware, of 11,000 hands.

Under this trade treaty, by handing some of this business over to the United States, the textile industry is to-day in a precarious position. Logging as a primary industry has added 13,561 to its payroll since 1930, and the reason for that is well known. It is the same reason that caused the packing industry to add 5,000 to their payroll since that time—all as a result of the empire trade treaties. But what we gained under the Bennett emergency session and in the empire trade treaties is being lost to us by the paralyzing of the secondary industries through these two agreements.

Have we really the machinery with which to make these deals? The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) mentioned Mr. Wilgress, Mr. Robertson and Mr. Hector McKinnon, three able, hardworking civil servants, three of the best we have. But are they equipped? Have they the necessary help and assistance? Are they not rather charged primarily with the responsibility for correspondence and all the business that comes to their own departmental desks? Is not Mr. Wilgress looking after commercial intelligence? Are not he and his secretary and stenographer charged with that responsibility? I have not the pleasure of knowing Mr. Robertson, but I assume he is busy with his own Department of External Affairs.

I ask you hon. members to stack up against these gentlemen the conditions obtaining in the United States on the one hand and in Great Britain on the other. The Minister of Trade and Commerce knows that at Washington, all the time, all the year round, there are secretariats looking after all kinds of producer organizations and all kinds of industry. He knows that as far back as January, 1938, to November, 1938, when the deal was signed, the Americans knew what goods would be affected. Their representatives were busy. I attended a meeting in Chicago as early as April—the deal was to come off in November—and I know they were then figuring ways and means to make sure that their production would not be harmed. The cotton growers met in April; the horticultural and agricultural groups met at Washington and studied the whole plan of action; they knew exactly what they were going after. Did this government recognize the horticultural societies? Did the Minister of Agriculture recognize the grain growers' association? Did the government recognize the Canadian Manufacturers' Association? Were these people called in? Did they have a chance? Did they know what was going to happen? Did the Minister of Labour call in the Federation of Labour? Did labour know what was going to happen to them? No! "Wait until you get it and then take it and like it." That has been the policy of this administration in drawing up their trade treaties. Yet they say, "We follow the British way."

Did they follow the British way? They did not. In London, on the Strand and up Kingsway you can go into scores of offices where you will find organizations and associations embracing all producing and manufacturing institutions in the British isles, and each association has its own chartered accountant who has access at all times to the books of each and every industry in order to see that their interests are looked after, through the board of trade, and by the way the president of that board is an active cabinet minister in England. But they even go further than that. I do not need to remind this house that they have one highly trained body of men whose duty it is to look after trade matters in order to see that imports come into that country only under the supervision of the import duties advisory committee. Would hon. members stack up our three junior men here against such men as Right Hon. Lord May, K.B.E., at $25,000 yearly; Sir Sydney J. Chapman, K.C.B., C.B.E., at $15,000; Sir Allan Powell, C.B.E., at $15,000; Sir Percy W. L. Ashley, K.B.E., C.B., at $10,000, and all the staff officers associated with them? They are organized to look after the interests of Great Britain in connection with matters of trade.

I ask those members of parliament who are here; I ask the ordinary member, what do you know about this trade treaty? I do not think you know a great deal about it; that is my frank, considered opinion, after listening to this and many other debates. I say that in a kindly way, because I know hon. members have a great deal to do; but I say it is not fair to Canada to charge our three commissioners with the responsibility of looking after a matter of this sort. And may I say that if any supporters of the party in power in Great Britain were to ridicule the president of the board of trade as some of our free trade friends are wont to ridicule the heads of similar organizations in Canada; or if they were to ridicule the organizations which serve that board, they would be read out of their party. Here it seems to be considered rather a fine thing to ridicule the manufacturers' association, the lumbermen's association and other similar organizations.

To sum up the whole situation, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce complains because my leader said population was not a fair basis of comparison, and said that we were a great trading country and should be considered on a par with the United States or with Great Britain in a trade deal, I say to him that the odds are fifty to one against us in regard to organization in consummating any such agreement. That is the position as it stands to-day.

Mr. EULER: What officials were employed by the Bennett administration when they tried to negotiate a trade treaty with the United States? Precisely the same ones that we used.

Mr. HARRIS: The minister reminds me of the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman); he also goes back into history. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) went back to 1842. Not satisfied with that, the hon. member for Huron North went back to Adam and Eve. Why not look ahead instead of to the rear? I like to look forward and not backward, and I want to put the facts on record. We are up against a difficult situation in trying to consummate a deal with the United States. Their mode of living, tastes and possible production are all very much the same as ours, with the result that every time we open our markets to them we have to restrict our own production. On the other hand Great Britain, which is the world's largest purchaser, is a complementary market, and that is a real advantage. It is only common sense that we must retain the preference we now possess. Sir Wilfrid Laurier believed in it; Right Hon. R. B. Bennett consummated it, but now what do we find? We find this government narrowing the preference, meddling with what we already have, to our own detriment, as is indicated in the passage I read from the London Economist. My hon. friends opposite seem to have lost their British make-up in some way or another. "What we have we hold" seems to have been something in the past as far as they are concerned.

It is perhaps unnecessary for me to say this, but I see the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) in the house, so I might remind him that our vegetable and fruit growing conditions are not the same as they are in the United States. Their climate is so much ahead of ours that they have a natural advantage over us. It is also common knowledge that they are over-industrialized in their secondary industries, and that they are anxious to get their extra capacity operating. When they do so they will produce more than they need for themselves, and when we lower our valuations for duty purposes and the other restrictions against dumping, the result will be that millions of dollars worth of their extra production will be dumped into this country, and more of our own people will be without work.

The hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh) told the house a short time ago that he opposed the $100 free entry. I do not believe in allowing $100 worth of goods to be brought in by tourists; I say that condition should not obtain in this country; for the reason that these goods consist of clothing, boots and shoes, dresses, refrigerators, radios, small motors and things of that kind which have a high labour content. The records show $6,000,000 of imports coming in free under that exemption, and we know there is another $6,000,000 not recorded; so, if we know anything at all about it, we know that means $1,200,000 taken from the wage rolls of the people of Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why does the hon. gentleman say there is another $6,000,000 not recorded? I ask the question for information.

Mr. HARRIS: For the very simple reason that the efficiency of our customs men at border ports, as the minister knows, is only fair. When I went to school and got a mark of "fair" on an examination, it meant that I was rated at fifty or more. So I would say the efficiency is about fifty per cent, and I believe the minister will agree with me.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. I just wanted the basis for my hon. friend's statement.

Mr. HARRIS: The spirit of these trade agreements is something that should be given more thought. Each year sees revenue bills passed by the United States against the natural products of this country. Even during 1938, sawed timber was added to the revenue bill in order that Uncle Sam might collect $1.50 a thousand feet on it. That is a new touch. But the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie)—and if he is at the hockey match I hope he can hear me—says, "Oh, but we hope that $1.50 will be taken off in June." Some hon. member to my right says there is no doubt about it, but let me remind my hon. friend that Canada has in this agreement agreed to relinquish further its guaranteed preference on lumber if and when the United States repeals the import tax on Canadian lumber. They have already sold us out in that regard, which means that more and more of the lumber we formerly sent to Great Britain under the British preference will be displaced by lumber coming from the United States. What about copper, with its four cents a pound, in all its ramifications placed against us as a revenue tax in 1934?

I should like to say something about animal oils and fats, and butter. The Liberal party are sliding down so fast on that toboggan of 40,000,000 or 50,000,000 pounds of surplus butter which is in Canada at the present time that they will hit bottom when the next election comes. Even though they have had a reference before their tariff board for over two years, asking that something be done in like manner to that which was done in the United States with respect to vegetable oils and fats going into that country, to the tune of from three to six cents per pound excise tax, nothing has been done in Canada. This is another example of the do-nothing administration.

And with what other result? The result has been that imports of this substitute for our natural fats have risen from the figure of 90,000,000 pounds which was reached about five years ago, until in the year ending December 31, 1938, it reached the figure of 255,000,000 pounds. There is as much vegetable oil coming into Canada, free of all duty and tax, as there is creamery butter made in this country. Yet this administration sits impotent, and does nothing about the matter. It does not call for the tariff board report; nothing is done about it. That is another example of the revenue tax legislation of the United States—and we may expect more of it.

The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) has come into the chamber—I had not noticed him before. He had something to say this afternoon about duties, and about our exports and imports. But he seemed to have forgotten that in 1930 the United States put through their tariff act of that year with the result that our exports to that country in the year dropped by $128,000,000, or 42 per cent. So I will ask the page boy to present my hon. friend with a copy of the tariff act of 1930 of the United States, and when he has finished with it he can return it to the library of parliament.

Mr. WARD: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. HARRIS: Yes, half a dozen of them —as long as it does not come off my time.

Mr. WARD: Does he deny the favourable trade balance figures given this afternoon?

Mr. HARRIS: Does my hon. friend deny the unfavourable trade balance figure of $196,000,000 for the year 1938, which I gave when he was on his way home from the hockey match, a little while ago? A hundred thousand of our people are looking for jobs. The hon. member quoted figures this afternoon, but I would say to him there are only 100,000 employees in the primary industries and there are 900,000 in the secondary industries. The rate is nine to one. Put your secondary industry unemployed men to work.

I should like to say something about transportation, and cutting off the business of our ports. I should like to say something about coal. I should like to say something about magazines and advertising which, in 1936—including magazine and other literature imports—stood at $2,900,000 and in 1939 had jumped to $5,900,000, filling this country with advertisements of all kinds of produce from the United States, and paralyzing our industry.

But the house will learn more of that anon. I have only five minutes left. Divide up the work of the Minister of Finance with the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has taken the work on tariffs of the Minister of Finance entirely off the board for three years, because the scope of our aggregate trade shows these astounding and astonishing figures: By this agreement seventy per cent of the trade of Canada is hamstrung for three years. There is $350,000,000 worth of trade within the confines of this trade agreement—and there is nothing the government can do about it. They have extended the most favoured nation treatment affecting trade valued at $241,000,000. The margin of our preference with Great Britain has been narrowed.

I wish the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) were in his seat. I have something on my desk I should like to give to him. This is your job, Mr. Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Prime Minister stated at page 904 of Hansard—and I shall not bother looking it up; hon. members can look it up for themselves—when he was talking about trade relations with Canada, "We want to give the exact truth." That is what he said, as reported in Hansard. But he gave only a half truth when he issued that press release pamphlet, and only a half truth when he made his speech in the House of Commons. At my own expense I put a staff of university students of commerce and finance to record our trade and the effects of the 1935 treaty, and what did I find? I found sixty-four pages of items, amounting to $350,000,000, all of which are affected by the trade treaty, and are favours given to the United States. I found fourteen pages of favours given to Canada by the United States. And when I analyse those figures, which I should like to place on Hansard—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HARRIS: And when I analyse those figures I find that for every dollar of actual value that we have received from the United States we have given two dollars of actual value to the people of the United States. And if hon. members want to multiply that by the population—I will not do it, but they may do it themselves—they will see it is forty to one against us. That is the picture with regard to this trade agreement—forty to one against us.

All right, shake your head. If you think we are as big as the United States; if you think you are as good a trader as the United States, if you think you are as good a trader as Great Britain, the actual dollars are two to one against us.

I make this charge: I say the government of Canada has not been fair to the people of Canada. It should file on the table of the house a record of the actual effects these trade treaties are going to have, and the effect the 1935 trade treaty had, particularly on the secondary industries in this country. Let us judge, not by the exact truth, so-called by the Prime Minister in his speech, but by the facts. And we shall have an opportunity to judge by the facts, before the next election. And these one-trippers who are in the House of Commons to-day—many of whom were at the hockey match to-night—after the next election will be like that book about which we have heard so much—"Gone With the Wind."

Mr. D. J. HARTIGAN (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the maniacal and bellicose remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat, there was only one thing I had cause to regret, and that was the deprivation the people of Canada suffer owing to the fact that television has not been fully developed.

For one reason, and one only, I did not intend to speak on the trade treaty, and that is that the treaty as such has been in operation only since January 1. All this debating which has taken place in the House of Commons with respect to the trade treaty, to a very great extent has been waste effort. It is not based on facts. How could it be? We have yet to see the effects of the treaty. The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), who has just taken his seat, has recorded a great array of figures; in fact, we were staggered by the millions and thousands which came rolling out. At the same time he went back into 1938, 1935 and other years. The trade treaties which were negotiated between Great Britain and the United States and between Canada and the United States came into effect on January 1. How can any decision be based on anything but conjecture when it goes back of this year? I doubt if the figures for January and February of this year are complete, because there are always odds and ends which come up later.

I do not think the language which has emanated from the other side of the house in condemnation of this treaty is going to sway the people of Canada one iota. They remember quite well the period from 1930 to 1935. The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) sat as a member of the price spreads committee, and he must remember the evidence given of the staggering profits which were made by the textile people and other manufacturers during those terrible years. During the greatest depression Canada has ever known, many manufacturers made immense fortunes while the majority of Canadian people were in want.

I do not intend to go back of January 1, 1938, because to my mind to do that would be useless as far as any discussion of this treaty is concerned. Canada has a small population, and in the last forty years our manufacturing industry has been developed so intensely as to outstrip our growth in population. No effort has been made to find out how the products of our industries can be distributed in Canada. I think that is our main trouble as far as trade in Canada is concerned, and this disability must be overcome in some way. There are one or two ways in which it can be done. The upper house met here some time ago and had to adjourn for lack of work. The upper house of the federal parliament had an opportunity to render real service to the people of this country by staying here and going into the railway problem, not from the point of view of unification but from the point of view of making distribution more readily available to the Canadian people.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is against the rules of the house to make any reference to the other chamber.

Mr. HARTIGAN: People say that there is no possibility of changing the situation as it exists at the present time, but I say that great opportunities are available to the parliament of Canada to change the system so that we may have better distribution. We can make our railways 100 per cent efficient in the distribution of the products of our factories. That would be one of the greatest helps in increasing trade in this country.

Every Conservative member, when discussing this trade treaty, has stressed its effect upon some small manufacturing concern in his own riding which was perhaps near and dear to his heart. But not one of them has spoken on the trade treaty from the point of view of the consumers who make up the greatest part of our population. Our greatest efforts should be to make available the commodities of this country to the ordinary wage-earner, the farmer and the artisan. No speaker on the other side of the house has expressed that idea. One or two of them were so hard put to-night that they had to refer to the fact that the customs officers on the border were not performing their duties properly. I think many of us who cross the line are quite pleased when the customs officers do not interfere with us, and I believe the same would apply to most travellers. Hon. members are advancing a very poor argument when they complain of a customs officer not making a proper examination. In most instances only $40 or $50 worth of goods would be involved, and I venture to say that it is only in rare cases that the amount involved is over $100.

Canada is a country of large areas, but our population is sparse. However, we have extensive railways. A cry has gone through the country which is fostering unrest and imbuing fear in the hearts of the people—the cry of the railway problem. Our railways are our greatest adjuncts to trade. Some people advocate that our railways should be amalgamated or unified, although they do not say how that is to be done. They do not realize how many people will be thrown out of employment. They do not realize how many people are utterly dependent upon the railways.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is wandering away from the subject matter of the resolution, which has to do with the ratification of a trade treaty.

Mr. HARTIGAN: This concerns the trade of the country. I was just indicating why the Canadian National Railways should be left as it is.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is not the question before the house at the moment.

Mr. HARTIGAN: I am pleading that the Canadian National Railways should be left as it is. It is our greatest adjunct to trade in the country. There are thousands of people who have no other means of getting their necessities of life.

There is another great problem which faces the Dominion of Canada and which should be grasped at its flood-tide. What we need is population. This is complementary to this trade treaty. This trade treaty has been the greatest thing ever put through. I maintain that the people of Canada would not consent for one moment to go back to the days from 1930 to 1935 when our high tariff prevailed. A commission should be appointed to go to the old country to study this matter. They should consult with the refugees who are being driven from pillar to post—

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member to confine himself to the discussion of the resolution before the house, which has to do with the ratification of a trade treaty. There should not be a long discussion on the immigration policy of the government.

Mr. HARTIGAN: I maintain that trade is one of our great problems and must be for a great number of years to come, and if we bring in a population that will help consumption, naturally our home trade is going to increase. If we get enough population in this country to consume all that we produce, does anyone think we would have to look for markets outside. With the great area we have, we should be taking advantage of international loans, and now is our opportunity to get people in to consume our goods.

So far as this particular trade treaty is concerned, we know what it has done in the two months it has been in operation, and what its results will be in the future we must leave to the future to decide. We know that it will do good. Even if we did not want to enter into a trade treaty with the United States at this time, the people of this country are cognizant of the fact that the United States and Great Britain were going to negotiate a trade treaty whether or not Canada came in. In any event, our preference in the British market would have terminated in June, and we would have lost it then anyway. Why keep harping on what has gone and on what would have been lost in any event, with no compensating results unless an agreement had been entered into? Those are the questions which the people of Canada must consider.

I say further that we should take advantage of every opportunity that offers to increase our population. It is no use our holding on to the idea that we are going to get a population purely British. We have so big an area to populate that Canada is bound to be a cosmopolitan country. If we hold off too long, when we want population we may not be able to get population commensurate with the needs of the country and under as favourable conditions as now. So far as trade is concerned, why worry about who comes in or who does not come in to increase our population? This trade treaty is signed and it is good for three years.

Mr. SPEAKER: Again I remind the hon. member that he cannot discuss immigration on this resolution.

Mr. HARTIGAN: This government has consummated this agreement with the United States, and its benefits are already becoming apparent to the people of Canada. But I maintain that we have to go a step further and increase the ability of our population to consume the goods we produce in this country, and we cannot do that with the small population we have now. If we want to make Canada the great country that it should be and that destiny intended it to be, we must go on and on year after year increasing our consumptive capacity for all the manufactured and basic products that we produce in Canada. I say it is no use for hon. gentlemen to rise in their places and give figures, going back ten or fifteen years. That has nothing to do with the present trade agreement. It is of no earthly use to us and does not help out the situation one bit. The safest thing we can do is to leave this trade agreement to the judgment of the Canadian people. One or two manufacturing industries may be hurt, but I venture to say that the majority will not be hurt. If there are some few industries in this country suffering from an inferiority complex, which feel inferior in business ability, management and productivity to our great neighbour nation to the south, let us bring in people who will produce the goods, and not only produce them, but distribute them and sell them at a profit.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question? Those in favour will please say Aye.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those opposed will please say Nay.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the Ayes have it.

Mr. FINN: Mr. Speaker, in face of the fact that I had risen in my place, do you persist in doing what you have just done?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I did not persist in doing what I have just done. Having asked if the house was ready for the question and if there were any more members to speak, and not noticing the hon. member, I put the question.

Mr. FINN: Then I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the question be withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those opposed to the motion will please say Nay.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the Ayes have it. I declare the motion carried.

Motion (Mr. Mackenzie King) agreed to.

[Mr. Hartigan.]

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I move, Mr. Speaker:

That the trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America, laid on the table of the house on the twelfth day of January, 1939, be referred to the committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Sir Eugène Fiset in the chair.

On schedule 1:

Customs tariff—6. Live hogs: one cent per pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—7. Meats, fresh, n.o.p.: ex (a) Edible offal of beef and veal, 4 cents per pound;
ex (c) Pork, 1¼ cents per pound.

Mr. MANION: What quantity of meats did we import last year?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I think I had better move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. MANION: Yes. May I make it clear that I do not want the minister to think we are blocking this in any way. There are certain details we want to get, and I did not suppose we should reach this to-night.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I think it is only fair to report progress and go ahead with some other business.

Progress reported.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 7, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Euler—Sir Eugene Fiset in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to create a national film board empowered and directed to review and report on government film activities and to discharge such other duties as the governor in council may request; and to authorize the governor in council to appoint, and determine the salary of, a commissioner, to be the chief executive officer of the board. Also, to provide for the appointment of an inter-departmental committee to centralize government film distribution.

Mr. LAWSON: Mr. Chairman, the other evening when this resolution was before the house I made some extended remarks in connection therewith, in the course of which I made a statement which was in error and which I should like to correct. I made the statement that there was in existence in each province or in nearly every one of the provinces a film bureau, and that the work to be done by this national bureau would be pure duplication. Upon making inquiries I found afterwards that all those provinces which three or four years ago had motion picture bureaux have, during the past two or three years, disbanded them in the interests of economy and have not now such a bureau. However, I should still like to persist in respect of some other matters I raised. When the minister has an opportunity, I should like him to tell us the purpose of bringing to Canada a gentleman who, I understand, was brought here from England and who spent some weeks here making a survey in connection with this matter. I should like to know something about the report he made, whether this scheme was recommended by him, and what that gentleman's report cost us.

Mr. EULER: As a matter of fact, I had not expected that this matter would come up this evening. I shall be glad on another occasion, perhaps when we are in committee on the bill, to give the information for which my hon. friend asks. The gentleman who was here from England was invited by me to come here for the purpose of giving us some expert advice with regard to this matter. While the bill is largely according to his recommendations, it was framed only after the deputy ministers of the various departments concerned had carefully canvassed the whole situation, discussed the merits of the scheme advanced, and adopted it unanimously.

Mr. LAWSON: There are some other matters in connection with this that I should like to raise. I have no objection to their standing over until the bill itself is in the committee stage, except that, in order to get the bill into the committee stage, it has to have its second reading, and I do not want to be taken as approving the principle of it, because on the information at present available to me I am very much opposed to the proposal, and I hope to be convinced by the minister before we are through with it that this is—

Mr. EULER: The hon. member will be.

Mr. LAWSON: —a necessary expenditure. Frankly, to me it is just a waste of the taxpayer's money. That is on the information I now have available. So I should like the minister, on another occasion, as he suggests, to bring us information as to what experience this particular gentleman had in the motion picture industry, and why someone from England was selected, rather than some Canadian, to make a report to us in connection with the matter; for we have in this country many men skilled in the motion picture art.

On this occasion I should also like to reply to a question which in the course of the discussion the other evening the minister put to me. I had said that in my opinion, if any particular province wanted a motion picture film showing the scenic beauty of that province to attract tourists, or showing some industrial operation within its borders, why should that province not make it and bear the expense of it; and my hon. friend posed to me, what about a national film? I have had an opportunity in the meantime to do a little thinking about a national film, and it seems to me that the only thought the minister could have had in mind as regards a national film, as distinct from a film connected with one particular province, would be a film which, if for example it were scenic, would cover the dominion from coast to coast and show outstanding features of the different provinces. May I say to the minister that if he attempted to make a film of that kind and do justice to the scenic beauties of the different provinces, it simply could not be done in less than twelve, fourteen or fifteen thousand feet of film. How on earth could one ever hope to have that quantity of film run for an exhibition purpose? When any hon. member goes to a regular motion picture theatre and sees a show or performance there, he will probably see 6,500 to 8,000 feet of film, and it will take him a minimum of two hours, and probably two and a half hours, to see it. What earthly possibility would there ever be of an audience sitting for four hours to see a national film, if that is what the minister has in mind?

May I make a concrete suggestion to the minister? By sheer accident I saw not long ago some film taken by somebody who was interested in mining and mining geology. He had carried with him into the north country one of those small motion picture cameras which anyone can operate, one which you hold up to your eye and turn the crank and expose the motion picture film. On that sort of machine, which is comparatively inexpensive, you use a 16 mm. film. As I pointed out to the house the other night, a 16 mm. film is the only kind which can be exhibited in places other than the regular operating room of a motion picture theatre. That is because of fire hazard. I saw the picture taken by this gentleman who was interested in mining geology, and I assure the committee that it demonstrated excellently anything which might be desired in an educational way.

Before the minister brings down his bill, I should like him to consider yet another aspect of this matter. It is proposed to have a board, I assume an advisory board of some kind, consisting of two ministers, three civil servants, three persons from the outside. Who will the three from the outside be? The minister made some suggestions the other night, and it must be obvious that these three will have to be representative of race and geography and all sorts of things.

Mr. EULER: Why so?

Mr. LAWSON: All right. I will say: Why so? Number one: Because it always has been, and I am afraid always will be, on every kind of board you have in Canada. Take the board of governors of the broadcasting corporation. Take your national harbours board, with one from the east, one from the west, and one from the centre. Take every board you have in Canada. Number two: If they are not going to be from different parts of Canada the minister is not going to accomplish the purpose he outlined to this house the other night as being behind this board, namely that he wanted to get views representative of all Canada on this board in order that he might have the advantage of their advice as to what sort of films should be produced to advertise Canada. If I misunderstood the minister in that regard I am sorry, but that is what I understood to be the purpose of the advisory board.

Mr. EULER: I do not think I said that.

Mr. LAWSON: What is the purpose?

Mr. EULER: Speaking offhand, I should say that the whole purpose would be to get from among the citizens of Canada three outsiders who would best serve the interests we have in view.

Mr. LAWSON: But what is the purpose?

Mr. EULER: I never had in mind such matters as race and religion and all the other things which might divide the people of a country. I should like to get away from that altogether. That was not in my mind.

Mr. LAWSON: Then what is the purpose of the board?

Mr. EULER: I can state it again. It seems to me that there is an entire misapprehension on the part of my hon. friend with regard to the purpose of this bill. I stated at the outset that the purpose was to coordinate the film activities of the various departments. As they are now, five or six departments are engaged, not in producing films but in having films produced, and are showing them and using them for their own purposes, which are quite proper. But there has also been a good deal of overlapping and inefficiency which we believe can be obviated by having this board, which will concentrate, unify and coordinate them all. That is the real purpose. There is, however, a more or less remote object, and that is the getting out of what may be called national films, which it would not be the duty of any one department now showing films to initiate.

Mr. LAWSON: Will the minister give an illustration? What does he mean by a national film?

Mr. EULER: There might be an educational film for the use of children throughout the country, for educational purposes. I give that merely as a possible example, but I emphasize again, the primary purpose of the bill as it is now is to coordinate the work at present done in the various departments. The national objective may be carried into practice, but that is at the moment not the primary purpose. The purpose is to bring about efficiency and economies, because there is some waste as the work is carried on at the present time in the various departments, and to make a better use of the film bureau which we now have. My predecessor will bear me out, I believe, when I repeat what I said the other evening, that we have in the film bureau as well equipped a plant as there is in north America. The hon. member for York South the other night rather objected to that statement and conveyed the idea that it was not an efficient organization.

Mr. LAWSON: I simply asked the minister to satisfy himself on the point.

Mr. EULER: To-day there was in my office a gentleman who, I know, has had a wide experience in all lines of film production. In fact, he was at one time engaged in Hollywood itself. He assured me to-day that the equipment we have in our own film bureau in the Department of Trade and Commerce is the equal of anything of its size in Hollywood. It is absolutely up to date. I repeat that for the information of the committee. I do not know that I can add anything more at the moment. I am not familiar with the technicalities of the film business, as my hon. friend is, but I am assured that we have an efficient plant, and I am satisfied that by having this film board or some similar organization we can improve efficiency, practise economy and secure a much better distribution than we have now.

Mr. STEVENS: When this motion was before the committee the other evening, just at eleven o'clock I was responsible, I believe, for its being carried over, but there are one or two observations which I wanted to make. I am under a slight apprehension as to just where we are heading if this resolution passes. In the first place I wish to say frankly that the motion picture bureau operating under the Department of Trade and Commerce, as far as its activities go, with the more or less limited appropriations that have been voted from year to year in the past, is in my opinion one of the most efficient, from the point of view of both equipment and personnel, that one could desire to have. I think the country has been extremely fortunate in having that personnel.

Another point referred to by the the minister is this. In recent years there has been a tendency to develop motion picture branches within other departments. I think that is deplorable, but we do not need a film board, nor need we have any bill, to deal with that. That is purely administrative. It is not peculiar to the motion picture industry. For instance, in statistics there is an overlapping, although some years ago it was all brought into the bureau of statistics.

The motion picture bureau was established for the purpose of serving all departments; but it is one of the inherent sins of the civil service—I do not say this in a condemnatory way, though it is a fact nevertheless—that there is a strong tendency on the part of civil servants to develop and expand their particular branches. For instance, there was a certain natural resources branch of the old Department of the Interior which was started with one man and a stenographer, and within a few years it had grown to 180 employees with vast expenditures for printing, illustrating and all the rest of it. Most of the material issued was taken from the bureau of statistics, revamped and issued a second time on very fine paper, with equally fine printing and lithographing. That was done away with.

What I am afraid of is this. We shall build up a film board—it is called a film board, and that is the dangerous part of it; but according to the resolution the board is only to review and report. Well, one does not need to erect a new board to review and report. The minister has told us that several deputies have already reported. At least that is what I understood him to say.

Mr. EULER: No. They conferred as to what sort of organization should be set up.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, there are the deputies and other responsible officers in the other departments; all that has to be done if there is overlapping, is for the Prime Minister—because if there is overlapping, the necessary action must be taken under the authority of the Prime Minister—to have those responsible in each department for the motion picture business get together, and then the Prime Minister, simply by order in council, would provide that the motion picture bureau, which might be put anywhere, I do not care where, should as at present constituted serve as the motion picture organization for the government. That is all that is necessary. A long review is not required nor is it necessary to constitute a new board. I venture this statement. If this resolution passes, if a film board is started, within five years there will be another radio commission or some other duplicate of that body.

When I was minister, speaking from memory I believe the vote for the motion picture bureau was in the neighbourhood of $50,000—I think it was less. Last year it was $88,000, and this year it is $150,000. That is before this coordinating effort has even begun. I warn the government that if this motion carries, they are heading in the direction of a new body of commissioners—I think a commissioner is contemplated, but I venture to say there will be commissioners or a commissioner and two or three assistants—and then there will be a glorification of their duties and their office, with an ever-increasing expenditure and ambitious undertakings entered upon. I would appeal to the Prime Minister to deal with this question in this way: that he and his colleagues in council issue instructions to the deputy ministers concerned—and if they know it comes from the cabinet they will act accordingly—that they must get together, iron out their differences, and turn over their activities to the existing bureau. If they do not like to turn them over to the Department of Trade and Commerce, or if it is thought better to put the bureau under some other department that can handle the work better, put it there; but do not let us start calling in outside people to tell the government what to do in a simple matter of administration.

In saying this, I am not criticizing the so-called motion picture bureau. It has been well managed, and I think its equipment is good. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) and I have differed on this before, but it is a perfectly friendly difference of opinion; many of the films that have been issued have been of such a nature that I question whether it would be commercially possible to make and distribute them. That is particularly true of educational films, which have been valuable and which have been sent to various countries. Speaking now with my knowledge of the situation three or four years ago, to my mind this bureau has rendered a valuable service to Canada. But let us keep down the expense. I venture to say that if the government gives Mr. Badgley and the present staff of the motion picture bureau a reasonable vote, and turns over to that bureau the activities which have grown up in other departments in recent years, it will have an organization just as satisfactory as any that might be created in the form of a commission. I should like to emphasize that I think it necessary that we face these questions as administrative matters. They do not call for a public or semi-public investigation; they are purely administrative.

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. STEVENS: I am going to be very strong in my opinion about that, because I know what I am talking about. The Prime Minister has frequently emphasized the principle of responsible government. He will please believe that I am not criticizing now, but I am urging that this is a case where the responsibility of the government can properly be exercised. I know that whoever is Prime Minister is an extremely busy man and cannot possibly delve into all the details of departmental conflicts and matters of that kind. But I assure him that if he will take administrative charge of this matter and instruct the various departments to get together, that can be done without need for this legislation. I fear that if this bill is allowed to pass, it will be simply the foundation for another commission. That may not be intended, but that is what it will become. I know the tendency, and it happens before one realizes it. So I warn the government that in my opinion they are starting something both costly and unnecessary.

Mr. WALSH: I remember a discussion that took place in this house a few years ago, when the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) was criticizing the Department of Fisheries in regard to the manner in which it had expanded during the previous few years. He gave as an example a workman engaged to shovel snow in front of the parliament buildings; and his analogy was that he came back five years later and found a whole line of offices, containing the commissioner of snow shovellers, several assistant commissioners, an accountant and a whole staff of employees. That is what is liable to happen in this case, and I quite agree with what was said by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens).

In saying that I do not want it to be understood that I am in any way disparaging the effort that is being made to concentrate these activities within one department. I think that is all to the good. I think anyone in this house who has had anything to do with education, directly or indirectly, will appreciate the value of visual education in this day and age. I know that in connection with schools, colleges and universities a bureau of this kind would be of tremendous value, and I know it would be put to wide use. So I am hoping that despite the criticism that is being offered against this plan, which in my opinion will lead to extravagant expenditure that would be better devoted to the production of films rather than to the establishment of a commission or board such as is suggested here, the same amount of money will be voted but will be spent on the actual films rather than on the body that is to look after this work. I am quite certain that this can be carried on along the lines suggested by the former Minister of Trade and Commerce. I personally have desired to take advantage of these activities as carried on in different departments, and have found it difficult to know exactly where to locate certain films. I knew they existed, but I did not know exactly how to go about getting them. We would write one department; they would suggest that we write some other department, and by the time we got in touch with the right department the reason for wanting the film had disappeared or we had found another source.

In considering the development of this activity I hope the minister will take due cognizance of the fact that most schools are now being equipped with certain types of projectors, and will see to it that the films issued by his department will be such that schools as well as commercial enterprises may take advantage of them. All schools have not the 35 mm. machines; some have 16mm. and some 9 mm., and I should like to see this bureau developed in such a way that it will be of practical assistance to every institution in Canada as well as to commercial enterprises for the purpose of advertising Canada to better advantage both within and without this country. I hope the minister will take the criticism I am offering, in good faith. I am anxious to see this development, but I am not anxious to see it along the line suggested. I should like to see the department organized so that those who may wish to take advantage of it may do so without too much trouble.

Mr. EULER: Rather than resenting what my hon. friend calls criticism, Mr. Chairman, I would say that he has advanced better than I did myself the reasons why there should be a film board or some central organization. When my hon. friend says that he approves the idea of one body—and I think he said this—being responsible for the distribution of films of an educational nature, for instance, which might be sent to the schools, and that sort of thing, he is presenting an argument for some central body to do this work.

Mr. STEVENS: You have it now.

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. STEVENS: Sure.

Mr. EULER: We do not have it now. I must differ with my hon. friend.

Mr. LAWSON: What does Mr. Badgley do now?

Mr. EULER: He produces films, as he is asked by others. As it is now, he receives requests from the various departments to produce certain films. That is practically all he does. He produces the films, but he has nothing to do with their initiation. That comes from the various departments.

The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) has suggested, in effect, that the Prime Minister should give instructions to the various departments to get together and to coordinate their efforts. That was carefully discussed in council, and the suggestion was made there that the whole organization and the complete preparation of films should be placed in one department. Since the film bureau is now in the Department of Trade and Commerce, it was suggested that it might all be placed under that department. But I will leave it to hon. members, and perhaps I should appeal particularly to those who have been members of a government: We will suppose the Minister of Trade and Commerce is in complete charge, that the Minister of Transport comes along and states he wants a certain film, and that the Minister of Mines and Resources states he wants some other film. All this has to pass the inspection and obtain the approval of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I say that ministers are human. They are just as jealous of their own rights in their own departments as are other people. I for one, as Minister of Trade and Commerce, would not like to be placed in the position of having to pass on the application for a picture by this colleague or by that colleague.

Mr. LAWSON: Why could it not go to the treasury board? An expenditure of money is involved.

Mr. EULER: From what I know of the treasury board—and I have been a member of it for seven or eight years—they have enough to do, without passing on films. This is a matter which does not seem to me to come under the purview of the treasury board.

The argument advanced by the hon. member for Royal is the one I have been trying to make, and possibly did not make as clearly as I should have. This will have the effect of concentration in one spot.

Then again, while I am not emphasizing the point I think it is of importance, and bears directly on what the hon. member for Kootenay East has said. He has commented on the fact that we now have items amounting to $150,000, whereas when he was in office the appropriation was only $50,000.

Mr. STEVENS: It was $40,000 in 1937.

Mr. EULER: It seems to me that goes to prove that the film has become a most powerful factor in the education of our people, and in publicity generally. I am not going to say here that there may not be some expansion, so far as expenditures are concerned, and quite justifiably so. But I would also say that I do not share the fear of the hon. member for Kootenay East, that this is going to expand into a large organization with a tremendous expense. I believe I can assure the committee that that will not take place.

As a matter of fact, as I said the other night the film board itself will not have any paid officials whatsoever. There will be only one paid official, namely the commissioner himself.

Mr. MacNICOL: Their expenses will be paid?

Mr. EULER: Yes, travelling expenses. May I point out that the fact that money must be voted by parliament indicates that there is a most complete control of expenditures. Unless money is voted, the board cannot spend it.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister say, if possible—and if not, would he bring the information down later—what other departments now operate anything in the nature of a motion picture branch, and what have been the appropriations in the last few years for each of those departments?

Mr. EULER: There is no other department which operates a film bureau.

Mr. STEVENS: But they have some activities in that respect.

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: What do they do?

Mr. EULER: Well, the Department of Fisheries may get out pictures; the parks branch may get out pictures; the Department of Agriculture has some, and I know in connection with tourist business the Department of Transport has some. There may be some others.

Mr. LAWSON: When the minister says "get out pictures," he does not mean that they make them?

Mr. EULER: No. There is only one film making organization in the government, and that is the motion picture bureau which is attached to the Department of Trade and Commerce. For instance, when the Minister of Transport gets out a film to illustrate the beauties of Canada, for purposes of tourist travel, he has it made either in our own department, by our own film bureau, or he may have some private film manufacturing organization make it for him. I believe he has done that in the past, and as I said the other night, there is nothing to prevent its being done again. We have to use our own well equipped film bureau for most of the government work, but it is provided in the bill that if the board is satisfied the work can be done better in some other way, by a private film organization, it may be done in that way, with the board's consent. But the board's consent must be obtained.

So far as the board is concerned, the purpose is that the various requests for films which come from the departments must be passed on by the central organization, in order to avoid overlapping and to make it more efficient. Then, later on, it must see to it that there is a better distribution than has been given by the various departments. And then—and I mention it again, because I think it is important, although I do not emphasize it—it is a direct or primary purpose of the bill that there should be some organization which could initiate what are sometimes called documentary films, but which I have called national films, or films which may be of use to the whole nation, or to the youth of the nation, in an educational way, and which would not be initiated by any one department, because each department has its own specialized work to do.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. MacNICOL: If it were allowed to initiate films, would that not increase the work of the motion picture bureau?

Mr. EULER: It might enlarge the work of the picture bureau. But if it is legitimate, and if the house votes money for a national purpose, then I see no reason why a moving picture bureau should not enlarge its activities. I do not see why it should enlarge the expense of the board itself. I do not see why the board ever should change in number, or why there should be any greater expense.

Mr. LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency): May I ask the minister if the bilingual nature of the country will be taken care of, especially in so far as explanations in the French language are concerned?

Mr. EULER: I should think if any of the departments wanted a film issued in bilingual form, there would be no reason why it should not be done.

Mr. LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency): I should not like to have any distributed in the province of Quebec without having them bilingual. I should like the minister to take note of that.

Mr. EULER: It would be in the hands of any minister who wished to distribute the film.

Mr. HAYHURST: I think the appointment of a commissioner would be an excellent idea because, as all hon. members know, visual instruction is important these days. Coordination of the work of the different departments could be brought about by a commissioner. But, in connection with a position as important as the one now in question, would the minister assure us that the appointment would be made because of efficiency and not because of political leaning?

Mr. EULER: I will give that assurance very freely.

Mr. SPENCE: What does the hon. member expect?

Mr. WALSH: I notice the word "commissioner" appears in the resolution. Would such commissioner have the same status as a commissioner of immigration or a commissioner of excise, and other officials of that kind?

Mr. EULER: If the hon. member is inquiring as to whether or not he would have the status of a deputy minister, I would say, no.

Mr. LAWSON: Would the minister suggest what functions the commissioner would perform other than those now being performed by Mr. Badgley of the motion picture bureau? I understood the minister to say that one of the objectives is to get better distribution than has been obtained heretofore. Conceivably that might be one reason. Can the minister suggest any other purpose for this higher salaried official—because that is what he would be—being superimposed on the top of the motion picture bureau we already have?

Mr. EULER: For the information of the hon. member may I point out that there is a section in the bill describing the duties of the commissioner.

Mr. LAWSON: But that does not mean much. However, I shall leave discussion of that point until the bill is introduced.

Mr. EULER: Possibly it would be better to discuss it then.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Euler thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 35, to create a national film board.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND PERIOD OF OPERATION OF ACT, ETC.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to extend the period of its operation and to vest in the minister authority to enter into certain agreements and to carry out and perform certain duties incidental to the operation of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Sir Eugene Fiset in the chair.

Mr. GARDINER: The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act was passed in 1935 under which an advisory committee was set up to advise the minister. Section 7 reads:

The governor in council may make such regulations as may be necessary or expedient for the effectual execution and working of this act and the attainment of the intention and objects thereof.

That is really the active part of the legislation. During the four or five years this act has been in operation we have found it necessary to do certain things by regulation which, now that the practice has been established, we think should be in legislative form. The act of 1935 set out that certain amounts were to be expended over a five year period. That period comes to an end this year, and the intention is to take the date out of the act in order to make it possible to continue activities under the prairie farm rehabilitation legislation. The practices which have been found necessary to be followed in order to carry out the intention of the act, and which will now be put in legislative form are, first, the entering into agreements with provinces, cities and other municipal bodies for the carrying on of activities within the province or the municipality; second, the acquiring of lands. Where we decide to flood areas we sometimes have to acquire land before it is done. Then, on occasion in connection with irrigation activities we have to acquire land, and also sometimes in the setting up of community pastures. Instead of basing our action on order in council, based upon regulation, we are asking for legislative authority to do it by order in council. The other provision has to do with the acquiring of machinery necessary to the carrying out of works, and the disposing of that machinery when we are through with it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): There are a number of matters I should like to discuss, but perhaps it would be better to leave them until the bill is before us in committee. I should like, however, to ask the minister if he can give us certain information now which would enable us to discuss this matter more intelligently when the bill is brought down. For instance, I have in mind what sums of money have been spent under the act, what projects have been undertaken, where they are located and their cost. If the minister had a table containing this information, perhaps he could place it on Hansard. If we had this information before us, I am sure it would save us asking a number of questions when the bill is brought down.

Mr. GARDINER: I have no information available to provide what has been suggested by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), that is, to indicate where these different works have been carried out and their number. I can say, however, that the first year the act was in operation $750,000 was voted, and to the best of my memory the amount expended was in the neighbourhood of $400,000. The next year $1,000,000 was voted and a little over $750,000 was expended. The year following $2,000,000 was voted and between $1,600,000 and $1,700,000 was expended. This past year $3,500,000 was voted, of which the greater part will have been expended before the end of March. I do not think there will be more than $100,000 remaining unexpended if there is that amount. The number of projects runs into the hundreds, and I am not sure that they do not run into the thousands. It would be impossible for me to enumerate them at the moment, but I can have the information brought down and placed on the table so that hon. members can discuss the matter in detail when the legislation is going through or on my estimates, which, after all, would give us the best opportunity.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I was not thinking so much of a list of all the projects; what I had in mind were the larger projects, and possibly the total number of dug-outs, the total number of dams, the total number of acres put under irrigation, the total number of community pastures set up, and so on. If the minister has not that information, perhaps he will have it available in committee.

Mr. GARDINER: I think most of that information has been made available already, either in answers to questions or in preparation of orders for return. If any orders have not been brought down, they will be tabled within a short time, in order to have them available before this legislation is discussed.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I have been watching for that information. If we can have it before the bill is brought down, we shall be able to discuss this matter much more intelligently.

Mr. GARDINER: I will see that that is done.

Mr. HANSELL: Will there be much difference between the present bill and the previous act, or is it just intended to extend the period of time?

Mr. GARDINER: The only amendment to the phraseology of the old act is to extend the period of time, and then three sections are being added to do under legislative authority what I suggested a moment ago had been done previously by regulation and order in council.

Mr. MacNICOL: Was all the money expended under this legislation provided by the federal government, or did the provinces and the municipalities subscribe anything?

Mr. GARDINER: All the money expended under this legislation was provided by the federal government.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Gardiner thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 36, to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

PENSION ACT

ABOLITION OF PENSION APPEAL COURT AND EXTENSION OF TIME FOR PENSION APPLICATIONS

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of Bill No. 6, to amend the Pension Act.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, to-night I am disappointed that the Minister of Pensions and National Health did not explain this bill because soldier legislation is of great interest to all members of the house and is hard to understand unless one has followed soldier problems closely. It must be particularly difficult for those members who are not veterans, and after all there are only about thirty-five members of this present parliament who served overseas. For these reasons I think the minister might have taken the time to explain to the house exactly what this bill purports to do.

Mr. POWER: He did on the resolution and first reading of the bill.

Mr. GREEN: It was not a long explanation.

Mr. POWER: I thought my hon. friends were intelligent enough to understand it.

Mr. GREEN: I am afraid the minister overestimated our intelligence.

Mr. POWER: He knows he did.

Mr. GREEN: The Pension Act is the charter of the veteran who was disabled on service, and of his dependents, but these amendments directly concern not only those veterans who are drawing pensions but also those who in the future will be able to prove that they have suffered disability as a result of their service.

This charter, the Pension Act, has been amended only once before by this parliament, and that was in 1936 at our first session. Then it was amended only after a most careful and searching investigation by a special committee on pensions and returned soldier problems. That special committee heard representations by soldier bodies; they heard evidence from departmental officials; they studied the bills which were placed before the house at that time; and they brought in a unanimous report in so far as amendments to the Pension Act were concerned.

That committee was composed practically entirely of veterans, and I think members on the other side of the house will agree with me when I say that we left politics outside the door of that committee and considered soldier problems on a non-partisan basis.

I suggest to the minister to-night that this could be done again now, and that it is greatly to be desired. I suggest that the same procedure be followed in regard to this pension bill we are now considering and also in regard to all the present-day returned soldier problems. I do not think it is fair to the returned soldiers of Canada that legislation of this type should be rushed through without being given due consideration, and I urge strongly to-night that this bill be sent to such a special committee because the bill does not meet the present situation. It does not meet obvious defects in our pension law, and now that the Pension Act is being opened up, all these defects should be remedied.

The bill does only two things. First of all, it abolishes the pension appeal court, and I think the government are to be commended for providing for its abolition. The last report of the Department of Pensions and National Health gives, at page 77, the figures of the findings of the pension appeal court during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1938, and we find these figures startling.

During that fiscal year the appeal court rendered 2,363 decisions on appeal. Of that number only nineteen appeals by veterans were granted, and twenty-three cases were sent back for rehearing. In other words, in about forty cases only out of over 2,300, the veteran either won his appeal or had a chance of gaining a pension on a rehearing. But against that, the crown, in other words the government, won seventeen appeals. There were seventeen crown appeals allowed as against nineteen appeals by the veterans across Canada, and there were sixteen crown cases sent back for rehearing. So that during the year the pension appeal court has not been of very great benefit; in fact, one might say it has been of no benefit at all, to the veterans of Canada.

Under this bill the appeal court is to be replaced by appeal boards of the pension commission. These appeal boards will take the place of the present quorums of the pension commission, and according to the bill are to consist of three members instead of two, which is the number making up the quorums at the present time. These new appeal boards will sit not in Ottawa alone, as is the case with the present appeal court, but in the different large centres of Canada. I think this is a splendid move because the boards will have the great advantage of seeing and hearing most of the applicants, and on the other side of the picture the applicants will have more confidence in these appeal boards than they have at the present time in a court which sits at Ottawa.

Another thing which is done by this bill No. 6—and I repeat that this bill touches only two problems—is that it extends the deadline for pension applications by veterans who served in a theatre of war, from January 1, 1940, to January 1, 1942.

For the benefit of those members who have not followed soldier legislation, there was no deadline prior to 1936. In that year when the Pension Act was amended, parliament set July 1, 1936, as the deadline for applications by veterans who served only in England or Canada, and January 1, 1940, as the deadline for the others, in other words, for the front line men. In respect of this latter class there was a discretion given to the pension commission to grant leave to apply for a pension even after the deadline had gone into effect. It will be found in the present section 12A, paragraph (b). Section 12A starts by saying that:

> A pension for disability of a member of the forces, shall not be awarded unless application therefor has been made—

Then follows paragraph (a), which provides for the man who did not serve in a theatre of war; paragraph (b), reads as follows:

> (b) before the first day of January, 1940, with respect to a member of the forces who saw service in a theatre of actual war, provided always that the commission may, in its discretion, with respect to this class, grant leave to have the application entertained after the first day of January, 1940.

At that time, in the committee which met in 1936, strong objection was taken to there being a deadline for the fighting men. I would point out to members of the house that each year it becomes more difficult for these veterans to prove their claims. They have to trace their disability back to the war, and each year it is more difficult to do that. The number of applications is dropping year after year; we find, for instance, that in the fiscal year 1934-35 there were 15,122 applications for pension; in the fiscal year 1935-36 that number had dropped to 11,216; in 1936-37 it fell to 11,096, and in the last year of which we have a record, the fiscal year 1937-38, the number was 10,450, or a further drop of 646 applications.

Then there is this fact to be remembered with regard to a deadline, that most of the applicants will be men who were actually wounded overseas. There are thousands and thousands of Canadians who were wounded overseas but are not yet drawing a pension.

From time to time they break down from their disabilities; and I do not think any additional restriction should be placed upon the opportunity of men of that type to get a pension. They should not have this additional handicap of being required first to go to the commission and convince it that it should exercise its discretion to allow them to apply for a pension. Such discretion may be exercised freely. It will depend a great deal on the members of the commission. But certainly the deadline means some restriction on the obtaining of a pension and I submit to this house that there should be no deadline for the fighting men.

Bill No. 6 extends it until after the next election; the deadline is extended to January 1, 1942, which means that the act will probably have to be reopened again in 1941.

Those are the two things which are done by this bill. But there are other defects in the Pension Act which Bill No. 6 does not touch at all. I have no doubt that practically every hon. member in this chamber to-night has run across cases of the classes I am going to recite.

First of all, under the present Pension Act, section 77, no pension is payable in respect of the child of a pensioner born after May 1, 1933. In other words, if a pensioner has children born before May 1, 1933, he draws an allowance for them until they are sixteen years of age; but if he has children born after that date he cannot draw any allowance for such children. That means there is a split family; the allowance is paid for some children and not for others. It also means discrimination as between the old and the young pensioners. I thought the position was very clearly set forth in a letter which I received a few weeks ago from a pensioner in British Columbia. He says:

> I am a disabled veteran sixty per cent, gun shot wounds leg and foot, three years five months in hospital, was married after 1933. Now I have two children. My last child was born without doctor or even nurse. I am healthy in body and mind. Now is it justice I should be penalized just because I was married after 1933. My wife has to go out selling laces from door to door.

There is no justice in that situation. There is no rhyme or reason for it, and if the people of Canada realized that such a situation existed, I do not believe they would stand for it.

Another defect in the present act is that no pension is payable in respect of the wife of a pensioner married on or after that same date, May 1, 1933. That again means discrimination, particularly as between the old and the young pensioner. The women married after that date deserve the allowance.

There is no justification for denying it. It would not open the way to deathbed marriages such as apparently occurred after the American civil war. It would not allow things like that to be done because the provision would apply not to a widow but only to the wife of a pensioner.

A third defect, probably the most serious of all, is that no pension after death is payable to the widow of a pensioner unless (1) he dies of his pensionable disability, or (2) was a pensioner drawing a pension of eighty per cent or over. I can best illustrate that situation in this way. Suppose a man is drawing a fifty per cent pension for a leg wound or any other disability: unless he dies of that disability his widow gets no pension. If he is unfortunate enough to be run over by a street-car his widow is just out of luck. Many of these widows of pensioners are in a desperate plight. There is little possibility of many pensioners providing for the proper care of their wives in the event of the husband's death, and I suggest that the Pension Act should be amended at this session. This matter should not be allowed to drift any longer. For example, the act might be amended to give the pension commission power in needy cases to pay the whole or at least a portion of the pension for death to the pensioner's widow. Under the present War Veterans' Allowance Act, which covers a class of men who cannot trace their disabilities to war service, the whole or at least a portion of the war veteran's allowance can be paid to the widow of the recipient for the period of a year. That is in section 9 of the act, which reads:

> After the death of any recipient an amount not exceeding the sum of twelve monthly instalments of the allowance which the recipient was receiving at the time of his death may, at the discretion of the board, be paid to his widow or for the benefit of any child.

Yet that cannot be done in the case of a pensioner. Unless the widow of a pensioner can show entitlement to pension for death, she cannot get any payment at all after her husband's death; she is just cut off and left to fend for herself.

A fourth defect in the present act—and I intend to refer this evening only to these four—has to do with nerve and mental cases. Medical members of the house will be glad to learn that this situation has been caused by medical experts. They have decided that many nerve or mental troubles are congenital defects; in other words, they are defects from birth and not caused by war service. For example, if a soldier has a bad nervous breakdown, under these medical findings it is because he was born to have it and not because of the alarms, the sufferings and the hardships of the war. Hence no pension is payable in many cases, in fact in far too many of these nerve cases. I cannot understand it; it is beyond me; it is a matter of medical opinion. But these pensions are withheld because of the way in which the Pension Act reads. I refer hon. members to section 11, subsection 1(b), which is as follows:

No deduction shall be made from the degree of actual disability of any member of the forces who has served in a theatre of actual war on account of any disability or disabling condition which existed in him at the time at which he became a member of the forces; but—

And it is always these "buts" which cause the trouble.

—no pension shall be paid for a disability or disabling condition which at such time was wilfully concealed, was obvious, was not of a nature to cause rejection from service, or was a congenital defect.

The trouble is that the doctors hold that these nerve troubles are a congenital defect. In 1936 we proposed an amendment to that section by adding these words, "of a nature other than mental, neuropathic or psychopathic," which I think would get over the difficulty. We could not, however, have that amendment accepted by the committee.

These are the main defects in the act. There may be others, and the whole act should be carefully reviewed and brought up to date now. Perhaps we could get finality if this were done, and it would not be necessary to tinker further with the act. Certainly every soldier in Canada will be glad when the act is finally brought to completion. Under the proposed bill No. 6, however, we cannot get finality, we cannot stop tinkering, simply because the bill as presented does not touch at all some of the most urgent problems facing the pensioners of Canada to-day, and facing those soldiers who, while they may not be drawing a pension now, will, as time goes on, be able to show that they are entitled to do so.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): The motion is for the second reading of the bill, some features of which I should like to discuss briefly. In view of the fact that this parliament has made provision for the veterans of the South African war to be placed within the four corners of the act, with the same privilege as is enjoyed by the veterans of the great war, with a pension of $20 monthly for single men or widowers and $40 for married men with wives, I am surprised to find that another deserving body of veterans are not included. I refer to those who served so admirably in the Northwest rebellion of 1885. Those were indeed critical days in the history of the west and of all Canada. Unfortunately there was a difference of opinion resulting in rebellion and military force became necessary. About 2,000 men went from Toronto, Ontario, and Nova Scotia and Quebec to the west, crossing lake Superior with the temperature at times at sixty degrees below zero or lower. Police Magistrate Colonel Dennison commanded the governor general's bodyguards. Among other excellent soldiers were the Queen's Own. General Pellatt, who formerly commanded the Queen's Own, took his battalion later to the diamond jubilee of Queen Victoria.

The Tenth Royal Grenadiers were also in that expedition to the west. These men suffered untold privations for the good of Canada, and they have had no pension all these years. Some of their sons and grandsons enlisted in the South African war and in the great war. The veterans of 1885 are getting up in years and many are suffering greatly to-day. Many are virtually nearly out on the streets. They want the same pensions as the South African veterans. It will not be very much.

The veterans of the Riel rebellion on their return received a small grant of land in the northwest, but as a matter of fact it was useless to them because they could do nothing with the property. It was situated in the northwest and they could not get transportation, so that the gift was practically worthless. The land was too far away to be looked after and the result was that they lost control of it. A great many of these men are in the cities and towns of Ontario, some in the maritime provinces and some in other Canadian cities. I once saw, when I was in the first form at school, a wonderful battalion in the old drill shed at the foot of Jarvis street. They were called the Haligonians from Halifax and were a splendid body of men. They were on their way home after the rebellion. Men in all parts of Canada responded as best they could to the call to duty for Canada at that time because it was doubtful whether the west would have developed as it has had not that action been taken. As I say, these men suffered untold privations, but saved Canada from being dislocated.

Last Friday I saw 200 veterans of the South African war at their annual banquet, and they were glad that parliament had at last done something to keep a few of them out of the poorhouse after waiting all these years for a pension. Had it not been for the veterans of the Riel rebellion, the militia units would not have been what they were when the South African war and the great war broke out. These veterans of 1885 now respectfully ask that the government place them on the same footing and terms, also conditions, as the South African veterans. There must be many South African veterans now living, over seventy years of age, who will come under the federal government's pension scheme. The veterans of 1885 are all over seventy years of age and they could apply for old age pension; but under this heading, if they so applied and they had a case which by extraordinary effort they were able to prove, it would be necessary for them to assign their property to the old age pension board, and if that property were sold or disposed of, the money so loaned would have to be repaid to the board out of the purchase money, which to a greater or less extent might cripple them.

The Ontario pension board would only pay the $20 monthly, with no further allowance for married men. Many of these men are suffering great hardships rather than come under the stigma and humiliation of accepting an old age pension.

It is eleven o'clock and I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—TABULAR STATEMENT OF TARIFF CHANGES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): With the consent of the house, I should like to lay on the table a tabular statement both in English and in French of tariff changes resulting from the Canada-United States trade agreement. This will be helpful to the committee.

Mr. MANION: Will it be distributed?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is for distribution to members of the house.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, March 10, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

FISHERIES ACT

BEAM TRAWLING—AMENDMENT RESPECTING VESSELS TO BE REGISTERED AND BUILT IN CANADA

Mr. J. J. KINLEY (Queens-Lunenburg) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 37, to amend the Fisheries Act, 1932.

[Mr. Church.]

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill contains an amendment to one of the qualifying paragraphs of the Fisheries Act which relates to licences for certain types of fishing. The effect of the measure I believe would be to prevent beam trawling as at present carried on.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SURVEY AND REGISTRATION OF EX-SERVICE MEN—ADJOURNMENT MOTION TO DISCUSS MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I desire leave to move the adjournment of the house to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the public announcement this date in the press and over the radio of a nation-wide survey and registration of ex-service men for the purpose of assisting the authorities in safeguarding the internal security of Canada under conditions of international tension, and the fact that there has been no pronouncement by the government as to whether official approval has been given the scheme, or whether present conditions warrant any partial registration for national service.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order with respect to the proposed resolution. May I say immediately that this has been a voluntary effort of cooperation—

Mr. HEAPS: That is not a point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am discussing whether or not it is a matter of urgent public importance, and I say immediately it is not. It has to do with a voluntary effort on the part of all ex-service men who have been for some time in Canada. They did approach the government with reference to this matter, and they were told that the information which would be available as a result of registration would be welcomed by the authorities. I fail to see how this attempt to anticipate what was to be a press release this evening can be regarded in any way as a matter of urgent public importance. I deprecate the attempt by anybody to play politics with the very noble efforts of the ex-service men of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MacNEIL: On the point of order, and discussing the question whether this is a matter of urgent public importance—

Mr. WALSH: Is there a point of order before the chair? Has the chair received that intimation?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am ready to give my decision, unless the hon. member wishes to speak.

Mr. MacNEIL: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker; I submit that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) has no right to impute motives.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. member has no right to take up the time of the house as he has.

Mr. MacNEIL: This announcement has had a profound effect throughout the country. The veterans have been criticized; and I think the government should explain the situation.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the motion before me; I have taken time to consider it, and I am ready to give my decision.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, before you give your decision,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think this section of the house is entitled to the same hearing that the minister received when he spoke. The minister did not raise a point of order; he explained the matter which the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) had raised. In view of what the minister has said, I think the hon. member for Vancouver North has a perfect right to state why he is raising this point in the house to-day.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I say a word as to the procedure which it seems to me should be adopted where it is the intention of an hon. member to move the adjournment of the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance? In previous sessions we have considered such matters, and it was generally understood that where a member proposed to bring forward a matter as being one of urgent public importance he should before coming into the house, submit it to the Speaker in order that his honour might have an opportunity to decide whether or not it was a matter of urgent public importance and thereby be in a position to give his opinion to the house as soon as the subject might be brought up. The question of deciding whether or not a matter is of urgent public importance rests entirely with the Speaker. I do not know if His Honour the Speaker was given this particular statement in advance, but I suggest that on future occasions when a step of this kind is contemplated the procedure be as I have outlined it, because I believe it is the procedure which would best suit the convenience of all hon. members of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Standing order 31 states:

(1) Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house (when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance) must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business (standing order 15) has been concluded and before notices of motion or orders of the day are entered upon.

(2) The member desiring to make such a motion rises in his place, asks leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, and states the matter.

(3) He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to the Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house.

I have just read the motion and in my opinion the matter to which it refers is not one of urgent public importance.

Mr. MacNEIL: With all deference, I object, and I ask hon. members supporting me to rise. I have the privilege under the rules of the house to appeal.

And more than five members having risen:

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I ask my hon. friend to read the rules and consider carefully whether there is an appeal from such a decision of the Speaker. This is not an ordinary ruling. It is a duty which devolves upon the Speaker to say whether in his opinion —not in any other opinion—the matter sought to be discussed is a matter of urgent public importance. I do not think there is any appeal to the house from the decision of the Speaker as to whether this is or is not a matter of urgent public importance.

Mr. MacINNIS: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Government notices of motions.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Orders of the day.

Mr. MacNEIL: The rule reads:

If objection is taken, the Speaker requests those members who support the motion to rise in their places and if more than twenty members rise accordingly, the Speaker calls upon the member who has asked for leave.

(4) If less than twenty, but not less than five, members rise in their places, the question whether the member has leave to move the adjournment of the house shall be put forthwith, without debate, and determined, if necessary, by a division.

I have stated my objection, and more than five members rose in their places.

Mr. SPEAKER: That may be the procedure if objection is taken when I put the motion. The Speaker is here to decide points of order, and the question referred to the house is not a point of order.

Mr. MacINNIS: I protest against this ruling. It is absolutely not in accord with the rules by which this house proceeds.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have rendered my decision and it cannot be questioned.

Mr. MacINNIS: But it is questioned. We appeal against your decision.

Mr. MacNEIL: With all deference I challenge your ruling.

Mr. MacINNIS: This has never been done in the house before.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak to this matter for a moment. I am not rising to support the hon. member (Mr. MacNeil), but with all due respect I think the hon. members to my left here are right. If five members rise, the Speaker then puts the question to the house. I may be wrong, but it seems to me that the rule is clear. It states:

He—

That is the member—

—then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to the Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house. If objection is taken, the Speaker requests those members who support the motion—

Objection has been taken by the minister and by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King).

—to rise in their places and if more than twenty members rise accordingly, the Speaker calls upon the member who has asked for leave.

I take it that twenty did not rise, but five did. The next paragraph says:

If less than twenty, but not less than five, members rise in their places, the question whether the member has leave to move the adjournment of the house shall be put forthwith, without debate, and determined, if necessary, by a division.

Under my reading of the rule, the hon. members are right in their request.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): On this new point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. What my hon. friend has read applies to what takes place after the Speaker has stated that he thinks the motion is in order. Paragraph 3 of standing order 31 covers the action taken after the Speaker has accepted the motion, after he has expressed the opinion that it is in order. The rule reads:

He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to the Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house. If objection is taken—

And so on. All that my hon. friend has read happens after the Speaker has stated that he thinks the motion for adjournment is in order. When he thinks it is not in order, that aspect of the matter ends then and there. Now, as to an appeal from the ruling, standing order 12 reads:

Mr. Speaker shall preserve order and decorum, and shall decide questions of order, subject to an appeal to the house without debate.

This is not a question of order which has been raised, and there is no appeal from the decision of the Speaker. Under standing order 31 Mr. Speaker is simply asked to state whether he thinks the matter should be submitted to the house. There is no appeal. There is no point of order there.

Mr. MacINNIS: There is.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): He gives an opinion; he states whether the matter should be submitted to the house.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): On the point of order, standing order 31, paragraph 3 reads:

He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to the Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order and of urgent public importance, reads it out—

I would point out that your honour has read it out, and by doing that recognizes it as being a matter of urgent public importance.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The Speaker did not read it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Speaker read it to himself, he did not read it out.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with I would ask the Prime Minister if this scheme has met with the approval of the government.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I must say to my hon. friend that I do not know what scheme he means. I have not seen any scheme. If my hon. friend will put his question on the order paper I shall try to answer it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie)? The Prime Minister did not have any knowledge of the matter referred to by my colleague (Mr. MacNeil), but apparently, judging from his remarks of a few moments ago, the Minister of National Defence did. May I ask him whether the subject matter of that plan has been approved by him, by his department and the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think I have answered that question already, but if the hon. member desires any fuller information and will place a question on the order paper, I shall be only too happy to accommodate him.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CREATION OF DEFENCE PURCHASING BOARD TO ENTER INTO CONTRACTS FOR MUNITIONS, EQUIPMENT, MATERIALS AND SUPPLIES

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish a defence purchasing board with exclusive power, subject to approval of the governor in council, to enter into all contracts for the purchase of munitions, equipment, materials and supplies required by the Department of National Defence in cases where the expenditure exceeds $5,000; to provide safeguards to assure that such munitions, equipment, materials and supplies shall be purchased at a reasonable cost to the government and without unreasonable profit to any manufacturer or supplier thereof; to provide that salaries, wages and other expenses of the board shall be payable out of moneys appropriated by parliament.

To authorize the governor in council to borrow such sums of money as may be required to pay expenditures of the Department of National Defence which are chargeable to capital account in the appropriations provided by parliament for the said department; and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to retire in ten years the said sums borrowed for capital expenditures of the said department, together with interest thereon at three per cent per annum.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think this is one of the most important resolutions that have come before the attention of this house during this or any previous session. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, it might be of interest and of benefit to every hon. member of this house if I be permitted to traverse some of the historical background of the efforts that have been made in peace and in war to meet this urgent problem of the control of munitions supplies. I proceed immediately, sir, to some of the efforts that were made in Great Britain in the years between 1914 and 1918 to deal with this question.

I cite first The Munitions of War Act of 1915, introduced into the British House of Commons by the Right Hon. David Lloyd George, which gave the government control over labour relations in the armament industry and provided for the limitation of profits in establishments which were producing munitions. The average net profits earned in the two years immediately prior to the war were taken in that act as the basis of computation, and profits exceeding by one-fifth the average for the preceding two years were taxed at the rate of one hundred per cent. In Great Britain at that time they also had an excess profits tax which applied to all industries with certain exemptions. The average profits earned in the years prior to the war were ascertained, and profits exceeding by more than $1,000 (£200) the pre-war average profit, were taxed at the rate of fifty per cent.

Then leaving the war years, and coming down to the year 1937, hon. members of this house will recall that the present Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Right Hon. Neville Chamberlain, then chancellor of the exchequer, introduced in Great Britain what is known as the national defence contribution. Although the provisions of that legislation were drastically modified after its introduction, there is still a special tax under the legislation on the profits of all trades or businesses over a five-year period, at the rate of five per cent in the case of corporations, and four per cent in all other cases. When the profit does not exceed $10,000 (£2,000) the tax does not apply. There are, of course, some modifications and exemptions.

I come now, sir, across the Atlantic to legislation adopted in the republic to the south of us, and I refer to the Vinson Act of the United States, passed in 1934, and applying only to the United States navy. Under this legislation no contract may be made by the Secretary of the Navy unless the contractor agrees to pay into the treasury, profits in excess of ten per cent of the contract price. Should the contractor fail to pay the treasury department levies a tax of the amount which should have been paid under the agreement. This does not apply to contracts or subcontracts of less than $10,000.

In the United States they also have an excess profits tax, which is a general tax, and profits are calculated as a percentage of the existing and declared value of the capital stock, and the rates fixed are as follows: On profits in excess of 10 per cent and not in excess of 15 per cent, the rate of tax is 6 per cent; on profits in excess of 15 per cent, the rate of tax is 12 per cent.

Mr. MANION: May I ask if the figures the minister has just given apply to all profits, or just to profits on munitions contracts?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It refers to a general tax.

I come back now to the war years in the Dominion of Canada, and will briefly mention the various pieces of legislation that were passed by the parliament of Canada and the steps taken by the government of Canada at that time to meet the very perplexing problem of profits during the years of the war.

On May 8, 1915, an order in council was passed establishing the war purchasing commission, consisting of three members. This commission was given the power generally to make all contracts for the purchase of materials of war and supplies of every kind, and for transportation, payable out of the War Appropriation Act of 1915. The largest part of the work of this commission concerned the purchase of supplies for the Canadian expeditionary force. The order in council sets forth certain provisions relating to the constitution of the board and the rules governing its procedure. For example, no contract could be made by the commission except under a requisition made upon it by the department concerned; and it might be noted, sir, in contrast to the legislation to be introduced consequent upon the resolution now under consideration and discussion, that the war purchasing commission did not require the approval of the governor in council for proposed contracts, although the council did authorize the release of funds and certain specific purchases. That is to say, sir, that so long as the War Appropriation Act gave authority for a certain expenditure and upon requisition of the department concerned, the commission had the power to proceed forthwith to enter into a contract. The commission was instructed that as far as practicable tenders should be obtained and contracts given at the lowest price offered.

Another order in council was passed on February 6, 1918. This extended the functions of the war purchasing commission to cover supervision of all purchases made by all the departments of government and not merely purchases under war appropriation acts. The board did not actually do the buying itself for all the departments, but exercised a supervisory authority over the letting of contracts and the making of purchases.

In September, 1918, the war purchasing commission recommended to the Prime Minister the establishment of a permanent purchasing commission centralizing in one office all buying for the public service. The bill was introduced into the house but was later withdrawn. The war purchasing commission ceased to function on July 1, 1920.

One word with reference to the Business Profits War Tax Act. It was introduced in 1916, and it established the following principle: that profits were to be calculated on the basis of the paid up capital stock. The measure levied a tax of twenty-five per cent on the profits of corporations in excess of seven per cent and on the profits of individuals in excess of ten per cent. In 1917 an amendment stiffened the tax rates and at the same time introduced the principle of graduation. It provided for a tax of fifty per cent on profits between fifteen and twenty per cent and a tax of seventy-five per cent on profits in excess of twenty per cent. In 1920 the tax was moderated considerably. The following is a schedule of the rates introduced at that time:

Below Per cent	Rate of tax Per cent
10	None
10 to 15	20
15 to 20	30
20 to 30	50
30 and over	60

The Business Profits War Tax Act as then formulated expired on December 31, 1920.

I think for the information of hon. members I might cite two extracts from these two guiding orders in council, in order that we may have an appreciation of the idea which underlay at that time the formation of these purchasing commissions. I refer to P.C. 1033 of 1915. The order in council was recommended by the Prime Minister of the day, and paragraph 13 reads as follows:

> The commission may make report to the Prime Minister from time to time in reference to any matter within the scope of its duties as herein outlined, with any recommendations the commission may see fit to make; and the governor in council and the Prime Minister may require from the commission a report in regard to any of such matters.

The Purchasing Commission of Canada was created by P.C. 1561 on July 12, 1920. This order in council was also recommended by the Prime Minister, and paragraph 10 reads as follows:

> The commission may make report to the Minister of Finance from time to time in reference to any matter within the scope of its duties as herein outlined with any recommendations the commission may see fit to make, and the governor in council and the Minister of Finance may require from the commission a report in regard to any such matters.

May I say in passing that this followed the soundly established practice of Great Britain, where financial contracts are always subject to the review of the treasury.

Mr. STIRLING: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Was the commission that he has been describing answerable in the first place to any definite minister?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes; one was answerable to the Prime Minister, and the other to the Minister of Finance. They reported in the one case to the Prime Minister and in the other case to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MANION: To complete the record: has the minister the names of the personnel of the commissions to which he refers?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not at the moment. I will get that for my hon. friend.

I come now to the purpose of the resolution, and that is the establishment of a defence purchasing board. As hon. gentlemen will observe, there are in the resolution three fundamental features and three cardinal principles. The first is the setting up of a defence purchasing board. The second is the establishing of a basis of profit limitation upon defence contracts. The third is arranging for the financing of certain expenditures over a period of ten years with the carrying charges against ordinary accounts.

In presenting this resolution to the house, I conceive it to be my duty to review, as I have already in part reviewed, the history of the efforts which have been made and the principles established in reference to defence department purchases, and to review as far as I can in all fairness the various viewpoints and see how far we can go to establish the approach to identity of aim and unity of purpose.

In 1937 my hon. friend the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Woodsworth) moved a resolution in this house. One part of the three point resolution read as follows:

> That at no time should Canadian citizens be permitted to make profits out of supplying war munitions or materials.

That resolution was defeated by this House of Commons on February 4, 1937. I should like again to place on the record some of the observations made by my right hon. leader the Prime Minister in the course of that debate:

> I share the hon. member's abhorrence of anything in the nature of profiteering. I cannot imagine a more contemptible means of seeking to make one's fortune than by doing so at the expense of the lives of others. . . .
> If there are to be no profits, I cannot think of any way in which industry can be carried on other than by its complete nationalization. . . . The choice lies between state monopoly and private industry, or partly the one and partly the other. . . .
>
> Guns and shot and powder are not the only materials required for war. They are not the only materials that present a temptation in the matter of profits when war occurs. . . .
> Are all these things to be procured only under a government owned and controlled system which will not permit of profits being made? All that could result from a policy of that sort, if it were possible, would be the creation of a non-profit socialist island inside a competitive economy. But I doubt very much if we could get that far in Canada in a great many years, and, even if we did, whether it would be a good thing for the country. . . . I am afraid that for a long time to come we would not recover what in the interval we had lost in the way of individual intitative and freedom. . . .
> Government manufacture may be desirable in regard to certain kinds of essential supplies which we require continuously.
> I think private industry, where it is engaged in the manufacture of munitions and war materials, has to be watched closely to see that excessive profits are not made. . . .
> We should seek most carefully to control private industry, but I cannot see how, in a system of competitive industry, you can totally eliminate the possibility of some profit being made. As hon. members of the house know, there is a great variety of special articles required as war supplies and equipment. It would be going much too far not to expect these to be obtained at least in part from private concerns which would expect to make some profit. Where, however, private industry is permitted to undertake the manufacture of munitions and war supplies, I believe there should be very strict government supervision. All contracts should contain provisions which will ensure that there will be no opportunity for other than a reasonable profit. I may tell my hon. friend that this whole matter has been given very careful consideration by the government. So far as any contracts with which we may have anything to do are concerned, every effort will be made to prevent anything in the nature of undue profits being secured by those who obtain the contracts.

May I say that those who affect the socialist philosophy of government know very well—and I do not say this critically—that profits are made out of raw materials as well as out of the completely manufactured weapon. They know that the requirements of armed forces are not confined to weapons and munitions. Those requirements include every commodity produced by the industry of the country.

Perhaps I might analyse the point of view of hon. members of the National Conservative party, and if my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) does not mind I should like to refer to an address which he delivered in Toronto on December 15, in which he made some observations that were reported by the Canadian press. If they are not correct I am sure the hon. gentleman will immediately correct them. If the report is correct, however, he appeared in that address to advocate in the first place, in the manufacture of arms and munitions for Canada, government control and elimination of profits, and in the second place, in the manufacture of arms and munitions in Canada for the United Kingdom, the control of profits, presumably by the Canadian government. This address, I must admit at once, was reported by indirect narration and it is regrettable that the exact language was not quoted in full. However, I have not seen any correction of this press report and therefore I must take it that, if the hon. gentleman does not correct it, it is accurate.

Mr. MANION: I accept the report largely, except that I did add that I had an open mind—I do not remember my precise words—in regard to the working out of this scheme; and I pointed out as well that, owing to the fact that a large capital investment would have to be made in connection with the manufacturing of munitions, the matter would probably require further consideration. I added something to that effect.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I was not finding fault with what the hon. member had said; I was merely wondering whether the report was accurate. May I quote from the report? The introductory paragraph of the press report reads as follows:

All arms and munitions needed for the direct defence of Canada should either be manufactured by the government itself, or under the complete control of the government, with profits eliminated, the Honourable R. J. Manion..... said to-night.

That was in indirect narration. The later paragraph, apparently covering the same subject matter, was as follows:

Doctor Manion said he offered government control and elimination of profits as an alternative to complete nationalization of armament manufacture because—

And then they quote the hon. gentleman:

"I don't like to see the governments getting too much into business and because of the large capital expenditures complete government manufacture might involve."

The meaning to be attached to the phrase "elimination of profits" is somewhat obscured, in my judgment at least, by another sentence in which the hon. gentleman is reported in direct narration as follows:

"These proposals are fair because they leave plenty of opportunity for private enterprise."

And then he is quoted again as follows:

"There should be complete control of profits in the manufacture of arms and munitions of all kinds for the United Kingdom."

Again, not speaking critically, I suggest that my hon. friend appears to advocate the elimination of profits with respect to Canadian munitions orders, and the control of profits by the Canadian government with regard to United Kingdom orders placed in Canada. May I say at once that unless the government of Canada, as a matter of policy, refused to permit any contracts between the British government and Canadian industry, I doubt very much how far their power of regulation would go, except in so far as we have powers under section 290 of the Customs Act with reference to the export of arms.

The Canadian government, in my opinion, has no status unless it assumes its complete rights to supervise or regulate the terms of contracts between the British government and industries in Canada, and of course it is necessary to get permission under the Department of National Revenue. I am subject to correction, but it appears to me, from the reference in the Toronto speech by the leader of the opposition to war-time conditions, that his argument was not fully developed in the press reports. He may have contemplated, as the government has very definitely contemplated, that different conditions should prevail with regard to the control of industry in peace time and in war time.

In the first place, he has said that nationalization might be too costly; and secondly, he is for the elimination of profits. I should rather think that what he had in mind was the elimination of excessive or unfair profits and not the elimination of profits, as reported in that address.

May I now proceed to consider for a moment remarks made by my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) as reported in Hansard of April 2, 1937, at page 2501:

For some months past an interdepartmental committee has been going very carefully into the whole question of the control of profits, with respect to munitions of war. . . . The line upon which we have been proceeding is to attempt to draw a distinction between war materials produced in times of peace, and what may be necessary in times of war. Unquestionably, special legislation would be required in times of war.

In the third place, although he has now left us, I should like to quote the opinions of the very distinguished leader of the opposition of last year, the then right hon. member for Calgary West. Speaking in the same debate, in reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), Mr. Bennett said:

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre dealt with the question of profits made out of war. I have made many inquiries on this subject, as no doubt he has. The business profits war tax in Great Britain, for instance, was a considered method of dealing with the problem of war profits.....

After very careful consideration of the whole matter by committees and by business men, Mr. Lloyd George expressed himself as being strongly of the opinion that the best method was to let the manufacturers make all the money they could, and then take it away from them by taxation. ....

The contention of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is that all money made from war should belong to the state. That was the general principle which was in the mind of the British government, and the principle which Sir Thomas White adopted here after it had been in operation in Great Britain.....

The question of maintaining the industrial life of a country during war as distinguished from its purely war activities is one which, as the Prime Minister said, is not as simple as it looks; on the contrary, it is extremely complex, for certain types of industry through the expenditure of small sums of money can be made available for producing war materials, yet that work dislocates and in some instances destroys the normal business of the enterprise. It was that fact, I believe, which was the determining factor that caused the government to proceed in the way that it did, rather than by nationalization of the whole effort in the manner advocated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who would be glad to see it accomplished because it means socialization of industry. It is a problem which is easier to talk about than to solve...

The reason which led to the enactment in Great Britain of a business profits war tax was that it first encouraged industry to develop to the *n*th power and then took away from it practically the entire amount of profits referable to the war.

We did not carry it to the same extent, but we did apply the principle.

I should like next to refer to the voluminous report of the British royal commission on the private manufacture of and trading in armaments. In part 7, chapter 12, the conclusions and recommendations of that commission are summarized as follows:

1. The most effective available means of removing or minimizing the objections to the private manufacture of and trade in arms would be the limitation of arms by international agreement.

2. The establishment of a universal system of state monopoly of the manufacture of arms is likely to be impracticable and in present conditions the promotion of general state monopoly should not be a part of the policy of this country.

3. The abolition of the private industry in the United Kingdom and the substitution for it of a system of state monopoly may be practicable; but it is undesirable. No sufficient case has in our opinion been made out for taking so drastic a step. We believe that the reasons for maintaining the private industry outweigh those for its abolition. We are of opinion that the necessities of imperial defence cannot be effectively met, in existing conditions, except by the maintenance in peace time of a system of collaboration between the government and the private industry of the country in the supply arms and munitions.

4. We are of opinion that this country should continue to promote and encourage the adoption of measures for the international regulation and control of the manufacture of and trade in arms. We believe that the proposals to this end recently submitted to the League of Nations by the government of the United States afford a basis on which agreement might be reached.

5. We recommend that the government should assume complete responsibility for the arms industry in the United Kingdom and should organize and regulate the necessary collaboration between the government and private industry; that this responsibility should be exercised through a controlling body, presided over by a minister responsible to parliament, having executive powers in peace time and in war time over all matters relating to the supply and manufacture of arms and munitions, costing and the authorization of orders from abroad.

6. We recommend that measures be taken to restrict the profits of armament firms in peace time to a reasonable scale of remuneration, designed not only to prevent excessive profits, but to satisfy the public that they do so.

7. We are of opinion that the problems involved in formulating plans for the conscription of industry in war time will have to be faced, and should be faced without delay.

8. We are of opinion that the administration of the system of licensing exports of arms should be governed by an outlook different from and more positive in character than that which now prevails; that licences should be granted only to such firms as shall have been specifically authorized to accept orders for export by the controlling body already recommended; that the grant of licences should be restricted to orders by foreign governments, supported by import licences issued by those governments which shall state that the goods will not be re-exported.

We recommend that the practice of issuing open general licences for the export of certain classes of arms, etcetera, be discontinued, that specific licences be required in all cases, and in particular that rigid control be exercised over all exports of aircraft, whether classified as military or civil.

9. We recommend the complete cessation of the private export trade in surplus and second-hand arms and munitions of war.

Then chapter 9 of part 5 is headed: "Taking the profit out of war":

135. The complete removal of the profit motive from private industry is in our opinion neither necessary nor desirable . . . but it is our opinion that measures ought to be taken to restrict the profits of armament firms in peace time to a scale of reasonable remuneration . . . and we believe that if the firms' profits were so limited little would remain of the objections to the continuance of the private industry that are felt by a large section of the public.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the minister now referring to private industry manufacturing war munitions, or to all industry?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am quoting from the official report of the royal commission in Great Britain.

Mr. MacNICOL: But it refers to what, to private industry manufacturing war munitions, or to all industry?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): To munitions entirely.

136. We do not propose to undertake the task of formulating specific methods for the restriction of profits in peace time. No doubt it is fraught with technical difficulty.

137. We do not think it would be sufficient for the purpose we have indicated to insure that the defence departments are themselves satisfied that the profits allowed to private manufacturers under particular contracts are fair and reasonable. Nor do we believe that a measure of taxation, such as the excess profits tax which was enforced during and after the last war will prove satisfactory to meet the essential object in view . . . It should, in our opinion be an essential characteristic of whatever system of control be adopted that, while providing reasonable remuneration on a scale sufficient to insure the cooperation of private industry in the service of imperial defence, it shall be such as shall prevent excessive profit and at the same time satisfy the public that it does so.

138. But the control of profits in peace time is not enough.

139. We believe that if it were known that in the event of this country being involved in a major war, industry generally would be conscripted, and that everyone in the country would be required at once to put himself at the service of the state, a considerable part of the objection to the private manufacture of arms would disappear. If the state could choose the staff they wished to keep in industry and those they required to join the forces, and if, in addition, everyone from the head of a business down were given similar positions and pay, according to the work they were doing, to those serving in the forces, it would make it still more unlikely for those engaged in supplying the requirements of the state in peace time to agitate for war.

Just one or two comments on these various paragraphs. With reference to paragraph 136, it is to be noted that even the British royal commission, after extensive study, did not undertake to recommend specific methods for the restriction of profits in peace time, neither did the United States senate committee. Both commissions went on record, as would the ordinary man on the street, to the effect that profits on the production of peace time requirements of departments of defence should be restricted. The British royal commission considered that the practice was fraught with technical difficulty. With regard to the specific problem that has confronted the Department of National Defence, neither of these two formidable inquiries produced concrete suggestions that were of assistance to the minister or the government or departmental officers. What has been accomplished has been done as a result of the foresight of the government itself and the earnest devotion of the public officials who had to deal with the problem.

With reference to paragraph 137, it is suggested that it is not enough for the defence departments themselves to be satisfied that profits allowed are fair. This was recognized in Canada when steps were taken to set up an interdepartmental finance committee to consult with and advise the department on this very problem. Since early in 1937, all contracts placed other than those where competitive bids were available, have been taken up with the interdepartmental committee; all possible advice and suggestions from that committee have been obtained for the guidance of the department, and valuable suggestions emanating from the committee have found their way into the text of the contracts let.

With reference to paragraph 137, the last sentence refers to the necessity of assuring the public that excessive profits are prevented; and this was the desire and policy of this government. At the last session more than one offer was made to refer all these contracts for complete analysis by the standing committee on public accounts, and when public controversy developed in regard to one contract, only two or three days elapsed before a royal commission was established to ensure that all the facts were made available to the public of Canada.

In regard to paragraph 139, the royal commission here calls for a declaration that more drastic regulation will be enforced in time of actual war, holding that if this were done a considerable part of the objection to the private manufacture of arms would disappear. The Prime Minister emphasized the same point, speaking in this house on April 2, 1937, as reported at page 2501 of Hansard. He said:

> The line upon which we have been proceeding is to attempt to draw a distinction between war materials produced in times of peace and what may be necessary in times of war. Unquestionably special legislation would be required in time of war.

Then, in regard to the general argument with reference to private manufacture of armaments—and I am not stating my own opinions here—may I point out that appendix No. 1 of the British royal commission's report summarizes the arguments of those who are in favour of retaining private manufacture. They say:

> It has been claimed,—
> (1) That to prohibit private manufacture would deprive the country of an essential part of its war potential which could not be entirely made good in other directions even were the country prepared to face the considerable additional expense that would be involved;
> (2) That under the existing system reserve equipment is maintained by the private firms and a reserve of skilled labour is available that can be utilized immediately to augment existing supplies of war material on an outbreak of war;
> (3) That the export trade maintained by the private firms in peace time provides a reserve for war purposes and meanwhile reduces the overhead cost of reserve maintenance;
> (4) That nationalization of armament production would involve the government in responsibility for the maintenance of this reserve, a reserve moreover which, under national ownership, would be largely maintained in idleness having regard to the objections that would be raised against the entry of the government into an export trade in armaments or the manufacture of alternative non-armament products in competition with private industry;

(5) That maintenance of reserve manufacturing capacity by the government would be costly even making allowance for the fact that under the existing system the government already pay for it, to some extent in the prices paid to the armament firms and by reason of certain direct subsidies paid to ensure the maintenance of plant which could not otherwise be maintained by the private firms;

(6) That maintenance of reserve capacity by the government would still not ensure the availability of the essential reserve of skilled labour which the private firms are able to retain by the utilization of their employees on export orders and non-armament work;

(7) That in many branches of armament work, e.g., in the chemical and aircraft industries, experience gained on civilian work of a similar category is beneficial; and

(8) That to deprive the aircraft firms of experience in the manufacture of military aircraft would prejudicially affect the development of civil aircraft.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Before the minister goes on, may I ask what statement he has read? Is it the statement of the British war office?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is appendix I of the British royal commission's report.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): And is the minister reading it because he supports it, or agrees with it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No—and I distinctly said so. I am trying to give the two sides of the case as fairly as I possibly can.

I now come to the report of the United States senate committee. As I mentioned in a former debate in the house, the majority report was for the extension of the principle of nationalization. It recommended the nationalization of manufacture of certain large items. But there was a very strong minority report as well. I wish briefly to place it on record, as well as the general findings of the majority of the United States senate committee.

The committee minority (Senators George, Vanderberg and Barbour), supporting all other findings of the committee, questions the complete nationalization of certain defence commodities, because it doubts the advantage from the standpoint of

(1) its effect upon disarmament,

(2) its effect upon essential national defence, and

(3) its effect upon government costs. The committee minority believes that if large government plants are erected to provide these commodities, there will be inevitable local, political pressure to maintain these plants at full capacity production regardless of actual defence needs, and the result will be to encourage armament rather than disarmament. The committee minority believes that if all production be thus concentrated in government plants, furthermore, there will be no adequate corrolary reliance, through private manufacture, in the event of a war emergency unless the nationalized facilities are maintained at a needlessly extravagant and dangerous rate during peace time.

The committee minority believes, on the other hand, that unless these facilities are kept on a full-time production basis during peace years, the unit cost of production will increase to a point which will create higher costs to the government than would be available through normal, private purchase. This could be another impulse to armament rather than disarmament through anxiety to maintain maximum arms production in order to maintain minimum costs. In other words, the committee minority believes that the public welfare, from the standpoint of peace, defence, and economy, can be better served by rigid and conclusive munitions control than by nationalization except in a few isolated instances.

That was the minority report of the United States senate committee.

I come now to the committee set up in Canada by the present government. It was known as the Skelton committee, and was under the direction of one of the ablest and most brilliant civil servants in any country of the world to-day. That committee had before it, in the first place, the report of the royal commission in Great Britain, secondly the report of the United States senate committee, to which I have just referred, and, thirdly, information with respect to the difficulties already experienced at that time by the Department of National Defence, and special measures already taken by that department in connection with the problem.

May I at this point refer briefly to the findings of the Skelton committee. In the first place, with reference to the placing of the manufacture of armaments in the hands of the state, it said:

1. The committee are unable to support such a proposal as being practicable under present conditions in Canada. Whether, putting aside the idea of a complete state monopoly, there might be a case for some moderate extension of present government arsenals, in order to produce, e.g., a certain limited selection of articles for which the government would be the only purchaser and might need a continuous supply, and for which no private manufacturing equipment now exists in Canada—is a matter which the government might wish to consider as a matter of policy.

Mr. STIRLING: What committee is this?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The committee set up by the Prime Minister in January of 1937, and presided over by Doctor Skelton.

Mr. STEVENS: Was it known as the interdepartmental committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No. This was the committee which recommended the formation of the committee we now know as the interdepartmental committee. It was a committee set up primarily to discuss the theories and general principles of profits control.

Mr. GREEN: Could that report be tabled?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Certainly; I see no objection to its being tabled. It was part of the evidence taken before the Davis inquiry. I see no reason why it should not be placed on the table of the house—in fact, I am informed it has already been tabled. It continues:

2. It is considered impossible to generalize a rule or rules of conduct in statutory form.

That is in reference to legislation.

The range of articles needed for the forces is so wide, that to attempt such legislation, would amount to an attempt to regulate the profits of a great part of the ordinary industry of the country. The problem appears to be essentially an administrative one.

The control of profits and prevention of excess can, it is believed, be most effectively sought by means of appropriate administrative practice on the part of the departments responsible for the placing of government contracts and orders involved in the defence program.

Where a really competitive market exists, the practice long pursued of calling for competitive tenders, appears to afford an effective safeguard against undue profits. For special articles, or work where the government will be the only or the main purchaser, other methods are required. In the one or two contracts of this type which have recently been placed, the Department of National Defence have taken special steps to guard against unreasonable profits arising.

This is early in 1937.

(3) Re special contracts: While the committee do not believe that any single hard and fast rule can be laid down, it is reasonable to assume that by careful study certain useful financial principles and safeguards might be evolved for each type of contract which may arise. It is suggested that there be instituted a standing interdepartmental financial committee to assist the officials charged with the placing of contracts under the defence program, the committee to be representative of the contracting departments and the Departments of Finance and National Revenue, and others, if considered desirable.

Such a committee might study and classify the requirements of the defence program from the financial point of view, and formulate and advise upon the financial principles or safeguards to be observed in placing contracts of various types, and as to rules of procedure. It might also be available for consultation upon the financial aspects of any unusual specific cases or conditions arising from time to time. It would be limited to this function of assisting in the prevention of undue profits.

Re Special considerations. The commissioner of income tax attached a separate report dealing with certain technical provisions, recommending that as a result of certain defects in the Business Profits War Tax Act of the last war, certain precautionary measures, with regard to capitalization and set-up of companies receiving armament contracts, be taken.

[Mr. Ian Mackenzie.]

The committee recommended that there be referred to the interdepartmental committee,

(a) Mr. Elliott's special recommendations.

(b) The advisability of inserting in all contracts not awarded through competitive tendering, a stipulation granting to government inspectors or auditors, complete access to the contractors' books and records.

(c) The extent to which costing principles established in government arsenals or factories might be effective, in facilitating the control of the costs and profits of private manufacturers.

Re Publicity. The committee believe it important not only to ensure that contractors will be limited to reasonable profits, but also to satisfy the public that safeguards in this sense are being provided. It is, therefore, suggested that on some appropriate occasion, the House of Commons be informed in this regard.

Just a comment or two on these findings. As suggested in No. 1, the government is making the maximum use of its own arsenal plants. I say that deliberately. The advice given me by the officials of the Department of National Defence and by the highest ranking officers, those who are in favour of the principle of public ownership, in regard to the development of the Lindsay arsenal is that until we proceed with the filling group and the ammunition group at Valcartier, until we have made Quebec available, we should not proceed with the development of the Lindsay arsenal as planned for the manufacture of small arms ammunition. It must be kept in reserve. However, since this government came into office the production of our necessities at the arsenals at Quebec and Valcartier has been increased by four, six or seven times. We have made a modest beginning at the arsenal at Lindsay and it is my fervent desire that as soon as possible we should proceed with the further development of the facilities at Lindsay.

Mr. McNEVIN: Did the minister subscribe fully to the suggestion of the committee that the further development of the Lindsay arsenal be not proceeded with until the filling group at Valcartier had been gone ahead with?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not pretend to be an expert on military affairs. That information was given to me by the highest ranking officers, and naturally I accepted their opinion at the time. I say this to my hon. friend, that the production of small arms and ammunition has been increased so much in the other arsenals at our disposal that in my judgment the old objections with regard to Lindsay have disappeared completely.

The second conclusion of the Skelton committee, that the problem must be solved by administrative means, appears to coincide with the conclusion of the British royal commission, which admitted that the problem was fraught with difficulty. The problem is a new one, at least so far as Canada is concerned, and we can hope for progress only by experience. The department welcomes every constructive suggestion, but those emanating from outside the department have so far not been very constructive.

With regard to the third suggestion, the interdepartmental committee was set up and has cooperated with the department for the past two years. In that time this committee has passed upon contracts totalling in the neighbourhood of $10,000,000. In regard to the fourth suggestion, Mr. Fraser Elliott's recommendation that the capitalization of companies be closely watched, this is reflected in the provisions of one contract which restrain the company from selling shares without the consent of the minister. This is the first time in the history of Canada that any such provision has been incorporated in a government contract. With regard to No. 5, which dealt with publicity, both the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence explained the situation very fully to the house in 1937.

Mr. MANION: Could the minister tell us offhand the name of the company to which he refers that was limited with regard to the sale of stock?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I was referring to the John Inglis Company.

I do not think I shall take the time of the house to deal fully with the machinery which has been adopted to give every possible safeguard by the Department of National Defence. I shall refer only to one contract which was let before the interdepartmental committee was established. I shall outline the precautions which were taken by the department before the committee was set up and which I think were commented upon by the Skelton committee in the extracts which I have submitted to this house.

The special provisions introduced in this contract were numerous. It was stipulated that in the event of emergency the crown could diminish or increase the number of aircraft covered by the contract. It was stipulated that the crown could take over the plant and require that, in substitution for aircraft, other articles capable of being manufactured by the contractor be supplied. Under a supplementary agreement it was provided that if orders at a lower price were accepted from others for similar aircraft, the price to the crown would be reduced proportionately. It was provided that to the extent that the cost of any special machinery, tools, dies, et cetera, was included in the purchase price of aircraft covered by the first contract, the purchase price of similar aircraft in any succeeding contract would be reduced accordingly. It was provided that in the event of the company entering into any other contract, the crown should have the right to have its aircraft manufactured in priority.

These were safeguards of an entirely new type devised by the department itself to protect the public interest. To my mind, which may be prejudiced, they indicate that the department, in pioneering a new field and in seeeking to develop for the security of this country an entirely new industry, was using its utmost ingenuity to keep strict control over the industry. It should be stated that in negotiating the price of the aircraft, both the government and the company had the advantage of knowing the costs in the old country where the parent airplanes were being manufactured, and it was possible to arrive at an approximate estimate of the extent to which these costs would be varied by Canadian conditions.

Then, as to national ownership, I wish to say a word or two as to some of the difficulties which might confront the Department of National Defence should we accept the principle of national ownership. In the old days it was the practice of the Department of National Defence to procure most of its technical equipment by purchase from the war office, the admiralty or the air ministry. During the war of 1914-18, Canada, as we all know, produced large quantities of munitions, but it is sometimes not realized that although the quantity was large the varieties were within a very narrow range. Canada employed her industrial resources in the production of shells, and to some extent, explosives. Weapons were not manufactured in Canada, and, with the exception of the Ross rifle, never have been.

When the present government took office the dominion arsenal at Quebec was equipped for the manufacture of small arms ammunition and of some of the components of certain limited types of light artillery ammunition. The Lindsay arsenal had been closed down since the war. The department had on order from the old country a number of articles of technical equipment, but the present government was advised that the delivery date would be several years in the future. The practice of the department being to order its requirements from the old country, we speedily learned that this was not going to be possible or practicable with regard to any speedy measures of improving the defences of Canada. Great Britain, as we all know, had embarked on a heavy rearmament program and was utilizing the full resources of her own industrial capacity.

The department was faced with the necessity of developing sources of production within Canada for articles of military equipment never before produced in this country. The question whether production should be by expansion of the government's own arsenal plants or by the utilization of private industry was very carefully and very seriously considered. As I suggested in my remarks before the royal commission, there were two schools of thought in the Department of National Defence. Certain senior officers were strongly in favour of the development of government arsenals. Others of equal senior rank pointed out that the capital cost of constructing and equipping the several plants advocated would run between $30,000,000 and $35,000,000. These officers considered that having regard to the probable funds available the cost and delay involved in proceeding by state manufacture would be prohibitive.

The matter was then considered at great length by the government. I think I am safe in saying that on principle the government favoured state manufacture. However, at that time we were faced with a most serious financial problem. There had been a long series of heavy budgetary deficits in Canada between 1930 and 1935, and there was at that time the utmost necessity of restoring public finance at least to a state of approximate equilibrium. The funds made available for the Department of National Defence in each of the years 1937 and 1938 totalled approximately $35,000,000.

The decision made then was to proceed with the expansion of the dominion arsenal with respect to the production of commodities for which a fairly constant demand over the years might be anticipated. This ensured that full use would be made of any expenditures on capital account and that continuous employment would be afforded to skilled labour assembled for the purpose.

With regard to the very large scheme of erecting plants for the manufacture of small arms, artillery guns and other costly technical equipment for which the total requirements of the country were limited, this is best illustrated by the results of the decision reached. Had we, Mr. Speaker, adopted the suggestion made by some hon. members of the house at that time when the estimates were before it, of state production along the lines suggested by those who were advocating this grand arsenal scheme in the dominion, that entire $30,000,000 during the past three years would have been required to construct and equip the necessary plants. What would we have lost? Instead of that we have acquired:

1. Four new destroyers and four minesweepers for the navy, and

2. Two hundred new aircraft.

3. We have established a system of fortifications on the Pacific coast, to be completed next year.

4. We have doubled the strength of our naval and air forces.

5. We have purchased a great deal of miscellaneous equipment for the militia.

6. We have increased the training of our militia forces in Canada.

7. We have developed new air stations and have augmented the facilities at the stations already established.

8. We have greatly increased the production of munitions, and we have augmented our supplies of all kinds of ammunition and other necessary military equipment.

Had we used our money on the construction of arsenals, we should have had none of this equipment with the funds at our disposal. I leave it as a cold business proposition to the fair and unbiased judgment of hon. members of this house.

9. During the last three years we have increased the output of the Quebec arsenal from four to six or seven times what it was in several commodities when we took office.

10. The government's own plants have been used for assembling anti-gas respirators, an operation never before undertaken in Canada.

11. We have begun the utilization of the Lindsay arsenal after twenty years of idleness, and propose that that development shall be continued and extended.

I come now to another point. I have been criticized in this house and outside with reference to not calling for competitive bids. I wish for a moment or two to compare the records of the two governments. The first instructions I gave to my officials in 1935 when I assumed the office of Minister of National Defence were that tenders were to be invited by advertisement wherever possible in regard to contracts over $5,000. Contracts, Mr. Speaker, in the Department of National Defence, may be handled in five ways:

1. By public advertisement.

2. Through selected bidders.

3. Through the war office, admiralty and air ministry.

4. Through sole manufacturers. This is usually for the replacement of parts.

5. Through submission to the interdepartmental committee in certain circumstances where competition is considered unavailable.

Where the department has to deal with sole competitors or with a particular manufacturer, there is no choice. There was no interdepartmental committee to review contracts in the days of the previous administration, so that method can be left aside for comparative purposes. But where competition is possible it is desirable that the widest possible competition be obtained, and the present government decided, having regard to the record of the previous administration, that there should be a change of practice.

Taking only those cases, in contracts over $5,000, where competition is possible, the following is the record of the late administration during the four and a half years from April 1, 1931, to October, 1935.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister is starting something new. What is the use of rehashing what has been done prior to 1935?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I thoroughly appreciate and welcome the sentiment my hon. friend has expressed; if that is the attitude he is going to take I appreciate it. But we have been criticized for not calling for competitive bids, and I thought it only fair to put the essential facts upon the record so that they would be available.

The late administration during the four and a half years from April 1, 1931, to October, 1935, let contracts as follows:

1. By public advertisement, eleven contracts, totalling $736,874.

2. By selected bidders, from selected lists, 284 contracts, totalling $5,013,502. In other words, Mr. Speaker, of the contracts available for competition where the amount involved was more than $5,000, the late government let by public advertisement:

1. By number of contracts, less than 4 per cent (3·7 per cent).

2. By dollar value, only 13 per cent.

They gave to selected bidders more than ninety-six per cent of their contracts, representing eighty-seven per cent in value of those available for public tender. Altogether, of contracts available for bidding, they let 295, to the value of $5,751,377. In five and a half years, under the previous administration, only eleven contracts, representing $736,874 out of $5,751,377, were offered to public bidding in the dominion.

Now we, sir, have let in three years in office, by competitive bidding, contracts to the value of $12,677,367. In three years and two months, down to December 31, 1938, the present government let 135 contracts by public advertisement as compared with eleven contracts in five and a half years under the previous administration.

Mr. STEVENS: Amounting to how much?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am coming to that. In five and a half years, the previous government let contracts of a value of only $736,000 by public advertisement—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Would the minister give the amounts?

Mr. DUNNING: Just be patient and you will get it all.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): While in five and a half years the previous government let only $736,000 by public advertisement the present government let $7,785,000 in just over three years.

Of contracts available for tender the previous government held 87 per cent, by value, for selected bidders, and threw open only 3·7 per cent for public advertisement. The present government has let 60 per cent, by value, by public advertisement, and only 40 per cent to selected bidders.

The present government let 135 contracts by public advertisement in three years, while the previous government let eleven contracts by public advertisement in five and a half years. The previous government threw open to public competition $736,000, or 13 per cent, while the present government threw open to competition $7,785,000, or 60 per cent.

But apart from the contracts referred to the interdepartmental committee, what is of special interest is this, that of the eleven contracts for which the previous administration invited public tenders through advertisement, no fewer than nine were in their first year of office, when they were fresh from the electors. After that first year, in four and a half years, the previous government only twice submitted defence contracts to public tender, for a total amount of $448,884. No public bids were invited in 1932-33; no public bids were invited in 1933-34; and only once in 1934-35, and again in 1935-36, did the previous government ask for public bids on defence contracts.

But what is the progressive record of the present government? This government let by competitive bids:

1. In the balance of 1935-36, 7 contracts.
2. In 1936-37, 31 contracts.

3. In 1937-38, 38 contracts.

4. In 1938-39 (nine months only), 59 contracts.

Perhaps, therefore, Mr. Speaker, I may be forgiven if I am fairly sensitive when this government is accused of favouring pets and favourites when calling for tenders.

Mr. MANION: I do not know anything about this record, and I cannot discuss it, but would the minister give us a little more detail in regard to the selected lists on both sides? I assume my hon. friend has had selected lists.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. I said forty per cent.

Mr. MANION: Would he explain to the house, as a matter of information, how the selected lists were chosen, both by the late government and by the present one?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. I think the general procedure is this. You are building in Calgary, let us say. There are before the department a number of potential contractors, say seven or nine. You invite them to tender. The contract is not advertised in the press; it is a closed list, limited to those selected by the department.

Mr. MANION: I understood that, but what I meant was this: Has the minister the lists or the numbers of people called in with respect to these selected lists?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I believe I can get them. I have not them at the moment. I suppose they would be available in the department in all cases, as regards both the previous administration and the present one.

Mr. MANION: I was just asking for information.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be very glad to get that information.

I come now to a brief discussion of the measure which would be consequent upon the adoption of this resolution by the house.

The bill itself has three definite features. The first is the creation of a defence purchasing board, with four members. The second principle is the provision for financing defence purchases of a capital nature on a ten year three per cent amortization basis. The third feature deals with the element of profit control.

I think it is fair for me to say that public opinion to-day is unanimous that excess profits on arms and munitions contracts must be curbed.

[Mr. Ian Mackenzie.]

Mr. LANDERYOU: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Who makes the greatest profit out of war, those who finance it or those who produce the materials?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): According to the information that is mine as a result of the experiences of the last war, the greatest profits were made, not on these engines of destruction which we call munitions, but in respect of essential food and other supplies for those who were trying at that time to fight the battles of Canada overseas.

Mr. LANDERYOU: How would that compare with the profits of those—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The house is not in committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): When my hon. friend interrupted me I was going on to observe that the commonest way of expressing this desire was to say we did not want anyone to profit out of war or preparation for war, but I must say that there has been a great paucity of practical suggestions as to how to attain this most desirable objective. My hon. friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have a very simple solution. They would nationalize all industry, and then there would be no profit at all in the manufacture within Canada of shells or bread or butter or any other commodity.

An hon. MEMBER: Nonsense.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is a subject on which the minister is not an authority.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But I believe the majority of people in Canada, as in Great Britain and the United States, believe yet in a competitive society and are not prepared for the drastic step my hon. friends would recommend.

Mr. MacINNIS: They are fast moving that way.

Mr. REID: Not the farmers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Short of the complete nationalization of all industry there is no way to eliminate all profits on our defence requirements, to use a phrase which was attributed by the press, improperly I believe, to my hon. friend with reference to his Toronto speech. If we manufacture shells and guns in state arsenals we shall still build the plants and buy the machinery and raw materials under the competitive system and the element of profit will still remain. Although it may be one degree removed, it will be just as real and just as objectionable.

There are other objections to the state arsenal plan for all direct requirements. It would involve, as has already been explained very thoroughly, large capital outlays on plant and equipment which would be required for only a short time, and unless your continuous supply is guaranteed, then would lie idle, throwing men out of work. Any such program has been rejected as uneconomic by some of the ablest observers. I have already reviewed the steps taken by Right Hon. David Lloyd George in the last war, when he said to a delegation of labour, "Let the manufacturers make their profits, I will take it away from them by taxation. Leave that to me." May I draw your attention to the fact that that measure was adopted under actual war conditions?

A great deal of thought has been given since then to the question of profits control in every democratic country in the world, and certainly much thought has been given to it by the present government. Perhaps I may be pardoned if I refer now to what I said in this house in 1937, I think in response to a question asked me by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps):

> Now I wish to deal with the question of profits.... This question divides itself into three categories.
> The first is the supply of defence equipment in peace time;
> The second is the export of munitions or supplies beyond the country, and,
> The third is the supply of munitions and equipment in war time.
> With reference to the first of these categories having to do with the supply of defence equipment in peace time, government policies were formulated some time ago....
> They are designed to safeguard the public interest as far as possible by competition, where competition is possible. Where this cannot be done; where competition is not possible, they are designed to establish rigid principles of reasonable remuneration to make unfair profits impossible and to provide for a thorough system of inspection and audit.

So, sir, we have been through the British royal commission report. We have had the majority and minority reports of the senate committee of the United States. We have had our own Skelton committee report. We have worked in cooperation with the interdepartmental committee of eminent civil servants, and we have even had debates in this house. In Great Britain this is what the royal commission said:

> It is our opinion that measures ought to be taken to restrict the profits of armament firms in peace time to a scale of reasonable remuneration. . . .
> We do not propose to undertake the task of formulating specific methods for the restriction of profits in peace time. No doubt that is fraught with technical difficulty.

There is no concrete suggestion there. They go on to say:

> Nor do we believe that a measure of taxation such as the excess profits tax which was enforced during the last war will prove satisfactory to meet the essential object in view.

That does something to increase the "technical difficulty" referred to, but nothing to help us solve it.

Mr. MANION: From whom was the minister quoting?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I was quoting again from the British royal commission.

The United States senate committee dealt mainly with the export of arms. With respect to national requirements it merely recommended expansion of the principle of state ownership. Requirements in a great country like the United States or Great Britain are such that a state arsenal is a much more economic operation than it would be in a country like Canada, whose requirements of some very costly and technical items are strictly limited. May I say I hope they will remain so.

In the United States they had a drastic reorganization recently in the army to improve purchasing methods. Very wide reforms were made, but I noticed, in an article on this subject in Liberty the other day, this significant sentence:

> No way around the old cost plus plan has been found.

The Skelton committee reported that profit control was essentially an administrative problem and advised that they were unable to recommend legislation which would cover all contingencies. They did make one important and valuable step forward—they recommended a court of review to advise the department directly concerned on the form of its contracts.

I want to say here that the interdepartmental committee, whatever criticism may have been offered concerning them, rendered magnificent and devoted service to the government and the country in the work they have done in the last two years.

Mr. HEAPS: If the legislation foreshadowed in this resolution is passed, will the interdepartmental committee go out of business?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think it might be reasonably assumed that that would be the case. But I should be very glad if my hon. friend would wait until the bill comes down. He will then have an answer to his question.

Mr. HEAPS: I think it is important that the minister inform the house whether this proposed new body will supersede the interdepartmental committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If my hon. friend waits a little longer, I believe he will find before I conclude my address that his inquiry will have been answered.

In the proposals now offered to the house under this resolution, and to be elaborated in detail in the bill consequent upon it, I believe that we have gone further than any other government, in the United States, in Great Britain or any other democratic nation which believes in upholding the institution of competitive industry. The bill that is to be submitted to this house consequent upon the adoption of the resolution I am now discussing provides that maximum profits upon defence contracts shall not exceed five per cent per annum on working capital actually utilized in the performance of the contract, and this is to be achieved by the simple, clear and definite process of taxing away the excess. May I therefore explain the procedure that is contemplated in its logical sequence. The purchasing board will consist of a permanent, salaried chairman who will give his full time to this work, and the other three members will be paid a per diem allowance for attending meetings, and their actual travelling and living expenses. The board will make all purchases and let all contracts for the Department of National Defence where the amount involved exceeds $5,000. The procedure will be for the Department of National Defence to requisition the purchasing board for each requirement. Full information must be imparted as to the reason for the requisition, stocks in hand, and also in regard to other matters. The board may vary the requisition but not without the consent of the Minister of National Defence. The board will then have a completely free hand in negotiating the contracts and in the supervision of their execution. Each contract must be recommended to council and approved by council before being let. This, in my judgment, gives even a closer degree of government control than under the war purchasing commission during the last war. The war purchasing commission had power to enter into contracts without any reference whatsoever to council. This act requires that every contract shall be approved by council and therefore the principle of ministerial responsibility is regarded. The government is thus given a threefold check upon these contracts: through the Minister of National Defence, who makes the recommendation; the Minister of Finance, who, subject to the consent of council, gives authorization; the Minister of National Revenue, who, when profits are made in excess of five per cent, is responsible for the taxation of excess profits.

The bill lays down as a cardinal principle that where competitive bidding is practicable there shall be competitive bidding by advertisement in the public press. The bill also lays down that as far as possible the purchases shall be made in the Dominion of Canada. If it is considered necessary to purchase outside of Canada the board must report to the government, giving its reason therefor. If, after competitive bidding, the board deems it not in the public interest to award the contract to the lowest bidder, the act requires that it shall report to council giving its reason therefor. Then there comes the type of contract where competitive bidding is not possible. These conditions arise with respect to arms and munitions contracts more often than in ordinary business, for two main reasons: first, there are sometimes secret specifications which it is not in the public interest to distribute among miscellaneous contractors for bidding purposes; and, second, there are especially in a small country like Canada, which has had no past experience in arms manufacture, sometimes undertakings of an involved and technical character with which industry in this country has had no past experience and on which there is no sound basis for estimating costs in advance. In such cases firms tendering have a tendency to allow very wide margins for unforeseen hazards.

Where competitive bids are not possible we have worked out, in my judgment, the most drastic system of profit control ever enacted, so far as we could ascertain. The key clause provides that the maximum profit shall be limited to an amount equal to five per cent per annum on the average amount of capital employed in the performance of the contract.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the minister be good enough to read that again?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, with pleasure. The key clause provides that the maximum profit shall be limited to an amount equal to five per cent per annum of the average amount of capital employed in the performance of the contract. The bill then provides that a tax shall be levied on the contractor equivalent to the amount by which his net profit exceeds the five per cent. The actual amount of capital is defined as follows:

> The actual cost less depreciation of the physical assets including plant, machinery, equipment and working capital which are employed in the performance of the contract.

It is provided that where the assets were acquired for a consideration other than cash the board shall determine their fair cash value at the time of acquisition having regard to any sale or sales of such assets within five years of their acquisition or to any other circumstances which may indicate their fair cash value. It is also provided that in determining capital employed in the performance of a contract the board may take into account actual cash outlays incurred in the acquisition of patents, royalties, or licence to manufacture. The board is forbidden, however, to give any value to goodwill to the extent that such patents, royalties or licences are employed.

The bill declares that net profit shall be the aggregate amount received under the contract less such actual expenses, disbursements, allowances for depreciation and overhead charges as the board may find properly chargeable to the contract. It is stipulated, however, that interest on borrowed capital shall not be deducted. The board is given power to employ auditors, who shall be given access to all books and records of the contractor. The determination of the amount to be charged as a tax is to be made by the purchasing board, but there is provision in the act for appeal to the exchequer court. The collection of the tax will be made by the Minister of National Revenue under the machinery of the income tax division. The bill makes the logical provision that income which has already been taxed away under this act shall not be counted as income under the Income War Tax Act.

The scheme calls for a substantial staff. Provision is made for the transfer of officials from the Department of National Defence and any other departments. The rights of such employees under the Civil Service and Superannuation Acts are carefully preserved.

In my judgment this is the most drastic tax on arms and munitions profits ever imposed. It is stiffer than was the war measure of Lloyd George in England. It is a tax on the whole of the profits which exceed five per cent of working capital utilized, and hon. members will agree that five per cent is a relatively low return on any industrial undertaking. We are proposing to impose that tax now in our peace time expenditures in regard to our national preparedness.

Mr. MANION: Will it be imposed on the Bren gun contract? I ask for information.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is a question of policy that I cannot answer at the moment.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask a question?

Mr. DUNNING: Wait until we get into committee.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am interested in that. Has the department consulted those who would probably tender, as to whether they would accept five per cent? Five per cent might be set up by the interdepartmental committee but not accepted by those who might like to be called upon to tender.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I welcome the question of my genial friend. Immediately we hear the clamour; the first time this government has taken steps for the most drastic profit control, the suggestion comes from my hon. friend—

Mr. MANION: It is not a suggestion.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is not a suggestion but a question.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The answer is, no.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why did you not answer? You always try to drag politics into everything.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member must take his seat.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister cannot answer a question civilly.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not desire to pursue any acrimonious argument at this stage.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then don't start it. I asked a civil question.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And I gave a civil answer. That is exactly the kind of criticism which I anticipated would be levelled at this resolution and the measure consequent upon it, that we are not allowing industry sufficient profit.

Mr. MacNICOL: Not at all. The minister is entirely wrong.

Mr. POULIOT: Let him sit on the board.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister flies off the bat every time I ask a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MANION: Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has some right to protest. He asked a civil question and the minister immediately says that this is an argument against the whole proposition. It is no such thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Apart from the fact that that is not a point of order at all, I did answer my hon. friend and I think I was entitled, as one who has been unfairly attacked in recent months for giving too much profit to private industry, to assume that the question was asked to show that, before we established this very low rate of five per cent—

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister has no right to draw inferences as to my reason for asking the question.

Mr. REID: It was a leading question.

Mr. MacNICOL: Let the minister be civil.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I intend to be civil to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol); I have the highest possible regard for him.

What would have been the result if we had consulted some of these firms in regard to this rate of five per cent? Does anyone think we would have received enthusiastic endorsation from some of these contractors? We are endeavouring to meet an actual situation of the present moment. We are endeavouring to submit for the consideration of the Canadian people a plan for the most drastic system of control of profits and munitions that has ever been attempted in any country. In regard to that plan I trust we shall receive the cooperation not only of the hon. member for Davenport but of every hon. member of this house.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister has no reason to doubt my cooperation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not the slightest.

I come now to consideration of the financial provisions of this bill.

Mr. MANION: Before the minister proceeds to that would he tell us a little more about the personnel of the board? He says there would be five?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Four.

Mr. MANION: Would he give some idea as to their occupations, or how they would be chosen, or something of that sort?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The question of occupations has not yet been even discussed. The idea is to have a chairman as the permanent head, who, I trust, will be one of the most eminent Canadians, and whose selection will meet with the complete endorsation of everyone in this house; because the success or failure of this proposed board in my judgment will rest entirely upon the personnel.

Mr. MANION: I said that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As far as I am concerned I assure my hon. friend now, and I am sure the Prime Minister will endorse this, that I have no desire in the world that there shall be any political complexion to that board. I shall be willing to seek the cooperation of the leader of the opposition and of any group in regard to getting the most eminent personnel in Canada so that this board shall be above any acrimonious dispute. No one wishes that more than the Minister of National Defence. As long as I am in this department I want to go ahead with the real business of defence. This question of contractor relations has always been an embarrassment impeding the minister and raising an element of suspicion in regard to munitions contracts which does not exist in connection with the contracts of any other department. And—I said this a year ago, I think—the further we remove it the better will the minister be satisfied and I believe the public as well. Therefore in that spirit of seeking cooperation in regard to the personnel, let us get a plan that will work. Although a net five per cent is not very fair to industry, I think it will work.

Mr. SPENCE: It is more than many people make.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think that is right. That is a sensible answer from a very good business man.

Now, one or two conclusions. In the first place the provision for the defence of the country is the first and most fundamental duty of any government. That duty involves the organization of our defence forces, of our man power and the equipment of our forces; hence it necessarily involves procuring weapons and munitions. The government definitely agrees to the principle of the production by national manufacture in state owned arsenals to the greatest extent practicable where a continuous supply is assured and a sudden interruption of that supply is not going to dislocate conditions of employment in Canada, as already stated in this house. But the government cannot go so far as to say in regard to these extraordinary conditions that we can nationalize everything with reference to munitions or armaments or supplies over night. I believe that in the end it would not be a practicable solution.

The government, if I may speak for them, believe in the principle of equality of sacrifice; that in war time men should not be required to offer their lives and limbs while those who provide the weapons of destruction have even the possibility of reaping undue profits.

Mr. GREEN: May we take it from that that it is the intention of the government to conscript at least certain industries in war time?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am not in a position to answer that question, but I say that the policy of whatever government should be in power in the event of national emergency would be determined by the actual situation prevailing at that time. We in the department have taken the precaution of making an industrial survey of practically all the manufacturing plants in Canada. But what the policy of any government would be I could not at this moment say with any authority.

The government considers that the problem of controlling arms and munitions profits in times of peace presents problems essentially different from those which would exist in time of war when mobilization of the nation's entire industry and man power might be required. The government is determined that in peace time, where private industry must be utilized, there shall be the strictest possible regulation of profits both in the interest of the taxpayer and in deference to public abhorrence of profits made from products which involve destruction of human lives and misery among nations.

I think I have given a fairly comprehensive survey of the discussions that have taken place in this and other countries in peace and in war in reference to this perplexing and absorbing question of the control of profits on munitions. I believe this to be a very drastic departure, and as I said to the Leader of the Opposition, speaking as Minister of National Defence I welcomed the removal of these contracts from the control of the department. I am much more concerned, as long as I have the privilege of serving that department, in the real task of preparing for national security and national insurance of our people. There is in this resolution or in the bill to follow no relaxation of the principle of ministerial responsibility. We are following the sound British practice of treasury control. The Minister of National Defence retains the power of recommendation; the Minister of Finance, with the consent of council, the power of authorization; and the Minister of National Revenue in certain cases the power of taxation. Again I repeat that the success of this legislation will depend upon the personnel of the board. It must be such as to command the support of all parties, and the confidence of the country. There is no more important task to-day in Canada than the great task to be entrusted to the proposed board, and, so far as the government is concerned, I want to repeat most emphatically that there is no suggestion of any political appointments. In connection with this important national question we invite the cooperation of every hon. member, belonging to whatever political philosophy you like, in the house. And let me add my own fervent hope that out of the disputations and criticisms of recent days there will emerge a system of which all in the Dominion of Canada may be proud, one which will get results for the Department of National Defence, and which will command the trust, the support and the confidence of all Canadian people.

Mr. LAWSON: Mr. Speaker, before a discussion of the resolution takes place I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) to elucidate one matter mentioned in his outline to-day. I understood him to say that the resolution contemplated three phases. One of those phases was that the bill, when brought down, would indicate that the expenditures on defence and war purchases would be on a three per cent amortization basis over a period of ten years. The estimates indicate the government proposes to spend $63,000,000 this year. Am I to take it that the government has, in addition to that expenditure for this year, a ten year plan covering war and defence expenditures, and that the proposed defence purchasing board is to work out a plan—or indeed one may be already in existence to be submitted to it for its administration?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Perhaps I should answer the question in committee. However I can say now that that is not so. The reason the $3,000,000 is placed in the estimates is to provide the sinking fund required to meet the capital expenditures. But there is no permanent plan of ten-year duration of any kind whatsoever. It is only a matter of taking care of current revenues, over an amortization of ten years.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with the very greatest interest to the remarks of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) in speaking to the resolution for which we have been waiting since it appeared on the order paper on January 24. I agree most emphatically with the phrase with which he began and with which he ended, namely that this is a most important matter in this or any country.

He has referred to the difficulties which attended this same question at the time of the great war. My thoughts immediately went back farther than that—to the great difficulties which attended this question in other countries throughout Europe, including Great Britain, at the time of the Napoleonic war, at the time of the Crimean war, and even as far back as the Marlborough campaign. Constant troubles and difficulties arose out of this question of the purchase of munitions.

Mr. DUNNING: Our old friend Sam Pepys.

Mr. STIRLING: Yes, right through that volume, and a great many other historical volumes too. You can go through Thackeray and find the same thing. It goes back far into history. Avaricious men in those as in later times, with respect to the quality of products produced, through being friendly to the government of the day, have endeavoured to take advantage of the miseries of a country at war.

It is to be feared that human nature has not greatly altered since then. To-day we are not so much faced with difficulties in connection with the quality of goods supplied. We have moved beyond that, through inspection. But we are still faced with the difficulties which attach to partisanship, and the desire to obtain greater profits than reasonably should be obtained.

The minister has also outlined in most interesting terms the ideal he has before him in connection with this board. It is an ideal, I hasten to state, with which I entirely agree. At this stage it is not possible to follow the minister in detail in his elaboration of the scheme which has been evolved. But it appears to me there are three questions in regard to the creation and setting up of the board, and the preparation for its functioning, which perhaps exceed in importance other matters connected with it.

Of course there stands first and foremost the question of personnel. With every word the minister used with regard to personnel I, and I am sure those associated with me, entirely agree. Whatever the final result of a further inquiry may be, there can be no question that the public has been somewhat shocked at the evidence produced before Mr. Justice Davis as to what has taken place in the past two years. Unquestionably there has been evidence which tends to show that partisanship has come in. If the personnel of the board is chosen with any idea of partisanship, the public of Canada will not be satisfied with anything the board may do.

The next thing we must remember when we are examining those provisions of the measure which have to do with the functioning of the board is that we are dealing not only with guns and shells, but also with blankets, food and office requirements. For, as I understand the set-up of the board, it will largely take the place of the officer now in the department known as the director of contracts.

So far as requirements over $5,000 are concerned, the board will be supreme, but perhaps the director of contracts, or the branch under his direction, will continue to exist and function in connection with those smaller amounts. But when it comes to a matter of considering requirements of the naval, militia, air or civil departments, it will be necessary for the heads of those departments to receive the acquiescence of the minister, and, in turn, the minister will pass on their requirements to the board. Any amount over $5,000 will, in the future, be in the hands of the board.

The position the board will occupy in relation to the minister of the department, to whose care money has been voted by parliament, is a point to which I listened with particular interest, and it is a matter which I have no doubt will receive a great deal of consideration when the bill, in all its details, is before us. But if I understand it correctly, when a requisition has been accepted by the minister and turned over to the board, it then passes altogether out of the hands of the Minister of National Defence; and from the board it goes to council, of which that minister is just one member. I think that is correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It goes to the Minister of Finance and from him to the council.

Mr. STIRLING: The board sends it to the Minister of Finance?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The recommendation, yes.

Mr. STIRLING: The Minister of Finance presents it to the council. The Minister of Finance is merely a minister among his colleagues.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Absolutely.

Mr. STIRLING: It appears to me that overcomes some of the difficulties which I foresaw in connection with the position this board might occupy in what we might call the mechanization of the government. I earnestly hope that the discussion which will occur on that phase of the matter will be illuminating and of assistance, and that the plan will work as the minister expects it will.

In his statement the minister made certain comparisons between contracts which have been let since 1935 and those which were let before that year. It is not possible for me to make any extended reference to those comparisons. As hon. members know, for a period of a little less than twelve months I occupied the position which the minister now occupies. I am sure he will agree with me that there is not, of necessity, anything wrong with the principle of selected lists. The common understanding of that term carries with it an idea of a list of political partisans, but the minister knows full well that is by no means true. There are certain requirements of the Department of National Defence, as of other departments, in connection with which very few people are competent to tender. I think the minister will agree with me when I say that since 1935 these selected lists have contained much the same names as were on the lists before that year. It is not possible for me to hazard any suggestion with regard to the comparative figures the minister has put forward; the records are available to him; he has a staff which is accustomed to dealing with these matters and it is easy for him to have prepared comparative statements which will bear out the view he wishes to express.

I should, however, draw attention to one fact. In the eleven months during which I occupied the office which the minister at present holds, we were operating in an atmosphere of disarmament. So far as my recollection goes, there were few contracts let for what could be primarily called munitions. The majority of the contracts let during that time, if my memory serves me correctly, were for the requirements of the relief camps. It will also be remembered that money expended during that period was looked upon as being somewhat in the form of relief. Therefore, if certain commodities were needed in eastern or western Canada, it was not an unreasonable view to take that the list of contractors capable of providing those commodities were those located in either eastern or western Canada. Details of that sort would enable one to make a much closer comparison between the two sets of figures. I do not propose at this stage to go further into that matter because I may elaborate it at a later date. If, however, the minister can carry out the ideal which he has put before the house to-day, not only will he have the closest cooperation of those with whom I am associated, but I think he will receive from the people of Canada recognition that the ideal he is striving for is a worthy one.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, what I shall have to say on this resolution can be better left until the bill itself comes before the house. Therefore my remarks at the present stage of the legislation will be exceedingly brief. However, before I turn to the resolution I should like to say a word or two about the minister's speech. I think all parts of the house will agree with him in his expression of horror at any idea of large scale profits being made out of the production of war materials. It seemed to me that the major part of his speech consisted of a defence of the Department of National Defence rather than a discussion of the resolution. After listening to the lengthy justification which he gave for all that has been done, I began to wonder why we should have this defence purchasing board at all. Every once in a while the minister would advance an argument against state ownership of armament factories and then look over at this corner and say something about the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation wanting to bring about socialization. The strange thing is that the minister himself is definitely on record as being in favour of the manufacture of war materials in state owned factories.

He cannot have it both ways. He cannot get the support of people who believe in state owned factories and at the same time label it socialism. He must be either for or against it. The fact that the minister throws back responsibility on the departmental officials by saying that there is a division of opinion among them cannot absolve the government from responsibility. What the opinions of the officials may have been; what the opinions of the officials may be to-day, has no bearing whatsoever. This government must accept responsibility for whatever policy they adopt in the manufacture of munitions and the preparation for possible war.

Let me turn now to the resolution itself. May I say that I have been interested in this matter ever since I came to this house and long before. On February 4, 1937, I had the privilege of moving the following resolution in the house:

That, in the opinion of this house, legislation should be immediately brought down by the government of the day providing that, in the event of another war involving Canada's active participation, every agency, financial, industrial, transportation or natural resources, shall automatically be conscripted for the duration of such a war, and that a penalty be imposed for the violation thereof.

It is interesting to note that although the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) was in his place at that time, he took no part in the discussion and we had no expression of opinion from him. I was interested in hearing the minister say to-day that this bill centres round the feature of profit control. I was, however, disappointed when he said that he did not believe we could remove the profit feature. I think the government and the minister have been sincerely concerned about the matter of profit control ever since they took office. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Minister of National Defence, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) and other hon. members have indicated that no one wants to see profits made out of either preparations for war or the actual war itself.

I have no intention of debating this question at any length, but I should like briefly to review what the government has done in an effort to control profits on war materials. I want to remind the house that on January 8, 1937, the Prime Minister set up a committee presided over by Doctor Skelton. I shall not go into the details of the report which that committee submitted, because the Minister of National Defence has reviewed it adequately. But they did take cognizance of the fact that there was in Canada a widespread feeling against war profits. They drew attention to the resolution which I have just read and which was on the order paper at that time. They contended that to place the manufacture of arms entirely in the hands of the state was not feasible at that time, although they thought that there might be a case for some moderate extension of the government arsenals. They were doubtful whether new legislation to control private profits could be attempted at that juncture. They felt unable to suggest any specific legislative measures. They felt that the control of profits and the prevention of excesses could most profitably be brought about by close and guarded administration.

As a result of that committee's report, which was not very definite, an interdepartmental committee was set up, and I want to place before the house the terms of the order in council which brought that interdepartmental committee into existence:

Certified to be a true copy. The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated March 2, 1937, from the Minister of National Defence stating that an interdepartmental committee formed under the instructions of the right hon. the Prime Minister to consider certain questions pertaining to the control of profits on government armament contracts, has in its report suggested that there be instituted a standing interdepartmental financial committee to assist the officials charged with the placing of contracts under the defence program, and that such a committee "might study and classify the requirements of the defence program from the financial point of view, and formulate or advise upon the financial principles or safeguards to be observed in placing contracts of various types, and as to rules of procedure."

That it was also suggested that this committee "might be available for consultation upon the financial aspects of any unusual specific cases or conditions arising from time to time, and that it would be limited to this function of assisting in the prevention of undue profits, that is to say it would not be concerned with other aspects of the defence program."

The minister is of the opinion that a committee whose functions and duties would be generally as set out in the suggestion aforesaid would be in the public interest, and therefore, recommends:

Mr. POULIOT: What page of Hansard is the hon. member quoting from?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): From page 887. The order in council then goes on to set out the recommendations:

1. That there be formed a committee to be known as the interdepartmental committee on the control of profits on government armament contracts.....

Then it gives the personnel of the committee. Then follows recommendation No. 2:

2. That the duties of this committee shall be generally to study and classify from the financial point of view the various requirements which the government's defence program involves, and when it is considered by the department concerned that effective competitive tendering cannot be secured in regard to any of its requirements, to formulate or advise upon such principles and safeguards, whether of a general or specific nature, which in this connection the committee considers should be observed, and to communicate to all departments concerned such information in this respect as the committee considers should be in their possession.

As a result of that order in council, which I have read in part to the house, an interdepartmental committee was set up, presided over by the deputy minister of national defence. I draw the attention of the house to the fact that the purpose for which that interdepartmental committee was set up was similar to the very purpose for which we are now proposing to set up a defence purchasing board.

Mr. DUNNING: Not at all.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Most certainly. The terms of the order in council deal with the preventing of undue profits and the safeguarding of the interests of the people of Canada, and the Minister of National Defence himself enumerated as the third feature of this bill, profit control.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I interrupt the hon. member to say that the difference between the interdepartmental committee and the proposed board is this, that the committee was purely advisory, while this board will have power to act apart from the Department of National Defence altogether, except by way of requisition.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is exactly the point to which I am coming. This interdepartmental committee was set up, and the impression was given in this house from time to time that it would be an adequate safeguard against the making of undue profits. The fact of the matter is that we know to-day that interdepartmental committee broke down.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I will make my own speech and the minister can make one after I have finished. The evidence placed before Mr. Justice Davis, while I have no wish to go into that at this time—

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member cannot.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The Minister of National Defence quoted from it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): He quoted from the evidence.

Mr. DUNNING: Not at all.

Mr. MANION: That just shows where we would have been had we not had some little discussion of the Bren gun. The whole matter would have been just buried in the public accounts committee.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friends can discuss it again when it comes back from the committee.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): When this discussion between hon. gentlemen on the front benches is over, I shall be glad to go on with what I have to say.

Mr. DUNNING: If it is in order.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It is in order. I want to point out to the house that here was a committee which in several specific instances found that the advice they gave and the point of view they took were deliberately either ignored or shelved. Here was a committee that broke down when it failed to report back to the body that created it. May I point out to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) who has been very good at interrupting, that here was a committee on which his own deputy minister sat as the financial representative, disagreeing with the policy of the chairman of that committee. I wonder if the minister is acquainted with the fact that his representative on that committee disagreed with what was being done.

The fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that the interdepartmental committee absolutely failed as a check on the making of undue profits. It absolutely failed to safeguard the interests of the Canadian people. We are now to have a defence purchasing board, and all I have to ask is, will the minister, before the bill is brought down, give us some guarantee that, when it is brought down, this purchasing board will do what the committee evidently failed to do? Will he assure us first of all that this purchasing board will have the power that the Minister of National Defence has just said the committee did not have? Will it have the authority to proceed along certain lines despite the fact that one official here, or another official there, is not in favour of a particular course of action?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If my hon. friend will wait for the bill to tell him.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Otherwise, this is meaningless. I point out again that the value of this measure will be determined largely by the personnel of the board. Take the matter of a selected list. A selected list is meaningless unless those who compile it have the national interests at heart. Take this question of a five per cent profit. The minister said that no member of the house will object to a five per cent profit. Well, I object to a five per cent profit unless I know what it is on.

Mr. DUNNING: That is what the minister told the hon. member.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): No, he did not. It will depend, for instance, on the value of certain pieces of land, certain buildings and machinery. But who makes these valuations? Here again everything depends on the integrity of the personnel.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Exactly, and unless the minister can assure us that this board will have the necessary authority and that its personnel will be of sufficient integrity to warrant the confidence of the Canadian people, this board will get no further than the interdepartmental committee got. That is what I want to know. If we are merely to have another smoke screen, another group of men with no authority, another group to act as a buffer, then, of course, we are wasting time. But if the government is sincere and proposes to give to this board substantial authority, and to put on this board the kind of men who will command the confidence of the Canadian people, then we can do what the Minister of National Defence so eloquently professes to believe in, that is, take the profit element out of the manufacture of war materials.

I say seriously to the Minister of National Defence, and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who is at present in his seat, that this defence purchasing board can mean everything or it can mean nothing. I trust that it will mean everything. I can assure the minister, although I am sure I do not need to do so, that the Canadian public will not stand for another failure in this respect; that a defence purchasing board which will function no better than the interdepartmental committee functioned in safeguarding the interests of the Canadian people will be merely another smoke screen which will bring the wrath of the people upon those who have been responsible for the purchase of war materials for the Department of National Defence.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): May I have the minister's attention, because it was in large measure his remarks which caused me to rise to speak? Ever since the last war my mind has been made up that if the time came again when Canada would have to embark upon any extended purchases of war materials or munitions, we should do something along exactly the same line as the set-up which has been explained this afternoon. Therefore, when the minister jumped on me, he was entirely out of place, and it ill became him to impute to me wrong motives in my question.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Oh, no.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister has a great many qualifications, but he has some serious defects—one perhaps more serious than any other, and that is a hot-headed temper. I am going to read to the minister a very ancient Brahmin proverb which I hope he will commit to memory and keep before him at all times when he is speaking. He must not impute motives to hon. members who have no such motives. The proverb I wish to read to him from an ancient book is: "Proceed not to speak or to act, before thou hast weighed thy words, and examined the tendency of every step thou shalt take: so shall disgrace fly far from thee, and in thy house shall shame be a stranger; repentance shall not visit thee, nor sorrow dwell upon thy cheek." I know the minister was sorry—

Mr. POWER: Send a copy to the leader of the opposition.

Mr. MacNICOL: I addressed my remarks to the minister. I know the minister is sorry—

Mr. MANION: Send a copy to the minister of health too.

Mr. MacNICOL: —that he replied to me the way he did; therefore I forgive him for that. I wish to speak for only a few minutes and to refer to just two or three items of the resolution. I am convinced that all reasonable, thinking people in this country will support any action of any government which will eliminate from the production of munitions either in peace time or—particularly —in time of war exorbitant profits such as were made during the great war. Therefore I heartily endorse the principle of this resolution.

I remember well that during the great war, when private soldiers in the front line were receiving $1.10 a day, moulders received a great deal more. I do not know whether at that time the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) was in that class; it is quite a while ago; but someone told me that he had been a moulder. As a class these men received extremely high wages. I know they were paid $18 a day because of the scarcity of that class of labour; had their wages been cut down, they would have gone on strike. As a matter of fact, in one plant I have in mind the moulders went on strike twice during the war until their wages were raised to about $18 a day, if I remember correctly. I assume that the bill to be founded on this resolution will prevent any such exorbitant profits all along the line, either to industry or to anybody else.

As I understood the minister, he said that it is not the intention of the government to embark upon a big scheme involving a huge arsenal wherein the government would manufacture in Canada all the munitions required. I am in accord with that declaration. I believe the government should not embark upon any such scheme—very largely for the reasons the minister outlined. On the other hand, I have been wondering whether a small plant, which perhaps should be called a pilot plant, could not be set up wherein various types of munitions could be worked out, blue-prints made, perhaps samples prepared, and all the details made available, so that when the government found it necessary to embark upon a program of manufacture, all they would have to do would be to call in a number of industrialists and say, "We want that article manufactured. We will supply the blue-prints and all the details and particulars necessary to make it." If the government also had special machines required for the manufacture of these articles, they might say to the producers, "We can also supply you with that line of machinery," and let them tender one against the other for a reasonable price. I imagine it would be possible to proceed along those lines.

The reason I endorse the manufacture of war munitions by plants other than those of the government or in addition to any government plants is that in war time the main consideration is to win the war. In following the records of Britain all down through their history, I find that she set out at the very commencement to win the war. In order to win, one must have the equipment and the necessary munitions. I have always felt that those supplies could not be produced in a government plant in war time at the same rate of speed that they can be produced in private plants. On the other hand, I am convinced that if ever the time comes again when it is necessary for the government to embark upon an effort at all comparable with that of the last war —I hope that time never will come—or even a fraction of the requirements of the last war, some regulations should prevail in industry itself whereby the men engaged in industrial production will not be up against the difficulties they encountered in the last war.

While I am using arbitrary figures whose relations may be altogether wrong, I have a distinct recollection that when manufacturers entered upon the production of shells during the great war and men were taken on to turn out, say a 4-inch shell, they would commence by producing perhaps forty or fifty a day, but towards the end of the war those same men were able to turn out approximately five to ten times the number. The consequence was that their health suffered. I know many, many men who, for the sake of obtaining large returns, exerted themselves far beyond the natural endurance of the human body, with the result that when the war was over, many of them were physically nothing like the men they were prior to the time they set themselves so strenuously to the manufacture of shells.

One point further, and briefly, because I have no desire to hold up the resolution. The government has, presumably as a result of its survey, a list of 720 plants or more throughout Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think it is about 1,200 now.

Mr. MacNICOL: I make no comment, nor had I any intention of commenting upon the question of a profit of five per cent. I am not associated with business, now, and what I had in mind was whether, in arriving at that figure, these men had been asked whether it was sufficient or not. That was a civil question, and I hope that when I again ask the minister any question of the kind he will contain himself and not fly off the handle. I can assure him that any question I ask is sincerely meant; it is intended to elicit information and has no other purpose. That is all I have to say on the resolution.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): I shall say very few words at the moment because I think most of the discussion can take place better in committee than at this time. I simply observe that if the minister had made the same speech as this in his previous effort in this house, when there had been some criticism of him, he would in my opinion have done himself and his party a great deal more good, and would have justified, to some extent at any rate, some of the acts which he did not then try to justify.

Having listened carefully to the minister, and agreeing with most of what he said, I am of the opinion that the provisions of this legislation are the result of the Bren gun discussion in this house. I do not suggest that there was not going to be an act; the minister had placed a resolution on the order paper fairly early in the session. I do suggest, however, that the result of the Bren discussion brought about in the terms of the legislation an improvement which we would not have had in the absence of that debate. The minister may deny it, but certainly it is the conclusion to which I have come, although I cannot prove it. I suggest that if the minister, his department and the government, when dealing with the Hahn contract and with the Montreal construction company's contract, to which this side of the house objected, had recognized and acted upon the principles incorporated in the minister's speech this afternoon, or the principles to be embodied in the bill which he proposes to bring down, we could have avoided the whole discussion that caused so much dissension and agitation in the country and a good deal of bitterness in this house.

I believe that even yet—I say this on behalf of my party, but I say it also in the interests of the country—if the government could in some way make retroactive the proposals said to be incorporated in the bill which the minister has explained briefly this afternoon; if those provisions could be made to apply to those other contracts to which reference has been made, it would redound to the credit of the government and to the advantage of the country at large. I suggest that the government give some further consideration to that proposal.

I have a great deal of respect for all classes of citizens in Canada. I am never one to criticize or question the loyalty of other people. Whether they be the working class, the professional class, the business class, I believe that the vast majority of our people, when it comes to any question such as the manufacture of munitions involving the huge sum of money which is to be spent in Canada, desire to see that money properly, fairly and decently expended. I believe that the proposal of a five per cent profit, if it can be worked out, as I think it can, will probably satisfy all those who stand by the principles which I have upheld here not only in the debate on the Bren gun contract but in the speech which I made in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. A few moments ago I looked up that speech, and while I recognize that it is not strictly permissible to make quotations such as I should like to give to the house now, at the same time the speech I gave on that occasion, dealing as it did with this very question, would set out my opinions on the whole matter better perhaps than I can state them now. At page 23 of Hansard for the third day of this session I said:

> The next paragraph with which I shall deal is that relating to the defence purchasing board. I am more or less in accord with the idea of a defence purchasing board, but before commending it completely I should like to know its personnel; I should like to know, for example, that it is not going to be a political purchasing board, that it will not be a case of picking one man and ignoring all others in regard to competition, picking a man and financing him while he runs around the world getting ideas about defence and then giving him the contract without permitting anyone else to tender.

I was obviously referring to the Hahn contract, but I also had in view the question of profits in general.

> I should like to know that, before I unqualifiedly endorse the idea.

While in detail the suggestions I offered are somewhat different, though not very much so, from the proposals which the minister proposes to incorporate in his bill, and while I have not had an opportunity to read the bill or to consider at all closely those proposals, I believe that the bill will largely meet the points which I raised in the speech which I made in the debate on the address and from which I have just been quoting. I went on to say:

> But as a Canadian citizen who for a long time has been familiar with public opinion I am convinced that the making of large profits from the manufacture of munitions or armaments is repugnant to the ideals of the Canadian people, whether such profits be made directly through a percentage of the amount of the contract, or by selling stock, or in any other way. The making of huge profits on munitions is looked upon by many of our people as taking blood money, as profiteering in patriotism.

Further on, I give certain quotations which, so far as I can remember, are pretty much those which the minister quoted this afternoon. I admit that there are some differences in my references so far as details are concerned. Perhaps I was not as definite in one or two of my remarks as I might have been. But the whole principle behind those remarks was the elimination of unfair profits, and with that idea the minister's bill as foreshadowed this afternoon is in entire accord. Subject possibly to some criticism as regards details, it will probably meet the ideas I expressed in my speech on the address. I did suggest that profits on the manufacture of munitions in Canada should be entirely eliminated, and then I added, as quoted by the minister, that so far as munitions for other parts of the empire were concerned, the government should control profits. That, I suggested, would encourage the British to give contracts in this country, assuring them of a fair deal, and also leaving a fair profit to the manufacturers. I believe in the profit motive, so long as it is fairly and properly carried out.

It is suggested I proposed that there should be no profits at all in the manufacture of munitions in Canada; but a remark of mine quoted by the minister showed that I was open to conviction in the matter, because I pointed out the danger of the idea not working out, and I left a door open. I do not believe that we could eliminate profits one hundred per cent; but if the personnel of the munitions board is well chosen and endeavours to carry out the provisions of the legislation along the lines indicated by the minister, eliminating all but five per cent—which is eliminating ninety-five per cent of profit—that should satisfy the people of the country to a large extent. I say that without prejudice, to use what I believe is a legal term, and not affecting my right to offer some suggestions or criticisms with respect to the details of the bill when it comes before the house, as I suppose it will do this evening.

That is really all I wish to say at the present time, but I thought it might be well for me to say that on the resolution because it might not happen to fit in with regard to any of the provisions of the bill itself.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should not like to let the remarks of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) go by without saying to him, on behalf of my colleagues and myself, how much we appreciate his chivalrous attitude towards the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) in what he has said this afternoon. My hon. friend has said that he thought that if the minister had made the same speech which he made to-day at an earlier stage, a good deal of the bitterness which has thus far characterized some of the discussions on defence matters would have been avoided. I agree with that, but I must say that the minister had a right to expect to have an opportunity to make the speech which he made this afternoon in connection with this measure apart altogether from the circumstances which surrounded the speech he made on a previous occasion. He was prevented from having that opportunity by the nature of the discussion on the Bren gun contract. The minister at that time was feeling very keenly the nature of the charges—I do not think that is too strong a word to use—which seemed to be leveled against him personally. I truly believe there is not an hon. member in this house who in his heart thinks for a moment that the minister did less than all he possibly could as a minister to avoid anything in the shape of profiteering or faulty procedure in the awarding of contracts in his department. But when a man is stung to the quick by bitter attacks before, as a minister, he has had an opportunity of presenting the affairs of his department to the house in a calm and deliberate way, it is not to be wondered at that he should have replied, to some of the references made, in a way that he himself would wish not to have been so obliged to speak.

What I want to make perfectly clear is that one of the reasons the minister spoke with the force and, to some extent, invective, which he used at the time, was that he has been subjected to pretty much of a personal persecution not only since this house assembled, but from a section of the press of this country from the time of the discussions which took place before the commission appointed to investigate the question of the Bren gun contract. Hon. members must realize that the Minister of National Defence has been under a tremendous strain for months past, a strain which I imagine very few men could have endured if they had not had, as I know he has had, a sense of personal rectitude beyond all question.

The leader of the opposition said he felt that the bill to be based on the resolution moved this afternoon was no doubt the result in large part of the discussions we have had in this house on the Bren gun contract. Let me assure my hon. friend that the measure which will come before the house to-day was to all intents and purposes completed in all essential particulars before this house ever met. I would draw my hon. friend's attention to the paragraph in the speech from the throne which says:

> Legislation will be introduced to establish a defence purchasing board with power to purchase equipment for the defence services and to ensure that, where private manufacture is necessary, profits in connection with such are fair and reasonable, and that the public interest is protected.

Mr. MANION: It is the details of the bill which I was suggesting had changed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me say to my hon. friend that before the commission under Mr. Justice Davis was appointed, the government had decided to bring in a bill along the lines of that being brought in to-day.

Let me say further that during the last two years my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence and I have had frequent talks together about this very difficult and complicated matter in relation to existing situations of how far it was wise to go in the opening up of arsenals, the letting of war contracts by tender, and with respect to other matters connected with his department; and repeatedly the Minister of National Defence himself has pointed out that he would welcome having some body independent of the Department of National Defence altogether review the contracts of that department so as to ensure that there would be no opportunity for any kind of profiteering or improper dealing with respect to any of them. It was at the instance of the minister and as a result of the talks he had with me as Prime Minister that in the first instance I appointed the Skelton committee, or recommended that there should be a committee to study this matter and advise the government as to the best method of proceeding to protect the public interest in connection with defence expenditures. The interdepartmental committee was a second step towards the same end, and the bill to be introduced is in part the result of the experience gained by that interdepartmental committee and the advice the officers of the government upon it have been able to give to the government. All of those steps were taken before there was any publication of any article in Maclean's magazine which occasioned the appointment of the commission. When that article appeared, it was just because the cabinet felt so strongly the necessity of seeing that there should be no suspicion, even, in the public mind either of wrongdoing or of wrong methods being employed in connection with defence contracts, that we immediately decided to have a justice of the supreme court make inquiry as a commissioner into the whole question of the contract there referred to as thoroughly and completely as possible. I assure my hon. friend and the house that the bill which is to be before us to-day was decided upon, its features settled and, if I am not mistaken, the greater part of its provisions drafted in final form before this house met, and even before parliament was called. It was the matter which to the largest extent occupied the attention of my colleagues and myself after we had completed the work on the Canada-United States trade agreement.

May I conclude by saying that at each stage the minister himself was the one who asked that the additional procedure mentioned should take place. When we come to read the bill it will be seen that one of the clauses gives to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) the authority of bringing the recommendations of the board to the attention of the cabinet. The Minister of Finance himself—I am not disclosing secrets that I should not—talked to me time and again about his not wishing to appear in his position to be in any way superseding the position of the Minister of National Defence. He thought that being naturally sensitive in this whole matter the Minister of National Defence might feel that others would think this provision was in the nature of a reflection upon him. It was because the Minister of National Defence insisted that in every respect he wished to have the financial aspect or rather the contractual relations aspect of the affairs of the Department of National Defence removed as largely as possible from the department and put, as it is in Great Britain, under the treasury or some authority in Canada corresponding thereto, that the bill is being brought down in the form in which it is to-day.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

INTERPRETATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO MAKE ANNIVERSARY OF SIGNING OF STATUTE OF WESTMINSTER A STATUTORY HOLIDAY

Mr. WILFRID GARIÉPY (Three Rivers) moved the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Interpretation Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, nations and families, like individuals, have their red-letter days. Events of special significance call for remembrance. Circumstances of particular importance deserve celebration. It is something of such a nature which prompts me to rise and present this bill.

Short as it is, the purpose of the bill is to recall yearly to our people our independence and emancipation, and to invite them to rejoice over the passage from a state of colony to a state of freedom and liberty. The object of this legislation is to add a holiday to the list of national holidays, and to make such holiday December 11, because the statute of Westminster was adopted in the old land on December 11, 1931.

In rising, I trust and hope to have the support of the house in the move I make. I know this is a request backed and endorsed by our people. I shall not delay proceedings by reading the numerous letters of approval which I have received from persons of different callings, nor shall I read the requests and petitions, the numerous resolutions passed in its favour by all kinds of bodies and societies, the writings of newspapers expressing opinions absolutely in sympathy with it and referring, all of them, to how essential it is for our national welfare that certain anniversaries be blessed and never be allowed to be forgotten by the masses and by the generations to come. This is one of them. Doctor Maurice Ollivier, of the law branch of this parliament has written:

(Translation) The life of all peoples is marked by certain dates which overshadow all others and are as beacons illuminating history and explaining it. In the history of France, it is 1789; in the history of England, 1215, and in our own history, December 11th, 1931.

(Text) The year 1789 in France meant the end of royalty, the opening of a new era, and a time when new devices and slogans were inscribed in French laws, and in the constitution of that country.

In England the year 1215 meant the alliance of King John with the nobles of his realm and the birth of that noble document, Magna Charta, more pregnant in its terms and in its objects than anything ever seen before, even in republican Rome or in ancient Greece.

The statute of Westminster is the law par excellence for Canada; it is the crowning gesture in our history; it is the final say in our marvellous advance towards progress, civilization, freedom and world importance. It is achieving the summit, after centuries of struggles and physical and intellectual labours. It is the most important constitutional result secured since the foundation of our country, brought about gradually and progressively by mutual consent, and through the genius displayed by leaders of public opinion.

Representative institutions never existed in this country under the French regime. Absolute monarchy then prevailed, and it may be that such a system was not without some advantages in the pioneering period. Our clergy worked hand in hand with the seigneurs, and truth and gratitude demand that we acknowledge and recognize the services rendered to our different communities then, as well as presently, by our clergy.

The year 1760 changed the flag under which our forefathers lived. In that year was instituted military rule which was not devoid of glory and lustre, but which was unacceptable to a civil population endowed with ambition and self respect.

In 1774 the Quebec Act brought about a slight improvement, an improvement which was still more marked in 1791 under the Constitutional Act, and again under the Union Act of 1840. But it was not until 1848 that, on instructions from the home office to Lord Elgin, the then governor, responsible government came into existence. By their firmness and foresight Lafontaine and Baldwin, giants in statesmanship, obtained from the crown for the Canadian people rights and privileges which cannot be prized too highly. Macdonald and Cartier, with Tupper, Brown, Mowat and others, are the fathers of confederation, as we have it. It is a monument of grandeur, a tower of strength, an instrument of flexible government—imperfect, if you like, but, as events prove, capable of being made suitable to our needs and requirements.

And through it all, from 1760 to 1931 laws and constitutions have been altered in London. There was the supreme power, the final authority. The statute of Westminster, adopted at our request by this final authority, removes every vestige of bondage and makes us sovereign not only within our own walls and frontiers, but throughout the world. Rights of minorities are guaranteed. That which is sacred remains sacred. But from now on we are a nation, in the full sense of the word; autonomy is firmly and definitely established and consecrated.

I am proud of Canada as she is now, with new rights and responsibilities, and I would say, Let us unite to be great and strong. Let us have not, a condition of province against province, race against race, creed against creed, but a condition where provinces, races and creeds may be standing together in brotherly love, under king and flag, to protect and defend our common heritage.

As a matter of record, may I state briefly the purpose of the statute of Westminster. It is described as "An act to give effect to certain resolutions passed by imperial conferences held in the years 1926 and 1930." It happens to be non-contentious, because we now face the fait accompli. Every political group and party, on behalf of the nation as a whole and without exception, will join in endorsing this great result which, obviously, has had the sanction of the government of the old land.

Doctor Ollivier, who has written extensively on the matter, states that the great war made possible what had looked like a dream before that time. Sixty thousand Canadians died in Flanders. Sir Robert Borden, the then Prime Minister, was emphatic in his views with respect to Canadian representation on post-war settlement commissions and at the meetings of the society of nations.

(Translation) By this statute, writes Mr. Leopold Richer:

> . . . the various dominions, including Canada, have become independent countries of the British Empire, kingdoms whose sovereign, George VI, is also king of England and emperor of India.

L'abbé Lionel Groulx has stated:

> This statute is the acknowledgement of a new state of affairs by equals and associates; a political and diplomatic contract drafted and accepted by all, each one speaking and acquiescing in the name of his country with an authority and right absolutely equal to that of the others.

As a preparation to this statute, the imperial conference of 1926 distinctly stated:

> Great Britain and the dominions are autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown, and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

(Text) May I recall that this statute secures for Canada what was desired by the American colonies prior to the Boston tea party. The revolution led by Washington might have been avoided had Lord North been animated by a different spirit. In short, the statute of Westminster declares in a few paragraphs that the British parliament has conferred sovereignty on Canada. Under its terms our country attains majority, is given complete and absolute power. It is liberated from the operation of the Colonial Laws Validity Act and can legislate with extra-territorial effect. It is no more under the power and control of the parliament of the United Kingdom. It is free as far as the merchant shipping act is concerned. The British North America Act is retained just as long as it is desired by ourselves. Amendments to the constitution of Canada are to be in the hands of Canada and Canada only. As it stands now, Canada is to choose its own representatives and make and sign its own treaties with other nations, untrammeled and without any interference whatsoever. Such conditions have their consequences. Our responsibilities are increased. Being masters in our own home, we must keep a closer eye on everything, not only the constitution itself but on our policies, internal and external. No engagement can bind us unless we are a party to it, and particularly no engagement as to war. This may create the necessity for a truly Canadian flag, the abolition of appeals to the privy council and the immediate attention to sundry matters heretofore attended to outside of our own country.

These are far-reaching changes, of a nature to create pride and self-confidence. Their effect cannot be overestimated, either in time of peace or in time of war. Under the new order of things decisions are not to be binding unless they are arrived at on this side of the water by our own Canadian parliament elected by our people. The genius for government of the British race has never been shown more clearly and established more firmly than by this great move, by this momentous concession of an old and glorious nation to a young and promising people. Rome in its palmy days, like communist Russia, like Italy and like Germany of the present age, believed in force, in armies, in concentration and in domination by sheer power. Not so with the empire of which we are proud to be a part. It is a commonwealth of equal states. Under the statute of Westminster we are partners; we have the same king. But if we bow to the same God and to the same king, nothing can bind us except our own brains, our own conscience, our own choice and decision to select and conclude. In short, His Majesty the King has become the king of Canada, and Canada emerges into complete independence, taking her place under the sun among the free nations of the world.

[Mr. Gariepy.]

Between 1890 and 1900 there was a period of uneasiness in Canada. From Toronto came a demand for imperial federation, whereas in my own province the opposite extremes were advocated, some talking complete independence and others going back to the 1854 bogey and discussing annexation. A satisfactory solution has been found and discord has been replaced by agreement. Men who differed are now united and happy in a common course of thought and action. Deserving of praise and credit as they were in their time, the Quebec Act, the Constitutional Act of 1791, the Union Act and the Confederation Act. although each a step in the right direction, were only moves toward the final and definite evolution which has been reached by the statute of Westminster.

I pray that this house will pass this bill. It is worthy of favourable consideration and enthusiastic approval. I am a Liberal, and I cannot be silent over the fact that the leaders of my party have proved to be no small factors in the adoption of this statute. In a memorable speech Sir Wilfrid Laurier said in a prophetic tone, "Canada is a nation." He gave his life for this country like Thiers, like Gladstone and like Lincoln. Laurier was a martyr to an idea, to an ideal, to a project and to a goal. He wanted all elements and all classes to work in harmony and in agreement so far as Canada's welfare was concerned. The present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was a disciple of Laurier. He was at the imperial conference of 1926 and history records the stand he took and the lead he gave, ably assisted as he was by his popular Siamese twin, the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). The right hon. Minister of Justice was the first Canadian to sign, in 1923, on behalf of Canada as a free country, a treaty with another nation. It was his glorious lot to impress the British government with the wisdom of this statute when its principles and features were being considered. Just a few days ago he said:

(Translation) In 1929 I had the honour of leading a delegation charged with the discussion and preparation of the draft of the statute of Westminster, and I devoted two months to that work.

(Text) Lapointe, Laurier, Cartier, Lafontaine and Papineau—this chain of Quebec leaders in the political field takes us back to previous centuries and recalls the part played in the progress of this country by the two great predominant races. Justice without favour, peace with honour, protection for one and all—it is under such sound policy that we shall fulfil our duties as Canadian citizens in the enjoyment of a new statute. We shall be true to our king, the king of Canada, but we shall be true also to ourselves. We shall be free like the air we breathe, free as we never were before, thanks to a statute which I want the whole country to salute and be reminded of on December 11 of each year. This is why I present this bill for adoption by this house.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the motion of the hon. member is for the second reading of bill No. 2, to amend the Interpretation Act. I am surprised that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has not risen in his place to declare this bill out of order inasmuch as it involves an expenditure of public money in its printing and in the time of the House of Commons it has taken up at so much per minute. The purpose of this bill is to make a holiday of December 11, which day is to be designated Statute of Westminster day. In my opinion there are too many holidays now, and it would be better if this parliament would devote itself to something practical for the benefit of the working people of this country and of the 300,000 or 400,000 youths who are out of work, rather than taking up time talking about academic questions like the statute of Westminster. This statute has been nothing but an empire wrecking act. It has come near to putting Canada out of the empire. Had it not been for Munich, this statute might have helped to bring about the end of the British empire.

We now have as holidays in December, December 9, the king's birthday; December 25, Christmas day, and December 26, which is more or less a holiday. There is also January 1, New Year's day, and it is now proposed to have another holiday, December 11, to be known as Statute of Westminster day. Well, good-bye and good night to work in this country. It is not holidays that the people are looking for; it is remunerative employment in Canada that Canadians want instead of having to go to the United States to look for positions.

Now, as to the proposal of the hon. member: who is asking for this statute?

Mr. SPENCE: Nobody.

Mr. CHURCH: Who has petitioned this parliament for a holiday on this date? Let us look at the statute and see what it is. It was the result of what is known as the colonial or imperial conferences—they have changed the name of these meetings—in 1923, 1926 and 1930. The representatives of Canada had no mandate from the Canadian people to bind us with such a statute as this, and those who went over there did not represent the wisdom and the judgment of the people of this country. Our people were never asked to express an opinion regarding this empire-wrecking statute known as the statute of Westminster. Of course, Canada took a leading part in obtaining it. Canada seems always to do all the talking on such matters before these conferences; but when it comes to actual performance paying or doing something practical, she does nothing at all. Canada was responsible very largely for Munich, because she persuaded the mother country to disarm the finest navy, air force and army the world ever saw, with the result that the pacifist pact of Munich was necessarily brought about.

Let us look more closely at this statute, included as chapter 4 in the statutes of Canada, 1932. It is arranged into some twelve sections. It will be noticed, in section 10, that Australia, New Zealand and Newfoundland refused to be associated with this triumph of Canada, the south of Ireland and South Africa, the three dominions which are linked together in this statute. Section 10 states that sections 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 of the act shall not apply to Australia, New Zealand or Newfoundland unless they are adopted by those dominions. What are those six sections? They are practically the whole of the binding sections of the statute.

Section 2, relating to the validity of laws made by the parliament of a dominion does not bind Australia, New Zealand or South Africa. It states that:

> The Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, shall not apply to any law made after the commencement of this act by the parliament of a dominion.

The next section relates to the power of parliament to legislate extra-territorially: Canada has adopted that, of course; although she still depends on the British fleet in time of trouble, she is over there leading in the obtaining of this empire-wrecking agreement. By section 4 the parliament of the United Kingdom is not to legislate for a dominion except by its consent. Section 5 deals with the powers of dominion parliaments in relation to merchant shipping. Section 6, as to the powers of dominion parliaments in relation to the courts of admiralty, we also put there.

It is evident that so far as Australia, New Zealand and Newfoundland are concerned, they want to be in the British empire. At this conference it was decided that every dominion must look after its own defence. Canada is coveted by all the dictators because of her magnificent natural resources. With the raw materials that we have, this land would be the happy hunting ground of the dictators if trouble occurred; there is only one agency which separates us from that trouble and from the power of the dictators, and that is the British fleet. The fleet is the protection which the motherland gives this dominion to keep open our trade routes and protect our shores. For that reason I cannot understand such legislation as this. I believe that if this statute had been submitted to the people of Canada, it would have been defeated at the polls. In the elections of 1930 and 1935 I never heard anything about it. Yet it was put over by those interested. In whose interest? To please South Africa and the people of southern Ireland. Australia and New Zealand are excepted from it almost entirely.

Let us go further and see what since this statute came into existence, is the position of the dominions. We will start with the Dominion of Canada, and see how this measure has led to separatism. The story goes back to 1919. I do not assign all the blame for this to the present government, because some of our own party were connected with this policy a few years ago. They opened a legation at Washington; and if I had been the only Conservative member to do so, I would have voted, had I been here, against the establishment of the Washington legation and other legations all over the seven seas, because in my opinion it was not only fatal in times of peace, but will be most disastrous in time of war. If it had not been for Munich, we would have found that out in twenty-four hours from the dictators. We were near to it during that awful week last September.

What part has Canada played? In 1919 we started this business of separatism by signing the peace treaty at Versailles as a separate nation. I collected these different statutes in an address on a motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) in this chamber on Wednesday, January 27, 1937, and I am reading from my speech in Hansard of that date:

> . . . a separate seat for Canada was demanded and secured at the assembly of the League of Nations. In March, 1923, the halibut treaty was signed at Washington by Canada as a separate nation.

I think the present Minister of Justice signed for Canada then.

> The imperial conference of 1923 affirmed the right of Canada to sign separate treaties. In 1924 Canada acted separately on the Dawes plan, and in that year Canada urged that the Colonial Laws Validity Act be repealed. In 1926 there was another imperial conference and the right was affirmed of each dominion to make separate and independent treaties not binding on any other country. We were given sovereign powers, and we saw the results in the Kellogg note. Separatism has gone far enough in this country. Some would abolish appeals to the privy council; others would abolish the office of lieutenant governor. Many innovations have been made during the last few years, with the result that we have nothing but a policy of separatism in this country, and this resolution, Mr. Speaker, practically says that Canada is a separate country from the mother country, like Spain or Ireland. We are bound to the mother country by ties of loyalty and affection. The governor general is also now merely a viceroy and removed from getting any advice from Downing street.

If any advice is required we are now told that Canada is the only place where one can get it. That is the position of Canada. Canada was a party to this statute of Westminster; we signed, sealed and delivered the statute which I spoke of in that debate and which I have just set out.

Now we come to Ireland. The statute was passed to please two dominions, South Africa and the south of Ireland.

Mr. GRAY: What is the hon. gentleman reading from?

Mr. CHURCH: Not only has Ireland abolished the office of governor general and can make its own treaties, but since the passage of this statute the king's head is off the coins and off the postage stamps; there is a separate flag, and the British army has been banished from Ireland. The authority and power for Ireland to act in this fashion were derived from the statute of Westminster. Yet it is supposed to be one of the dominions. From the same source come the powers of the president of Eire, as they call it, or the president of the republic as I call it; others can call it any name they like. Not only that, but Ireland has gone further. She abolished the protection of the motherland so far as the army goes. The Prime Minister of the Irish republic goes over to London and refuses to drink the royal toast at the banquet at the parliament buildings, and then he proceeds to try to annex the Six Counties. That is where they stand under this statute of Westminster.

We come to another of the dominions named in this statute, the Union of South Africa. Where does it stand? That dominion is part and parcel of this statute. On page 1, in the preamble, reference is made to the delegates from the Dominion of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, et cetera. The Prime Minister of South Africa refuses to take the privy councillor's oath. They have already hauled down the flag, and they have a little flag of their own in which there is a little eyelet hole for the union jack. The flag which protected them has been removed. They want to follow the example of Ireland, whereby they will want to be outside the empire altogether except for the protection of the British navy, and they appoint their own governor general. They want to be what is called an outside state—outside 364 days in the year, but on the last day wanting the protection of the fleet of the flag that protect their shores. There is no doubt that is where they stand.

Here is a picture of how separatism works. There was a picture in all the Canadian papers away back on November 4, showing Hon. Mr. Pirow, the Minister of Defence of South Africa, reviewing Hitler's troops right in the city of Berlin a week after Munich. And he was there before. What was he doing over there? He was over there to try to get back for Germany by exchange some of her mandated colonies. That is the position to-day; and the right hon. Prime Minister Hertzog has never taken his oath as privy councillor and will not take it. What do we find Hon. Oswald Pirow, Minister of National Defence for the Union of South Africa, doing? He went to Berlin and reviewed Hitler's troops and took the salute. I have a picture in my hand of him reviewing the troops in Berlin. The Union of South Africa some years ago passed an agreement over the head of the mother country whereby certain territories will be given back to Germany in exchange for certain others. The Minister of National Defence for South Africa finally wound up in Great Britain, and what was he trying to do there? Trying to persuade the British government to give Germany back her colonies. In Canada the press, with three or four exceptions, for years have kept the people in the dark by their lip-service to the League of Nations. There are only about four or five newspapers in this country which have opposed this doctrine of separatism.

The Daily Express of Johannesburg has a picture, to which I referred in the debate in this house two weeks ago, of the hauling down of the union jack just before a parade at which General Hertzog took the salute. The caption under the photograph is as follows:

Just before General Hertzog arrived at Swartkop aerodrome to take the salute at to-day's union day parade, officers discovered that the union jack, instead of the union flag, was flying at the saluting base. Hastily they had the union jack hauled down.

That is the position in that dominion.

This doctrine of separatism is disastrous in peace but more futile in war. We saw the result of it in 1914. Lord Roberts went up and down England telling the people that war was coming, just about a month before war broke out, and he appealed to them and to the dominions for preparedness. The leading statesmen of England, with the exception of Lord Milner, were opposed and would not listen to Lord Roberts, who was telling the people to be prepared. If they had been prepared Great Britain could have had four hundred thousand troops ready to move at the outbreak of the war, and the war would have been over in a couple of months.

We may have the same state of affairs in Canada as a result of the doctrine of separatism and trying to look after our own defence. Where are we to-day? Suppose Munich had not been a success. Germany's air force has a supremacy in the air estimated at three to one, and they would have been over London within a very few hours. What did the Secretary of State for War in Great Britain, Leslie Hore-Belisha, say? He showed the futility of the defences of London in case of war and gave the people all the real facts, not silence. I quoted in this house a couple of weeks ago what Mr. Chamberlain said that there should be the fullest publicity not only with regard to the defence of England but with regard to Britain's foreign, home and defence policies.

So far as the statute of Westminster is concerned, all the papers of Canada, with five or six exceptions, have been giving lip-service to the League of Nations, hoping that that would save us, that it would provide an armed force to protect our shores. But we know the futility of that hope because the league is done and finished.

There is no demand from the people of Canada for this bill. The act leaves us to look after our own defences ourselves. The explanatory note to the bill states:

Paragraph (11) of section 37 at present reads as follows:

(11) "holiday" includes Sundays, New Year's Day, the Epiphany, Good Friday, the Ascension, All Saints' Day, Conception Day, Easter Monday, Ash Wednesday, Christmas Day, the birthday or the day fixed by proclamation for the celebration of the birthday of the reigning sovereign, Victoria Day, Dominion Day, the first Monday in September, designated Labour Day, Remembrance Day, and any day appointed by proclamation for a general fast or thanksgiving.

Then it goes on to say that the purpose of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Gariepy):

. . . is to make the eleventh day of December a holiday throughout Canada. The Statute of Westminster, which confirmed Canada's present status, that of a sovereign country freely associated as a member of the British commonwealth of nations, was assented to on the eleventh day of December, 1931.

It is fit and proper that this most important anniversary should be kept and observed as a holiday.

The bill is entitled, "An act to amend the Interpretation Act," and reads:

His majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. Paragraph eleven of section thirty-seven of the Interpretation Act, chapter one of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, as enacted by chapter six of the statutes of 1935, is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(11) 'holiday' includes Sundays, New Year's Day, the Epiphany, Good Friday, the Ascension, All Saints' Day, Conception Day, Easter Monday, Ash Wednesday, Christmas Day, the birthday or the day fixed by proclamation for the celebration of the birthday of the reigning sovereign, Victoria Day, Dominion Day, the eleventh day of December, designated Statute of Westminister Day, the first Monday in September, designated Labour Day, Remembrance Day, and any day appointed by proclamation for a general fast or thanksgiving;"

I see no demand for this legislation, Mr. Speaker. But this government wants to change everything.

Under the statute of Westminster each of the dominions is to be responsible for its own home defence. Where is Canada's? What home defence have we if Canada is invaded by the dictators? We had a little discussion in this house last year about Japan—

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is going far afield from the subject matter of this bill when he talks about the defence of this country. This bill has to do with adding one more holiday to our list of national holidays, and the hon. member is not at liberty to speak of national defence on this bill.

Mr. CHURCH: Let me quote the words of the statute of Westminster respecting defence—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is repeating his argument, and there is a rule of this house which says that an hon. member repeating his argument all the time may be called to order by the Speaker. The hon. member is not adding anything new.

Mr. CHURCH: Then I will say it at some other time, Mr. Speaker. If all parliament has to do is to spend its time discussing academic questions like this, the sooner we go home the better. A private member has no rights here; yet a private member is the only connecting link between the government of the day and the electors, and when he ceases to function all parliamentary government is at an end. I have, as an authority for the functions and rights of private members and their duty, that statement in Edmund Burke, who in his address to the electors of Bristol said:

Certainly, gentlemen, it ought to be the happiness and glory of a representative to live in the strictest union, the closest correspondence, and the most unreserved communication with his constituents—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member cannot impute motives. The hon. member for Three Rivers is quite within his rights in introducing this bill.

Mr. CHURCH: I accept your ruling Mr. Speaker. I doubt if a private member can say anything in this house. We have rules and regulations governing us that are three and four hundred years old. All we are here is a house of undertakers, janitors and caretakers. That is what we are coming to.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: We have no powers; we might as well go home.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I must congratulate the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Gariépy) on his very fine address and thank him personally for his kind words concerning myself. I hope he will not be too disappointed if I question the necessity or the opportuneness of carrying the bill into legislation. The hon. member for Three Rivers said such nice things about the modest work I had to do in connection with what led to the statute of Westminster that I needed the other words of my hon. friend the member for Broadview (Mr. Church) to bring me down to a status of humility.

As far as the proposal is concerned, to declare this particular date a holiday, to attain the purpose of the proposer of the bill would need more amendments than this one, because the Interpretation Act only defines what a holiday is when there is no other interpretation in the text of special legislation. On every occasion when we celebrate a holiday, that holiday is defined. For instance, in the Bank Act, in the Letters of Exchange Act, in the Civil Service Act, the holidays provided for are therein all described; and merely to add this date to the Interpretation Act would not have the effect of creating holidays for the various purposes of those legislative enactments. That could be remedied, of course, by adding amendments to the bill. I am doubtful, however, about the proposal itself, not because of the motives of my hon. friend but because I believe that the first of July, Dominion day, is the national day of Canada and embraces the commemoration of all that Canada has done in her progress to nationhood.

Dominion day means confederation day. The confederation was formed in 1867 by the joining together of four colonies, and the new nation, or at least the country that was on the way to nationhood, gradually added to itself other provinces and made various improvements to reach the status which we now enjoy. This has been a gradual process. I will not describe the various stages; my hon. friend did. The year 1926, of course, crystallized the work that had been done, and the position of Canada in the British commonwealth was actually defined and accepted by all on a status of equality. In 1929 we had the conference in London where a draft of the statute of Westminster was prepared, discussed, debated and accepted and finally, in the following year, the statute was enacted defining Canada's nationhood.

All along there were many difficulties to be met and faced. Every step forward has been fought, most frequently by arguments such as those used by the hon. member for Broadview to-night. I may say that even those who accept the statute of Westminster to-day, and not only accept it but celebrate its anniversary on different occasions, were rather indifferent at the time, and some of them were apprehensive. It was represented as meaning separatism, separation from the British empire, as the hon. member for Broadview said to-night. Of course, it is the opposite. It is a symbol of union; it is unity and freedom; it is the bond that binds together the various parts of the commonwealth under the same crown. Freedom is the cement that binds all these nations together, and if the people of Canada and of the various countries of the commonwealth had ideas such as those expressed by the hon. member for Broadview, that, I believe, would lead to division, disunion and disruption.

Fortunately, my hon. friend's voice is one in the wilderness, because most of the people of Canada accept the situation as it is and are pleased at the change. But—and here I address myself to the hon. member for Three Rivers—the statute of Westminster applies to all Canada. It was the goal of all Canada and Dominion day, which is Canada's day, the national day of the whole country, embraces it all; so that undoubtedly the celebration of Dominion day, the Westminster act and the statute that was passed as a result of that act, all go together.

I do not believe that too many holidays would be advisable. I believe perhaps we ought to have fewer holidays, but we should celebrate them with greater keenness, more fervour and more patriotic enthusiasm. For instance, Dominion day, Canadian day, is not in my opinion celebrated as it should be throughout the country as the national day, as the national days of other nations are celebrated. It should be more assertive of the national spirit of Canada. I repeat, I do not think there should be too many holidays.

I have a list of the public holidays in England. For instance, bank holidays in England and Wales, Ireland and the Channel islands are, Easter Monday, Whit-Monday, the first Monday in August and the first day after Christmas or Boxing day. Banks are also closed on Good Friday and Christmas day; stock exchanges are closed on bank holidays; customs houses and docks are also closed on bank holidays and the king's birthday, June 3, or when decreed. It appears that the banks are open on the king's birthday, because it is specially stated that customs houses and docks are celebrating the same holidays as the banks, with the addition of the king's birthday. The law offices close on Good Friday, Easter Monday and Tuesday, Whit-Monday, Christmas day and the first day after Christmas, that is Boxing day. There are really less holidays there than we have here at the present time.

I have another reason to offer. The statute of Westminster is a great step; but it is not as final for Canada as it has been for most of the other dominions, because of certain things which prevent complete nationhood, in spite of the fact that those obstacles are of our own will, are there because we want them to be there.

Mr. PELLETIER: Would the minister say that there has been any sort of agreement between the various provinces to request the enactment of this statute?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have only five minutes left, and I may be presumptuous, but what I have to say is more important to me than giving the statement that my hon. friend would like me to make.

First, there is the right to amend our own constitution. This is the most important legislative work; it is our own charter; the conditions under which we act as legislatures here and in the provinces are still laid down at Westminster. This is by our own desire, because of our special conditions, but it is there. How can it be accepted in international law that we are a fully sovereign nation when we have to resort to the parliament of another country to effect changes in our constitutional structure? This creates a situation which I hope to take the opportunity to deal with in connection with some important matters which will be debated this session concerning foreign affairs and various bills which are on the order paper.

In the second place, there are the privy council appeals. There, again, it is our own will; we can change it any time; we have the right to abolish appeals to the privy council, but we have not done so. Litigants from Canada must go to the mother country to get a final decision in Canadian cases. As the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) said last year, the sovereignty of Canada resides in the judicial committee.

There is another matter which has been discussed this session for a couple of hours, but which seems to be treated as futile, namely, the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag. We cannot say that we have complete equality of status and full sovereignty until we have a Canadian flag. As far as I am concerned—I am speaking only for myself—I think the three matters I have mentioned will have to be dealt with and definitely solved before we can say that we are like the other dominions which have all done so. These dominions are as loyal as Canada, their people as loyal as any Canadians. But there are some people in Canada with the ideas of the hon. member for Broadview, who are afraid of asserting themselves, or to declare that they are full Canadian citizens.

This is not in any respect talking in favour of separation. I tell hon. members most sincerely and earnestly that I believe that the best way to keep the Dominion of Canada in the British commonwealth of nations—I hope to God it will always remain in the British commonwealth of nations—is to have a Canada free and equal in status in every respect. It is cooperation in freedom. And I repeat, none of those steps has led or will lead to separation.

I am pleased that my hon. friend has brought the matter up, in order that it might be discussed; it is an important subject. I do not suppose he expected that his bill would be accepted this session. His purpose must have been accomplished by having the matter discussed, and I suppose he will not insist on his bill being enacted this year.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CREATION OF DEFENCE PURCHASING BOARD TO ENTER INTO CONTRACTS FOR MUNITIONS, EQUIPMENT, MATERIALS AND SUPPLIES

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver) that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish a defence purchasing board with exclusive power, subject to approval of the governor in council, to enter into all contracts for the purchase of munitions, equipment, materials and supplies required by the Department of National Defence in cases where the expenditure exceeds $5,000; to provide safeguards to assure that such munitions, equipment, materials and supplies shall be purchased at a reasonable cost to the government and without unreasonable profit to any manufacturer or supplier thereof; to provide that salaries, wages and other expenses of the board shall be payable out of moneys appropriated by parliament.

To authorize the governor in council to borrow such sums of money as may be required to pay expenditures of the Department of National Defence which are chargeable to capital account in the appropriations provided by parliament for the said department; and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to retire in ten years the said sums borrowed for capital expenditures of the said department, together with interest thereon at three per cent per annum.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): This resolution which was being considered by the house before recess, plainly contemplates extensive private manufacture of armaments in Canada. For the sake of making that clear, I will read the first part of the resolution, which is as follows:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish a defence purchasing board with exclusive power, subject to approval of the governor in council, to enter into all contracts for the purchase of munitions, equipment, materials and supplies required by the Department of National Defence in cases where the expenditure exceeds $5,000.

To me the most significant feature of the discussion which took place this afternoon was the announcement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) that the government have adopted a policy of restricting manufactures in dominion arsenals; in other words, that our arsenals are to make only certain ammunition of a type of which a continuous supply is required. This means—and I suggest that the house and the Canadian people should understand it clearly—that Canada is going much further in the private manufacture of armaments than the United Kindom or any of the other dominions. It means that our government have adopted a policy of relying almost exclusively on private firms for our armaments, contrary to the definite recommendation of our general staff as opposed to the recommendation of the deputy minister of national defence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I regret to interrupt my hon. friend, but he said that I had made some statement. I made no reference to any policy respecting arsenals this afternoon.

Mr. GREEN: I think the Prime Minister will recollect he stated that he had discussed with the Minister of National Defence on numerous occasions the question whether or not Canada should manufacture her armaments in dominion arsenals or should have them manufactured by private companies with profits restricted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did discuss these matters with the minister; but I made no statement of policy this afternoon in regard to that.

Mr. GREEN: At any rate, the Minister of National Defence made a statement of policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I hate to interrupt my hon. friend, but I think I stated, at least I hope I conveyed the impression to my hon. friend that the policy I would like to see adopted is to extend the facilities of state manufacture as far as they are possibly practicable. I meant to convey that, all through my address.

Mr. GREEN: I am afraid the minister and his department wish one way and act another, because their actions certainly are in the other direction. As I have said, the government are doing this contrary to the recommendations of their own general staff. That was set out in the report in the Bren gun inquiry, where it is stated at page 10:

> The minister said that there were two very definite schools of thought in the department and that he assumed all responsibility. One school, he said, was headed by the then chief of general staff, and the other by the deputy minister, for both of whom he said he had equally great admiration.

I would point out that, under our law, the deputy minister is not a military official. He is a civil official. Yet his recommendation was taken over that of the chief of general staff, who is a military official. Then the report goes on:

> The minister said that General Ashton (the then chief of the general staff) was very insistent upon the development of government arsenals and that the former chief of general staff, General McNaughton, evolved a very comprehensive scheme for Valcartier which would include practically all the requirements of the Canadian forces.

Mr. GRAY: The minister said that to-day.

Mr. GREEN: And I am repeating it to-night. The government may be right in adopting this policy, but personally I do not think they are. I believe they are not looking far enough ahead, and I believe they have drifted into their policy as the easiest course to follow in the recent emergency, instead of taking a long-range view, instead of realizing that we are really just beginning this business of defending ourselves and that we shall require munitions and war equipment for many many years to come.

Australia has gone the other way. She has an arsenal policy, developed after the war—which is the time, incidentally, when Canada should have developed her defence policy. And the House of Commons might very well remember that during all those years the present Prime Minister was at the head of the Canadian government.

After the war Australia set out on an effective arsenal policy. The result is that she produces not only her own munitions, but also her own machine guns and rifles, and I believe she either produces or is able to produce her light artillery and anti-aircraft guns, and her 4·5 howitzers. Incidentally, she produces her own Bren guns.

Then, the Australian arsenals serve as pilot plants for private industry. They develop the processes required for manufacture which, if necessary, can be made available to private industry. They produce the tools, jigs, gauges and so on which are required by private industry for the production of armaments. They do research work and train key men for armament manufacture. Hon. members who are interested will find an excellent summary in the Canadian Defence Quarterly, volume 14, at page 288. It is an article entitled Australian Defence, written by the Hon. Sir Archdale Parkhill, Minister for Defence for Australia.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not now.

Mr. GREEN: No, but he was at the time this was written. The question of munitions supply in Australia is discussed at page 296, and I should like to read the following paragraph which seems to sum up the situation:

> In time of war the government factories would be quite inadequate, but in peace time they serve as places where a technical staff can be trained, and in the course of that training it is arranged that the ordinary peace time requirements of munitions by the fighting services are produced. The factories are also organized as the centres from which manufacturing details would be circulated to the commercial industries should necessity require their conversion from their normal pursuits.

In Australia they have what I believe this house might very well consider establishing in Canada, namely what they call a munitions supply branch. I believe it is very much like the old munitions board of Canada. The summary sets out that the munitions supply branch, which to a great extent has been modeled after the old ministry of munitions in England, is administered by a board which has functions which I shall enumerate presently. I suggest the minister might get more efficient work from a munitions supply branch or a munitions board of this type than he will get from his proposed purchasing board. The functions of the Australian munitions supply branch, which is a part of the Department of Defence in Australia, are these:

(a) To manufacture and arrange for local production of armament, arms, ammunition, supplies and stores of all kinds as may be demanded by the fighting services.

(b) To provide facilities for scientific research and experiment, and the inspection and examination of munitions.

(c) The designing of factories, machines and tools for production in time of war and the making and checking of gauges for trade manufacture.

(d) The training of men in the manufacture of munitions for distribution as instructors and inspectors to the civil factories in time of war.

The summary goes on to explain about the different factories and organizations which the Australian government have. For instance, they have a clothing factory which makes uniforms not only for the armed forces but also for the postal and tramway employees. It also makes mail bags. I should not like to be considered as suggesting that this government should go into the business of making standard articles such as blankets, clothing and so on. I think all that work might very well be left to private firms. But in Australia we find that they have a commonwealth clothing factory. Then, they have a munitions factory, an explosives factory and an ordnance factory which, as I have stated, is capable of making guns up to 4·5 calibre. At page 299 of the Canadian Defence Quarterly we find that lately the ordnance factory has commenced the manufacture of three-inch anti-aircraft guns, with mountings, and that good progress is being made. It is stated that in the projectile factory every class of shot and shell up to eight inches in diameter is made, and the larger types of bombs are also being manufactured. Then, they have a small arms factory, and they provide for investigation into chemical defence, inspection services, and so on. Apparently this is an adequate munitions supply branch.

Mr. GRAY: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is he opposing the resolution of the minister?

Mr. GREEN: I think if the hon. member will keep his seat for a few moments, and will listen until I have finished my speech, he will find out what I am doing.

The manufacture of munitions has developed to such an extent in Australia that in 1937, at the imperial conference, the Right Hon. J. A. Lyons, Prime Minister, was able to report to the other dominions and to the United Kingdom the following, which appears at page 17 of the summary of proceedings of the conference:

The building up of the munitions supply organization had reached the stage that the government factories had developed the capacity for the production of the various types of the ordinary requirements of the army, navy and air force, and these resources were being further expanded. A survey of civil industry was also being carried out to determine the possibilities of capacity for production, and to prepare plans for mobilizing its resources in an emergency.

Just about a month ago a local Ottawa paper carried a news dispatch from Australia headed, "Australia near self-sufficiency in munitions manufacture." This is a dispatch from Melbourne, dated February 7, by Canadian Press and Reuters:

So great has been Australia's development of munitions supply that she is now nearing national self-sufficiency in munitions manufacture. The number of employees in munitions factories has been doubled in the last four years, though the actual number employed is not revealed.

And it goes on to set out the extent to which the Australian program has been developed.

So much for Australia. Now we turn to the United Kingdom where they have had such lengthy experience in the production of armaments. We find the position there to be much the same as it is in Australia. The minister will correct me if I am wrong in any of my information. I believe there are government arsenals at Woolwich and Enfield as well as many other government armament factories, some for example, in the depressed areas. All these factories are manufacturing armaments much in the same way as Australia, probably more or less in the capacity of pilot plants. This afternoon the minister quoted from the report of the royal commission on the private manufacture of and trading in arms which sat in Great Britain in 1935 and 1936. I think it should be noted that the sixth recommendation by that commission is as follows:

We recommend that the government should assume complete responsibility for the arms industry in the United Kingdom and should organize and regulate the necessary collaboration between the government and private industry; that this responsibility should be exercised through a controlling body, presided over by a minister responsible to parliament, having executive powers in peace time and in war time, over all matters relating to the supply and manufacture of arms and munitions, costing and the authorization of orders from abroad.

The commission went on to make this further recommendation, which I submit applies to Canada just as much as to the United Kingdom:

We further recommend that the government's own manufacturing establishments should be fully equipped for the production in some measure of naval, military, and air armaments of all types.

I understand that South Africa is making similar provisions for the manufacture of armaments. All these sister nations use government arsenals as the basis of their plans for the providing of armaments. In Canada apparently the arsenal at Quebec is doing first-class work. The arsenal at Lindsay is not doing very much, my information being that it is only making brass plates for shell cases, but it is an arsenal which could be used for the production of many more articles than are being produced at the present time. Yet, in spite of all this, we actually have the government turning over machinery for the making of munitions to a private firm, as was done in connection with the Bren gun contract, and buying machinery for another private firm in the case of the Montreal company which is to make shells. This is just the reverse of what is being done in Great Britain and Australia. To date Canada has not gone very far with this restricted arsenal policy. For example, we have not yet manufactured any rifles, any anti-aircraft guns or any artillery. The minister will correct me if that is wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Correct.

Mr. GREEN: Sooner or later we shall have to face the question of how we are going to obtain these armaments. I suggest to the government that before they proceed any further with the present policy they should reconsider the whole question. They should arrange to use the dominion arsenals as Australia and the United Kingdom have done. I do not believe the Canadian people approve reliance being placed exclusively upon private firms for our armaments, and I do not believe they will tolerate, let alone approve, armament rings and armament trusts, which are likely to spring up as a result of the government's policy. On the other hand, I have no doubt our people would be solidly behind a policy such as that adopted by Australia and the United Kingdom, even though this policy required in the beginning a heavier capital outlay than does the present policy; the government have at hand the means of raising the money under their new plan for financing capital expenditures for armaments on a ten year basis. I suggest that in dealing with this very important problem the government show a little more of the foresight and initiative and courage of the individual Canadian.

Mr. GRAY: I come back again to ask the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green)—

Mr. MANION: Put it on the order paper.

Mr. GRAY: I will ask him now. Is he opposed to the resolution of the minister?

Mr. GREEN: The hon. member can read my speech in the morning and he will see exactly what I am in favour of.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I should like to know from the minister who is to compose this new board. There is a rumour in the house that the former Minister of Labour, the Hon. Wesley Gordon, will be one of the members. He was a minister in the Bennett government. It is also rumoured that Mr. Tom Moore, the well known parasite here in the city of Ottawa, will be another member.

Mr. HEAPS: That is not fair.

Mr. POULIOT: I should like to know if there is any foundation in those rumours. There will be no partisanship in that, and I hope the minister will answer me later on. Mr. Wesley Gordon was dumb when he was Minister of Labour. Quite often when I asked him a question it did not seem that I was addressing the chair; it seemed as though I was addressing the desks because there was no answer.

Mr. MANION: I rise to a point of order. I do not like to interrupt my hon. friend because he is generally amusing even though he does not often enlighten the house. I do not think attacks on Wesley Gordon and Tom Moore have anything to do with the resolution before the house. I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, to deal with the hon. member as you have with others, and make him keep to the subject before the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member should be more careful.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the minister be kind enough to tell me if Wesley Gordon and Tom Moore are to be members of this board?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The minister is in no position to tell my hon. friend who are to be members on this board. I expressed a general principle this afternoon. I should be glad to see a board established which would command the confidence of all the Canadian people and in the appointment of which the hon. members of every party in this house would concur.

Mr. POULIOT: As I am a Canadian I warn the minister against falling on slippery ground by appointing those who are unworthy of the confidence of the government. That is my humble opinion. I am a Liberal to the core. I was born a Liberal, I am a Liberal, and I shall die a Liberal. But that does not prevent me from liking some Tories, although not all of them.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Has the hon. member no ambition?

Mr. POULIOT: And also some members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, whose conversion I expect to see some day, as well as some of my hon. friends of the Social Credit party.

I am a Liberal. I believe in Liberal policies, having been taught Liberal policies when I was a child. I have always fought for Liberalism. At times I was alone in voting against the social policy of the last government. I was proud of that; and my electors supported me, and the speech that I am making now I can make anywhere in my constituency, anywhere in the province of Quebec, anywhere in Canada. I am sick of suffering the continuance of Tory policies. I am fed up with them. I am a Liberal to the core. Here, provided that any minister has the approval of any Tory, he is sure that he is on safe ground.

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: That is where he is mistaken. And now I am very doubtful if this legislation is a legitimate child. Who is the father? Is it Sir Thomas White, who was the patron saint of all profiteers during the war? Reference to him was made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) in his speech. Afterwards he quoted the former leader of the opposition; then he quoted the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), and then the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). He forgot the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), who corrected his forgetfulness by quoting his own paper. Who is the father? Is it Sir Thomas White? Is it Mr. Bennett the bachelor? Is it the present leader of the opposition? Is the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation the father? It is a most important measure.

Mr. LAWSON: Who is going to be charged as the putative father?

Mr. POULIOT: It is very hard to say, but what can be said is that the child is surely illegitimate.

An hon. MEMBER: Is it not more important to know about the mother?

Mr. POULIOT: Afterwards we had some explanation from my chief to the effect that the Minister of National Defence had suggested to him that he did not want any contractual aspect of the Department of National Defence to be under himself, but that it should be under the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). I am in full sympathy with the Minister of National Defence. He is my friend, and when everybody had a long face, at the time of the discussion of the Bren contract, I tried to crank the old Ford of the House of Commons to make it a little more snappy and to chase neurasthenia from the minds of my friends.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Did the hon. member succeed?

Mr. POULIOT: I tried to help the best I could. But now I think of the late famous Japanese general, General Oku, when he committed hara-kiri.

An hon. MEMBER: What is that?

Mr. POULIOT: Of course the minister of a department is the head of the department; but I fear that in this case, to quote Roman law, there is not a decapitation but there is a diminutio capitis, a reduction of head. This is not at all subtle. In fact, in the Department of National Defence there are two things. There is on the one hand the army, navy and air force; afterwards there are the supplies for the army, the tripartite army, consisting of army, navy and air force, and those supplies are of two kinds. There are, first, what we may call clothes, food and so on; and then there are the munitions. All contracts concerning the fabrication of armaments are transferred to the Department of Finance.

According to this resolution a new board will be created, and I strongly object to the creation of that board. I find it absurd. And I find it absurd because I am a good Liberal and because I have always fought the battles of the Liberal party. For me the Minister of National Defence is a good minister. I consider him so. I believe in him, and I want him to continue to act as Minister of National Defence. I say that as one of two hundred and forty-five members, expressing my own views. He is the victim of one of the worst intrigues of bureaucracy that I have ever witnessed.

Of course all the speeches that have been delivered by the hon. gentlemen who have spoken this afternoon and this evening were most interesting, but not one was to the point. You find that extraordinary, Mr. Speaker. But if hon. gentlemen will read Hansard of February 13, not for the speeches themselves but for the evidence, they will see that the cause of all this fuss is the fact that there was an incompetent individual in the Department of National Defence. Just because he belongs to the Rideau club, belongs to a highly respectable family of Ottawa, and has fine connections and relations, he will keep his job there; and instead of his being replaced by a competent man, a new organism is created at great cost just to do the work that that man should have done. I will not name him; it would give him too much importance. I do not think one should fire a 15-inch gun at a fly or a firefly; a puff is sufficient. But the evidence is there. It was put on Hansard; although it is always dull to read the reports of a committee, it was put there just to prove an evident fact, just to prove a thing that one sees very well, that it is dark at night, that it is bright in the daytime. It is there in the first pages of Hansard of February 13.

Then, to summarize the little speech that my distinguished leader made this afternoon, it was not, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) said, as a result of the Bren discussion in the house that we have now to discuss this measure, but it was precisely on account of the report of Judge Davis, which was forwarded to council before we had it in the house. This is exactly the recommendation that has been made by Judge Davis. I am ready to support any policy which is enacted by the government that I have been standing with all the time and that I still stand with. But I will never vote for any so-called Liberal policy which is drafted by a Tory judge. That is all there is to it.

Mr. GRAY: The minister has already recommended it.

Mr. POULIOT: Now, Mr. Speaker, there was an interdepartmental committee for the purchase of munitions. It was headed by whom? It was headed by Doctor Oscar D. Skelton, under-secretary of state for external affairs, the champion of the League of Nations —buying armaments for the defence of our country. Can you imagine anything more ridiculous, Mr. Speaker—Doctor Oscar D. Skelton, champion of the League of Nations, purchasing armaments for the defence of our country! He was the head man. He was surrounded by others, who are not bad men, but very few of them were lawyers. They had to pass on contracts, and so well was their work done that on the thirty-second day of the Bren gun investigation Judge Davis wondered who had drafted that particular contract. Because the committee had made no progress for months they had to work one night for the very first time, to settle the contract. I refer you, Mr. Speaker, to page 846 of Hansard for what the judge said.

Now there is Tom Moore who is out of a job. He is well known as a parasite, a man who has put in his pocket $13,813 paid to him by this country when he had not worked at all. He was on the unemployment insurance commission, and he had absolutely nothing to do at the time, for the legislation was being appealed before the privy council. Now he calls himself a dominion public servant. I do not want him on this board, sir, and I so notify the minister.

With regard to Mr. Wesley Gordon I will say nothing more than that there will be a revolt in the province of Quebec and throughout Canada if he is appointed because he was not competent as Minister of Labour. It may be a policy of appeasement of my Conservative friends in this house to say: We will appoint an important Conservative to the board. But I believe, Mr. Speaker, that there are good men among the Liberals, and it will be an insult to each one of them to select Tories when we have to award contracts. Is it impossible to find four just men in the Liberal party who are qualified to be appointed to that board? Is it necessary to cater to the official opposition and the other groups in this house? If the government have something to do, let them do it boldly and they will meet with the approval of the country.

I want the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) to stand up like a man and defend his own department, and not let it be carved up as our constituencies were carved up by the late administration. I want him to remain minister in full charge of his department. He has nothing to turn over to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). I do not blame the Minister of Finance for this, but there again I see the nigger in the woodpile—these people who want to hold all the strings of government in the Department of Finance. In England the thing has been refused by the British House of Commons. Here the Department of Finance has complete control over the expenditures of every department, and now they are taking from the hands of the Minister of National Defence the absolute right which he has to award contracts for munitions which will be used by the soldiers, sailors and airmen under the minister's control. I strongly object to that. It is a master intrigue, Mr. Speaker, which has been catered to by Doctor Skelton, Tom Moore and others I could name, for instance, Mr. Clark of the Department of Finance, et cetera. I see some members who think of rising and saying that these men are not in this house; but they are our servants, and we are here to discuss their actions. I see bureaucracy there. In the United States they have a committee now studying the menace of bureaucracy which is the worst threat to democracy. They feel that in the United States, just as we feel it here. At the present time the civil servants, most of them, have no respect for their ministers, and why? Because they are paid, not under the authority of their own minister but under the authority of the Minister of Finance. That should stop. In the name of Liberalism there must be an end to it.

Of course there may be some Conservative members listening to me at the present time who may not agree with me, but they know that no one can pull a hair from my head here in this House of Commons. I have been battling for the Liberal party all the time; and even when I did not listen to the orders I received from my leaders to stop or shut up, it was for their own good, for their own defence. When I fought alone against the nefarious social legislation of the Bennett government, it was to keep the home fires burning in the province of Quebec. Fifteen days before the election I went to Toronto, the holy city of Toronto, where I told my audience that sixty Liberals would be elected out of sixty-five seats in the province of Quebec, and that message was carried to the homes of the whole population of Ontario by the Telegram as well as the Globe, by the Mail as well as by the Star.

The Liberal party is an entity. I believe in Liberalism, and if at times I use strong words in reply to my friends opposite to my right, it is not because I lack Christian charity, but because I do not believe in their doctrines. They do not sit here as citizens but as members of parliament representing certain doctrines, certain ideas, with which I do not agree. If I can help them personally at any time I shall be glad to do so, but they shall always find me in their way fighting to the last ditch any of their doctrines that I consider pernicious and find to be all wrong.

My great grandfather was a humble merchant who was one of those who in 1834 voted for the ninety-two resolutions in the Quebec legislative assembly. He was one of those who believed in the same doctrines as William Lyon Mackenzie, the grandfather of my chief. I believe in responsible government, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of National Defence knows that I am his friend, and I want him to present the estimates of his department as the chief and head of his own department.

I want him to withdraw this legislation and to get rid of the thirty or forty employees of the Department of Finance who are a pest in his own department. I want him not to present this legislation to the house. Mark you, that does not mean that I am in favour of big profits on armaments, but I want the minister to have control himself and to be given a free hand, and he is at liberty to kick out of his department some of the incompetent men who cast an undeserved slur upon him.

Those, Mr. Speaker, are the views of a Liberal from below Quebec, and you also represent a constituency below Quebec. I do not want to be misunderstood. If Mr. Chamberlain found a policy of appeasement to be the right thing, I find it all wrong. Either our policies are good or they are bad. Even if they are very good we could expect the opposition to criticize them.

Mr. MANION: No, never.

Mr. POULIOT: In theory they may deny it, but in practice, Mr. Speaker, you will see that that is done. If our policy is wrong, let us withdraw it; but if our policy is good, let us go ahead with it. That is my humble view. Then, if you do not satisfy the interests of our friends by giving them plums and large contracts, at least the members of the Liberal party will satisfy the minds and expectations of our friends, and the Canadian people will understand then that the Liberal party is true to its mission of defending the rights of the people against the rights of monopolies. I regard it as an insult and I protest in the name of the Minister of National Defence, who knows I am one of his best friends in this house, against the dismemberment of his department. He is a worthy minister. Let him keep his department as a whole and let him administer it with the good men he has in it, provided that he has, I will not say the courage—I know that he has—but the freedom to kick out those who are unworthy to be there and who, because they are incompetent, expose the lives of our children and others, in case of attack on this country.

I heard the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) speak of the integrity of the personnel of the interdepartmental committee. I do not discuss their honesty; I give them the benefit of the doubt. But some are incompetent. There, sir, you have the whole story. Now I appeal to my hon. friend the minister. I ask him to reconsider what he said the other day when he urged us all to support this procedure. I for one cannot. I ask him not to insist upon it but to speak again to the Prime Minister and to say to him, "I was weak the other day when I suggested to you, sir, to allow one important part of my department to go to the Department of Finance. I was wrong, and I have changed my mind after due reflection. Now, sir, it is in the interests of the country for me to keep the department as it is at present." The Prime Minister would understand, surely, and it would be for the good of the government and for the good of the department as well.

Here in the service, sir, it is my experience that when a man is incompetent he may get a promotion, but he is sure never to be troubled. And here in this house, if I say there is an incompetent man somewhere, I shall be told that he is my bête noire, that I am after him; or I shall be told that he is not here. It is most ridiculous. We are here to discuss the value of the men in the public service who are in charge of important positions. If they are competent, all right; but if they are incompetent, then I say "Get rid of them," and the sooner the better—the better government we shall have. Otherwise this country will be a democracy only in name; in fact, it will be a country in which there exists the dictatorship of bureaucracy. I hope these warnings that have been given for the good of the minister, for the good of the government, and to express the feelings of all in my province and in Canada at large, will be heard and heeded.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I hope that now the minister has decided upon a board, he will meet with the same success which has attended the activities of the British munitions board. I have here a summary of their report as given by the manager of the commission, Colonel Carnegie.

I fear a shortage of power if an emergency overtakes this country. As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, in 1917 there was a shortage of coal in Canada, and we also found ourselves faced with a shortage of hydro power owing to the fact that Ontario was supplying export power to other points and the huge demands for munitions. At one period of the war, in 1917, as this Carnegie book of the history of Canadian munitions shows, Ontario was manufacturing forty per cent of the total shells supplied to the British forces. She was able to do this largely on account of the huge power she had from the Hydro commission, but the demand for power was acute.

The debates that have been going on for a month or so now may, after all, prove to have served a most useful purpose. There were similar debates in Great Britain during the early days of the war and we had them here too. It brought about here a demand for reforms.

There are a few things which I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. The resolution declares that it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish a defence purchasing board with exclusive power, subject to approval of the governor in council, to enter into all contracts for the purchase of munitions and so forth in cases where the expenditure exceeds $5,000. In my opinion it would be better for the new board to assume complete control, with the necessary safeguards, over contracts amounting to more than $200, not only over those of more than $5,000. That was more or less the policy during the war, and competitive bids were called for those up to $200. Over that there would be a straight contract under the board.

I hope that the minister will see to it that everyone who wishes to have his plant surveyed will be given that opportunity. Prior to the war the Baldwin interests had a granite sets plant in Toronto at Ashbridge bay. In the early days of the war tariff changes were made which handicapped it, and it was at last turned into one of the largest munition factories in the empire. It was under the control of the British munitions board. The first shipment of shells, only a few, was made in December, 1914, and in 1915, on the institution of a new policy of the British munitions board, production went ahead by leaps and bounds. The late Mr. Fred Miller, a great patriot, was connected with the plant in an honorary way, as was also Mr. E. L. Cousins, manager of the harbour board. As I say, it was one of the largest munitions establishments in the British empire and it did very well.

I wish this new board every success, and I do not believe that the discussion which has taken place in this house, and which, after all, led to and was responsible for a board, will do any harm, because it will be an intimation to the manufacturers of Canada that they must be up and doing. The Economist of London, England, has had some pertinent remarks to make with regard to the question of home defence. I quote:

It is not merely with reluctance, but with repugnance that most citizens acquiesce in rearmament. There is one aspect of the matter, however, to which these feelings need not so fully apply. The army, the navy, and the air force are each of them necessarily concerned with the taking of life and the destruction of wealth. But there is a fourth arm, home defence, which, though it costs money which can ill be spared, is at least concerned exclusively with protection and preservation. Home defence, moreover, has a peculiar urgency for Great Britain, for in many ways we are one of the most vulnerable of European nations. It is more difficult for us than for others either to protect our population from air raids or to ensure that they are supplied with food.

I trust that the new organization which is to be set up will follow the principles and great record that guided the British munitions board in Canada during the great war. When the war broke out Canada did not have a single plant to make shells, but by the co-operation of manufacturers, of labour and of a large number of key men who served voluntarily and without pay, a glorious record was made by Canada, and I wish the minister's new board equal success.

Iron and steel are the principal ingredients in modern armaments. Let me read two paragraphs from the report by the imperial munitions board of what Canada did; and I hope this new board will be able to parallel those achievements. In the report issued by the British war cabinet for the year 1917 it was stated:

Canada's contribution during the last year has been striking. Fifteen per cent of total expenditure of the ministry of munitions in the last six months of the year was incurred in that country. She has manufactured nearly every type of shell from 18 pounder to 9·2 inch. In the case of the 18 pounder no less than 55 per cent of the output of shrapnel shells in the last six months came from Canada, and most of these were complete rounds of ammunition. . . . Canada also contributed 42 per cent of the total 4·5 inch shells, 27 per cent of the 6 inch shells, 20 per cent of the 8 inch and 16 per cent of the 9·2 inch.

[Mr. Church.]

The following figures give some idea of what Canada accomplished in the production of munitions of war:

1914	$ 28,164
1915	57,213,688
1916	296,505,257
1917	388,213,553
1918	260,711,751

The report continues:

The effect of the establishment of the munitions industry in Canada in increasing iron and steel production is also observable in the statistics of manufactures. In 1915 the iron and steel products industry of Canada produced commodities to the value of $120,422,420, while in 1917 its products were valued at $400,385,086, and in 1918 at $443,455,779. The chemical and allied products industry was also greatly stimulated by the war. Commodities to a gross value of $45,410,486 were produced by this industry in 1915 while in 1917 the gross value increased to $133,618,658 and in 1918 the gross products were valued at $173,649,073.

That is the glorious record of this dominion, considering it had at the beginning no factories and no industry to manufacture shells.

The manager of the British munitions board in Canada was David Carnegie, C.B.E., formerly member and ordnance adviser, shell committee, and imperial munitions board, Ottawa. He has given an account of the history of munition supplies in Canada, and I hope the new board will follow the great example in business administration which that board gave.

The former Prime Minister of Great Britain, Right Hon. David Lloyd George, shows what Canada has done. He says:

Though the material required could not then be produced in Canada, for, it must be remembered, no private manufacturer had ever made a shell in that country and the output of the only arsenal need not be considered, the Canadian manufacturers, under the initiative and leadership of the Minister of Militia, produced these munitions.

Then the account goes on to refer to the fact that the contract was for 220,000 shells a week but owing to the organization of the board they produced 400,000 18-inch shrapnel shells, twice the number called for in the contract.

Mr. Winston Churchill at the conclusion of the war wrote a letter of congratulation to the board for the great work it had done.

Then the United States came into the war, and it was fortunate for that country that Canada had the British munitions board. Let me read just two paragraphs concerning that:

In the autumn of 1917, after the government of the United States entered the war, negotiations were opened between the officials of the United States ordnance department and the Imperial Munitions Board, with a view to placing at the disposal of the United States the surplus forgings and machining capacity which had been developed in Canada.

At the time in question Canada had a shell-forging and machining capacity for 18 pounder shells of 400,000 per week, and had actually shipped overseas 32,000,000 of these shells. This remarkable development had taken three years' hard work and organization, but now was not fully required by the British government, who had increased her manufacturing capacity in Great Britain. The actual requirements of the British government from Canada amounted to 150,000 to 200,000 per week, leaving an unused capacity of 200,000 to 250,000. It was this latter capacity the Imperial Munitions Board on behalf of the manufacturers of Canada, and in the interest of the Allies, placed at the disposal of the United States government. The proposal was opportune, as at the time the United States were making desperate efforts to organize for the production of the 75 mm. high explosive shells. This shell was about the same size as the British 18 pounder shells. It was therefore with the object of assisting the United States ordnance department in carrying out its munitions program that negotiations were begun.

So we see what was done in Canada by all the parties uniting in harmony. I hope that the new board will go to work and that not only shall we get orders from our own defence department for home defence but that Canada will have a large share of the munition orders of the mother country in her rearmament, because we are not getting it now. In addition, I hope that advancement will be made all along the line and that Canada will be making the record for itself which it made in the late war.

Motion (Mr. Mackenzie, Vancouver) agreed to and the house went into committee, Sir Eugène Fiset in the chair.

Mr. MANION: I wish to ask a few questions. I asked about the personnel. I assume from his reply that the minister does not know who the personnel will be.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not in the least.

Mr. MANION: Is there not a defence council in the minister's department? What connection will the defence purchasing board, when appointed, have with the defence council?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is a defence council in the department consisting of the senior ranking officers in the three services: the chief of the general staff, the chief of the naval staff, the chief of the air staff, the adjutant general, the master general of the ordnance, the judge advocate general, the deputy minister and the minister.

As far as I can recollect from the terms of the legislation, there will be no connection whatsoever except that in the first place I would think the requisitions would come from the members of the defence council. My hon. friend is probably aware that there are full meetings of the defence council; there are meetings of the military members of the council; in recent months there has been formed an air council in the department of air services, and they meet by themselves to consider problems relating essentially to that branch of the service. But in regard to the general requirements of the Department of National Defence, they would make the representations through the minister to the purchasing board, and the purchasing board will probably review the entire requirements of all services and make recommendations in turn to the Minister of Finance who will bring them before the council.

Mr. MANION: That is why I asked the minister in regard to the personnel. I am concerned not so much regarding their names as regarding their occupations. I remember in the remarks I made to which he referred this afternoon and to which I also referred, I had suggested—it was merely a suggestion—that perhaps the board which would handle the purchases of munitions and armaments might be made up of, I think I put first the militia, naturally someone from the army, then a manufacturer, then a representative of labour, and some others. I mentioned those as an example. After all, if the defence purchasing board is merely a group of business men with possibly labour representation—and I think there should be labour representation—that board would naturally not know the needs of defence in Canada. They are not military men, any more than my hon. friend and I are military men. Therefore there will have to be some liaison between the defence purchasing board and the defence council.

A suggestion has been made to me by a military man for whom I have a great deal of respect, but who is not and never has been in any way associated with the Department of National Defence. This suggestion, which I believe is worthy of consideration, is that there should be a committee of the House of Commons and the Senate—an advisory committee, if you wish—made up of eight or ten persons who could hold discussion in camera, if necessary, with the defence council and with the defence purchasing board. They could discuss the needs of the Department of National Defence, the method of obtaining requirements and other matters relating to the defence of the country. I do not know whether or not this is the best place to discuss the matter; probably I should have waited until the defence estimates were before the committee of supply, but it seemed to me that the subject fitted in here just as well as anywhere. If I speak now, it will not be necessary to do so later on.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Perhaps it might be said more properly when the bill is before the house.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But I have no objection to the statement being made now.

Mr. MANION: The suggestion was made that it might be expected that questions would be asked in regard to the spending of money for the defence of Canada by the Department of National Defence, and that replies would be made by the Minister of National Defence or by the Prime Minister to the effect that it is not considered in the public interest to give the information asked. I can understand how that would happen. It seems to me there should be some group, composed of members of the House of Commons and the Senate, who could discuss these matters in camera, and possibly act as a sort of liaison between the two houses and the Department of Defence. This is a suggestion which I believe is worthy of consideration.

The question of defence is a big problem in Canada to-day, particularly in view of the world situation. The expenditure of $63,000,000 for armaments and munitions is very important to the Dominion of Canada, and I suggest it should be made to the best possible advantage.

I should like to ask the minister one or two further questions. Did the minister say there would be three on the defence purchasing board?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Four, altogether; the chairman would be a permanent official, and the other three would be temporary.

Mr. MANION: One further question: Did he say the chairman would be paid a salary, and the others would receive merely expenses?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, the chairman would be paid a salary, and the others would be allowed per diem expenses and allowances for the time they may be called in to advise on specific contracts. The hon. member will readily realize there might be a difficult legal contract to be drawn up. It might be that a commercial lawyer would be called in—or an accountant, as the case may be, depending on the qualifications of the temporary personnel.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. LANDERYOU: Will the money be borrowed from private money lenders, the same as was done in the last war? Is that the intention?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does the hon. member refer to the financial provisions necessary to look after the operations of the board?

Mr. LANDERYOU: Yes. The resolution uses this expression, "To authorize the governor in council to borrow such sums of money" and so on. Who will they borrow from—from what source?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I would say, from the very best sources available.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The amount involved this year would possibly be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $60,000,000? Could the minister give the committee any figure as to the amount that might have to be borrowed this year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think the estimates for this year will speak for themselves. The total vote is for something more than $63,000,000, of which amount $3,000,000 is required for the financing of the capital expenditures. If my memory is correct, $29,000,000 of the $60,000,000 is taken from capital expenditure, and the balance from ordinary revenue. The differentiation is based on the durable value of the implements or supplies.

Mr. LANDERYOU: If war broke out, considerably more money would have to be borrowed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Oh, yes.

Mr. LANDERYOU: It could not be taken out of revenue. That would simply mean that this sinking fund provision would have to be increased tremendously.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I tell my hon. friend that if war broke out, entirely new and drastic financial provisions would have to be made overnight.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I would hope that would be the case, because the experience we had in the last war would indicate that such procedure would be necessary. The first paragraph of the resolution contains the expression "to provide safeguards to assure that such munitions, equipment, materials and supplies shall be purchased at a reasonable cost to the government and without unreasonable profit to any manufacturer or supplier thereof." With that thought I am absolutely in accord. It is not those who labour in the production of war materials who make the profits. It is not necessarily those who supply the raw materials who make the profits. It is not particularly those who control the industries who make such large profits. I believe our experience in the last war would indicate that it was those who financed the war who made the tremendous profits or, in other words, those who have been described as the men who stand behind the men behind the guns—that is, those who financed the whole thing. They are the ones who derived the profit.

We are informed that the last war cost between 250 billion and 400 billion dollars. The cost of the war to Canada has been estimated in the neighbourhood of one billion seven hundred million dollars. I know that the debt of Canada rose from about $360,000,000 in 1914 to about three billion dollars when the war was over. We have been paying interest on that sum ever since—interest amounting to as much as we originally borrowed. And still we owe the amount we originally borrowed to finance the war. So I say that if we go to those private moneylenders to get money to carry on Canada's national defence, we shall be creating a practically intolerable situation in Canada. We shall be raising the debt and taxes tremendously.

May I make a suggestion to the Minister of National Defence? I would suggest that he have erected a very large Neon sign which could be seen at night when illuminated, and also during the day, and that on that sign he would have the debt of Canada, private, municipal, provincial, and federal. I would suggest that he have, too, the number of Canadians unemployed and living on the verge of starvation. I would suggest that he put on the sign the number of homes lost through taxes and mortgage foreclosures. If that were done, I suggest any invasion of the country would be stopped immediately. If an enemy could see a big sign showing the terrible mess the country is in, the debts we owe—privately, municipally, provincially and federally—it would hesitate to take over a country in such condition. I believe such a sign would be more valuable than the guns the minister has placed on the west coast. He would simply be advertising the terrible financial mess the country is in, and enemies would hesitate to take it over and, as it were, pay the shot. Of course we know that, ten chances to one, if an enemy did take the country over, it would never attempt to pay the debt. And so we would be fighting, and fighting hard, to keep somebody from getting in here who would free us from financial bondage. We fight for the privilege of paying this intolerable burden of debt and taxation.

I hope the minister will adopt my suggestion and have the sign erected as quickly as possible, and at the least possible expense.

Mr. BRADETTE: What a dramatic joke!

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It seemed to me this afternoon that the minister, in a lengthy speech, in an able manner weighed pro and con the policies of state manufacture and private manufacture. He went into the subject elaborately, and placed upon Hansard a great deal of valuable data, which I think most of us want to go over before we can be prepared to say much about it.

It seems to me as though the government has definitely set its feet toward private manufacture as opposed to state manufacture. I wonder if the minister could tell the committee—if he has not this information now perhaps he will have it when the bill comes down—how much has been spent in the last few years by the Department of National Defence in the way of capital expenditures to provide machinery to be installed in the plants of private manufacturers, the machinery to belong to the government if, later on, it is decided to go into state manufacture.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I could not give the information immediately, but I shall endeavour to have it when the bill is in committee. As far as I know, there are only two plants in which machinery has been installed, the two which were mentioned in the debate last week. My hon. friend does not refer to the expansion of the government arsenals; he refers only to private companies?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall have the information when the bill is in committee.

Mr. MARSHALL: The resolution refers to unreasonable profits. Will any limit be set on the profits that may be made in the manufacture of munitions? For instance, we were told that in connection with the Bren gun contract a ten per cent profit was allowed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The profit allowed here is five per cent. As a matter of fact, according to the evidence given, the profit under the Bren gun contract is 7·76 per cent.

Mr. PELLETIER: The press dispatches in to-day's newspapers state that there seems to be a decrease in the tension in Europe and that the clouds of war which were hovering over Europe a short time ago appear to be dispelled. I was just wondering if the work to be undertaken in connection with national defence would be such that it could not be discontinued in the event of more peaceful times coming to the world. In setting up a board of this kind I should like to know whether it is to be of a permanent nature. They are even talking of possible disarmament conferences and new limitations being placed upon armaments that might be required. There seems to be some hope that countries will not have to carry on with their armament programs. In setting up a board of this kind the government must have some definite information that the situation will be precarious for many years to come. I submit it would be illogical to set up this board for a year or some other short period of time. We are being asked to vote some $65,000,000 for purposes of defence, and I should like to know what would happen in the event of the situation in Europe becoming less tense, and there being no further danger to this country. Will the government then drop all these armament projects or will it be compelled to continue with the work it has undertaken? During the last number of years the government has spent millions of dollars to build up defences which we are told are obsolete to-day. I ask the government to give some indication of what is feared in the future and what its attitude will be concerning the continuation of a program of this kind in the event of the war clouds over Europe disappearing.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Obviously the questions asked by my hon. friend are such as are not capable of being answered specifically. Naturally the attitude of any government in Canada would be guided largely by the conditions which might prevail in the world. There is nothing in the constitution of this board to make it of an absolutely permanent nature. What we are trying to do is to provide an efficient system, in connection with even small purchases, with the requirements of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. HEAPS: When the minister was speaking this afternoon, I asked what would be the status of the interdepartmental committee when this board was appointed. Will that committee still function?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That will be fully disclosed by the text of the bill. I would say, however, that the interdepartmental committee which has rendered such excellent service to the country in the last two years would be no longer required for this particular purpose. As a matter of fact, under the bill to be introduced, this board will have authority to deal not only with contracts, as I explained this afternoon, but to review all existing contracts which have been let under the old system and to report thereon to the government.

Mr. HEAPS: In a sense this new set-up will be a replacement of the interdepartmental committee which has been functioning up to the present time. As the minister said this afternoon, a great deal will depend upon the personnel of the new board. Am I asking too much when I inquire whether the powers of the new board will be of an absolute nature, or will its work be subject to review by this parliament?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The work of any board is subject to review by this parliament. We could not take away from parliament the right to review the work of any board. I think it would be more convenient if my hon. friend would wait until he sees the actual sections of the bill, which are self-explanatory in regard to the questions he has just asked. I may say, however, that this is to be an independent board to supervise the purchases by the department.

Mr. SPENCE: How can it be an independent board if, as has been suggested by some one, there is to be on it a representative of labour and representatives of other classes? We should have on this board men of the highest integrity, men with good business training and with sufficient ability to carry out the work successfully.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I can promise my hon. friend that we shall do our utmost to carry out his suggestion in that regard. I think it is advisable, as far as possible, to have the various occupations represented in the make-up of the board. We might need an accountant; we might need a trained legal man; we might need a representative of labour, as was suggested by the commissioner. Of necessity, no decision has been made as yet in regard to these occupational qualifications.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 38, to establish a defence purchasing board.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PENSION ACT

ABOLITION OF PENSION APPEAL COURT AND EXTENSION OF TIME FOR PENSION APPLICATIONS

The house resumed from Thursday, March 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Power for the second reading of Bill No. 6, to amend the Pension Act.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Before the bill passes its second reading, I have a few observations to make. I wish to associate myself very warmly with the remarks made last evening by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). I am not in opposition to the bill. I think the minister is to be commended for proposing to abolish the pension appeal court and to set forward the date for receipt of applications for pensions.

I think, before the bill passes second reading, the minister should take an opportunity to explain to the house his attitude with regard to several important proposals which have been made to him by organized ex-service men in connection with pensions. An honest endeavour was made earlier in this parliament to recast as it were the Pension Act and to bring all pension matters to a stage of finality. Since that time we have experienced various problems; we have encountered several anomalies in the act; and I think that on this occasion, when he is introducing an amending bill, a further effort should be made to bring to a stage of finality these important problems with regard to which the minister has received recommendations.

I do not wish my remarks to be construed as opposition to the bill introduced by the minister, but this is the only opportunity we shall have to point out its inadequacies and to invite him to make a pronouncement with regard to several matters which should be dealt with at this time.

I am of the opinion that a bill of this kind should be referred to a special committee of the house. There are several important and valid reasons why it should be dealt with by a special committee. This matter of pensions should be considered with relation to the general problem. If it becomes possible to deal with small groups under the Pension Act without violating the principles of that act, that, I think, should be done with relation to existing problems among ex-service men. The question of pensions is a subject of a highly technical nature, and can be discussed more readily and with more facility in a special committee. A committee provides a useful forum for the receipt of recommendations and the discussion of them without detaining or unduly occupying the time of the house. Furthermore, it is important with regard to the pensions question, with the experience we now have, that we should bring this matter, as I have said before, to the stage of finality.

I think it is important that the minister should make a pronouncement at this time with regard to the claim of non-pensioned widows. This matter has received considerable attention in recent months, and certain classifications of those widows have a strong claim upon the government and upon this country. I believe a strong case can be made for those widows of ex-service men who until the time of death were in receipt of pensions. Those women up to the time of their husbands' deaths were in receipt of the additional pension. They were in a sense assured up to the time of death of an income in respect of the disability incurred during service. Because it cannot be definitely established that the man's death was due to a pensionable disability, they are cut off with, perhaps, only a month's allowance. I think consideration should be given to those in that classification who are in destitute circumstances, who were in receipt of the additional pension until the time of death of their husbands and that some form of allowance on the basis of need should be extended to those widows to enable them to adjust themselves to a new mode of life. After all, if they are in destitute circumstances they must apply for relief, either for mothers' allowance or some other form of aid, to the provincial or civic authority, and usually the federal government contributes a large proportion of the assistance extended to them. I think they have a just and proper claim upon the federal government. There would be no great expenditure involved. As far as I can ascertain by an examination of the departmental figures, not a very large number are involved in that classification, and I believe that at this stage the government would be well advised in moving forward to a sympathetic consideration of this classification.

With regard to the other classifications, I think some of them at least might be placed on the same basis as the widows of those who were in receipt of war veterans' allowance at the time of death, and who at the present time receive the allowance for the continued period of twelve months. Much could be said in this regard. I am confident that already, because of representations made to him, the minister must have given the matter careful attention.

Perhaps I should refer to these cases where there is doubt, the borderline cases where it may be contended strongly that the pensionable disability was a contributing factor to death. I have under my hand a copy of a decision made by the pension appeal court which I think illustrates the point I am discussing at the moment, where a man had established entitlement to pension, where he was admitted to hospital because he required operative treatment—he was pensionable for a chest condition—and as a result of the administration of a general anaesthetic he developed bronchial pneumonia and death ensued within a few days. In this particular case the appeal court went to considerable trouble to question the former decision rendered by the pension commission with regard to entitlement. The deceased officer in question happened to have had service in the British forces. It was shown in the concluding paragraph of the judgment that there was doubt, even in the minds of the members of the pension appeal court who signed the judgment, and by the way, the case was appealed by the crown. The court felt that a further claim should be made and that it might be possible in their opinion to consider fresh evidence with regard to entitlement. I feel that cases of this kind should be again reviewed, under the new and amended legislation, by the pension commission. I think that in cases such as this a powerful contention may be made for some form of allowance to the widow who is not now pensionable and because a reasonable doubt exists that the pensionable disability was a contributing factor to death. In this case the widow had some assurance that because of her husband's disability she would receive some form of income from the state with respect to that disability. Certainly in many of these cases the widow during her husband's life gave the best years of her own life in administering to his comfort and need when the man was handicapped by his war disability.

I wish again to stress the necessity of amending the legislation dealing with the needs of those suffering from mental and nervous disorders. That ground was traversed last evening by the hon. member for Vancouver South, and I support him in that regard. I suppose that almost every hon. member is having considerable trouble with claims advanced by men suffering from some form of neurological disorder. I have under my hand a case which, I believe, illustrates the point—a man who had three enlistments and who gave meritorious service in France. There is a record of hospitalization, while on active service, for epilepsy, mania and neurasthenia. Nevertheless, upon examination by the neuro-psychiatrists of the treatment branch, it was diagnosed that he was suffering from psychopathic personality of constitutional origin, that there was superimposed on that psychopathic personality an anxiety neurosis, and to quote the report:

> On the strength of the neurological report and diagnosis to psychopathic personality, the commission have ruled that the entire disability present in this case is the result of the constitutional condition and psychopathic personality with spasmodic affection of the eye, and the man's award of pension previously paid at 30 per cent for anxiety neurosis has been discontinued.

I have no criticism in this regard of the pension commission, but the man's total disability was thirty per cent. He is receiving pension for aggravation at the rate of eighteen per cent because of the spasmodic affection of the eye. I suggest that if section 11 (b) be suitably amended by the house at this time along the line suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver South, the pension commission would be on stronger ground in dealing with these cases and be in a position to relieve the worry and anxiety which these men are occasioned, and which I contend accentuates rather than removes their disability. That is in my opinion an important matter. I believe it was the original intention of parliament to protect the man who served in a theatre of actual war with regard to pre-enlistment disability. It was never intended that there should be discrimination in respect of mental or nervous disorders. I fail to comprehend why there should be any distinction drawn between, say tuberculosis, and a mental disorder. If a man had any constitutional or hereditary tendency to pulmonary tuberculosis, no discrimination is made because of that, and upon discharge from the service he is given the full protection of this section of the act. But by reason of the recommendations of the neuro-psychiatrists of the treatment branch, who dominate the situation with respect to diagnosis, this discrimination against mental or nervous disorders does exist to-day, and a certain number of men, whether the number be large or not I do not know, are suffering grievous hardship as a result. I urge upon the minister that he take the opportunity of amending the act in the way previously suggested, so that men in this category may be given their full rights.

I find that this bill makes no provision for the plight of those dealt with under section 77 of the Pension Act, and that also was referred to last evening—the payment of additional pension in respect of children born after May 1, 1933. I would remind the house that this section was introduced as an economy measure when the depression was at its depth, and no longer is there any good reason for the maintenance of this section.

I also urge that the date with respect to marriage contracted subsequently to the appearance of disability, which is now January, 1930, should be moved forward to synchronize with the final date for payment of additional pensions, May 1, 1933, or delete section 77; in one way or the other remove the apparent anomaly that exists in the Pension Act.

I again urge upon the minister the necessity of dealing more generously with the non-pensionable widow. If he cannot see his way clear to assuming any additional responsibility in this respect at the present time, he should at least give consideration to lowering or extending the classification. At the present time provision is made for the dependents of those who died in receipt of pensions, classes 1 to 5. That might be lowered to include those in receipt of fifty or sixty per cent pension without incurring any great additional liability, and again meeting the need of those who are rendered dependent by death where the pensionable disability is a contributing factor to death.

I do not wish to detain the house at length. I merely urge upon the minister at this stage that he make a declaration on behalf of the government with regard to the important recommendations which have been advanced and which should now receive consideration. I repeat my suggestion that it would be proper at this time to have a brief inquiry by a special committee of the house where all these technical matters might be adequately and frankly discussed to the satisfaction of the organized ex-service men.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, this bill, of course, is strictly limited. I gather that it deals merely with the change from the appeal court to appeal boards of the commission.

I am inclined to agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), who has just taken his seat, that it might be advisable to set up again this session a special committee to deal with the numerous, and, I think, reasonable requests, many of them, that have been made by veterans' organizations. I recall that over the years since the war, the special committees that have been set up from time to time to deal with soldier problems have done extremely valuable work. I think all who know of the work of those special committees will agree with me in paying tribute to the splendid work done by the present minister (Mr. Power) when he was a private member of the house and a member of that committee, and, on some occasions, chairman of it.

While I was not a member of that committee, I do recall that few committees of this house have carried on their deliberations with a more genuine spirit of cooperation, or reported to the house with a greater degree of unanimity than the special committee which was set up from time to time to deal with pensions and returned soldier problems. I suggest that at this session a similar committee should again be set up, to which this bill might be referred, for the purpose, not of dealing with this particular subject but, rather, of reviewing the position of the veterans as it is to-day.

I am quite aware that there will naturally be in the minds of many people the thought that sooner or later we must call a halt on pension legislation. But I feel that this concept is not a very sound one in the light of the facts with which we are confronted at the present time.

May I now turn the thoughts of the members of the house for a short time in a slightly different direction. From time to time we are told, as, for instance, when we were dealing with the question of free hospitalization or free medical attendance of a civilian nature, that these are matters of provincial jurisdiction where the province must be considered, and where, indeed, our jurisdiction is distinctly questioned. And so again with questions of relief. We are told that this is primarily a municipal matter, certainly a provincial matter, but that through grants in aid we can cooperate. But the welfare of veterans is definitely and distinctly a federal responsibility, and I think the time has arrived when we as a parliament ought clearly to declare, as we have in a half-hearted way declared at times in the past, that this is a federal matter and that we propose definitely to take that responsibility on our shoulders. I think if we should so declare, it would go a long way toward clearing the atmosphere.

I am not giving to the house anything new when I refer to a document issued by the Canadian Legion containing a copy of an address by the late Sir Robert Borden when he was Prime Minister. I have no doubt members of the house are familiar with it, and I shall not quote it at length but rather refer to it for the purpose of supporting what I have just said. In this address by Sir Robert Borden to the members of the Canadian expeditionary force in 1917, I find the following language:

> The government and the country will consider it their first duty to see that a proper appreciation of your effort and of your courage is brought to the notice of the people at home, and it will always be our endeavour to so guide the attitude of public opinion that the country will support the government to prove to the returned men its just and due appreciation of the inestimable value of the services rendered to the country and empire, and that no man, whether he goes back or whether he remains in Flanders, will have just cause to reproach the government for having broken with the men who won and the men who died.

These were magnificent words spoken by the then Prime Minister of Canada, and in my opinion—and I have always held this view tenaciously—it was a declaration that we dare not break faith with those men, a declaration which we must respect. Taking that view, I hold that we should not hesitate to declare that it is our federal responsibility, the responsibility of this parliament, to care for the veterans of the great war. What does that involve? I know that we cannot respond to all the requests and suggestions, because many of these requests, though made by men in good faith, are made without an appreciation of the magnitude of the demands or of their seriousness—demands such as a large bonus to every individual, and so on. Some of these requests cannot be entertained, but the least that parliament can do is, as we have done in the past, from time to time to review the general conditions of the veterans of the last war, in such a manner as to ensure that we are doing the maximum in caring for them.

There is a second point I wish to emphasize. The other day we spent several hours discussing state medicine, and it has been discussed on several occasions in this house. Well, there should be no hesitancy on the part of parliament in assuming responsibility for the complete hospitalization of the veterans of the last war, irrespective of whether they are pensionable or not. I speak now as a layman and from observation and contact with these men, and while of course my opinion is not technically authoritative, it is nevertheless my view that most of these men are probably eight or ten years older than they are, if I might use that contradiction in terms. By virtue of that service they are aged before their time. I may be wrong, but that is my impression. I meet men I know who are no older than myself, but they are certainly much older in their physical condition than I am, and I think that is generally the case. For that reason we ought frankly to accept the responsibility of hospitalization for the veterans, and I would make no discrimination regarding the causes of their illness, and so on. I would accept responsibility in the name of the people of Canada, and because I think parliament must keep faith with the declaration made by the Prime Minister of Canada of that time, with full knowledge and a sense of responsibility of his statement as Prime Minister, that we would take care of these men.

The hon. member for Vancouver North referred to the question of widows' pensions. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the technique of this subject, the particulars of the law, to discuss it, nor do I wish to discuss it at length. But there in that connection is a point which I think we could well take into consideration. The widow of a veteran, although for pension purposes, under the law as at present drafted she may not be entitled to continuation of the pension, because of lateness of marriage or for some other reason, is nevertheless in my opinion still entitled to special consideration by this parliament, and I again apply to that subject the same test I applied to the other, namely, that we are called upon in Canada, through the provinces and the municipalities, to care for the derelict, the unfortunate, the unemployed and the destitute citizens of the country, by tens of thousands. We do that with the question of jurisdiction constantly thrust forward, whereas we have here a group whom we might very well take under our care, and the responsibility for whom this dominion should assume.

There is another question which is perhaps more difficult. I do not admit that in these two other instances I have mentioned, the question of hospitalization of veterans and the question of widows, there is any complicated difficulty. But the next is perhaps a little more complicated, and that is as regards imperial veterans resident in Canada. With respect to this class, I recognize, of course, that there may be two broad divisions. On the one hand there is the imperial veteran who is perhaps an old country born man, who enlisted in the early weeks or months of 1914 in the imperial army. Many of them hastened away because of the delay at Valcartier and because they wanted to get back and join the imperial forces. At any rate, they left Canada and joined the imperial forces, and they are naturally subject to such benefits as the imperial parliament may have granted. There is a technical argument that can be advanced regarding this class, and that is that they are imperial veterans and that therefore the imperial parliament must take care of them. On many occasions since the war their rights or requests have been reviewed, and we did make certain concessions, so that the answer I have just indicated does not really hold good. I say, we have made certain concessions to them. Now I suggest that their requests should be again reviewed by a competent committee of the house to consider whether or not we could extend to them some additional privileges which they do not now enjoy. I suggest that we might very well include them in the privileges of free hospitalization. These are certain major questions to which I wanted to refer.

There is, of course, the question of taking care of or making what we call economic provision for the returned unemployed. I hold in my hand a letter which I received from the Cranbrook branch of the Canadian Legion, signed by its secretary, W. S. Johnston, from which I quote one paragraph:

> The officers and members of the branch are in complete sympathy with the proposal that the dominion government adopt the principle contained in the recommendation of the veterans' assistance commission and the dominion convention of the Canadian Legion at Fort William; "that unemployed ex-service men who saw service in the theatre of actual war be paid a provisional economic allowance by the dominion government while unemployed."

That is a suggestion made not only by this branch but by the veterans' association and the Canadian Legion generally. I am quite aware that it might be argued that the federal authorities should not be asked to pay an allowance to unemployed veterans. But we are caring for our unemployed—this is a point I should like to emphasize—and some at least suggest that many of the unemployed are now getting substantial relief, and more than is granted under the soldiers' aid provision. In other words, the civil unemployed get from the civic authorities plus the dominion grant more than do veterans directly from the department. I again submit that inasmuch as we are called upon to make very heavy grants to the provinces and the municipalities on general unemployment, this is a section of our citizens that we might well consider taking under our special and direct care.

Many of these men are, because of war service, burnt-out before their time. I am sure medical men in the house will support me when I say that because of war service many of these men who are unemployed or only partly employed, are not employable in the ordinary sense of the term. A great many of them are, as a result of their war service, quite unfit for ordinary manual labour. I know that in some instances men who suffered some slight wound or sickness overseas, some of the very best of them, did not report or disclose their disability or sickness during service; when they came back from the war they felt fairly good and they said—some of them used pretty frank language—"To the devil with it; I am not going to bother about pension or make any application," so they just let it slide, and the record is gone. Now, as these men have grown older, it is difficult for medical men to determine whether their present disability is exactly due to war service.

It is true we have in the law a provision referring to the burnt-out group and borderline cases, but the law has been fairly strictly interpreted. The minister rather smiles; perhaps he thinks I am wrong in that, but I know cases where it has been strictly interpreted. I cannot of course speak for a very large number; but within my own knowledge there have been many cases that I have brought to the attention of the authorities, and in some instances they have been adjusted. Perhaps it was because I and others pressed the matter, not in any political sense; the minister and the department under the present administration will react just the same as any others, but in many instances there has been an adjustment, or shall I say justification of an adjustment has been recognized, after reviews which it was difficult to get and which had been denied in the ordinary interpretation of the law. That being so, I say we should take responsibility for these cases and recognize them definitely as a federal responsibility.

I wish also to refer to another communication which I received only a day or two ago from the Canadian veterans' bonus league at Regina, signed by its president, Mr. Cole, and its secretary, Mr. Gee. I shall not read the whole communication, but it impresses me as a rather reasonable analysis of the case. I quote a paragraph or two—

Mr. POWER: If my friend will permit me, they do not seem to agree with him entirely in regard to imperial veterans.

Mr. STEVENS: That may be true. I have a number of communications and am dealing with several of them.

Mr. POWER: This particular branch does not seem to have the same view as my hon. friend.

Mr. STEVENS: There may be differences of opinion among ex-service men, but I never allow that to interfere with my approach to this question. I think we should approach the question in a very broad spirit. This letter contains this paragraph:

> We contend that the soldier of 1914-18 served the nation as a whole and no section in particular; that during such service he was a complete charge—

This is rather a good argument; I would like the minister to catch it.

> —he was a complete charge of the federal government during the time of service, therefore as a veteran should still be such a charge, and that the federal government should assume the full responsibility for their welfare.

I think that is putting the matter succinctly and well. Then they make certain suggestions. They asked for action during the present session to cover these points—I will read the points as they have outlined them:

> 1. Place the responsibility for the care of the veterans where it rightfully belongs, on the federal government.

With that I entirely agree.

> 2. Deal with the problems of that class of veteran that is incapable of competition in the labour market due to age and disability.
> 3. Create work and employment for this class of veteran that will be of a permanent nature and not that type of employment which will be discontinued in a few weeks or months and then place the veteran back where he is.
> 4. In ordering certain types of employment for the exclusive employment of veterans over a period of years guarantee permanency and allowing the veteran to stabilize his economic position.
> 5. Give the Canadian veterans certain preferences over imperial veterans.

Well, I have never argued that we should place the imperial veterans in exactly the same position as Canadian veterans. I think it is a question that is open to argument. I think we should be very generous towards the imperial veteran in any of these measures of assistance that we can render, particularly if he was long a resident of Canada before the war, as many of them were. Many of them were born here; others were men who had lived in the country a good many years. I know one little village, Wallashee on the Canadian Pacific main line near Ashcroft, B.C., where there were twenty-seven able-bodied men when the war broke out. Every man went and went immediately. They had been in that village for years building up little fruit ranches. As you go by you can see these ranches to-day, gone to waste, the fruit trees dead and the neat little houses now a wreck. Not one man lived. The whole village was wiped out. That is the class of men they were. Of those who did fortunately come back, many had spent years in building up the country and are entitled to such consideration as I have suggested.

There are a number of other points to which I might refer, but I see it is eleven o'clock. I suggest earnestly to the minister that a committee be set up this session to review the present requests and suggestions for dealing with the veterans, and that parliament should declare at this session that it accepts the responsibility of caring for the veterans of the great war as a definite and distinct responsibility.

On motion of Mr. Finn the debate was adjourned.

At 11.04 o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. POULIOT

EDITORIAL IN OTTAWA JOURNAL OF MARCH 13

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. This morning the Ottawa Journal published a lengthy editorial about a member of the House of Commons in which they refer to his so-called buffooneries and bad manners. They continue:

> Last session, for example, Mr. Pouliot's combination of clowning and bad taste, exhibited in childish antics and atrocious attacks upon a well known and respected civil servant, blurred whatever good work was done by a parliamentary committee on the civil service, helped to bring the committee into contempt.

Last year the Ottawa Journal published an article entitled "Inviting contempt for parliament," in which the writer wonders whether much of the contempt one hears expressed regarding our democratic institutions is not often deserved. That article had to do with the appearance of Mr. Foran before the civil service committee. I afterwards telephoned to the writer of the article and asked him why he had defended Mr. Foran in the name of democracy. He answered me that occasionally he played golf with him. The article this morning speaks of "vulgar abuse," "primitive blackguardism" and "buffoonery that is vulgar and vicious," and goes on to state:

—and even when it comes from a quarter making an argument for its being excused.

Of course, that is very bad English. The editorial this morning is headed: "An M.P. who should be tongue-cuffed."

There is no such word in the king's English. Apparently that is a new word for a new kind of torment or corporal punishment which is being invented for members of parliament. I shall have to write letters of sympathy to my colleagues who are to suffer from being "tongue-cuffed." All this is said because the member for Témiscouata decided to express his views about some members of the civil service who, by the way, are members of the Rideau club. I expected that to come, but I regret that such language has been used by this paper. On the other hand, it is not the paper which has spoken, it is the Rideau club. For the information of the house, may I say that the language which has been used by the Ottawa Journal with regard to the member for Témiscouata is precisely the same language which is used daily with regard to my right hon. leader, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), to the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), to the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and all their supporters in the house, by the small gang in the Rideau club which pretends to rule this country. That is all I have to say. The house is informed now.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO STUDY AND REPORT ON MATTERS PERTAINING TO ELECTIONS AND ELECTORAL DISTRICTS

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Health) moved:

That a special committee consisting of Messrs. Bothwell, Brunelle, Cahan, Clark (York-Sunbury), Dussault, Factor, Fair, Glen, Heaps, Jean, MacLean (Prince), MacNicol, McCuaig, McCulloch, McIntosh, McLean (Simcoe East), Mullins, Gauthier, Pelletier, Perley, Power, Purdy, Rickard, Robichaud, St-Père, Stevens, Stewart, Stirling, Taylor (Norfolk), Turgeon, Turner, Wermenlinger and Wood, notwithstanding section one of standing order 65 in relation to the number of members thereof, be appointed to study and report on the following subjects:

(a) Methods used to effect a redistribution of electoral districts in Canada and in other countries and to make suggestions to the house in connection therewith;

(b) Methods whereby: (I) the source and disposition of sums received and expended in promoting the return of members of the House of Commons may be readily traceable; (II) publicity may be given to all receipts and expenditures in connection therewith; (III) the cost of elections to candidates may be reduced; (IV) the amount that may be spent by or on behalf of a candidate in his election campaign may be limited;

And that the said special committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath and report from time to time.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the object of this motion is to set up again for this year a committee which has been functioning for the past three sessions of this parliament. During the 1936 session the committee studied and reported on such matters as proportional representation, the alternative vote, compulsory registration and voting. During the session of 1937 it considered a large number of proposals which had been made to this house, and particularly to the committee, having for their object the revision of the elections act. Of these proposals, something over one hundred in number, I am informed, some thirty-three were adopted and passed into legislation.

The committee also gave some consideration during the 1937 session to the question of the method of arriving at an equitable redistribution of the seats in this house. During the session of 1938, in the light of the information they had gained from the suggestions made to them by the public, by members of parliament, by organizations, and also by the chief electoral officer, whose long experience in matters of this kind formed the basis of his recommendations, the committee studied and finally recommended unanimously an act known as the Dominion Elections Act, which, with some minor amendments, finally passed this house. I think it can be said, generally speaking, that this act, so far as we are able to judge, since it has not been in operation in an actual theatre of war, has given general satisfaction.

There remain for the consideration of the committee two subjects which are cognate to those already discussed, namely, first, that of methods of effecting redistribution of seats in this house, and second, the question of election and campaign expenditures.

With respect to the redistribution of seats, I think the advisability and even the necessity of remodelling the procedure whereby every ten years or so this house is made the theatre of a somewhat unseemly, undignified and utterly confusing scramble for personal or political advantage, should be evident to all. The difficulty of making an equitable distribution of seats in any country is increased many fold in this country, where we must take into consideration diversity of interests, economic and social; the racial distinctions which exist; the growth of population; and the varying movements of our population brought about to some extent by economic causes in our cities, and in the rural districts, by the opening up of our hinterland. I say this country is an extremely difficult one to redistribute, and that makes it all the more necessary that there should be a drastic change in the system which we have followed up to the present.

As hon. members of the house know, these redistributions have taken place as a result of conferences, of meetings of committees, and finally of what you might almost call a battle royal in this house. It is inevitable no matter which party is in power that there should be complaints and that the distribution of seats will not meet with the approval of all. There are to-day, as there have been in the past, what I might call almost appalling inequalities of distribution. To cite only a few of them: In the province of Quebec, the constituency of Argenteuil has 11,122 voters and sends one member to this house. Another rural constituency, that of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, has 30,363 voters and sends only one representative to this house. Among the urban constituencies in the city of Montreal, St. Lawrence-St. George, with 22,549 voters, sends one member, and St. James, with 54,760 voters, sends one member. It is not surprising that there has arisen a suspicion that the redistribution was undertaken or was carried out not so much in the interests of giving a better distribution of seats but, on the part of some government, to have a greater number of their own followers in the house. But I say and repeat that this would happen no matter what government were in power, and we can only come to the conclusion upon looking over the ground that there should be evolved some method other than the law of the jungle—might is right—in order to bring about a distribution which would be fair to the people of Canada.

With this object in view, the committee instructed its counsel to inquire into the systems in vogue in other countries, particularly in the newer countries of the British empire. At this distance, at least, it would appear that the legislation in force in Australia and New Zealand could perhaps be adapted to our needs, and the counsel for the committee has made a study of this legislation and is prepared to submit to the committee a draft bill, not by any means as a formal bill or as a government bill, but in order that it may be able to make a further study of these matters. The draft bill would contain some such provisions as this: That there be set up a commission, presided over by a judge of the supreme court, and joined to him the surveyor general of Canada and perhaps one other member; that when the redistribution of any particular province was being studied, one or two persons from that province might join in the deliberations; that there should be public meetings held throughout the country and representatives heard from the different bodies; and that this commission would draw up a plan of redistribution. I should say first that the commission would be given instructions, because in this country particularly instructions would be necessary: instructions, for instance, as to the basis of redistribution, which basis, as is already well known, is laid down in the British North America Act, the basis whereby each province is allotted a certain number of members. They might also be given instructions with regard to such fundamental factors as the physical-geographical features, means of communication, existing boundaries of electoral districts both federal and provincial, and boundaries of administrative areas. The object in suggesting a bill to the committee is to give the committee something to work on which might stimulate thought and perhaps eventually action. I can only say that if the committee sees its way clear to bring in a recommendation and this house were to pass some such legislation, it would earn our commendation and gratitude.

Now a word or two with respect to the other matter which is referred to the committee, namely:

Methods whereby: (I) the source and disposition of sums received and expended in promoting the return of members of the House of Commons may be readily traceable; (II) publicity may be given to all receipts and expenditures in connection therewith; (III) the cost of elections to candidates may be reduced; (IV) the amount that may be spent by or on behalf of a candidate in his election campaign may be limited.

Last year a bill entitled the Political Expenditures Act was introduced into this house and immediately sent to the committee. Owing to the fact that nearly all the time of the committee was taken up with the study and the moulding of the Dominion Elections Act—which had to have precedence over any other business, because had there been no dominion elections act passed last session there would have been no provision in our statutes for the holding of a general election had one been necessary last year—it was impossible to give more than casual study to the political expenditures bill. But the committee did report this, on motion of Mr. Robichaud:

Resolved that the committee report on Bill No. 90—

That was the political expenditures bill.

—as follows: Your committee approves of the objects of Bill No. 90 and recommends that a similar bill be introduced at the next session of parliament and referred to a committee of the house for its consideration.

I should say that generally speaking, from what we have been able to ascertain, from correspondence and from comments in the press, the idea of the Political Expenditures Act was well received. I believed last year, and I still believe, that there were no faults in it which could not have been corrected by amendments made in committee. But I am willing to admit that a hasty perusal of the bill, such as in all probability was given by most of us, would seem to indicate that it was based on an academic idealism not quite consistent with our hard-boiled political philosophy.

The objections raised last year were mainly these: that there was no necessity for a special act, and that it would be better if the whole law with respect to elections were found within the four corners of a single enactment; that the procedure might be costly, and that the nomenclature was new and should not be changed. For instance, there was mention of the corporation sole, of the trustee, and so on—all words which meant what we have been accustomed to call the official agent. There was the suggestion that the method of keeping the accounts was somewhat involved, and that certain very onerous duties were placed upon the banks who should keep the accounts of political candidates—duties which it was not quite likely that the banks would discharge.

It was thought, also, that the administration of the act would require the setting up of an entirely new department, and generally speaking that the act was too complicated and that some simpler method might perhaps be found.

Towards the end of the last session, in reply to the right hon. Mr. Bennett, I said, as reported at page 4230 of Hansard:

It is quite possible that there were contained in that bill certain provisions which did not meet with the entire approval of all the members of this house or even of all the members of the committee. I am under the impression that sooner or later, possibly this year, the committee will accept at least the principle of the bill, and it will perhaps be left for some of us to work out the details in a manner which will be more acceptable to the members of the house generally.

During the recess the subject matter of the bill, perhaps more than the bill itself, was made the object of further study, and it will be found quite possible to submit to the committee suggestions which, by amending only two sections of the Dominion Elections Act itself, will achieve the same result as was sought last year in a separate bill, and will embody in one statute instead of two all the important and essential features which appeal to those sincere in their advocacy of reform.

It is with some misgiving that I mention sincerity in the same breath as reform. Reform, that staid and respectable goddess, has of late been sued too often and too successfully by pseudo-messiahs not to have been divested of some of her pristine virtue. The peoples of this north American continent have not, of late, been particularly enamoured of reform movements as such, and I fear that perhaps last year too much emphasis was placed on reform and moral uplift, thus arousing a certain antagonism and prejudice which derogated from the really true and practical value of the legislation which was introduced.

I am not unmindful, either, that the legislation itself, not unexpectedly, met with the gibes and sneers of the sceptical, the perhaps ill-disposed, and certainly of the ribald; and it was not very long before the bill was known as the "lily-white" bill, the "snow-white" bill and the "purity purge." To have received more support in the house, it should really have been entitled "an act to prevent the exploitation of parliamentary candidates, and to promote economy in elections."

It is essentially a businesslike piece of legislation, and it was an attempt so to modify the law that the candidates would be enabled to apply to election campaigns the same open, sane businesslike methods that they apply in their own business. It was most emphatically not the deathbed repentance of a reformed political rake who, with the zeal of the convert, is anxious to cram new-found civic virtue down the throats of his colleagues.

I should like to repeat what I have already said, that the cost of election campaigns is too high, and that some means must be found to lower it. I should like to repeat also that political corruption, wholesale bribery and the distribution of liquor has to a large extent disappeared from our political morality, usages and customs. It has been succeeded, though, by more modern methods of propaganda and proselytism, which are almost as expensive. Electors, rightly or wrongly, believe that campaign funds are unlimited, and that they are to be dug or gouged out of an almost bottomless purse. As soon as an election is in prospect, candidates, organizers and supporters get together and decide that their man must have the largest and best-equipped hall in the community. He must have the best brass band, and his advertising must be on the front page. He must have the best and the longest possible time on the radio. His placards and posters must be the most artistic, and if Rembrandt or Titian were alive to-day they would be hired to decorate the fenceposts of the neighbourhood with the portraits of the candidate.

It is absolutely futile in many instances for the candidate to protest that he has no funds. The faithful insist that he must have the same consideration as any other candidate, and that the constituency is being discriminated against unless he is as well advertised as the very leaders of the party in the country. The way to avoid this tendency towards extravagant expenditure is, I believe, first, to publicize the aggregate amount of funds received by the party; second, to publicize the expenditures made in any election campaign; third, to limit the amount which may be expended in a constituency; fourth, to have detailed accounts of every cent spent in a constituency made and reported, I can rather imagine that if this measure is enacted something like this may well happen. When the election is in prospect the candidate will call in Bill Smith from the fifth range of the second concession of blank township, and he will say, "Well, Bill, how are things going this year?" Bill will say, "Not so good, you know; not so good. The opposition are burning up the ground with their automobiles; they are going around from house to house; we shall have to make pretty good preparations here." Eventually it will come down to something like this; "Well, what is it going to be this year?" Bill will probably say, "Two or three hundred dollars; you know, we will have to have a brass band, and meetings, and this and that." The candidate probably will say to Bill, "It can't be done this year any more; it can't be done as it was in the past, because some fool in parliament has just passed a bill to prevent me from spending more than $3,000 in this constituency. The other side are in exactly the same boat."

I know exactly what Bill's first reaction will be. It will be that of one of my friends who, on being told that there was to be no liquor used in the constituency by either side, said, "Well, I hope to hell you will both be beaten," which is the vernacular for the Shakespearean "a plague o' both your houses." But when Bill is persuaded that this is the law, I think he will finally come round, and the last straw that will eventually convert him will be this statement: "All right; if you do get $50 or $100 it is going to be printed in the blue-book and all your neighbours will read about it." Then I think Bill will come round and do for nothing what in his so-called loyalty he had always boasted he was doing for the party for nothing anyway.

The suggestions which are proposed to be incorporated in the submission to be put before the committee, and which are really those which were contained in the political expenditures bill last year, without some of the frills to which I have referred, will cover such points as these: Limitation of the amount that may be spent in a constituency; books and detailed accounts to be kept by an official; the detailed accounts to be incorporated in a return to be sent to the chief electoral officer—not, as is the case at the present time, to be sent to the returning officers and hidden away; the chief electoral officer to examine all returns and make inquiry if necessary; the chief electoral officer to make reports to the Speaker after inquiry made; the chief electoral officer to publish summary returns in the Canada Gazette and a similar summary in the blue-book; and lastly, national and provincial federal organizations to keep detailed accounts and make returns to the chief electoral officer, and publication in the Canada Gazette and the blue-book to follow.

The point I should like to stress here is that if we take even the provisions which already exist in our legislation, and clarify them and strengthen them and extend them to provide for real instead of veiled publicity, we can and will persuade even the unbelievers among the faithful that the law no longer winks at evasions, and we shall be giving greater satisfaction to the public. It is true, as was said last year by a number of people, that you cannot make people good by act of parliament. You cannot by act of parliament prevent people from committing murder either, but you can by placing laws on the statute book make it inconvenient for him to do so and extremely uncomfortable for him afterwards if he does.

I firmly believe that there is no necessity for all the expenditure which is made in political campaigns. I do not believe that all this expenditure alters one single vote. If the people have made up their minds to vote a certain way, all the money in the world will not change that determination. I also think that this legislation or any legislation such as this cannot be passed unless it has the wholehearted support of every corner of the house and every individual member in it. And I think that support will be forthcoming if hon. members realize that this is a business proposal, that in a simple and practical way it is proposed to put candidates in such a position that they shall be able to resist pressure, and that the law can be enforced with a minimum of evasion. I think we are all sincere in our desire to remedy the abuses and improve the machinery of our present electoral system. The public has a right to assume that the representative whom it sends to parliament has been elected on his own merits and without any suspicion that he is here because he or his friends or his party or his supporters had the longest purse.

If a measure such as is suggested is passed by parliament, its effective operation will be obstructed only by those who in the past have profited by the deficiencies in the existing system; the remainder of the population will, I believe, be extremely glad to have in their hand some weapon to assist them in fighting racketeering in election campaigns, and I am sure that parliament will receive the hearty endorsement and grateful approbation of all who are sincerely interested in the betterment of our social and political conditions.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): I am sure the house is very much interested in this double-barrelled resolution. As a member of the special committee of last year on the elections act I desire to address myself very briefly to the subject.

It must be clear to every hon. member that both proposals set forth in the resolution are difficult and complicated. First, as to redistribution I assume we may fairly conclude that there is no intention to bring about a redistribution on the eve of a general election; that the redistribution that has been made will stand, and that the next election, whenever it comes, will be fought on the basis of that redistribution. I take it that the object of the resolution and the bill to be founded upon it is to adopt a different method for arriving at a redistribution of the seats. The minister has very properly pointed out how complicated and difficult that is. We have made considerable progress since the early days when a redistribution was a purely partisan measure. Later the method was adopted of appointing a joint committee representing all parties in the house, and that committee advised a plan of redistribution.

It must be admitted that there are inequalities, but from what the minister has said I think these inequalities are inevitable. When you take into consideration the density of population in some parts of Canada as compared with others, the unit of urban as compared with rural representation, the fact that one province has a fixed number of seats on which the representation in the other provinces is based—all these facts tend to complicate and make difficult the adoption of a fixed unit for a constituency. In taking part in the work of these committees I have been struck by the discrepancies in the province from which the minister comes. I remember on one occasion pointing out some of them and suggesting that they be corrected. The answer I received was that the number of seats in that province was fixed; that it was not necessary to redistribute that province; that conditions had become settled; that these constituencies were now well known, and that therefore they should be left as they were. I do not think that argument is good; nevertheless it prevailed in many instances. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has laid down the principle that the unit of representation in the cities might very well be larger than in rural districts. That accounts for some of the other discrepancies. Then area has to be taken into consideration. As to whether there should be a commission of judges, or how we could arrive at a redistribution, I am not prepared to say. All these methods have been advocated for the last quarter century, and have been studied; but the committee was not prepared to recommend any change in the existing method. I doubt if the present committee, constituted as it is and having given the subject the study it did last session, would be prepared in the dying days of a parliament to recommend any new method of redistribution. Of course that is only my personal opinion; it may be that I am quite wrong.

Then as to the other feature of the bill to which the minister has referred, I agree that if existing legislation—

Mr. POWER: This really is not a bill; it is a reference to the committee in order that they may study these methods.

Mr. STEWART: That is quite right. I agree with the minister that if existing legislation could be enforced, many of the evils would disappear. There are those who believe that we have about as much legislation now as we can enforce, and that it would be difficult to carry out anything much more drastic. We all agree, however, that if it is possible to correct the abuses, injustices and hardships that are suffered by candidates in these elections, everything possible should be done to bring about that result, and I can see no objection to giving the matter further study. That is the way the resolution impresses me at the present time. Both these questions are very important, difficult and complicated, and I hope a further study of them may bring about some improvement.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I want to refer briefly to the two recommendations made by the minister, referring first to paragraph (b) of the resolution. The bill which the minister sent to the committee last year in reference to the control of election expenses was not very well received, as he has said. That unfavourable reception did not come from one party only, but from all parties. Feeling that something should be done I made a suggestion to the minister last year which, if it had been accepted and incorporated in the bill, I believe would have gone a long way towards reducing the cost of elections to candidates, and would have been of some help in eliminating corruption, using that word in regard to election expenses that are not reported by the candidates in the returns they forward to the chief electoral officer.

My suggestion was that we should follow the system that is followed pretty well throughout the British empire with the exception of Canada; because I believe Canada is the only part of the empire in which the control of the polls is entirely in the hands of one political party. By this I mean that the deputy returning officer and the clerk, the two officials who control the poll, are appointed in Canada by one political party, but I do not think that situation exists anywhere else throughout the empire.

If the minister will listen to me for a moment, the reason I am referring to this matter is that last year in my opinion—I may be wrong—if the minister had not permitted his views to be expressed to the majority of the committee, that suggestion would have been incorporated in the act.

Mr. POWER: My hon. friend should not say that. He knows that I attended only one meeting of the committee, and that the only time I opposed his suggestion was when it came up in the house. It is not fair to accuse me of influencing the committee when I was not there.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the minister will just listen to me—

Mr. BRADETTE: Never mind the insinuations.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not need any suggestions from the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette).

Mr. BRADETTE: Always insinuating.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member can get up and speak for himself. I do not want any interference from him, and I will thank him to remember that. I am not speaking on this matter for the mere purpose of talking. I think the members of the committee last year will be fair enough to admit that I have made perhaps as exhaustive an inquiry into election matters as any other member of this House of Commons, and I am now presenting to the house my best opinion on the subject.

To resume, when the matter of having in the polling booths two officials representing the two political parties was first presented to the committee last year, I am satisfied that a majority were in favour of it. The matter was considered favourably for some length of time, but towards the end of the meetings of the committee it was definitely outlined that it would not be acceptable, and therefore it was not adopted.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Might I ask the hon. member a question, instead of making a speech on the subject? Is it not a fact that when this subject was first broached in the committee last year different members expressed the desire to have it held over for a thorough discussion later; and that when that discussion took place it was decided not to adopt the suggestion?

Mr. MacNICOL: Perhaps it was something along that line. The committee, in other words, were quite disposed to consider the matter, and it might have carried. I may be wrong in that, of course, for every member of the committee has a right to his own opinion. I will repeat, however, that in my judgment that would be a good method to eliminate unnecessary expense and certainly a lot of corruption. For instance, in my own case I did not have a scrutineer at the last election. Why? I determined that I would not pay a scrutineer; I could not, when making the return of my election expenses, take the oath if I had done so and the scrutineer had voted. Therefore I did not have a scrutineer. And when my election expenses were sent in to the returning officer every cheque issued for the payment of election expenses had a voucher attached to it. My return was one hundred per cent true. In the last election many members of parliament had scrutineers. I am not going to make any comment on their having done so, but I believe it was an infraction of the act to vote them.

Mr. POWER: Would my hon. friend cite the section of the act to which he refers?

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, they had to be paid.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): We never have paid scrutineers.

Mr. MacNICOL: The conversation passing back and forth across the floor is in the jocular manner in which the minister spoke of this matter a moment ago. Every one of us knows that there are many elections which have cost many thousands of dollars and which have been reported to the returning officer as costing only three or four thousand dollars. Many expenditures were made for which vouchers were not handed in.

That is one way in which the act can be improved. I have said that I believe Canada is the only member of the British commonwealth of nations which places two officials of the same party in the polling booth. In England the polling booths are not under the control of the parties; they are largely under the control of the municipalities. In Australia the officials are appointed with no relation to their politics, and remain in office indefinitely.

I should like to say one further word about Ontario. The minister's remarks about redistribution were general and did not apply particularly to Ontario. There were thirty-one Ontario seats which were not altered in any way during the last redistribution. Everyone knows that we tried to set up certain principles which should be followed, one being that where a town was located on a county boundary it should be placed in the riding in the county to which the reeve attends as a county councillor. I believe there is only one town in Ontario to which that rule does not apply. We tried to adhere to county boundaries, and I think we did very well. We tried to set reasonable population limits for the different ridings. The redistribution called for an approximate population of 44,000 odd for each riding, which was based upon the division of the population of Quebec by 65. But we were obstructed in our efforts and were forced to do two or three things to which any one with reasonable judgment should have been opposed. Where you have a county with a population of 16,000 to 18,000 adjacent to a county with a population of approximately 25,000, they should be placed together. But because of an agitation which arose in a certain part of Ontario during the last redistribution we were forced to allow certain ridings to remain largely as they were.

If this matter is to be referred to a committee I think certain principles should be laid down. I certainly want to support any reasonable move toward a reduction in expenses, and I firmly believe that certain principles should be incorporated into our act to apply to redistributions.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I hardly think that this is the time when we should go into the details of the elections act. However, I wish to say a word or two in commendation of the minister for the general principles he has laid down this afternoon as to how elections should be conducted in the future. I do not intend to say very much about the elections of the past.

When the minister speaks of a substantial reduction in the cost of elections, I am sure he strikes a responsive chord in all sections of this house. Elections to-day are far too costly, although I cannot say that with regard to my own or with regard to those conducted by members of my group. Some members of our group have conducted their elections with expenditures of $400 or $500, in some cases even less than that. If candidates in fairly large constituencies can be elected for $400 or $500 there is no reason why it should cost certain candidates approximately $50,000, as has been stated on the floor of this house in the past. I think the candidates themselves may be to blame in this particular regard. If a candidate wants to spend money during an election, it is the easiest thing in the world to find persons who will come along and accept that money for work which they may or may not do.

A word with regard to redistribution. There is no doubt that anomalies exist in connection with the size of some of our constituencies. We have some constituencies with populations of from 25,000 to 30,000 adjoining constituencies with populations of 60,000, 70,000 or possibly 80,000. When the committee gets down to work I think it should be able to fix certain limits with regard to population, so much for an industrial constituency and so much for a rural constituency. I am quite willing to concede that rural constituencies should contain smaller populations than industrial ridings, but I do not think that the disproportions which exist at the present time are entirely fair. However, the committee will have to go into this matter.

As far as the members of this group are concerned, we give our wholehearted endorsation to the principles laid down this afternoon by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power)—or may I also call him the minister of elections?

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I believe all hon. members of the house noted with satisfaction the enthusiasm with which the minister introduced this motion, and I hasten to assure him that it is with a spirit of cooperation that I rise in my place. I feel, as he does, that this is a step forward which will be well received by the great majority of the people of this country. I desire to congratulate him upon his statement when introducing the resolution, as well as upon the remarks he made last year when he introduced his bill. Last year when he spoke on the same type of resolution he said that there were two points which would be brought up during the course of the discussion. Perhaps I had better deal with them now.

The first was that central campaign funds were necessary and essential. To that I would reply that while they may not be absolutely necessary or essential, undoubtedly they are of some advantage to the public. However important we may think our policies, our pronouncements, our discussions and our debates may be, we must realize that outside of this house and throughout the country there are many thousands of persons who are far less interested in us, in our activities and in governmental activities than they are in the sport pages of the daily newspapers, in the radio or in the movies. I believe with the minister that political funds are necessary to a certain extent. Nevertheless, this question of political funds has caused a great deal of misapprehension, if I may use that word, throughout the country. From time to time we find references as to the effect of political funds upon the political life of our country. I should like to cite the words uttered by the minister last year as reported on page 2027 of Hansard. He said:

Undoubtedly there is growing throughout the country a contempt for politicians and distrust of certain phases of party politics. There is a belief firmly implanted in the minds of many thoughtful men that the result of electoral campaigns is not a true reflection of the views and opinions of the people, but that these views and opinions have been influenced by propaganda and sometimes by corrupt and corrupting funds raised by people who hope to profit by the advent to, or the maintenance of one party or another in, places of power and responsibility.

The minister believes, and I believe, that this will meet with the approval of the vast majority of the people of this country. A motion is now introduced to set up a committee to recommend amendments to our present law so that it may never again be said that Canada has such a thing as corrupt political funds. That is why this committee is being appointed.

Political campaign funds are being discussed from time to time by various people and by the press in this country. Only the other day I happened to come across an article in the Saturday Evening Post, which in its issue of February 4, 1939, speaks of a person, a United States citizen, I believe, whom they call "Sell 'Em Ben Smith." He is now head of Thomson and McKinnon, which the Saturday Evening Post describes as:

—an old, respected, profitable, Wall street stock brokerage house.

It goes on to say that Sell 'Em Ben Smith:

. . . succeeded his friend, Jack Bickell, on January 1, 1939. Smith and Bickell are partners in Wall street and in Canadian gold mines as well.

He is also, according to this article in the Saturday Evening Post, a heavy contributor to the campaign funds of President Roosevelt. I do not know that there is anything wrong about this gentleman coming to this country. Nevertheless it is known that he has contributed to political campaign funds elsewhere, and now we find him visiting Canada from time to time. I say this not because I believe there is something wrong about it, but because I believe it is time that we protected our own interests in Canada and that we avoided any suggestion of anything wrong being done in this country with respect to campaign funds. That is why I particularly welcome the motion the minister has introduced.

Apart from that, there have been what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) likes to call allegations throughout this country about campaign funds. The most recent and notable examples are certain articles which appeared in the daily papers published in the city of Ottawa. Not long ago on its front page the Citizen carried a notice to the effect that there was need for a judicial inquiry to get campaign fund facts. The article went on to make various statements on the front page, when a thing like that is published abroad it tends to give the impression to the public at large that there is something absolutely wrong with our present system of campaign funds.

Mr. BOTHWELL: What is the date of the publication?

Mr. PELLETIER: March 3, 1939. I am not sure if that is the issue in which this notice appeared on the front page, but the issue of March 3 carries an article exactly similar to that which appeared on the front page either the day before or the day afterwards.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Is it a letter?

Mr. PELLETIER: No, an editorial, entitled "Need of judicial inquiry to get campaign fund facts." From time to time also in the same newspaper there have been articles to the effect that campaign funds were bedeviling Canada. An editorial appeared, for instance, on March 7, 1939, in the course of which statements like this were made:

> For years the bottom of the St. Lawrence river has been dredged below Montreal in a continuous outpouring of public funds. One result of this dredging has been to lower the water level in Montreal harbour more than seven feet as compared with the level before dredging started. Evidence of this wasteful result of dredging has long been available to both parties, but they say nothing about it. A judicial inquiry into the relationship of patronage politics to dredging contracts would startle Canadian taxpayers.

Articles of that kind travel throughout the length and breadth of this country. Again, last year, during the debate on the address, the then leader of the opposition, Mr. Bennett, made certain statements which were characterized as allegations or vague rumours to the effect that levies were common in connection with contracts of the Canadian National Railways. Desiring to render a service to the people of this country by dispelling such rumours I brought forward a motion at that time calling for an investigation of these matters, but the Prime Minister told me that the manner in which I had proposed my motion was calculated to involve the fate of the government if put to a vote, and suggested that if the question were brought forward in such a way that members would feel free to support or reject the motion, he would welcome it. Let me make that quite clear. I have taken the trouble to search Hansard of last year for the exact words the Prime Minister used on that occasion. At page 464 he said:

> We are only too anxious to see that our electoral laws are made as effective as possible to prevent anything in the nature of corruption. The government intends, in pursuance of its promise at the last session, to deal with the franchise and with the electoral laws again this year, so there will be an opportunity for all hon. members to come forward with any suggestions which they may have, any concrete, practical proposals which they may care to make. The government will be glad to consider any such proposals. I here and now invite hon. members, instead of wasting their time in doing what they can to defame the institution of parliament and democratic government in this country, to come along with practical suggestions whereby we can prevent in the future anything of the kind which they to-day are imagining has taken place in the past, or which actually may have taken place in the past.

So that the proposal I intend to make to-day in the form of an amendment to this resolution is really the result of a call from the Prime Minister to every member of the house to lend his assistance to the government so that these things which he called shadows may forever be dispelled from the minds of the people.

I know for a fact that editorials and articles such as those to which I have referred to-day have rankled in the minds of various members of this house. Just the other day the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) criticized bitterly the attitude of certain newspapers in this country. He said at page 1440 of Hansard, speaking of the Ottawa Citizen:

> That newspaper has made certain statements in the last two or three weeks and I suggest right now to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that the editor should be brought before the bar of the house and be required to give, what I know he cannot give, one tittle of evidence that either the party opposite or this party has collected money improperly.

He went on to refer to statements that had been made by the Citizen, and replying to him the Prime Minister said that he agreed with him in certain particulars, especially with reference to certain newspaper editorials. Furthermore the Prime Minister suggested that he would request the public accounts committee to summon this writer before it, then and there to give under oath any evidence he might have. I believe the Prime Minister suggested the public accounts committee simply because at that particular time there had been a fuss made about a certain contract given by the Department of National Defence. It was well known and thoroughly understood by everyone concerned that there was no suggestion of political corruption involved in this contract, but because, I believe, these articles had appeared at that particular time the Prime Minister suggested the public accounts committee. If I remember correctly the government had not then given notice of the resolution which we are debating to-day, and perhaps up to then it had not been the intention of the government to move any such resolution as this with respect to campaign funds. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if we are going to try to do away with corruption, the best place to investigate these matters is not before the public accounts committee but before the special committee on elections contemplated in the motion brought forward to-day by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power).

These are matters which I believe we should consider in connection with the motion now before the house. However, I do not believe what I have said so far is the strongest argument which I could use in support of the amendment which I desire to propose. The motion provides that a special committee consisting of certain members be appointed to study and report on the following subjects: (a) methods of redistribution; and

(b) Methods whereby: (I) the source and disposition of sums received and expended in promoting the return of members of the House of Commons may be readily traceable; (II) publicity may be given to all receipts and expenditures in connection therewith; (III) the cost of elections to candidates may be reduced; (IV) the amount that may be spent by or on behalf of a candidate in his election campaign may be limited.

I know it is the sincere desire of the government that the committee charged with the responsibility of bringing back to the House of Commons the recommendations which they seek, should have the greatest possible latitude so as to bring back the best possible report. I know it is the intention of the minister, of the government, and as a matter of fact of every hon. member, to bring about such conditions in Canada that allegations and vague rumours will no longer appear in this phase of our national life.

Last year, in the course of a debate very similar to this, the Prime Minister was very resentful about the fact that he had not been given any notice of the amendment. He stated at that time that he had relied on certain rumours which he had heard in the corridors of parliament. My desire being, as I said at the beginning, to cooperate with and assist the Prime Minister and the minister responsible for this motion, I took the trouble this year to send the ministers a copy of my amendment several days ahead of time so that they would not have to rely on rumours in the corridors of parliament but would be fully notified as to my intention concerning this matter. The amendment is to the effect that we should have greater latitude in the way of gathering the information which this committee should have in order that it may bring in a better report. In this amendment I have referred to a definite period of years within which, I suggest, investigations should be made. I have fixed ten as the number of years, and my purpose in doing that is that we may embrace the newer political parties. I should not want it to be said that the Social Credit party were not called upon to do what other parties, new or old, were required to do. I should like all of them to be treated as on an equal basis. For that reason I have provided sufficient time to go back to the very beginning of these movements, so that they may be included in any investigation which will take place.

After all, when it comes down to investigating the matter of donations to political parties, I believe the Prime Minister has agreed from time to time that such action is quite proper and wholly in order. He went further; he said last year that not only was there one man responsible for gathering party funds but that as far as his own party were concerned they kept a whole committee to do that very thing; the record of that statement is on the pages of Hansard. The then leader of the opposition felt the same way about it. He related various circumstances of which he knew; and he insisted that certain parties contributed to political funds in the same way that they would contribute to their church. One man in particular said that his mother had taught him that, of every dollar he earned, there should be first a certain portion for the church, and second, a certain portion for the political party to which he belonged. In view of the attitude taken by the former leader of the opposition and the present leader of the government, no one should hesitate to come forward and give this committee which it is proposed to set up the information which is desired by all in order to facilitate its task. I move, seconded by Mr. Fair, the following amendment to the motion:

That the motion be amended by adding the following words immediately after the words "special committee" in the last sentence of the motion:

"in order to facilitate the carrying out of instructions contained in paragraph (b) of the resolution, have power to investigate the amounts of contributions held at various times by various federal political parties, or party assistants on behalf of such parties, in Canada, for the past ten years, the sources from which such contributions came and the dispositions from same contributions of all sums of one hundred dollars or over, and . . ."

I believe that the house, the Prime Minister and the government will be only too glad to adopt this motion. By doing so we shall dispel rumours, we shall put on the table the cards we have at our disposal, and no one in future could write articles such as have been written recently. There would be no such thing as allegations or vague rumours, and it no longer would be necessary to get up in the house and plead in defence of the honour of the house itself or of any particular hon. member.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I do this at the indirect request of the Prime Minister. Last year he invited us to assist him in order to help the House of Commons to do away with these vague rumours, and I believe that he will receive my sincere effort at cooperation in the spirit in which I move this amendment.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): As a member for the past three sessions of the committee on elections and franchise I want to express in my first words commendation of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) for having brought in this resolution. Last year, as the minister has pointed out, the question was before the committee, but because of lack of time we had to leave it over for the time being. I am very glad that he has brought it up again this year. I hope that his colleagues will see to it that the appropriate measure is brought forward and carried to a successful end in the spirit in which the minister has presented the matter to-day.

I cannot agree with everything the minister has said in commenting upon certain things which have happened—for instance, as to free liquor at election time. I had the pleasure of visiting Saskatchewan last year during the provincial election, and free liquor was one of the big things in that province. Again, those who went to Edmonton East during the federal by-election know that many other free things were in evidence right there in Edmonton.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Did the liquor come from Alberta, along with the promises?

Mr. FAIR: You can go to the provincial by-election in Athabaska and find out about the free liquor, the free dances, and free music which were in evidence. The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) has mumbled something, and I could tell him about something which happened last June, or about the end of May, very close to his home, during the provincial campaign. If he wants to find out anything in connection with Saskatchewan he does not have to go far from his own doorstep. He will find plenty right around there—enough to satisfy him.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Very smart. If there was any liquor there, you brought it.

Mr. BRADETTE: Promises and liquor.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): We are long past that stage.

Mr. FAIR: If I might have the attention of the house I would tell the hon. member for Melfort that I do not touch liquor, and I did not bring any into his constituency. The Liberals saw to it that there was plenty of liquor on hand—and free, at that.

Apparently the Minister of Pensions and National Health believes that open confession is good for the soul. If we are to believe everything the papers tell us, he is soon to go to that haven of political rest, and will not need to worry about political contributions. If he goes there I certainly wish him happiness—just so long as the country sees to it that that haven is put up with.

We are told that too much money is spent in connection with the election of certain members. I am not going to specify any member in particular, but I believe I could tell of one whose election on one occasion cost $70,000. I understand a member draws something like $4,000 as indemnity, and when we realize that $66,000 above the amount of the indemnity was spent to elect that man, then we must believe that somebody, somewhere, was possibly contributing some of that $66,000, expecting to get something in return.

Statements have been made in the house since I have been a member which, while not offered as definite charges, have included some very strong allegations and are sufficient, I believe, to lead anybody to the belief that this measure should be put through. Not only should the measure pass, but it should have teeth in it to make it effective. If hon. members cannot be elected without corruption, then we cannot expect anything but corruption in connection with some of the legislation which comes before the house.

I would recommend that members come here free of party or contributory funds. In that way we would probably have better legislation and a better Canada than we have to-day. The conditions which exist are the result of operations within the parties which have held office for a number of years, and I must say that they are conditions of which

I am ashamed. If a change in our election practices will bring about better conditions for the people of Canada, then let us have that change, and have it now.

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the observations of the minister in presenting the resolution. It does seem to me that since last session an effort has been made to provide something on which the committee which is being set up may work. As chairman of that committee for the last three sessions of parliament I must say that I believe every member was most anxious at each sitting to do the best he could to see that the elections act was brought to the point where it would be the most effective act we have ever had in Canada dealing with this subject.

The Political Expenditures Act came to the committee towards the close of the session. It was under discussion at two or three sittings, and although most committee members expressed themselves in sympathy with the idea, some of them were not altogether in favour of the terms of the bill. It was for that reason the resolution which passed the committee was worded in the terms quoted to-day. We recommended and expected that a committee would be set up this year to further study the principles embodied in the bill, and I believe I am safe in saying that every member of the committee was more or less in sympathy with the suggestions made by the minister to-day, although possibly not in all cases with the details.

When the committee is set up I believe it will have the duty of considering all the suggestions which can be made by the minister and other members of the committee who have studied the political expenditures measure, and by others from whom the committee can get further information which may be required.

I need hardly say every hon. member realizes that the first part of the resolution requires considerable study. I refer, of course, to the paragraph dealing with methods used to effect a redistribution. In 1937 the committee had the opportunity of devoting considerable time to a discussion of this problem, and although they did not report, it was not, as suggested by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart), because they could not come to a finding. They believed the matter would have to be returned again to the committee for further study. From the discussions which took place with respect to redistribution, it was my opinion that an arrangement which would be a substantial improvement over the method now in vogue could be arrived at.

With respect to paragraph (b) of the resolution, and the amendment moved by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) I can say only it does seem to me that the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) part of which was read to the house to-day, and as we listened to it last year, expressed the very opposite of the interpretation the hon. member for Peace River has placed upon it. The amendment proposes that a committee of the house inquire into contributions which have been made to campaign funds over the last ten years, and ascertain the effect and influence of those contributions, where they were spent, or what disposition was made of them. Well, why stop at ten years? If we are going into an investigation of that kind we might as well go back to confederation. It seems to me the only object the hon. member can have in mind in asking the committee to make an investigation of that kind, in connection with the paragraph which refers to the "methods whereby the source and disposition of sums received and expended in promoting the return of members of the House of Commons may be readily traceable"—or the second, third or fourth subparagraphs in that paragraph—is that the group to which he belongs may gain something which would be of assistance to them. Surely nothing can be gained by investigating the source and disposition of campaign funds for the last ten years, or any other period. If there have been any specific dredging contracts which should be investigated, as referred to in the article quoted, there is ample provision in the rules of this house to enable that to be done. But it is impossible for a committee to do anything as a roving commission such as this amendment proposes.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What is the hon. member afraid of?

Mr. BOTHWELL: Afraid of nothing. Since the hon. member asks that question, I am free to admit that in the past campaign funds have been used by every party that asked for the votes of the people, whether they called it a campaign fund or anything else. But is there any difference in principle between the man who contributes ten dollars towards the expenses of a campaign when he is not able to give personal service, and the man who drives his car and spends days or perhaps weeks campaigning for some friend or in the interests of the party that he believes is going to give the best government?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): There is a difference when a corporation gives a large sum of money.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I can see no difference between those two men. Many people have not the opportunity to spend time in campaigning, or perhaps have not the ability to do so. As far as my experience goes, it costs the man who spends his time in that way a lot more than the few dollars another man may contribute to help put over a campaign. I can see no difference in the principle.

To go back over a period of ten years and investigate all the contributions of over $100 made to any political party in this country, and to find out the disposition of them, I feel confident would take a commission with such roving powers several years, even to make a fairly decent interim report. Everyone admits that there have been campaign funds in the past—

Mr. LANDERYOU: Is no record kept of these campaign funds?

Mr. BOTHWELL: I can speak only for my own constituency. As far as the campaign is concerned, the official agent files his return of contributions received by him. The candidate himself has to make a report of his own expenses and any moneys that came into his hands; as to any money that comes to the central fund, if I might so term it, of any of the parties, I have never seen any record of it. I do not know whether there is any central fund or not in any party. I never have personally received any money from any central fund belonging to the party to which I owe allegiance, and I do not know of any person else receiving any contribution from any central fund of any other party. In any event surely nothing can be gained by going muck-raking over the past ten years.

What this committee has been endeavouring to do during the past three sessions of parliament is to work out an elections act which will clarify everything pertaining to elections, simplify them, make elections less costly. As far as the cost to Canada is concerned, under the Dominion Elections Act we have succeeded in reducing it by a substantial amount and if we can now insert provisions in the act which will save money for the candidate, the object is certainly a worthy one. The resolution itself covers all that we need do.

I have been wondering whether the campaign funds that have been spoken of by hon. members ever had any more influence in an election than the promise of $25 a month that was made in two elections that I know of.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What is wrong with that?

Mr. BRADETTE: What a conscience you have!

Mr. BOTHWELL: I believe it had a great deal more effect than any campaign funds I ever knew anything of in the constituency I have the honour to represent.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Your minister does not agree with you; he said money has no influence.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Well, that $25 a month was to be a continuing thing, practically putting a man on a pension.

As far as I can see, no committee of this house could possibly carry out the terms of the amendment proposed. If I am to be a member of that committee I am ready and willing to spend all the time possible and whatever ability I have in an endeavour to put into effect the objects aimed at—not in the exact form enunciated by the minister; I am not admitting that everything he said is correct. I believe it is a matter that will require days and weeks of study by the committee; nevertheless I am prepared to do my share in trying to achieve the objects aimed at by the political expenditures bill of last year.

The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) seemed to be of the opinion that the committee were ready to adopt a suggestion made by him that the deputy returning officer and the poll clerk should be of different political stripe. As chairman of the committee of last year I may say that I did not gain that impression. The matter came up for discussion, several hon. members spoke on it, and then it was simply tabled for later consideration. The report of the evidence contains pages of discussion on it, but the committee decided not to adopt the suggestion. The political expenditures bill, so far as I know, had no influence on the action of the committee in that regard.

I also understood the hon. member for Davenport to say that the situation in the province of Quebec as to the number of voters in various polling subdivisions did not apply to Ontario.

Mr. MacNICOL: I made no reference whatever to the province of Quebec. I did refer to Ontario.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I just noticed the hon. member was not in his seat for a moment. I have the figures here for Ontario. In Ontario the smallest rural constituency has only 11,073 electors, whereas the largest has 47,870.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the population of those constituencies?

Mr. BOTHWELL: The populations are 18,666 and 88,597 respectively.

Mr. MANION: What are the names of the constituencies?

Mr. BOTHWELL: Glengarry and Nipissing. Then in regard to urban constituencies, the smallest one—or as closely as we could get it in our investigation—is Danforth, with a population of 41,824 and 29,034 electors. On the other hand Spadina has a population of 82,127, with 52,160 electors. I just mention that to show that the situation described by the minister in regard to the province of Quebec exists in Ontario also, and we can go right across Canada and find the same thing in other provinces.

Mr. MacNICOL: If I might interrupt my hon. friend for a moment, I said there were conditions in eastern Ontario, and perhaps western Ontario as well, to which I was opposed and to which other members of the committee were opposed; but we were compelled to allow the ridings to remain as they were because of an agitation that was carried on to retain representation for seats such as Glengarry. We wanted to place Glengarry and Stormont together; we wanted to join Russell and Prescott, but we were not allowed to do so.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I just wanted to explain that.

Another matter which was brought up in connection with redistribution was the relationship between urban and rural constituencies. I believe every member of the committee was convinced that the urban constituencies should be considerably larger than the rural constituencies, and the evidence taken contains figures as to the relationship in other parts of the empire between rural and urban constituencies.

Mr. J. C. LANDERYOU (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Bothwell) speaks with authority; for he said he had no knowledge of any central campaign fund. If he has no such knowledge I do not see how he could be in a position to state that an investigation covering the last ten years would take up so much time or be so difficult as he suggests. The amendment reads:

> In order to facilitate the carrying out of instructions contained in paragraph (b) of the resolution, have power to investigate the amounts of contributions held at various times by various federal political parties, or party assistants on behalf of such parties, in Canada, for the past ten years, the sources from which such contributions came and the dispositions from such contributions of all sums of one hundred dollars or over . . .

Surely in the committee it would not be very difficult to establish whether or not there was a central campaign fund; surely it would not be difficult to establish whether there are any records as to the amount of money paid into and paid out of such central fund. Surely it would not be difficult to establish whether or not it is true that large industrial and financial institutions make contributions to this fund and whether or not they expect to get anything in return for the large contributions that it has been suggested they make from time to time. So I do not see that this would be such a tremendous undertaking. Surely the muckraking to which my hon. friend referred would not extend to such proportions that it would be impossible to make an investigation into it. I do not even suggest that it would necessitate muckraking, but those are the words of my hon. friend.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Does the hon. member think it would be possible for a committee of this kind to find out what influence a certain contribution to a political party, if it was ever made, had upon the dredging contract in the St. Lawrence river?

Mr. LANDERYOU: There is nothing like that contained in the resolution. There is no suggestion that there should be an investigation into campaign funds in respect to the dredging of the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. BOTHWELL: It refers to dispositions from such contributions.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I ask my hon. friend just how he reads that into the resolution.

Mr. DUNNING: The mover spoke of that as one reason for his resolution.

Mr. LANDERYOU: He was just referring to an editorial to show the need for an investigation into this matter. I believe the hon. member who moved the amendment will agree when I say that he wants to establish whether or not there is a central campaign fund; whether or not there is any record of this fund; whether or not the fund has been audited, and so on. Surely these vast sums of money are not paid into a fund with no record being kept. I am not even suggesting that there is a central campaign fund, though many have declared that to be so.

Mr. MARTIN: Assuming that this amendment were in order and that it were carried, would the hon. member be prepared to ask the premier of Alberta to explain what was done with the $100,000 voted by the legislature of Alberta for propaganda purposes, which we all know went to help elect Social Credit candidates in Saskatchewan?

Mr. LANDERYOU: That, Mr. Speaker, is a deliberate falsehood. Further, I am prepared to say—

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member must withdraw that expression. I do not believe it is parliamentary.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I simply ask the hon. member to confine himself to a statement that can be accepted by us as the truth.

Mr. MARTIN: I assume, Mr. Speaker, that in saying it was a falsehood the hon. member wishes to withdraw any innuendo that might be understood.

Mr. REID: We believe it, anyway.

Mr. LANDERYOU: If my hon. friend desires an investigation into the affairs of the province of Alberta—

Mr. MARTIN: No, I was simply asking the hon. member to do what I know he will do, withdraw any suggestion that I was guilty of a falsehood.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I will withdraw any suggestion that the hon. member himself was guilty of a falsehood, though the statement he made was not true. In fact, the premier of the province of Alberta has declared that it is not the truth. Those charges were made in Alberta, and he stated that they were wrong. I ask my hon. friend upon what he bases that remark. Is it on rumours, or newspaper clippings?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not think it proper for the hon. member to ask questions of this kind. The house is not in committee, and it is not proper to put questions across the floor at this time.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Then may I say to my hon. friend and to the house that we do not hesitate to say that we want a complete investigation into all these matters, if you want to extend it that far, though I believe the investigation should be confined to the affairs of this parliament. In regard to the promise hon. gentlemen opposite claim we made the people of Alberta in regard to the payment of $25 a month, I should like to see that matter referred to the banking and commerce committee or some other committee for investigation, because it is right in line with the promises made by the Liberal party that they would issue currency and credit to meet the needs of the people. I think there is no doubt the people of this country are in need of increased purchasing power. We can debate the amount, but I do not believe $25 is too much to suggest.

I hope in this amendment we shall have the united support of all hon. members of the house. I believe it would clear the air and would indicate our sincerity in this matter. It would disclose possible information which would be very valuable to us in drafting amendments to the bill itself.

Mr. J. S. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I am assuming that the minister was absolutely sincere in what he represented to us this afternoon. From my point of view, this resolution marks a tremendous advance in our political life, and I think we ought to accept it as such. Inherent in every man is a suggestion of sadism, sometimes physical and sometimes intellectual. I deplore the suggestions that have been put forward in this house that we should rake over the coals of the past. If we have been playing with cards having unequal angles, the new deck about to be distributed is the one with which we shall work in the future. I call for a clean sweep. I should like to see absolute purity in the whole of our political life. I definitely associate myself with the minister's resolution and announce my opposition to the amendment.

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (Huron-Perth): Mr. Speaker, in connection with the statement made a short time ago with reference to the promise to pay a monthly dividend of $25 in Alberta, I may say that during the election in that province I had sent to me some of the literature which was used by study clubs and other groups throughout the province prior to and during the election campaign. When Mr. Aberhart, the premier of Alberta, was in our town, last December, he made the following statement—

Mr. PELLETIER: Having absolutely no objection to any hon. member discussing the $25 per month dividend—

An hon. MEMBER: You have no objection!

Mr. PELLETIER: I rise to a point of order. I maintain that we are not now discussing any particular item of political corruption. We are discussing an amendment, and what the hon. member is now saying is somewhat akin to a reference to political corruption along one particular line. That could be investigated by the committee when the time comes.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not consider the hon. member has stated a point of order.

Mr. GOLDING: I have no desire to violate the rules of the house. I think this statement should be on the record. I was pointing out that when he visited his home town, Mr. Aberhart made a certain statement, according to the following report:

In an interview, Mr. Aberhart denied ever promising a $25 a month dividend to Albertans. He had told audiences he saw no reason why a dividend shouldn't be paid and that he thought this dividend shouldn't be less than $25 a month. Dividends will only be paid, he said, out of a surplus created by Alberta's natural resources.

Mr. LANDERYOU: May I ask my hon. friend—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LANDERYOU: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: What is the point of order?

Mr. LANDERYOU: I want to know what the hon. member is quoting from.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member said he was quoting from a report of a statement made by the premier of Alberta.

Mr. GOLDING: I am quoting from the London Free Press. This is a report of a statement by Mr. Aberhart when he visited our town last December. He went on to say:

Never will any dividends be paid from taxation. That only impoverishes one group to satisfy another.

I have in my hand a pamphlet which was sent to me by none other than the premier himself.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What is wrong with that?

Mr. GOLDING: I should like to read it. This is headed:

Study Group Feature No. 3. Purchasing Power in the Hands of the Consumers.

There is an introduction here; I do not know whether I should read it.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Read it.

Mr. GOLDING: I shall be glad to put it on Hansard, but I want to read one part of it. This is what was sent out to the study clubs which were studying social credit.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let us hear it.

Mr. GOLDING: It goes on to say—

Mr. LANDERYOU: On another point of order, Mr. Speaker; what is the hon. member quoting from?

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member told you.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood the hon. member to say he was quoting from a circular which he had received from the premier of Alberta.

Mr. GOLDING: I should like to put this whole circular on Hansard so that hon. members can see for themselves what it says.

Mr. SPEAKER: That can be done only with the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Unanimous consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Put it on.

Mr. GOLDING: This is the circular:

Study Group Feature No. 3
"Purchasing Power in the Hands of the Consumers"

Introduction.

A. It is quite evident that mankind has solved the problem of production. We live in the age of plenty.

1. But in spite of this, the paradox is ever before us. We have poverty in the midst of plenty.

2. The great problem is to place purchasing power in the hands of the consumers.

Body.

A. A solution is being suggested in two ways—

1. Remove the surplus by exporting or sabotage.

(a) This will create the need of more goods and industry will hire more employees.

(b) Who will pay for goods destroyed?

(c) For the last few decades there has not been sufficient purchasing power to buy the goods produced. So the trouble will at once return.

2. Create employment by beginning an immense system of public works.

(a) This will give purchasing power without creating more consummable goods.

(b) Where will we get the money to finance these public works? Our debts are now high enough.

(c) Furthermore how long will we be able to provide public works to be done.

B. There is only one remedy.

(1) Through the agency of basic dividends granted to every bona fide citizen we shall give purchasing power sufficient to buy the bare necessities of food, clothing and shelter, without basing the same on work, but the unearned increment of social credit.

(2) This will be distributed through credit houses at which monthly a credit pass book will be presented by each citizen and an entry of $25 will be made.

The citizen will then be able to pay for purchases by a non-negotiable certificate ordering the transfer of the credit to another.

The process will be largely a matter of bookkeeping.

(3) For travelling in other parts of Canada and small purchases at home. Dominion currency will be supplied by the credit house, upon the presentation of a non-negotiable certificate for the amount.

(4) No citizen will be allowed to overdraw on his account without special arrangement for same.

(5) Salaries, wages and commissions, etc., are in addition to these basic dividends.

A. These dividends will be paid to the individual man or woman, married or single, and each will have full authority over same.

(1) Young people reaching the age of seventeen and continuing educational training of any kind will be given $5 a month. This amount will be increased by $5 a month at each succeeding birthday until the full dividends of $25 will be secured.

(2) Anyone handicapped physically or mentally may be given a bonus dividend.

(3) To prevent exploitation of the country's resources, citizenship must be carefully protected from unworthy individuals.

(4) No citizen shall be allowed to barter away or otherwise dispose of his basic dividends and thereby become a vagabond or tramp with no fixed place of abode or with no means of sustenance.

Any one who understands the English language cannot help but see that there is mention there of certain sums of money—$25 for adults and $5, $10, $15, $20 and $25 for young people over the age of seventeen years. In that campaign a promise of the payment of a $25 dividend was made, and if that is not bribery I do not know what I am talking about.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): With respect to what has been said by the last two or three speakers, I am under the impression that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) is not quite in order. I am not raising that point at the moment, but perhaps shall do so a little later. It brings up questions which are entirely new issues, and has nothing to do with the motion which has been placed before the house. In any event I am at a loss to understand just why this amendment is moved.

I have here extracts from Hansard which perhaps I had better read, indicating that in all quarters of this house there is an appreciation of the fact that there are campaign funds. Last year in the course of the discussion I myself said that there were campaign funds, and that they were necessary, and I discussed in this house quite frankly the question whether or not the publicity of campaign funds would dry up their sources. There never was in mind any hiding of the fact that no political party can get along without some financial support. Mr. Bennett, at page 36 of Hansard of January 31, 1938 is reported as having said:

Contributions to political parties are not in any sense censurable.

And he went on at great length along the same line.

The right hon. leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) as late as March 1, 1939, said:

Campaign funds are necessary for the purposes of an election. Is there anything wrong with securing funds to help to propagate the principles in which one believes?

I have many other extracts from Hansard which tend to show that nobody denies the existence of campaign funds.

My hon. friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party also admit that there are campaign funds. They admit also that they require them. I have in my hand a clipping from the Vancouver Province, an advertisement entitled "The C.C.F. makes a frank appeal to you." In the advertisement there is a picture of my hon. friend the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). The appeal is made through Arnold Webster, First Vice-President, and it says:

I wish to address very briefly C.C.F. supporters throughout British Columbia—especially the thousands of sincere men and women who for one reason or another are not active members of our organization.

Many of you, at different times, have said something like this: "You know I can't safely associate myself with the C.C.F. My job makes that impossible, but I believe thoroughly in the cooperative idea; in fact, I'm with you and Mr. Woodsworth 100 per cent. If I can ever help the movement, let me know."

Mr. Webster apparently continues:

Well, I'm making that appeal to you now.

There will be a federal election this year. In every one of the sixteen constituencies in B.C. the C.C.F. will have a good chance of victory if we are able to carry out the preliminary organizational work that is required.

You know, of course, that the old parties do not bother ordinary folk with such requests for money. Those who are making large fortunes out of the work and wealth of others will gladly contribute thousands of dollars to the campaign funds of the Liberals and Conservatives—

I wish they would only bring them along, and I am sure the leader of the opposition would be glad to see some of them.

Mr. MANION: I should be very glad.

Mr. POWER: The advertisement continues:

—and, as a result, control their policies and their decisions.

Against these privileged groups stands the C.C.F., the one important movement to-day that reflects the best in the hearts and minds of the common people of Canada.

We are beginning now to plan this year's campaign. Will you help us?

Money is needed to purchase radio time, to prepare attractive literature, to send organizers into neglected areas—to do the hundred and one things necessary to assure the success of C.C.F. candidates.

I wonder what else the other parties do except the one hundred and one things necessary to ensure the success of their parties. It goes on:

Many of you, no doubt, will wish to share in the work of building a strong organization in this province in preparation for the 1939 election.
You can make a direct contribution or pledge—

Something like a twenty-five dollar promise, probably.

—a set amount per month and contributions will be privately acknowledged and remain confidential.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POWER: It continues:

All contributions should be sent to . . . Herbert Gargrave, provincial secretary, at C.C.F. headquarters, Holden building, Vancouver, B.C. Help the C.C.F. to help you.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): To which member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party was the hon. member addressing his remarks?

Mr. POWER: To all of them.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I thought he was addressing someone in particular.

Mr. POWER: No. But I may in a moment if my hon. friend wishes. I have in my hand Hansard of last year, containing the report of the debate on the address, in which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who, I understand, is a prominent member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, says:

The time has come, in the interests of clean and decent government in Canada, when political parties should be compelled to publish the sources of all their campaign funds.

The deeds of these mighty men make mock of the words they say! Here his own party pledges itself to keep secret and confidential the surreptitious contributions it is going to receive. I wish the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in the house would be like the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation outside the house—

Mr. COLDWELL: It is.

Mr. POWER: If my hon. friend can show that, doubtless he will.

Mr. COLDWELL: I will.

Mr. POWER: After all his rage, his anger, his indignation, at secret contributions, his party endorses and appeals for these same secret and confidential contributions.

The point I wish to make, Mr. Speaker, is this: The Liberals know there are campaign funds; the Conservatives know there are campaign funds; and apparently the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation know there are campaign funds.

Now I come to my hon. friends the Social Crediters. There are those of us who believe that it is just as honest for the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation to use the campaign funds, which they have collected in this surreptitious manner, to influence the electors as it is for the Social Crediters to use the electorate's money, the people's own money, to influence them by promises of twenty-five dollars a month. As between the methods evolved by these two political parties I do not think it is for us to judge. If the one condemns the other I shall be extremely sorry, for I sympathize with both. Is that vote to which reference has already been made of $100,000 appropriated in the legislature of Alberta for the propagation of the social credit faith to be considered as a campaign fund or is it not?

Mr. DUNNING: It surely is.

Mr. POWER: If any one of us of the disreputable old parties were to—

Mr. MANION: Speak for yourself.

Mr. POWER: Out of sympathy for my hon. friend the leader of the opposition I claim some kinship.

Mr. MANION: It is only a matter of race.

Mr. POWER: It is a matter of race, and not of politics. As I was going to say, if these so-called disreputable old parties were able to find money so readily and so easily from a vote in the legislature of the province in which they were in power—let us say, for example, that the province of Quebec gave $100,000 to whatever party that province now supports, or let us say that Nova Scotia gave $100,000 for the propagation of Liberal principles—

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): How about Ontario?

Mr. POWER: —or that this government were to decide to ask this house for $100,000 to propagate Liberalism—I can see my hon. friends in the corner rising up in their wrath, in holy horror.

Mr. LANDERYOU: No.

Mr. POWER: Did my hon. friend say "no"? My hon. friend says he would not oppose it? Some fine day we shall have to put it to the test. I should like him to serve on this election committee and make a suggestion such as that to the committee, and if it were carried, bring it into this chamber and propose it. But whether it is propaganda carried on under government auspices for one political party or another, it still involves propaganda funds, and my hon. friends have no right to raise their hands in holy horror when other political parties are obliged to find means to carry on their work of education.

What does my hon. friend suggest? He suggests that we should inquire into sources of campaign funds in the last ten years. The reply of my hon. friend who was chairman of the committee last year is that that of itself would take ten years. But leaving that aside, what will the hon. member who makes the suggestion have when he is through with the inquiry? He will have muck-raked; he will have thrown dirt at a large number of people in this country; he will have thrown suspicion on the old political parties; but he will not have advanced to the step at which we are to-day, when we have a bill to remedy these abuses. Does he want muck-raking or does he want action? If he wants muck-raking he can follow the procedure he suggests. If he wants action, he can do, not what he did last year, namely stay away from the committee during most of its sittings, but go to the meetings of the committee and help it with its work. Last year my hon. friend went to six sittings of the twenty-three sittings of the committee. When he saw there was no muck-raking to be done, when he saw there was nothing to foster that suspicion which he deplores, he stayed away. He stayed away when there was real work to be done.

Mr. PELLETIER: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. POWER: I will apologize right away. Sit down. When there was real work to be done he was not there. I am not apologizing for that statement.

Mr. PELLETIER: I want to point out to the minister that I was not appointed to that committee until after it had been established for some time. The minister knows that.

Mr. POWER: I will check that. That is strange. I found, on checking over the record of his attendances, that he was there for the first five meetings and then quit. I will find that in a moment. I think I have it here somewhere.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Let us have the facts.

Mr. POWER: Oh, yes. There is no trouble about that. I will not sit down until I give the information to the hon. member. I took the trouble to look into my hon. friend's record, but if I am mistaken I shall be glad to be corrected. I know he appeared at the first meeting, or perhaps the second; then he was absent for one meeting, and I think he appeared for five consecutive meetings. Here we are: "Mr. Pelletier's atttendance at meetings of the special committee on franchise and elections, 1938: April 26"—which I take to be the first one—"present; April 28, absent; May 2, 3, 6, 11, present; May 12, 13, 17, 19, 20, 24, 30, 31, June 1, 7, 9, 15, 16, absent;- June 17, present; June 21, 23, 29, absent. Twenty-three meetings; absent, seventeen meetings; present six meetings."

I wonder what my hon. friend seeks to accomplish by his motion. I have said that not only is there a piece of legislation which could be studied by the committee, namely the political expenditures bill of last year, which the committee is not precluded from studying, but there are also some suggestions with respect to improvements of the elections act which will be introduced this year. What more does he want? He says he wants to put an end to suspicions and vague rumours. I might suggest to him respectfully that one good way would be for him not to talk about them.

There is little more to say on this matter, except that I do not believe any useful purpose, namely the purpose of putting on our statute books legislation which will curb to some extent abuses that we know exist in connection with expenditures in political campaigns, will be served by an investigation such as he requires. I say also that I believe the amendment is out of order, and that you, Mr. Speaker, should so rule.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I have an opportunity of saying one or two words before the amendment is ruled upon, if it is questioned. The minister was kind enough to refer to my rage and my horror regarding campaign funds. Let me say I do not think I exhibited any rage.

Mr. POWER: I take that back.

Mr. COLDWELL: I may have exhibited some horror; but if I did, that horror found its seeds in the addresses which I heard on occasion from the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), whom I followed during the old progressive days, when there was no one more caustic than he regarding the collection of campaign funds.

Mr. STEVENS: Chickens come home to roost.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I refer to the advertised appeal by the first vice-president of our organization in British Columbia? We make those appeals publicly, through the press, and at every one of our meetings.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite right, too.

Mr. COLDWELL: And over the radio.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. COLDWELL: That is the way we have of raising funds. I have never noticed the minister's own party making appeals of that description.

Mr. DUNNING: We do it all the time.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then why complain because we make them?

Mr. HOWARD: We are not complaining.

Mr. COLDWELL: I understood that the minister sought to imply there was something sinister in the suggestion in the advertisement that contributions would be regarded as private and confidential. We do receive contributions from people who, if their employers knew they were contributing to our campaign fund, would lose the jobs they now hold. We know that to be so.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Oh, no.

Mr. COLDWELL: It has happened. Moreover, I daresay they might be penalized in other ways. Having been treasurer of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation before the last general election, I am proud to be able to tell the house that we are quite willing to have our campaign funds thoroughly investigated, because although we won 400,000 votes, the only amount which was at my disposal as the national treasurer of the campaign fund was less than $2,000. It was less than $2,000 for the entire national campaign. We had hoped that we might put our leader on the air for at least one national broadcast, but were unable to do so. Consequently, when the inference is thrown at us that there is something sinister when we suggest that the relatively small contributions we received from our supporters ought to be kept private and confidential, I would tell the minister that really he is stretching the point.

Mr. POWER: It is not sinister; it is only according to your principles.

Mr. COLDWELL: The word used was "surreptitious," and that word has a sinister meaning.

Mr. POWER: No. You condemned it yourself, and that is why I brought the matter to your attention—and for no other reason.

Mr. COLDWELL: I would assure you, since our campaign funds and our method of collecting them has been brought before the house this afternoon, that at least we have never received hundreds of thousands of dollars from a power corporation.

Mr. DUNNING: How do we know? How does anybody know that?

Mr. COLDWELL: As a matter of fact, I would ask the minister, who knows me very well, to accept my word for it.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course I shall. But my hon. friend is not his whole party, any more than I am my whole party. And when one is willing to accept private contributions, that is where the danger arises.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was treasurer before the last campaign, and we are quite willing to have an investigation. An investigation was held into some Liberal party funds, and the fact I have just mentioned was fully established at that time.

May I say I believe the suggestion made in the amendment is of interest to every hon. member, and to all parties. As the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) indicated, from time to time newspaper articles appear and references are made in public speeches which tend to undermine confidence in the election of members to the House of Commons, and in the virtue of parliament. Consequently I believe the amendment is in the right direction. I therefore rise to do two things, first to set the minister right, if he thinks there was anything surreptitious—

Mr. POWER: "Surreptitious" only means hidden—go to your dictionary.

Mr. COLDWELL: But certain words, by usage, acquire a particular connotation, and the minister knows that as well as I do.

As I said before, we are quite willing to have our funds fully investigated, if the other side is willing. I want to say only this, that we are supporting the principle of the amendment because we believe it is in the best interests of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: With reference to the point of order raised by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power), I am of opinion that the amendment of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) is not in order, because the so-called amendment is not in fact an amendment at all. It is a new motion the hon. member is endeavouring to place before the house, one of which he has not given the house notice and concerning which hon. members have had no time to form opinions.

In order to support my decision I would refer the house to two similar decisions rendered on February 28, 1929, one by the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, the then Speaker of the House, and the other one by the then

Deputy Speaker, Mr. J. F. Johnston, then representing the constituency of Long Lake. Those decisions are to be found in volume 66 of the Journals of the House at pages 109, 110 and 111. I find further support in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, page 127, citation 397, where it is stated:

> An amendment must not raise any question which by the rules of the house, can only be raised by a distinct motion after notice.

Therefore the amendment is out of order, and I declare it so.

Mr. PELLETIER: Speaking to a point of order—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have rendered my decision. The hon. member may appeal, if he wishes.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak briefly to the resolution. The minister who introduced it, and some other hon. members who have spoken, have referred to the variation in the density of population as between constituencies. It seems to me in a country such as ours it is difficult to avoid that condition, and I doubt if there is any method whereby equality could be brought about.

At the same time some of the disparities shown are so great that they would appear to be unfair to one or other of the parties. However, one is confronted with the fact that some sections of our country, huge in area but sparse in population, must, in the interests of fair representation, have their representatives in parliament. I am not attempting to defend a system in which that condition exists, but I do believe that until those areas are more densely populated than they are at the present time, some of those inequalities must be accepted.

I do not believe that I would disagree with most of the minister's observations with respect to the general conduct of elections. It is my belief that conditions throughout the country are improving. I shall not go into detail in this connection, but I might point out by way of example that the son of a man who ran in one of the Quebec constituencies for election to the first parliament after confederation, and who had contested elections before confederation, told me that in those days the regular thing was to have the hogshead of whisky out in the back-yard, and to make it understood that the people who came round on certain days were free to use it, and that they expected it to be there. Such was the custom of that day, and I assume all candidates in certain sections of the country followed it. To-day that is largely done away with, although there are times in certain elections when whisky is not in the hogsheads, but is passed round. In my own constituency I have never seen, on my side at any rate, anything in the way of the passing round of whisky. I think there is a good deal of exaggeration in the minds of many people throughout the country with respect to the powerful effects of the buying of the electorate.

I remember a very good story which actually happened in my constituency. One of the members who preceded me—and a fine fellow he was, in his own way—at election times depended altogether upon the spending of money. He would go to the extent of mortgaging his house, and in every way putting up the last dollar he could raise. He carried on the election campaign in that way, and he did endeavour to buy votes when he could. On one occasion a friend of mine told me of a certain incident. He said that this old member—a good friend of mine, incidentally—asked him how such and such a village was going to vote. The reply was, "Well, there are about ninety votes there, and I fear they are all very doubtful." "How much money will it take to get them right?" The reply was, "About $5 each." The representative went out and bought every vote. But when the votes were counted they got only one of them.

I do not believe that there is any more use in attempting to buy votes to-day than there was in those days. I believe there is much exaggeration with regard to the matter. Certainly in my constituency, which the gentleman in question had represented in past years, I had no money to throw round. I paid what I thought were legitimate expenses, and carried on election campaigns as honestly as I could, during all the years I represented the constituency of Fort William—and I believe the situation is the same to-day. I have no doubt the hon. member who now represents that constituency is just as honest as I am. I found the seat could be won in a good and honest manner, and with no dishonest expenditures of money whatsoever.

Mr. DUNNING: But it costs too much just the same.

Mr. MANION: It does, I entirely agree, and I also entirely agree that we should do all we can to do away with that extra cost. I agree also with the minister when he says that money is needed to run elections. He has given some evidence regarding our friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. We have all heard that saying—I believe it was Sir John A. Macdonald's—that elections are not won by prayer.

Mr. BRADETTE: It was Tarte.

Mr. MANION: Well, they were both pretty good judges. In that book which my hon. friends opposite are so fond of quoting I discussed the whole question. My friend has missed a chance to look it up. I pointed out, and I point out again now, that there should be more publicity about campaign funds. There is nothing shameful about campaign funds, so long as they are honestly acquired.

Mr. STIRLING: And honestly used.

Mr. MANION: If people put up money to help the party of their choice, because they believe in that party, and no strings are tied to that money, what is wrong? There is no more wrong in a man putting up $5,000 for the Liberal party or for our party than in someone putting up $5 for my friends to the left. The man who puts up the $5 may be hoping that his friends will get in so that he will get a job. The man who puts up $5,000 or $50,000 or $100,000 is just as honest as the man who puts up a small amount; he believes in the principles of the party he is supporting.

Mr. HEAPS: Suppose he gives to two parties.

Mr. MANION: Well, he may have some reason for doing so, and it is his money. Suppose he gives to the four parties, if you like. He knows that elections cost money. If he chooses to contribute to both Liberal and Conservative parties, and asks that no pledges be given or strings attached to that donation, there is nothing wrong with it that I can see, and I imagine I am just as honest as my hon. friends to my left, with all due respect to them. I believe we should bring this matter out into the open.

I hesitated about saying anything on this matter, because I think the minister dealt with the question very well, and the Speaker has now ruled the amendment out of order. But the other day I proposed to the Prime Minister that he bring the editor of the Ottawa Citizen before the bar of the house and make him prove some of his charges. I have here some of the charges he made, and I am going to read them, without comment. The hon. member who moved the amendment was trying to do what the editor of the Ottawa Citizen proposed. I have here half a dozen editorials from the Ottawa Citizen which made me see red. When I read these editorials, suggesting that both the old parties are a lot of crooks instead of decent citizens, it made me angry. Having been associated with political affairs in this house for twenty years, I say that members of parliament are just as honest as editors of newspapers or any other class, and I resent the suggestion that we in this house, whether Liberals or Conservatives or my hon. friends to my left, are a lot of crooks. I recall well an example of this irresponsible chatter; I was sitting in a smoking car—have I told this here before?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. MANION: Well, I heard a man criticizing both the old parties as a lot of crooks and I asked him on what authority he based his statement. He replied he did not base it on anything; he had just heard other people saying it, and he thought it the right thing to say. The irresponsible criticism of many people is of just the same type.

This is an example of what I object to. It is from the Ottawa Citizen of February 6:

> National government is the next objective of amalgamated authority in Canada: it will include the economy of subscribing to the campaign funds of only one party.

That is not particularly bad. Here is another, of February 2:

> It is the same old order, with no difference between parties excepting in the distribution of political patronage. Both parties are controlled by the same invisible government.

I say this party is not controlled by any invisible government or any individual, group or interest big or little. The government can answer for themselves, but I say that this party to-day is not controlled by anyone. We have campaign funds—I do not say we have much; I wish we had more. Obviously, we cannot have an organizer going round this country without someone paying him, and I cannot afford to pay him from my own purse. Our friends have contributed small amounts to carry on our organization, and I have nothing to be ashamed of. Not a dollar had a string on it in any shape, manner or form. The idea that there is anything wrong about doing that is ridiculous.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I should like to meet the men who give money away without any strings on it.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member apparently is of the type who does not think anyone can be honest.

This is another of these quotations from the Citizen; it is dated February 21:

> The Conservative party will probably have to be satisfied with less than 40 per cent of the usual contributions as they are said to be distributed by the financial investors in the old game of party politics—

Mr. DUNNING: "As they are said to be."

Mr. MANION: Exactly, that is the type of stuff.

In any case, there are signs that the Conservatives are becoming resigned to the prospect of being allowed a few cabinet seats in a national government as it is being demanded in the places where both parties collect the money to pay election expenses.

These are more of these ugly charges without any facts to substantiate them.

Another of January 28:

The power of the party machine to silence members—

This, I think, is a slander on every hon. member, including my hon. friends to my left.

The power of the party machine to silence members goes far beyond this influence of the central campaign fund. Members on the government side become involved in patronage deals. Members on the opposition side look forward to the day when they will again enjoy the spoils.

Another one, of which I have not the date, states:

The whole democratic structure is threatened from within as well as from without. An independent parliament, free from dependence upon predatory campaign fund sources. . . .

I think this parliament is independent; I do not admit that this parliament is tied up to any campaign fund sources. Another statement is:

The party machines are largely financed by secret relations with contractors, promoters and privileged interests. Members become involved through indebtedness when election expenses are to be paid or later in the competition to display party loyalty before the next election—

The last I will quote is from the Ottawa Citizen of January 27:

Before the end of this session it will probably have been demonstrated to the paymasters of both parties—

I object to the statement that I have a paymaster. I repeat that I am under obligation to no individual, class, group, interest or anything else, neither is this party, and I object to the Ottawa Citizen making a statement like that. I resent such statements because they are slanders on all hon. members; as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) I think said, it is doing damage to and undermining democracy. I agree with that, and that is why I resent such statements. When I suggested that the editor of the Citizen be brought to the bar of the house, how did he defend himself? He demanded a judicial investigation. In other words, he accuses one of being a thief; the accused challenges him to give some proof, and the accuser says, "Oh, we will get a judge to investigate your whole life."

Mr. DUNNING: No, he puts it up to you to prove you are not guilty.

Mr. MANION: Exactly, not the British system of assuming innocence until guilt is proved, but "you are guilty" first, and then he will send out a fishing expedition to see if he cannot find something against you. That is an irresponsible and improper method, and my hon. friends who move and support this amendment take the same attitude. So far as I am concerned I agree with the minister; I do not consider that this fishing expedition would get anywhere. Men who contribute to the campaign funds of both parties do so legitimately. I assume many who contribute may not want the fact known. Suppose a man is a manufacturer; he believes rather in the principles of the Liberal party, who claim they are low tariff people, although they do not always live up to it, but he is more in sympathy with the principles of the Liberal party than with ours. He may wish to contribute to the Liberal party funds, quite legitimately; he likes them and wishes to support them. But he may say, "If it is known that I have contributed to this fund and another party gets in, that other party might do something in the way of tariff changes which would hurt me." After all, he has a legitimate right to make his contribution in privacy, so I do not consider that an investigation would get anywhere at all.

It is almost six o'clock and I wish, before we take recess, to finish what I have to say. Many people contribute to party funds honestly. They believe in certain principles, and they wish to support the party that professes those principles. There are different kinds of dishonesty. Let me give an illustration of what I would call a worse piece of dishonesty than anything in regard to campaign funds. I was in Alberta not so long ago, travelling by automobile, and during the trip I heard over the radio a very prominent, if not the most prominent, social crediter in the province. He announced to his group—and apparently there was a large audience—that he was going to have a professor give expression that afternoon to the principles for which the capitalist system stood. That was done. The man who was master of ceremonies would make a clever and witty interjection every once in a while, more or less destroying the argument of the supposed professor of political economy who was setting out the principles of the capitalist system. Then, when the "professor" had finished, this other gentleman demolished the whole argument in a few well-chosen sentences. Of course it was a very bad argument, poorly put together, anyway; because the same man who made the interjections, the same man who demolished the argument, was the man who wrote both sides of it. I found later that the supposed professor of political economy was the janitor of one of the provincial public buildings. Is that proper? Is that honest politics? I was driving with a prominent citizen of Calgary; I hung my head and said, "I am ashamed to think that any man in public life could descend to that type of campaign. No leader of either of the old parties would do that sort of thing." I say that type of campaign was much more discreditable than anything that has been done by either of the old parties.

I do not wish to argue against the Social Credit people. They have a perfect right to whatever attitude they choose to adopt, but at the same time I think we should all admit that we are honest. I do not think honesty is confined to any individual or any party in this house. In regard to my friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, during the election in London the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation candidate who opposed me made an appeal for funds, saying that if he were not helped financially he would not run. He put on a more elaborate and, so far as I know, more expensive campaign than I did; certainly he was on the radio a great deal more than I was. I have nothing to say against that; I find no fault with it at all, but let us agree that if you have not enough money yourself, you cannot carry on elections unless someone helps to pay the expenses. Whether a man contributes $5,000 or $5 to campaign funds, if there are no strings attached to it; if there is no crookedness in it; if the contribution is not made for the purpose of bringing about some dishonest act on the part of a party in power, then I say it is a perfectly legitimate contribution.

In closing, let me say that we want to cooperate with the minister, as I think all members of this parliament should cooperate, to lessen the cost of elections. They are far too expensive. It is unfair to the candidates of all parties. I think we should do everything we can to clean up election irregularities of all kinds in order that real public opinion may prevail and a fair deal given to all classes. In that way, by promoting public welfare, we may have a real democracy. So far as I am concerned, and speaking for my party, we will do everything we can in this committee, if it is appointed, to help clean up for the future. We are not worrying about the past. I do not believe in these fishing expeditions, and anyway, frankly I do not believe in charges of scandal. I never have believed in one party charging the other with doing something scandalous. Very seldom is anything proved of a scandalous nature. In the present unsettled condition of the world, unless a man is so certain of his facts that nothing can refute his charge I believe this sort of thing does nothing but undermine democracy, undermine our whole electoral system, undermine the freedom in which we all believe. I agree in large measure with what was said by the minister in introducing this resolution, and we will do all we can to help him clean up the elections of the future.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) to a problem which has arisen and which, I hope, will be taken into consideration by this special committee. I suggest to the minister that it would be advisable to broaden the terms of reference to the committee in order to enable consideration of a matter of vital consequence to many electors in British Columbia. In order to clarify the discussion I propose to move an amendment in terms which I hope he will accept. Briefly, I desire to direct his attention to a situation existing under the present provisions of the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, as it affects lumbermen, fishermen, miners and seamen. Under the act which was in effect during the federal general election of 1935, provision was made for what was called absentee voting, and special classifications were indicated therein for fishermen, including all those persons engaged in the fishing industry; lumbermen, including cruisers, loggers and so on; miners, including prospectors as well as workers in or about mines; and sailors, including all those engaged or employed on board ships or vessels. These persons were entitled to vote under special provisions contained in sections 99, 100, 101, 102 and so on, of the act. However, these provisions were abolished under the new act introduced at the last session. The chairman of the committee which sat last year, the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell), explained the situation to the house, as reported on page 4246 of Hansard of June 24, 1938. At that time he said:

The committee found that the expense of absentee voting did not warrant our including it in this bill.

He goes on to say:

And it was by reason of the expense which was incurred in connection with absentee voting the committee decided that for the sake of a vote of that size we would not be warranted in inserting a clause which would deal with absentee voting.

He then enumerated other reasons why it was considered inadvisable to provide for absentee voting. I commend the minister when he endeavours to introduce amendments to the act to prevent any person from voting twice, but I had hoped that the new sections would not prevent certain classes of voters from voting at all. After a study of the act I have found that the workers engaged in the industries I have mentioned, that is lumbering, fishing, mining and those at sea, will not have an opportunity to exercise their franchise. We have done what it is possible to do in this country to encourage people to exercise their franchise, and it seems to me inadvisable that any obstacles should be placed in their way at this time.

I have made a study of the sections of the act in consultation with representatives of the organized workers in these various industries, and they confirm the conclusion which I stated last session, namely, that many of these workers will not have an opportunity of exercising their franchise. I hope that the committee will take into consideration ways and means of enabling those workers who must migrate from place to place in the pursuit of their vocations to exercise their voting rights on polling day. The act of 1938 not only abolished the provisions for absentee voting, but restricted to some degree the residential qualifications. Section 14, subsection 1, reads:

Save as hereinafter provided every person, man or woman, shall be qualified to vote and be entitled to be registered as an elector on the list of electors for the polling division in which he or she ordinarily resides—

The word "ordinarily" was introduced last session.

—at the time of the preparation and revision of the list of electors therefor.

It then goes on to give other qualifications. "Ordinary residence" is defined in section 16, subsection 2, as follows:

The place of ordinary residence of a person is, generally, that place which has always been, or which he has adopted as, the place of his habitation or home, whereto, when away therefrom, he intends to return. Specifically, when a person usually sleeps in one place and has his meals or is employed in another place, the place of his ordinary residence is where the person sleeps.

At the request of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) the bill was amended in some respects, and section 46 was amended by the deletion of the word "ordinarily" to make it possible for an elector within the electoral district in which he resides to present himself only at a rural poll to vote, provided he is vouched for by an elector already on the list in the poll. I submit that under the conditions which prevail in these industries in British Columbia a large number of men are actually disfranchised. When one considers the conditions of employment imposed on loggers, for instance, one must realize that the great majority of the camps at which these men work are outside the electoral districts in which they ordinarily have their residence. I confirmed this fact by inquiries since last session. The principal operations are on Vancouver island at Cowichan lake, Campbell river, and on the Queen Charlotte islands, these points being distant from the cities and towns where these men are recruited for these operations. Under the conditions prevailing in the industry they are unable to secure time off in order to vote, and they are unable to defray the expenses of returning to the polling division or the electoral district in which they have their ordinary residences.

The plight of the fishermen is still more serious. If polling day occurs when they are at the fishing grounds they are likely to find themselves in the predicament of being unable to return to their places of ordinary residence, which are usually in the vicinity of Vancouver. It might be possible to permit them to vote at the port from which they obtain their supplies when they are operating at the fishing grounds. There are many seamen employed on tugs and barges engaged in the coastwise trade who might be able to vote at a port of call but who certainly could not return to the polling division or the electoral district in which they are ordinarily resident.

The act of 1938 made provision for other classes of electors who are permitted to cast their votes outside the electoral district in which their names may have been placed on the list at the time of the issuance of the election writ. I refer to section 16, subsection 6, wherein provision is made for ministers, priests or ecclesiastics of any religious faith or denomination, for teachers and students. I submit that an attempt should be made to extend a similar privilege to the thousands of workers in the lumbering and fishing industries and to those engaged at sea. I do not wish to detain the house, but I do hope that my amendment will be acceptable to the minister. I am suggesting at this stage merely that the terms of reference to the committee should be broadened in order that the committee may take into consideration ways and means of dealing with this problem. I therefore move:

That the motion be amended by adding thereto the following clause:

(c) Methods whereby lumbermen, fishermen, seamen, and miners in the province of British Columbia may be enabled to exercise their franchise under the Dominion Elections Act, 1938.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I must support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). There is no district in British Columbia outside my own where the necessities for some such plan are greater, and I do not except the district represented by the hon. member who has moved this amendment. Some of his electors may live in North Vancouver or Vancouver and go out to work in his riding, but if they live in Vancouver or North Vancouver and go out to work in my district, they are wholly disfranchised under the conditions which he has mentioned. As he said, the act which was passed a year or so ago made provision for voting in a polling station other than the one in which an elector was registered, but this was confined to the electoral district in which the man resided. That takes care of a number of cases in my district, but only to a limited extent.

There is no doubt that the present law does disfranchise a considerable number of the classes to which the hon. member has referred. This has been the case as far back as my memory goes, with the single exception of the election of 1935 when, as the hon. member has stated, there was inaugurated a system of what was called absentee voting, drafted in a large measure from the British Columbia system which works adequately in the smaller area of a province. But there were features about that system which did not make it so attractive as the hon. member suggests, and for this reason: It was founded on a system known as the fixed list, and the list was changed only once a year. In British Columbia we used to change the provincial list once every month; but in the dominion act passed here—and members will correct me if I am wrong—provision was made for a revision only once a year, with the result that in that province, where we have a good deal of a floating population, many more people were disfranchised than there would be under the system now used. If they were there but if they did not get registered at these annual revisions, they were simply out of luck. I think the working men lost more votes under that method than under the system now proposed.

The hon. member for Vancouver North has pointed out that the act passed two years ago did make provision for school teachers and ministers of the gospel being allowed to vote if they moved into new territory, but it was upon the condition, which had to be definitely established, that they were going to become or had become permanent residents of the new district. A minister of the gospel, for example, had to prove that he was the ordained or accepted minister of his church, and a school teacher had to produce a certificate from the school board that he or she was legally and properly employed under contract for a certain period of time. The object of that was to do away with the danger, which must immediately suggest itself to the mind of anyone who considers these matters, that if you make it too easy for people to vote in a new district it is quite possible for a wealthy man or a wealthy party to bring in a couple of hundred men, say from a city district adjoining, keep them there for ten days—less than that would suffice—have them vote as temporary residents, and then return them. That is an even greater evil than the one my hon. friend is trying to avoid.

While he did not put it forward as his own opinion he referred to the argument of the high cost in the last election against having any more absentee voting. But I do not know whether the high cost was ever as definitely ascertained as it might have been, compared, for instance, with the cost of men voting at an advance poll. The cost there is quite comparable with that of an absentee vote.

Then he said that a great number of men who sought to vote were not allowed to vote. That happened in my district to the extent of several hundred people. They were thrown out against my protest simply because the deputy returning officers had not been thoroughly informed, or were incompetent, and they did not draw up the ballots in the way the act prescribed. They were given a certain number of blank ballots, and the act prescribed that if a man in the district of Comox-Alberni came to a deputy returning officer and said he wanted to vote in southeast Kootenay, the deputy returning officer must take a blank ballot, make a facsimile of the one used in southeast Kootenay, and put down the name of every candidate, his occupation, residence and so forth. But in a great many instances the deputy returning officer was either ignorant or did not bother to do that. The very utmost he would often put down would be Jones, Brown and Smith, as the names of the candidates; he would not bother about their occupations at all, and many good votes—good in my opinion because the men were going to vote for me—were thrown out for that reason.

I know one case where the deputy returning officer, evidently in a spirit of good fellowship, apparently said to a man, "Whom do you want to vote for"? The man replied, "Jones"; the deputy returning officer wrote "Jones" down on the ballot and nothing else, and in that way perfectly good ballots were thrown out. That was on account of the system being new and the deputy returning officers not being sufficiently posted. Also they had to stop on a busy election day to make out a facsimile ballot. The case could have been met by furnishing the deputy returning officer with printed ballots for every riding in the province.

Even if the question of cost is considerable, there are other methods by which the proposal of my hon. friend, which I heartily endorse, could be carried out. His amendment, as I understand it, asks only that a method be considered whereby loggers, lumbermen, fishermen and so forth may be able to exercise their franchise.

In Australia, speaking from memory, I believe they have several systems of dealing with absentee voters. One of them is the post-card system. Nothing more stringent is required than for the voter to sign a post-card in the presence of the returning officer, and then under suitable restrictions and precautions it is mailed back to the place whence the voter came.

There is another method whereby they can vote absentees in person, something like that mentioned by my hon. friend. But the post-card method seems to work there without any opportunity of fraud and without any excessive cost, and I would hope that some system like that might be adopted. Surely we owe it to everyone that they should be allowed to exercise their franchise. And the fact that a voter's occupation takes him away at certain seasons of the year for two, three, six or eight months should not be allowed to stand in the way of his voting.

While I am speaking I might say a few words on the general proposals outlined by the hon. member who introduced this resolution. Some member speaking this afternoon said that the subject matter as introduced last year was unpopular. But I submit it was not the subject matter that was unpopular; it was the bill that was universally unpopular. I regretted to hear the minister—perhaps I did not hear him aright—speaking in a tone of laudation, I thought, of that misbegotten thing which was introduced last year.

Mr. POWER: What was that?

Mr. NEILL: The bill, the so-called purity bill. I thought he spoke this afternoon with some note of approval of it.

Mr. POWER Naturally.

Mr. NEILL: It must have been owing to the fact that he is the putative father. There is an axiom in law in cases of disputed succession, that he is the father whom the marriage points out. I might paraphrase that by saying that he is the father who introduced the bill. The minister was associated with it in that regard, and in that regard only, in a very step-fatherly way. We all know that his ability and, above all, his sense of humour, would have entirely prevented him from having drafted of his own initiative such an abortion as the thing which was presented last year.

Mr. POWER: Do not insult my child by saying that.

Mr. NEILL: The bill was worse than the word I applied to it. I think it was a burlesque. Having read it a year ago, I have not now a clear recollection of all its provisions, but it certainly was a ridiculous and an unworkable thing. I wonder sometimes if it was not intended to be unworkable. One of the matters of interest to the group members was this thing called a corporation sole and two other positions at the same time, a sort of trinity proposition, and provision was made that the trinity had to be a lawyer or an accountant. It might well be that in ridings represented by social crediters there was no lawyer or accountant of their political party; they would be compelled to employ and be under the domination of this lawyer or accountant, who might be entirely opposed to their views, and he could make it very interesting and disconcerting in the conduct of the election. His powers are almost unbounded.

Something was said about limiting the costs to so much per head. Well, I am sorry, but if they put the costs at any reasonable figure I am afraid it will mean that I shall be unable to take part in an election. Ten cents a head, I assume, would be a reasonable cost.

and that would allow me a thousand dollars to spend on an election which ordinarily costs me between four and five thousand dollars. They say, "Oh, well, but it is done in Great Britain." But Britain is an established, settled country where a polling station, if it has eighty-five people to-day, will have eighty-six or eighty-four five or ten years from now. They know what it will cost. In our polling divisions we may have three hundred to-day and perhaps three at the next election, or perhaps four or five hundred. The conditions are so different that they cannot be compared, and I do not think any hon. member wants to be put in this position. You have struggled through the election with the difficulties of this corporation sole and these other capacities as well; you think you have won through at last, have kept within the margin you were told to keep in, that is that you must not spend more than ten cents a head, and have won the election.

I speak now not for myself, because it does not apply to me as I do not get party funds. But take the case of the man drawing party funds. He has been elected, or so he thinks; he has kept within the costs as far as he can honestly ascertain them; and six weeks after the election he gets a notice from Ottawa, "sorry, you have spent $4.81 more than you should have done, and you are unseated." He writes back and says, "No, I didn't; I kept well within the margin." "Oh, yes, but your proportion of the money spent by the headquarters of your party, your share, estimated to be so much, comes to so much, and therefore that puts you over the line." We do not want a machinery which will put members of parliament, no matter whether they are ourselves or some other candidate, in that position.

I agree heartily with what the minister said, that he thought the present bill, by merely being extended and expanded in certain regards, could do a great deal of what is aimed at in these resolutions. I heartily agree with him there. Take the case of the expenditures of sums of money. Under our present act the agent has to put in a return under oath of the amount of money he has received, how he has expended it and—note this—from whom he received it. Could one have anything more definite than that? But the way he gets out from under it under the present circumstances is this. He says, "I got $4,000 from Bill Jones and others." Bill Jones may have contributed $200 and the party fund or some corporation may have contributed the balance. That could be very easily adjusted by compelling the agent to state in the case of every sum bigger than say $50, from whom he got it, and that would be done by a trivial change in the act which we have now.

We are told, and it is a sort of bait held out to us, that one of the results of this may be to reduce the costs of the candidates. Well, I cannot see it. I am afraid it is going to increase the cost to us, because we are going to be at the beck and call of the corporation sole fellow; in the middle of the election he may come forward and say, "You cannot hire that hall because you are exceeding your quota up to date," or something of that kind, and in this trinity of capacities he is likely to cost you a great deal of money. Above all that, there is the harassing anxiety when you are running an election—and it is an anxious enough time—that you will never know until it is all over, perhaps six weeks or perhaps six months afterwards, whether you have not been unseated through some trivial over-expenditure which you were perfectly incompetent or unable to stop at the time.

I know there are restrictions of this kind in Britain, but conditions there are totally different from what they are here, especially in the west where conditions change every month and every year. Now I would desire to see every one of the suggestions the minister has in his resolution put forward and carried to a conclusion. Certainly we want everything that is put there. But for the love of heaven and for the love of wretched candidates who will have to carry on, cut out last year's bill, or put it in the fire, or put it to some more ignoble purpose.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like to say one or two words in seconding the amendment to the resolution moved by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). Before I do that I wish to congratulate the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) upon the subject-matter of the resolution which we discussed before recess. I am in the fullest accord with the two sections of that resolution, and I hope that not only will the committee be able to find ways and means of making a more satisfactory and possibly more just redistribution of seats than we have had hitherto, but that it will also find ways and means of keeping election expenses within reasonable bounds. I do not share the fears of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) that at some time I may over-spend, that I may spend more in my election than is allowed by the committee, because I am sure that I shall never have that much money to spend. Poverty has its advantages; I am free from that fear.

I wish it to be noted that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver North has reference to British Columbia only. The reason that absentee voting is so important to British Columbia is first, the economy of the country, which takes a great many of the voters away from their homes on election day; and second, because we have had for many, many years absentee voting in the provincial elections. I am not sure whether the first act was passed in 1920 or 1924, but I think it was the former year. I believe all federal members from British Columbia are agreed upon the value and the desirability of absentee voting. I never heard one of them oppose it. I remember that on one occasion shortly after the system had been put into effect there was some opposition because of irregularities which had developed, but that was overcome, and there has been no opposition since. I hope, therefore, hon. members will keep in mind that we are asking that this amendment apply only in British Columbia. Of course if hon. members from other provinces wish the same method to apply in their provinces, that is satisfactory to us.

I should like to read two sections from the revised statutes of British Columbia, chapter 84, having to do with provincial elections. Section 108 provides for absentee voting, and it will be observed, when I read the section, that in British Columbia absentee voting applies not only to persons outside their own electoral districts on election day but to persons who may be in their own electoral districts but not in the particular polling division in which they are registered. Section 108, subsection 1 of the provincial act reads:

> For the purpose of exercising his franchise, any voter whose name is on the list of voters for one polling division of an electoral district, and who is absent from that polling division on the day on which the poll is held, may obtain an absent voter's ballot-paper in any other polling division of the same electoral district and may record his vote in the manner provided in this section.

That section covers all of British Columbia, with the exception of the electoral districts in the cities of Vancouver, Victoria and New Westminster.

Section 109 is still wider than section 108. Subsection 1 of section 109 provides:

> For the purpose of exercising his franchise at any general election, any voter whose name is on the list of voters for one electoral district, and who is absent from that district on the day on which a poll is held therein, may obtain an absent voter's ballot-paper for that district in any polling division of any other electoral district in which a poll is being held, and may record his vote in the manner provided in this section.

As I said before, in British Columbia we have had this method of voting for the past twenty years. The people have become accustomed to it. Loggers and others who, on election day, are away from their homes, or from the places where their names appear on the voters' lists, feel that they have something to do with the election of the government when they are allowed to exercise their franchise.

It seems to me that democracy means the extending to every class within the country the privilege of taking part in the government of the country. To the extent that we can do that, and to the extent that all classes can take part in the government of the country, just to that extent do we have democracy. And to the extent that any class, or section of any class, is restricted from taking part in the government of the country, or in electing its representatives, to that extent is our democracy limited.

A great deal of argument has been made about the cost. In my opinion in the election of 1935 the high cost was on account of the inexperience of the election workers. I am sure that with better organization and the freer use of the absentee method of voting the cost would be much less. In the amendment we are asking to have this method applied to four different occupations, namely, lumbermen, fishermen, seamen and miners. I would point out to the house that in the provincial elections in British Columbia absentee voting is not restricted to any particular occupations. As I have indicated in the two sections I have read, any person who is not in his polling division or electoral district on election day may vote by absentee ballot. I would ask the government to give the most favourable consideration to the amendment to enlarge the scope of the reference to the committee, before deciding to turn the amendment down.

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), I can only say that last year in committee considerable time was spent in discussing the subject of absentee voting. If the amendment is in order, which I doubt very much, my first objection to it would be that it applies only to British Columbia. If the act is going to be amended to provide for absentee voting, then it would appear to me that there should be general application so that it would apply to every province. The maritime provinces must be in exactly the same position as British Columbia, and the same observation would apply to those constituencies facing on the great lakes. The sailors on those lakes will be absent from home, just in the same way as the seamen, lumbermen and fishermen of British Columbia may be absent.

The hon. member has referred to my remarks of last year as reported at page 4246 of Hansard. On that occasion I said:

> The committee found that the expense of absentee voting did not warrant our including it in this bill. For instance, in the election of 1935 there were 5,334 votes polled under the absentee voting provision. We found that 1,533 of them were rejected. The cost of absentee voting was approximately $250,000, or $65 plus, per vote. And it was by reason of the expense which was incurred in connection with absentee voting the committee decided that for the sake of a vote of that size we would not be warranted in inserting a clause which would deal with absentee voting.

If expense is no object, then I assume we can provide for every person in Canada, no matter where he or she may be, exercising his or her franchise on election day. Certainly machinery can be set up in some way whereby every man would have an opportunity to vote, either before or after the election, and whether or not he was in his own constituency or polling subdivision.

However, I believe the committee had before them all the representations which have been made this evening, and they gave every consideration to the matter. Their conclusion was that they were not justified in inserting the absentee provisions which were in the 1934 act.

Mr. MacNEIL: Was any other method of dealing with the problem considered by the committee?

Mr. BOTHWELL: Various methods were discussed. As a matter of fact, representations were made to the committee by an organization of sailors on the great lakes. Representations were made with respect to the exercising of their franchise, and I believe a resolution of two or three pages was presented in which suggestions were made which would have had the effect of permitting them to vote. However, so far as I am concerned as a member of the committee—and I assume other members will have the same view—I am ready to reconsider the matter, if it is deemed advisable. But I do not see how the same committee can reach a conclusion different from the one they arrived at last year. If the amendment is in order I would consider discussing the matter again—although I see the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) shaking his head. I assume he is of the same opinion I am, namely that it will not get any further than it did last year.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): I had no intention of speaking on this motion, but in view of certain statements that have been made during the debate I should like to make a few brief remarks. It has been suggested that the social credit proposals were used as a bribe during the last provincial election in Alberta. Hon. members making those charges show complete ignorance of the growth of the social credit movement in that province. That movement started at least three years before the election. It was started as an economic movement, with no intention at that time of political action. An attempt was made to persuade the United Farmers of Alberta government to introduce legislation implementing the social credit proposals, and it was not until that government had definitely refused to take any action in that regard that finally the people of Alberta from one end to the other demanded of Mr. Aberhart that he organize politically. In view of that it cannot possibly be maintained that social credit was used as a bribe, because the people cannot very well bribe themselves, and it was as a result of the demands of the people that the action was taken.

I will, however, agree that in the last election social credit was used as a bribe, not by the Social Credit party but by the leader of the Liberal party in Alberta.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. QUELCH: I hear one hon. gentleman laugh. I quote this statement from the Edmonton Journal of August 17, 1935:

> Many Liberal candidates and speakers are denouncing social credit with great vigour. But no matter how completely one may agree with what they have to say on the subject, it is impossible to forget the stand that their leader has taken and the pledge that was given in the party's platform. A statement from Mr. Howson was published in the editorial column of the Medicine Hat News on January 14 last, which read:
>
> "The Liberal party has maintained an open mind and has and will be at all times fully prepared to treat the social credit idea sympathetically. . . . I sincerely hope that no Liberal member or candidate and no Liberal may take the position of fighting the social credit movement."

In an address at Bentley, three and a half months later, Mr. Howson had this to say:

> You may be surprised to learn that the Liberal party was in the field on behalf of social credit before the Alberta movement started. . . . Mr. Aberhart has promised his followers no more than the Liberal party has. As a matter of fact he has promised them less.

So when people suggest that social credit was used as a bribe in Alberta, remember that it was by the leader of the Liberal party.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope the hon. member is making it clear that he is speaking of the provincial leader.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes, I mentioned the name, Mr. Howson.

Some people may say that the Social Credit party in Alberta has not succeeded in carrying out its promises in full. But if the leader of the Liberal party—and I am now talking of the federal leader—had kept his promises, then Alberta would have had a far better chance to fulfil its program than it has had. Of course I am referring to the promise made in Saskatoon in the 1935 campaign, reported as follows:

> In Alberta at the present moment the government was launched on the experiment of social credit. "I hope with all my heart that they will be successful," said Mr. King, assuring the audience that if he was returned as Prime Minister of Canada, Alberta would be assured of the greatest freedom in carrying out its experiment under the Liberal policy of not interfering with the rights of the provinces.

Surely no one will suggest that that promise has been fulfilled.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So long as the province kept within its own field it has had ample scope.

Mr. QUELCH: The Prime Minister may say that disallowance was out of his hands. But I refer to another matter in which the promise of this government was not kept. I refer to the action taken in the spring of 1936 when some of the provinces, including Alberta, had certain bonds maturing. They were given the option of either depending upon their own resources, which generally speaking meant default, or becoming a party to the loan council.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think the hon. member is getting far from the resolution before the house. The question of Mr. Aberhart is not before the house.

Mr. QUELCH: It was only when the Prime Minister denied that the rights of the provinces had been interfered with, that I mentioned that subject.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) took exception to a certain Professor Anonymous. Surely he is not suggesting that the premier of Alberta was trying to make the people of Alberta believe that this gentleman was in reality a professor of economics. If he was fooled by that play he was the only one who was. It was just a piece of play-acting, but apparently the acting was so good that the leader of the opposition thought it was real. It was generally understood by everyone in Alberta; the people knew those who took part in that little play; it was a little act put on week after week.

Mr. MANION: There was no hint of humour about it the day I heard it.

Mr. QUELCH: It depends on one's point of view. To the followers of the movement it was humorous; from the psychology of a hidebound Conservative of course it would be highly distasteful.

Another point referred to by the leader of the opposition was those articles in the Ottawa Citizen. Personally I cannot see anything to take exception to in those articles. It is old, old stuff which, generally speaking, has been believed in Canada for years. We all know there are campaign funds; we know that in some instances contributions have been large, and I do not think there is any change in that respect.

Mr. MANION: I did not claim that there are no campaign funds, I said there are. But the Citizen charged that both the Liberal and the Conservative party are the tools of the people who contribute to campaign funds; that is what I contradicted.

Mr. QUELCH: The leader of the opposition admits that large sums are contributed to campaign funds. I ask why? Why are they contributed? For the purpose of supporting a certain policy. Would the leader of the opposition suggest that if the old-line parties departed from their present orthodox reactionary policy, these contributions would continue to come in?

Mr. MANION: Certainly they would continue.

Mr. QUELCH: Not from certain large financial corporations, who contribute funds in order to maintain the status quo.

Mr. MANION: I do not admit that.

Mr. QUELCH: If they thought for a moment that the old parties would depart from their present program, these contributions would immediately stop.

Mr. MANION: The people who contribute believe in certain principles; if we departed from those principles they would not support us, I admit that.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes; unfortunately the people who can contribute these large sums are large financial corporations, and they are willing to contribute as long as the present reactionary policies are maintained. That is what the people object to; they object to large financial corporations being able to support a reactionary government. That I think is a fair statement. It is not a question of whether there is a string tied to any contribution; the question is that these large financial corporations are willing to donate funds to maintain the status quo. That is why I think it is a very good thing that this bill is brought in by the Minister of Pensions and National Health. It will receive our support.

Mr. POWER: I suggest that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) is out of order on two counts. The first is that the statement made in it is absolutely inaccurate. The amendment is that the motion be amended by adding the following clause—to study, I assume:

(c) methods whereby lumbermen, fishermen, seamen and miners in the province of British Columbia may be enabled to exercise their franchise under the Dominion Elections Act, 1938.

But they are able now to exercise their franchise, excepting only a certain few who happen to be away from their homes. Of all the people of Canada, those who took advantage of the absentee voters clause during the last election numbered only 5,000. Of all the people in Canada who could take advantage of the absentee voters clause, only 5,000 did so.

Mr. HEAPS: That does not make the amendment out of order.

Mr. POWER: It is out of order, because an inaccurate statement is made. The amendment says that lumbermen, fishermen, seamen and miners should be enabled to exercise their franchise. If it had said "in order that certain miners who are absent from their homes may be able to exercise their franchise," I would be able to understand it, but it makes the gratuitous statement that somebody is endeavouring to prevent lumbermen, miners, fishermen and seamen from exercising their franchise.

Apart from that, Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw your attention to the fact that this amendment raises a new issue. The resolution before us deals with redistribution and with political expenditures. What is sought to be referred to the committee here is an amendment to the elections act, which act was thoroughly discussed by the committee for three years and passed by this house last year. I do not think it is the opinion of the house that the reference should be enlarged, and in any event no proper notice was given which would permit raising the issue.

[Mr. Quelch.]

Mr. MacNEIL: I think the minister is stretching a point when he says I offered a gratuitous, inaccurate statement. In my remarks I endeavoured to outline the problem, and I would direct your honour's attention to the fact that a ruling was given previously this session, when the act to amend the Fisheries Act was under consideration, to the effect that when the general act was under review it was in order for an hon. member to bring in an amendment.

Mr. POWER: But no part of the Dominion Elections Act is under consideration at the moment.

Mr. MacNEIL: I am coming to that. In his remarks the minister stated that he might take into consideration certain amendments to the Dominion Elections Act which would strengthen its provisions in dealing with political expenditures; and in that regard he did suggest that the Dominion Elections Act would be under review again by this committee, in some respects at least.

I hope the minister does not press the point of order. I see no objection to having the committee give consideration to this vital problem. I have not suggested any particular solution; I have merely asked that the committee review the problem in the light of additional evidence now available.

Mr. HEAPS: There is only one point at issue, namely, whether a member of this house has the right to add something to a reference to a committee. I do not think it has ever been contended that a member has not the right to move an amendment to extend the terms of reference, and that is all that is being sought in this case. The minister himself has presented a resolution referring two matters to the committee; another member of the house rises and asks that the terms of reference be extended in the present instance by including fishermen, lumbermen, miners and seamen in British Columbia.

Mr. POWER: A few fishermen, lumbermen, and so on.

Mr. HEAPS: He did not say "a few."

Mr. POWER: But that is what he should have said.

Mr. HEAPS: Well, Mr. Speaker, if in the last election five thousand of these people were prevented from voting, I would not call that a few.

Mr. POWER: Five thousand all over Canada.

Mr. HEAPS: Well, five thousand is not a few. If the minister thinks the terms of reference should include the maritime provinces, I have not the least objection to having them included, in order to bring the amendment more in order according to his way of thinking; but I cannot remember any time in this house when it was held that an hon. member did not have the right to move to enlarge the terms of reference to a committee.

Mr. MacINNIS: Before you give your ruling. Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw your attention to the fact that this motion merely extends the terms of reference contained in the resolution moved this afternoon by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power), and that it concerns a matter closely related to the subject matter of the resolution itself. Surely if five thousand voters are barred from voting because of the limitations of the elections act as it now stands, that is a matter of some importance to this house. Many hon. members who are sitting here received less than five thousand votes. So I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, before ruling on this amendment, to give it most careful consideration, because it is of the greatest importance, psychologically if not in reality, to many people living in British Columbia who, because of circumstances over which they have no control, are unable to be in a place where they can cast their ballots on election day.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon. member wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. FINN: I should like to say just one word on this resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is a point of order. Does any other hon. member wish to speak to it? The amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), and seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), is that the motion be amended by adding thereto the following clause:

(c) Methods whereby lumbermen, fishermen, seamen and miners in the province of British Columbia may be enabled to exercise their franchise under the Dominion Elections Act, 1938.

The Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) rightly points out to the house that voters of these classes are already entitled to vote, under the Franchise Act. Therefore I think this amendment, as an addition to the motion before the house, would be useless. If it had been a direction to the committee to inquire into further facilities to be afforded voters of these classes, it might have been considered, but on that score I consider the amendment not in order.

Further, I have looked into the question of amendments and subamendments generally, and the rule is that no new question may be introduced in this manner. I quote from Bourinot, at page 321:

If such a practice were tolerated, all the benefits of giving due notice of a motion, and allowing the house a full opportunity of considering a question, would be practically lost. A member would then be in a position to surprise the house at any moment with a motion of importance, and the necessity of giving notice would be superseded to all intents and purposes.

This was the second point raised by the Minister of Pensions and National Health, and on these two points I consider that the amendment proposed is out of order.

Mr. MacNEIL: With all deference, Mr Speaker, because of the principle involved, I must challenge your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is only an appeal from my ruling.

Mr. MacNEIL: Then I appeal from your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER put the question as follows: During the debate on the motion to appoint a select committee to study and report on methods used to effect a redistribution of electoral districts, and methods whereby the source and disposition of sums received and expended in promoting the return of members of the House of Commons may be readily traceable, and so on; Mr. MacNeil moved, seconded by Mr. MacInnis, that the motion be amended by adding thereto the following clause:

(c) Methods whereby lumbermen, fishermen, seamen and miners in the province of British Columbia may be enabled to exercise their franchise under the Dominion Elections Act, 1938.

The amendment was ruled out of order on the ground that it raised a new question beyond the scope of the notice of motion, and a new instruction to the committee should have been moved instead.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the chair was sustained on the following division:

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, your honour's ruling a few minutes ago was based, I take it, on the objection raised by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) that the reference included, if I might put it that way, too much territory, and I noted that when your honour ruled you stated that had the motion been differently worded it might have been in order. The preamble of the resolution states that the committee is to be appointed to study and to report. I therefore move seconded by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) that the motion be amended by adding thereto the following clause:

(c) Methods whereby certain lumbermen, fishermen, seamen and miners absent from their electoral districts may be enabled to exercise their franchise in dominion elections.

I believe, your honour, that this meets the objections which were raised. The previous amendment that was presented was well discussed, and the reasons for the adoption of this amendment are those that have already been discussed earlier this evening.

Mr. POWER: I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this amendment is out of order on pretty much the same grounds, but personally I think perhaps every member of the committee would have no objection to this question going before it again this year. This is a matter that was studied for three years and met with an unfavourable reception by the committee, but rather than waste the time of the house I would suggest that the question be allowed to go to the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: The amendment is about the same as the previous one so far as being in order is concerned.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in agreement with this amendment because it does tend to enlarge the democratic privilege of the voters, and I should be glad if the minister would accept this amendment and allow the question to be considered by the committee.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, while I voted to support your ruling because, on the general principle of parliamentary procedure, I think a Speaker's ruling should be upheld so far as it can be, at the same time I should like to make it clear that those on this side of the house who voted to support your ruling believe that if there is any method whereby the lumbermen, fishermen, seamen, miners and others who are unable, because of absence, to vote at their regular polling place, can be given the right to vote, it should be given to them. My opinion, as I listened to the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), was that it was one that should be moved in committee.

Mr. HEAPS: How could it be?

Mr. MANION: I think it should be moved when the matter is being considered in the committee. My hon. friend (Mr. Power) shakes his head. Then it could be moved as an amendment to the report of the committee or when we are dealing with the act itself, if amendments are to be made to the act. But I rose merely to say that while I voted for the Speaker's ruling, I believe that if there is any method whereby the principle of both these amendments can be incorporated in the Dominion Elections Act, I should be entirely in favour of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, it might serve to regularize the amendment to have it in the form of an instruction to the committee that they may consider the following. That, I understand from the clerk, would be the correct form in which the amendment should be put, and if it would satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite to have it presented in that way, it would conform to the rules of the house.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I agree to that suggestion and thank the Prime Minister.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then, by leave of the house the amendment will be amended accordingly.

Amendment (Mr. Coldwell) agreed to.

Motion (Mr. Power) as amended agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS —UNDERTAKINGS IN GENERAL INTEREST AND FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) (for the Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress and for such purpose to authorize the execution of undertakings in the general interest of Canada and requisite for the purposes of the act, out of moneys appropriated by parliament, and also to provide financial assistance to the provinces by way of loan, advance or guarantee, out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, and for the appointment of necessary officers, clerks and employees.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

MEASURE TO PROMOTE AND ASSIST TRAINING OF YOUNG PEOPLE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) (for the Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure for the purpose of promoting and assisting in the training of unemployed young people to fit them for gainful employment in Canada and, for such purpose, to appropriate sums aggregating four million five hundred thousand dollars to be expended over a period of three years from the 31st March, 1940. The application of the act and the payments made thereunder to be conditional upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon with the several provinces.

He said: There is a slight error in the fifth line. The line reads:

. . . to be expended over a period of three years from the 31st March, 1940.

That should have read:

. . . to be expended over a period of three years beginning with the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1940.

If the resolution might be amended in that form I should like to move it, and inform the house that His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution as amended, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May we have any further details with regard to this matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is only a motion to proceed to-morrow in committee. It is the formal motion required to have it appear under government orders.

Mr. MASSEY: Did the Prime Minister say that the date is 1940 or 1939? This year or next year?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: "Beginning with the fiscal year which ends March 31, 1940." It is a roundabout way of putting it.

Mr. MANION: Why not simplify it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It can be simplified to-morrow.

Motion as amended agreed to.

SEED GRAIN

REQUIREMENTS OF FARMERS IN CERTAIN AREAS OF SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), based on a report in the western papers of a discussion which took place at the convention of the association of rural municipalities, setting out an alarming situation with respect to the lack of seed grain, especially rust resistant grain, in certain areas of Saskatchewan. I wish to ask the minister if he is prepared to assure the house that either the provincial government or this government will in due time take action which will provide for the requirements of seed in the area where it is needed.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The matter of supplying seed where it is needed in Saskatchewan has been under discussion. I understand that the provincial government have the matter well in hand, but I am not in a position to say anything more than that with regard to it.

WHEAT POLICY

FIXED PRICE FOR 1939 CROP—CONTINUANCE OF WHEAT BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): In view of the fact that seeding on the prairies may commence within a month, can the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) inform the house when we may expect some definite pronouncement regarding the question of a fixed price for the 1939 crop and the continuance of a wheat board? I may say we are being asked this question continually. When may we expect an announcement?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): All I can say with regard to that is that the policy of the government will be announced in due course.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF PRESENTATION OF REPORT OF ROWELL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he expects to receive the so-called Rowell commission report. It was mentioned in the speech from the throne that a certain course of procedure based upon that report might be carried out, and I am hoping that the report will be received early in the session so that we shall have plenty of time to give it consideration.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The last time I had a word with the chairman of the commission was at the beginning of the year so that I might advise parliament when parliament met. I was then informed that the commission hoped to have their report ready about Easter. I am sorry that I am unable to say whether they are still of that opinion. I shall inquire and try to let my hon. friend know later.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

REVIEW OF GOVERNMENT FILM ACTIVITIES—INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE TO CENTRALIZE DISTRIBUTION

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 35, to create a national film board.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. STEVENS: The other evening I pointed out that from the terms of the resolution I feared that what we were about to do was to erect more elaborate machinery for carrying on what could very well be done with the existing machinery. This part of the section, (c) "commissioner," is a part of the interpretation clause which deals with the question of introducing the name "commissioner." The next sentence, (d), refers to "director." My view is this, that without the enlargement of the personnel of the motion picture bureau, that bureau with its director could do all that this bill provides to be done. Not only does this clause mean the appointment of an additional first-class public official, with, no doubt, a substantial salary, but it means that he will be surrounded with all the staff which goes with a position of that kind and it involves a great deal of additional expense. I am quite aware, because I have read the bill through, that certain provisions in it make it necessary to appoint the commissioner, but I am taking this first opportunity since the introduction of the bill to reiterate my protest of the other evening that what we are really doing is expanding the service, I believe unnecessarily. Let me add, so that there will be no question of my motives, that the bureau under the direction of Mr. Badgley, the present director, has done excellent work and is capable and competent to do continued work quite equal to that contemplated in this bill.

I assume the minister will say—I will anticipate what he is going to say—

Mr. EULER: The hon. member may be wrong.

Mr. STEVENS: I may be wrong, but I think I know his mind in this matter. The minister will probably say that this commissioner is to coordinate the present diverse activities of a number of departments in connection with this matter, and that it is necessary to introduce some new person, with a glorified title, in order to impress those in other departments with the importance of this gentleman, so that they will willingly pass on to him their requests, which at present apparently they are not prepared to do to the director. I pointed out the other day to the Prime Minister that all that was necessary in connection with the present machinery was the exercise of administrative authority in order to achieve what this bill is doing, without any additional expense, except that which might be necessary in the physical enlargement of operations—that is, in an increased number of films and so on, if that were thought advisable.

The other evening, speaking from memory, I said that the vote had been about $50,000 or less. I find it was $40,000, or less. In this year's estimates the amount is $150,000. Here is a jump from less than $40,000 to $150,000, a substantial portion of which will be used up, I might say, by the commissioner and his staff, through enlarged offices—because you will have to have offices for the commissioner, for his secretary, for his stenographic staff, and so on. You will have a new battery of offices and an enlarged staff, and by no means all of that $150,000 will go towards the improvement of the actual service.

I say to the Prime Minister and to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that if they will give to the present bureau additional funds such as they gave last year, they can get from the present personnel and organization all the service they want and all the service that is required in connection with the motion picture business of the government. This is simply the commencement of a large, new organization; and I venture to predict that next year those who come to the house—and possibly some here to-night will not be here at that time—will find that the estimates are again enlarged, and that this, that, and the other thing will be required in order that this new body may have room to operate.

I am sorry the minister did not listen to my suggestion the other evening, and that he has persisted in going ahead with this new organization. In other words, he is superimposing upon an efficient existing organization unnecessary expansion and personnel. I might say, by the way, that usually the minister is reasonably cautious and conservative in his views.

Mr. EULER: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: That is, of administration. But here he is now becoming quite reckless in his manner of expenditure.

An hon. MEMBER: Liberal.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend reminds me that the expansion tendency is Liberal, and I accept that. I was a little delicate about suggesting it. However, it is really a waste of funds, and I protest earnestly and sincerely against it.

Mr. EULER: May I say the fact that I am not able to see eye to eye with the hon. member who has just spoken is really no reflection upon his powers of persuasion. As a matter of fact, with all due respect to him I am afraid he is not quite seized of the intentions of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, I said I recognized that if the balance of the bill were carried the commissioner would undoubtedly be necessary to carry out its provisions. But, leave the commissioner out, and you will not need the balance of the bill.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend will appreciate that it takes some centralized authority to coordinate the work of the various departments—

Mr. STEVENS: You have it now.

Mr. EULER: —which, primarily, is the purpose behind the bill. If he will appreciate, too, that the board is being set up with the thought that one of its activities is to be the framing and production of what I called national films, he will see that there is a real need for an official of this sort.

Mr. STEVENS: None at all.

Mr. EULER: And for a board. That, of course, is just because of a difference of opinion between the hon. member and myself.

Mr. STEVENS: Decidedly.

Mr. EULER: While my hon. friend has had experience in the Department of Trade and Commerce, perhaps he has not appreciated, as I believe many hon. members have, the great place which the film has made for itself in ordinary business and in various activities throughout the world. Probably he does not realize that other countries are adopting this medium for the promotion and spreading of intelligence, information and, if you like, entertainment for the working out of certain national interests.

That is the purpose of what we are doing. When the hon. member speaks of the term "commissioner" as being a glorified name to impress other departments—well, I think that is hardly worthy of him. That is not the purpose at all. As a matter of fact, it does not matter particularly to me whether the man in charge is called a commissioner or by some other name. I regarded that as a suitable name to describe his functions.

I think my hon. friend does not show a complete appreciation of what we want to do. It is this, that the director of the bureau —and may I say that I can join with him in paying tribute to the efficiency of the director—has enough to do in running the bureau and in dealing with the production of films.

The commissioner will have entirely different work to do. Under the board itself, which will frame policies and which will decide as to national films, if you like, and as to the work which is to be carried on, the commissioner will himself have a sphere in which he may work, and will do work which in my opinion the director of the bureau will not be able to do. There will be sufficient scope for work for both of them.

Had I the time I might dwell upon what I mean by the production of national films. I said the other evening there might be a need or a desirability for the production of a national film which would appeal to the whole country, and which could not be produced by any one department. As we have it now, we have half a dozen departments of government which produce films, but which deal only with the particular work of their own department. But that does not touch what we mean by a national film.

Perhaps from some notes I have before me I might give a somewhat more complete description of what is meant by a national film. I have spoken of what is meant by a departmental film, namely one which would serve the needs of any one department. For instance, the Department of Trade and Commerce might require a film in connection with the promotion of the sale of goods. One might be required by the Department of Transport, which would deal with encouraging tourist traffic. Then, we might require another for the Department of Labour, and still another for the Department of Mines and Resources, which might deal particularly with the mining of gold or any other mineral. Then we might have a film which would appeal to the whole country; sometimes they are known as prestige-building films. Usually in a dramatic or imaginative way they show different aspects of a country's life. They show its work, its resources, and its achievements in the various fields of social and industrial endeavour. Such films are designed to sell the idea of a country in terms of national perspective, so as to build up an increased interest and a favourable sentiment towards a nation and its people, at home and abroad.

The other evening the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) offered the suggestion that provision be made for the distribution of national films designed to help Canadians in all parts of Canada to understand the ways of living and problems of Canadian people. That conveys pretty well the idea of what is meant by a national film. I am not going into the matter at greater length, but I would say that if the committee believes there is work to be done by way of having national films which appeal to the country at large, entirely distinct from the work of any one department, then I think we have room for the formation of a film board, to be headed by a film commissioner, which would carry out that work entirely in addition to the work of coordination of the operations of the various departments, to which I made reference before.

The hon. member has made reference to the amount of money appropriated this year. He has said that last year we spent a little less than $40,000.

Mr. STEVENS: No; last year the amount was about $88,000. In 1937 it was $40,000.

Mr. EULER: No; I have information before me showing the amounts for the last ten years—going back to the time when the hon. member was in charge of the department. These are the amounts:

Year	Amount in estimates
1929-30	$75,000
1930-31	75,000
1932-32	65,000
1932-33	45,000
1933-34	70,000
1934-35	50,000
1935-36	40,000
1936-37	40,800
1937-38	41,880
1938-39	40,279

The drop in 1935-36 may be significant. So it would appear that the amount is quite small. As the hon. member has correctly stated, last year the amount was more than $88,000. The explanation is simple. My hon. friend may not know it, but in the last year or so the estimates have been drawn up somewhat differently from what they were before. Where before the salaries were included in civil government, they are now included in the film vote. That practice is now carried on throughout the various departments. In the coming year the same thing will be done, but in addition to that we are going to spend more money for film purposes. We propose to make five or six additional films, because the films now distributed in the old country, those films in our distribution depot in the United Kingdom, are obsolete. They are no longer worth sending out, and we must have something new if we want them to be worthy of this country. That is the reason for the additional appropriation.

I do not share my hon. friend's fears to the effect that the film board will be expanded into a heavy-spending body. I do not anticipate that for a moment. The work we want to do is coordinating the film activities of the various departments. I sincerely believe we can actually save some money.

Mr. MacNICOL: By cutting down the expense in the film branches of other departments?

Mr. EULER: Exactly, where there is overlapping or inefficiency. But with the growth of the film as a method for the dissemination of information and advertising I would not say that it is not possible and might not indeed be thoroughly justifiable and a proper thing to do to spend more money in that way. We are using this particular method of advertising Canada and Canadian activities and the work of the various departments. But it is not the intention arbitrarily to create a board with a big staff and spend large sums of money. In fact, I think at the outset about the only additional expenditure besides perhaps national films that we ought to have is the salary of the commissioner himself. I do not know what that salary is going to be. It is important that we get the right man as commissioner, because an important duty will rest upon him in the working out of the national films themselves. Beyond that, I should think a stenographer and perhaps a clerk in the office will be all that is required.

Mr. MANION: That is the way it always starts.

Mr. EULER: Well, I say quite frankly that if it is found to be in the interests of Canada that that branch should expand, I should have no hesitation in bringing before the house added estimates to carry out what I consider to be in the interests of the country. But in the meantime there is no intention of having it become a heavily manned and expensive department.

Mr. MANION: Could the minister give the costs of the film branches of other departments?

Mr. EULER: I can only give what the other departments expended with other film producing concerns:

Finance	$ 1,555 00
Justice	403 31
Mounted police	13,002 68
Post office	1,606 64
Mines and geology branch	23,116 57
Lands, parks and forests	7,301 12
Agriculture	5,013 43
	$51,998 75

That is for the last fiscal year, 1937-38.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Does that include the Department of National Defence?

Mr. EULER: That department is not mentioned. This is information supplied by the treasury officials regarding expenditures made by the departments for motion pictures and other photographic work other than payments to departments of the public service. Some of the work is done through the bureau and some by outside concerns. I think one or two of the departments did not use the bureau at all. Since we have a bureau that is as good as anything in this country or even in the United States, it is hoped that in the interests of economy, if for no other reason, that they will use the facilities we have now in the bureau. We have a plant there that has cost the country something like $200,000—I do not think in the last three years since I have been in charge of the department that much has been added in the way of capital expenditure. But we have a well equipped and well manned bureau that can do the work; why should it not do it?

Mr. MANION: Is the money spent by the other departments, amounting to nearly $52,000, for work done by the moving picture section of his department or by outside companies?

Mr. EULER: This is "other than payments to departments of the public service." That is not very clear. I am not sure whether it is the money spent with the bureau or money spent, for instance, with Associated Screen

News or some other private concern. This is not all that was expended by the other departments; that is true. But we do hope that in the coming year, when this board is established, all the departments of government will as far as possible use the facilities of our own bureau. If the bill goes through, it will be necessary for the various departments to get permission of the board before they can project any films.

Mr. MANION: Has not the minister today a Mr. Badgley who is director of the moving picture branch of his department, which really is the only moving picture branch of any importance that we have in the country?

Mr. EULER: That is correct.

Mr. MANION: Does the minister know whether that work done for the other departments was done by outside companies, or paid by the different departments to his moving picture branch?

Mr. EULER: It is done both ways.

Mr. MANION: Yes. The moving picture bureau under Mr. Badgley of the Department of Trade and Commerce, is a branch for which I have a good deal of respect. While I was never Minister of Trade and Commerce I was acting minister of that department occasionally when the then minister, the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) was away. Thus I became acquainted with the work of Mr. Badgley and his group, and I have a great deal of respect for him.

In view of the comparatively small amounts that are being spent by the other departments mentioned by the minister, who said the mines branch was spending some $20,000 while various others were spending less, some as little as $5,000, is it not sufficient to leave things as they are and allow Mr. Badgley to carry on exactly as he is doing, with this modification: If other departments want moving picture work done, it should be done by Mr. Badgley's branch? If it is necessary, from the point of view of other departments, to have some check on Mr. Badgley, that might be effected by some kind of interdepartmental committee. Take the mines branch, as a good illustration. Possibly there will be more and more work done on behalf of that branch, which has to do with one of our great industries. The Department of Agriculture might be another branch that would have a good deal of work to be done. If Mr. Badgley had something in the way of an interdepartmental committee to assist him, he could do exactly what would be done by the new commission proposed by the minister.

We have Mr. Badgley, an able civil servant, who has been doing splendid work: the minister himself said so, and I know that to be the case from what little experience I have had with that bureau. He is not to be encouraged to carry on his work on the wider scale which the minister believes will be necessary. Instead of that, and instead of attaching greater importance to his position, the government is thinking of bringing in some outsider, no doubt a man who has had something to do with moving pictures, putting him over Mr. Badgley and forming a new bureaucratic branch of government. I say this sincerely, and with no thought of merely opposing the minister: I believe we have enough departments of government now.

I remember many years ago in this house listening to a speech by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar); as I remember it, he was then in opposition. I have never forgotten that speech; it is the only one he ever made that I remembered—he is behind the curtain there, so I will tell him this. In his speech he showed the rapid increase in the number of civil servants, year after year. I do not wish to steal the thunder of my hon. friend the member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), but as he pointed out the other day, every time a new branch of any kind is established it starts out with an officer and a secretary. Within a few months the secretary has a secretary, and of course there is always a messenger in the beginning as well. Then, before you know it, you have a real branch of some department built up, and the more employees they get the more important they think they are. It is a strange thing, but I am informed by outstanding civil servants that many of them at any rate, if not all, judge their importance by the number of employees they have under them. So it seems to be a habit, whenever a new branch is established, to build it up and make it important. I could give many instances which I remember. I have one in mind in particular, but I do not wish to name it because I believe it performs a useful service. I can think of others, however, that have started in the same way and have been continually built up. Finally, instead of spending the $125,000 which is indicated for this year, we shall be spending perhaps $250,000, and we shall have another bureaucracy taking over part of our government.

I say to the minister in all sincerity that he should hold up this bill a little longer, give it further consideration and see if a scheme cannot be worked out, as I feel sure it can, whereby Mr. Badgley may remain in control of his own bureau, assisted by something in the way of an interdepartmental committee made up of representatives of the other departments interested. These might include the Department of Mines and Resources and perhaps the Department of Agriculture. The minister of that department, being such a good friend of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, probably would be of particular assistance. That is an aside, however; that is not really of any great importance.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend does not really mean that.

Mr. MANION: No, probably I do not. To be serious, however, I do believe the minister could allow things to remain as they are, with Mr. Badgley in control, and set up a committee of representatives of two or three other departments, who would see that all applications received fair treatment. I am sincerely of the opinion that the minister would be well advised to hold up this legislation and not start another branch which to my mind is not necessary, and I say that after having listened with reasonable care to what the minister has said and to the discussion that has taken place.

Mr. McIVOR: I have a purpose in rising at this time, Mr. Chairman. I believe this change will make for efficiency. There seems to be more than one head to this body now; and I am sure the leader of the opposition, being a medical man of note, would agree that one head was enough for one body. We have reason to believe that the work of this branch is increasing, and it is most important work. We can send down to this branch, secure films and send them back to our constituencies without any charge of any kind. Many of these films were shown in Chippawa park last year, and they attracted and interested tourists from outside Canada.

I desired to ask whether the work of this department was growing rapidly, and also whether the department is now under one head? My other purpose was to tell the minister that one of the most important sections of Canada seems to have been left out when these films were made. Those who know the head of the lakes will agree that there we have scenery second to none on the continent of north America. For instance, we have Kakabeka Falls, with 190 foot head. If the minister will see that these pictures include some of the beautiful scenery at the head of the lakes, I am sure it will interest tourists from all over this and other countries.

Mr. MASSEY: Mr. Chairman, I gather that in connection with this bill the minister is permitting a general discussion of the whole situation, and I think we must look at it from the point of view of the importance of the job that is to be done. After all, we have at hand an organization for the production of films. As I understand it, the minister is not anxious to add to that organization; rather, he desires some body which through one individual, the commissioner, will have control over the production of films for the various departments of government. His idea, as I gather it, is not to add to the present film division; his desire is to have a coordinating body.

The success or failure of the coordinating body which he suggests, as I see it, depends upon two main factors. In the first place the success of what he has in mind will depend very largely upon the choice of the commissioner. If the commissioner is a man who has not had the full breadth of experience necessary for this position, he will not be of value to the board to which he is responsible; for, after all, he will be the connecting link between that board and the mechanical production of these films. Therefore he must be a technical man, able to give to the board such advice which is so necessary in the production of a successful film.

According to this bill, there are three gentlemen outside the permanent civil service who are to be appointed to the board. When discussing the resolution the other evening I suggested to the minister what I thought was a most important point. I suggested he make sure that among these three men there should be at least one—it would be preferable to have more—who had certain experience, not only in the production of film but in its conception. After all, an idea is one thing and the production of it is another. It is all very well for the minister of any department to suggest that a film should be produced to accomplish a certain purpose which he has in mind—it may be that the tourist bureau would want to show that in certain parts of Canada there are attractions for the tourists in the form of bass, maskalonge or otherwise—but one would not expect the minister to be a showman, as I suggested the other night. The conception of that film would be one thing; its production would be another. Just exactly how are you going to provide a short to be shown on the screens in the northern part of the United States drawing attention to the fact that there are certain areas in Canada where the maskalonge is just waiting for the tourist to come to take him home? After all, there are various ways in which that can be done. I have seen it done successfully and I have seen it done badly. Therefore, in considering the suggestion which the minister makes, I think it is highly desirable that the commissioner should be the type of man which I have outlined. And further, as I have said, at least one and preferably two of the three men to be appointed outside the permanent civil service should be of the type who can give the fullest and best advice to the whole board.

I do not know whether the minister has anyone directly in mind to be appointed commissioner, but this man should possess three main attributes. In the first place, he should be a technical man or he should be constantly making contacts with those who have technical ability. He should be able to tell the board whether or not what is suggested is possible. After all, there may be a suggestion made in all sincerity by a minister for the production of a certain film which might present unusual and extraordinary technical difficulties. The commissioner ought to be able to see at once that while such a film can be produced, if it were produced in a certain way it could be turned out at perhaps a third of the cost. He should have some knowledge of the technical difficulties which may be encountered in the production of film and some realization of the technical possibilities.

Then he should be a showman in his own way. He should have some idea of how a film should register upon an audience. He should be able to say to a minister whether or not the suggested film will be suitable for the type of audience to which it is to be shown. In the third place, and probably the most important, he should be an advertising man. If we look through the pages of our newspapers, if we glance at our magazines or if we listen to our radio we do not find it difficult to tell whether the advertising we see or the advertising we hear has been prepared or produced by a man who knows something about that art. The effect of advertising, be it received through the eye or through the ear, or both simultaneously, must be spontaneous. To be effective, advertising must be at once effective. When you see a film, the impression which it is intended to leave is either left upon your mind or it is not. It seems to me that the necessity for an advertising type of commissioner is an exceedingly important point.

There is a great need for films to present Canada, not only to Canadians but to the people in other parts of the world. The minister knows from his own experience in other countries that the phrase "made in Canada" does not have the effectiveness it should. We are proud of our agricultural products, as we have every right to be; we are confident that our manufactured products are of a type and kind which should have acceptance on the markets of the world. Certainly it is the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite that it is highly to be desired the channels of trade be opened to Canadian produce and to Canadian manufactured products. On the other hand, any salesman knows that adequate advertising decreases sales resistance and heightens desire, and thus is an important part of successful trade.

As the government of Canada has made it possible, through such agreements as the Ottawa agreements of 1932, to permit our entry into the market of the United Kingdom, it seems to me to be highly desirable, from the point of view of the producer of this country, that the government assume its share of responsibility in attempting to merchandise those products in that particular market. I have been to various shops, vegetable markets and so forth in the United Kingdom, and I have found great difficuty in obtaining made-in-Canada goods. I am sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will agree on at least this one point, that we should advertise our merchandise as fully as possible, be it agricultural products or be it manufactured products, in the market in which we are attempting to sell.

Canada is a tremendous country capable of producing highly diversified products, but I have yet to happen to be in an English or Scotch cinema when there was being shown a picture depicting Canada from the point of view of the production of farm products or the production of manufactured products. The average resident of the United Kingdom has little idea of the length and breadth of Canada; he has little idea of what our prairies look like and so on, but he can be shown these things. This need not be done according to the Hollywood conception; it need not be based upon some absurd drama; it should be by means of a carefully prepared government film. For example, if we are to sell our excellent prairie beef in the United Kingdom, surely the consumer in the United Kingdom should have an opportunity of seeing from what part of the world that beef comes. Such a film could be made extremely attractive.

Then I turn to the tourist trade. The average resident of the United Kingdom has never been to Canada. The number of tourists from the United Kingdom to Canada is very small compared with the number that come from the United States. Perhaps this year the resident of the United Kingdom may be a little wary of going to the continent. He likes to travel, and he should be made to realize that Canada can provide a perfect and comparatively safe playground for his summer holiday. Are we in the process of preparing adequate advertising literature, films or whatever may be needed to attract the visitor to Canada? I am sure Mr. Dolan is to be heartily congratulated upon the work he has done with the tourist bureau; but, as I have said in the past in committee, the vote which we grant each year for the development of our tourist trade is highly inadequate. Our tourist trade has been one of our most profitable businesses. Many hundreds of thousands of tourists come here each year from the United States, but we can do more, much more, to develop this trade.

To sum up what I have said, it seems to me that the purpose of this bill is perfectly sound from many different points of view. I fully realize that there may be the danger of appointing another commission, that we may be providing a temptation to broaden out and spend more money. I suggest to the minister that he has at hand, without going very much further, the necessary material to build up through readjustment what he has essentially proposed in his bill. I have, as I have already said, great confidence in Mr. Badgley. It seems to me the work he has done so far has demonstrated that he possesses in great part those attributes I suggest the commissioner should possess. The minister may say that it is a two-man job to run a film bureau and to act as commissioner on this board. It may be so. On the other hand, if that is so, instead of retaining the present set-up of the film bureau why would it not be possible from out of the film bureau to take the head as a sort of commissioner and give him the necessary assistants to carry on the work which he would not be able to carry on by himself in the future as a result of his new responsibility. I think it is quite possible, Mr. Chairman, to form, as it were, a committee rather than a board within both the ministry and the permanent civil service.

Mr. EULER: There will be an interdepartmental committee in addition to the board.

Mr. MASSEY: And will the interdepartmental committee be composed of permanent civil servants?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. MASSEY: May I ask the minister whether the board will consult the committee, or will the committee report to the board?

Mr. EULER: The committee will really cooperate more particularly with the director of the bureau. My hon. friend will find when we come to that clause in the bill, it will be described in the bill itself.

Mr. MASSEY: Then I do not wish to detain the committee any longer. I have spoken at greater length than I had intended. I just want to say in conclusion that I think the minister will find and appreciate that he has on hand at the moment the necessary machinery for the production of films, and that in his effort to coordinate the activities of the various departments he will arrive at the conclusion that a board composed of the present available personnel is the best possible means of achieving that end. I suggest that he give full consideration to the possibility of developing the board itself from within the ranks of those who sit on the treasury benches and of the permanent civil service, bearing in mind that he has at his disposal the services of two such able gentlemen as Mr. Badgley and Mr. Dolan.

Mr. WHITE: Mr. Chairman, I am a little curious to learn from the minister the vent of these films. How are they circulated? Their purpose I take to be principally to attract trade and tourist travel from abroad to Canada. Are these films shown in moving picture theatres, and if so, are prices paid by the government to these theatres for the showing of the films. It is a very simple thing to produce films of Canada, its resources, scenery and so on, but a very different matter to have those films shown more or less throughout Europe and the United States. I should think that is a costly proceeding, and if the government has not as yet been paying out money to that end, what sort of circulation of the films has been secured?

Mr. EULER: The bureau has produced literally thousands of feet of film which are being distributed. They are not shown to as great an extent in the theatres as might be wished, because with the present practice of moving picture theatres of running two feature films, there is not much room for a short film.

Mr. MANION: Not enough sex appeal.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps not, but it is hoped that progress will be made by showing the film in the theatres. There are also a great many organizations which are very glad to receive these films. They are distributed to schools, Y.M.C.A's and various social organizations. I might give some indication of the work which has been done.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Would the minister at the same time give the type of film distributed?

Mr. EULER: I am not sure that I can at the moment give the particular types of film distributed, although I can procure that for a later stage. The motion picture bureau has a world-wide circulation for its films far in excess of any other film organization in Canada and probably greater than any other governmental film organization in the world. It has more films in circulation in more countries than any other organization in Canada. The bureau has produced twenty-three new films in the last year. It has at the present time over 6,000 copies of its films in active circulation in about thirty countries and is reaching an estimated audience of probably 40,000,000 people each year. Actual reports for the past year show a total audience in the United Kingdom of over 4,000,000 and between nineteen million and twenty million in the United States.

Mr. WHITE: Are the films free to these organizations?

Mr. EULER: In most instances.

Mr. MANION: Is not the story which the minister has just told of the very good distribution that is now taking place an argument against what he is proposing? In other words, the present distribution is so good, as he has just described it to us that I do not see why he needs any different type of organization. That struck me when the minister was giving his explanation. While I knew there was a considerable distribution, I do not mind saying I had no idea it was so widespread as the minister has just indicated. A distribution of film that reaches 40,000,000 people and spreads over thirty different countries seems to me a splendid distribution. The organization would seem to be doing such excellent work that I do not know why the minister wishes to change it. That is what puzzles me a bit. I think a little widening out along the line suggested by my hon. friend the member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey)—and that was really the suggestion which was made by the hon. member for Kootenay East and myself, namely that the present organization be widened—with Mr. Badgley remaining as the head, and something in the way of an interdepartmental committee to advise him, should answer the purpose. If the minister wished, there could also be something in the way of outside honorary advisers. But the idea of bringing in another commissioner, and setting up another bureau over Mr. Badgley and the men who have brought about this splendid distribution, seems unnecessary and really strange to me.

Mr. EULER: I am sure that my hon. friend will agree that nothing is ever so good that it cannot be improved, and that is exactly what we hope to do in the setting up of this organization. Something has been said with regard to Mr. Badgley who is now director of the bureau, and the suggestion has been made that he could handle the whole thing. I have nothing to say of Mr. Badgley but what is good; he is an excellent official. But—and when I say this I am giving no intimation whether Mr. Badgley or anyone else is to be the commissioner because neither the government nor I have given any consideration to who the commissioner might be—I do contend that if we are going to carry on this work in the way that has been suggested by the hon. member for Greenwood and according to what is in my own mind, it means a better distribution, the elimination of overlapping, and the creation of what we might call departmental films. I think there is a job there for two good men; one as a director of the bureau, to do the work that is being done now—and perhaps still better work is possible with added facilities—and certainly there some one else is needed for the framing of national policies and the producing of national pictures such as will be done by the board with the assistance of the commissioner, the commissioner being an executive officer.

I am convinced, after giving this matter a great deal of thought, that it will add to the efficiency of our picture distribution if we adopt a plan something of this kind. The bureau itself is the productive factor. The work of initiating films, especially of a national character, is something entirely different. It is related to it; but it requires, to my mind, a different kind of efficiency—initiative, and the power of developing films on a national basis for educative purposes, advertising purposes and so forth. Not the production itself, which is more or less a mechanical job, but the initiating of ideas in connection with national films, requires something more in the way of special capacity, and it is for that reason we want to enlist the services of someone from the outside.

The hon. member for Greenwood made a very good point, I thought, when he said that there will be required on that board one technical man who knows something of the film business, something of the value of advertising, something of the sort of appeal which can be made to the public. That knowledge ought also to be in the commissioner himself, and it is going to be an important matter to select the right man for that position. It may be Mr. Badgley; I do not know. There seems to be considerable solicitude in the committee as to what will become of Mr. Badgley. I am not prepared to say. I am perfectly sincere when I say that the selection of the commissioner has not been made even tentatively as far as I am concerned. But I believe that if we want to carry out the principles outlined in the bill, to coordinate the work of the various departments and initiate national films for general country-wide educational purposes, we need the two organizations and their officers, the director of the bureau and the commissioner to proceed with the work under the board itself.

I do not know that I can make any better argument. I could give, perhaps in more detail, a description of the work it is hoped to do. I could give a description of the work which is now being done, and show that the work done by the various departments individually and separately, while good in itself, can be tremendously improved by eliminating some of the overlapping and unnecessary expenditure.

I should like again to reassure if I can some hon. members who seem to fear that we are going to set up a costly organization to run into hundreds of thousands of dollars of expenditure and create another bureaucracy. I regard that as imaginary. I do not believe it will happen, because the committee should remember that all the moneys the board will spend must be voted by this parliament. On the board there will be two members of the government and three civil servants. From that it surely must be evident that the operations will be thoroughly under the control of the government itself and of parliament. So long as I happen to be at the head of the department there is not going to be any spreading out of an expensive staff in connection with this board. As a matter of fact, I am astonished that so much argument has arisen in connection with it. It is not a tremendously expensive agency that we propose to set up; it is just something which seems to me to be the sensible and businesslike thing to do. So far from creating expense, I believe we shall eliminate some expense and obtain more efficiency than we have had hitherto. That is all the purpose we have in mind.

Mr. STIRLING: For instance, in the matter of accommodation, will there be room in the motion picture bureau for this board of about fifteen people, including the advisory board, the secretary and so on? Is there accommodation for a number such as that?

Mr. EULER: I have not given any thought to that. But this board will not meet very often, probably only once or twice a month, and surely it will be an easy matter to find a room in which its meetings can be held. As to the small office staff, one or two at most in addition to the commissioner, I do not think I shall find any difficulty in providing room in my department to accommodate these people.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not going to prolong the discussion beyond making clear my position. I had directed my remarks to the subclause of section 2 regarding the commissioner, but the discussion has broadened out until it involves really the bill. There are two or three matters to which I should like to refer. The term "coordination" has been used, and the suggestion has been made that this bill represents the first time that a little common sense has been injected into this business—

Mr. EULER: Oh, no.

Mr. STEVENS: —and that we are now going to do the businesslike thing and coordinate the motion picture business. The motion picture business was coordinated years ago when a bill was introduced for that very purpose. That is why the bureau was established. But, as I said the other night, because of loose administration—and I am not blaming particularly this government any more than previous governments — other departments crept into the business and we had the same condition as existed before the first coordination. Now we are going to have a second coordination to coordinate the first coordination. That is really what we are doing. All that was necessary was that the Prime Minister and the minister or the governor in council should call attention to the tendency to spread out, point to the fact that there was a bureau, and instruct the different departments to do their motion picture business through that bureau which at present exists, and which was coordinated once for that purpose.

The second point is that while you are erecting a board, you have at present in the minister's department an organization which will take care of all that is proposed in the bill. The national research council is under the direction of a committee of the privy council of which the minister is chairman. There are, I think, four ministers on that committee.

Mr. EULER: More than that.

Mr. STEVENS: Four or five. It is comparatively a small committee. The same thing could be done in this case. You could make your committee of one or two ministers plus several senior civil servants, and establish it by an administrative act without any legislation at all, under the precedent I have already cited.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend was minister of this department and therefore was chairman of the committee of ministers which had to do with the research council.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. EULER: Did he find any difficulty in getting these ministers together and getting any actual service out of them? I did.

Mr. STEVENS: No. I had associated with me Doctor MacLaren, Doctor Sutherland and Mr. Gordon, and I have forgotten whom else. I think there were five ministers. I had no difficulty. I simply sent a notice out and they met in my office quite frequently.

Mr. EULER: The hon. member's experience is better than mine.

Mr. STEVENS: That may be. But we had no difficulty. The committee functioned admirably.

There is another point which, at least in my view, should be cleared up. The minister has referred several times to the bureau as "technical." Certainly the bureau is technical, but I want to tell him and tell this committee that the bureau under its present direction has all the elements of vision which are necessary for the production and designing of films. I was amazed at the unusual skill which was present there for the designing and production of film subjects. All we have to do is go over the library of films. If hon. members are interested they could go to the bureau and have a few of them put on the screen. It might be a good idea for the minister to invite members to go to the bureau to see those films, because I believe they are excellent. The hon. member for Greenwood stated a minute ago that he has not seen any in the old country. I was in the old country and I saw a number of them.

Mr. MASSEY: I said I happened not to have seen them.

Mr. STEVENS: I remember seeing a number of excellent films. I saw some Russian films, and films from other countries exhibited at the same time. I would say that those from Canada were in every respect equal to those from other countries. We have no reason, with our present organization —its efficiency, its skill, its science and its art—to take a back seat to any of them. It must not be permitted to go on the basis that, as we now have the technical requirements, we must set up a board and a commissioner to put into it the brains—or the science, or art, as the case may be—because we have that now.

I question very much whether, under the present scheme, we shall improve that phase of it one iota. I should like to see a committee of council, with the minister as chairman and with two or three other ministers associated with him who would have definite administrative instructions from the government. It would have to be one central film operation, and it would stop all this nonsense where individual departments may go off and buy films from the outside. The minister said a moment ago he was not quite sure, but I venture to say to him that every dollar of that $50,000 was spent outside the government service. I will venture to say further—and I challenge contradiction—that in addition to that it will be found there are little, miniature organizations in two or three other departments, organizations of semi-skilled individuals who call themselves film experts, carrying on a sort of secondary or subsidiary film bureau in the different departments. All that is required is a bit of administrative action on the part of the government to stop this useless duplication and this senseless broadening out of these things, after this first coordination was effected some years ago. There is now a coordinated body. Instead of erecting a new coordination organization, the government should take a step backward and insist that the department observe the present arrangement, respect it, and call for their service through that body.

With all due regard to the minister and his intentions—which I believe are serious; he knows very well I am not reflecting upon him in any personal way—I warn him, I warn the government and I warn the committee that if we go ahead with this organization we are simply going to superimpose on an existing excellent organization another one which will ultimately become very costly.

Let us turn to the next clause, which has already been discussed to some extent, and just visualize what it means. The minister is providing for a board to hold office for three years, one to retire each year for the first three years, and from then on they will hold office for three years—all outside members, as well as members of the privy council and the civil service. Once a board of that kind, on which are outside persons appointed for terms of three years, is erected, they will start building up a little bureaucracy within the government; whereas, if a committee of council is appointed under the present authority, with no further legislation we would keep the administration under the control of the minister in charge.

Mr. EULER: It will be that way, because the minister will be the chairman; one colleague will sit with him, and three civil servants.

Mr. STEVENS: But you are erecting a board with outsiders on it. You can always call in an expert from any part of the country, and pay him for whatever advice you get. But in this way you are erecting a bureaucracy within the department, instead of maintaining ministerial control, which the hon. member for Témiscouata dilated upon so eloquently on Friday night.

Mr. LANDERYOU: There is a new and improved educational development in Alberta under the supervision of the minister of education. It has been declared by the minister in that province that they intend to a greater extent to use films throughout the schools of the province. Many of the schools, as well as churches and other institutions throughout Alberta, have facilities to make available to the public whatever national films may be produced by the department.

I find myself in accord with the bill. I should like to learn from the minister how many educational films we have which could be supplied to the schools.

Mr. EULER: I am afraid I cannot give the number now, but I could get the information for the hon. member. I should not like to give a definite figure.

Mr. LANDERYOU: What steps are being taken to inform the schools and churches as to the type and number of films they may have?

Mr. EULER: They merely have the knowledge that these films are in existence at the bureau, and when they write in for them the films are sent. I do not know that there is anything further done in connection with the matter.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The explanatory note refers to the government film distribution and public information service. I understand this is already provided.

Mr. EULER: What is the question?

Mr. LANDERYOU: The note says:

> Its main concern will be the organization of a central government film distribution and public information service.

As I understand it, we already have the public information service, and this will effect no improvement.

Mr. EULER: It will just have the effect of intensifying the work now being done. I see my hon. friend the former minister has left the chamber, and what I am about to say is not said with the intention of criticizing, but I believe I could point out that in the past the work of distribution and production has been more or less haphazard. It is our desire to unify it and make it better than it was before.

On section 3—National Film Board.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is there any theory of cooperation between the national board and the various boards in the provinces?

Mr. EULER: There are not any provincial boards.

Mr. HOMUTH: Did not some of the provinces have their own motion picture bureaux?

Mr. EULER: Not now.

Mr. HOMUTH: None of them?

Mr. EULER: None at all. Ontario did have one, but it has been discontinued.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

On section 8—Government film commissioner.

Mr. MANION: Is there any intention of broadening out the duties of the government film commission in such a way as to effect or to have any influence upon anything connected with outside work, or films outside the government; or is this entirely for the purpose of broadening out the work presently done by the government?

Mr. EULER: Entirely government work.

Mr. BAKER: If this added expense is to be incurred, will the outside purchasing of films, which apparently has been going on, be discontinued?

Mr. EULER: It all depends. If some department can convince the film board that its work could be better done by some outside organization it will be done, but it must first get the consent of the board.

Mr. HOMUTH: In connection with the visit of their majesties to Canada there will, of course, be moving pictures taken for the archives and as a matter of record. Would this department handle that?

Mr. EULER: All arrangements in connection with the royal visit are being handled by a government committee. I have no doubt the bureau will do some of the work; at least I hope so. Whether it will be confined to the bureau, I cannot say.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Duties of commissioner.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister be willing to add as the first clause of paragraph 9 something like the following:

advise upon the making and distribution of national films designed to help Canadians in all parts of Canada to understand the ways of living and the problems of Canadians in other parts.

The minister used the words earlier this evening, but as I read the bill there is no mention in it of national films. Yet the vision of what national films can mean seems to me the most important feature about this bill. I agree with the minister that national films could mean a great deal in building up the Canadian nation.

Mr. EULER: I think my hon. friend will find in the bill the term "national films."

Mr. STIRLING: It is in paragraph (a).

Mr. EULER: Yes, "coordinate national and departmental film activities." I assure my hon. friend it is the intention of the government that national films shall be initiated.

Mr. GREEN: For the sake of the people who are administering this act in the future, it would be well to set that out clearly in this section. After all, the important idea behind this bill is that there should be national films developed, and I think that should be stressed more than it is in the bill as drawn.

Mr. EULER: If my hon. friend thinks that the phrase "coordinate national film activities" is not sufficient, we might say "coordinate and originate" or "coordinate and develop national film activities."

Mr. GREEN: I think that feature is worthy of a separate clause. I have one here that I shall send over to the minister.

Mr. HAYHURST: Does the government at present do all its own film work?

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. EULER: No; that is one of the reasons for this bill; some of the departments are having their film work done outside, and some may continue to do so; but it is hoped that, having a bureau that is as good as the best, the various departments will have their work done by this bureau; in fact they must, unless the board agrees to its being done otherwise.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The other night when we were discussing this matter I asked the minister if it was the intention of the department to put this film business on a more or less commercial basis. No doubt there will be commercial firms who would like to have these pictures taken and shown in various countries. Could not the government get some revenue out of this bureau?

Mr. EULER: I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend any greater encouragement than I did the other evening. This is advertising, not a money-making concern. I have not a great deal of hope that when we supply these short films to theatres and other places we can collect much revenue for them. I am told that the British government issues some films out of which it makes a little money, but I should not like to say that we are going to make much out of this. We are running it for the purpose of doing our own advertising. If we can make a little profit it will be that much to the good, but I should not like to give much hope of making money out of the film bureau. We do not hope to make money out of supplying films to schools and institutions of that sort.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It seems to me there could be a source of revenue. We have our trade commissioners throughout the world looking for trade, and our manufacturers of one kind and another who are looking for business. I think it would be easy to develop a great source of revenue in connection with this bureau. If we start out on the basis that we are not going to make anything out of it, we certainly shall not. But I think the government should see that we do have one section of it that will handle this film business from the point of view of advertising Canadian products, and I think the various manufacturers in this country would be quite willing to pay for that service. At the present time they pay for the service they get from the national research council. As we all know, that council has developed into a profitable institution; at least it pays its way, and there is no reason why this bureau should not be put on the same basis.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green):

That section 9 be amended by inserting the following as subsection (a):
advise upon the making and distribution of national films designed to help Canadians in all parts of Canada to understand the ways of living and the problems of Canadians in other parts.

And then the other subsections will be re-lettered.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MANION: In regard to expenditures by the various departments, might I ask the minister if there is any provision in this bill that would compel the other departments to have their films produced by this branch?

Mr. EULER: Section 11 deals with that.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Departments to refer matters to commissioner.

Mr. STIRLING: Does not subsection 2 presuppose that the departments are going to endeavour to invest in apparatus themselves; and is that not contrary to the explanation the minister gave, that it was the hope of the government that the work of the departments could be concentrated in this bureau?

Mr. EULER: According to a note I have here, it is estimated that the value of camera, projection and film servicing equipment at present in possession of all departments—that is, other than the motion picture bureau—is about $25,000, which has been purchased piecemeal from different sources. This equipment is not standardized to any extent, and in some instances is not the most suitable equipment for the purpose for which it was purchased. It is not intended, of course, that any department is to take the place of the bureau, but it may be that small purchases will have to be made, and that will be done under the supervision of the director.

Mr. STIRLING: So the various departments still will be permitted to maintain their own apparatus and make their own films?

Mr. EULER: They cannot do it without the consent of the director.

Mr. BARBER: Who purchases the equipment provided for in subsection 3?

Mr. EULER: The body which has an appropriation for the purpose, but it must be all under the supervision of the director.

Mr. BARBER: Any department?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. MASSEY: If the purchase of apparatus is to be made only with the consent of the board, I do not see anything in the bill which would similarly prevent any department from making its own pictures with such apparatus as it has now. It is not incumbent upon the department to turn over its apparatus to the motion picture bureau, so it can continue its own little parasitical bureau.

Mr. EULER: Yes, but it cannot produce any films. Section 11 provides that all processing and production of films must be undertaken by the bureau, except where the commissioner agrees that the work can be done through officers of other departments. They cannot make their own films without the consent of the commissioner.

Mr. MASSEY: But on the other hand the departments now have a certain amount of apparatus of their own, and the temptation will be for the departments to continue the work they are now doing. They may be able to prevail upon the commissioner to give them permission to do so. Why not have the departments turn over all apparatus to the bureau?

Mr. EULER: That is probably what will happen. The possibility of any department going on with the production of its own films is rather remote, in view of the bill now being considered. They cannot do very much in the production of real films in any event. In the past they have either used the equipment of the bureau or had the work done by an outside firm. They can no longer do that without the consent of the board and the commissioner.

Section 11 agreed to.

On section 12—Employment of temporary staff.

Mr. MacNEIL: Is there any good reason why we should not allow these appointments to be made under the civil service commission?

Mr. EULER: For the simple reason that in many instances, perhaps when certain films are being made, a great deal of temporary help will be required, perhaps specially qualified help. It would take too long to have these appointments made by the civil service commission; and I think perhaps it is no insult to the commission to say that possibly the officer of the board would be much better qualified to select these technical temporary employees than would the civil service commission. In point of the time required, particularly, it would be quite out of place to utilize the services of the civil service commission.

Mr. MacNEIL: Then what procedure will be followed in engaging temporary personnel?

Mr. EULER: The director of the bureau may employ temporary help.

Mr. MacNEIL: Would it not be possible, in anticipation of a demand of that kind, to have an eligible list established by the civil service commission from which the director could draw from time to time? We pass act after act in this house containing the expression "notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act," and at the same time the government has declared itself as being in favour of the merit system.

Mr. EULER: What my hon. friend says is true in a general way. But supposing the bureau has to produce a particularly important film, or a film of such a character that it became necessary to bring somebody even from Hollywood; I do not think anyone would expect the director to go to the civil service commission to obtain a person of that sort. This has to do with men of technical qualifications, engaged for very short periods.

Section 13 agreed to.

On section 14—Central government film distribution service.

Mr. MASSEY: Would the minister explain to the committee what government film distribution service there is at the present time? Is this in addition, or is there any change?

Mr. EULER: It is really just an expansion of the present service. The bureau is distributing films now, and it is perhaps to make it just a little more official. Assistance will be given by this departmental committee which is to be set up, and this is more or less to give it official standing.

Mr. MASSEY: To incorporate it in the act?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Bill reported.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. CRERAR: To-morrow we shall take up the second reading of Bill No. 38, to establish a defence purchasing board, standing in the name of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie); and also, in committee of ways and means, the trade agreement, as well as any other bill standing on the order paper if we dispose of those items.

Mr. MANION: About ten days ago, I think, or perhaps a littler longer, I mentioned in the house that one of our members was going to move an amendment on going into supply. There has been no motion for some time to go into supply and, if possible, we should like to have that motion to-morrow. If we cannot have it to-morrow, possibly it could be done on Wednesday, but there is no motion for committee of supply on Thursday and Friday. In justice to hon. members I think the government should move to go into supply on such days as Monday or Tuesday, because that is the one opportunity when hon. members may deal with important subjects not on the order paper. If possible, I should like the minister to consider this matter. So far as I am concerned, he can advise me in the morning whether the government considers it possible to move to go into supply to-morrow in order to give an opportunity to one of our members to move an amendment, notice of which I gave from my place in the house I think ten or twelve days ago.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall bring that suggestion to the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I think the purpose is to move along with the bills under consideration in order to get them finished so that they may be sent across to the other house. In any event, I assume we would be moving to go into supply not later than Monday of next week. While the urgency of the matter suggested by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) may be considerable, it probably could stand until the beginning of next week. However, I shall bring this to the attention of the Prime Minister in the morning and ask his office to advise the leader of the opposition.

At 11.05 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, March 14, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. W. A. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.) presented the first report of the standing committee on public accounts, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, in the ordinary course I presume that without unanimous consent the motion to debate this report cannot be proceeded with to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point is well taken. The motion stands as a notice for to-morrow. Forty-eight hours' notice of motion is required.

Motion stands.

RADIO BROADCASTING—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher) presented the second report of the special committee on radio broadcasting, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): I was not in the committee during the last few moments when, apparently, this report was agreed upon, but I am opposed to the suggestion that this committee should now sit while the house is in session. I do not think there is any need for it. I think it is unwise, unless in cases of absolute urgency, that committees should sit while the house is in session. Had I been in the committee I should have voiced my objection there, but I left just before the committee rose, and I assume that the report was agreed upon afterwards.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I say to my hon. friend that it is not the intention of the committee to abuse the privilege. It is merely that members of the committee thought it would be advisable to have it, and they could then decide whether or not they wished to exercise it.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON ELECTIONS AND ELECTORAL DISTRICTS—CHANGE IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Deslauriers be substituted for that of Mr. Dussault on the special committee appointed to study and report on matters pertaining to elections and electoral districts of Canada.

That the name of Mr. McNevin (Victoria, Ont.) be substituted for that of Mr. Wood on the special committee appointed to study and report on matters pertaining to elections and electoral districts of Canada.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTION OF PRIORITY OF CERTAIN GOVERNMENT MEASURES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My attention has been drawn to the remarks of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) at the close of yesterday's session, in which he suggested that the government should bring on to-day a motion to go into committee of supply, rather than proceed with the bill with respect to the defence purchasing board. My hon. friend further mentioned that he thought the government ought to bring in a motion to go into supply on Mondays and Tuesdays, and he made some other suggestions.

May I say to my hon. friend that he will doubtless recall the little discussion we had in this house a month ago, and again a week ago, with reference to the business of the house and the government getting along with the public business. At that time my hon. friend felt that supply was not a very important matter, that it was brought before the house when nothing else was available, and he alleged that we had not brought in measures of public importance and sought to chastise us on that account.

Mr. MANION: It was merely a return chastisement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. There was a good deal said in the preliminary part of my hon. friend's remarks. Perhaps the house would be interested in hearing them as they bear upon his request of last night. They will be found in Hansard, page 1617:

Here is a list of matters called public business dealt with so far this session; let us see how important they are. There was of course the speech from the throne. Then, supply. Supply comes in as a sort of filler-in; it is one of the measures brought in when we have not anything else to proceed with. When the government runs out of its regular business it brings on supply. While the estimates are in a sense public business, they are not important enough or urgent enough to have everything else sidetracked in order that they may be dealt with.

Now, I wonder what my hon. friend would say to me if, after having had this advice, I were instead of going on with other important legislation, to proceed with supply.

Mr. MANION: The government has been proceeding with it on Thursdays and Fridays.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I do not think we have. I believe that, if my hon. friend looks over the records, he will see that unfortunately we have taken up very little supply on either Thursdays or Fridays. We have been trying to get on with the other measures which, as my hon. friend the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) mentioned last evening, we were anxious to get over to the other house as soon as possible. In the latter part of his remarks my hon. friend made special mention of the two measures which we spoke of proceeding with to-day and which were announced last night by the Minister of Mines and Resources as the ones intended for to-day. I quote from page 1624 of Hansard:

> Mr. Manion: We have been dealing with the trade treaty, but the right hon. gentleman has been shelving it for other measures. We have been led to understand since the house opened that they were about to bring in a measure for a defence purchasing board. Why have they not brought it on?

We are now trying to proceed as rapidly as we can with the trade agreement. We are also trying to proceed as rapidly as we can with the defence purchasing board bill. Those are the two measures which, we feel, ought to be given priority over all others, and they are the two which the leader of the opposition suggested should come on, because of their importance, before other measures. I should like to oblige my hon. friend in every way I can, but I would say this. From the beginning of the session the government has tried to get on with the public business, with the measures which we regarded as the most important. A great deal of time was taken up in the debate on the address and on other resolutions which were moved, but these two measures I have just mentioned are ones which we could not proceed with on that account and are anxious therefore now to proceed with as rapidly as possible. I think that if we are to have due regard to public business and the rapidity with which it is to be carried on, we should continue with those measures.

May I point out to hon. members, what I believe is well known to them but which perhaps requires emphasis at the moment, that a motion to go into committee of supply means, as my hon. friend has indicated, that in all probability the opposition will then introduce an amendment in the nature of a want of confidence motion, which may occasion debate and which may run on in this house for a week or longer. If that is what the government is to expect, there is all the more reason why, before legislation which we regard as important is again held up because of other matters which the opposition wish to discuss, we should get on with the measures to which the government attaches particular importance. I hope that we shall make sufficient progress this week with the legislation which is on the order paper in the nature of resolutions and bills which we wish to get across to the other house, to enable us to call for supply at a comparatively early date; but I say to my hon. friend that if we are to get on with the important measures we must take first those which for the present we regard as the most important, and take up somewhat later the matters which we think can be better dealt with at a later stage.

I should perhaps also remind the house of what the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) said to us, speaking on Wednesday, February 14, with regard to the government controlling the business of the house. His remarks will be found at page 918 of Hansard:

> Control of the house is always in the hands of the government, and from my recollection that was never more so than it is to-day, having regard to the government's huge majority.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, let us get on with the business.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what I want to do, and that is why I am explaining to the house why the government thinks it would be preferable to take up legislation which is on the order paper in the nature of bills and resolutions before we move to go into committee of supply, because once we move to go into committee of supply we know that a debate may be provoked in this house which may occupy an indefinite number of days.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to say just a word with regard to the remarks of the right hon. gentleman. The reason I mentioned this matter last night was that it has been the custom of all governments once in a while to move to go into supply on Mondays and Tuesdays, to give to any private member the right to take up some subject in connection with which he thinks redress is required. There was no intention, may I say, on the part of our party of taking up more than perhaps part of a day in discussing the question. However, so far as I am concerned the right hon. gentleman can bring it on when he wishes. I am not going to worry about that any further. I merely suggested it because it looked to me, and it does yet, as though the government were dodging the question of moving into supply. I am not going to argue any more about it. The government can do as it wishes.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has a very clever habit of picking out some little slip of the tongue and harping on it, referring to it over and over again. That is what he did when he picked out the remark I made about supply. I simply meant this, and we all know it to be true, that when this government or any other government run out of business, they swing over to the estimates of some department. There is no particular hurry about them. They are not particularly helpful to anything; they are merely fillers-in. That is what I meant, and I stick to it. When governments have no other legislation ready, they move over into estimates, perhaps public works or agriculture—agriculture by preference on Friday, for example. We know that that is so, and that is all I referred to. The Prime Minister keeps on harping on the fact that I said "supply." Everyone knows that the government has to get supply, but what I meant was that governments constantly move into estimates when they have nothing else to move into.

With regard to the defence purchasing board, I quite agree we should get on with that. I certainly had no desire to delay the government's business at this time, and as regards the attitude which the right hon. gentleman has taken to-day, I repeat what I have said on a number of occasions. We have done nothing on this side of the house to hold up the business of the government. The questions that have been debated have been of the utmost interest. Certainly none will assert that important questions were not brought up in the debate on the address, and I submit that the Bren gun question was of the utmost importance, so much so that a good many of the details in connection with the defence purchasing board are, I contend, the result of the Bren gun investigation. Again, the trade treaty is public business; no one will deny that. I say, therefore, that we have not been holding up public business in any manner. However, whatever the right hon. gentleman desires will suit me.

As regards a vote of want of confidence, that was not our desire. One of our members did wish to bring up a certain question because he is of the opinion, and I agree with him, that it is of the utmost importance. With a view to expediting public business, I would suggest that instead of a want of confidence motion, after we have disposed of the defence purchasing board, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) might bring on his resolutions with respect to youth training and unemployment, and on that motion the remarks which the hon. member on this side wishes to submit to the house might then be made. That would suit us and it would not delay matters, because the subject is one that will be discussed in any event. After we have got through discussing the defence purchasing board, the Minister of Labour, I suggest, might take up the resolutions with respect to youth training and unemployment and the other question could then be discussed. I am not asking for favours; I wish to have that distinctly understood. I neither ask for them nor am I particularly anxious to give them. My right hon. friend can do just as he likes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In order to keep the record straight, I might point out that no mention was made last night of the resolutions of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), but since my hon. friend has suggested that they might be taken up at an early day, I will say now that we shall take them up to-morrow the first thing.

Mr. MANION: Suppose we are not through with the discussion of the defence purchasing board? My right hon. friend was so anxious to have it disposed of that I should like to see it done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was going to say—my hon. friend rather threw me off the track by saying we might go on to-day after concluding with the defence purchasing board bill—that we would go on with the resolutions if we got through with the defence purchasing board. He led me to assume the other measure would be through to-day.

Mr. MANION: Sometimes I should like to throw the right hon. gentleman off the track.

PACIFIC OCEAN DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO CANADA'S PARTICIPATION IN CONFERENCE TO BE HELD IN NEW ZEALAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister? A dispatch from London, dated March 12, and published in the Ottawa newspapers yesterday, contains an announcement by the Dominions Office that there is to be a conference on Pacific ocean defence questions, to be held at Wellington, New Zealand, at which there will be representatives from the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand. In view of the fact that Canada has serious defence problems on the Pacific ocean, will it be possible for Canadian representatives to be sent to this conference?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The government of Canada has not received any communications from any governments with respect to this particular conference. I think the reason is clear. The conference to which my hon. friend has made reference is one which is being held with respect to matters affecting the southern Pacific, and evidently the governments immediately concerned have not thought it advisable to invite the Canadian government to send any representatives. Until we are invited it would be as wise for us not to accept.

ROYAL VISIT

QUESTION OF PROROGATION OR ADJOURNMENT OF SESSION—FUNCTIONS TO BE ATTENDED BY MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Inasmuch as requests are coming in for certain members of parliament to be in their home cities at the time of their majesties' visit, will the Prime Minister tell us where he expects members to be during that time?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I do not know that I can answer my hon. friend's question exactly in the form in which he has put it, but as I understand the essence of it he wishes to know whether parliament will have prorogued or will be adjourning over the period of their majesties' visit to Canada, or whether we shall continue to sit here while their majesties are in this country.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And whether there will be in Ottawa any functions which members will be expected to attend.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe I made it clear at the beginning of the session that the government is most anxious that the fact that their majesties are coming to Canada shall not in any way interfere with the business of this house—that the visit shall not be permitted in any way to be used as a means of influencing hon. members with respect to the length of time parliament is to sit. I therefore indicated at the time that if parliament was not ready to prorogue when their majesties came to Canada, we would adjourn over the period of their majesties' stay in the dominion. Since then, there has come to me from different sources, from members in different parts of the house, an intimation that, if we are not through at that time, hon. members probably would prefer to continue sitting during the time of their majesties' stay in the country, with a very short adjournment for the period of time in which their majesties will be in this city. There seems to be a considerable body of opinion in favour of that—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —even from the intimations that have come while I have been speaking. I do not think that any decision should be reached on this point until we see how we get along with the business between now and the time when their majesties are expected to arrive. By Easter we may have a general idea of the amount of business that remains, we shall see by then what progress has been made. I would say at once, however, that when it comes to making a decision on the point, an effort will be made, with respect to whatever conclusion we arrive at, to have it in accordance with what appears to be the consensus of view of hon. members.

As regards the period of their majesties' visit to Ottawa, every effort will be made to have matters so arranged that hon. members of both houses of parliament will be able to attend all functions that may arise in connection with that visit, with regard, of course, to what may be customary with respect to a state dinner at government house. But I may say at once that the government intend to have a parliamentary dinner when their majesties are here, which will be confined to members of both houses of parliament, so that there will be opportunity for all hon. members to be presented to their majesties, accompanied, if they are fortunate enough to have them, either by their respective wives or by an unmarried daughter.

With regard to other functions, the unveiling of the national war memorial, the laying of the cornerstone of the supreme court building, the trooping of the colour on parliament hill, all these functions will be so arranged as to make special provision for the probable attendance of members of the House of Commons and the Senate.

Perhaps this would be a good occasion on which to intimate to the house what his majesty has graciously signified his willingness to do in the event of parliament having concluded its business at the time of his arrival in Canada. Should parliament have concluded its business and be prepared to prorogue, his majesty has graciously signified his willingness to prorogue parliament himself. Lest this consent on his majesty's part might be construed as an indirect way of exerting pressure on hon. members to hasten the conclusion of the session, I have asked His Majesty the King through His Excellency the Governor General whether in the event of our not having concluded our business by that time we might not have the great privilege of having his majesty assent to one or two bills which might be held for that purpose, so that hon. members could participate in a function in which the king along with members of both houses of parliament would be taking part in these buildings. I am pleased to announce that his majesty has graciously signified his willingness to give the royal assent to any bills which may be held for that purpose, so as to ensure that there will be at least one function within the walls of these houses of parliament at which the king and members of both houses of parliament will be present.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CREATION OF DEFENCE PURCHASING BOARD TO ENTER INTO CONTRACTS FOR MUNITIONS, EQUIPMENT, MATERIALS AND SUPPLIES

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of Bill No. 38, to establish a defence purchasing board.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I have just listened to the statement of my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King), that his majesty may during his visit in Ottawa give his assent to a few bills passed by parliament. Of course such bills should be good legislation. I wonder if this bill is good legislation?

The other day I adjured my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) not to proceed with the resolution upon which this bill is based. Now of course we have to study the bill. There are two things to consider about this piece of legislation. In the first place it is the work of the interdepartmental committee which was headed by Doctor Skelton of the Department of External Affairs. So much for the past. What is to happen in the future? This is a transfer of power from the Department of National Defence to the Department of Finance. What was said last Friday on the resolution preceding the bill has been questioned by the press. A paper which I mentioned yesterday said that my attack upon a public official who is in no position to answer back illustrates the quality of Mr. Pouliot's sportsmanship and of his courage. I want every hon. member of the house to read the evidence as contained in the official files kept in the office of the clerk of sessional papers of this house, referred to in Hansard of February 13. It is the evidence given by the judge advocate general before the Bren gun commission. It was only on that day, at the thirty-second sitting of the commission, that Judge Davis realized what was the trouble in the whole Bren gun business. Every hon. member who takes the trouble to read that evidence will want then to read the complete evidence which is downstairs, assimilate it and be guided by it. Hon. members will understand that there is in the Department of National Defence as judge advocate general a man who is not competent. He is not here, of course; if he were here he could not act as judge advocate general.

There is nothing I find so silly as to say that here we attack a civil servant, and that we attack a civil servant who is not here. If any one of us talks with his wife about the roast beef which has been burnt by the cook, it is not necessary for the cook to be present at the conversation. If you say that your boots have not been well shined by your servant, it is not necessary for the bootblack to be present at the conversation. If you say to your wife or your friend that your butler has stolen your whisky, it is not necessary for the butler to be there to hear of it; and they are not supposed to listen through keyholes. We are here to decide upon our own business, the business of governing—not to attack or to criticize anyone, but to pass judgment upon what is wrong and praise what we think is right. There is no lack of courage in saying that. There is courage in not being afraid of blackmail of that sort. What has been written by that paper is just pure blackmail, trying to frighten members of parliament. Moreover they were bold enough to make suggestions to the Prime Minister and other members of this house to stop free discussion in this house. Will there ever be a padlock law applied to this house? That very paper protested against the Quebec padlock law, but now they want every hon. member of parliament to be tongue-cuffed. That as to courage.

I want to say something about the progressive and nefarious influence of some high-posted civil servants, who probably do not mean badly but who are intriguers of the worst kind and who try to serve their own interests or the interests of those who are close to them rather than the interests of the state.

In the first place we will see to what extent some friends will act together. Some years ago, in 1924, there were two professors of the faculty of arts of Queen's university, in the political and economic science branch. They were in active service. One was Doctor Skelton and the other Doctor W. C. Clark. The former is now under secretary of state for external affairs; the latter is now deputy minister of finance. I have in my hand a most interesting book, the Canadian Parliamentary Guide for 1939, which contains some autobiographies. In one of these, it is interesting to note, there is a gap covering seven or eight years; that is, the autobiography of Doctor Clark. If you will look at page 672, sir, you will see—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not think the hon. member is quite in order. The motion before the house is for the second reading of Bill No. 38, concerning the establishment of a defence purchasing board. I think the discussion should be confined to the advisability of establishing such a board.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Apart from that, Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend will agree that I am the last person in this house who would wish to curtail in any way his freedom of discussion; but I do feel that, as leader of the House of Commons, it is part of my duty to see that members of the public service, who are not in a position to speak for themselves during the course of debates which take place in this house, should be protected against any remarks in the nature of a reflection upon themselves, or references to their personal history such as the hon. member I gather was about to make. It must be obvious that members of the public service have to look to the administration for protection in the discharge of their duties; and if deputy ministers or leading public officials or any members of the public service are to be attacked here, in justice to them they should have the right to make reply on their own behalf from wherever they may happen to be. If that method were to be adopted with regard to the conduct of our public affairs I am afraid the public service of the country could not be carried on in the manner in which the country has a right to expect it will be carried on.

I hope my hon. friend will see that in discussing the matters he is dealing with at the present time, it is not necessary for him to bring in personal matters which really have no bearing on the question before the house.

Mr. POULIOT: I will not insist further on that point, Mr. Speaker, but in due course I will obtain that information by means of questions placed on the order paper, and I shall be satisfied if I receive complete answers to those questions.

What I want my chief to understand, however, is that I have no personal grievance against Doctor Skelton, Doctor Clark or any other man in the service. What I am very much concerned about is the fact that daily the high officials of the civil service are acquiring greater importance at the expense of the government. This is a matter of great concern to me, because these men are responsible to no one. Many times when a minister wants to get some information from these officials—and I am not referring to these two in particular—they think they are superior individuals. They feel that members of the House of Commons count for nothing, though we are here, working daily, meeting people in all walks of life and trying to do our best for them. We need the civil service to help us in our work. That is my humble contention, and I am sure my chief agrees with me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In order to make my position quite clear may I say that my hon. friend would be quite justified in attacking me or in attacking the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) with respect to any official within our departments who may not be performing his duties as he should. But we are the persons to be attacked; we are the responsible ministers, and the same would apply to the ministers of the other departments. My hon. friend is quite within his rights in bringing to the attention of the house anything at all in connection with the attitude of individual public servants; and, speaking for myself, if officials of any department with which I have to do are assuming attitudes which they should not assume towards members of the House of Commons or the Senate, I will be the first to speak to them about it. But I would say, knowing him as I do, that Doctor Skelton is the last man in the world who would seek for a moment to be other than wholly deferential to all hon. members of the house, and I believe the same is equally true of Doctor Clark.

Mr. POULIOT: I agree to a certain extent with what my right hon. leader has said. I should like him to understand that I have no vengeance to satisfy. I am much above that. What I endeavour to do, at times, is simply to enlighten the government as to what is going on, for their own good. Of course according to parliamentary practice a minister is responsible for everything that is done by those under his control; but with the new system of things—and this defence board is part of that system—I feel that the ministers will have less and less authority over the civil service.

My understanding of government is the understanding which was held by my great grandfather and my grandfather, who were also privates in the great Liberal army. It is that a member of parliament is entitled to all information concerning the expenditure of public money and that the minister who is in charge of a department is responsible for everything that is done by his department.

What I regret, sir, is that to-day there is a strong tendency to lean upon the shoulders of somebody else; it is still the old story, "My little brother broke the glass." No one is responsible for anything. When any member of parliament writes to a department for information he is almost always told that he has come to the wrong door. In fact, for your information, Mr. Speaker, as well as that of my right hon. leader and all other hon. members of the house, I would say that out of the sixty letters I have to write daily for my constituents at least half if not two-thirds are due either to the silliness, the stubborness or the great importance of some officials of the civil service. So, instead of having the leisure to read some public papers which I must read I have to waste my time dictating useless letters because those to whom I have written did not give satisfactory answers in connection with very ordinary routine matters.

It is not my pleasure to rise to-day and to address the house on this bill. I do not do it for pleasure. I do not do it as a matter of entertainment; in fact I realize that my speech is very dull. I do it from a sense of duty and, in the best possible spirit and as a good Liberal, I give warning to the government. I want the principle of ministerial responsibility reestablished as it was at the time of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as it was at the time of Blake, Baldwin, Lafontaine, Cartier and all the others. Those people may have made mistakes, but they were true imitators of the British parliamentary system.

Of course, I cannot understand a department which is not complete, like the human body. The Department of National Defence is one which requires quick action. At its head there is a minister. Then there is one deputy minister, and other branches of the department operate under each of the head officials. If this bill is adopted the Department of National Defence will be like a body deprived of its arms. It will have no ammunition, unless there is agreement by the Department of Finance. Who are the experts in armoury and gun making in the Department of Finance?

Mr. DUNNING: None.

Mr. POULIOT: Well now, that is a direct and timely answer. The experts in gunnery and armoury shall be left with the Department of National Defence. By exception we have two experts in the House of Commons—only two. There is the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. McAvity) who was on the imperial munitions board, and the hon. member for Huron, who made munitions during the war. In addition to that, none of us knows anything about the making of munitions. The Minister of Finance has just said there is no one in his department who is expert in such matters. Well now, what will happen when there is an order or a requisition for a certain quantity of munitions, in a contract exceeding $5,000? The Minister of National Defence will have no authority to decide upon it. He may receive requisitions from Great Britain or from some other country, and those requisitions will be sent to the Department of Finance.

Then, we will have a board composed of four people—and this is in accordance with the report of Mr. Justice Davis. Who will those four men be? One will be a capable and experienced corporation lawyer, a commerical lawyer who has had wide practice in dealing with large commercial contracts. You know, sir, that most of the trouble experienced by this country in regard to watered stock has been due to corporation lawyers. As a rule, corporation lawyers are a failure at politics, and no one has experienced that more than the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), who is a distinguished medical doctor. There is no need for any corporation lawyer on that board. In fact, if somebody requires information about the solvency of a company which has sent a tender on a piece of ammunition he has only to subscribe to Dun's. It will cost $25 per annum, and he will receive all possible information concerning solvency of any company. If the Minister of Finance wishes to be more economical, he may ask the Bank of Canada to supply information concerning the solvency of any company which sends in a tender. Therefore there is no need for a commercial lawyer who has had a wide practice in dealing with large commercial contracts. And here is the point: It is just because the one who is now judge advocate general has had no experience at all in commercial contracts that one is required on the board.

Then the second suggestion is that there shall be a representative of labour. That is a farce, because the Department of Finance has no authority to prescribe hours of labour. You know, sir, the fate of the social legislation enacted by the House of Commons, but which was declared ultra vires by the privy council. There is no possibility of using the services of any representative of labour in connection with those contracts. We have no authority to do that. Unless the constitution is changed, the government can do nothing, except give a fat job or sinecure to a parasite of some kind.

And now we come to the capable and experienced manufacturer. This is dangerous, because such capable and experienced manufacturer must have some friends to protect underneath. I find that provision most dangerous.

Then there is mention of a chartered accountant, under the Minister of Finance. This is what I have preached in the house: Instead of having accountants from the Department of Finance the Minister of National Defence should have his own chartered accountants. If we look at the British publication which shows the personnel of the British war office, the British admiralty, the air department and the department for the coordination of defence, we see the number of chartered accountants who are appointed to look after the expenditures of each department. But here all the accountants of all departments are in the Department of Finance. This is another most dangerous step. Officials of the various departments are all intermingled. We have the example of the Minister of Finance being the head of the accountants in all departments. There is not a single accountant in the civil service who is not under the Minister of Finance. With a few exceptions, the legal advisory counsel of various departments are under the Minister of Justice. You have also a lawyer like the chief advocate general of the department of pensions, who is not a lawyer at all, and whose only qualification was to study medicine for one year. Then there are the translators, who are mostly under the Secretary of State, although they are scattered amongst various departments. I am against that, Mr. Speaker. There is no more hierarchy; there is no order in the departments. The minister cannot give definite instructions to any one of these men who are amongst his employees because they are under another minister and to reach them he has to communicate with that other minister, one of his colleagues. I am strongly opposed to that in principle.

There is another thing which also causes me the deepest concern. It is that all that intermingling, if I may call it that, is an arrangement to allow various officials to be entirely free to do just as they please under the authority of no one. The further away the authority is, the lesser in degree, in my humble view. I have studied many files and what I notice—and I wish to bring this to the attention of my right hon. leader and his colleagues—is the easy way in which several high officials try to evade all authority and all responsibility. That may not always be noticed, of course, but it is a very dangerous practice. My right hon. leader knows that if there is communism in Russia to-day it is due entirely to the extravagance of bureaucracy; and in Germany and Italy the members of their bureaucracy were so powerful as to cause the destruction of democracy in those countries. Their influence was not always apparent. They were like termites, which were undermining the pillars of state. To-day there is no more democracy in Russia, there is no more democracy in Italy, there is no more democracy in Germany; and here in Canada we are on the eve of having a dictatorship of bureaucracy. We should see the connection between the editorial staff, the whole staff of the Ottawa Journal, and the staff of the civil service commission, to understand what is behind the insults of which I have been the victim. I do not pose as a martyr, because I do not care what is said about me in praise or blame. I try to do my duty. In fact, Mr. Speaker, ever since I have been in politics I have been called so many names as to exhaust the richest vocabulary, and what can be said of me now can be only a repetition. Therefore I am indifferent to abuse. But what I regret is that some people do not see what is behind this. If order is not restored in the civil service we shall run the risk of falling down as other countries have done where bureaucracy was not checked.

Of course, it is always unpleasant to say something of anyone which is not a compliment; it is not a pleasure, but duty must come before sentimentality. Moreover there is the popular side to consider. People are thinking more deeply now than they ever did before, and they are very much concerned about these special privileges that are granted to the very few.

A man cannot be judged by his salary. Here we receive an indemnity of $4,000. Of that, all of us may pay perhaps $1,000 for insurance, give away $1,500 for gifts in our constituencies, and for travelling expenses, and what is left? Very little. There is $1,500 to live on, and we have to run into debt. We are not considered important because we receive a very small indemnity. But if the members of the House of Commons were receiving as much as the two officials whom I mentioned at the beginning of my speech, we should all be great men because our incomes would be much higher. That may seem stupid, but it is the view of many people. In the civil service, however, when a man has reached his maximum salary he is considered a genius, even if he was dumb when he was earning but little at the start.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have already called the hon. member's attention to the fact that he was wandering away from the question before the house, and I must again remind him that he is not in order in continuing to discuss the affairs of the civil service on this motion.

Mr. POULIOT: Sir, I shall not persist, but the reason I was doing so was that this bill makes mention of a new body to be created in the service, and in my view we have enough civil servants now—more than enough if they were all competent. In conclusion, sir, I say that if the incompetent ones were replaced by competent ones there would be no need for this new board.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to discuss not the civil service but this bill, one of the most important measures which has been placed before this parliament since it assembled in 1936. The bill in my opinion adopts and commits parliament and the country to a most momentous policy. We are asked by this measure to concur in the principle of the private manufacture of arms. To this principle a very large section of the Canadian people are very thoroughly opposed; and before the house is even asked to adopt the principle laid down by the bill, every opportunity should be given for careful consideration of its provisions.

The resolution foreshadowing this bill was placed on the order paper on January 25. The minister discussed the resolution last Friday, March 10, and the bill was distributed in the usual way to the members on Saturday last. From what I have been able to see of this bill, and because many of the members have been otherwise engaged since the bill was distributed, I submit that hon. members have had insufficient time to go into its details.

The group with which I am associated regrets that the government has felt it necessary to abandon the policy of the manufacture of armaments in publicly-owned plants.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is not correct.

Mr. COLDWELL: I heard the interruption, "That is not correct." Having read carefully the minister's speech and having noted that, for example, the minister placed on the record the minority rather than the majority report of the committee of the United States senate which reported upon the public manufacture of armaments—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Both.

Mr. COLDWELL: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Oh, yes. May I interrupt my hon. friend—

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, I have read the minister's speech.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I distinctly said that the majority report was for the extension of government manufacture.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have read the minister's speech, and all I can find is a very brief reference to the fact that he has just stated. However, that is beside the point. Suffice it to say that the bill itself, as I shall endeavour to show in a few minutes, emphasizes the private rather than the public manufacture of arms, and the purchase from private manufacturers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I interrupt my hon. friend again? As reported at page 1757 of Hansard, I said:

> The majority report was for the extension of the principle of nationalization.

Mr. COLDWELL: As I say, the minister did mention it, but the minister placed on record substantially the minority report, favouring private manufacture, making only a brief reference to the much more important report of the majority of that committee.

In my opinion the bill as presented to this house does not give adequate control of profits incidental to the private manufacture of arms. It deals only, for example, with contractors selected without competitive bids. In support of that statement I direct attention to the explanatory notes which are printed opposite page 2 of the bill, where I read:

> Net profits on contracts awarded by the board—

That is, the board named in this bill.

> —without competitive tender, and subcontracts in connection therewith, are to be limited to five percentum per annum on the average capital employed or to be employed in the performance of the contract. Effect is to be given to this provision by the levy of a tax equal to the amount by which profits exceed the maximum of five per centum per annum on the average capital employed.

And may I again emphasize this:

> Net profits on contracts awarded by the board without competitive tender. . . .

Then, if we turn to section 7, page 6 of the bill, subsection 9, we find these words:

> For the purposes of this section the word "contract" shall include contracts entered into under the authority of this party and subcontracts in connection therewith, but shall not include (a) contracts awarded as a result of competitive tender or subcontracts in connection therewith, and (b) contracts or subcontracts to the extent that such contracts or subcontracts are performed outside of Canada.

Then if we turn back to section 4, subsection 4, on page 3, we find this:

> In respect of all contracts, the board shall, wherever practicable, invite tenders either by means of advertisements in the public press or otherwise.

"Where practicable" tenders shall be invited. In other words, and primarily, the bill contemplates the calling of tenders for the making of arms; and contracts entered into by tender, according to the section I read immediately before this one, are not, so far as the five per centum profits go, under the control of the board. In the minister's speech on Friday last he made the statement that in the past few years this government had awarded by tender some sixty per cent, I think it was, of the contracts, and forty per cent by the other method.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is where bidding was available.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think I have confirmed the statement I have just made, that if that proportion is maintained—perhaps it will not be, but if it is—some sixty per cent of the contracts so awarded would not come under the provisions of this bill. I notice that the minister nods his head in approval of that statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, all these would come under some of the provisions of the bill. They would not come under the taxation provisions of the bill.

Mr. COLDWELL: Exactly. They all come under some provisions of the bill; but the point I am just making is this, that we object to the making of profits out of what we regard, rightly or wrongly—we are all entitled to our opinions—as in a measure blood money. We say, and I think the minister agrees, that as far as the limitation of profit is concerned under this bill, the companies to which I have referred do not come under all, but only that part of them which do not secure contracts by competitive tender. We say that the whole of them should be controlled.

The limitation of profits in this bill is also somewhat obscure. If we turn to section 7, subsection 1, at page 4, we find these words:

The maximum net profit—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but at the present time the house is not in committee. I would prefer that he confine his remarks to a discussion of the principle of the bill, and defer the discussion of particular sections until the house is in committee of the whole on the second reading. It is the principle of the bill which should now be considered.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I always try to abide by the rules of the house and to accept a ruling without question. But at the moment I am engaged in discussing the principle of this bill, and I find it very difficult indeed to discuss the principle without referring to some of the clauses. Of course if your ruling is that I must not do so, I shall abide by your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to confine himself as much as possible to a discussion of the principle of the bill. He might quote some of the clauses of the bill to draw attention to what the bill appears to him to be, but he should not at this time go into a discussion of the bill clause by clause.

Mr. COLDWELL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I will endeavour to abide closely by the rules. With your permission I must refer from time to time to some of the phraseology of the bill. If, then, we may just look at section 7, subsection 1 we shall see the principle involved:

> The maximum net profit received by any person in respect of any contract to which this section applies shall be limited to an amount equal to five per centum per annum on the average amount of capital of such person employed in the performance of the contract.

And a little further on we have this:

> . . . shall be based upon the actual cost (less depreciation at a rate deemed reasonable by the board) of the physical assets including plant, machinery, equipment and working capital. . . .

I am anxious to find out when we get into committee just what the term "working capital" involves, because upon its definition, I take it, a great deal will depend in relation to the limitation of profits under this bill. Of course if it includes capital used in the purchase of material and in the employment of labour, the definition would indeed be very wide, and the real profit, therefore, increased substantially. I submit, therefore, that the first part of the bill does not satisfy that large body of public opinion which demands the elimination of private profit in the manufacture of arms, or even the substantial curtailment of private profit in that manufacture.

So far as we in this group are concerned, my hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) and others of the group have moved on occasion the point of view we hold, which is that in the manufacture of munitions and war materials private profit should be eliminated, and for this purpose the industry should be brought under public control. That does not mean that one would expect those engaged in the industry to render services to the nation without recompense, but it does mean that at least the element of private profit should be eliminated. Therefore, in any bill which is brought before this house dealing with this particular matter, not forty per cent but one hundred per cent of those supplying munitions and arms to the Dominion of Canada should be brought under the control of parliament in relation to profits that are made; if they are allowed at all.

Turning to part II of the bill, we object to the manner in which the bill has been presented. The bill should have been divided into two—there should have been two bills—because it deals with two different things. The first part of the bill quite clearly deals with the purchase of armaments, which in my opinion ought to be considered apart from the financing of capital expenditures under the Department of National Defence. I submit to the minister that we may find ourselves in this position, that while we may agree with one principle of the bill we may be in direct conflict with another principle of it. It is therefore unfortunate that it has been brought down in this particular form. It would have been more satisfactory to the house and particularly to our group had it been brought down in two bills instead of one.

I am not a lawyer and therefore may not understand the import of section 17 of part II of the bill, and until some explanation is given I would hesitate to vote for it. A good many members of the house are uncertain what the clause means. Perhaps it can be explained later before we are asked to vote upon it.

While we welcome the suggestion of a defence purchasing board as a method of meeting a given situation, we should have been better pleased had the government contemplated wider public manufacture of munitions. I realize, of course, as I believe most members do, that the manufacture of all that is required would not be possible, but at this moment a greater measure of control over private manufacture ought to have been instituted in a bill of this sort.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): A few remarks which the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) made in this chamber last week, when he introduced the resolution on this subject, prompt me to rise on this occasion to say a few words on the question of a defence purchasing board.

In the first place I asked the minister what was to become of the interdepartmental committee which has been functioning for so many months. When I put that question to him, as usual with him, he spoke of the magnificent work which the committee had done while it was in existence and said that if I carefully perused the bill when it was introduced I would ascertain what was to become of the committee. I have casually gone through the bill, and if I understand anything of what it proposes it seems to me that in one way the interdepartmental committee goes out of business while in another respect it is resurrected.

I have no objection to what has been done in that respect, but if the interdepartmental committee had done such splendid work while it was functioning I do not see why it should go out of existence. Personally I believe that those who comprised the committee were all men of excellent character and great ability, and I feel that the persons who will be appointed to the new defence purchasing board will in their own way be no better men than those who until now have been functioning in that particular regard. If that is so, I wonder why we have this bill at all. As I say, in one way we are doing away with the interdepartmental committee, and in another way we are resurrecting it. In the measure itself we find that before a contract is finally approved, the Minister of National Defence makes a requisition to the proposed board, then it goes through the Department of Finance, then it is approved by the governor in council. I think that is a cumbersome way of doing government business. I may be alone in that assertion, but I have more confidence in existing departmental officials than to believe that it should be necessary for a contract to go through three departments before being finally approved of. Is there any other contract of more than $5,000 which has to go through the same routine as is proposed here? If there is I should like to know what department deals with contracts in such a manner.

When the minister spoke on Friday last he paid this group indirectly a very fine compliment. He did not intend it, and that is why I say it was indirect. In his lengthy speech he paid more attention to the seven members of this group than he did to the duties which the new defence purchasing board is expected to perform. He spent more time in trying to point out the fallacies of the things we stand for than he did in discussing the purpose of the resolution. If there was one thing which he tried to impress upon the house it was the fact that, unless there were some incentive, people who might make munitions could not be expected to engage in the successful production of armaments.

Mr. HOWARD: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEAPS: There is at least one hon. member who agrees with that. The Minister of National Defence is a very able lawyer.

If I wanted a lawyer to defend me I would go a long way in an effort to secure the services of the hon. gentleman, because after hearing his fervid oratory—when he is in his ordinary mood and is not over-excited—I believe there is hardly a jury whom he could not convince. Consequently I would go to considerable lengths to secure the services of so able a lawyer.

Mr. DUNNING: It is better not to need one.

Mr. HEAPS: I am sure if he were practising law in his own city he would build up a practice which would yield him many times the $4,000 a year which as a private member he would receive in Ottawa. I wonder what it was that moved the Minister of National Defence to come to this chamber at $4,000 a year, less the expenses he has to meet, when he could have earned so much more in his own city.

Mr. FINN: Love of country.

Mr. HEAPS: I wonder if the minister would tell us what it was.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Faith, I suppose.

Mr. HEAPS: Well, to a certain extent his faith has been rewarded. But I am still wondering what it was that prompted the minister to come and sit in this parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think it is true that every hon. member of this house is here because he wished to serve the public interest.

Mr. HEAPS: I am glad to have that statement from the minister. He prefers serving the public interest to seeking monetary reward. That is what I am getting at. If the minister and other hon. members of this house can serve the people of this country without the urge of monetary reward, why cannot the manufacturer of munitions be on the same basis? That is all I am asking. The minister says it requires the incentive of monetary gain; I believe that munitions can be produced without the incentive of monetary reward, just as so many hon. members of this house are prepared to give their services in the interest of Canada.

Further I believe that once you open the door to profit-making in the manufacture of munitions, the profit cannot be limited to five per cent, no matter how many audits are made of the books. I think it has been proved over and over again that these limitations do not limit. I would far rather see the government itself go into the production of munitions as far as practicable. I am satisfied the government could do it on an efficient basis, just as the Ontario government runs its hydro, the city of Toronto its street railway system, or the city of Winnipeg its hydro. There is in this country to-day wherever you go a growing feeling of hostility to the making of profits out of armaments and munitions. When men are asked to serve in the military forces for $1.10 a day it is not a question of profit as far as they are concerned; it is a question of duty to their country. In the same way we should expect men to serve their country in time of need by producing munitions without profit.

I notice that the bill provides for the appointment of one paid officer, the chairman, and three others who will be given their out of pocket expenses and a per diem allowance. I am wondering what incentive there is to those three men to give their best services on this board. As to who is to comprise the board, I have just as much faith in the officials of the government who are in a way directly responsible to parliament as I have in any persons who may be put on the board. I believe that in many respects this bill will not achieve the purposes for which it is intended. All it will do is create another department of government. I do not know where there are any greater experts outside than we have inside the service. Past experience with boards of this kind has not shown them to be very successful. All I hope is that if the bill goes through in its present form, at least there will be appointed to this board men of such a calibre as to merit the confidence of this house and the country.

Under the provisions of the bill now before us the functions of the board will not be very important, because once they have rendered a decision on certain contracts, those contracts will still come under the jurisdiction of the permanent officials of the Department of National Defence and the Department of Finance, and their decisions will ultimately have to be approved by the governor in council. That seems a cumbersome way of doing business. I would prefer to see a simpler method of awarding government contracts, a method under which those who award them will be directly responsible to this house.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to say only a few words at the present stage; I shall reserve any detailed suggestions until the bill is in committee. Unfortunately the demands on the time of all hon. members are such that we have not as much opportunity as we should like to study questions of this kind. However I have read the bill a few times, and I have read over again the speech of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). As other hon. members have emphasized, I believe the bill is one of very great importance; I cannot think of any subject before the people of Canada to-day which is of more importance than the proper handling of the money that is to be spent in huge amounts by the Department of National Defence.

I want to refer briefly to one or two remarks made by the minister in regard to selected lists of contractors under past governments. In the first place, of course, I know nothing about this; I accept the statement of the minister in regard to the number of contracts let to those on selected lists. I had nothing to do with that department; I had my own troubles in the department of which I was the head, and had little time to follow the doings of other departments. At the same time I remind hon. members that during the time the Bennett government was in power we did go through a world depression, and an attempt was made at that time to allocate contracts of various kinds in such a manner as to relieve unemployment in various parts of this country. I also agree that possibly the use of selected lists may at times be the best way to deal with contracts. I do not wish to go into that question at length.

There is this also to remember: that in that period the whole world was hoping for peace, as unfortunately we cannot do with such confidence now. The German dictator had not come to the zenith of his power as he has recently. We all remember how Great Britain refrained from rearming, as many now think she should have done. We in Canada were in the same position. I made it my business to look up the amounts expended on armaments by Canada in the last ten years. I find that for the five years we were in power the total estimates of the Department of National Defence for defence purposes amounted to some $75,000,000. This year alone an expenditure of $63,000,000 is proposed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I believe that includes some amounts for unemployment relief.

Mr. MANION: Probably it does, but that amount is almost equal to the total for the five years during which the Bennett government was in power. For the past two years the figure was $70,000,000, just about equal to the total amount spent during the five years of the Bennett government. I am not giving these figures in any spirit of criticism; I believe that with present world conditions we must be prepared to defend ourselves. As I said during the debate on the address Canada cannot sit back and depend upon other countries, however friendly they may be, to defend us if we are in trouble. Because of this huge expenditure, however, it seems to me all the more necessary that we should do everything in our power to avoid the errors of the past, if errors were made, as no doubt they were. I have never questioned the statement that errors were made during the war, though I have never checked up to see if that was so; and I presume such errors were serious. All the more reason, therefore, that at this time, when thank God the world is not at war, we should be very careful so to spend this huge amount of money that there cannot come from the public any condemnation of what we call our democratic parliamentary system.

To a certain extent I believe hon. members to my left, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, are right when they say the public demands or at least desires nationalization of the entire manufacture of munitions in Canada. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) admitted, I thought very fairly, that this is too much to hope for. I forget the exact words he used, but he admitted, in terms with which I agree, that such nationalization is really too much to expect. However, I think if we could get nationalization without too much in the way of capital investment by the government, and without getting into government manufacture on a huge scale, it would meet with the approval of the people. At any rate the people do desire, in fact they demand, that there must be no unfair profits, which is what I would call profiteering, in regard to these expenditures. In other words if they cannot have nationalization, they demand that we must have full and absolute control of profits.

With the object of the bill and the principle behind it, as I said the other day, I believe we all agree; that is, the principle of cutting down profits as far as possible. Whether or not this bill will accomplish that end I do not know; some of its sections I think require elucidation, and when we are dealing with it in committee I intend to ask certain questions and make certain suggestions in an endeavour to improve the bill. To show what can be done by private enterprise, however, I should like to refer to the Canadian Annual Review of 1918, which contains a very good account of the work done during the war by the imperial munitions board. Even though it may be a little tedious I am going to take this opportunity of putting some extracts on record, because I am convinced that the business men of Canada are the equal of the business men of any other country in the world. I am also convinced of something with which some may disagree; that is, that the business men of Canada, if given the opportunity, are ready to do their share in serving this country. I believe that, and I believe business men should be given a greater opportunity to serve without remuneration. Therefore I believe that with a better appreciation of what they did during the war—much of it for profit I admit—we might safely come to the conclusion that by calling in the business men of this country to assist whatever government may be in power we can obtain service for this dominion which we cannot secure if we merely maintain in its entirety the old profit motive.

I quote from page 542 of the Canadian Annual Review of 1918:

To the imperial munitions board, which succeeded the famous Shell Commission in 1915, under appointment by the imperial government and with Sir Joseph W. Flavelle as chairman, much of this success was due. Prior to August, 1914, Canadian manufacturers knew nothing of shrapnel or shell-making and had never made a cartridge case or fuse; by December 31, 1915, under the Shell Commission, they had exported $57,241,852 worth; in the next three years, under the imperial munitions board, they had exported nearly a billion dollars' worth—$296,505,257 in 1916, $388,213,553 in 1917; $260,711,751 in 1918. The total for the whole war period was $1,012,548,501, with contracts in hand which would largely exceed that figure, as a manufacturing total. In 1915 desperate efforts were being made to produce fuses; at the beginning of 1918 Canada was turning them out at the rate of 2,750,000 per month and of such high quality as to win congratulations from the imperial authorities. By this time the making of 16,000,000 boxes to carry munitions overseas had been carried out and the production of explosives such as cordite, T.N.T., acetone, methyl-ethyl and nitric acid steadily developed and maintained; large orders from the United States were on hand including 7,000,000 shells, 10,000,000 forgings and 2,000,000 cartridge cases; over 300 aeroplanes a month were being produced and large orders for steel ships were under way. The board in these months was spending $1,000,000 a day in Canada, and contracts had been given or were being worked out by 950 manufacturing firms. As the year 1918 passed on the work of the board grew in volume and variety. National munition plants were put in operation at a cost of $15,000,000 in Montreal, Renfrew, Trenton, Toronto and Parry Sound, and in them powder and high explosives were made, fuses loaded, steel and forgings produced and aeroplanes built.

A little lower down on page 543 there is a quotation from a statement by the British war cabinet, which I think is worth putting on record:

Dealing at this juncture with production, as it had been in 1917, the British war cabinet declared that "the manufacturing resources of Canada have been mobilized for war production almost as completely as those of the British isles," and added these detailed facts—

This is the statement by the British war cabinet:

15 per cent of the total expenditure of the ministry of munitions in the last six months of the year was incurred in that country.

That is, in Canada.

She has manufactured nearly every type of shell from the 18-pounder to the 9·2-inch. In the case of the 18-pdr., no less than 55 per cent of the output of shrapnel shells in the last six months came from Canada, and most of these were complete rounds of ammunition, which went direct to France. Canada also contributed 42 per cent of the total 4·5 shells, 27 per cent per cent of the 6-inch shells, 20 per cent of the 60-pdr. H.E. shells, 15 per cent of the 8-inch and 16 per cent of the 9·2-inch. In addition Canada has supplied shell forgings, ammunition components, propelants, acetone, T.N.T., aluminum, nickel, aeroplane parts, agricultural machinery and timber, besides quantities of railway materials, including no less than 450 miles of rails torn up from Canadian railways, which were shipped direct to France.

Then this article goes on to say:

Ships to the value of $64,000,000 were put under construction by the board; the operations at Shawinigan in producing calcium acetate, and acetic acid grew to large proportions and included cellulose acetate for aeroplane wings with important orders, also, from the United States—

Over on the next page it gives the complete figures of our exports during the four years, in regard to quantities. There are a good many other details which I do not wish to put on record, but I think these are worth while:

Shells	65,343,647
Fuses	29,638,126
Fuse parts	16,174,073
Cartridge cases	48,627,673
Percussion primers	35,386,488
Shell forgings	6,412,115
Explosives; chemicals (lbs.)	111,297,107
Metals; compounds (lbs.)	107,282,336
Lumber (feet)	53,327,107
Exploder containers	13,285,000

Then it goes on to deal with the matter in greater detail. I quote this, sir, because I think it should be on record in justice to our business men. It shows the magnificent work that was done during the last war. I repeat that it is my opinion that given the opportunity, particularly in peace time when there is not the pressure that existed during the war, we can produce munitions in Canada in the same splendid way that we did during the last war, as is illustrated by what I have just quoted. I repeat that I believe we should do more. I do not mind saying that on one occasion I proposed to my own leader, in connection with another matter, to call in the business men of Canada to assist us in certain matters. I believe if some of our leading business men were given a chance such as Mr. Purvis was given in regard to unemployment, if they were brought in to assist, that they would gladly do so in any way they can—just as members of parliament as was mentioned a few moments ago, desire to assist their country. Undoubtedly that is the desire of members of parliament. I believe they are working for the good of Canada, whatever the criticisms may be that are opposed to that suggestion.

I repeat I would prefer that there should be no profits at all in the manufacture of munitions for Canada. But, after all, the government has looked into the matter thoroughly. The minister reviewed the attitude of the governments of various countries, and it is the opinion of the government that we cannot go in for the manufacturing of munitions by ourselves. Therefore the government must do everything it can to maintain full control of profits, such as they are.

I have made the statement that I believe discussion in the house on the Bren gun inquiry has had much to do with the improvement of the bill. The bill is a refutation of the statement which has been made outside the house, as well as in it, that the Bren gun discussion merely held up the business of the country. Had it not been for that discussion I believe this bill would not be as good as it is. I believe the government will admit it is more ready, because of the criticism it received—and perhaps it claims some of that criticism was unjust—to see to it that the bill is as close to perfection as possible.

For example, had the measure now before us been in force—even as it now stands, without the improvements which I hope will be made as a result of discussions in committee—there would have been competition in the Hahn contract. There was no competition in that contract, either through public tender or, through use of a selected list. To my mind a selected list would have done away with the severe criticism of the Hahn contract. Then, there would have been no letter of introduction to one man, to the exclusion of all others, or the making of one man the representative of Canada. There would have been no pressure on Great Britain. There would have been no stock profits.

When the minister is on his feet I would like him to explain further what he said as it is reported at page 1759 of Hansard. In reply to a question of mine he stated in effect that in the Bren gun contract the possibility of stock profit had been done away with.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The first time it was attempted.

Mr. MANION: But, as a matter of fact, under the Bren gun contract there was an opportunity to make a million in profits. That is one of the things which was most offensive to the people. If there had been some such provision as appears in the bill, a limitation of profits to five per cent or ten per cent on the capital, there would not have been the same danger of huge profits such as are going to be made in the Hahn contract.

There are a couple of suggestions I should like to make in regard to the bill. One of the great flaws in it—I mentioned it the other day in my remarks—is that there is not close enough connection between the proposed defence purchasing board and the defence council. As the minister knows, the defence council is made up of the Minister of National Defence, as president, and the deputy minister of national defence, as vice-president; and the members are the chief of general staff and the director of naval services. The associate members are the adjutant general, the quartermaster general, the master general of the ordnance and the director of the Canadian air force. I believe one of the weaknesses of the bill is that there is not sufficient liaison, if I may use that term, between the defence council and the board proposed in the bill. I suggest there should be a closer association—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I interrupt?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Although it is not specifically provided for, in several places in the bill there are opportunities where the chairman of the board could consult the council with reference to requirements of the Department of National Defence. I refer to stock on hand and requirements for the future.

Mr. MANION: I admit that. There is opportunity for the minister, who is president of the defence council, and would be the liaison between the two.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. MANION: I do not think that is sufficient. My own opinion is that the minister or the government could improve the bill. I was going to refer to the minister, but by virtue of his office he would have access to the board. But, let us take, for example, the master general of the ordnance, who does much of the purchasing of supplies and who has a military training. He could be placed on the purchasing board, as a non-voting member, if you like. Or, it might be done the other way, namely by placing the chairman of the purchasing board on the defence council.

The point is that there should be some member in addition to the minister who is associated with one body and has a place on the other so as to achieve a closer liaison than there would be under the bill.

At page 9 of the Bren gun report there is a suggestion from the Artillery Association of Canada, and one from the conference of defence associations. They suggest the setting up of a munitions board, not a purchasing board such as proposed in the bill. The quotation I wish to read is on page 9. It is as follows:

There was also read into the record a resolution passed on November 13, 1936—

That is two and a half years ago.

—by the conference of the defence associations —a body comprised of senior officers appointed by the different service associations who meet for a conference each year. The infantry association, the cavalry association and the artillery association each appoint four of their senior officers to represent them at what is known as the conference of defence associations, which meets in Ottawa and at which matters pertaining to the militia are discussed. The resolution of November, 1936, read as follows:

"That this conference of Defence Associations urges the government of the Dominion of Canada to take immediate steps to create a munitions board or some similar body to control the production within Canada of such munitions as can now be made here satisfactorily and to prepare plans for the effective mobilization of our industrial resources in the event of war, and that a copy of this resolution be sent to the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition."

This had reference to the late leader of the opposition. The report goes on:

And the following resolution unanimously passed in February, 1938, by the officers of the artillery association (both the permanent and the non-permanent force officers) was read:

"That steps should be taken by the government to appoint a munitions board—

The same suggestion.

—under the chairmanship of a skilled manufacturer to provide for the manufacture of all munitions which can be efficiently produced in Canada."

In view of these suggestions made by the only associations in Canada which really represent all different branches of Canadian defence forces, I think the government might be well advised to accept some such suggestion as I am making. I say that because it seems to me that the munitions board would go much farther than it is proposed the purchasing board shall go. In fact, I have had a couple of representations from members of the conference of defence associations urging that the defence purchasing board is not sufficient. On the other hand I have been told that at least one of the very prominent members of that association supports the board. The minister may have information with regard to that. Anyway, I repeat that there has been opposition by a couple of members—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask a question?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What could the munitions board do that this proposed board could not do?

Mr. MANION: It would go much farther. After all, the proposed purchasing board merely puts into effect the requests of the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. MANION: The minister is the man who puts matters up to the board, after they have been passed upon by the defence council.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But then they survey the entire requirements of the department, in conjunction with the experts of the department.

Mr. MANION: The minister may be right. I am glad to be corrected by the minister, who says that this board goes as far as a munitions board would go. If so, I shall be more satisfied. But it is claimed by those who took it up with me—I do not know that I asked them to specify the difference, but it did seem to me that they were right—that a munitions board will go much further. The purchasing board, in my opinion, should have a closer association with the defence council than it has at the present time. I have said all I wish to say on that subject, and I have now only one or two suggestions to make.

I think that what we require in this country is, first, good equipment for the money expended. Second, we need efficiency and speed in manufacture. Third, we require the elimination of profits, if possible. Apparently that is not entirely possible, but there should be the full control of profits, not only on contracts which are not let by tender but on contracts which are let by tender. I do not know that that can be done, but I believe some further investigation should be made in that regard. I do not wish to go into it in detail now, but when we come to the appropriate clause of the bill I shall have a few questions to ask. Finally, we all want wise and honest expenditure of the money of the Canadian people.

In regard to my suggestions, let me briefly recapitulate the points I have made. First, we must try to bring about a closer association between the defence council and the purchasing board. Second—and this may have been covered by the minister to a certain extent—if the government is not willing to go into government manufacture on a large scale, it could certainly have pilot plants in various parts of Canada which would serve at least as a check on the cost of munitions being manufactured by private concerns. Third, I think it would be well to have something in the way of a committee of both houses, to discuss, in camera if necessary, the whole defence problem of Canada; questions will be coming up in the house, on the estimates of the department, for instance, which the minister will not care to answer. He will probably, and truthfully, tell us that in the public interest certain questions which we ask cannot be answered. These questions might well be discussed in camera by a committee of both houses, which would serve to reassure the people generally, even though they were unacquainted with the work of the committee, that everything was being carried on in a proper manner, from all aspects.

Finally I should like to see this bill improved, and we can do that better perhaps as it goes through the house, in order to satisfy public opinion in regard to profits. It seems to me that defence expenditure is so important that it is no exaggeration to say that on the proper expenditure of this money we shall have to depend if or when we are called upon to fight for our very national life.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make only a few remarks on this bill before it goes into committee.

A perusal of the bill indicates that the government is now embarked on a very large rearmament program. There are two ways in which the government can get armaments: either by manufacturing them, or by purchasing them from private manufacturers. This bill would indicate that in the main the government proposes to follow the practice of purchasing from private manufacturers.

I want to draw two facts to the attention of the government, and particularly of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). The first is that despite his eloquent speech of last Friday, to my mind he has not yet given any good and sufficient reason why the government cannot manufacture a great many armaments and materials of war in its own arsenals.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt my hon. friend for a moment? Two or three hon. members who have spoken from his group have said over and over again that the government's policy is to encourage manufacture by private interests, and not to have the manufacturing done under government auspices in its arsenals or other government establishments. There is nothing in this bill which would justify that statement, and it is not true as a statement of government policy. I want to assure my hon. friends that the question whether certain contracts are to be given to private firms or the work done in government workshops is one which will be studied as we go along with reference to the different contracts that have to be made, equipment or supplies that are required, and the circumstances under which alone they can be made. There is nothing in this bill which justifies the statement that the government is committed to the one policy rather than the other.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I point out to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that there is nothing in the bill to justify any belief to the contrary.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes. Section 2 specifically provides for government manufacture.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But this is a purchasing board—

Mr. DUNNING: We would not need one to purchase from ourselves.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): This bill provides for a purchasing board whereby the government may purchase its requirements, and it contains all the provisions for the letting of contracts. The minister would not suggest that we will let contracts to ourselves.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me, we would not need a purchasing board to purchase from the government's own factories.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Exactly, we would not.

Mr. DUNNING: We do not.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Therefore the fact that this board is being set up, and the fact that we are to provide large sums of money for national defence, indicate that we now propose to purchase from private manufacturers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend wants to present the government's policy in its true light, it would be this. The government is not in a position to say that it is going to have all armaments and munitions manufactured in government arsenals and workshops, that there is going to be a monopoly in the provision of armaments by government workshops and arsenals. All that the bill implies is that there will of necessity be some orders placed with private concerns, and that being the case this bill makes provision for a defence purchasing board to deal with contracts where such are to be entered into. That is the true position.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Of course the Prime Minister can make that statement if he likes, but it is apparent that some contracts will have to be given to private firms.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And those are the ones we seek to control by this bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The Minister of National Defence the other day weighed the arguments pro and con in respect of public manufacture. Speaking of differences of opinion in the department itself, he said that certain senior officers were in favour of public manufacture, and then went on to say, at page 1760 of Hansard:

> Others of equal senior rank pointed out that the capital cost of constructing and equipping the several plants advocated would run between $30,000,000 and $35,000,000.

Then he went on:

> I think I am safe in saying that on principle the government favoured state manufacture. However, at that time we were faced with a most serious financial problem.

He proceeded to outline what the government's policy had been, that the policy has been the purchasing of armaments. By this measure we are providing the machinery whereby the government may continue to purchase from private manufacturers. The Prime Minister spoke of the extent to which that might be done. The extent to which the government will purchase from private manufacturers and the extent to which they will manufacture in their own shops will be left, of course, to the decision of the government, but the fact remains that nothing was said by the Minister of National Defence the other day to indicate that the government proposes to extend the machinery for producing in its own plants.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Most definitely he did.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Oh, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He referred to the Lindsay arsenal in specific terms.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Exactly, and pointed out that we could not use it.

Mr. DUNNING: Let my hon. friend quote correctly from the minister's speech—and not misquote.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I will read what the minister said in that regard. I quote from page 1758 of Hansard:

> Just a comment or two on these findings.
> [Mr. Mackenzie King.]

He was referring to the findings of the interdepartmental committee presided over by Doctor Skelton.

> As suggested in No. 1, the government is making the maximum use of its own arsenal plants. I say that deliberately. The advice given me by the officials of the Department of National Defence and by the highest ranking officers, those who are in favour of the principle of public ownership, in regard to the development of the Lindsay arsenal is that until we proceed with the filling group and the ammunition group at Valcartier, until we have made Quebec available, we should not proceed with the development of the Lindsay arsenal as planned for the manufacture of small arms ammunition. It must be kept in reserve. However, since this government came into office the production of our necessities at the arsenals at Quebec and Valcartier has been increased by four, six or seven times. We have made a modest beginning at the arsenal at Lindsay and it is my fervent desire that as soon as possible we should proceed with the further development of the facilities at Lindsay.

Let me now return to what I was pointing out.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member will find it rather difficult.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Here we have provision for a board for the purchasing of armaments. There can be no denial of that. Here is the machinery being set up—a commissioner with three others; provision made whereby they can either call for tenders or have a selected list; a requisition is received from the Minister of National Defence; they arrange a contract; that contract goes to the Minister of Finance; if he approves it is referred to the governor in council, and if they approve it is signed. Now, however much the government may not like it, the fact remains that here is a board for purchasing armaments.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend this question, so that we can get the point perfectly clear? Do I understand he is arguing that, for example, aeroplanes which are required, which are part of the defence equipment, should be made in government workshops; or that searchlights, which are part of the equipment for the defence department, should be made in government workshops? Unless he is arguing that all the equipment and supplies must be manufactured in government workshops, I say that where matters such as these are concerned the government should have a board of this kind if it wishes to control contracts.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): There is no need for me to start telling the government what could be manufactured under public ownership and what could be manufactured privately. The fact is that things other than aeroplanes and searchlights and equipment of the kind mentioned by the Prime Minister are being manufactured and have been manufactured by private concerns.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why, certainly.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Bren machine guns, and shells, are being manufactured now by private manufacturers for the government under contract, and nothing was said the other day by the minister to indicate that that policy is to be changed. On the contrary, every indication is that it will be continued. If the Prime Minister says it is not so, I shall be only too pleased to hear it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I make the government's policy clear now, so there may be no doubt about it? The government does not propose, with regard to the provision of arms and equipment, to have them manufactured wholly under private industry, nor does it propose to have them manufactured wholly under public ownership. It proposes to distribute the work between the two in the light of the best advice it can obtain as to what would be most in the public interest.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, that some hon. gentlemen opposite can find satisfaction in that statement. I cannot find any satisfaction in it.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, we don't wonder at that.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It is said that some will be manufactured privately and some under public ownership, in the light of the circumstances, but according to the government the circumstances lately have been such that the bulk have gone to private manufacturers. Nothing has been said by the government to indicate that that trend will be reversed, and in view of the increased expenditures expected it would appear that policy will be not only continued but accentuated.

The Minister of National Defence said the other day that one of the greatest arguments against state manufacture was the cost. I have already read the passage in which it is stated that the capital cost of constructing and equipping the additional plants advocated would amount to between thirty and thirty-five million dollars. But in respect of at least two contracts the government is buying the machinery in order to have the munitions manufactured by private concerns. Would it cost any more to buy machinery and have the government manufacture the munitions than for the government to buy the machinery and let private concerns manufacture them? We have three arsenals, and I do not think anybody has suggested that they are working to full capacity. There are railroad shops across Canada which could be utilized for this purpose. Even though it should cost more—and I believe that point is debatable—the confidence created in the minds of the Canadian people would more than make up for any cost which would be involved, to say nothing of the fact that, as I see it, labour conditions among the men employed in government-owned factories manufacturing war materials would be much better than in some factories which will receive contracts through this purchasing board. So I say that no good reason has yet been shown by the Minister of National Defence or by the Prime Minister why these armaments should be secured by purchase from private manufacturers.

May I take a moment or two to point out to the government the price we are going to pay for not having state manufacture of armaments? By the giving of these contracts to private manufacturers we are helping to build up the armaments industry in this country. We are helping to build up another link in that chain of armament racketeers which now extends around the world because of the blood money they made in the last war, because of the tremendous profits they are making to-day in almost every country—interests which have had a large part to play in the bringing about of international discontent, suspicion and distrust. Sometimes I am alarmed when I look at the figures and realize that Canada is rapidly becoming a munitions dump for the world. We passed in this house a bill to limit the—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: "Munitions dump." What does my hon. friend mean by that?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, it is a military term. A munitions dump is usually a place where they keep large supplies of munitions. I will use the word "arsenal" if the Prime Minister prefers it. I used a term commonly employed; if it is not a parliamentary term I shall very gladly replace it with a more suitable term.

I have here something else from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, namely the exports of military planes from this country. What do I find? We have heard a great deal recently about the defencelessness of Great Britain and the need to assist her. But I notice that last year, whereas Canadian firms manufacturing military planes and parts exported to Great Britain about $86,000 worth, we exported to Turkey, for instance about $2,000,000 worth.

Mr. DUNNING: Of what?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Military planes and parts.

Mr. DUNNING: Military planes?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Military planes and parts. That is what I said. I have here the list of licences issued each month for the export of munitions and weapons of war from Canada. This is furnished by the Department of National Revenue. I am amazed when I go over it. I will just read off the figures:

Period	Value of arms, ammunition and munitions exported from Canada
February, 1939	$ 71,178
January, 1939	131,689
December, 1938	126,198
November, 1938	101,993
October, 1938	165,675
September, 1938	223,388
August, 1938	92,473
July, 1938	183,145
June, 1938	285,922
May, 1938	833,221

A part of the last mentioned represents the supplying of aeroplanes to Turkey.

April, 1938	$ 179,160
March, 1938	1,104,373

This represents the shipping of aeroplanes and munitions to Turkey and Japan.

February, 1938	$444,046
January, 1938	94,192

A year ago last December the amount was $82,000; in November a year ago it was $46,000, Turkey again being one of the chief recipients, and so on. Over the last four or five months large quantities of shells have been shipped out of Canada. From private manufacturers of arms in Canada are going weapons of war—to whom? In many instances, not to Great Britain.

Mr. DUNNING: Not to Great Britain? Let the hon. member correct that immediately.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Not exclusively to Great Britain. I do not say there is none to Great Britain, but it is not exclusively to Great Britain.

Mr. DUNNING: Shells are going to Great Britain.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes; shells are going to Newfoundland and Australia and military planes are going to Turkey and Japan. Large quantities of nickel and copper for the manufacture of shells are going to these countries.

Mr. DEACHMAN: How does the hon. member know that it is for the manufacture of shells?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member is fond of statistics. If he will take imports of nickel into Germany over the past ten years he will find that the large imports of nickel and copper into that country from Canada coincided almost to a month with the large rearmament program that was carried out in Germany.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Has the hon. member the figures for the last ten years?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I have them, but not here; I have the figures for the last three years. Our exports to Germany in hundredweights have been:

1936	10,136
1937	23,151
1938	20,233

What I want to point out is this. By purchasing from private manufacturers of armaments we are playing our part as a government and a people in helping to finance and support an armament ring who, as every student of the last war and of the years following the war will remember, constituted a serious menace to the peace and good government of the world. Somebody suggests that not only are we helping to build an armament ring, but that this armament ring is in turn helping to arm countries, which, if their present actions are any indication of their policy, are likely to become, and in some instances have become, international aggressors. The cost of building up private armament manufacture in this country is to strengthen the hands of a group of people who all through the last war sold armaments and weapons of war, to one another, even though their own countries were at war.

I would refer hon. members to Philip Noel-Baker's Private Manufacture of Armaments, Merchants of Death by Engelbrecht and Hannighen, the Nye report by the United States senate, and The Private Investor by E. Staley. Any one of a dozen authoritative works can be consulted to bear out what I have said. German boys died at Verdun on barbed wire made in Germany. French aluminum found its way into Germany; Canadian nickel and British glycerine and guncotton found their way through Sweden into Germany. Since the war it has been known that these armament racketeers, by means of propaganda through newspapers and radios which they control, have fostered suspicion and distrust. It is still within the memory of most members of this house that one disarmament conference at Geneva was to a large extent wrecked by the machinations of a United States armament agent who was sent there to engage in activities that are a disgrace to the human race.

In my opinion nothing could be more serious for a country that loves peace, for a people who talk about neutrality, than to become a link in the international armament chain, and that is what we are rapidly becoming.

Mr. MARTIN: Why does the hon. member say that? With a good deal of what the hon. member has said I agree, but we must be reasonable in our utterances. The statement he has just made is surely one that should be substantiated—that we are becoming part of an international racketeering ring.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I have before me sessional paper 107. I will not read it all, but it gives the lists and dates and the amounts of munitions which these companies have been exporting from Canada, starting in 1935.

Mr. DUNNING: Can the hon. member give the total over those years? I should like him to substantiate the statement that Canada is getting into an international armament ring. Let him do so by telling us what have been the exports of all these materials of which he speaks.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Here is the National Steel Car Corporation of Hamilton, Ontario, with at least twenty batches of exports.

Mr. DUNNING: Where to?

Mr. MARTIN: Are they part of this ring?

Mr. CLEAVER: And what is the value of these exports?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I shall be glad to make this speech myself without assistance.

Mr. DUNNING: We are merely interested in the truth; that is all.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am glad to hear the minister is; that will be news to a great many people.

Mr. CLEAVER: Oh, no; give us that information, please.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I have here the list of exports by these different firms, with the different values.

Miss MACPHAIL: Maybe the Department of Finance will add them up.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I find in the list Canadian Industries Limited, Fleet Aircraft of Canada Limited, with two pages of exports of war material—

Mr. GOLDING: Are these firms racketeers?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): They are manufacturing materials for war. Take nickel.

Mr. CLEAVER: I should like to put a question to the hon. member.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Will the hon. member wait a moment. I am developing my point and do not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. CLEAVER: Well, I rise to a point of order. The hon. member has made a charge that the National Steel Car Corporation of Hamilton is in an armament ring. I ask him to substantiate that charge or withdraw it.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member makes statements he should be able to substantiate them.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member surely is not familiar with the sessional paper. This is a list of companies who have received permits to export arms and articles of war under section 290 of the Customs Act.

Mr. CLEAVER: I am sorry to have to interrupt again, but I rise to a point of order.

Miss MACPHAIL: What is the point of order?

Mr. CLEAVER: The hon. member distinctly charged that the National Steel Car Corporation of Hamilton was in an armament ring. I ask him to substantiate or withdraw that charge.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that is not a point of order. If the hon. member makes statements he should be able to substantiate them.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I pointed out that this company along with a number of others has been receiving permits from the Department of National Revenue for the export of war material.

Mr. DUNNING: Where to?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The Minister of Finance keeps interrupting, asking, "Where to?" The Minister has been a long time in this house, I have not been here very long; but I should expect a man in his position, if he wanted to ask a question, at least to rise in his place and ask it politely. I object to men lounging in their seats with a silly smirk on their faces—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Hon. members wishing to ask a question usually rise in their places, but on account of the Minister of Finance having been ill I do not think he should be criticized for not doing so.

Mr. DUNNING: I desire no quarter on that account; I apologize here and now to my hon. friend for not rising and asking his permission to ask a question. Have I his permission now to ask him where the munitions manufactured by the National Steel Car Corporation were exported to? I am not speaking for that company, but I should like to know. I think my hon. friend might be courteous enough to answer that question.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am prepared to answer it, but I object to interjections of the kind that we have had this afternoon. I have here the exports for every month for the past fourteen months; the minister must be familiar with them. The names of the companies are here, the amounts, the categories—they come under seven different categories, shells, howitzers, machine guns, aeroplanes, etcetera, with the destinations for which they are intended. I am prepared to pass this over to the minister, but surely he does not expect me to stop in the middle of my speech to add this up. I have given the total by months.

I point out that those exports of war material and munitions are on the increase, and that we are in serious danger of becoming involved in a serious situation. I have just placed on the order paper this afternoon a question relating to a report which came to me this morning from a fairly authoritative source, as to box cars being broken up in the Canadian National railway shops at Port Mann, B.C., and the scrap metal shipped to Japan on Japanese boats. I do not know whether that is true, but I know that exports of nickel and steel and scrap-iron for the latter part of 1937 and all of 1938 showed a very great increase, and that increase coincides with the Sino-Japanese war which began July 8, 1937. I point out that while the Minister of National Defence may feel that state manufacture of armaments is a costly proposition, yet over a period of years, in terms of what we may have to face if this country becomes embroiled in a war, if the international armament manufacturers succeed in getting their finger in this country, the cost will be very much greater than any price we could be called upon to pay for state manufacture.

The other day the minister quoted Mr. Lloyd George. I was interested in observing in the Glasgow Evening Times of May 6, 1936, a report of the appearance of Mr. Lloyd George before the royal commission on the private manufacture of and trading in arms at the Middlesex Guildhall. Mr. Lloyd George explained at the outset that he was in full agreement with the proposal that the manufacture of arms ought to be a government monopoly, and set forth his reasons for forbidding the private manufacture of arms. The report proceeds:

> On political grounds, he said, it would avoid the creation of powerful vested interests whose prosperity depended on war and preparations for war. The enormous increase, amounting to tens of millions in a few weeks, in the value of the properties of the armament firms of this country upon the intimation of a program of rearmament on a great scale by the government was in itself a startling demonstration of this peril.

And the war-time Prime Minister of Great Britain goes on to point out to the extent of two and a half columns that during the war private enterprise failed to meet the demands of the situation. He said that contractors in all sincerity, because their eyes were bigger than their stomachs, contracted to produce certain material that they had not the capacity to produce. He cited a case in which one contractor promised 12,000,000 shells and was able within the given period to produce only 1,000,000 shells. He says that more and more throughout the war the country had to depend on Woolwich, the government arsenal. I believe the experience of Mr. Lloyd George should be of some value to us, and that the government as they proceed with this rearmament program ought to give serious consideration to the feasibility of manufacturing under government ownership. Mr. Lloyd George said:

> When you contemplate the possibility of another great war, what matters most is the facilities we possess for speedy expansion on the most effective lines.
> Here nationalization of armaments has an enormous advantage over private firms.
> When in 1914 it came to the need for increasing our supply of munitions on an enormous scale private firms broke down completely.

So first I ask for some more adequate explanation why we should not have government manufacture, and second, have we measured the cost of continuing with private manufacture? I am satisfied, despite the sincerity of the Minister of National Defence and of the Prime Minister and his cabinet, that no matter how carefully any bill like this may be worded, it would be difficult to limit profits if the strain of war should come upon us. Attempts to do this were made by Mr. Lloyd George in Great Britain, by Mr. Baruch, in the United States, and in this country. We know that all of them failed. Under the present Prime Minister of Great Britain legislation was passed attempting to limit profits on the manufacture of war materials, but it has not been successful. Just the other day a newspaper report from Great Britain carried the statement that recruiting was behind for the simple reason that profits on the manufacture of armaments were said in some cases to be as high as forty per cent. If that is true it is an unfortunate state of affairs, and I doubt if this legislation can stop that.

This government or any government that wants to stop excessive profits being gained out of the making of instruments of death is to be commended. I am prepared, and hon. members of this group I am sure are prepared to support any such move. But we are not prepared to support something that will be merely a blind, that may give the impression of doing something when it is not doing it. We are eager to see the real thing, but we are not going to be satisfied with a spurious substitute. Nor are the people of Canada who pay the taxes, who are going to carry the burden of this extension of defence, going to be satisfied. If war should come, the rank and file of the young men of Canada, of my own age and younger, are going to bear the brunt of the sacrifice; and it behooves this or any other government, and even this parliament, to take steps now to set on foot a defence policy which, so far as it is humanly possible, will include the public manufacture of war materials, with the view that if sacrifices are necessary in this country, they will be sacrifices of all the people for all the people rather than sacrifices of all the people for a few of the people.

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale): Anyone who has had experience in awarding contracts can readily see that most of the discussion to-day has been carried on by people who have had very little experience along that line. I am not one of those who would try to bring about the nationalization of armament manufacture; nor, on the other hand, would I allow private interests to make big profits out of it. As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) said this afternoon, however, there are still honest people in this world, and we should not be so suspicious about everybody. There are in the business world to-day a number of men who would be tickled to death to make armaments, and who, if given the opportunity, would make them for less than the five per cent profit.

I have awarded contracts for many years, and I do not believe that awarding contracts on a plus five per cent or plus ten per cent basis is a good system to adopt. Big interests, and even smaller interests, have often manipulated matters in such a way as to make that cost fairly high. They can increase the salaries of their executives by $5,000 or $10,000 each; or, if they do not like that, they can call meetings of their boards more often than is necessary and pay their directors $5,000 a meeting. I know this has been done by some gold-mining interests and some liquor interests. That is why some of these companies have not paid dividends for several years; the profits have been eaten up by high salaries of executives, and by directors attending meetings more often than is necessary and being paid $5,000 for spending an hour at these meetings. That is done by some of the big interests in Toronto, and I am not referring to munitions at all.

I believe we should establish an experimental station where there will be experts, under the Department of National Defence, who will know exactly how much it will cost to make any commodity that may be required if we should engage in a war, which we all hope will not happen. My idea is that we should get the lowest price possible. You could have the specifications of the particular article you have to buy, or perhaps a sample of the article itself; then call in a number of the people who are established in that business, firms with real machinery which you do not have to put in for them, and ask them to quote a figure. At the same time your own experts could be figuring out a price with which you could compare the tender. That is what they do if they build a trunk sewer, a road, a bridge or anything else; they have an expert staff figure on the cost of the undertaking. In that way you would know that the firm would not be making more than five per cent. But if you say a firm can have this business but that they must not make more than five per cent, then they will make their overhead so high that when they get their five per cent on it they will, in reality, have a much larger profit.

I do not see how the profit is going to be kept down to five per cent unless some such measures are taken, although at the same time I am not so terribly suspicious of the business men in Canada. I am perfectly satisfied that Canadian manufacturers to-day are willing to do anything they can to save this country, and that there are just as many honest business men and manufacturers as there are honest people of other classes. If you put some confidence in them, ask them to come to your support and to give you advice, they would be delighted to do so, and in that way you could get together with them.

I am all for this purchasing commission, but I want to warn the government that the members of this commission must be born bargainers; they must not be just the tools of anybody who may come along. They must be able to read the men with whom they are doing business; they must be prepared to adopt schemes and methods whereby this country will receive the utmost return for each dollar that is spent. Everyone would not make a purchasing agent, as hon. members know, and I warn the government that they will have to be careful in selecting the personnel of this commission. As I have said already, this five per cent profit will be the most difficult thing in the world to handle. Something has been said about auditors who will check up everything; well, all the auditors in the world cannot check up some people, because, while figures do not lie, liars figure.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I think the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) is under a slight misapprehension if he thinks all contracts come within the five per cent limitation. The bill itself states that this board is to limit costs and control the profits on these contracts, but in another place I notice that the five per cent applies only to contracts which are not competitive.

Mr. SPENCE: Let it apply to all.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): We have heard a great deal about dividing up armaments between public and private manufacture. I believe at present we have some small arms ammunition being made in public plants, but the machinery of our arsenals is rapidly being transferred to private plants. I do not think that is a very good division as between public and private ownership.

If the government had followed the suggestion of the defence council of Canada, which was also urged by both General Ashton and General McNaughton when they were chief of the general staff, we would be well on our way now towards some kind of government arsenal; we would have commenced the policy of having pilot plants for the manufacture of arms. It may be that the emergency was not recognized at that time, but now we find ourselves in a state of emergency. We are in a hopeless situation and the government, quite rightly, is turning from pillar to post in an attempt to make up the deficiencies in connection with munitions. But we must not look to the present only; we must look to the future as well, because I feel certain that it will be not a matter of five years or ten years but probably fifty years that this country will have to be prepared to defend itself.

Let us now look for a moment at the methods which I understand were pretty well agreed to at the defence conference of 1937. One of the first principles adopted by that conference was that all the nations of the commonwealth should cooperate with respect to the defence of the empire, and in connection with that cooperation I believe different methods of manufacturing munitions were also discussed. For many years in Great Britain they have had their arsenals and their pilot plants, and the pilot plants having to do with the manufacture of large arms also have been useful in connection with the manufacture of peace-time commodities. For example, one process with respect to big guns is used to-day in the manufacture of turbo-generator shafts. I think there the idea is that the manufacture of small arms in those plants should pay a certain percentage of the cost of the experimentation which takes place in their other pilot plants.

Let us go one step further. In Great Britain the practice has been to pick out firms of known capacity, with the machinery in their plants, and allow them to tender for government contracts. As a general rule not one but two or three are selected and asked to tender. I imagine profits are fair, and that is their way of doing it. But they do pick out the outstanding firms. I do not believe it can be said that Canada has followed the British practice with respect to at least two contracts. We know about one contractor, a radio manufacturer, who has never manufactured armaments and of another, a building contractor, who is given a government armament contract. I do not believe that when we let contracts in that way we are following the British practice.

Let us consider the situation with respect to Australia. They have developed their own arsenals and their own pilot plants. I have before me a picture which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail of March 2, showing a new anti-aircraft gun constructed in the ordnance factory at Maribynong, Victoria. The gun is being operated by the members of the first anti-aircraft battery, from Mosman, now in camp at Narrabeen, in Australia. The gun is shown in the picture. Are the Australians so much more clever than we are? Is it a fact that they can make these things, and that we cannot?

Let us consider the position we are in to-day. If we were confronted with an emergency and had our own arsenal and pilot plant we would be in a position to act. We would have our processes and our jigs, and almost everything necessary to show the manufacturer how he must operate. But we have not made that preparation. We would have to fish around to have different industries give us prices of one kind or another, and the amount of success we might have is open to question.

While at the present time we have to buy our munitions from private industry, there is no doubt that we should be developing our own public arsenals, so that we may have the advantage of using them in the future.

I believe the defence purchasing board is worth while, but I do not think it goes far enough. I do not see how it will bring about a decision as to whether munitions are to be manufactured in private or public factories. That apparently is a matter of government policy. In my view we should have a munitions board which would have powers wider than those of the proposed purchasing board. I believe control of the manufacture of munitions for the land, sea and air forces of Canada, together with the design, distribution and production of the necessary parts, should be under the control of a munitions board. While I favour the purchasing board, I repeat my belief that it does not go far enough, and would urge the government to try to do more of the work in our own arsenals, and to build them up for that purpose.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are we passing the introductory part?

The CHAIRMAN: We are dealing with section 1 which states that the act may be cited as The Defence Purchases, Profits Control, and Financing Act, 1939.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have no objection to proceeding with this section. I was, however, going to ask the minister the significance of limiting costs, as indicated in the preamble, and if in such limitation of costs there will be adequate protection for labour in the factories?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The hon. member is dealing with the preamble, and we are dealing with section 1. Speaking generally, I would say that the preamble would be considered last.

Section 1 agreed to.

Section 2, paragraph (a) agreed to.

On section 2, paragraph (b)—"contract."

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, it is almost six o'clock, and I suggest that we might lay this aside until we resume this order of business to-night. There are questions in connection with the section which I should like to ask.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

INDUSTRIAL LOAN AND FINANCE CORPORATION

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 21, respecting Industrial Loan and Finance Corporation—Mr. Vien.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, before the hon. gentleman moves the second reading of this bill, perhaps by leave of the house I may be permitted to make a brief announcement on behalf of the government. The government is impressed with the dimensions and seriousness of the evils of unregulated money lending in Canada at the present time and will introduce legislation of a general nature to regulate the small loan business and to curb the loan shark evil. This legislation will be introduced this session, very soon, within a few days, I hope. It will be introduced in either this house or the other.

I do not think it is necessary for me to say more at the present time; for this is not the time or the place to go into the nature of the legislation. In view of what I have just said perhaps the hon. member would let his bill stand.

Mr. VIEN: Very well, Mr. Speaker.

Bill stands.

IMMIGRATION ACT

AMENDMENT OF PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPORTATION OF PROHIBITED OR UNDESIRABLE CLASSES

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved the second reading of Bill No. 14, to amend the Immigration Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I explained at some little length on the first reading the purpose of this bill. I might perhaps take a minute now to say what it does not do.

It has been suggested from an unfriendly source that this bill is the evidence of a dark conspiracy to which I have lent myself for the purpose of turning Canada into a dumping ground for European criminals. That is a fine appeal to those who are terribly and entirely ignorant of the facts of the case. But the most casual acquaintance with the bill itself or with the conditions to which it refers will show the absurdity of such a contention.

The present Immigration Act prescribes a number of prohibited classes which are not allowed to come into Canada. My bill never affects that section or those people in any way.

shape or form. It does not allude to them; it does not deal with them; and it cannot possibly make it easier for any criminal to get into Canada. So that argument falls to the ground. There is not much opportunity for dumping criminals under that.

The present act says that those not yet domiciled, that is those who have not yet lived five years in Canada, and who commit certain crimes which are named in the act can be deported, and in fact must be deported. With one exception my bill does not affect those who commit such crimes. So there is small ground for suggesting that under that section Canada will be a dumping ground for criminals. Section 40 of the present act, among the crimes mentioned, lists that of having been a public charge; in other words, having been at some time, however remote, on relief. We have often heard it stated in a spirit of sarcasm that being poor was a crime, but here it is definitely found a crime because it is listed with living on the avails of prostitution, polygamy, and offences of that kind; and a person can be deported for having been at some time, under some unfortunate circumstances, on relief. A serious penalty is provided, that of deportation. A person can be sent back with the odium of being a prisoner.

My first impulse was to phrase my bill so that under no circumstances could a man who had been on relief be deported on that ground alone, but during times of great depression there are cases where a number of people who are proposed to be deported are quite willing to be deported, and that provides an easy channel for making them deportable. On the other hand, they may be British born. I know the case of a man who came out here, a good mechanic. He got a job and brought his wife and family over. Then his job petered out through no fault of his, and he was out of work. After he lost that job, he was fit for nothing but common labour work. He took sick and went on relief for a few weeks. He was automatically, compulsorily reported for having been on relief, because that is the way the law reads. The clerk of the municipality, or his equivalent in an unorganized territory, must report such a case; the government immediately appoints a board to investigate the circumstances, and if the board finds the facts are as stated, that the man has been on relief, the board must automatically order deportation. That is subject only to an appeal to the minister, with which I shall deal a little later.

There is an appeal to the minister; yes, that is true. But if the man has no political friends, and people in such a situation seldom have, he is handicapped in approaching this far distant minister along channels with which he is very imperfectly acquainted. There is this also to be said. There have been cases of ministers—I could name them—who have been indifferent to their duties, and who simply signed on the dotted line; and when the case of Tom Jones comes before him ordered to be deported, on the appeal the minister gives a most casual glance at the papers, sees that his deputy and those under him have O.-K'd the deportation, and naturally and not unreasonably agrees with them.

The point I am trying to make is that the appeal is made primarily or almost entirely from the decision of the board and intermediary officers—there is an inspector and someone else—to a minister who is largely guided by the advice of these very men, and the brief which is presented to the minister in regard to the case is drawn up by one of the very men who have already condemned the man to deportation. Can you think, sir, human nature being what it is, no matter how fair-minded this officer intends to be, that he would not put into that brief something at least of his own conviction that the man ought to be deported?

The process is this: The board of inquiry orders the man deported because he has been on relief. The case then goes to an inspector, and, I rather think, another official; then it goes to Ottawa where it is passed on by two competent, sound officials here; if they all agree on deportation, the case goes to the minister, who glances over the papers—or perhaps he does not—and says to himself, "These are my officials, reliable men, quite familiar with the case, and I am not," and too often he is apt to sign on the dotted line and acquiesce in the decision of his officials.

All that my bill asks is that this board inquiring into the case, if deportation is being asked for solely on the ground that the man has been on relief, may have the power, and that they shall use it, to recommend against deportation. At the present time they have no alternative than to order the man to be deported.

It is true that there is in a rather obscure section of the act, totally unknown to the man who is going to be deported, a provision that the board may also submit their views on the subject. But they have already damned the man, sentenced him to be deported, and if they accompany that with a recommendation that he had better not be deported, it does not have half the weight that it would have if the original recommendation had been against deportation. That is one of the main purposes of the bill

The bill has two phases, but that is the main idea, so that the board of inquiry, if in their judgment the circumstances are such that the man has every prospect of being a desirable citizen and it was only by accident, perhaps sickness or ill health or something like that, that he happened to go on relief for a few weeks—the board may recommend that he be not deported. They may, it is true, so recommend now, but in a sort of back-door way. That is, they may accompany their recommendation that he be deported with a letter that maybe he had better not be deported. That is rather a peculiar way of dealing with the matter. I want it dealt with straightforwardly so that there will not be any doubt, and I want the board to have power to do that. That is one of the purposes of the bill. There is not much opportunity there to make Canada a dumping ground for European criminals.

The other purpose of the bill is to give the same powers of recommending against deportation in the case of those who, because of having been on relief or possibly because of some minor offence, would be deported to a country where a heavy punishment, possibly death, would await them for some political crime they had committed which would not be a crime in this country. I make it specifically clear that it does not apply to extraditable offences or to anything which would be a crime in this country.

I have in mind the case of a man whose sole offence is, perhaps, that his mother or his grandmother was of a certain racial origin in Europe and who, if he goes home, is certainly liable to be sent to a concentration camp and possibly a great deal worse; for it is almost incredible how small an offence is made the subject of most serious punishment in these cases. I therefore propose to make it permissive only to those government officials who have heard the man's tale, and the onus is on him. I have known a case where a man produced distinct evidence that he was going home to his death for some offence for which in this country he was not liable to death. In that particular case the minister used his discretion. I am quite content that the responsibility shall be on the man to prove his case. I do not say that a board of inquiry should run all over Europe investigating these matters. But I think that if a man is able to substantiate his contention in a case of that kind the official should have at least the permissibility, so to speak, of recommending against his deportation. As I have said, it does not apply to extraditable offences or to those which would be punishable in Canada.

It has been Britain's boast almost since Britain was Britain that once a man touched British territory he was free. You remember, Mr. Speaker, that when slaves came from the south they could turn on their pursuers once they put their foot on Canadian soil and say that they were free men. Cases have been known where refugees have swum out to a British ship in a harbour and once they touched the side of the ship they were free from prosecution or pursuit from the officials of the country where they had been.

History tells us that Britain has benefited greatly by allowing liberty to all who came to her shores. I believe that the glass industry was started by refugees from Holland. Certainly the lace and woollen industries were started by refugees from the continent. Canada also has not lost much through the empire loyalists who came to us under similar conditions. But that is entirely too mercenary a view to take of the matter, and I do not want to emphasize that point.

This bill is quite limited. It does not open the door to refugees; it does merely two things. It gives the board the power, on inquiring into charges against possible deportees, to recommend if they choose, and only if they choose, against deportation—in the one case, where the deportee has been guilty, if it is a case of guilt, only of having been on relief; and in the other case, where he is going to very severe punishment, perhaps death, in the country of his origin.

The minister kindly suggested that I should discuss this matter with his officials. That is an excellent idea, because a person can get much better results across a table than he can across the floor of the house; and I did so. The aspect of it which I grasped, the viewpoint of the officials as I got it, at any rate, was that they do now do a great deal of what I have been asking to have done, but they do it by an act of grace, an act of compassion; that these officials do try to understand the circumstances of the man—and I do not deny it, for there are many excellent officials—they do study the case; if they think it is not one calling for deportation they so recommend to the minister and he gives his official decision against it. Yes, but the only objection to that is that they are now doing by a side-door what ought to be done openly. They are giving that clemency to a man by compassion and, so to speak, the grace of God which it ought to be his right to claim. We must always consider the human element. Officials change; ministers change; we might quite conceivably have officials who were negligent or careless in their duty, and a minister who is the same way, and they would just go along the line that "This man has been ordered deported, and the man who saw him ordered deportation, so I guess we had better let it go through," although the case might be a very trivial one indeed. Officials tell me that that is not done; they cited case after case where a man had been relieved from deportation at the last minute by their own investigation and recommendation, and I give them all credit for their action in that regard. Nevertheless the fact remains that the minister's judgment is almost bound to be swayed by the recommendation, the brief, which is presented to the minister, and that brief is drawn up by an official who has already decided against the man. Can one conceive of a man convicted in a court going to a higher court and having the brief asking for favourable consideration in that higher court prepared by the prosecuting counsel in the lower court? That, I think, is almost a comparable instance.

Therefore really the bill is not demanding a great deal. According to the officials' own viewpoint, I am only as it were legalizing or legitimizing what they say they very often do, but I am making it a matter of right rather than a matter of grace. That is the whole thing so far as I see it as regards those two points, and I think the minister might let the bill go through, or at least consider it, because it cannot do any harm and possibly it might save to Canada a few desirable citizens whom we want, instead of having them deported.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, while the bill introduced by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has considerable merit, it might create a dangerous situation if it were adopted in its present form. It is true that the hon. member who introduced it has talked chiefly with reference to British subjects coming to this country who, because for some reason or another they become destitute within five years, are subject to deportation. But I have in mind a condition of affairs in British Columbia which might very well rise if the bill passed in its present form.

In 1931, when relief became prevalent throughout Canada, many nationals of foreign states applied for assistance in British Columbia. I took the trouble to investigate in Vancouver and other cities as to the nationalities of those applying for relief, and I found that many Japanese citizens were included among those applicants. Their cases were investigated, including the length of time they had been in this country; it was found in 1930 and 1931 that many of those who applied for relief had not been in Canada five years, and they were ordered to be deported. As soon as the Japanese discovered that they were liable to deportation because, having been less than five years in the country, they were applying for relief, they immediately—shall I say—took cover; those who had been less than five years in Canada and were destitute either denied the fact or were kept by their friends until they had lived here five years, and then they applied for relief. It is stated in the explanatory note:

This bill will have the effect of protecting immigrants on relief pending their naturalization.

I can visualize how welcome this bill will be to those from a country like Japan who are living in British Columbia, and who could procure relief which in many instances might be a greater amount than they were receiving by way of wages; the relief money might be a gold mine to them. Owing to the fact that the Japanese can live so cheaply, the relief, meagre as it is to British subjects or to Canadians, would be very acceptable indeed to them, and would be applied for right away.

I realize that there is some merit if one argues along the line of the odd British subject or so who comes into the country with money and for some reason or another loses it shortly after his arrival. I can see how unfair it would be to deport such a person. At the same time I am thinking of conditions in British Columbia. Those of us who would like to see the bars put up against the further entry of orientals, especially Japanese, have a certain point of view, and I can see that if this bill passes in its present form it may be seized upon by nationals from that country who might not be deported, as they were in 1930 and 1931, and as they are still liable to be. To set up a board and then leave it with the board to say whether proceedings for deportation should take place or not might give rise to a racial cry. If no proceedings were taken against subjects from Great Britain, and then proceedings were held against nationals from other countries, I am afraid a serious racial cry would be raised.

I would rather see the act remain as it is even though the odd British subject may have been deported—and there are not many—because if the bill passes in its present form, interpreting it as I have done in the light of the remarks of the hon. member, and from what I have read of the bill itself, I think it would open the door to people from other countries like Japan, who might take full advantage of the opportunity to go on relief and stay in the country, when as I said at the beginning they would be liable to deportation.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I wish to say but a very few words in support of this bill. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and I have not always agreed on many matters, but I say to him now that the introduction of this bill does credit to his humanitarian instincts. I support the bill for two distinct reasons. In the first place I think this amendment should be given careful and serious consideration; as a matter of fact, it should be accepted, because we should not have on the statute books a provision that merely to become a public charge under the conditions that prevail in the country to-day shall be considered a crime. At least it should not be classed among the other reasons that are set out in the section under which a person may be deported, that he has had to apply for relief. May I, for the benefit of hon. gentlemen, who possibly may not be acquainted with it, read section 40 of chapter 93 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927. That section reads:

> Whenever any person, other than a Canadian citizen or person having Canadian domicile, shall be found an inmate of or connected with the management of a house of prostitution or practising prostitution, or who shall receive, share in, or derive benefit from any part of the earnings of any prostitute or who manages or is employed by, in, or in connection with any house of prostitution or music or dance hall or other place of amusement or resort habitually frequented by prostitutes, or where prostitutes gather, or who in any way assists any prostitute or protects or promises to protect from arrest any prostitute or who shall import or attempt to import any person for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose, or who has been convicted of a criminal offence in Canada or who admits the commission prior to landing or entry to Canada, of a crime involving moral turpitude, or has become a professional beggar or a public charge . . .

That is, who loses his job and has to appeal to the authorities for relief. In this section, such a person is classed with the others who are enumerated in the first part of the section. There are a number of other persons mentioned in this section who may be deported, but I do not believe that becoming a public charge, in the sense that a person has to apply for relief, should be considered a cause for deportation in Canada.

I support the amendment also because of the conditions that exist in many parts of Europe to-day. We know there are a great many people who because of race or because of their political opinions find conditions in their own country intolerable. For instance, we know that in Germany people of the Jewish race are persecuted and driven out of the country; but there is another class of people in Germany who are persecuted, and who as a matter of fact are in a worse position than the Jews because they cannot leave the country. I refer to the Social Democrats. The Jew can make his case known, and if it is known that he is a Jew every effort is made to get rid of him; but the Social Democrat cannot admit that he is a Social Democrat because he would be immediately subjected to persecution. Because of that fact, he cannot make application to leave the country. So he has not the opportunity to leave.

There are people in Canada who have been here three or four or five years and who may be socialists in their political opinions. If we deport such people because they have become public charges, in the sense that they have applied for relief, we are sending them back, as the hon. member says, to certain death or at any rate to spend the rest of their lives in concentration camps.

For these reasons I submit that the amendment should be accepted. I do not agree with the position taken by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). We allow people to come into Canada, and to me it makes no difference whether they are white, yellow, black or brown, we should not discriminate against them. They have been allowed to come in under the laws of Canada, and while here, through their productive efforts, they have added to the wealth of the country. We should not in any way discriminate against such people because their skins may be yellow and their eyes slanted. We shall have to raise our moral concepts a little higher than that and get away from some of our racial prejudices if we are to hold our place in a world that can be called civilized.

I hope that the government will consider this amendment favourably and take the necessary steps to make it law.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) is an important one. In the operation of the act abuses such as those to which the hon. member has referred might creep in. I do not say there is not the possibility of abuse or perhaps of injustice being done. But as far as my observation has gone in the administration of the Immigration Act since I have had any responsibility for it, I do not think that has happened. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) referred to section 40 of the act, which sets out a number of offences which might lead to an inquiry and deportation. Among those is the offence, if such it may be called, of becoming a public charge. That section provides that:

. . . it shall be the duty of any officer cognizant thereof, and the duty of the clerk, secretary or other official of any municipality in Canada wherein such person may be, to forthwith send a written complaint thereof to the minister, giving full particulars.

In other words, some individual who has been in the country less than five years and has not acquired domiciliary rights in Canada may be on relief. Under the act the duty is imposed on the secretary of the municipality in which he lives to notify the minister to that effect. Then section 42 contains this provision:

Upon receiving a complaint from any officer, or from any clerk or secretary or other official of a municipality against any person alleged to belong to any prohibited or undesirable class—

That is, for instance, one who may have been on relief.

—the minister, the deputy minister, the director or the commissioner of immigration may—

Not shall.

—order such person to be taken into custody and detained at an immigrant station for examination and an investigation of the facts alleged in the said complaint to be made by a board of inquiry or by an officer acting as such.

The procedure I think is fairly clear up to that point. It is the duty of the official of the municipality to report to the minister that the person is on relief. The minister or the other officials designated in section 42 may order an inquiry or may not. As a matter of fact, I think the inquiry is usually ordered.

Mr. NEILL: Always.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, I would not say always, but usually it is. The inquiry is then held and all the facts ascertained. And the board of inquiry may order deportation. That does not mean deportation forthwith. The person who is—shall I say—accused has the right of appeal direct to the minister. Under the law the board of inquiry must advise the man of that right.

Mr. NEILL: Will the minister excuse me? He says it does not mean deportation forthwith, but the very wording of the section says "he shall be deported forthwith."

Mr. CRERAR: That may be correct, but I am speaking of the practice—

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. NEILL: But that is the law.

Mr. CRERAR:—and in any event his appeal must be considered by the minister before deportation can take place. As a matter of fact, the report of the board of inquiry is sent to the superintendent of immigration for the district concerned. It then comes to the immigration branch, is examined by officers of the department and in the final analysis must come to the minister, and the law imposes upon the minister the duty of dealing personally with these appeals. One of the matters I have to deal with almost every day in my ordinary conduct of the business of the department is these appeals. Deportation is not always ordered. Often the officials of the department say, "Deportation is not justified in this case." I recall cases where the officials—I am speaking now of the senior officials in the department—have recommended deportation—sometimes they make no recommendation—and I have not accepted their recommendation because on examination of the evidence I did not think deportation warranted. I quite admit the position of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that the law as it stands may impose a hardship upon a person who is charged with being on relief. But I say that since I have had anything to do with this matter—I speak only of my own observation—that is pretty effectively guarded against at the present time.

The proposed amendment suggests further that such a person who may otherwise be subject to deportation, if he makes representations to the board of inquiry that deportation would be likely to place him in a position where he would suffer trial and punishment, or punishment without trial, in the country to which he would be deported, can claim the right to have this taken into account by the board of inquiry. The amendment would impose upon the board of inquiry the necessity of conducting an investigation into such an allegation.

Mr. NEILL: No, merely to listen to the man.

Mr. CRERAR: No. Let me read the governing clause:

Provided however, the board may report against the deportation of such person where the sole complaint against such person is that he has become a public charge, or where the board of inquiry, in addition to an investigation of such complaint, has inquired into and investigated, which it is hereby empowered to do, any representations made by such person to the effect that were he deported he would be liable to suffer trial and punishment or punishment without trial in the country to which he would be deported. . . .

Mr. NEILL: They investigate the representations.

Mr. CRERAR: Precisely. What does that mean? A person who comes before a board of inquiry on the ground that he has become a public charge says, "I do not want to be deported because if I am sent back to Germany or Austria or Russia or some other country I shall be sent to a concentration camp or tried for some offence and my life may be endangered." Under this provision, as I read it, it would be necessary to have such a complaint or assertion inquired into and investigated before deportation could take place. That would impose upon the board of inquiry a duty which I do not think it would be practicable for it to discharge. Consequently I think it would make the administration of the law in that regard very difficult.

I quite admit the contention of my hon. friend that occasion may arise of hardship of the kind described being imposed upon some individual by a deportation order. But while that may arise, I can say to the house quite frankly that I do not think it has resulted in any of the cases that have come to my attention. Let me make it clear, Mr. Speaker, that I am not speaking of any previous administration, because I do not know anything about any other administration. I do say, however, of my own knowledge that when deportation orders have been issued there have been occasions when the board issuing the order has recommended that it should not be put into effect. There have been cases in which the officers more immediately on the spot have made such recommendations; there have been occasions when, after these matters came to the notice of the senior officials of the department, as in due course they must, they have made such recommendations and, when none of these things happened, there have been cases that have come to me in which I have allowed the appeal.

Under those conditions I think I should say to the house that the administration of this act at the present time is carefully guarded to avoid inflicting upon any person charged with being on relief the penalties theoretically provided by the law. I may say further that I considered bringing in some other amendments to the act, because some clarification is required in one or two respects in connection with this matter of deportation so far as provincial laws are concerned; but it was decided to let the matter stand over until next year, when it is the intention of the department to bring in some amendments to the act. I do not know how far my hon. friend wishes to press his amendment. I believe in its present form it would be difficult to accept, because I am afraid that any complaints which might be made by a person to the effect that he would suffer serious penalty if deported could not usually be investigated. So I would suggest to my hon. friend, and I would be glad to have him give the matter consideration, that the point in his amendment that I believe has some merit might well stand over until another session when, if I have anything to do with the administration of the department, I shall be glad to see that it is included in the amendments submitted.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Just before the minister takes his seat, would he explain how this amendment would embarrass departmental administration if it were passed?

Mr. CRERAR: I have exhausted my right to speak; but if I may reply to the hon. gentleman, the provision here, which I mentioned a moment ago, would be a very difficult and indeed impossible matter of administration. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni may not agree with me, but let us suppose we have before a board of inquiry a person charged with having become a public charge. That board must examine into his case. If they find he has become a public charge he may say, "Oh, I don't want to be deported. If I am sent back to Germany or Austria I will be punished; I will be sent to a concentration camp; my life may be in danger." Then it becomes the duty of the board to inquire into and investigate that statement. How could a board sitting in Winnipeg, for example, investigate his record in Germany or Austria in order to find out whether or not he was telling the truth?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Why not?

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the minister has dealt very fairly with the arguments I have put forward, and not in a partisan or one-sided manner. For instance, he admitted quite frankly that the act distinctly says that if the board of inquiry finds certain facts to be true the man shall be deported forthwith. That is one of the things to which I object. The minister made a point when he said my bill possibly would require a board of inquiry to investigate at great length, perhaps in foreign countries, the representation of the man concerned that he was in danger of losing his liberty or his life. That provision could have been amended very easily in committee. All I wanted was to have the board listen to the man and pay attention if he proved his point beyond question.

Then the minister admitted quite frankly that under the present act hardships may result, and after all the purpose of my bill was to prevent such hardships. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has said, I do not see that any great harm or embarrassment would arise from the adoption of this bill. Nevertheless the hon. gentleman, as a minister of the crown, has indicated that he is not willing to allow the bill to go through, but that he is willing to give these points consideration in amending the act next year. So on the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread I would suggest to my hon. friends to my left that it is always better to take what you can get and keep on advancing than to be totally turned down.

Before asking permission to withdraw my motion, I should like to say a word with regard to the argument put forward by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). It was unfortunate and, I think, wholly unnecessary that the racial cry in regard to Japanese should have been introduced into a discussion of this kind. It serves no good purpose; it is utterly and entirely remote from the purpose of the bill, which is intended to apply to Canada as a whole. The hon. member spoke of the large number of Japanese who were asking to go on relief and said that if my bill did not pass they could be deported. There is nothing under high heaven in my bill that would save them all from being deported under those circumstances; surely the hon. member must be aware of that. Then the hon. member spoke of opening the door. He must know that by no possible twist of reasoning or construction could it be said that my bill proposed opening the door to Japanese immigration. I notice that he took the opportunity to advertise to the house, and I assume for home consumption, his high desire that there should be no further immigration of orientals into British Columbia. That comes with singularly bad taste, Mr. Speaker, from an hon. member who is on record in the pages of Hansard of last year as voting against a bill which was carefully designed to prevent the immigration of Japanese.

In the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the consent of the house and of my seconder to withdraw the motion for second reading.

Mr. REID: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I want to make a denial. I did vote against one bill, but I voted in favour of the bill that was introduced by the hon. member to exclude Japanese from the province of British Columbia.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. NEILL: In other words, the rooster went behind the barn on the second occasion.

Motion (Mr. Neill) withdrawn.

FISHERIES ACT

BEAM TRAWLING—AMENDMENT RESPECTING VESSELS TO BE REGISTERED AND BUILT IN CANADA

Mr. J. J. KINLEY (Queens-Lunenburg) moved the second reading of Bill No. 37, to amend the Fisheries Act, 1932.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill purports to make a short amendment to subsection 2 of section 56 of the Fisheries Act, 1932. Under section 56 it is provided that every person shall be guilty of an offence and shall incur a penalty who attempts to fish or to cause any other person to fish with otter trawls or similar equipment, except under licence from the minister, and in order to qualify for such licence at the present time such vessel must be registered as a British ship in Canada and be owned by a Canadian. The present amendment would change this qualification to read "unless such vessel has been built in Canada and is registered as a British ship in Canada and is owned by a Canadian."

The bill does not decide the question of the merits whereby a licence is granted, but it does make a difference in what vessels can apply for a licence to the further extent that they must be built in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, it is nearly nine o'clock, and I should like to see the bill receive consideration and perhaps go to a committee. I know the minister from Nova Scotia is interested in it, and it may be that he would want to make an announcement to the effect that we could send the bill to a committee. Perhaps that would be the best thing to do, because it is a matter of detail. I suggest the bill is important and a matter worthy of the consideration of the house, especially of the fisheries committee. Therefore, as the hour has almost expired I shall not say anything further at this stage, but will, in order to advance the bill to-night, ask that it be sent to the fisheries committee.

Mr. R. E. FINN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) has introduced the bill and made a few remarks in reference to it. There is grave doubt in my mind as to whether the bill will accomplish the object intended. I suggest that the bill is not really intended for the purpose of stopping the trawlers. The bill provides that unless a trawler is built in Canada and has British registry it shall not be permitted to bring fish into any Canadian port.

Mr. KINLEY: May I explain. It does not affect the merits whereby a vessel shall get a licence. It only says that in order to qualify, before she can even apply for a licence she must be built in Canada.

Mr. FINN: I agree with the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg—"before she can apply for a licence" and have the right to bring fish into a Canadian port, she must be built in Canada. But in the bill as it stands there is nothing to prevent any Nova Scotian—the National Fish Company, which is a monopoly —building vessels in Nova Scotia, as they are doing, putting them under British registry and, ipso facto, they become and have the right to become trawlers under order in council. I do not think the bill should be hastened so quickly into committee. I say it should remain in this house until the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) is here. This is the place to discuss the bill in detail, because it is of absolute importance to the hook-and-line fishermen of Nova Scotia that it be discussed in the house fully and then go to committee.

I was surprised last night, in conversation with the Minister of Fisheries, a conversation which was not private, when he told me that he believed the day of the hook-and-line fisherman of Nova Scotia was gone. I do not agree with the minister. If he is correct, their livelihood is gone.

As I am not on the fisheries committee I shall continue the debate until nine o'clock, and then move the adjournment, so that the matter may remain in the house where every hon. member who so desires may discuss the merits of it on the return of the minister.

Last year three trawler licences were issued from April 1 for one year, whereas before they had been for three years. Now there are five, I believe, to be applied for. An organization known as General Sea Foods, a United States company, with head offices in the city of New York and subsidiary offices in Boston is applying for two licences. This company is occupying space at the Halifax terminal. They have taken all their books and all information which would denote how much they make, away from the Halifax office, and no person in Nova Scotia or under the provincial act can find out anything about the amount of business the corporation does.

I say that condition is not fair to the fishermen of Nova Scotia. Only to-night I was reading where a small motor-boat had gone out from Yarmouth; and had it not been for one of the government boats tied up there that went to the assistance of that motor-boat which, even with anchor down, was, on account of the gale, heading towards the reefs, the lives of those fishermen would have been lost. If the fishermen along the coasts of Nova Scotia attend to their work, even unto death, in order to make a living, then I say we cannot trifle with their means of livelihood, and hand over to commercial interests privileges which are in the nature of a combination.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CREATION OF DEFENCE PURCHASING BOARD TO ENTER INTO CONTRACTS FOR MUNITIONS, EQUIPMENT, MATERIALS AND SUPPLIES

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 38, to establish a defence purchasing board—Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver)—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 2, paragraph (b)—"contract."

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): We have here that the bill deals only with contracts in excess of $5,000. What is to prevent one firm or one person from having twenty contracts of $5,000 or less each? Under those circumstances he would not come under the measure. I would suggest the paragraph might be amended by adding the words "or having more than one contract aggregating the amount of $5,000 or more," or words to that effect. It is easy to see that many contracts would not come under the board at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The principle involved here is the same as obtains in the Department of Public Works, where there is a rule that the department must call for tenders on contracts over $5,000. That is the same principle that is being followed in this legislation. I suggest the public interest is fairly well safeguarded by the provisions as they appear in the legislation.

Mr. BROWN: What amount of last year's appropriations was expended on contracts under $5,000?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I would have to ascertain that later; I have not it before me at the moment.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There may be a principle involved that operates, but there is nothing in the bill, is there, to take care of that $5,000 or under?

Mr. MANION: Before the minister rises, I wish in a general way to support the remarks of my hon. friend, so far as the principle is concerned. I believe that the $5,000 limit so far as these contracts are concerned is the proper idea, but I have been informed by contractors themselves, by one of them quite recently, that in some departments of government—I am not suggesting this department—the very policy which the hon. member has just mentioned is carried out; that is, contractors are given contracts for under $5,000, and that is repeated so that they do not reach the stage of calling for tenders. I do not know just how this could be corrected, but I believe the minister is sincere in wanting to have this properly done. I give him credit for that, and I should like to see some clause inserted so that no individual contractor would be able to get a series of contracts under $5,000 without tenders being called for.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am inclined to agree with the suggestion of my hon. friends. Although the $5,000 limit is here, there is nothing in the legislation to prevent the purchasing board itself from dealing with contracts under $5,000. Under the legislation they have the exclusive right of dealing with contracts over $5,000, but they are not prevented from dealing with contracts under $5,000. The main idea was not to clutter up the work of the board with numerous contracts of small amounts. But the suggestion that has been made by my hon. friends is worthy of consideration, and I shall be glad to look into it.

Mr. HOMUTH: Further on, this same clause says:

> . . . provided that the foregoing definition shall not extend to any defence equipment, manufactured in an arsenal or factory owned and/or operated by the government of Canada or to projects carried out by persons in the employ of His Majesty the King in right of Canada.

I have in mind, for instance, the Montreal Construction Company, which is operating with government machinery.

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) that he is dealing with clause 3.

Mr. HOMUTH: No. Mr. Chairman, I am dealing wtih section 2.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on paragraph (b) of section 2.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is what I am speaking to. The Montreal Construction Company might be classed as a company that is operated by the government in view of the fact that its machinery is government owned and the government advances everything in connection with the operation of the plant. It is just a question whether contracts could be given to such a firm without the sanction of this board.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is no question whatsoever that if a contract such as that given to the Montreal Construction Company is contemplated in the future, it would definitely come under this legislation with reference to the control of profits. This proviso refers only to arsenals owned by the government.

Mr. HEAPS: Who will have control of contracts under $5,000?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Department of National Defence under this legislation, but there is nothing in it to prevent the purchasing board, if it so desires, from dealing with all contracts. It is purely a question of the most efficient management. The board might possibly be overworked if they had to deal with all contracts. A parallel case would be the practice in the Department of Public Works where contracts over $5,000 must be submitted to public tender.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it the present intention of the minister to allow his department to have in its own jurisdiction the control of contracts under $5,000?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is the intention of the legislation which is now before the house.

Mr. BAKER: I think it is fair to say that all contracts should be under the control of this board. It is easy to give ten or twenty contracts of $4,800, something just under $5,000. I would rather see all contracts under the board.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): While I am prepared to give every consideration to the views of this committee as expressed, I think perhaps we had better leave it to the experience of the board in the working out of the legislation, because it might be overloading the board to give them control of every small contract, say for one or two hundred dollars.

Mr. MANION: I suggest this in that regard. Apparently it is the unanimous opinion that some control should be exercised over contracts under $5,000. I quite agree with the minister that we do not wish the board to be cluttered up with a great many one hundred dollar purchases, but perhaps a clause could be framed whereby all contracts should be at least submitted to the board, so that they would be aware of what was being done and would have to pass upon them at any rate. I should like to see such a clause inserted.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That all contracts should be referred to the board?

Mr. MANION: Yes, and that they should have to pass upon them, if you like. They might not have to do the actual letting of the contracts, but they could pass upon them. Suppose some successor of my hon. friend were not so high-minded as he and decided to hand over to some individual contractor a number of contracts under $5,000 over a a period of time. If the board were made aware of what was going on, it could refuse to pass upon them. I do not think it would be difficult to draft a clause to cover that point. I do not think it is necessary for the board to pass upon every small purchase. Perhaps a limit of $1,000 could be imposed, that all contracts of that amount must be submitted to the board for them to initial, so that they would be aware of everything that was going on within the department.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am anxious not to load up the board with so much work that its really vital function will be retarded. While I appreciate very much the suggestions that have been made, I think it should be left to the working out of the legislation, but I can assure my hon. friend that as long as I am in the department the points he has mentioned will be taken good care of.

Mr. HEAPS: When this new board is set up, this whole question will depend upon the permanent officials?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: A good deal of purchasing is done by contract and a good deal by requisition, and I think there should be a distinct cleavage between orders by requisition and orders by contracts. The department may, by ordinary requisition, order something costing over $5,000, and there may be no need for a contract. That must happen on many occasions where work is done upon requisition, without any contract, by the ordinary officials of the department. But where contracts have to be entered into, small contracts may often lead to larger ones, so I think contracts should be left to the body designated by this bill. It should have the power to award contracts, and requisitions could be made in the ordinary way by officials of the department.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Referring again to the phrase:

. . . provided that the foregoing definition shall not extend to any defence equipment, manufactured in an arsenal or factory owned and/or operated by the government of Canada.

I am interested in that, in view of the statement made by the Prime Minister this afternoon that the government was not contemplating giving a monopoly of manufacture either to government arsenals or private manufacturers. I wonder if the minister could give us some idea of what weapons and what equipment are being manufactured in the arsenals compared with the equipment which is being manufactured by private corporations, and about what amount of money has been expended in the one compared with the other over, let us say, the last three years.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Expenditures in government arsenals in 1936-37, 1937-38 and 1938-39 to date were $6,025,469. That includes the dominion arsenal at Quebec, the dominion arsenal at Valcartier, the dominion arsenal at Lindsay, the repair shops at Esquimalt dockyard, the Esquimalt armament supply depot, the repair shops at Halifax dockyard, the armament supply depot at Halifax, and some stations and depots under the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Are those the orders given to these public arsenals?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is the amount spent for government purposes in government-owned arsenals in various parts of Canada. The amounts by years are as follow:

Year	Amount
1936-37	$1,560,000
1937-38	2,867,000
1938-39 to date	1,597,000

That includes production and the purchase of machinery. I have not the actual amounts for machinery broken up. I was not able to get that except as part of the other expenditures.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I do not think I made myself clear. What I wanted was this. It was pointed out this afternoon that some of the government's equipment will be made by private companies; some of it on the other hand will be made by government arsenals. I was wondering what munitions, guns and equipment over the last three years have been made in government arsenals, and on the other hand how much has been spent on orders or contracts to private corporations. How would they be related, and what material would be made in each case?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In government arsenals production has been practically all of small arms ammunition, with 4·5 and 18-pounder shells to a limited extent, but up to the capacity of the production at the present time in regard to both.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): How much money would that represent?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As I said the other day in the house, it used to be a matter of departmental policy to reserve Lindsay as an arsenal for small arms munitions. But with the very much increased production of small arms ammunition in Quebec arsenal in the last few years, as a matter of policy it will now be quite possible not to reserve Lindsay arsenal for the purpose for which it used to be reserved. With regard to machinery in private plants, just two plants were mentioned in the debate in the house. The total machinery in the Montreal plant is of the value of about $235,000; in the other, I am told, it is $844,000. That is paid for as to two-thirds by the Canadian government and one-third by the British government, and is entirely owned by the Canadian government.

Mr. CLEAVER: This afternoon, when this matter was under discussion, the hon. member for Weyburn made these statements:

> We are playing our part as a government and a people in helping to finance and support an armament ring who . . . constitute a serious menace to the peace and good government of the world. . . . Since the war it has been known that these armament racketeers . . . have fostered suspicion and distrust. . . . In my opinion nothing could be more serious . . . than to become a link in the international armament chain, and that is what we are rapidly becoming. . . . Here is the National Steel Car Corporation of Hamilton, Ontario, with at least twenty batches of exports.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member for Halton, is, I think, out of order. He is repeating something which was discussed this afternoon. We are now on the bill, paragraph (b) of section 2.

Mr. CLEAVER: I am speaking to the word "contract" in section 2, paragraph (b) of the bill. I again ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw that statement. There are many employees of the National Steel Car company living in my riding.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is definitely out of order.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, I do not like to oppose the minister in this regard. I believe that he is doing this in good faith. At the same time I am strongly of the opinion that that figure of $5,000 is too high, and I am going to move an amendment:

> That the word "five" in the twentieth line be deleted and the word "one" substituted therefor.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Before I sit down may I say that I appreciate the attitude the minister has taken that he does not wish to have this purchasing board cluttered up with small contracts. The purchasing board can easily protect itself in that regard by proper organization, through which it can be arranged that the smaller contracts will be merely glanced over by them, and one of their officials associated with the department will be able to check up with them. My opinion is that the figure should be "one," or if the minister prefers it, that all contracts should be submitted, as I suggested earlier in my remarks. But I think the simplest way is to make it $1,000 instead of $5,000, because then the department will be able to make small purchases without cluttering up the machinery of the purchasing commission.

Mr. POWER: I think the $5,000 limit was arrived at largely by analogy to other matters. As my hon. friend knows, under the Public Works Act any contract of over $5,000 is subject to the procedure of calling for public tender. Under regulation of, if I am not mistaken, the treasury board the same thing applies, that all contracts of over $5,000 must be submitted to council. But that is because $5,000 is considered to be a fairly reasonable amount.

Perhaps if we went to the genesis of the legislation we would conclude that it arises out of the desire of the minister and the government and the house generally to avoid any criticism of what are known as munition contracts. I do not suppose anybody in the house desires that the ordinary administration of the department should be in any way interfered with. The objections are with respect to munition contracts. I can hardly conceive of any objectionable munition contract which would be under $5,000. What is in the mind of the public at this time and in the minds, I think, of all of us, is to prevent what is called war profiteering, profiteering in blood. We have heard it often enough on the hustings and in this house. It seems to me that the bill goes pretty far when it states that this board, which, after all, is a board to deal with munition contracts, shall have full power and authority to inquire into these. Heaven knows, it will have work enough. Does any hon. member suggest that a contract for clearing snow at the citadel at Halifax or at Quebec, the sort of contract which is called for in the ordinary course of business of the department, and represents under $5,000, probably $1,500 or $1,300 for the whole winter, should be submitted to the special board? It is dealt with without even going to council; no order in council is called for in these cases.

An hon. MEMBER: Such contracts would not come under the act, anyway.

Mr. POWER: Contracts for conservancy, contracts of all kinds that are just the ordinary necessary part of the business—"requisitions," the hon. member for Winnipeg North called them—are contracts for which tenders are asked in every case. I do not think anybody would contend that this board should have to deal with that kind of thing.

Mr. MANION: I do not argue that this board will deal with that, and I do not think, if the clause is changed from $5,000 to $1,000, the board will do any such thing. For example, when the board is told that there is a piece of work necessary—to use the example cited by the Minister of Pensions and National Health, clearing the snow at Halifax—once it is explained to the board that that is the purpose of the contract the board can dispose of it just as rapidly as the department could. It is merely a safeguard. I was informed this very day by a big contractor that in some departments of the government—and I am not blaming this government particularly, perhaps, more than past governments—by keeping contracts down below $5,000 large amounts of work are given to favoured contractors. I am told that by a contractor who has had very big dealings with governments. In view of that, and in view of the desire not only of the house but of the country to have these contracts above suspicion in every way, I make that suggestion.

I have enough respect for the board which the government will appoint to believe that by a proper type of organization they can easily handle such matters as the Minister of Pensions and National Health refers to, in regard to snow clearing contracts and matters of that kind. Once the explanation is made by the liaison officer, whoever he may be, between the department and the purchasing board, it is not necessary for the purchasing board to demand that there be a contract. They know the routine contracts as well as the minister will know them, and once the facts are disclosed the purchasing board will show its own common sense by dealing with them just as they are dealt with now, so long as they are handled in a fair and proper manner.

I do not wish to be captious or unfair in my criticism, but I suggest that the minister would be well advised to accept the amendment or to put the matter in some other way. I am not holding out for the amendment, although I will hold out unless something is offered in its place. If a clause is inserted providing that all contracts shall be submitted to the board for its approval, in a more or less formal way, that will satisfy me; otherwise, unless something else is offered by way of substitution, I shall have to stand by the amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I would refer my hon. friend to section 4. If $1,000 were substituted for $5,000, the board would have exclusive power and the department would have no power.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The other day when this subject came up in another connection, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), if I remember rightly, expressed the hope that when the defence purchasing bill came before the house, no effort would be made to have any transfer from the Department of National Defence to the finance department. He said that a move of the kind would be in the nature of a departure from the principle of ministerial responsibility. I do not agree with that view. I do not think there is any departure from responsible government in having financial matters referred to a treasury board, but I do think there is something still owing to ministers of the crown, who are heads of different departments, that they should all to as great an extent as possible be treated alike with respect to the administration of the affairs of their several departments. I would certainly look upon a request to transfer every contract, no matter how small the amount might be, over $100 and up to the figure named here, from the Department of National Defence to the Department of Finance, for examination, as a distinct reflection upon the Minister of National Defence compared with his colleagues. For that reason, anxious as I am to see this legislation made as tight as it possibly can be to effect the purpose aimed at, I would not be prepared to support an amendment which would have the effect I have mentioned.

I believe the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) is quite as capable of seeing that all contracts in his department are just as honourably awarded, and business in that department as well carried out, as other ministers of the crown are with respect to their departments. Under the statute mentioned by the Minister of Pensions and National Health there is a provision that wherever contracts are in excess of $5,000, public tenders must be called for. The amount of $5,000 was fixed in this particular legislation with that precedent in mind, and I think it is a pretty fair basis to go on. I do submit that this legislation is a departure, going a long way in a new direction, and the effort we are making in the matter would, I believe, only be impeded in the long run if at this stage we tried to go further along the road of change than we are going in the bill which is now before us. I am sure the leader of the opposition has the same purpose we have in seeking to make this measure as acceptable as possible to the public; but having had a good deal to do with the administration of large departments, he knows that there are many matters that do not appear on the face of things when legislation is being put through, which come to play an important part later on in administration. If after this measure is on the statutes and its efficacy tested it is found that there is some special reason why contracts of a smaller amount should go before the board, that will be time enough to consider the question; but for the present we are, I believe, going far enough if we retain the figure now proposed.

Mr. HOMUTH: I cannot see the logic of the Prime Minister's argument. To make the change from $5,000 to $1,000 is no reflection on the minister. If there is any reflection at all on the minister it is the fact that the larger contracts will be dealt with by the Department of Finance, and that is provided for in the bill. Some of the suggestions made by the Minister of Pensions and National Health would not come under this bill at all. This bill has to do with the purchase of munitions and supplies; it has nothing to do with shoveling snow or doing work of that sort. I think we can very well make the change from $5,000 to $1,000.

Mr. BROOKS: It does not seem to me that there is any provision for the purchasing of machinery for the equipment of factories. The government has already spent large sums of money for equipping arsenals and for assisting in the equipment of other factories, and it will need to expend large sums in the future. Looking over the section I do not find that the money expended for this equipment is included in the definition here. Is the purchase of machinery for the equipment of factories included?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): For future purposes, yes; any equipment above $5,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Paragraph (ii) of (b) refers to the construction, erection, repair, improvement or extension for the department of buildings, and so on. Had this law been in effect at the time the contract was let for the operations in the Inglis plant or in the plant in Montreal, would contracts for the alteration of those plants have been handled by this board, had the board been functioning then?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: I understood the minister to say that equipment for factories is included. Where do we find that in this section?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In (b) (i):

> the purchase for the department of any armaments, munitions, military, naval or air force stores, ships, aircraft, or any other equipment. . . .

Mr. BROOKS: That seems hardly broad enough.

Mr. MANION: May I say just a few words in reply to the Prime Minister. I am not in any way reflecting on the minister, and I have no intention of doing so, but I do not agree with the right hon. gentleman that this is the same as every other department. I am open to correction, but I am not quite sure that the figure in regard to all other departments is $5,000.

Mr. POWER: I have not checked on it, but so far as calling for public tenders for construction of public works is concerned, I am sure that is the figure.

Mr. MANION: I am wondering. I was trying to throw my mind back to the Department of Railways and Canals which let contracts amounting to many millions in the few years I was there. I think the limit was $2,500, not $5,000, but I am not certain.

Mr. POWER: There is this distinction to be made, that under the Public Works Act tenders must be called for if the amount of the contract exceeds $5,000. What I am not quite sure but almost sure of is that all contracts amounting to over $5,000 in any department must go before council. Under that amount they need not.

Mr. MANION: I thought it was $2,500 in the Department of Railways and Canals, but I am subject to correction. At any rate I repeat that this is not quite the same as other departments. There is no demand from anyone in this country as far as I know that the ordinary departments of government, whether Public Works or Agriculture or Trade and Commerce, should have a board appointed to look after their contracts. But there is an insistent demand that the purchase of munitions and war materials should be handled in a different manner.

Mr. FACTOR: Substantial orders.

Mr. MANION: Yes, it is substantial orders of which I am thinking. The minister said that nobody could make a very large amount of money out of a contract for $5,000. But repeated contracts for amounts just under $5,000 given to friends might mean a great deal of profit. I am not suggesting that this department would attempt to do that, but I know no reason why the department should not be glad to put this legislation into such shape that no one could have any ground for making such an accusation. There was a suggestion that the requirement should apply to all contracts. I realize that small purchases of supplies for the department, up to, say $1,000, might well be left out. But I do not think a purchasing board would find any difficulty in so organizing itself that it could deal with these smaller contracts in a way that would not interfere with the efficiency of the department, but would give assurance to the people in regard to purchases of munitions at any rate, whether by this government or the next—because this legislation will go on when our government comes in next year, so I want to get it in good shape.

Mr. POWER: They may get a better man as chairman.

Mr. MANION: Well my hon. friend will be in the senate by that time. He is one who, I hear, is ready to desert the sinking ship.

Mr. POWER: "They won't kill me, James, to make you king."

Mr. MANION: I should like, however, to see the legislation in good shape. I do not see any reason why the government should object to lowering that figure to $1,000. I have not heard any argument that makes me think it should not be lowered, so as far as I am concerned it stands.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In this connection the paragraph reads:

. . . provided that the foregoing definition shall not extend to any defence equipment, manufactured in an arsenal or factory owned and/or operated by the government of Canada, or to projects carried out by persons in the employ of His Majesty the King in right of Canada.

My hon. leader, speaking to-day on the resolution, pointed out that he did not think this bill went far enough; that the board's advice should be available to the defence council with respect to the manufacture of munitions by the government. Why deprive the Department of National Defence of the advice of this board in connection with any projects they intend to carry out themselves? Why not let them have something to do with it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Government arsenals are supervised by government officials, and we could not purchase from ourselves. That is why the operations of the purchasing board would not extend to government arsenals.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That answers one part, but the paragraph also includes "projects carried out by persons in the employ of his majesty," such, for instance, as fortifications of one kind and another. Surely the advice of these business men would be of value to the department in carrying out such projects. Why exclude them? Everything possible should be done to satisfy the public mind.

Mr. HEAPS: To what department of the government will this defence purchasing board be directly responsible?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): To the Minister of Finance, who brings the recommendations of the board before the governor in council.

Mr. HEAPS: They will not be under the direct jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, in no way at all, except that the requisitions go from the department to the purchasing board, and they have certain powers by way of getting information and cooperating with some of the officials of the Department of National Defence in regard to requirements.

Mr. HEAPS: I wonder whether that is an altogether desirable arrangement. Here we are going to have two departments purchasing supplies for the Department of National Defence. Duplication of that kind should be avoided. I could see that a reduction of the amount from $5,000 to $1,000 might make difficulties for the Department of National Defence. I am inclined to think even the $5,000 will make some difficulty. I think there should be some direct contact between the Department of National Defence and the proposed board. Would it not be desirable for the purchasing board to come under the Department of National Defence and then report to the Department of Finance? As it is now, we are setting up a new department probably in competition with the Department of National Defence.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As I pointed out the other day in speaking on the resolution, in the organizations that we had in this country in 1915 and 1918, in one case the board reported to the Prime Minister and in the other to the Minister of Finance. The whole idea is to make it responsible to the treasury, following the well established practice in Great Britain where the treasury scrutinizes contracts of this kind. I think it is in the interests of the Department of National Defence to have it in this way, because it will do away with a great deal of criticism and allow the officials of the department to concentrate on the work of organizing our defence forces.

Mr. HEAPS: When the proposed board is set up, is it the intention that any of the expert officials of the Department of National Defence shall, so to speak, go to the finance department?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, but I can imagine that a few who have been doing this work would be seconded for duty under the jurisdiction of the new purchasing board.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I was trying to get the relative production of the government arsenals compared with that of private contractors. I shall not labour that point, but does the government propose to extend the field of operation of government-owned plants beyond what they are now doing? I understood from the minister that now they mainly manufacture small arms ammunition and small shells. Is it the government's policy to extend that, or will that relatively small production by the government arsenals remain so compared with the increase in manufacture by private contractors?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I stated the other day, I think, that the production at Valcartier had been increased to about six or seven times the previous production in regard to small arms munitions, and I further stated that it was my desire, and I believe the desire of the government, to extend the production in government arsenals as far as practicable. As a matter of fact, at the present moment we are working on a scheme in regard to the development of the Lindsay arsenal.

Mr. GREEN: Take, for example, rifles or heavy machine guns; how are they to be acquired? Are they to be manufactured in dominion arsenals or are they to be purchased?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As my hon. friend probably knows, all the heavy machine guns are imported from Great Britain. The question of whether whatever government may be in power will proceed with the erection of a gun factory in Canada is a matter for consideration. At the present time we are proceeding, as my hon. friend knows, to have light machine guns manufactured in Toronto, while the heavier machine guns are all being imported from the old country.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the government's policy to purchase rifles or to manufacture them?

[Mr. Ian Mackenzie.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The government's policy in that regard will be determined in the future. At the moment I am not in a position to state definitely what it will be.

Mr. STIRLING: What instances can the minister give of projects carried out by persons in the employ of His Majesty the King in the right of Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That would refer to day labour directly employed by the crown.

Mr. STIRLING: Such as what?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Any works done by the department by day labour; the work at Trenton, for example.

Mr. PELLETIER: In the case of a joint contract in which the Canadian department was interested in cooperation with the British war office, if it was decided to award a contract in Canada for the manufacture of equipment that might belong to both the British war office and the Canadian department, would contracts of that type come under the jurisdiction of this board?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If it were for more than $5,000 it would come under the jurisdiction of the proposed board.

Mr. PELLETIER: Even though it might originate with the British war office?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: There is an amendment before the committee moved by the leader of the opposition, that the word "five" in line 20 of paragraph (b), section 2, be struck out, and the word "one" substituted therefor.

Amendment negatived: yeas, 32; nays, 63.

Mr. GREEN: On several occasions earlier in the session the suggestion was advanced that the government should make use of certain Canadian National railway shops for the manufacture of at least some of this defence equipment. As I read section 2, it is not clear as to the class in which such supplies would come. Would they be purchased by the board, or would they be considered as manufactured by the government? I hope the minister will give serious consideration to that proposal. In the Journal of the Parliaments of the Empire for October, 1938, I find this, dealing with the way in which South Africa is procuring defence equipment:

It had been decided to establish new railway workshops at Pretoria to build medium sized lorries convertible into armoured vehicles for railway and government purposes. A joint committee of defence and railway experts was now examining the possibility of a subsidy by the defence department to the railways—

I understand these are government railways.

—for the purpose of acquiring and working certain heavy presses and a forging plant, which would be in a position to engage in aspects of armament manufacture at present beyond the means of local industry.

What arrangements have been made in regard to the Canadian National railway shops?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There are no definite arrangements, except in so far as they were included in the surveys which were made for the information of the department in regard to the capacity of various plants. With regard to the other question asked by my hon. friend, I would think it largely a matter of opinion as to whether the Canadian National workshops would come under that subsection. My personal opinion is that they would.

Mr. GREEN: Would it not be well to make it clear in the latter part of the section?

Mr. POWER: If the Canadian National Railways entered into a contract with the government as the Canadian National Railways I imagine that contract would go before the defence purchasing board; but if the Canadian National shops were taken over and operated by the government it would be equipment manufactured in an arsenal or factory owned or operated by the government of Canada. I think that would be the answer to my hon. friend's question Paragraph (b) agreed to.

Paragraphs (c) to (e) inclusive agreed to.

Section agreed to.

On section 3, subsection 1—Board constituted.

Mr. HAYHURST: We have a chairman and three other members making up this board. Would any of these be public officials?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That has not been determined up to the present time. As a matter of policy that has not yet been decided. During the debate to-day the suggestion was made by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition that possibly one of the officials of the defence council might be appointed to this board, but so far as the government is concerned we have not yet given the question any definite consideration.

Mr. HOMUTH: I think this is one of the most important sections of the whole bill. This afternoon the leader of the opposition advanced the suggestion that a member of the defence council should belong to this board. If that is not acceptable to the government, then I would suggest that the chairman of this board should be made a member of the defence council, as has been done in England. In the old country, even with its years and years of armament manufacture, they found themselves up against a difficult situation in the last year or two. They were not getting deliveries of war materials as they had expected to get them. Instead of changing everything round and upsetting the whole system, however, they simply enlarged the system and made the head of their munitions purchasing board, or whatever they call it, a member of the defence council. I do think that, as my leader suggested, one member of the board should be a member of the defence council; or, in the alternative, that the chairman of this board should be made a member of that council. I believe there should be a closer relationship between the defence council and this board than is provided in this legislation, and I believe we should have some assurance from the minister that something along that line will be done. I think it is essential for the proper working out of the system.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In regard to the point raised by my hon. friend and referred to this afternoon by the leader of the opposition, in any event it would not be necessary to embody that in this legislation. As my hon. friend knows, by order in council, the minister can at any time add to the defence council. But without consenting to the suggestion being introduced into the legislation at the present time, I should be glad later on to give every possible consideration to the suggestion of the hon. member.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): In passing contracts of the kind indicated, it is important that some consideration be given to conditions of labour under which men will work on contracts. Has the government given consideration to having one of the members of the board a representative of organized labour?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I can assure the hon. member the government has given no consideration whatsoever to either the individuals or their occupational qualifications. In the recommendations of Mr. Justice Davis there was a suggestion that one of the four should be from a labour group. I shall be glad also to give consideration to the suggestion of the hon. member.

Mr. MANION: In regard to the matter to which reference has just been made by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr.

Homuth) and to which I referred this afternoon, may I say I believe the government and the minister would be very wise to reconstitute the board along the lines suggested. It seems to me the board would be far better able to carry out its duties if on it there were a permanent member of the defence council. My personal suggestion would be either the ordnance officer or the chief of general staff. In my opinion, either of those gentlemen would be suitable, in addition to the minister.

I do not wish to move an amendment to that effect, and I have thought the minister would hold up the clause, give it further consideration, and then advance it in altered form. If he were to do that, I would be satisfied. Otherwise I would like to move an amendment that the board consist of five members. The present personnel would remain as it is, but one of the members of the defence council would be added. I will leave this to the minister or to the government. I believe my suggestion would strengthen the board because it would involve direct connection with the council, in addition to the connection it may have through the minister. There would be direct connection between the defence purchasing board and the defence council, and I believe the suggestion would add very much to the usefulness of the board and, generally, would bring about much greater efficiency than otherwise there might be.

By virtue of his office the minister is a member, and with another permanent man with whom they could discuss the whole problem it seems to me the activities of the body in question would be strengthened. For example, the board would consist of four people. I should suppose that the chairman would be something by way of an industrialist who would understand the making of contracts and for that reason would be in a position to deal, in a businesslike way, with contracts given. The other three would act in an advisory capacity and would come in occasionally. It seems to me the chairman of the board, who would be a permanent official, would be happy to have the services of someone who would know military matters even better than the minister himself, or a man like myself, if I were minister. I do not pretend to know much about matters of that kind. I should think the chairman should be happy to have someone from the permanent staff with whom he could discuss the whole matter. I am not making the suggestion with any intention of embarrassing the minister, but I do believe it would improve the legislation materially.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I appreciate the remarks of my hon. friend. As we have not tied up the legislation by any specific occupational qualifications, I feel, in regard to the suggestion made that, although I have the highest possible regard for the present chief of general staff and the master general of the ordnance, I think the carrying out of my hon. friend's suggestion would have to be left to future developments.

In regard to the relationship between the board and the defence council, I can assure my hon. friend that so far as I am concerned every effort will be made to establish a close liaison between the two. I should not like by an amendment to the legislation at the present time to accept any specific occupational qualifications of members from the defence council, or from any other quarter.

Mr. MANION: I was not suggesting any individual officer. As a matter of fact, I had written out an amendment in these words:

That the word "four" in the thirteenth line on page 2 be deleted, and the word "five" be substituted therefor, and that the following words be added to the clause in line 16, "with one member of the defence council, other than the minister."

The member would be chosen by the minister himself. If the minister has some objection, and if he feels that he cannot accept it, I should like to press the matter. If he says he will accept it, then he may move the amendment himself, if it suits him better to do so. I do not care about that. Otherwise I should like to move the amendment myself, and if the government wishes to vote it down, it is their choice.

Mr. FACTOR: With all due respect to the leader of the opposition, I think it would be a mistake to have either the chief of general staff or the ordnance officer on the purchasing board. Presumably the board is to be set up for the purpose of keeping a check on the requisitions put in by the Department of National Defence. Before putting in a requisition for war munitions, that department is likely to consult the very official who subsequently would be on the purchasing board, and the two duties of that officer would conflict.

I believe the personnel of the board should comprise persons altogether apart from the Department of National Defence, and be persons who would be able to check up on all requisitions put in by that department.

Mr. BROOKS: I believe I see the force of the argument of the leader of the opposition. As I understand it, the requirements of the different branches, including the naval and air forces, would originate with some member of the defence council. That person might be the head of the naval service or the head of the air service. As the requirements originate in the defence council, it would seem to me to be a very good idea to have the chairman of the board either sit in with the defence council or have the chief of general staff sit in with the purchasing board. Certainly there would be a connecting link between the two, and it would be the means of giving a clear understanding to the board of what the requirements were for, and why they were being sought.

Mr. MUTCH: In disagreeing with the suggestion of the leader of the opposition may I say that it does not seem important to me, once the decision has been made within the department that certain contracts should be called for, that there should be anyone from the defence council on the board. My understanding is that it would be a business committee. While I have the highest regard for the military knowledge and accomplishment of the present defence council, some of them having a sufficient number of medals to make them bowlegged, carrying them around, it would seem to me that their military accomplishments do not necessarily in any sense of the word make them business men. The mere fact that a man might be an excellent military officer or a leader of men in the defence of his country does not necessarily—and in my opinion probably would not—make him a valuable member of the board.

Mr. STIRLING: The hon. member for Royal has put forward a suggestion which had occurred to me, and which I was about to make, that if the government is prepared to give consideration to the idea of a liaison or close linking between the board and the defence council it might perhaps better go in the direction of the chairman or even a member of the board being present at meetings of the defence council, for the very reasons the hon. member pointed out. The purchases which will have to be made will be naval, military, air and civil, and it might not be as easy to choose a member of the defence council capable of speaking on all four branches as it would be to have the liaison effected by the chairman of the board sitting in on the defence council.

Mr. POWER: In reply to the suggestion of the leader of the opposition may I point out that, after all, this is to be a board which is presumed to apply whatever talents and capacities men in business are supposed to have in connection with the purchase of supplies. It was at least hinted in the Davis report that the very training of men engaged in military life is not such as would make them very readily able to discuss, negotiate and enter into contracts of this kind, and I think anyone who has had a little experience of military life would come to the conclusion that it is not a business training, at any rate, whatever else it may be. But the idea of the act is that the military men, whether they be army, navy or air force, having come to the conclusion that certain equipment, guns, munitions or whatever it may be, is required, will submit their requirements to the purchasing board under clause 4, and their requisition must specify in detail:

(a) the defence equipment to be purchased, the quantity thereof and specifications therefor, the time and place of delivery, the parliamentary appropriation available for such purchase, the quantity of such defence equipment already in the possession of the government of Canada or contracted for but not yet delivered, and such other data as may be considered requisite; or

(b) the defence project to be constructed, erected, improved or extended, the location of the same, the plans, drawings and specifications therefor if necessary, the estimated cost, the approximate date at which such project is required to be completed, the parliamentary appropriation available to meet the cost thereof, and such other data as may be considered requisite.

The point I wish to make is that the Department of National Defence and the officers thereof, whether they be on the militia council or in any one of the branches, are the people who are charged with the duty of requisitioning what they require. I do not know what purpose would be served by having them on the purchasing board except to go there as advocates of what they require; and should it so happen, as perhaps it might, that they might be more extravagant in their ideas than perhaps a business man would be, they would be just one more advocate on the board to persuade it to accede to that particular thing. It would seem to me the part of wisdom rather to have the board outside the department to decide whether the requisition made was fully justified. I would think from a business standpoint that would be the proper thing to do, giving to the board the fullest power to inquire why these things were required, and at the same time giving to the department, naturally as a corollary, the right to show the board that they require such and such a thing rather than this particular thing or that they require this particular kind of munitions rather than another kind of munitions. It seems to me that the set-up will work pretty well, and that to do what is suggested might seriously impair the work of the board.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, I agree with those who have said that this is a very important section of the bill, but it is a section that I do not think this committee can do very much about, nor do I think we would be wise in trying to do anything about it. If this bill has been sincerely put forward to fulfil a definite purpose and need, as we must accept that it is, then the governor in council will be anxious to select the best individuals possible to carry out the functions of the board, and I do not think we are justified in trying to restrict the governor in council in any way whatsoever in the selection of the board. Unless individuals of ability and integrity are selected, the bill will not fulfil the functions we expect, and for that reason I do not think the committee should even make suggestions to the governor in council as to who should or should not be on that board.

As I understand it, this purchasing board will perform the function that an individual performs acting in a similar capacity with a private company or a municipal council or possibly a provincial or federal government. The members of the board need not have military training; they need not be concerned about that. They will be told what is required, and the functions of the board will be to buy what is required in the best possible market and to the best advantage of the people of Canada. Consequently, the government itself should be interested in getting the best men available, men of the best ability and integrity. I believe the greater number if not all of the members of the board can be found within the civil service itself, people who will be able to give better service than any appointees from outside.

The CHAIRMAN: An amendment has been moved by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion):

That the word "four" in the thirteenth line on page 2 be deleted and the word "five" be substituted therefor, and that the following words be added to the clause in line sixteen: "With one member of the defence council other than the minister."

Mr. MANION: If the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. MacInnis) is correct in his argument that we should not put any restrictions at all upon the governor in council in selecting the board, then to be logical he should take the attitude that we should not have a board at all.

Mr. MacINNIS: No.

Mr. MANION: If we should not have restrictions upon the minister, we should not have a board to restrict, so I do not agree with my hon. friend's argument.

[Mr. Power.]

The remarks made by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) merely strengthen me in my idea that I was right, because he points out that by clause 8 the board may, through the department, investigate or require information. But so far as I have read the bill—and I have read it pretty thoroughly two or three times—the only person with whom the board has any contact at all is the minister. It does not say that specifically in the bill, but it is certainly implied here, there and everywhere throughout the different sections.

Mr. POWER: Look at paragraph (f) of section 8.

Mr. MANION: Paragraph (f) provides that the board:

(f) shall have power to require any officer or employee of the department to furnish to the board any information which he may have in regard to any of the matters falling within the scope of the duties and powers of the board.

All right. But look at clause 6:

It shall be the duty of the board to supervise the performance of all contracts which may have been entered into pursuant to the provisions of this Part with a view to assuring that such contracts are performed in accordance with their respective terms.

Imagine, if you like, the chairman of this board, a business man, as undoubtedly he will have to be, possibly with military training but very unlikely; he is going to supervise the letting of a contract for the department, and all he has before him are the specifications. He has nobody to talk them over with except the minister. True, he may call in the officers of the department; but if he had with him on the board an officer of the department who was familiar with its needs, a man who understood the military engineering requirements of the department, he would have somebody there who would be in a position to advise him all the time. Otherwise he is going to have to ask the minister, "Can I have such and such an officer brought here to talk over things?" Probably it can be worked, but I think it would be very much to the advantage of the board if the chairman, the business man, has someone associated with him with whom he can talk over these different matters which come before him, these different contracts, the requirements of the department in various ways, from, if possible, the military and naval points of view.

Mr. POWER: One could not expect that the military man would know anything about the air or that the naval man would know anything about the army. So, to follow up my hon. friend's argument, all three men on the board would be soldiers, and we would be back where we started.

Mr. MANION: They would know more than either the minister or myself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I might say a word with regard to what the leader of the opposition has just said. I do not know that he has fully appreciated just how difficult it is, not only for the minister but for the cabinet as a whole, to decide whether or not the requisitions which come from the defence department are absolutely necessary to the extent to which they are made out. As a member of the government, with others of my colleagues I have had occasion in the last couple of years to meet on several occasions with members of the defence council with respect to the requisitions which they were making upon the government in the form of proposed estimates, to consider those estimates with a view to discovering whether what was being requested was absolutely necessary or whether what was proposed was in excess of what was really required. My experience on these occasions—and I think it was the experience of my colleagues as well—was that unless we had some independent board to whom we could refer the requisitions with a view to ascertaining whether they were really necessary, there was no way of getting that information except taking in its entirety what the heads of the different departments said was required.

Take, for example, the militia. Take the air; take the naval service. All of these branches of the defence department have asked from this government amounts vastly in excess of anything that appears in the estimates as brought down. They have told us that what we have brought down to this house at the present time is not at all adequate for the situation as they see it. We have had to examine them and cross-examine them, and study the matter very carefully ourselves before having estimates brought in here. My hon. friend knows that estimates are discussed in the cabinet as a whole, but the defence estimates in addition have been considered by a sub-committee of the cabinet with members of the defence council. I say to my hon. friend, from the experience I have had on that committee of the cabinet dealing with the heads of services of the defence department, that I feel one of the most necessary of all things is to have a board which will be entirely independent of the heads of the defence branches, which will be in a position to advise the government, if the government wished to be so advised, as to whether or not what is being asked for is absolutely necessary in the circumstances. That objective would be defeated in part, I think, by what my hon. friend has suggested. There is nothing to prevent this defence board from having the closest contact with the head of each branch of the defence department. Not only can they meet, but they are expected to have close contact with the heads of these branches. But to attach to that board itself the head of any one of those services, or one who is supposed to represent all of them, would, in my opinion, tend to defeat one of the very objects for which the board is being appointed.

Mr. MANION: Is my right hon. friend suggesting that this board is going to advise the government as to our requirements from a military or a naval standpoint?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Quite.

Mr. MANION: I do not think this board should do any such thing. This board is a purchasing board. As I understand it, it is to see that all contracts entered into by the Department of National Defence are honest and above-board; that they are efficiently carried out, and that the government and the people of Canada get their money's worth in all regards. The minister has not said who are going to be on the board. He has not given us any indication.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not know.

Mr. MANION: But he has not contradicted what I think must be true, that the chairman will be a business man, not a naval or military man. The minister said in reply to me that he probably would not be both, anyway; therefore he is going to be a business man. The other three will be advisory. Are these three advisers and the business man to come to this government and tell them what we are going to need in the way of defence? I do not think they are going to do that. But if the government are convinced by their advisers that a contract is needed for the defence of this country, the board is going to see to it that a contract is entered into which is decent and is fair to the people of Canada. That is all that is intended, so far as I can see.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend may know more about the legislation than I do, but I can assure him that, along with my colleagues, I have given a great deal of thought and consideration to this bill, and one of the objects the government had in mind in the appointment of this board was that the board should have power to ascertain, if so desired, whether or not what was being asked for by the defence department was absolutely necessary. I think that is clearly set forth in section 8, which at the moment I need not go into in detail. But observe the very first paragraph:

> For the purpose of carrying out its powers under this part, the board
> (a) may inquire into the requirements, whether actual or anticipated, of the department for defence equipment, or for defence projects, the specifications thereof and the reasons therefor.

That is the very first of the powers given to the board, to inquire into these things to see whether they are necessary or not.

Mr. BROOKS: May I ask the Prime Minister from whom they would make their inquiries if it would not be from the very men he has mentioned?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They will make these inquiries from the officers of the department. They will weigh the reasons, and they will take any means which they may think most advisable to satisfy their minds on this point. Paragraph (f) of section 8 says that the board—

> . . . shall have power to require any officer or employee of the department to furnish to the board any information which he may have in regard to any of the matters falling within the scope of the duties and powers of the board.

I must say that I think that aspect of the board's work is one of the most important of the duties it will have to discharge, and I believe that that duty will be much better performed if the personnel of the board is kept quite distinct from that of the defence council, although I agree that, as between the chairman of the board and the members of the defence council, there should be the opportunity for the fullest possible kind of collaboration in any particular which either of them may consider to be desirable.

Mr. MANION: In view of that, will the Prime Minister give us some idea as to what he considers these four men should be. One man is to give his full time, and three others will be in an advisory capacity, because all they are receiving is their out-of-pocket expenses. The Prime Minister suggested a few moments ago in his remarks that he thought this board should be independent of the defence department, and surely one man put on from the defence council is not going to be able to vote down four. He is only one out of five; he is well diluted, if I may use that word, and the four can vote him down any time. He is there only to give them advice. I would have no objection to the suggestion made by a couple of other hon. members, that it be worked the other way, and that the chairman of the board be a member, if you like, of the defence council.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That would not require to be inserted in this legislation at all. That could be easily done afterwards—could be considered.

Mr. MANION: This legislation should be reasonably complete. I do not care for the minister's suggestion, which he has made three or four times to-night, that we should pass the legislation on his word that he will do this, that and the other thing which are not taken care of in the legislation. I do not think we should be asked in this committee to do that. We should know the type of people of which this board is going to be composed. Certainly, if it is to be a board which will go to and advise the governor in council what we require in the way of defence, naval, air and military, it is going to be a pretty wide board. It is to be composed of four men, one of them giving his permanent time, a business man who probably does not know anything at all about military, naval or air affairs, and the other three just giving support to him. That, to me, is the most extraordinary proposal I have yet heard in regard to this legislation.

Mr. HOMUTH: I would say that the very argument used by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Pensions and National Health is an argument in favour of the amendment. If, as the Minister of Pensions and National Health says, these military men have not necessarily the business ability required, they are nevertheless going to make certain recommendations. Let us take, for instance, aeroplane engines. The best aeroplane engine in the world is the Rolls-Royce. Suppose they said we needed 100 or 200 Rolls-Royce engines and the recommendation went to the purchasing board. The board would make inquiries and would find out that these engines would have to be bought in England. What else could they do? This board, working along with the defence council, would have to ascertain what was the best engine to use in aeroplanes, and if the Rolls-Royce engine could not be obtained then something else would have to take its place. They might say, "Let us develop an engine in Canada." Some of the automobile firms could do it. The work of the two boards would be so closely coordinated that in my opinion they ought to have a much closer working arrangement than is provided for in this bill.

Mr. POWER: The suggestion is not quite accurate. I am not familiar with all the work of the Department of National Defence, but it seems to me it is never the defence council that makes requisitions. The matter which my hon. friend is discussing, the question of aviation, would be one for the head of the aviation branch. At present it goes to the director of contracts and the director of contracts is a civilian. May I remind the committee that traditionally in Great Britain it has always been considered advisable to have civilian direction of matters of this kind. The direction of military services has been, as far as possible, under somebody not connected with the active army, and to a large extent the same thing obtains in the navy. It so happens that since the last war the incumbents of these positions have been men who have served in the army, but they are not as a rule, professional soldiers. That tradition, I believe, has arisen for a reason. The people of Great Britain have not wished their defence departments to be ruled by professional soldiers, and I think that is pretty well inbred in the British tradition.

Personally I am not convinced that when the aviation branch goes to this board and says, "We think the best engine is the Rolls engine," it would not be better to have the board say, "Look here, young fellow, the Rolls engine costs too much; we cannot afford it; if another engine will do just as well, let us have it." It is the same in every department. I suggest to the leader of the opposition that in the Canadian National Railways the purchasing agent was not an engineer. I do not know whether he is or not, really, but as a matter of fact he had not been practising as a professional engineer. I refer to Mr. Vaughan. When it came to buying engineering equipment or locomotives, it was likely that the man who wanted to buy the locomotives or a certain type of railway truck would go to Mr. Vaughan and say, "We need this type of equipment," and I suggest that in the course of his duties Mr. Vaughan might reply, "That is too expensive; can you not get a cheaper one that will serve the same purpose?" Many times he may have had difficulties with his technical men—I do not know that he had; I am only guessing. The leader of the opposition was Minister of Railways and he may have heard some such thing.

In a department like the Department of National Defence, technical men might ask for the very best equipment, when perhaps another kind would be just as good. I suggest that the purpose of the board is as much control over purely technical men, who naturally cannot have the business knowledge of people outside, as it is for anything else, and I say that without intending to cast the least reflection on any member of the militia council or on the Department of National Defence.

Mr. PELLETIER: We in this corner rather agree with the attitude of the Prime Minister towards the amendment. We feel that this board is an entirely different department. It will be a supply department to meet the needs of the Department of National Defence. What I cannot find logical in the attitude of the leader of the opposition is this. He criticized bitterly the closeness of certain contracts in the Department of National Defence. Well, here it is proposed to move these things as far as possible from the Department of National Defence, but now he seeks to bring in some liaison officer, thereby nullifying the attitude he has taken in the past.

Furthermore, the very fact that there would be someone from the defence council as a member of the proposed purchasing board would be detrimental to the board; for this very good reason, that as time goes on the board itself might very well become used to taking suggestions made by a member of the defence council; and inasmuch as a part of their duties would be to look into records and make certain that the requisitions of the Department of National Defence are what are really needed, the time might come when, instead of making inquiries as fully as they should do in the line of their duty, they might simply take the word of the representative of the defence council and let things slide in that way. If that connection were made it would be harmful to the board. They should have as much freedom of action as possible. If the amendment is proposed we will oppose it.

Mr. MANION: If that is the case, I must sadly accept the opposition. I would point out to the hon. member that my criticism was not of the department having something to do with the contracts. My criticism was of the government generally for permitting the Bren gun and the Montreal Construction Company's contracts. It was of the whole government and perhaps of the minister, if you will. I was not, however, criticizing the technical officers of the department. The technical officers are the only people who, as far as I am aware, know anything about these matters. I do not accept the minister or his assistant, the Minister of Pensions and National Health, as an authority, as knowing any more about the matter than I do from the technical point of view. I suggest that the board be not merely a group without knowledge of these matters, their only liaison being the minister, so that in the ordinary course, when they wished to have some matter discussed, the minister might send them anyone he pleased.

May I deal with a remark made by the Prime Minister, that he hoped this board would advise the government as to how much they should spend—in other words that it should help them make up the estimates for the Department of National Defence. That is boiling it down to a sentence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When requisitions come from the Department of National Defence to this board, one of the duties of the board will be to satisfy itself that these requisitions are necessary to the extent to which they are made out.

Mr. MANION: I do not see how this board will satisfy itself in that regard. The board is being placed above the military machine. I have no reason to think it is not a good machine, and now a certain number of men are to be brought in and put above the whole defence department. That is what it amounts to.

Showing that these sums of money are already allocated, we have already passed clause (ii) which says that this means any contract for:

(ii) the construction, erection, repair, improvement or extension . . . which involves an expenditure by the department of a sum in excess of five thousand dollars, and for which parliament has appropriated moneys or authorized commitments.

In other words, the money has already been appropriated.

Mr. POWER: Not specifically. Suppose they need 10,000 blankets, we do not come to parliament for that. And the board might say that 5,000 would do.

Mr. MANION: But from what I understood the Prime Minister to say this board is to advise the government how much money is to be spent. The Prime Minister said the $63,000,000 is nothing to what the Defence department wanted if added all together.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said that the greatest difficulty the government had was to be satisfied in its own mind that all of these things are necessary. The government's mind will be much relieved if after parliament has appropriated moneys and before they are used to the extent that may be desired by some branches of the defence service, the government is satisfied that those expenditures are absolutely necessary.

Mr. MANION: Well, never in my experience have I known of a government that had to have its mind made up for it by someone else as this government has.

Paragraph (a) of subsection (3) of section 4 refers to:

. . . the defence equipment to be purchased, the quantity thereof and specifications therefor . . . the parliamentary appropriation available for such purchase. . . .

"The parliamentary appropriation available for such purchase." This board has nothing to do in regard to telling the government as to the necessities of the Department of National Defence. The department itself, like every other department, makes up its estimates—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say this board is to advise the government in making up its estimates. I said my experience in dealing with this question when the estimates were being prepared showed the necessity of having some authoritative body that could say whether or not what is recommended and appropriated is absolutely necessary.

Mr. MANION: That is true of every department. The Minister of Finance in every government has to fight every department, because they all want more money than they get. That is one of the difficulties a government has to deal with. I agree with the Prime Minister that all the departments ask for more than the government feels it can give them, and I understand the Department of National Defence at the present time wanting more than it gets; but it seems to me that is settled irrespective of this board.

This board is not for the purpose of going over the estimates of the Department of National Defence. Once the minister of the department has submitted to the Minister of Finance, or to the government, or to the treasury board if you will, its estimates, and this $63,000,000 has been arrived at without any committee to help them decide, then this defence purchasing board is for the purpose of seeing that the expenditure of that money is carried out in a proper fashion. That is the real duty of this board as I see it. I again suggest to the minister or his colleague or the Prime Minister that one or another of them tell us something as to who is to be on this board. I do not mean the names; but in view of the remarkable statement made by the Prime Minister, will he tell us what kind of men are to be on this board? The Prime Minister's statement gives a new purpose for this board; surely he has something in the back of his head that he is not telling the committee in regard to the type of or the occupations of the men who will constitute a board of this kind. I am going to sit down and let one of the three hon. gentlemen tell us what kind of board it is to be.

Amendment (Mr. Manion) negatived: yeas, 15; nays, 72.

Mr. PELLETIER: The last clause of subsection 1 of clause 3 reads:

. . . who shall be appointed by the governor in council and who shall hold office during good behaviour for five years.

The usual phraseology employed in a case of this kind simply says "shall hold office during good behaviour" or "during pleasure." There must be a definite reason for using the language used in this clause. Is it because the government contemplates or believes that at the end of five years they will no longer need to purchase munitions? I should like to know just why these words were inserted.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I assure my hon. friend that is the phraseology usually employed. The appointment is definite for five years.

Mr. PELLETIER: There is no provision here to reappoint them after the period of five years expires. Further clauses provide that certain members may be replaced, but what happens at the end of the five years? Would it be necessary to enact new legislation reappointing these people, or in what manner may they be reappointed? I assume the term of five years is taken as a definite commitment, and it would be necessary either to amend the section or to use some other authority to reappoint these people.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The point made by my hon. friend has perhaps some force. The words "may be reappointed" might be inserted, but I do not think it is legally necessary. I shall, however, be glad to look into it.

Section 3, subsection 1 agreed to.

Section 3, subsections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 3, subsection 4—Chairman to devote whole time.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): When this bill was in the resolution stage it was said from all corners of the house that the effectiveness of this piece of legislation would depend very largely upon the integrity and ability of the personnel. If the persons selected for this board are of high calibre they can do some very effective work; if they are not we are wasting our time here this evening. In the investigations carried on after the war in Great Britain, France and the United States, unfortunate conditions were revealed of men holding positions of similar character who were found to be either directors or shareholders in large armament concerns. I think the government is to be commended for having suggested that the chairman of the board shall not after his appointment be an officer or director of any industrial corporation or company. I wonder, however, if the minister would consider adding to that the words: "nor shall he be a shareholder in any firm engaged in the manufacture of armaments." I do not want to make it too strict. The man selected may be in business, and he should not be expected to drop all his connection with the business world; but the confidence of the Canadian people in such a board and its personnel would be strengthened if they could be absolutely sure that he had no business connection whatsoever with companies that might receive contracts from this board. If he had shares in such companies there is no reason why he could not sell them; it would be simply a matter of asking any man who takes this position to dispose of any shares he holds in any company likely to make application for a contract. And if any company in which he had shares were not making application at the time but later decided to make application, it would be his duty to sell his shares in that company. Only in that way can we give the people of Canada a feeling of confidence in the board that is to be appointed as a result of the legislation we are now considering. I will not move any amendment until the minister has said something about it, but I would suggest that in line 29 of subsection 4 of section 3 the words "nor shall he be a shareholder in any firm engaged in the manufacture of munitions" be added.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The point mentioned by my hon. friend was carefully considered before the legislation was brought in. While I have a certain amount of sympathy with the point of view he has expressed, I am very much afraid that, since it is the desire of the government to obtain an outstanding business man for this position, it would be practically impossible to ask any business man not to be a shareholder in any company. I would agree with my hon. friend if he were to say "a shareholder in any company doing business with the board or the government"; then it would be a different matter, but I think it is going rather too far to extend the principle as far as my hon. friend would carry it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am afraid the minister misunderstood me; that was not what I said. I am not suggesting that the word "shareholder" should be inserted after the word "director." That would be unfair. Any man now engaged in business could not be expected to terminate his contact with the business world because he accepted this responsible position. What I am suggesting is that the words "nor shall he be a shareholder in any firm engaged in the manufacture of armaments," be inserted after the word "company" in line 29. That would not touch any other kind of firm, and I think that makes it quite specific. Certainly I would not extend it to every firm.

Mr. HOMUTH: What does the hon. member mean by "armaments"?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I would mean any firm that might be likely to obtain contracts from this board. No matter how fairly it might be done, I think the man himself, if he thought it over, would want to have this provision inserted; because if any firm in which he held shares should receive contracts from this board in any considerable amount he would never be able to remove the suspicion from the minds of the Canadian people that those contracts were granted to that firm primarily because the chairman of the board held shares in it. I would think he would want that provision inserted for his own protection. I know any man I have in mind who might be considered likely to be appointed to this position would, for his own protection, sell any shares he held in any armament manufacturing concern.

Mr. POWER: Personally I would be inclined to urge the minister to accept the amendment suggested by my hon. friend, but I am not quite sure whether the word "armaments," as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Waterloo South, would cover it. For instance, as has been already pointed out in this house, munitions might mean wheat, feed, fodder, and a thousand and one things. Perhaps by reference to section 2, paragraph (b) (i), we might find some better expression; I see there the words "defensive equipment." I am not quite sure what term I would feel like recommending, but in principle I would be quite prepared to recommend the adoption of the suggestion of my hon. friend, if we could agree upon the proper phraseology.

Mr. HEAPS: It might be allowed to stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has it been decided that an industrialist is to be chairman of the board?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not necessarily.

[Mr. T. C. Douglas.]

Mr. MacNICOL: Then the amendment would be entirely out of order, because it refers to an industrialist.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: Just wait until I have finished, please. The last line contains these words:

. . . be an officer, or a director of any industrial corporation or company.

Why does it not go further and say a member of any legal firm or any other firm?

Mr. POWER: He might be a lawyer and an industrialist.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be glad to give consideration to the point raised by my hon. friend.

Subsection 4 stands.

On section 3, subsection 5—Salary of chairman.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister give us any idea what salary it is intended the chairman of this board should receive?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The government has given no consideration at all to that point.

Mr. MANION: I should like it very much if the government, which the Prime Minister says has been considering this question for so long, would give the committee something in the way of a general idea as to what they think of the board, as to what kind of board they are going to appoint. I do not think we should be asked to pass this bill without being given some information along those lines. A day or two ago the Prime Minister said the government had been giving consideration to this matter long before the Bren gun contract. Well, the Bren gun contract was given a year and a half ago, so the Prime Minister and the government have had a great deal of time to think over this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say before the Bren gun contract was given; I said before there was any suggestion of an inquiry into the Bren gun contract.

Mr. MANION: Well, even that takes us back to last October, or earlier than that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): September.

Mr. MANION: That is six months ago now. Surely the government can give us some idea as to what they have in mind. I am asking this for information, not to embarrass the government. It seems to me they must have some idea in regard to the type of people who are to make up this board. Someone asks if the chairman is going to be an industrialist, and it strikes me that he almost has to be an industrialist. He must be someone of that sort, or a corporation lawyer who has been dealing with contracts. It seems to me he is more likely to be an industrialist, with wide experience in manufacturing. Then, in regard to the other three members of the board, surely we should have some information before this section carries.

Mr. HOMUTH: If this bill is a direct result of the recommendation of Mr. Justice Davis, or if that recommendation had something to do with this bill having been brought in, I would remind the minister that Mr. Justice Davis made in his report a specific recommendation that the board should include a corporation lawyer, a representative of labour, and so on. Would the government say that they are thinking of carrying out this recommendation?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My hon. friend will find that the type of committee recommended by Mr. Justice Davis is entirely different from the purchasing board suggested in this recommendation. If the hon. member will read the report, at page 51 he will find that Mr. Justice Davis recommended a purely advisory committee, whereas this board has definite executive authority. So in that regard the two proposals are quite different.

With reference to the question of the leader of the opposition, I can only repeat that it will be the desire of the government to have some very prominent Canadian citizen, some industrialist or business man, someone with definite experience along the lines of purchasing, at the head of this organization. Who he is to be I do not know, any more than anyone else knows. But I would suggest that the whole success of this purchasing board will depend upon the personality, ability and integrity of its chairman. In regard to the other three members, as I said before no occupational qualification has been laid down, although something was said along this line in the report. I think the others mentioned in the report were a commercial lawyer, an accountant and perhaps a representative of labour, to assist the chairman. However, as yet no definite decision has been made with regard to these occupational qualifications.

Mr. MANION: May I point out, Mr. Chairman, that I was not so far wrong when I said the Prime Minister spoke of a body such as this having been considered by the government before the Bren gun contract inquiry. I will quote what the right hon. gentleman said on March 10, in reply to myself:

> Let me say to my hon. friend that before the commission under Mr. Justice Davis was appointed, the government had decided to bring in a bill along the lines of that being brought in to-day.
> Let me say further that during the last two years my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence and I have had frequent talks together about this very difficult and complicated matter in relation to existing situations of how far it was wise to go in the opening up of arsenals, the letting of war contracts by tender, and with respect to other matters connected with his department; and repeatedly the Minister of National Defence himself has pointed out that he would welcome having some body independent of the Department of National Defence altogether review the contracts of that department so as to ensure that there would be no opportunity for any kind of profiteering or improper dealing with respect to any of them. It was at the instance of the minister and as a result of the talks he had with me as Prime Minister that in the first instance I appointed the Skelton committee—

The Prime Minister goes back two years, so I was not very far wrong when I said the right hon. gentleman certainly implied that this step had been under consideration by the government since long before the Bren gun contract was let. Of course the Prime Minister has left the back-door open; there is a little bit of doubt as to whether or not he was talking about this board. But, as a matter of fact, that is pretty clear. I thought I met it when I made the remark that the Prime Minister certainly implied to this house four days ago that for two years at any rate they have been discussing this very board.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend I cannot understand the smallness of his arguments in some of these matters. He seems more concerned in seeking to find a meaning for words which had never been given to them, or intended, than he does to discuss legislation intelligently. If he thinks his last remark with reference to what I said bears out the truth of anything he has said before, he is perfectly welcome so to construe it. But I can assure him that any impartial reader of Hansard will see that what I have said was quite correct.

Mr. MANION: It is a matter of opinion, and I would suggest to the Prime Minister that he be a little less personal in some of his remarks to me. I was quoting the right hon. gentleman's words, his actual words, right there, and I was putting the interpretation I think any intelligent person would put upon them. I do not need a lesson from him in regard to using intelligence in connection with this question.

The right hon. gentleman has three or four times recently in this house made personal remarks about me, and I say to him now that he must just stop it. I can say things just as personal as he can. I can put my record up against his, dealing with the war, or anything else, now or any time—any time he likes—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Mr. MANION: And a lot of howling from his followers, his rubber stamps, men who simply act as rubber stamps—

Mr. VIEN: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The leader of the opposition has no right to call an hon. member of this house a rubber stamp.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. VIEN: And I ask that he withdraw it.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw "rubber stamp," but neither have my hon. friends the right to attempt to howl me down when I am arguing legitimately with the Prime Minister. I am interrupted in this house I venture to say more than any other member who speaks in this chamber, and I take the interruptions without argument. I have been complimented by my hon. friends opposite upon that. I do not mind interruptions, and I will accept them, but I do not intend to be howled down by a group of men, no matter who they are.

Mr. VIEN: When the leader of the opposition tries to set up his war record against that of the Prime Minister, I think it is unseemly on behalf of the leader of the opposition to do so, because we could also tell him some points that he may have forgotten. For instance, he left his post at the front and became a Liberal candidate in the election of 1917—I am talking about the war record that the hon. member has just mentioned—and when he landed at Quebec he became a Unionist candidate. I say that we do not want—

Mr. LANDERYOU: On a point of order.

Mr. VIEN: I say that we do not want—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, in view of the remarks the hon. member has made, I think I have a right to reply. I was not comparing war records. I did not mention my war record at all. I simply said that I was willing to stack my record up against that of the Prime Minister.

So far as leaving the front is concerned, the hon. member has made a statement which is absolutely false. He said I left the front to run as a candidate. I left the front because I was ordered out by the doctors, and I was operated on as a result of my service at the front. I wish to point out to the hon. member that I did not stay at home, in uniform, as he did. I went to the front.

Mr. VIEN: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In regard to personal attacks and criticisms, although I may be mistaken I thought I had tried to be particularly careful not to be personal in my remarks.

Mr. MANION: My right hon. friend has been particularly careful to be personal three or four times in the house, and I object to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had not intended to be personal. I am afraid my hon. friend has read into what I have said a meaning which was not there. I am afraid he does that on occasions.

Mr. MANION: Before changing Hansard the right hon. gentleman had better see what he said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not changed Hansard. But in looking over Hansard to-day I notice where my hon. friend had changed Hansard with respect to a statement he made the other day in regard to the question of the trade agreement being a matter of importance. When he spoke in the house he said it was not a matter of great consideration. But when I come to look at that Hansard to-day, I noticed it had been altered to read that the trade treaty was one of the most important of all things. When my hon. friend insinuates that I am changing Hansard—

Mr. MANION: I had not insinuated it, either. But I made no change in Hansard. As a matter of fact, I do not see it; my secretary does that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, if my hon. friend leaves Hansard to be revised by his secretary he must take the responsibility for what his secretary does. I revise Hansard myself, and I take the responsibility. However, what I wish to say is this: I have no desire to be personal. If at any time I am personal and my hon. friend will direct my attention to it, I shall be glad to withdraw whatever is personal in my language.

Mr. MANION: What right has the Prime Minister to suggest as he did a few minutes ago—or to say that if I would use intelligence—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think I used any such expression.

Mr. MANION: My right hon. friend will find it when he looks it up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It may be so, but I did not think I had used any such expression. I have every desire to have the debates in the house carried on as free from personalities as they can be.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is high time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my hon. friend would just—

Mr. HOMUTH: I have reason to know about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the reason?

Mr. HOMUTH: I have reason to know that debates should be carried on on a high plane.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I am very glad my hon. friend and I agree on that. However, I think perhaps it is important on all occasions to endeavour to avoid personalities. I shall be very glad to do what I can, to help see that such a course is followed.

May I say this, in regard to war records. My hon. friend has referred to this matter. Since the war I have been before the Canadian people in five general elections, and on four occasions out of five I have been returned as Prime Minister of this country. That is the answer.

Mr. VIEN: I rise to a question of privilege. The leader of the opposition has spread on the record the statement that I had remained at home and had refused to enlist.

Mr. MANION: I did not say the hon. member refused to enlist.

Mr. VIEN: The hon. member said, at any rate, that I had remained at home while he was at war. On a question of privilege I wish to say that on August 4, 1914, with the regiment to which I belong, I was summoned to take the field at Fort La Martinière, where we were in service until December, 1914. Since then for three times I enlisted in the Canadian expeditionary force. The regiments in which I was were disbanded, were sent as drafts, and we were left behind. The only question that arises is that I was not in London, as so many others, who for months and months were waiting for appointments to the front, and were returned to Canada. My record can be compared with that of any other.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 15, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

MR. R. S. WHITE

EIGHTY-THIRD ANNIVERSARY OF BIRTHDAY OF THE MEMBER FOR ST. ANTOINE-WESTMOUNT

Mr. R. S. WHITE (St. Antoine-Westmount): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DUNNING: A question of privilege!

Mr. WHITE: —I am deeply appreciative of your courtesy in permitting me to say a few words of thanks to hon. gentlemen who have greeted me this afternoon, for their goodwill, and particularly to the members of the party to which I belong for this gift of beautiful roses.

To-day I end my eighty-third and begin my eighty-fourth year. It is an old age, at least the sixth of Shakespeare's seven ages. I am reminded of that fact when I recall that it was fifty-seven years ago that I attended my first session in this House of Commons. I was then, in the words of Disraeli, a gentleman of the press, and had no other escutcheon, sitting in the gallery of the fourth estate, commenting upon the proceedings of parliament. That work I carried on for seven consecutive sessions, until, in 1888, succeeding my father, I was elected to sit in this chamber. It is, if I may be forgiven for mentioning it, an example of that bonne entente which should prevail among all classes and all provinces that for seventeen consecutive years two persons resident in the city of Montreal in the good old province of Quebec have represented in the House of Commons a constituency in the heart of the province of Ontario, twenty to forty miles north of the city of Toronto.

Parliament in 1882 enabled me to see in the flesh and to become personally acquainted with many of the members of the parliament of 1878. It is an evidence of the brevity of life and the swift passing of time that, of the men who were in the House of Commons when I first entered it, one only in all Canada other than myself survives—I refer to that distinguished citizen known as the grand old man of Ontario, Sir William Mulock. It has so happened that, of the eleven prime ministers Canada has known since confederation, I have sat in parliament with ten—Sir John A. Macdonald, Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, Sir John Abbott, Sir John Thompson, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, and the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King) who at present rides the whirlwind and directs the storm. If I could apply to myself the lines of Henley—

> I am the master of my fate;
> I am the captain of my soul.

—I would choose to sit in parliament under the twelfth prime minister, the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion).

I have received at the hands of hon. gentlemen many kindnesses and expressions of goodwill, which encourage me to hope that I may have something of "that which should accompany old age—honour, love, obedience, troops of friends;" aye, Mr. Speaker, troops of friends, the very salt and savour of life, without whom existence would be bleak and barren indeed.

So once more I give you all my thanks and the assurance of that abiding gratitude so finely expressed as "the memory of the heart."

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. White) that it would be difficult to find words wherewith to give expression to the appreciation with which all hon. members of this house have listened to the remarks which he has just made. Nor would it be possible to express to him too sincerely the feelings we share towards him on this, his eighty-third birthday anniversary. I believe we are all proud that it has been our privilege to be present in this chamber this afternoon to listen to one who has played such an important part in the public life of the country speaking to members of this House of Commons as he has out of his wealth of an exceptional experience as well as years. We are grateful that his remarks have been taken down by Hansard that they may become for others as well as ourselves a permanent record of one of the most pleasing incidents ever witnessed in the House of Commons of Canada.

My hon. friend has said that if he were expressing what he would like most for himself, it would be that he might have honour, love, obedience and troops of friends. May I say to him that he has all four in abundance from those who sit with him in this house.

He has observed how rapidly time is fleeting. All of us in these days, I think, are impressed above all else by the rapidity with which many of those who have been most familiar figures in the public life of our country are passing away. There are very few links left in the dominion between the Canada of to-day and the Canada of confederation. My hon. friend is one of them—one of them of whom all Canada is proud, because he has been an ornament to the profession of which he has been a member and an ornament to this parliament in which he has represented his constituency for so long a time.

I might say much more to my hon. friend; it would be mostly expressing what we all wish for him. I join in every wish that he has uttered except one—

Mr. WHITE: I did not say when.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), has just remarked to me, even at that I wish him long life. I do wish him that most sincerely and with it the strength needed to support his years. I hope it may be my privilege year after year, from this side, for many years to come to renew the congratulations which I am extending to him to-day.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): After the little masterpiece delivered by my very dear old friend, whom I delight to call Sir Robert White, I am afraid that any remarks of mine would be somewhat of an anti-climax, particularly following the very graceful tribute paid the hon. member by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). At the same time, I think I should be remiss in my duty if I did not say just a word to echo the sentiments of the Prime Minister in everything that he has said—except one. I join with the right hon. gentleman in expressing, for myself and on behalf of those with whom I am associated, the affection which we all feel for this "noblest Roman of them all," the old and distinguished member for St. Antoine-Westmount, who sits to my right—or rather who has honoured me by sitting to my right.

Perhaps I might take the liberty, something that is not often done, of associating with Mr. White his very charming lady, who sits looking down at him from the gallery, in this expression of our affection for him. I think I can assure him of the affection of the whole house both for himself and for her. I might say now something I said at a luncheon which our party gave to our distinguished friend from St. Antoine-Westmount an hour or two ago in the parliamentary restaurant—and I said it in the teeth of my whole party—that of all my followers there is none whose advice and counsel I value quite so highly as I do the advice and counsel of Mr. White.

I heartily echo the wishes of the Prime Minister for a long life of happiness for both Mr. and Mrs. White. I know that I am expressing the hope of all members of my party and, I am sure, the hope of the Prime Minister and his followers, when I say that we should all like to have the honour, for many years to come, of associating in this chamber with the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I, on behalf of my fellow-members from the province of Quebec, associate myself with the tributes of regard and affection which have just been paid to the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. White), whom we consider as one of us and of whom we are proud. Mr. White is a living example of the characteristics which should distinguish the true Canadian—broadness of mind, tolerance, moderation, generosity in his relations with all his fellow-citizens. I wish him many more years of life. Again, on behalf of my French-speaking fellow-members from the province of Quebec, I say to him that we are happy to salute him here as one of us.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): There is really nothing anyone can add to what has already been said, but we in this corner should like to join with the others in our meed of appreciation of the services of our friend Mr. White. At this particular time there are no opposition parties whatever, and I am sure that for once, at least, we are all in entire accord.

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River): I am sure no words from a member as humble as I am could possibly add anything to what has been said by those who have preceded me to-day; nevertheless I think I have a special privilege inasmuch as on various occasions I have been associated with the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount, he being the oldest member of the House of Commons and I the youngest. The only possible tribute I could pay to the hon. gentleman is to say that when later on I have occasion to look back over my past, I trust that my political record will be as happy and as honest a record as that of my hon. friend.

CIVIL SERVICE

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Hull) presented the first report of the special committee to inquire into the operation of the Civil Service Act, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CREAM SEPARATORS—IMPORTATIONS

Mr. LEADER:

1. How many cream separators were imported into Canada from Sweden in 1938?
2. What was the rate of duty imposed?
3. Does the new trade treaty with the United States affect the duty on Swedish cream separators imported into Canada?
4. If so, to what extent?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. 13,371.
2. Twenty-five per cent.
3. Yes.
4. Under the Canada-United States trade agreement, effective January 1, 1939, cream separators are dutiable at 12½ per cent ad valorem. Sweden, being a most favoured nation, enjoys the benefits of this trade agreement.

*REGISTRATION OF EX-SERVICE MEN FOR NATIONAL SERVICE

Mr. MacNEIL:

1. Has the government given approval to the proposal that ex-service men be registered for national service?
2. Will the government accept the records compiled as a result of the survey to be made of ex-service men?
3. If so, for what purposes will the information be utilized, and by what department?
4. Are there conditions that warrant any partial registration for national service?
5. Will further steps be taken to undertake registration of all citizens?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to reply to this question orally.

1. The proposal for the registration of ex-service men was entirely a voluntary cooperative proposal emanating from the organized ex-service organizations.

2. The approval of the government was not in any way required for this purpose, but the ex-service organizations courteously informed the government of their proposals and were informed that the information which would be made available would be welcome.

3. The information should be of general benefit, but it has not been decided to use it for any specific purpose.

4. That is entirely a matter of opinion.

5. As far as voluntary efforts are concerned, the government has no information; and as far as government policy is concerned, the government has never considered taking any such action.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED REQUEST OF ADVISORY AIR COUNCIL FOR RESIGNATION OF MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): I desire to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Has the Air Defence Council of Canada communicated with the Prime Minister requesting the resignation of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) because of unsatisfactory conditions with regard to air defence, as reported in the Winnipeg Free Press of March 10 in a news dispatch over the signature of Major Moore?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I submit that is not a question which should be asked on the orders of the day, nor do I think it is a question that requires an answer. I would however say to my hon. friend that I have had no communication of the kind mentioned, and if I had I would answer it pretty sharply.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS—UNDERTAKINGS IN GENERAL INTEREST AND FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress and for such purpose to authorize the execution of undertakings in the general interest of Canada and requisite for the purposes of the act, out of moneys appropriated by parliament, and also to provide financial assistance to the provinces by way of loan, advance or guarantee, out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, and for the appointment of necessary officers, clerks and employees.

He said: We listened a few moments ago to a speech by the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. White) which will be remembered and treasured by all who heard it. As one of the younger members of the House of Commons I should like to extend my own good wishes and to express the hope that the hon. member may enjoy long years of happiness and usefulness to this country. His presence here has been a benediction, and the example of his public life an inspiration to all of us.

In other years when a resolution similar to this has been before the house I have presented a brief survey of the relief situation resulting from unemployment and agricultural distress, and a more detailed statement of the results obtained under the various measures adopted by the government to deal with unemployment in its various aspects. I intend to follow the same course to-day. When the legislation which will follow the adoption of this resolution is presented a little later, there will be further opportunity to answer questions and provide additional information on questions of policy and administration.

The first part of my task is simplified by the fact that during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I dealt at some length with the statistics of relief and unemployment, and placed upon the record a number of tables based upon the national registration of relief recipients which was commenced under the national employment commission in September, 1936. Since that debate closed, figures have become available for later months, and I intend to place those figures before the house.

Before presenting a statistical survey of the relief situation, however, I want to take strong objection at this time to certain glaring distortions of the true position which have appeared from time to time in some of our newspapers and periodicals. I do so because I believe that responsibility and freedom go hand in hand; and freedom of the press becomes an empty phrase unless it is directed to the service of truth and the destruction of error. So far as relief and unemployment are concerned my position from the beginning has been that it was the part of wisdom to search out and present the truth, however unpleasant it might be. Only by doing so can we know as a government the full measure of the task before us.

With that object in view we provided for a national registration of those in receipt of relief; and from the commencement of that registration we have published a monthly press release giving a summary of the latest available figures, with a comparison with the figures in the preceding month and also the same month in the preceding year. Those figures have separated agricultural aid from unemployment aid, and have also separated employables from heads of families and individuals who were dependent and unemployable. With the regular publication of these figures obtained through the national registration it has been possible to follow the changing trends of the relief situation from month to month and year to year. But the fact that these figures have been available has not prevented certain newspapers and periodicals from grossly distorting the true picture. Repeated references to "over a million persons on unemployment relief" were being given wide publicity in September last, when 553,111 persons across Canada were registered as receiving material aid; and that number included children and aged dependents, unemployable and partially employable persons as well as farmers and their families, whose needs certainly did not arise from any lack of work. Actually at that time the employable persons being assisted numbered 114,460; yet we read of "hundreds of thousands of Canadian workers on relief."

Perhaps no subject related to unemployment has been exposed to more misrepresentation than that of the transients. In January of this year a Canadian periodical, Maclean's magazine, in a leading editorial stated:

> This month, at least 80,000 Canadians will be wandering back and forth across the country, without homes, without work, without definite relief status.

And this, the editorial stated, was a conservative estimate. No information was furnished as to the source of the estimate. Not to be outdone, a few days later one of the daily papers came out in an editorial with the information that there are said to be anywhere from 100,000 to 185,000 transients in Canada. Here again no indication was given as to who said there were such numbers. As a matter of fact, from a survey conducted by the Department of Labour in January information was obtained from reliable sources, the provincial governments and the two railway companies, showing that outside of those being cared for by the joint federal and provincial plan the transients, as defined in Maclean's magazine, numbered less than ten thousand.

I want to refer to another figure, again grossly distorted, that has been given wide currency in this country. It has been said that the number of idle young people in the country has reached a total of over 400,000. So far as I have been able to discover, that figure originated in a census survey, so-called, conducted by the Canadian Youth Congress. I do not for a moment question the motives of those who conducted this survey. The Canadian Youth Congress believes that there is a serious youth problem in this country, and I do not question that there is such a problem. What I do question is the technique of research which was adopted by those who made this astonishing computation of over 400,000 idle young people in Canada. Let me indicate briefly to the house, if I may, just what follows the publication of a figure of this kind. When the Canadian Youth Congress issued this figure it was made quite clear, for example, that it included young women as well as young men. But I have seen many a headline, arising from that survey, suggesting that there were 400,000 idle young men in Canada. Surely no one would suggest for a moment that the publication of information of that kind, unless it is based upon most authoritative evidence, can do other than harm not only to this country but to the very group whom the Canadian Youth Congress desire to serve. I have in mind, for example, an article which appeared in the Philadelphia Enquirer, a newspaper published in the United States, which has a wide circulation. This is the headline, bearing out what I said a moment ago:

> 450,000 Idle Youths Pose Grave Problem for Canada.

Then it goes on to explain that this information was obtained from a census survey conducted by the Canadian Youth Congress. I think it may be worth while to spend just a moment or so to explain how this total was arrived at.

In the first place it was not a census survey in the strict sense of that term. It was not even a sample census survey, based upon the actual investigation of conditions in any one city or group of cities. It was merely a computation obtained by a series of arbitrary deductions from the total number of young Canadians between the ages of fifteen and thirty, as given in the census of 1931. And I am informed, I believe reliably, that after making the various deductions, the figure of 465,000 remained. Remember, it includes those from fifteen to thirty years of age; but it also includes those within that age group who are living on farms in this country. The explanation given to me was that these young people are not regarded as being gainfully employed. Well, Mr. Speaker, I did not have the good fortune to be brought up on a farm, but I have had some experience with farming operations; and to suggest that those included in this total who are living on farms in this country are not gainfully employed is surely a wide exaggeration of the truth.

Miss MACPHAIL: They are employed, but not gainfully; there is a distinction.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But they are not idle.

Miss MACPHAIL: No. They are employed, but they are not paid.

Mrs. BLACK: I would suggest to the minister that I know they get their living on the farms.

Mr. ROGERS: Certainly. Surely there cannot be any question with regard to the danger—and I use that word advisedly—of having gross exaggerations of the unemployment situation spread about this and other countries in such terms as I have just described. If newspaper editors wish to criticize those charged with responsibility for unemployment and relief, they are perfectly free to do so. I do not want it to be thought for one minute that in what I have said just now I take the slightest objection to criticism of policy. But I do take the ground very strongly that one cannot separate freedom from responsibility, and I suggest that those who write these editorials or who use these figures ought, before they are published, to take some reasonable care. If they do not use the official figures, then they might very well provide in the article itself the source of the information they have obtained.

Mr. HEAPS: Have we any official source?

Mr. ROGERS: So far as criticism is concerned, may I say that I would think the millennium had come if newspaper editors refrained from criticism.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Has the minister any figures to give us?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. I will proceed to that presently, if my hon. friend will just be patient.

Freedom of criticism does not imply the right to misrepresent and distort facts upon which complaints are based. To do so is not an attack on governments; in effect, it is an attack on the country. Its result cannot be otherwise than to undermine confidence at home and abroad. I suggest further that it does damage to the country in much the same way as a gross exaggeration of casualties would do damage to the country, if it were engaged in war.

As I said a moment ago, I shall now turn to the latest available figures on unemployment and relief, from the national registration. I shall place these figures before the house; and after having done so, I am going to make some comparisons between the totals of the various classifications this year and this month, and in previous years.

Preliminary figures showed that the grand total of all classes of persons on urban and agricultural aid in January was 978,000, an increase of almost eight per cent over the December figure, as revised to date, but 3·7 per cent less than in January, 1938. The dominion total of unemployed but fully employable persons on aid in January of this year was 180,000, representing an increase of eleven per cent from the December total of 162,000. The figure for January of this year represented an increase of nearly seven per cent over that for January a year ago. A total of 662,000 persons were receiving non-agricultural aid in January of this year, or 9½ per cent more than in the previous month. This category includes all totally unemployable, partly employable and fully employable persons, together with all dependents and family heads. This aggregate shows a net increase of about five per cent from the figure for January, 1938.

Although unemployed persons receiving aid showed, as usual, a seasonal increase from December to January, and brought the January total above that of the same month in 1938, the grand total of persons of all classes in receipt of aid showed a decrease from the year before. The number of farmers and members of their families in receipt of agricultural aid continues to show a decline from the year before. Some 67,000 farmers who, together with their dependents, account for a farm population of 316,000, were reported as receiving agricultural aid for subsistence in January. Of these persons 270,500 were located in Saskatchewan alone. The dominion total on agricultural aid, while up 4·3 per cent in January over December's revised figure, was almost eighteen per cent less than in January, 1938. The January total of farmers and their families on aid in Saskatchewan, while continuing to hold the improvement over the total a year ago, increased by three per cent over the total for December, 1938, but was still more than nineteen per cent lower than in January a year ago.

Briefly, one may say with respect to agricultural aid that in the past year there has been some improvement. With respect to urban aid, which may more properly be called unemployment aid, there has been an increase in the total number. That applies also to the total of those on aid, in so far as unemployment is concerned, including also their dependents.

Mr. HEAPS: Is the minister in a position to give the house the number who at present are unemployed and not on relief?

Mr. ROGERS: Well, Mr. Speaker, this matter has been discussed time and again in the house—

Mr. HEAPS: It is very important.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be pleased indeed to take note of the question of my hon. friend, but all that we have with respect to the number of those unemployed is, as he well knows, an estimate which is prepared on an index basis by the bureau of statistics, and which is made available from month to month.

Mr. COLDWELL: Like the youth congress.

Mr. ROGERS: No, I would say it is based on an entirely different technique from that followed by the youth congress. By the way, since my hon. friend has raised that point, I shall return to the question of the 400,000 figure, which has been mentioned. Actually, according to our own figures, the number of those within the age group supposed to be covered by the youth congress estimate, and on relief, was 26,000. That was the number of those within that age group who were registered as being in receipt of relief.

Mr. MacNEIL: Does that include all those who would be cared for by the various charitable agencies?

Mr. ROGERS: No; it includes those receiving government assistance.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does it include those being cared for by their parents?

Mr. ROGERS: I have no doubt that those cared for by their parents have never appeared on the list of those who are in receipt of aid. Why should they?

Mr. LANDERYOU: There are many between—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ROGERS: If my hon. friends proceed they will discover that everyone in this country, including members of the House of Commons, is unemployed. Further, in the last census of the western provinces I believe we have perhaps the best indication of the incidence of that particular problem. I have not suggested that there is not a problem. All I have objected to is the exaggeration of that problem. Let us try to face it as it is; but by all means do not let us exaggerate it.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. ROGERS: Will my hon. friend permit me to continue.

Mr. HEAPS: If I may?

Mr. DUNNING: We shall be going into committee.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the minister any figures at all to give the house at this time in regard to the unemployment situation in the country? All the figures he gave were with regard to the unemployed on relief.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): He is making his speech.

Mr. HEAPS: That is a fair question.

Mr. ROGERS: I was going to point out that in the last census conducted in the western provinces, those who took the census took first a record of those between the ages mentioned who were actually on relief. Possibly at the same time they took a census of those within that age group who, while not on relief, were reported as being unemployed. The number of those classified as unemployed was about four times the number registered as unemployed and on relief. The inference to be drawn is that if you have a statement showing those within the age group who are on relief and multiply it by four you will have a pretty fair indication of the total number within that age group who are unemployed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is before the depression?

Mr. ROGERS: No; that was according to the last western census, which, as hon. members will recall, was taken in 1936, five years after 1931. I suggest that this is probably as close an approximation to the true figures as we are able to obtain at the present time.

I was going to place before the house a comparative statement of the relief situation, with respect to both agricultural and unemployment relief, for the past two years. I believe this may serve to show that we have been making substantial progress over that entire period, despite the setback which occurred during recent months. These figures are:

Fully employable persons:

(a) Total, January, 1939—180,000; although this was 6·8 per cent over January, 1938, it was 29·2 per cent less than January, 1937.

(b) Average monthly number, January to December, 1938—148,189. This was less by 20·8 per cent than January to December average in 1937.

Total on urban aid:

(a) Total, January, 1939—662,000; although this was 4·8 per cent over January, 1938, it was 22·9 per cent less than in January, 1937.

(b) Average monthly number, January to December, 1938—557,525. This was less by 15·5 per cent than January to December average in 1937.

Total on agricultural aid:

(a) Total, January, 1939—316,000, this was less by 17·5 per cent than January, 1938, and less by 1·2 per cent than January, 1937.

(b) Average monthly number, January to December, 1938—314,578. This was more by 2·8 per cent than January to December average in 1937.

Total on urban and agricultural aid combined:

(a) Total, January, 1939—978,000; this was less by 3·7 per cent than January, 1938, and less by 17·0 per cent than January, 1937.

(b) Average monthly number, January to December, 1938—872,103. This was less by 9·7 per cent than January to December in 1937.

General comparison of trend:

Comparing figures for the months January to December, 1937 and 1938:

(a) Grand total on aid is less in all months in 1938 than in 1937 except months of July and August which are slightly higher in 1938 than in 1937.

(b) Fully employables are less in each month in 1938 up to and including September; October, November and December, 1938, are slightly above 1937.

(c) Total on urban aid is less in each month in 1938 up to and including September; October, November and December, 1938, are slightly above 1937.

(d) Total on agricultural aid for each month in 1938 is substantially above 1937, up to and including August; September to December, 1938, are substantially less than in 1937.

Mr. QUELCH: Do those figures include those who are taken care of under the farm placement scheme?

Mr. ROGERS: They are not included in these figures, but that information will be placed on the record in a few moments. With the consent of the house, and for the information of hon. members, I should like to place on Hansard a number of tables setting out the information which I have just conveyed in these comparisons.

Table No. 1 will give the comparative totals of persons on aid in September to January in the last three years.

Table No. 2 will give the percentage changes in dominion totals of persons on aid in September to January in the last three years.

Table No. 3 will give the comparative totals of fully employables on aid in September to January in the last three years, showing percentage changes.

Table No. 4 will show the percentage distribution by provinces of totals on aid in November, 1938.

Table No. 5 will show the percentage distribution of heads of families and individuals, by degree of employability, on aid in November, 1938.

Table No. 6 will show the comparative totals of persons on agricultural aid in the province of Saskatchewan in September to January in the last three years.

Table No. 7 will show the comparative totals on material aid, that is, urban and agricultural aid combined, in January for each year from 1933 to 1939.

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister must have the unanimous consent of the house to place these tables upon Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. ROGERS: The tables are as follows:

The above figures for Saskatchewan for January, 1937, 1938 and 1939, represent the following percentages of the dominion total of persons on agricultural aid and of the dominion total of persons on urban and agricultural aid respectively:—

	January 1937	January 1938	January 1939
Per cent of dominion agricultural aid	55·9	87·4	85·6
Per cent of dominion urban and agricultural aid	15·2	33·0	27·7

Table No. 7.

Comparison of Grand Totals of Persons on Material Aid (i.e., urban and agricultural aid combined) in the Month of January, from 1933 to 1939

January, 1933	1,363,742
January, 1934	1,292,075
January, 1935	1,245,125
January, 1936	1,326,088
January, 1937	1,178,231
January, 1938	1,015,165
January, 1939	978,000

January, 1933, showed the highest figure of any January since the dominion commenced participation in the cost of material aid. The net reduction from January, 1933, to January, 1939, was 385,742 or 28·3 per cent.

Mr. MacNEILL: Do those figures include men now in the camps in British Columbia?

Mr. ROGERS: The figures for those in the camps, along with those who are registered under the farm employment plan, are kept separately inasmuch as they are regarded as being in employment. So much for the relief situation as it presents itself to us at this time.

I shall turn now to the various measures which have been adopted by this government under previous relief legislation to deal with unemployment. The relief act of last year and the acts of previous years conferred power upon the governor in council to enter into agreements with the provinces for the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress. Somewhat more than a year ago a separation was made between agricultural aid as given in the drought areas and other forms of relief assistance. It was felt that agricultural aid in the drought areas should be combined closely with other forms of assistance being given in those areas by the Department of Agriculture, and that all forms of relief in those areas should be administered by that department. That has been done. Therefore, agreements with respect to relief in the drought areas are entered into by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) with the provinces concerned.

In so far as unemployment relief is concerned, the dominion government has entered into a number of agreements with the provinces designed to assist those provinces in the alleviation of distress, in the provision of work for the unemployed and in certain additional measures of rehabilitation. Let me deal first with the grants in aid to the provinces for the purposes of giving assistance by way of material aid. As is well known to members of the house, the system under which the dominion grants monthly sums of money to the provinces for this purpose was set in motion at the early stage of the depression. It was initiated as an emergency measure; it has been continued as an emergency measure, but as the years have passed, in the very nature of things, it has assumed more and more the aspect of a fixed policy.

There has always been a question whether this method of giving grants in aid to the provinces for the alleviation of distress was the best and most economical method by which the dominion could discharge its responsibilities in relation to this great problem. I am not going to discuss that question at great length this afternoon, nevertheless, I feel I should say this. It has been represented from time to time that the national employment commission had recommended specifically that the dominion government should take over the entire burden of unemployment relief. That is not the case. If one will examine the report of the national employment commission it will be found that this commission made two sets of recommendations with respect to the administration of relief. One set of recommendations had regard to what was described as the existing constitutional position; the other set of recommendations had regard to the situation which would arise if and when it was found possible for the dominion parliament to enact an unemployment insurance measure. I think it is well that this position should be clarified at this time. So far as the existing constitutional position is concerned, the national employment commission approved in general the policy whereby the initial responsibility was placed upon the municipalities and provinces, with financial aid given by the dominion under conditions which would provide for efficient and economical administration. I have no desire to detain the house by reading any long extract upon this point; but it will be useful, in order to remove any misconception in this regard, if I quote from page 14 of the final report of the national employment commission. The quotation is as follows:

> The recommendation of the commission for handling the existing situation whereby aid is accorded by the dominion for the relief of distress by means of grants-in-aid to the provinces was dealt with at some length on pages 15, 16 and 17 of the interim report.
> At that time it was pointed out that the commission strongly recommends that, so long as the present constitutional basis exists, the method introduced in 1934 of granting aid on a temporary basis, without definite or adequate control, should be abandoned by the dominion and the following basic principles accepted:
> 1. That the primary responsibility for the relief of distress should remain with the municipal authority and/or the province;
> 2. That the dominion should contribute thereto only when in its view it is shown that a practical necessity exists because of the unusual nature or extent of the distress;
> 3. That the dominion should attach such conditions in the granting of such aid as it deems necessary and proper with due regard to (a) careful coordination of effort, and (b) supervision through the designation of a proper dominion authority.

That is the position which has been maintained up to this time. When I had occasion a year ago to refer to the recommendations of the national employment commission and state the position of the dominion government in relation thereto, I indicated that the government was prepared to give consideration to any such readjustment of responsibilities in relation to unemployment as might emerge from the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations. There may be some hon. members who will say that this is simply another evidence of the desire of the government to escape its responsibility in this matter. It may be urged that we are seeking shelter behind the constitution. On the contrary, instead of taking shelter behind the constitution in this matter, we are merely respecting that division of authority with respect to social welfare which has been laid down by the constitution; and I have little patience, if I may say so, with those who are continually saying to the government regarding these matters, "Do not allow the constitution to stand in the way." If that attitude is persisted in by those who hold responsible positions in political parties in this country, the result cannot be other than to discredit the constitution, and I should like to remind particularly the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that it is by a gradual process of attrition of that kind that constitutions have been whittled away. By all means let us seek for amendments of the constitution, but let us do it by the open door and not by subterfuge and evasion.

Like my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) I have had in these last few years some experience with the administration of social services on a basis of dual responsibility. I shall not conceal from the house that when I studied this question in the abstract, before I entered parliament, I was impressed with the possibilities of co-operation in this field of dual responsibility. I have not entirely rejected the possibility of cooperation, but I have found by experience that this indefinite area which applies particularly to social services in this country is not only susceptible of cooperation but is perhaps even more susceptible of conflict and friction. Therefore when it has been urged upon me from time to time as Minister of Labour that in the absence of any constitutional changes, before serious consideration of any constitutional changes and without such information as may proceed from the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, we should take over the entire burden of relief, I have said that we should not assume financial responsibility without securing administrative control. I submit that this is the only position with regard to this matter that can be taken by those whose attitude toward it must be based upon a sense of official responsibility.

It may be that from the point of view of efficiency and economy it will be preferable in due course for the dominion government to assume a larger degree of control over certain social services. The Minister of Finance has already indicated his own conviction that this is so with respect to old age pensions. It may be desirable to extend that field. But I suggest seriously to hon. members that, when we do it, let us know what we are doing. Let us try to define our responsibilities. Because I know of nothing that has done more to impair confidence in our federal system than the impression which is being created time and again that this or that government is seeking to escape its responsibility. And it becomes possible to make those charges only to the extent that we maintain this indefinite area, this enlarging area of dual responsibility. I should like to see us ultimately come to a point where, with respect to the greater part of that area, it will be so divided as to leave no doubt in the mind of any man as to where the responsibility lies.

As the situation is now, under dual responsibility we may have provinces saying that the dominion is not taking its fair share of old age pensions—and is not taking its fair share of unemployment relief. We may have, on the eve of an election, a group of provinces emphasizing that unless the dominion takes a larger share of financial responsibility with respect to some of these services there will be such a protest as may be embarrassing to the government in power. I have not forgotten some of the undertakings that were given in the election campaign of 1930 with respect to old age pensions, when in certain provinces it was suggested that the dominion government might contribute as much as ninety-nine per cent of the cost of old age pensions and yet leave the administration with the provinces. Is it possible to imagine a greater violation of that principle of public finance which requires that those who spend public money should have the responsibility of imposing the taxation that produces the revenue?

I would suggest to my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre, who I know is keenly interested in the amendment of the British North America Act, because he has taken the part of a pioneer of that movement in this parliament, that nothing has done more to postpone the adoption of a reasonably flexible amendment procedure than the repeated surrender of the dominion government to provinces who have declined to discharge their own obligations unless they were financed by the dominion government in doing so.

Mr. LANDERYOU: How else can they do it?

Mr. ROGERS: They could agree to an amendment to the constitution under which responsibility could be concentrated either in the one authority or in the other.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In the meantime, may I ask, what about the unemployed and others who are suffering?

Mr. ROGERS: Surely that is an irrelevant question. Does my hon. friend mean to suggest that in so far as the unemployed person is concerned there is any difference as between the existing method of administration and another method of administration that may be followed—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, I do.

Mr. ROGERS: —when that area is divided among several authorities?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We face a national emergency and in this national emergency there are a great many municipalities that are simply not able to provide the necessary help the unemployed require to-day.

Mr. ROGERS: On that point, may I say that this government has been aware of that situation from the time it came into office. The very first action we took with respect to unemployment was to increase grants in aid to the provinces by seventy-five per cent in order to assist the municipalities. Not only that, but in the order in council providing for that increase we provided that the increase should be passed over to the municipalities; and, by a series of measures which I shall detail later, we have given assistance in other forms to municipalities. More recently it has been announced that pending the final determination of this difficult problem we as a dominion government are ready to assume, along with the provinces, forty per cent of the total cost of material aid.

If that proposal is accepted by the provinces in the terms in which it was made, it will mean that the municipalities will not be required to pay more than twenty per cent of the cost of material aid, and I suggest to my hon. friend, on the basis of the figures which we have obtained and with which I think he is familiar, that this twenty per cent would not represent more than a proportion of the total problem which might be described as that of unemployables and indigent cases. Certainly, from the figures I have obtained from the provinces, that would appear to be a fair inference, that twenty per cent of the total cost of material aid would represent just about the cost of maintaining unemployables and indigents.

The municipalities that have had their difficulties in recent years have not experienced those difficulties simply because they have been called upon to pay a particular percentage of the current costs of material aid. The municipalities that have suffered most have done so because of the cumulative effect of funding relief costs over a period of years, and that I submit to my hon. friend is not a question which can be dealt with as a matter of policy by the dominion government. It is a question which can be submitted properly to any general review of dominion-provincial relations, and I believe it has been so submitted to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations on behalf of the Canadian municipalities.

Mr. DUNNING: But it is solely within the power of the provinces.

Mr. ROGERS: It is entirely within the power of the provinces to determine what share of relief costs the municipalities will bear, and it is also within the power of the provinces to give permission to the municipalities as to whether they can fund their relief costs or otherwise.

In the last few moments I have been trying to put to the house some of the cogent reasons which have led the government to follow this policy of giving grants in aid to the provinces for unemployment relief, maintaining that policy at least until such time as there can be a clear and intelligent redefinition of responsibility with respect to social welfare as between the dominion and the provinces; and I submit that on the basis of our experience in past years, the arguments to support that position are valid and are arguments which must have commended themselves to any government holding responsibility in this matter at this time.

So far as the past year is concerned, the agreements entered into with the provinces were framed in terms recommended by the national employment commission. We put into effect in those agreements most, if not all, of the specific recommendations made by that commission. I am bound to say that some of the recommendations did not prove to be as satisfactory in practice as they appeared to be in prospect. That fate, of course, befalls many recommendations, but for the most part we have been able to carry out those recommendations of the national employment commission which were designed to bring about a more economical and efficient administration of relief under this system of dual responsibility.

The total amount appropriated last year for grants-in-aid was $17,500,000. That was divided among the provinces upon as fair a basis as we could devise. In each province the maximum was controlled by a percentage. We have kept very close to that appropriation during the past year. We have also permitted the provinces that desired to do so to substitute works or training plans for direct relief. In a number of provinces that has been done. Here again that alternative was incorporated in the agreement with the full approval of the national employment commission. I regret to say that the provinces in general have not taken kindly to the suggestion that training plans should be substituted for relief with respect to the older unemployed men and women. Some provinces have taken much more kindly to the view that the money assigned to the provinces for unemployment relief should be spent in providing work instead of relief, through a public works program. I may speak particularly of the province of Quebec in that respect. That province took the position very strongly that they were in favour of a broad public works program which would afford employment to all who were idle. We, as a dominion government, took the position that if a province wished to follow that method it might use our contribution to do so, but that we would not and could not pay more to a province to carry out that method of providing relief than we would to those provinces that were by preference administering a system of direct relief. In the nature of things one has to allow some latitude with respect to programs which are applied in the different provinces. We have not been arbitrary in our dealings with the several provinces. We have as far as it lay in our power done our utmost to cooperate with them in carrying out policies which were designed to relieve the unemployment situation within their boundaries.

I come now to other expenditures under the relief act of 1938-39. These expenditures are set out in the supplementary estimates of the present fiscal year. I am not going to comment at any length on the various items, but it might provide the house with some indication of the scope of the work done if I mention each of them in passing.

The first is to provide for commitments under relief settlement agreements with provincial governments. That plan was initiated under the preceding administration. It is a plan whereby families on relief are taken from our populous towns and cities and placed upon selected land with some financial assistance designed during the four year period to make them self-supporting. This plan has worked out reasonably well in some provinces; in others it has been abandoned. I shall be glad to give full details when the bill itself is in committee. I would say, however, that opinion in a number of provinces is turning definitely in the direction of broader schemes of agricultural reestablishment. When this is done, my view is that so far as the dominion government broader schemes of agricultural reestablishshould come from the Department of Agriculture and not from the Department of Labour. It seems to me that agricultural matters ought to come within the purview of the department that assumes responsibility for agriculture throughout the country. The Department of Labour entered into these land settlement plans because they developed within what might be termed the structure of relief administration. They are being continued, and as I said, I shall be pleased to place before the house the details of the success attending them in the various provinces.

Mr. MANION: Has the minister at hand the total number of people reestablished on the land in the manner he mentions?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, I have that here. The total is not impressive in relation to the entire problem. Relief settlement agreements continue in force in the provinces of Quebec, Manitoba and Alberta.

In Quebec there are at the present time settled on the land 3,123 families with 15,578 dependents, a total of 18,701 individuals. During the present fiscal year 1,452 families have been settled with 6,777 dependents, or a total of 8,229 individuals.

In Manitoba there are at the present time settled on the land 1,057 families with 4,354 dependents, or a total of 5,411 individuals. During the present fiscal year 275 families have been settled with 1,206 dependents, or a total of 1,481 individuals.

In Alberta there are at the present time settled on the land 568 families with 2,170 dependents, or a total of 2,738 individuals. During the present fiscal year 136 families have been settled with 520 dependents, or a total of 656 individuals.

The number of abandonments during the current year is very small. Of those noted above as being settled during the fiscal year the following abandonments have been noted: Quebec, nil; Manitoba, thirteen; Alberta, six.

Mr. MANION: Has the minister the total of those figures he gave?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not, and I am not a lightning calculator, but I shall be glad to note that question and give the total later.

Mr. QUELCH: To what extent are these families self-supporting?

Mr. ROGERS: Many of them become self-supporting at the conclusion of the four years of assistance. Of course much depends upon the quality of the land on which they are settled; even more depends upon the quality of the settler himself. I have visited some of the districts where these families have been settled, some in Ontario north of Cochrane, some in New Brunswick, some in Manitoba, and it is interesting to see how neighbouring farms present a striking contrast. The explanation nine times out of ten is not the quality of the land but the quality of the individual. One settler had some training in agriculture and was ready to work; another was apparently quite willing to take the subsistence allowance during the four years and then go on relief. I am not saying that in any way as an indictment of the policy in general, but my experience has been that a great deal depends upon the selection of individuals.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Will the minister have the figures when the bill is brought down?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, I shall try to have all figures the house may require.

Mr. McNIVEN: Was that scheme made available to Saskatchewan?

Mr. ROGERS: It was made available to all provinces; it was adopted in a number of provinces which later abandoned it. I shall note that question also and have the information available.

Mr. COLDWELL: In what year was the policy first adopted?

Mr. ROGERS: It was in the period of the late administration; I would not care to say the year offhand.

Mr. COLDWELL: Was it 1931?

Mr. ROGERS: I am inclined to think it was 1931 or 1932.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Is it not the case that in Saskatchewan there are many thousands, over eight thousand families, being settled on the land under a slightly different scheme but at the expense of the dominion government?

Mr. ROGERS: That is correct, but that particular measure was designed to remove families from the drought areas to the northern part of Saskatchewan.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): And from the cities as well.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. Originally that project was under the Department of Labour, but two years ago it was transferred to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is on a fifty-fifty basis, is it not?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. The next item is to provide for commitments and completion of works in connection with federal contributions to provincial and municipal relief projects.

[Mr. Rogers.]

That is a re-vote and requires no further comment at this time. I merely say that last year, instead of entering upon a broad program of joint works with the provinces through the Department of Labour, it was decided that those departments which had the more immediate responsibility with respect to certain projects should enter into the agreements for such projects. It followed, therefore, that the Department of Mines and Resources assumed responsibility last year for the appropriation for highway construction, and this was confined largely to tourist highways and sections of the Trans-Canada highway.

The next item is for the completion of the Winnipeg sewage disposal project. That, again, requires no further comment at this time.

The next is to provide for outstanding claims for direct relief under the Relief Act, 1935.

The next is to provide for federal contributions to farm employment and supplementary plans; a re-vote for commitments was also included in this. As to the farm employment plan it has been in operation now for the past three years. The results I think are known to many hon. members. In 1936-37 under this plan the total placed was 47,665, and in 1937-38 the total was 42,733. For 1938-39 the total as of March 13 was 30,465. Hon. members will recall that this plan was devised in order to provide shelter, food and some agricultural experience for young unemployed men who otherwise would be on relief or having temporary shelter in hostels established in the larger cities of western Canada.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Has the minister the number of applications in the same period?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not those figures here at the moment. But while my hon. friend is on his feet I want to take exception to a statement attributed to him when he was discussing this farm employment plan in Ottawa not long ago. I hope he has been incorrectly reported, but here is the statement of my hon. friend, which is presented here as an indictment not of the plan itself but of the youth training program; which, if I may say so, indicates a degree of ignorance with respect to government policy which is not easily excused in an hon. member of this house. This is what was said by my hon. friend, speaking to a group of unemployed in the city of Ottawa.

"Out west they give a fellow $5 a month to act as nursemaid to a herd of cows," he remarked.

Above that there is this statement:

Youth training projects were criticized by T. C. Douglas, M.P., in an address before the Ottawa Single Unemployed Men's Organization on Tuesday afternoon.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It was not I who associated them; it was the writer of the article.

Mr. ROGERS: Does my hon. friend deny making that statement?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Not at all, but it was not I who associated them.

Mr. ROGERS: I am glad to have that correction; but even so I do suggest that my hon. friend is not doing justice to himself or to the group of which he is a member when he makes that sort of comment upon a scheme of this kind. We have reason to know that large numbers of those who have been placed upon farms under this plan were retained by the farmers concerned on a wage basis after the special bonus was withdrawn at the end of April. And even though he and I might wish that these men could be employed at prevailing wages, surely my hon. friend would admit that this plan is far more wholesome in its effects than the concentration of these single unemployed men either in hostels in our cities or in relief camps somewhere in the wilderness. If that is not the view of my hon. friend I should be glad to have him say so.

Mr. SLAGHT: Or the $25 a month they do not get.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. The next item is to provide for the development of training projects for unemployed young people. I am not going to enter into any detail at this time with respect to the youth training program. There is another resolution on the order paper which will be dealt with when this matter is concluded, and that will provide perhaps a more convenient opportunity for a discussion of the details of the youth training program. Again, however, if I may be permitted to comment upon what has been said in another house, I want to take exception to what was said by the leader of the opposition in the other house a few days ago with respect to the youth training program.

Mr. MANION: I do not think the rules of the house permit the minister to do that. I am not defending the leader of the Conservative party in the other house, but I do not think we have any right to enter into a discussion with regard to what happened there.

Mr. ROGERS: At all events it has been stated by one who ought to know better, regardless of where he now is, that out of those receiving training under the youth training program only twenty-five were actually placed in employment. I want to make it clear that the reference as it appeared in the record was confined to the province of Quebec; but I hold in my hand an article appearing in the Vancouver Sun which makes no reference to this placement of twenty-five persons as having occurred within any single province. The suggestion is, and there must have been some warrant for it, that this was an indictment of the entire youth training program. As a matter of fact under that national program some 3,282 were placed in employment, which is a very different story from 25. It does seem to me, reverting to what I said in the beginning in regard to carelessness in the presentation of information of this kind, that those who hold positions of high authority as elder statesmen ought at least to take the trouble to ascertain the facts before they make statements of this kind.

I come next to an item for the rehabilitation of unemployed persons. That was a new vote last year, and followed the recommendations of the national employment commission. As soon as the vote was passed letters were sent to all the provinces asking for their cooperation in projects designed to retrain and physically recondition older unemployed men. Thus far three provinces have adopted plans of this kind—Ontario, Manitoba and Alberta. I may say to the house that it has been found much more difficult to secure cooperation in projects for the training of these older unemployed men than it was to secure cooperation in connection with youth training projects. Again I have no desire to detain the house with details at this time; there will be an opportunity to discuss this vote when the bill itself is in committee.

These various measures, Mr. Speaker, do not by any means represent the program adopted by this government to deal with unemployment. These joint arrangements with the provinces have provided much work in themselves. They are moving also towards the reestablishment of many of those who are unemployed. But it would be an entire mistake to assume that the policies of this government in relation to unemployment are confined to these expenditures which have taken place under the relief act during the past year.

At this stage I want to refer, if I may, to what has been done in connection with housing. The national employment commission selected the building industry out of all others as the one which held the greatest promise of expanding employment under careful government stimulation. Every recommendation made by the national employment commission with respect to housing has been carried out, I suggest, in spirit if not in letter including the home improvement plan, which was inaugurated in 1936; and the plan for low rental housing, which was included in the National Housing Act of last year, and we went beyond the recommendations of the commission in affording a further stimulus to the construction industry through the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act. Under the home improvement plan there has been to date an expenditure of $25,340,000 across Canada.

Mr. MASSEY: As of what date?

Mr. ROGERS: As of March 15. That has been expended on the basis of the assistance given by the federal treasury in the form of a guarantee. An analysis of the loan applications indicates that approximately forty-six per cent of the amounts spent went for masonry, carpentry and plastering; twenty-four per cent for plumbing and heating; sixteen per cent for painting; nine per cent for roofing, and the other five per cent for electric wiring, mechanical equipment and installation. A further analysis indicates that approximately 16,175,000 man hours of labour have been provided and approximately $10,977,000 has been distributed directly as wages and other earnings in the building trades. That is simply under one of the proposals made by the national employment commission, and carried into effect by this government.

In so far as housing generally is concerned, the Dominion Housing Act of 1935 has been completely renovated and is now producing effective results. I consider members of the House of Commons are under great obligation to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) for the manner in which that moribund legislation was eventually brought to life, because from the time it was adopted until this government assumed office no loans whatever had been made under it. I believe that is correct.

Mr. DUNNING: No loans were made until after we came into office.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. It was revised last year, as part of the National Housing Act. Two other parts were added: Part II dealing with low-rental housing, and Part III providing for the remission of taxes on houses valued below $4,000 built upon land owned by the municipalities. May I say in passing that while the low-rental housing plan has not yet produced that degree of success we would have wished, nevertheless it has received the complete approval of the national housing conference which met in Toronto just a short time ago. A resolution passed by that conference in 1939 is as follows:

> Resolved that in the opinion of this conference, the legislation embodied in part II of the National Housing Act, 1938, is, in general soundly conceived, and that those provinces which have not already passed the necessary enabling legislation be urged to do so; and that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the federal and provincial governments, and to the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities.

So I think we are entitled to say that, apart altogether from the delay as yet in the submission to and acceptance of low-rental housing projects by municipalities or limited dividend corporations, the legislation itself appears to have been skilfully drafted, and drafted in a manner which has received the full support of those who are able to speak with some authority on this type of legislation.

Judging from the results attained under other sections of the National Housing Act and under the Home Improvement Plan, I think we may expect with confidence that once these arrangements are fully understood and once reluctant provinces give their approval to the plan, it will provide a means whereby a great deal of additional employment will be afforded in most of the provinces of the dominion.

Mr. GREEN: Which provinces have passed the legislation necessary to enable the municipalities in those provinces to carry out low-rental housing?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not that information at hand. As my hon. friend is perhaps aware, the National Housing Act comes under the administration of the Minister of Finance. I refer to it only to illustrate part of the policy of the government with respect to employment.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall give that information later.

Mr. ROGERS: But my hon. friend is perhaps aware that projects of limited dividend corporations require no guarantee at all.

Mr. DUNNING: They require no provincial legislation, in any event, except in so far as the municipality is concerned.

Mr. ROGERS: Under the National Housing Act, apart from the figures I have given with respect to the home improvement plan, there has also been a marked increase in the loans granted, and therefore in the labour provided to those who are unemployed.

In that connection may I say a word with respect to the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act. That act was also passed last session and was intended to give a further stimulus to the construction industry. It did require the approval of the provinces to place it in operation. Under that act the following expenditures have been made to date:

British Columbia	$1,570,635
Alberta	754,133
Saskatchewan	750,200
Manitoba	179,031
New Brunswick	405,000
Prince Edward Island	7,000
Total	$3,665,999

The total available under the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act is $30,000,000. Perhaps I should have said before that the total available under the home improvement plant was $50,000,000. Under the Dominion Housing Act and the National Housing Act, low-rental section, the amount is $100,000,000. So by these acts this government has made available these vast sums of money for building or for self-liquidating municipal projects. I ask if my hon. friends in the far corner of the house could ask for any better illustration of how the national credit has been brought to the assistance of our provinces and municipalities in connection with this urgent problem of providing useful employment? Under the Dominion Housing Act the total expended thus far is just under $30,000,000.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should be interested to learn how many applications have been refused.

Mr. ROGERS: There have been very few refused under the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act. There are pending applications covering the amount of $371,000. Therefore it is quite evident from the figures I have that there have not been many rejections.

Mr. DUNNING: There have been some.

Mr. ROGERS: I have no doubt there have been some.

Mr. DUNNING: But not many. And those rejections have been only because the applications did not come within the four corners of the act.

Mr. HOMUTH: Reference has been made to provincial enabling legislation. Are there some provinces which have not passed that legislation?

Mr. ROGERS: Oh, yes. I would say that applies particularly to Ontario and Quebec; those provinces have not approved, but the others have. As I said a moment ago, expenditures under the National Housing Act to date have been just under $30,000,000.

Mr. MASSEY: Not under "The National Housing Act?"

Mr. ROGERS: Under the Dominion Housing Act and the National Housing Act.

Mr. MASSEY: That was the "moribund legislation" to which the minister referred.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. Those expenditures have been widely distributed, and I doubt very much if any member of the house could argue that everything within reason had not been done to stimulate the housing industry of this country. As yet I have not mentioned the remission of the sales tax on building materials. That, too, was brought about at the last session.

There is every reason to believe that once fear is removed and confidence returns, and the people are willing to make advance commitments, the full effect of this legislation will become apparent. And it will be recognized that, far from having done nothing in relation to the problem of unemployment, this government has done as much as any government could do in order to stimulate the building industry of this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: More.

Mr. ROGERS: And, Mr. Speaker, that is not all. The government has also taken effective measures to stimulate the mining industry. One of the first measures in the first budget of the present government was designed to provide for the remission of income tax of mining companies operating in improved areas during their early years of production. Also, in cooperation with the provinces we have expended some $5,000,000 in improving transportation facilities into mining areas. No one can doubt for a moment that these measures have had their due effect in expanding employment in that great industry which perhaps has done more than any other to provide us with confidence and with expanding employment through these years of depression.

I want to refer to some other expenditures which were made by the government, partly as a means of providing immediate employment but chiefly as a means of stimulating some of the basic industries of this country and in due course expanding our national income. Hon. members may recall that when the supplementary estimates were brought down last year, acting under instructions from the government I made a brief statement which covered some of the more outstanding of those expenditures. I should like to refer to some of these. As I go along I would point out that these expenditures could not by any stretch of the imagination be regarded as wasteful or extravagant. They were intended rather to conserve and develop the great resources of this country.

A total of $1,310,000 was set aside for the improvement of road transportation into new mining areas. A total of $300,000 was provided for geological surveys. An amount of $3,500,000 was set aside for highway improvement, apart from mining roads. Of this amount, $1,000,000 was set aside for the removal of level crossings, which was in addition to $500,000 provided in the main estimates for the same purpose. Another item in this group of expenditures which was designed to assist the tourist industry was that of $450,000 for the restoration and development of historic sites. There are some who tell us from time to time that there have been no useful works accomplished as a result of these expenditures for relief. That is far from the truth. I would say that of the total expenditures from 1930 to the present time at least two-fifths are represented in works useful to the community. Only the remaining three-fifths may be said to have been expended for direct relief.

Mr. DUNNING: That is over the whole eight years.

Mr. ROGERS: Exactly. Even that three-fifths I suggest was spent for the conservation of what after all is a vital resource of this country. To say that that money has been wasted is doing violence to our intelligence. It may have been possible to add much more to the money expended for direct relief and construct more works. That might have been done, but the question which after all must be faced by any government is as to how far it can go with public expenditures without destroying that degree of confidence which is essential to the expansion of private investment. There is a prudential limit within which the government must keep in its public expenditures.

There is every reason why, with respect to unemployment, expenditures on public works may be expanded in a period of depression. On the other hand, surely there is no logic in those who say in one breath that there must be retrenchment on the part of the government and, in the next breath, that the government is following the wrong policy in not putting all those who are idle and on relief at useful work. We have had some experience with respect to these matters. No one would doubt for one moment in general terms the advantage of having those who are unemployed at work, but the question we have to consider is whether by increasing public payrolls to a great extent you may not deny yourselves the opportunity of expanding private payrolls. I believe it is the considered experience of all countries, including those which have tried other policies, that there is no real solution for unemployment in any vast program of public works designed to take up the entire slack of unemployment.

As I have suggested, it is sound policy to expand certain types of public works which not only provide employment but develop resources and increase the national income. But apart from that it cannot be urged that there is any magic or virtue in that type of policy which finds a solution for unemployment in the construction of public works.

Mr. HEAPS: What is going to happen to the other half million unemployed?

Mr. ROGERS: I am glad my hon. friend was the one who raised that question. He represents a labour constituency, and I wonder if he has seen a bulletin which was issued recently by the American Federation of Labour dealing with this very point. My hon. friend himself has said in times past that public works are a palliative and not a cure.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes.

Mr. ROGERS: Let me place upon Hansard at this time the considered opinion of the American Federation of Labour. I think it is of great significance, particularly in view of the apparent change in the relief policy of the United States. This is the quotation:

> The absorption of the unemployed and the creation of work opportunities for all who are able and willing to work, in private industry, have ever been a part of the economic philosophy of the American Federation of Labor. We have consistently sought to achieve these purposes.
>
> During all the years intervening between 1929, when unemployment became a serious national problem, until the present moment the executive council has cooperated with the government, with industrial management and with all other groups in order that working men and women thrown out of work might find a new place and new positions in private industry. Both time and experience have clearly vindicated the position assumed and maintained by the American Federation of Labor upon economic, social and industrial problems.
> We are firmly convinced that various forms of government spending, either in the distribution of relief or in the development and maintenance of work projects designed to supply relief wages to unemployed, can only serve as temporary measures and cannot and do not provide a permanent solution for unemployment.

I suggest that such statement, coming as it does from the American Federation of Labour, has very special significance and importance at this time.

I have not touched upon all the special expenditures which were made in the past year in order to develop the basic resources of our country. Over $7,000,000 was expended on the expansion of harbours and rivers. There was also the money devoted to the Grand River conservation project, and $1,000,000 for canal improvements. The sum of $650,000 was spent on the encouragement of the fishing industry. There was the expansion of facilities for air transportation through assistance given not only to trans-Canada airways but also to municipal airports. There was the provision for rehabilitation and water storage in the prairie provinces, a second line of defence against the recurrence of drought. Some $3,500,000 was included in the estimates for that purpose.

I suggest that in the light of what has been done through direct assistance to the provinces and municipalities, what has been done under agreements with the provinces for work programs, what has been done through the stimulus given to the mining and housing industries, what has been done in order to expand municipal improvements in the form of self-liquidating projects, what has been done in a dozen different ways to conserve and develop the great resources of our country and expand our national income, no one can seriously urge that this government has not met the challenge of unemployment.

Mr. HEAPS: I would say that.

Mr. ROGERS: I am glad my hon. friend has said that, because I am prepared to discuss it at any time and at any place. We will doubtless have other opportunities when this legislation is before the committee. But let me ask my hon. friend, what ways could he suggest to cure unemployment? Does he believe that Germany has cured unemployment?

Mr. HEAPS: No.

Mr. ROGERS: Or Italy?

Mr. HEAPS: No.

An hon. MEMBER: What about Russia?

Mr. ROGERS: Or Russia?

Mr. HEAPS: What about New Zealand?

An hon. MEMBER: New Zealand has.

Mr. ROGERS: By no means.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, yes.

Mr. ROGERS: In the United States, the great country across the boundary, according to figures issued by the Canadian Welfare Council there were recently 21,000,000 on relief, and the total unemployed is 12,000,000. That government, I suggest, has carried out in its policies all those spectacular notions which hon. members have in vain urged upon this government.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Included in the number of those on relief are those who are working on government projects.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes; but unfortunately, as my hon. friend is aware, government projects have a tendency to continue indefinitely; that is the great difficulty in connection with the works progress administration projects in the United States. In Great Britain within the last month the number of unemployed reached a total of 2,039,000, and that despite the vast rearmament program of that country.

Mr. LAWSON: What country is that?

Mr. ROGERS: Great Britain. That is the number of unemployed, not of those on relief. As a matter of fact, the position in Canada, difficult though it is, and let us face it, is not as difficult as that in other countries. Why cannot we take encouragement from the fact that the situation in this country is relatively better than it is in others.

Mr. MASSEY: That does not make it good.

Mr. ROGERS: Why is it that far fields are always so green? There are those in other countries who look upon the position here with envy and respect, and I say that with some knowledge of the facts.

Mr. LAWSON: Would my hon. friend permit me? I have no desire to be a carping critic, but surely one can hardly make a comparison when everybody who is unemployed in the United Kingdom is under an unemployment insurance scheme and has an income coming in, compared with the poor unfortunate devil in this country who is out of employment and not on relief.

Mr. ROGERS: That is not so. My hon. friend surely must be aware that a person in Great Britain is in receipt of unemployment insurance for only a limited period, a certain number of weeks, and when that period has expired he has to receive relief on precisely the same basis as in this country.

Mr. LAWSON: My hon. friend is not suggesting that there are 2,100,000 unemployed on relief in the United Kingdom. He was talking about their being unemployed; but a large number of them are under the unemployment insurance scheme.

Mr. ROGERS: I think I can assure my hon. friend that for the most part they are not receiving a greater allowance than, under our relief system, heads of families are receiving in Canada.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be pleased if my hon. friend can retain his question; we can deal with it in committee. I take no satisfaction from suggesting that conditions here or there are worse than they are in Canada, except in so far as it does indicate that we in this country have no ground for despair at this time. I have no patience with those who continually look upon the worst side of the situation in this dominion. As a matter of fact, when it is considered that in the last two years we have had not only a world depression to contend with, which we have in common with other countries, but also prolonged drought, which has taken a large part of our agricultural area out of production—

Mr. LANDERYOU: We still have that.

Mr. ROGERS:—and when it is considered also that, despite the sharp recession in the United States in the latter part of 1937 and 1938, our figures of employment kept relatively constant, there is evidence here of the recuperative powers of this young country; and if only we had more faith in the recuperative powers of Canada, if only leaders of industry had more faith in the recuperative powers of Canada, it would be possible, I say—

Mr. HOMUTH: Give them a chance.

Mr. ROGERS: — for us to make a substantial reduction in the number of unemployed this year. My hon. friend objects to my referring at all to the leaders of industry.

Mr. HOMUTH: I do not. I say, give them a chance.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not refer to leaders of industry in any other way than to point out to them, as I have done before and shall do again, that the challenge of unemployment is not a challenge directed only to governments. And those who speak for the leaders of industry, particularly through such newspapers as the Financial Post, that, as I have said, in one breath cry for government retrenchment and in the next condemn this government because it has not provided work for those on relief—

Mr. MacNICOL: That is because of the tariff policy.

Mr. ROGERS: —are simply bedeviling the entire situation. I say that advisedly and deliberately, and I will not hesitate to say it again.

What of the future?

Mr. MacNICOL: Pretty sad-looking.

Mr. ROGERS: I think we can look forward with reasonable confidence to an extension of employment during the year 1939. A little more than a month ago there was in the British House of Commons a debate upon unemployment. In that debate the government of the United Kingdom was chastised, criticized and condemned for its failure to do the very things that we or any other group of men as a government would be condemned for having failed to do in recent years. I think it was the president of the board of trade, who pointed out that the basic cause of unemployment throughout the world to-day was an abnormal contraction in international trade, an abnormal contraction in private investment, and a persistence of fear through international tension which, if continued, would place an even greater burden upon governments. Surely we can understand that international tension, which has continued almost without any interval of peace in the last two years, has deterred many a business man from making forward commitments, from investing his money in industry. If tension continues, governments must accept their responsibility in meeting the situation. As a result of that, this government had to assume greater burdens than otherwise it would have assumed.

Fortunately there is some ground for believing that this fear which has haunted the world in the last two years may be receding, and with its recession there may be a return of that confidence which will permit business men once more to expand their activities on the basis of the expected consumption of their products. If, with that relief of international tension, there comes also a return to more sensible policies of trade in countries which have turned away from international trade to economic nationalism, then this great exporting country will have once more an opportunity to build up in western Canada that market, that store of purchasing power not based on paper certificates, but based on the sale of goods, which will provide a means for the development and expansion of the industries of central Canada.

As one charged with responsibility in connection with unemployment and relief, I have tried to see the picture as it really is.

In these days one lives continually in an atmosphere of distress; but never at any time has this government, or its Minister of Labour as a member of this government, adopted an attitude of defeat and despair. If this parliament in its discussions of unemployment and relief will try to face the facts as they are, there will be no criticism on my part in so far as exception is taken to any feature of our policies. But if we can see what is good in the situation as well as what is disturbing; and provided there is a change in international factors which from the beginning have been beyond our control, and a willingness also on the part of citizens as well as governments to accept their obligations in relation to this problem, it is not too great for this nation to solve.

Mr. DENTON MASSEY (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, again we have listened to a speech by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), purporting to review the condition of employment and unemployment in Canada for another year. I have listened with intense interest to what the minister has had to say, but I am forced to this one conclusion, that there has never been in this house a more frank and complete confession of failure than that to which we have just listened.

The minister commenced his speech admirably, as he always does, and he used a phrase which we should do well to remember. I took it down verbatim lest I forget: "The part of wisdom is to search out the truth and to present the truth." There is not an hon. member who will not subscribe to that. The minister sought out the truth, according to his own statement. Then, at the end of his speech, in his peroration, he gave the excuse which the government now employs for its failure to deal with this problem of unemployment and agricultural distress. That excuse was world conditions, and I could not help thinking, at the conclusion of his speech, of that celebrated night in his own city, during the course of the election campaign of 1935, when the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), as he is now, and others, spoke in a meeting maligning and vilifying the then administration, without a single reference to a world depression. From the point of view of what one says, what a difference it makes, apparently, where one sits in this house. Alibis and excuses! I say to you, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MASSEY: Hon. members may laugh, but I am wondering what will happen in the next election when all they can present to the unemployed in their ridings is the bitter bread that the minister fed them to-day, the bitter bread of failure—the admission of complete failure to deal with this problem. Perhaps the laughter was slightly premature.

Then we listened as the minister progressed in his speech to his complaint in regard to the use of figures by some apparently, as he described them, irresponsible journalists, who are ignorant, who should know better. He complained that the figure of one million was given as representing those who were dependent upon relief in this country. Well, here is his own release dated Ottawa, March 15.

Mr. ROGERS: Surely my hon. friend will permit me to ask him a question. I said that at the time when the number on relief, according to registration, was some 544,000, it was being stated in newspaper editorials that there were a million unemployed on relief. My hon. friend is aware that there is a fluctuation in relief figures from month to month.

Mr. MASSEY: The insidious danger in the use of figures, as I shall demonstrate with reference to some figures which the minister himself has used, is that the point behind the figures is not made clear. Here is a figure that cannot be dodged—the minister used it himself this afternoon: 978,000 on relief, dependent upon relief, in the month of January, 1939, an increase of eight per cent over the same period last year. That is the figure. It will go out from this house this afternoon. Is it to be wondered sometimes that, in the midst of the distress which this country has experienced, such a figure as that is used perhaps incorrectly?

Then the minister went on to object to the use of the figures of 80,000 or 90,000 or 150,000 as the number of transients unemployed in this country. He said that the best estimate he could make, from sources which he regarded as reliable, was, I believe, less than 10,000.

Mr. ROGERS: According to the definition, yes.

Mr. MASSEY: Again we have the academic approach to the question—according to definition. Those housed in provincial and other institutions, hostels of one sort and another—what about them? As I stand in my place now, I tell you, Mr. Speaker, I know of scores upon scores of transients unemployed who are in receipt of charity, if you want to call it that, from private individuals. I know of hostels that are maintained by private capital, of which this government has no knowledge. I know of tens of thousands of transient unemployed receiving the benefit of private charity in this country, whom this government does not list at all and knows nothing about.

Then the minister went on further to complain of the number which had been given as representing the unemployed youth in Canada, the number which had been suggested by the Canadian Youth Congress—450,000, he said. He challenged that figure. Well, I wonder what it means to be a youth unemployed. I wonder what the academic definition of a youth unemployed is, which will reduce that figure to act as a salve to the conscience of the government. What difference does it make whether it is 150,000 or 500,000? In either case it represents a ghastly state of affairs in this country. And what is being done in connection with it? I shall deal with that question later.

The minister admitted that the youth congress, in arriving at a figure of 465,000, had included those who were on farms. Has the minister any idea of the number of young farmers who left their farms, went into the city, got some sort of work, lost it, then went back to the farms and are now waiting for a better day, being in the meantime looked after by the father and mother who are struggling to keep the farm going as best they can, with the added difficulty of having to keep a son?

Mr. WOOD: Could not that son—

Mr. MASSEY: The hon. member will have plenty of time to speak.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): He doesn't want to answer.

An hon. MEMBER: He is afraid of the question.

Mr. MASSEY: Who said that? Let him get up and say it. I want to make my argument consecutive, and there will be plenty of opportunity for the hon. member opposite to speak.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I said that the hon. member did not want to answer questions. He has asked plenty himself, I might add.

Mr. MASSEY: Did I interrupt the minister in his speech?

Mr. WOOD: May I ask a question?

Mr. MASSEY: Ask your question, certainly.

Mr. WOOD: If the son goes back to the farm will he not earn his own board on the farm?

Mr. MASSEY: I do not mind a question, but I do not want a speech. The hon. member knows what I mean. He knows the point I have in mind. He knows that in his own constituency of Brant there are plenty of sons who went to Paris, Brantford and Toronto and are now back on the farms, waiting for an opportunity to return to the city. It may be for the moment they are earning their own keep, but they are those who could and would be gainfully employed and at the moment they are unemployed. That is the point. It impressed me that the whole matter is one which the minister was endeavouring to deal with by figures—figures—figures. After all, what is the size of this question in Canada; what is the extent, in figures? Anyone in this house knows that the size of the problem, the breadth of the problem, is the breadth of Canada, and the depth of the problem is the heart of every man, woman and child in this dominion. That is the size of the problem. Why are we worrying about figures? After all, we know that the situation is ghastly. But the government is not dealing with it accordingly.

The minister went on to discuss the question of cooperation with the provinces, the necessity for a change in the legislative approach in regard to the provinces themselves. He referred to the fact that one should seek any amendment to the constitution that we desire by "the open door"—I believe that was his phrase. Why not cooperation? In 1867—and I do not wish to splash about in history—this dominion was born, under an act known as the British North America Act. For years it progressed, progressed successfully under the spirit of that act. Then, somehow, we began to change our point of view in connection with it. To a new and widespread and ominous extent autonomous powers were assumed by the provinces, which insisted on one of two things, either an amendment to the act or reversion to our original interpretation of it, which meant in turn cooperation. But the minister referred to conflict and friction; conflict and friction, where cooperation might exist. Just as it was possible to gain cooperation, so there might be conflict and friction. Well, may I use a rather ancient platitude, which however seems to apply so well: It takes two to make a quarrel. If there is no cooperation due to conflict, both the federal government and the provinces are to blame. Then the minister referred further to efficiency and economy, and to responsibility without control, and he gave the house the benefit of his academic background in a most interesting pedantic discussion of the question of dual responsibility, of the right of the dominion, or the possibility of the dominion entering upon a realm now presided over by a province, and usurping authority. As far as the provinces are concerned, in so many cases it is a question not only of ability to cooperate but of ability to provide. In the meantime, while these various difficult and moot points are being considered and discussed and debated in this house and outside of it, innocent victims to an unknown number are suffering.

I wonder if it would not occur to the minister that in his entire speech this afternoon he failed to bring to the attention of the house a single nation-wide constructive effort in the way of permanent employment.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member did not get it.

Mr. MASSEY: Well, I should like the hon. member to name one when he replies.

Mr. MARTIN: I certainly will.

Mr. MASSEY: It will be interesting. Not a single nation-wide project of a permanent character.

Mr. MARTIN: Can the hon. member name one of a permanent character?

Mr. MASSEY: Before I sit down I shall give to the government eleven constructive suggestions.

Mr. MARTIN: Of a permanent character?

Mr. MASSEY: Of a permanent character.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend has asked a question, so perhaps he will allow me to answer it. What would he say, for instance, of assistance to mining roads and the mining industry, of national housing, of the home improvement plan, of the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act—and I could detail others?

Mr. MASSEY: I expect to deal with them all in detail. But in regard to the statement I have just made, the minister did not suggest any one nation-wide project of a permanent character. By "permanent" I mean the creation of some new—shall I say—economy in regard to a certain part or portion of this dominion which affects all of this dominion.

Mr. MUTCH: How long is "permanent"?

Mr. MASSEY: Not "much" longer for some.

I would say that it is very obvious, appallingly obvious, that on what the minister has suggested to-day as the path followed by the present administration, every step taken was a palliative and not a cure; that the problem has been temporized with rather than dealt with at its core. Let me illustrate what I mean. The National Housing Act, the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, the youth training projects and other such matters were mentioned by the minister, along with the question of highways and such development as was carried forward in the mining areas, and so forth. I should like to deal briefly with one or two of these matters with which the minister himself has dealt. Let me take first the question of youth training. I fully realize that there is on the order paper a resolution in regard to youth training, on which such a discussion as this should properly be launched. On the other hand the minister himself brought the matter up this afternoon, accordingly I shall assume the right to answer the statement he made.

He objected strongly to a statement—his language was "It has been said by one who ought to know better in regard to twenty-five who were placed under the training plan." I have in my hand a pamphlet entitled, "Training Canada's Young Unemployed." I have read this pamphlet carefully. It is an official publication of the Department of Labour. Reading through the pamphlet, if one omits page 24, it reads like a real estate agent's description of a piece of property he has for sale. It is a most interesting booklet and well prepared, and lays out, may I say, many worthwhile and worthy projects. The plan was operated under a vote of the session before last of $1,000,000. The money was spent on various and sundry projects throughout the dominion. The statement that was made by the hon. gentleman "who ought to know better" was to the effect that of 13,542 young men who were given training in one province, twenty-five found jobs. The minister said 2,500, but in that case he had better re-edit his own pamphlet, because I am reading from it just as the hon. gentleman who made the statement.

Mr. ROGERS: Oh, no—

Mr. MASSEY: I know what the minister is going to say. He made his statement all-embracing of the result of all the efforts put forth, and I read that same statement and I do now re-read it. There were 13,542 men given training in one province, and according to this pamphlet twenty-five found employment.

Mr. ROGERS: But what I pointed out was that the statement as given was to the effect that this was the result for all of Canada. That was not the statement as it appeared in Hansard, but it was the statement that appeared in the press.

Mr. MASSEY: One can hardly blame the hon. gentleman if his statement is misconstrued in the press. After all, the statement in Hansard which I also read is clear and distinct. We would hardly expect the minister to say the hon. gentleman should know better than make such a statement; the minister himself should know better than make the statement he made.

Mr. ROGERS: Certainly he should not have given that as an indication of the success of the scheme in all Canada.

Mr. MASSEY: He did not.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, he did.

Mr. MASSEY: I shall be glad to deal with the success of the scheme, but I do not wish to do so just at the moment. The minister went on to discuss the effect of the act of this year. I have here, if I can put my hand on it, a statement in regard to the efficiency of the plan which shows very clearly the result of the efforts that have been put forward so far. I have in my hand a pamphlet which was put out by the minister himself shortly after the end of last session, entitled "What did parliament do?" The pamphlet states that "this is a difficult question to answer," and with that we entirely agree. It goes on to say:

> The memorandum is confined to parliamentary action directed definitely toward rehabilitation. It does not, nor is it intended to, cover the complete list of accomplishments last session.

Then it proceeds, through some fourteen pages of typewritten material, to detail the accomplishments of parliament in 1938. I have taken it upon myself to summarize those alleged accomplishments. What did parliament do? The first item is the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, with an appropriation of $30,000,000. Loans to date total $3,102,668; advances by the government to date total $659,796, or 2·2 per cent of the total. Then under the National Housing Act, part 1, $20,000,000 was appropriated. Loans under this part total $7,931,575; the dominion's share amounts to $1,982,894 and advances by the government total $593,701, or 4 per cent of the total. Under part 2 of the National Housing Act the appropriation was $30,000,000. To date none of this money has been used. Under part 3, of course, there has been no appropriation at all.

There we have $80,000,000, as was blazoned across the front pages of the press of this country last session, introduced by the government to revive the construction industry; $80,000,000 that was going to make it possible for municipalities to undertake self-liquidating improvements; $80,000,000 that was going to provide houses for scores of thousands of our people. Eighty million dollars, and how we heard that in this chamber; what a great triumph it was for the government! Yet to-day only $1,253,497 out of that total has come from the government treasury, or 1·7 per cent. I claim that such statements as were made in this chamber last session were eyewash.

Now we come to youth training, for which $1,750,000 was voted last session, which amount included a revote of $290,000 from the previous year. The youth of Canada were looking to this government—I do not know why they should, but in some sections they continue to do so—in the hope that something might yet be done, their patience all but exhausted but still hoping against hope; and $1,460,000 was our grant for 1938-39. What has been spent to-day? Only $351,000, or 24 per cent.

Mr. ROGERS: If my hon. friend will permit me to correct that, as a matter of administration the provinces frequently do not send in their accounts for work done until months after the actual expenditures have been incurred, so this figure does not represent work done at all.

Mr. MASSEY: Mr. Speaker, I have here a letter dated Ottawa, March 4, 1939, over the signature "Norman McL. Rogers," as follows:

> In response to a telephone request from your secretary to my deputy the enclosed statement has been prepared showing the disbursements under two of the votes in the supplementary estimates for the present fiscal year, namely, votes 520 and 521.
>
> I trust that the information herein covers that which you desire.

Therein I find listed the figures I have just given.

Mr. ROGERS: That does not affect what I have just said. Those figures do not cover all the work done; they cover only the accounts that have come in.

Mr. MASSEY: Well, would the minister care to make a statement, during his remarks on the next resolution standing in his name, as to the amount that has been spent under these agreements this year?

Mr. ROGERS: Certainly.

Mr. MASSEY: It seems to me a serious thing that under date of March 4, which after all is less than a fortnight ago, a statement such as this should be put out, containing no mention whatever as to the period covered. I suppose the minister will say that statement is made by one who ought to know better, in other words the hon. member for Greenwood. I simply take what is given over his own signature. If I have misrepresented the facts I apologize to the minister;

but on the other hand it is obvious to me from the letter I have in my hand that only 24 per cent of the youth training appropriation has been expended to date. The results would give that impression, in any case.

Mr. ROGERS: The statement is correct.

Mr. MASSEY: If the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has anything worth saying I wish he would say it, and not mutter to himself.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member let me say it?

Mr. MASSEY: Certainly, if it is worth hearing.

Mr. MARTIN: If the hon. member will permit me to say it—

Mr. MASSEY: If the hon. member has a question to ask I shall be delighted to give him the opportunity to do so, but I object to his muttering to himself. There is always the suspicion, when someone mutters, that he does not want even himself to hear what he is saying.

Now I come to the question of farm employment. In the pamphlet to which I have alluded we were told that $1,870,000 was granted for farm employment. Subject, I presume, to the same correction by the minister, to date $596,000 has been put to use, or 32 per cent. But Mr. Speaker, here are the facts of the case. The appropriations I have mentioned, totalling $83,330,000, represent 70 per cent of the grants listed in this extraordinary document "What did parliament do?" The other 30 per cent is essentially for public works of one kind or another, including grants in aid totalling $17,500,000. The amount of $20,000,000 for public works projects and the $17,500,000 have been essentially applied fully; but of the $83,330,000 only $2,200,497 or 2·6 per cent has been put to use. And then, Mr. Speaker, in the light of figures such as I have just used, the minister rose in his place this afternoon and said, in words which echoed through this chamber, "The government has taken every possible step to stimulate the building industry." Does the minister honestly believe that the government has taken every possible step to stimulate the building industry?

Mr. ROGERS: Within reason.

Mr. MASSEY: Does he believe they had to pass through two sessions, two and a half years of administration, before they changed that "moribund legislation"? Does he believe that the Dominion Housing Act, that "iniquitous act" which had to be changed, should exist for two and a half years before it was changed? Why was it permitted to remain on the statute books, if it was moribund legislation?—because, Mr. Speaker, in its own right it was doing a job.

Mr. MARTIN: Oh, oh.

Mr. MASSEY: Well, after all, I think the hon. gentleman who groans represents more fully than anything else the first syllable of the city from which he comes.

Mr. STEWART: A Windsor groan.

Mr. MASSEY: And that, after all, if he will look—

Mr. MARTIN: I missed that pearl of humour.

Mr. MASSEY: If the hon. member will look at the record he will find that operations under the Dominion Housing Act, providing as it did for houses of an average value of $4,000, were successful to the degree of about $25,000,000. I have not the exact figure in my hand. That was a fair fillip to the construction industry. But this "moribund legislation," even in the face of recommendations of the national employment commission, which came in a year and a half before, remained on the statute books for two and a half years before it was changed.

Mr. STEWART: And not changed much.

Mr. MASSEY: "The government has taken every step possible to stimulate the building industry." Shall I say "that statement is made by one who ought to know better"?—that was the minister's phrase. What about the years which have gone by? What about the lack of cooperation of the provinces? The old chestnut of provincial rights was not merely trotted out this afternoon by the minister; it was brought in with a blaze of glory. He referred to it very guardedly and carefully for the consumption of those in all the provinces, be the provincial government guilty of "conspiracy" or otherwise. Mr. Speaker, the admission this afternoon in the speech of the Minister of Labour was a most fatal admission; and if the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) were listening—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am listening; my hon. friend has no right to insinuate that I am not. I have no difficulty in hearing him.

Mr. MASSEY: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I was just judging by appearances. I did not think my right hon. friend was listening.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, he cannot help being bored.

Mr. MASSEY: If the right hon. gentleman had been listening this afternoon, intently, he would have heard his minister say—as he did—that every possible step had been taken to stimulate the building industry. I wonder if he feels that that is an accurate statement. He realizes also that his minister was compelled to make the statement—not in so many words, no—to make the statement that it was lack of cooperation between the federal government and the provincial governments that was nailing down the lid of the Liberal coffin more than any other single factor, so far as the efficiency of the government was concerned—handicapped and hamstrung on every angle by the absence of cooperation.

"We have taken every step possible to stimulate the building industry."—whereas all hon. members know the difficulty or the handicap in the way of stimulation is the lack of federal cooperation with the provincial governments.

Then the minister, toward the end of his speech, said "the government has met the problem of unemployment." I repeat, "The government has met the problem of unemployment." I wonder if those hon. gentlemen coming from industrial areas are prepared to go back to those areas, to meet the man on the street who is still unemployed or the youth who has yet to find his first job, and say, "Cheer up, old boy; all is well. The government has met the problem of unemployment. The Minister of Labour told me so."

Mr. MARTIN: The Minister of Labour did not say that.

Mr. MASSEY: He said it, word for word. I wrote it down as he said it—"the government has met the problem of unemployment." Perhaps that would be a statement for a stump speech on the hustings; perhaps it has been thrown out in the House of Commons for some purpose or another. But what purpose does a statement like that serve for the man who is still unemployed? The government has not met the unemployment problem. If the minister thinks for a single, solitary minute that such figures as he put on Hansard this afternoon indicate in any way, shape or form that the government has met the problem of unemployment, then he is wrong. There are 978,000 dependent upon relief in this country; tens of thousands of the youth of this country wandering about, trying to find something here or there—eking out an existence. "The government has met the problem of unemployment!" I think there has been no more damnable statement made than that in this House of Commons.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member should not use that word.

Mr. MASSEY: If the word is objectionable, I would withdraw it—but the house knows what I mean.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DUNNING: Has he withdrawn?

Mr. MASSEY: "If the situation in Canada is relatively better, why should we not be pleased?" Those were more of the minister's honeyed words. If the situation in Canada is relatively better than it is in any other country of the world, why should we not be pleased? The fact that we may be better off in Canada than people in some other countries does not make the condition here as it should, or could, and must be. We are better off than they are in Czechoslovakia. We are infinitely better off than the peoples living in some of the European countries at the present time. That we well know, and we thank God for it. But that does not provide the government with an excuse or alibi for the fact that conditions are no better in Canada than they are.

"We have no ground for despair in Canada." We have no ground for despair of our country, but we have of the government. Yes, we have of the government. After all, we must perforce realize that we are faced with a situation which may not be very palatable from the point of view of those who occupy the treasury benches. But the fact remains that we have not done all we can by any manner or means to stimulate construction, or any other industry. And just because things may be relatively better in Canada does not make conditions here right. Because things are relatively better in Canada does not preclude the right of some of us in this house rising in our places and calling the attention of the government to a situation which they themselves know exists, but which they seem either unwilling or powerless to deal with. Either the government does not understand the problem or else it is unwilling to deal with it—or both.

Mr. SPENCE: They do not know how to deal with it.

Mr. MASSEY: The resolution before the house anticipates a measure to provide assistance in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress. It seems to me extraordinary that two months of the session should pass before the problem facing the man on the street or the man on the farm is given any consideration by the government. Here is one of the greatest—possibly the greatest—problems facing Canada today. Those are problems which, as I have already said, either directly or indirectly affect the life of every man, woman and child in the dominion. I am going to make no apologies this afternoon for discussing the subject matter of this resolution at considerable length, and attempting to present to the house the unvarnished facts. I do not fear the undesirability of laying such facts before the country. It is highly to be desired, especially in view of the speech to which we have listened this afternoon, that such facts be presented.

I shall not, however, attempt to discuss the problem of agricultural distress, though I plan to speak upon this great question at a later date. I realize fully that this problem is irreducibly linked up to its twin problem of unemployment and that a healthy condition of agriculture is tantamount to a prosperous Canada. Sufficient be it to say here that the government has treated the agricultural situation for the last three and a half years as a succession of emergencies. Under and by reason of this performance the problem of agricultural distress has in fact become a succession of emergencies. Surely the facing of these successive crises as isolated individual phenomena does not constitute an agricultural policy.

As I have just stated, the problem of unemployment and its resulting distress touches our national life at its most vital point. History tells that story. The urgency and need for swift and courageous government action is painfully obvious. I shall attempt to demonstrate before I sit down that it is the absence of such action that has caused and is causing the condition which we face in Canada at the present time. Not minimizing for a moment the value of efficient and equitable trade treaties—I certainly do not include the last two trade treaties——and of a large export trade, we must realize that we in Canada consume about eighty per cent of the goods we produce and manufacture within our own borders. Further, even though we are the fifth exporting nation of the world, we may claim only about four per cent of the total world trade.

The challenge to the government is to put Canadians to work in Canada and to realize to the fullest possible degree the natural resources with which we have been blessed and to reestablish the principle that Canadian raw materials should be processed as far as possible by Canadian workmen. There is nothing wrong with our Canadian people. There is nothing wrong with our Canadian youth. The unemployed Canadian, the youth who has yet to find his first job, is ready and willing to go to work, earnestly seeking the opportunity to give outlet to that virility and energy which has always characterized the individual Canadian. Thus I say, the government is challenged to clear the way for the creation of new jobs, not palliative methods of employment, not casual employment, but new jobs of a permanent character, and to create opportunity for the development of Canada by Canadians. It is with the deepest regret that we are forced to the realization that the present government has failed so miserably to answer this challenge. As I wish, Mr. Speaker, to discuss this matter from several different angles, and as it is approaching six o'clock, I desire to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 16, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. W. A. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house I move that the first report of the standing committee on public accounts, presented to the house on the 14th instant, be now concurred in, as follows:

Your committee recommends that it be empowered:

(1) To print, from day to day, 500 copies in English and 200 copies in French of its minutes of proceedings and evidence, and that standing order 64 be suspended in relation thereto.

(2) To sit while the house is in session.

(3) To employ clerical and stenographic assistance.

(4) To sit, for a period not exceeding two days, in the city of Toronto, and that the payment of any travelling expenses incurred be authorized.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the report be not now concurred in but that it be referred back to the standing committee on public accounts with instructions to delete clause 4 therefrom.

Under clause 4 authority is requested from this house that the public accounts committee may sit for a period not exceeding two days in the city of Toronto, and that the payment of any travelling expenses incurred be authorized.

As one of the minority of that committee who protested against this procedure, I find it necessary to carry the protest in this form to the floor of the house. It is not my intention to obstruct the business of the committee but rather to protest against a plan which I believe will obstruct the true purposes of the inquiry.

I submit that this procedure is not within the intentions of parliament when the inquiry was authorized. As far as I can discover there is no precedent for it in the records of parliament. Not a word of evidence has yet been heard; and apparently the members of the committee are to be transported to Toronto and to be dazzled, or to be influenced, before any evidence is heard, by the sight of a humming industry. I submit that the present state of the plant is not in question. What is in question is the state of the plant in October 1936 and at the time the contract was executed in March 1938. This is an attempt to focus attention on that which has occurred since the execution of the contract, whereas the purpose of the inquiry is to deal with that which occurred prior to the execution of the contract. Since the execution of the contract, and according to the statement made by the minister in the house the other evening, a sum approximating $844,000 has been spent on the plant. It should be in good shape. If it is not in good shape, others should pass judgment on that matter. Apparently it is in such good shape that the John Inglis Company is in a position to advertise in all the trade journals that it is prepared to take on a great deal of other business. It is altogether too late for the jury to visit the scene of the crime.

I submit that the committee is not in a position to determine the ability of the company to execute the contract according to schedule. It has been contended that that should be the purpose of the committee at its outset. For that purpose experts are required, and if during the proceedings of the committee it be found necessary to secure evidence on any of these matters, experts should be secured. There are many on the committee—and perhaps I may include myself in the number,—who could not tell the difference between certain types of shaping presses and heavy duty boring lathes. If we are to determine whether or not the company is in a position to carry out the contract according to schedule, it will be necessary to examine production schedules. I can readily imagine that there would be objection to such a procedure, and in any event it is entirely beyond the resources of the committee. Appraisal and inspection companies now employed by the Canadian government could carry out this work if in the judgment of the committee it were considered necessary.

Statements have been made repeatedly that discussion of this contract in the house has delayed the company in meeting the requirements of Canada's defence forces. What could delay the work in this factory more than to conduct through the premises at this time fifty members of a standing committee of this house, and to require that company to make preparations for such a visit? In addition, prominent officials of the company will later be required to give evidence at length before the committee.

I have also in mind the warning given on various occasions by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) that committees of this house should exercise care in incurring expense for printing and the calling of witnesses. Therefore the cost of this plan should be taken into consideration. And it should be taken into consideration on the basis of the outside liability. The phrasing of this report is such that it does not restrain hon. members who take the trip from submitting accounts for their out-of-pocket expenses. It has been the custom when members of this house are required to undertake journeys on public business of this kind that they seek reimbursement of their out-of-pocket expenses. The suggestion has been made that members of the committee might refrain from submitting expense accounts, but there is nothing in the phrasing of this report to restrain them, and therefore the outside liability should be considered. I have made a rough and ready calculation, and the lowest estimate of the cost of a two-day sitting in Toronto is something in the neighbourhood of $650. I can itemize that if any hon. member requires it.

In justice to all the firms concerned it follows that similar visits should be made to other plants—to Montreal in order to visit the premises of Montreal Construction Supply and Equipment Limited, and possibly to the dominion government arsenal in the city of Quebec. Certainly if proper comparisons are to be made, visits should be made under this precedent to other established firms in Canada equipped to do machining work of this kind. I submit therefore that the ultimate cost of the policy for which this report establishes a precedent would involve a sum of over $2,000 to be paid out of the public treasury, and for no good purpose. For that reason the trip would be regarded simply as a junketing trip.

I desire to restate the purposes of this inquiry as I stated them when I moved the motion of reference to the committee. I moved the motion of reference because of specific issues raised by Mr. Justice Davis. He stated in his report that certain matters would have to be determined by parliament. The first was whether or not the Bren gun could be manufactured under public auspices or by private manufacture. The second was whether the conduct of the individuals concerned was above question, as referred to on page 35 of the report. The third was whether adequate reasons existed for the failure of the interdepartmental committee to report back to the government when the system of supervision of contracts broke down, as referred to on page 41 of the report. The fourth was to discover whether the procedure followed in negotiating this contract protected the public interest, as referred to on page 49. The fifth was whether proper steps were taken to ensure proper discharge of the responsibility assumed in the selection of one particular contractor, as referred to at page 50.

These were the main reasons I advanced in moving my motion of reference to the committee. I protest most vigorously against the proposal embodied in clause 4 of the report of the committee, inspired by the eminent and learned counsel for the defence on the committee, as being nothing more or less than a brazen window-dressing to obscure the real purpose of the inquiry.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I think little need be added to what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) in regard to the motion and on the amendment now before the house; that is, that the committee on public accounts proceed to Toronto to take evidence there. I took the position in the public accounts committee that we should first proceed with such evidence as could be obtained and such investigation as could be made in Ottawa, and that if subsequently we found it necessary to go to Toronto and inspect the John Inglis plant, that the permission of the house could then be requested. I am sure there would be no objection from the committee if it became evident as we proceeded that that was necessary. However, the majority of the committee thought otherwise, and we have this motion.

I sumbit that there is no reason at this time for inspecting the John Inglis plant. The commissioner who was appointed to investigate this contract and who heard evidence for something like two months, did not at any time during that time consider it a part of his duty to go to Toronto to inspect this plant officially. As the hon. member for Vancouver North has already stated, if this committee inspects the John Inglis plant it will be bound to inspect all the other plants in Canada that are capable of carrying on this kind of work.

We have in the report of Mr. Justice Davis, on page 37, the evidence of Mr. Fraser Elliott of the interdepartmental committee. He said:

> The committee began to take an active part in the sense of asking questions and getting to grips with the problem. In so doing the committee indicated that competitive bids should be one of the main considerations, and one of the first considerations. We pointed out that there was a number of very substantial subsisting companies in Canada that were manufacturing precision tools, and had had experience in what we thought was this line of work. We felt that they should be consulted and given an opportunity to submit competitive tenders. . . . The committee also thought there would be considerable time required for further consideration of the contract.

I submit that if we go to Toronto to see the John Inglis plant, and if we draw any inferences from what we see there, we are bound to visit these other plants and find out for ourselves whether they were or were not in a position to bid on this particular work.

One of the members of the committee, a medical man, speaking in favour of the motion to inspect the John Inglis plant and take evidence in Toronto, stated that he was taught by his professors never to make a diagnosis without seeing the patient. This is not a matter of making a diagnosis without seeing the patient. This is a matter of justifying a caesarean operation, two years after it was performed, by having a look at the infant. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we shall be merely wasting the time of the house, the time of the committee and the money of the people of this country by taking this trip to Toronto. There are many things in regard to this contract, as the hon. member for Vancouver North has pointed out, that need investigating; but at this time it does not appear that there is anything that can be learned by going to Toronto to inspect this plant, because the John Inglis plant as it is to-day is not the John Inglis plant as it was at the time this contract was signed. As the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) pointed out, I think on Tuesday last, something like $844,000 has been spent on this plant by the Canadian and British governments since that time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. There is too much noise in the house. I would ask hon. members to converse in lower tones; I can hardly hear what the hon. member is saying.

Mr. MacINNIS: Some other members of the committee said they wanted to go to Toronto to see the John Inglis plant because of certain statements made in the committee to the effect that it was a boiler shop.

Some hon. MEMBERS: A broken down boiler shop.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, a broken down boiler shop. There is no question of that; that statement was accepted by the commissioner and by everyone connected with the commission as being correct.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MacINNIS: Well, just let us see. Mr. H. S. Alguire, of the aircraft inspection detachment at Toronto, made a report which was filed with the commission, in which he said that the factory at the time the report was written, October, 1936, was inoperative and had not been in operation since April, 1936. There was no staff in the plant at the time, with the exception of three maintenance men; and he stated that the plant was equipped for making boilers and heavy machinery of that kind, adding that in view of the time the plant had been in operation, the machinery was in reasonably good condition.

That is not the plant we are going to see; that is not the plant we will see if we go to Toronto. The plant we will see will be an altogether new plant, containing nearly a million dollars' worth of machinery which was not in it when this contract was signed. That is why I say we should not take up the time of the committee or spend the money of the people of Canada in a junketing trip of this kind.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): As one of those who formed the minority in the committee in regard to this proposal I should like to make my position clear. When the suggestion that the committee visit the Toronto plant was first broached, I thought a smaller committee would be more effective and more economical. I voted for the suggestion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) that a subcommittee go to Toronto instead of sending the whole committee. That amendment was defeated, and the main motion was carried. I did not vote for the motion, but so far as I am concerned if the motion carries to-day I feel that it will be my duty to proceed to Toronto with the rest of the committee. However, I still feel that a small subcommittee would have been just as effective and certainly less expensive.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, the first thing that strikes me in regard to this matter is the fact that the Bren gun contract and the report of Mr. Justice Davis were referred to the public accounts committee over four weeks ago. Almost four weeks went by before the committee was even called; almost five weeks have gone by, and we have had only one meeting. At that meeting the proposal now submitted by the chairman of that committee was adopted by an overwhelming majority. As one of those who opposed it I want to make my position clear, and at the same time I want to point out to hon. members what to my mind is a ridiculous situation. There has been a great deal of comment by the press and by citizens generally throughout the country as to the waste of time and of public money. If we take this proposed joy ride to Toronto I consider that it will be one of the worst pieces of burlesque to which this house has ever been a party.

What is proposed? It is suggested that we should send this committee, consisting of fifty members, to the city of Toronto to look over a plant which has a contract from this government. The original motion was that we should spend not more than two days there taking evidence. Now I understand the idea is that we should not take evidence. What is behind the motion? So far as I can see, the only thing behind it is that hon. members who resent the criticism of this contract may be able to go back to their voters and say, "We saw a very well-equipped plant, which is making the Bren machine gun." Why is this proposal advanced? For no other reason, Mr. Speaker, than that these hon. members, without any particular knowledge of machinery, or the equipment of this plant, or what it can do, may be in a position to try to offset the criticism that has come from one end of this country to the other with regard to this contract.

What brought about this whole trouble? It resulted simply because a man obtained a very important contract through political patronage, and it has been shown very clearly who that man is. He is a promoter; he has been promoting companies, not for the general welfare of the people of Canada but for his own welfare.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to call the hon. gentleman to order, but surely he knows that this matter is before the committee and that he is not at liberty to discuss, as he is discussing, matters that are at present in the hands of the committee.

Mr. HOMUTH: I still maintain that this motion is being made as a start in the investigation of the Bren gun contract, and I am opposing this trip to Toronto for certain reasons. One of them is that throughout the whole thing we pointed out the inefficiency of the plant, the fact that it was not fitted to make Bren guns and that there was no assurance it was fitted to make any kind of ammunition. But as a result of getting this contract certain men who were promoting it and who got the contract and control of the business would have been in a position to make millions of dollars of profits, through stock manipulation alone.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HOMUTH: I submit I am in order, Mr. Speaker; I am discussing the matter and pointing out the things that we as a committee are supposed to investigate as a result of the debate which took place in the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It has gone far beyond that.

Mr. HOMUTH: If I am out of order, sir, I will abide by your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should confine his remarks to the motion and the amendment before the house. The amendment is that the report be not now concurred in, but that it be referred back to the committee with instructions to delete a certain paragraph. That is the subject matter at present before the house.

Mr. HOMUTH: I abide by your ruling, Mr. Speaker. But I do say that we are asked to go to Toronto to investigate a plant—not the plant that was there when the contract was given, but a new plant which has been constructed, in which the Bren machine gun is being made. It is not being made in that immense boiler factory with ceilings sixty, seventy or eighty feet high. The Bren machine gun is being made in an addition—and a rather cheap looking addition at that—which has been built outside the old John Inglis Company plant. In that part they have spent $844,000 in machinery, much of the profit from which is going to those who are promoting this whole affair. The plant we would see is entirely different from the plant which was there when the contract was made.

There were lies told about the plant, and untruths told about the condition of the plant, in order to get the contract. One lie led to another, and the whole thing was a case of misrepresentation. We charge that the old John Inglis Company plant was not a fit place in which to make the Bren machine gun. The very fact that they had to build a new plant is proof of that.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is not discussing the merits of the question.

Mr. STEWART: On a point of order, I submit it must be borne in mind that the reference to the public accounts committee is absolutely wide open. The reference to the committee included the Bren gun contract, the report of the commissioner on that contract, and all other contracts. The report of the committee suggests a visit to Toronto to inspect a plant. I submit every reason which can be urged against inspection of that plant is quite in order now on this motion.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But that is not what the hon. member is saying.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He is giving judgment.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): He is resuming the whole debate on the merits of the first motion to send the matter to the committee.

Mr. STEWART: No, no.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): He is adducing arguments which were adduced at that time, and which have nothing to do with the proposal to visit the plant. Indeed his arguments show conclusively that it is important that the plant be visited.

Mr. HOMUTH: If there is a continuation of the debate I say it is the fault of the government that there is any debate on this matter at all, and hon. members of that committee making any such silly suggestion as that of going to Toronto. We charge—

Mr. SPEAKER: That is a reflection on the government and members of the committee.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker, I did not say members of the government were silly; I said it was a silly suggestion to make—and I still think so. I still say that the whole condition of the plant was misrepresented, and that what we will see in Toronto is a new plant equipped with government money. This government has $844,000 invested in the plant, and we do not know yet how much more will have to be invested in it before they are able to turn out Bren machine guns.

Mr. REID: Go up and see it.

Mr. HOMUTH: If the committee wishes to go to see the plant, then let us go to see some of the plants which were mentioned in the evidence.

An hon. MEMBER: Who mentioned them?

Mr. HOMUTH: Let us go and see the plants which could have made the Bren machine gun. On the committee we have doctors, lawyers, farmers and insurance brokers, men who in their own professions are undoubtedly capable. I have been in industry all my life, but I could not go into any plant, and simply by looking at it and at the machinery, say whether or not it would be equipped to turn out any particular article.

With all due respect to their ability, I venture to say that members of the house could be taken into a washing machine factory and be told, "In this factory we can turn out pistols and machine guns," and they would simply reply, "Is that so?" What knowledge have the members of the committee with respect to the manufacture of a machine gun? No man on the committee, even if he has been interested in industry all his life, is in a position to go into a plant, inspect it and be able to say that it would be an efficient plant for the purpose of turning out the Bren machine gun. He could not do that unless he knew every operation necessary to turn out such a gun. These matters are all secret; they are not for the knowledge of the members of the committee. We have been told by the minister that they are so secret that they had to be very careful with respect to the men they employed in their plant at Toronto.

If the committee is going to make inspections, let it inspect the plants which could have done the work, without the government having to invest a million or more dollars to do it, and to build up a private enterprise for some stock promoters. Let them go and inspect plants which could have made shells such as are being made in Montreal. Let them inspect plants which made shells during the last war, which are equipped to-day to make shells and to make them cheaper than they are being made under contract in Montreal.

If hon. members and people throughout the country have any reason to protest against loss of time and waste of money, they will certainly have a great deal of reason to do so if the house decides the committee is to go to Toronto to investigate the plant. Personally I shall take no part in this joy ride. I will not be a party to this burlesque. I do not intend to go to Toronto to inspect the John Inglis company plant.

Mr. J. A. MARSHALL (Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up much time of the house or to hold up the vote on this particular question. As a member of the public accounts committee from time to time I have purposely refrained from making any statement or any remark on the floor of the house with respect to the Bren machine gun contract or the report of Judge Davis. I prefer to defer any comments until such time as the committee has completed its work and made a report to the house.

It has been stated that over $800,000 has been spent on the plant by the Canadian and British governments since the investigation took place before Mr. Justice Davis. It may be possible to visualize the condition of the plant before that expenditure was made, but I do not believe a casual inspection as is contemplated would enable me at any rate to form an unprejudiced opinion. Therefore, I shall support the amendment to the resolution, and all the members of this group will do likewise.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the question before the house is whether the public accounts committee of some fifty-six members shall be authorized to proceed to Toronto to visit the Inglis plant and hold there a session of the House of Commons and a parliamentary inquiry. That is what it amounts to. There is an amendment before us to strike out paragraph 4 of the report of the committee. There has been a great deal of criticism of this house in connection with the appointing of committees and commissions and empowering other people to go all over the civilized world on public business. Very little is accomplished or learned. The reference to this committee was that it should find out whether or not this was a good contract and in the public interest. That is why the committee was appointed and constituted. Now they want to go beyond their prerogatives and hold a session of parliament, a session of the public accounts committee at the factory of John Inglis Company on Strachan avenue, Toronto. How many members of this committee are technical men who would know anything about the plant or its work.

If Canada were industrialized to the same extent as Great Britain, some object might be accomplished in inspecting this plant in Toronto. Ottawa alone is where this committee should sit. A royal commission was appointed under the Public Inquiries Act and considerable evidence was heard and the judge made his report. I may say that in England a parliamentary session was held at Aldershot, according to pictures which appeared in Sketch for February. The whole membership of the House of Commons went to Aldershot to inspect the armaments being manufactured there. But Aldershot is only a few miles from London and they were able to be back in the house the same day.

At the present time the Inglis plant is not fully equipped for this purpose, but will soon be. I passed there last Saturday and there was a large number of men at work. It is an old and splendid plant and is a most commendable idea if it is extended to provide work for all. I understand from the minister that he has had reports by his officials on 1,300 plants, but there are many other plants which were not inspected but which should be at once. This is a unit which is actively engaged in this work, but I cannot see the necessity for holding a public judicial inquiry in Toronto at present. Witnesses are to be heard and their evidence taken under oath. I cannot see how any good results can be obtained from such a visit. If the House of Commons is to hold a session in Toronto, they should hold it in the Toronto exhibition coliseum which is next door to this plant in Toronto. The members would then be able to inquire into a much more important question, namely, why 1,200 transient men are on relief and cannot get work. In my opinion unemployment is a much more important matter for us to deal with than the present business to be dealt with by this committee.

When the session closes we find our representatives travelling all over the world, on each one of the seven seas. We get very little good out of these joy rides as the press call them because that is all a great many of these trips are. So far as this committee is concerned, I was a member but I am not at the present time. I believe the committee would be better employed if it stayed here in Ottawa. A few members could be appointed to make an inspection of this plant if the government thought it necessary. It may be necessary to do a little later on what was done during the days of the war when a visit was made to the Baldwin plant and other munition plants in Canada. However, we are not yet far enough on with this munitions expansion at the present time. I understand the program of the minister on rearmament calls for an expenditure of several millions, and when we get far enough along perhaps it may be thought advisable for the House of Commons to appoint a committee, as was done during the war, to visit this plant and other plants later and make a report. As I understand the reference to the committee, the committee is to go over the evidence taken before the royal commissioner and his report. We are now being asked to delegate our powers and permit sessions of parliament to be held in Toronto. If that is to be done, let us consider this more important question, the question of unemployment.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the public accounts committee I hesitate to take part in this debate because I understand it is not the usual procedure to discuss matters before a committee until a report has been tabled. As other hon. members have brought to the attention of the house, an amendment was moved by me in committee to provide for the appointment of a smaller committee of seven members to proceed to Toronto to inspect the plant and then report to the main committee. I was quite willing to abide by the decision of such a committee. However, when that amendment was presented it was discussed by the various members and the majority thought that the committee as a whole should visit the plant. I do not feel this is a joy ride, as has been suggested by some of the hon. members who have spoken on this matter. This trip is necessary in order that we may vote intelligently on this important question. I like the attitude taken by the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Marshall). The hon. member intimated that he had refrained from discussing this matter because he wanted to keep an open mind. That is my attitude with respect to this whole question. I want to hear every detail brought before the committee and then make up my mind to support the majority or minority report, as the case may be. I feel that we should visit the plant and I am supporting the recommendation made by the majority of the committee.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If the hon. member cannot vote intelligently without going to Toronto, how does he expect the members of the house generally to vote intelligently unless the whole house goes there?

Mr. ISNOR: I think I can answer that to the satisfaction of the hon. member. One hon. member has said that an expenditure of $800,000 was made on equipment. I should like to satisfy myself or have a report from a subcommittee as to whether that expenditure of $800,000 was justified. I think that is a very important aspect of the matter.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. MEMBER: The expert!

Mr. MacNICOL: I am persuaded to rise as much by the remark I have just heard from the opposite side as anything else, but particularly because of an article which appeared in the Toronto Telegram of Saturday last, March 11, apparently an interview with the officials of the Bren gun plant, justifying the plant. This interview says:

> What precisely is the John Inglis plant like? Is it the broken down, empty boiler factory, the wretched ghost of more prosperous days, its critics say it is?

Anything I said about the John Inglis plant in the former debate was about the plant as I knew it and had known it for many years. I have known it from end to end and my remarks had reference to the plant as I knew it, not as it is now. In fact, the whole debate applied to what the plant was like before it was purchased. I continue to quote:

> According to officials of the company that is an unfair and untrue picture of the situation, based upon rumour, gossip and miscomprehension.

I repeat that any references I made in the debate to the John Inglis plant were to the plant as it was before this contract was let, not as it is to-day. My remarks had no reference to the new part of the plant. Continuing the quotation:

> They admit that the original purpose of the plant was to manufacture boilers, that it went into liquidation, but they claim that now, under new management, the plant is staffed and equipped to meet the demands made upon a competent engineering and ordnance organization.

I have nothing to say as to the competency of that company to manufacture to-day any kind of equipment, large or small, or the Bren gun. What I have to say refers to what the plant was when the member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton) wrote to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King).

An hon. MEMBER: It is still the same.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member who said that really does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Let us go and see it.

Mr. MacNICOL: On the 24th of August, 1936, the hon. member for Trinity wrote the Prime Minister as follows—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MacNICOL: Very well, Mr. Speaker. The letter is in Hansard and has been quoted often; I do not need to repeat it.

I am going to describe what the plant was like at that time for I know it very well. It consisted of seventeen or eighteen or nineteen large and small buildings, some of them lean-to's. There were five main buildings. There was the office building. Then there was the machine shop, which is a large building that was used for manufacturing all kinds of steel and iron equipment that the John Inglis company made. They were splendid manufacturers of marine engines. That was their original business. They made hydraulic machines for mines and so forth, condensers, centrifugal and reciprocating pumps. They made tanks; they made boats—they made one of the ferry boats for the city of Toronto. They also made marine legs for grain elevators, and they made coal bunkers. The John Inglis plant at that time was well equipped for making all that kind of material.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacNICOL: I hear a "hear, hear" from a man who knows I am right, and I hope he is on the committee, because I know he knows what a plant means. It was the hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding).

Building No. 3 was for making boilers. It was a large building and the boilers they made were, some of them, perhaps 20 feet long, some perhaps longer, and anything from 24 inches in diameter up; I believe they went as high as 100 to 150 inches in diameter in the boilers and tanks they made. These tanks and boilers had to be lifted away up and turned round and brought down again. It was a thoroughly equipped boiler plant, none better in Canada.

Building No. 4 was for holding the patterns of the company. I knew the company very well because the company I was with bought a vast quantity of material from the John Inglis company. Shop No. 5 was the forging shop. The company in later years made boilers and the boiler-heads were dished at the plant, and because of that the company had a very large forge shop for heating and dishing the heads and flanging the sheets that entered into the construction of a boiler. I see my hon. friend the hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding) nods his head. He knows that is a large building.

There were five main buildings and a whole lot of small buildings, perhaps another dozen of small buildings or lean-to's. During the past months a sixth building has been added to the plant, at the rear, as I understand it, of the forge shop, part of it between the forge shop and the machine shop. That building, I heard someone say, is 582 feet in length. At its narrowest its width is 37 feet, and at its widest, in the centre of the building, approximately 140 feet. It angles off alongside the railway for a considerable distance, and at the west end is perhaps not over 45 or 50 feet in width. That new building may be all that is claimed for it. But at the time the contract was let that building was not there; it has been built since. This new building has tin on the outside, glass on the north side and glass on the south side, and it runs alongside the railway track. I believe the ceilings are about 14 feet high. The machines are assembled in the building alongside the windows on the south side and alongside the windows on the north side, with a row of machines down the centre. That is the new shop.

The company itself in its own advertisements in the Toronto papers endorses everything we said about the plant in the debate in this house. Here is a picture of an advertisement that appeared in the Toronto papers. It carries a cut showing the old John Inglis plant before the new building was added; in fact, the new building is not shown in the cut at all as I see it. This advertisement states what the company can do; and what does the company itself say? It is now referring to the old plant, described as a boiler plant. I do not remember whether someone said—I know that I never at any time said, and it is neither here nor there whether anyone did or not—that it was a broken down boiler plant. It was a good boiler plant in its day, none better in the country, but it stood idle for several years before it was purchased by the company which now owns it. This advertisement reads:

> We are designers, engineers and manufacturers of machinery and equipment for mine, mill, power plant and factory.
> Our skilled staff of experienced technicians is at your service. We invite particulars of your requirements.
> John Inglis Co. Limited.

I have no doubt they can do all that, with their patterns and equipment in the old part of the plant. They did all that before, and no doubt can do it again, and if there is any business along these lines I hope, because of my warm feeling for the old company and the name of Inglis, they will get some of that business.

All our remarks in connection with the Bren gun were by way of opposition to the purchase of the old plant for the making of Bren guns; and we were right, because they are not making Bren guns in the old plant, they are making them in a new plant. I have no doubt that the plant they have put up is a good one; I have nothing but the best to say about it, and I hope that it turns out good guns. No doubt they have good workmen. I do not know any of the men who are working in the plant, but the machinists and other technicians employed in Toronto and elsewhere are, in my experience, quite qualified, and I have no doubt that they will turn out good equipment. The point at issue between ourselves and hon. members who want to make this joy ride is that if the committee go there now they will be taken into a brand new plant and doubtless will find it well equipped.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Does my hon. friend call a trip to Toronto a "joy ride"?

Mr. MacNICOL: I have heard people say they spent a week in Toronto one Sunday; but to me there is no finer city anywhere. Perhaps others are just as good, but none is better.

I cannot conceive that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), for whom no one in the house has a warmer personal regard than I have, a regard which goes back a long time, and makes me feel for him in all this business —on this point Mr. Speaker stopped me a while ago, so I will not now continue what I might have said—will allow the committee to go to Toronto to look at a new building. Not that a new building as such is not worth looking at. The new building of any other company which might have made these guns with much less new equipment and with fewer buildings than the company which to-day has the Bren gun contract, would be worth looking at. What I am particularly opposed to is a joy ride at the country's expense. There are hon. members who do not take any stock in the leadership league movement, but in my judgment it is going to do a great deal of good. At least it will arouse the voters of this country to think of what their members are doing and what parliament is doing. I am convinced that parliament as a whole, irrespective of any party or group, is composed of as good men as can be found in any other parliament in the world. I have the highest regard for this house and its members. But the leadership league is charging us with doing nothing. What will they have in that vacant space to which on two or three occasions the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has referred?

An hon. MEMBER: They have dropped it out.

Mr. MacNICOL: When this joy-riding delegation goes to Toronto they will put a line in that vacant space to the effect that the committee is there at the country's expense. Of course hon. members travel, at any rate as far as their tickets are concerned, free of charge. I appeal to the Prime Minister to put his foot down. As I have said, I have a high regard for him; I should like others to have a high regard for him, but it will be impaired if he lets this junketing joy-riding delegation go to Toronto at the country's expense. If they wish to go at their own expense, let them do so. I have no objection to that. If any individual member wishes to go, let him go, but not, I say, at the expense of the country.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the public accounts committee I feel it my duty to speak briefly to this resolution.

There was in the committee a sharp division of opinion as to whether this inspection should be made. In the committee I opposed it. I took the ground that it was a strange proceeding. There had been a thorough investigation of this contract in all its aspects, counsel had been employed by the government and by all parties interested, and it was never suggested in the course of that investigation that anything whatever could be gained by making a trip to Toronto to inspect this plant. What can be gained at this late date? Very much less, I submit, than could have been gained if an inspection had been made earlier. An inspection at this time, after the large expenditure of money that has been made, is useless.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. STEWART: In many cases it is desirable when a matter is in dispute to investigate the site of the trouble, and sometimes a judge orders it. But if the judge knows that all the conditions have been changed since the event occurred which is the subject of investigation, he declines to authorize an inspection.

What was the reference to the public accounts committee? The Bren gun contract, the commissioner's report, and other contracts were referred to the committee. I wish now to suggest to this house just what our duties are and why this inspection is unnecessary. Reading from page 49 of the report of the commissioner a paragraph or two which I think condenses and summarizes what we should undertake, I quote as follows:

> The contract is not for a fixed sum; it is on a cost plus basis. It is admitted that we do not know how much the guns are going to cost. There are, of course, adequate powers of inspection, supervision and control vested in the department under the contract and with the etsimates from Enfield of what the guns there are costing it should be possible to keep actual cost well within bounds.
> No substantial objection can be taken in my view—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member should not go into the merits of the contract or discuss whether it was properly entered into or not. That is a matter for the committee to decide. I do not think that the hon. member should revive a general discussion of this subject which has already taken place in the house. The only question now before the house is whether or not the last paragraph of the report should be struck out.

Mr. STEWART: Mr. Speaker, I thoroughly understand the point you have taken and the objection you have made to certain statements being read. My contention that there should not be an inspection of this plant is based on what is contained in this report, and all I propose to do is to read one other paragraph as a basis of my argument that that inspection is useless and worthless:

> No substantial objection can be taken in my view to the provisions of the Canadian contract, though in the absence of any competitive bids or terms of manufacture I am unable to pass upon the substance as distinct from the form of the contract. It is important, of course, that the contract be a good and businesslike contract; but what is more important after all is whether the procedure adopted in making the contract was that best calculated to protect the public interest and to secure the confidence of the people of Canada that there would be no improper profiteering in the private manufacture of war armaments for the defence of the country.

These are the subjects which are suggested for consideration and investigation by parliament. I submit that for the consideration and determination of these, an inspection of this plant is worthless; it is not helpful in any way. In what is parliament interested in connection with this Bren gun contract? I think we want to know, in the first place, why the manufacture of these guns was not undertaken in a government property and under government auspices. In the second place, if the manufacture of these guns was not to be undertaken as a government work, why were tenders not invited for the manufacture? Why was this particular firm chosen above all others when there were others quite competent and with ample equipment to manufacture these guns? Why was the interdepartmental committee's suggestion and recommendation—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): What has this to do with the amendment?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is dealing with the question of the Bren gun contract. The question before the house is merely whether it is advisable to accept or reject one paragraph of the report of the committee. I ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to that subject.

Mr. STEWART: I accept your ruling, sir, but the argument I am trying to make apparently has not been appreciated by your honour or by the house. I am arguing that what we are in duty bound to do is to ascertain what I have been referring to rather than to inspect a new plant which has been built since this contract was awarded.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should speak to that point.

Mr. STEWART: My contention is that if the committee goes to Toronto it will be seeing a plant which has been constructed since this contract was made. This will be of no assistance whatever in coming to a conclusion as to the condition of the plant at the time the contract was made.

Mr. YOUNG: Does the hon. member admit that the present building and plant is a satisfactory plant?

Mr. STEWART: Whether or not that is so can be easily established by calling one or two witnesses who know and can give expert testimony as to the condition of the plant. If this procedure is followed we can form a better judgment than we could by going to Toronto and inspecting the plant. To me this is a futile undertaking, a waste of public money. I opposed it in the committee and for the same reason I propose to vote for the amendment.

Mr. G. G. McGEER (Vancouver-Burrard): I supported in the committee the resolution to ask the house for leave to go to Toronto to inspect the plant and the present operations of the John Inglis Company, as they apply not only to the production of Bren guns but also to the commercial activities of the plant.

I did so in order that we might have a first-hand view of the possibilities of coordinating war-time preparation activities with peace-time commercial activities, not only to secure efficient means for the production of arms in time of need but also to coordinate that kind of work and the reestablishment of peace-time industrial enterprise. It is important to consider this particular contract from the point of view of the policy of governmental cooperation with private enterprise to aid as far as possible the preparation for the production of necessary arms for defence and, as well, the reestablishment of industrial activity in Canada.

Any better reasons for the inspection of this plant than have been advanced by hon. members who have spoken against the proposal of the committee, would be very difficult to find. I am amazed that those who have been responsible for the enormous amount of time that has been taken in investigating this minor item in British empire defence should now hesitate to go and examine, or allow a committee of parliament to go and examine, the thing that they have condemned as unworthy of confidence.

Mr. MacNICOL: They would not know anything about it.

Mr. McGEER: Let me tell the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) that this whole program is based on misrepresentation. When I read the Maclean's magazine article—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MacNICOL: That was in Hansard.

Mr. McGEER: Well, the picture I am referring to was not in Hansard. One thing that impressed me was the picture of the John Inglis plant, and because I saw that picture, I stopped off in Toronto on my way through to Ottawa and took a look at the plant. No greater misrepresentation could possibly have been made to the public of Canada than the picture which featured the article which by innuendo made the charges which have been under investigation for months.

What is this committee asked to do for parliament and for the people of Canada? It is asked to ascertain whether the plant was a broken down boiler plant, whether the personnel of the company was competent to carry out the contract. What better evidence can the committee have than to go and see the men carrying out the contract, the problems of production and of organization, and to have explained to them the manner in which those problems are being faced and carried out? In a matter involving much technical detail no man can form a judgment so well from the evidence of experts as he can by going and seeing for himself the problem and its solution.

We are told that the delivery of the guns will be indefinitely delayed, that the company's assets were not of the value stated in the evidence before the royal commission, that there was gross misrepresentation as to the commercial value of the plant as well as its war-time value—

Mr. STEWART: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, your honour has ruled that we should stick closely to the motion before the house. I submit that the hon. member is travelling far afield.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member who is now speaking is as much in order as some who preceded him.

Mr. STEWART: There is this difference, that others were stopped and he is not stopped.

Mr. SPEAKER: I stopped them, but they would not abide by my ruling.

Mr. McGEER: I wish to keep within the rules of the house, Mr. Speaker, and certainly I bow to any ruling you may make. But I am pointing out some things which as a member of the committee I feel we are required to report upon, and some things on which I believe we can form a better opinion by seeing with our own eyes than we can by merely calling experts whose views we may be unable to understand.

We are told that the plant and the company were not capable of being efficiently and economically converted into a production unit of arms for Canada, namely, Bren guns. What have we heard this afternoon? We have been told that a new building has been erected and that some $840,000 of public moneys have been expended on that plant. There is one feature of this particular kind of contract about which the committee by going to Toronto can get first-hand information. In the production line, which spreads over a very large building, a uniform temperature of 68 degrees Fahrenheit must be maintained, because this particular type of equipment, with its innumerable parts, has to move in production throughout under the same temperature. I am given to understand that, starting from a plant not in operation as against starting from a plant in operation, one of the reasons why it is wiser to adopt this course rather than the other—

Mr. MacINNIS: What other?

Mr. McGEER: —is that you can build a new organization and equip it having regard to the conditions that are necessary successfully to produce this kind of weapon. In any event, for any hon. member of this house to say that he does not want to go and will not go to examine a plant in which $840,000 of public money is invested and in which defence armaments are being produced, indicates in my opinion an extraordinary conception of the duties and responsibilities of a member of parliament. Let me say that while the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) smiles—

Miss MACPHAIL: We laugh.

Mr. McGEER: Yes, I know that.

An hon. MEMBER: We are all laughing.

[Mr. Stewart.]

Mr. McGEER: I am glad of that. But when a man stands in his place in this house and says, "I will not agree with a majority of the committee; I will not agree with a majority of this house; I will stand alone; I refuse to go," he is bringing to this house something that at least borders on that from which the world is suffering so much to-day, namely the dictatorship of fascism.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. HOMUTH: I would ask the hon. member to withdraw the reference to myself with regard to fascism.

Mr. McGEER: Oh, no, Mr. Speaker; I did not accuse the hon. gentleman of being a fascist. I said that in my humble opinion his attitude bordered dangerously upon that from which the world is suffering to-day; because as I understand fascism, it is the dictatorship of one individual who declares his will against that of all others.

We have been told that these expenditures of public money are unnecessary. Well, I think an examination of the plant will give us direct information in regard to what must be done in order to bring into production an instrument or arm of defence such as the Bren gun. There are two other phases of this inquiry by the public accounts committee which I think are important. One is that the instigator of this whole investigation, Colonel Drew, has declared that this plant should be closed; and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) has asked this house to cancel the contract. If we are to close the plant or cancel the contract, or consider whether or not we should do so—and these are issues that are definitely presented to the public of Canada for consideration to-day—surely we should go and look at what we are going to close and understand what we are going to cancel.

Mr. HOMUTH: You will never close it.

Mr. McGEER: Well, I do not think an intelligent parliament would.

Another item which I think should be considered is the question of the expense involved in going from Ottawa to Toronto. I only wish that those who have spoken about this item of expense had been as considerate of the cost to the Dominion of Canada of this long investigation and the altogether too lengthy debate that took place in this house. Members of parliament have passes. We propose to go to Toronto on Friday night. We propose to sit in Toronto, or to examine the plant in Toronto without taking evidence, on Saturday morning. We propose to be back on the job here in Ottawa on Monday morning.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I ask who has decided all this? I am a member of the committee, but so far I do not know anything about it.

Mr. McGEER: I am inclined to think my hon. friend will suffer from that difficulty in connection with a great many phases of the activities of the committee.

Mr. MacINNIS: This is the dictatorship complex coming out now. Let me tell my hon. friend that at the moment he is not in the city council of Vancouver.

Mr. McGEER: We appointed a steering committee. That steering committee met. The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) is a member of that committee, and I am sure he will agree that I am stating the general idea of that steering committee, which was agreed upon this morning and which will be reported to the general committee to-morrow morning.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then we will decide to-morrow morning.

Mr. MARSHALL: I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether all members of the steering committee were notified of this meeting which was held this morning.

Mr. McGEER: All were notified and a majority were present.

Mr. MARSHALL: I understand that I am a member of that committee, and I want to state positively on the floor of this house that I received no notification of the meeting.

Mr. McGEER: There is another feature of this expense problem. Any member of that committee who does not think public money should be expended on this trip does not need to file a bill of expense; so that the total expense—and I think I can speak for the Liberal members of that committee—will depend upon the bills filed by the members of the committee from other parties in this house. There will be no expense as far as this side of the house is concerned.

Mr. REID: That cuts out the joy ride.

Mr. McGEER: Anyone who would suggest a joy ride to Toronto at this time of the year has a strange conception of what a joy ride ought to be.

I do not want to prolong the debate, which has continued much too long, but the events which are occurring to-day in Europe should cause members of this house and the members of the committee to recognize a sense of responsibility, which every Canadian should realize is involved in every feature of our defence program. The time has come when the defence of Canada, as part of the British empire and one of the democracies of the world, should rise above the partisan desires and political ambitions of men who would sacrifice defence in the hope of gaining party advantage. With regard to what has been said about the expense of this proposed trip of the committee to Toronto, let me ask hon. members of the house: What about the loss the Dominion of Canada has suffered as a result of the tactics of the instigators of this inquiry?

An hon. MEMBER: And the Bren gun.

Mr. McGEER: My hon. friends complain about the $400 expense to go to examine what is admitted to be an investment of $840,000, an investment which is to produce arms which are essential for the defence of Canada. But this investigation and the manner in which it has been conducted has probably cost the workmen of Canada some $50,000,000 in war contracts which would go for the defence of the British empire.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is getting away from the subject matter of the debate.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Getting away? —he has gone.

Mr. McGEER: I bow to your ruling, sir, but what I would point out is this. Let us stop this bickering debate. Let us say to the people not only of Canada but of the British empire and of the democracies of the world: Canada is united, and is moving, in proportion to her wealth and power to make her contribution to the defence of democracy. If we do that we need have no fear of leadership leagues or anything of the kind.

I ask the house to confirm the recommendation of the committee, so that there may be a report from a committee which has done its job fairly well by starting first with the most important feature of its obligation, namely an examination of the plant as it was at the time the contract was entered into, an examination of it as it is to-day, an examination of the organization which is operating, and the conditions under which the contract is being fulfilled. If we do that one job we shall then be able to deal more intelligently with many other features of the investigation which we have been asked to make.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the government favour which the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) is now enjoying will bring encouragement to all members of the House of Commons who are standing out, as some are— and particularly in the government party—against the majority opinion in their party. I say that because I can recall a time, and not so long ago, when the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard was not—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Miss MACPHAIL: This really has to do with going to Toronto. There was a time when the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard was not in such high favour. But now, three times, we have seen him called in as the most able lawyer—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Miss MACPHAIL: —pinch hitting for the government. Each of the three times has been in connection with the Bren gun. It is really a compliment to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, and I am sure with his Irish humour he has already laughed to himself regarding it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is not fair. My hon. friend is in high favour all the time, and she usually opposes us.

Miss MACPHAIL: I thank the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe); he is always very gracious.

I listened to the whole debate on the Bren gun, but until now I have said nothing about it. My opinion would be, however, that the committee is being taken—for I judge with the "small" majority the government has, the motion will carry—to Toronto to approve the government's action. There is no doubt about that. By going to Toronto now to investigate or to look over a plant, after $844,000 has been spent on it, you get about as much idea of it as you do from visiting an old house which has been renovated. I have not had much experience with manufacturing plants, but I have seen old houses renovated, wings put on, fireplaces put in, a picture window or two added, until you could not tell where the old house had gone; certainly you could not find it in the new one. I suggest it is the same with the John Inglis company plant at Toronto. After $844,000 has been spent the committee will not be able to see the old plant at all, so there is no use going to Toronto to see it. But if members of the committee have to go in order to know what to do, then all the members of the House of Commons had better go up on a Saturday. It would be a real joy ride; and if it were not a joy ride, we could have a joyous day after we got there.

Mr. DUNNING: No expense accounts, though.

Miss MACPHAIL: I am not the sort of person who puts in expense accounts, so I would not mind that. Of course I would be on my way home, anyway. It seems to me the government is making an error in asking the committee to go to Toronto.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The government did not ask it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The committee asked it.

Miss MACPHAIL: Government members of the committee undoubtedly have asked, though, that they go to Toronto. I think it is an error. It would be far better to bring people to tell what the plant was like in the beginning. One cannot now see what it was like, even if one did go. Then the committee could have people come to tell what the plant is like at the present time.

It would look now as though the plant is being groomed as the seat of action for munitions. While I should like to see the manufacturing done under public ownership—and I must not continue with this, or Mr. Speaker will rule me out of order—it would appear that this plant is being prepared for the manufacturing of munitions. The government having spent $844,000, it is going to be difficult to pass over that company and give it to others.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard struck a very patriotic note. I was afraid to laugh too much, for fear he would too, and that would have spoiled the effect. May I say to him that one need not have armaments in these days in order to win a war. Just walk in—there is not even a protest. So that the hon. member's arguments seem rather far-fetched. I do not think hon. members of the committee who do not want to go are any less patriotic than hon. members who do want to go. If I were a member of the committee—and I am glad I am not—I should not want to be taken there to see a new plant, and then be put into the very awkward position of saying that the plant was not a fit one in which to do manufacturing.

I believe the committee would be well advised to forget about it, and, as is the usual custom with committees, bring experts here. Otherwise if the government is going to do what we hope it is going to do, if it is going to be fair and give contracts in other places, this committee will have a great time travelling around the country. It will not be in a position to stop after the visit to Toronto; it will have to go to many different places. I believe the good sense of the House of Commons, no matter how the vote goes, is that the committee would be well advised not to travel or to start on a roving commission.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only a few words in connection with this matter, and in doing so I shall endeavour to point out the real issue before the house.

In part, the motion moved originally by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) and seconded by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) was as follows:

. . . together with a copy of the agreement between the government and the John Inglis Company of Toronto for the manufacture of Bren guns, the report of the royal commission dealing with said agreement, and all related documents, evidence, vouchers and exhibits be referred to the standing committee on public accounts.

That was the reference to the public accounts committee. In other words that committee is to look into the contract and the manner in which it was given, and is to pass its opinion upon whether or not the contract was properly given.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer), in one of his usual eloquent speeches, has done everything he can as a lawyer to confuse the issue. He has dragged in a lot of material which has nothing at all to do with the investigation by the public accounts committee. For example, he said something to the effect that the trip to Toronto and the investigation was for the purpose of finding out if peace-time industry might be turned into war-time industry, or something along that line. I am not quoting his exact words, but that is one of the thoughts back of the expression he used. We all know that peace-time industry in this country can be converted into war-time industry; it has been done over and over again. Just a few days ago—I think the hon. member was absent at the time—I quoted from the Canadian Annual Review where they give the record of Canadian industry during the last war. I thought that this information should be placed on record. I showed from that statement that over a thousand million dollars' worth of war materials had been produced by Canadian peace-time industry during the last war, by converting those industries into war industries. I do not know that I can lay my hand on that statement at the moment, but I quoted from the same book a most complimentary reference to Canadian industry for the magnificent work it had done at that time. We do not need any committee to go to Toronto to find out whether peace-time industry can be converted into war-time industry. We know that without an investigation of any kind. The committee was not asked to do that, as the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) points out. The committee was asked to make an investigation of this contract akin to the investigation carried on already by the Davis commission.

Mr. McGEER: Just on that point; in my argument I directed the attention of the house to the possibility of using war-time preparation in industry to assist peace-time industry. I was not referring merely to the conversion; it was a matter of using the one as a backlog for the other. That is a different thing from what the hon. member is discussing now.

Mr. MANION: I do not know that the hon. gentleman has asked an outstanding question; I would not even call it a leading question. Any plant can be converted either way; that is only common sense. Any industrial plant can be converted in the reverse direction. A peace-time plant can be converted to manufacture war-time materials, and a war-time plant can be converted to manufacture peace-time materials.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard said that I proposed cancelling the contract because of the inability of this plant to manufacture these guns, because it was an old boiler plant or something of that sort. I did not say anything of the kind. I admit at once that an old boiler plant could be converted into a good munitions plant if sufficient money were spent on it. I suggested that this contract should be cancelled because it had been improperly given. I did not go outside the evidence of the Davis report in making that submission. That was the reason why I suggested it should be cancelled. The hon. member says that we are missing $50,000,000 worth of work in Canada because the empire will not spend money here now. I repeat what I said in my argument on a previous occasion. The best way to get empire industries over here to purchase war materials is to show Great Britain that she will get a fair deal, that profits will be properly controlled, and that the implements of war can be obtained on a reasonable basis.

To get back to the issue; which is whether or not this committee should go to Toronto to investigate this plant, to take a look at the industry as it has been built up with the expenditure of a huge amount of money, the hon. member himself stated, as well as a number of others behind me and to my left, that something like $800,000 worth of government machinery had been put into this plant. Even an old boiler plant can be easily converted into a good industrial plant by the expenditure of money. It has been pointed out by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) and others that the plant in which the Bren gun is being manufactured is not the old Inglis plant at all; it is a new plant. I have no criticism even of that. I admit at once, and I think the whole house will admit at once, that if you spend sufficient money you can turn any kind of plant, or even no plant at all, into a good industrial plant for the manufacture of munitions. But I do question the utility of a visit by a parliamentary committee made up of fifty members to a plant such as this one. To my mind it would be the most futile trip in the world. So far as I know, in the public accounts committee there is only one member, the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth), who is an industrialist. There may be others, but he is the only one I know of at the moment.

Mr. McCANN: What has the wool industry to do with munitions?

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is supporting my argument, although I do not suppose that was his intention. Even though he is in industry, the hon. member for Waterloo South would not be able to tell any more about this plant after having visited it than he would before his inspection. All he would be able to say is that it looks as though it might be a good industrial plant. That is the reason he gives for not going. I submit that no other member of the public accounts committee is qualified to make an inspection, certainly not the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, and certainly not myself if I were a member. I suppose that he and I are average of the house in general, but I do not think that either of us could visit that plant and give to the public accounts committee any opinion which would be worth while. In my position as minister and as a member of this house for many years I have had the opportunity, as have other hon. members, of visiting mines and industrial plants. That is the usual method of entertaining members of parliament when they visit industrial cities and towns. You go through a plant, you see a lot of wheels turning and belts going round, you see a lot of men at work, but you come out no wiser than you were before. Not one member of this committee will be able to go into this plant on Saturday morning and be any wiser afterwards as to whether the plant will be able to manufacture Bren guns in a splendid manner.

Mr. GOLDING: That is absolute nonsense.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member can make a speech if he wants to, but if he wants to ask a question, he should ask it. I am not going to have him get up and say that this is absolute nonsense. The hon. gentleman may make his own speech, and I am endeavouring to make mine.

I repeat that no member of this committee can go to Toronto and visit this plant and be any wiser afterward as far as the terms of this contract and the method of carrying it out are concerned. It is futile to do that.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard "pooh-poohed" any talking about expense. Apparently hon. members have changed their minds since the committee framed its report. The fourth paragraph of the report reads:

> To sit, for a period not exceeding two days, in the city of Toronto, and that the payment of any travelling expenses incurred be authorized.

That is the report, yet the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard gets up here and castigates hon. gentlemen on this side because they criticize the expense. I criticize the expense.

Mr. McGEER: Was the hon. member aware that the statements I made about expenses to this house were made in committee, and that the expense item was left in the report so that no one would have the right to say, "I did not go because my expenses would not be paid." That was in the committee.

Mr. MANION: When I deal with any resolution of this house I do not need to go to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard or anyone else to ask what it is. This resolution speaks for itself. Certainly some of our party got up in the committee and objected on account of the expense. I do not know what the others did. I object on account of the expense—not that it would amount to very much; members of parliament have their passes, so that their expense accounts would not be very large. I submit that if any hon. member wants to visit that plant on Saturday morning he should pay his own way. I do not think this country should have to pay one dollar of expense for a futile visit of this kind. I certainly hope that none of the members behind me will take advantage of this motion to the extent of even one dollar for expenses in connection with this trip. I say this, which is really all I have to say: The whole proposal to visit this plant is ridiculous.

I tried to think out what the purpose of this visit to Toronto could be, and the only conclusion I could come to was that it was a sort of smoke screen, to enable the committee to go up there and then come back and say: "Here is a fine industrial plant." Nobody questions that; I do not know whether it is or not, but I do not question that. It has no bearing at all on the Bren gun debate, which had nothing to do with the plant as it exists to-day. The debate had reference to the plant which was taken over by Major Hahn. It was a boiler plant at that time, and had been closed down—a plant which was not fit at the time the contract was let to produce munitions, as compared with other precision steel plants throughout the dominion which might have been in much better shape to produce the Bren gun. The past debate on the Bren gun had nothing whatever to do with the position of the Inglis plant to-day.

Now it is proposed to have this trip to Toronto, by fifty members of parliament, practically none of whom is an industrialist. One or two members may have sufficient engineering ability to judge a little better than the others, but I should think that forty-five out of the fifty members of that committee have had no industrial training to fit them to judge that plant or what it is doing. This whole proposal, I repeat, is not only ridiculous but is an imposition on the Dominion of Canada if one dollar is charged for the trip. I see no reason, by the way, if individual members wish to go to Toronto and look over the plant for their not doing so. It is interesting to see industrial plants, whether you understand them or not, and frankly, I really understand very little about them. But as to the government paying out money for this trip, and as to the trip serving any useful purpose, I say it is simply out of the question, absolutely and entirely.

Mr. PETER BERCOVITCH (Cartier): Mr Speaker, as I happen to be the member who moved that the public accounts committee proceed to Toronto for the purpose of inspecting this plant, and as there have been questions asked by some of the speakers as to what the motive was, may I tell this house just what prompted me to propose that motion?

I know nothing about engineering plants; I say so at once. I know nothing about the manufacture of guns, be they machine guns or any other kind. I know nothing about the manufacture of munitions, and I know nothing about boiler plants. But when I sat here and heard hon. gentlemen say in the debate that this was a broken-down old boiler plant which the government had got hold of, and that fortunes of money were going to be thrown into this broken-down old boiler plant; that the people who owned the plant and were parties to the Bren gun contract knew nothing about the manufacture of munitions, that they had had no experience in the administration of a large industry; when I was told that Major Hahn, who apparently was a prime mover acting for the Inglis company, had formerly been in the radio business, I felt that it was most important to members of the committee—

Mr. STEWART: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I submit the hon. member is not discussing the resolution at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Of course he is.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the hon. member is giving the reasons why he made his motion.

Mr. BERCOVITCH: For the reasons I have just mentioned, Mr. Speaker, I felt it was of the utmost importance to the members of the committee who were called upon to judge so important a matter as the Bren gun contract that they should have the opportunity of proceeding to Toronto and seeing for themselves whether this was a broken-down old boiler plant and whether the people connected with that institution knew anything about the building of the plant.

Apparently, from what hon. gentlemen opposite have told us to-day, they do not want to proceed to Toronto because so many improvements have been made in the plant. But I want to proceed to Toronto, Mr. Speaker, to see if this contract is being carried out properly, because it is just as important to the citizens of Canada to know that the contract is being carried out properly as it is to know whether the contract was a fit and proper one to make at the time it was entered into. My motive in making the motion before the committee was to give every member of the committee an opportunity of inspecting the plant. Even though I know nothing about munitions, know nothing about engineering, know nothing about manufacturing plants, I do know enough to be able to understand whether a plant is a broken-down old boiler plant or a plant in which such materials as are required for the Bren gun may be properly manufactured, particularly when later on, after inspecting the plant, I shall be in a position to examine or cross-examine some of the witnesses who come before the committee, for the purpose of eliciting such technical details as we may require to supplement our own observations.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is an additional reason why I believe it is necessary that the members of the public accounts committee visit this plant. The members of the public accounts committee investigating the Bren gun contract have a most important duty to perform. As was mentioned in the committee the other day by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Francœur), when he read an extract from some dispatches that came through from England, the British government are being asked questions on the floor of the house regarding this very contract, and so it is of interest not only to the people of Canada but to the entire British population to know whether this plant is equipped to carry out such contracts as may be entrusted to it by the British government or by other nations in times such as these.

I did not really intend to speak on this matter, because I thought the motion would pass in the ordinary course; but in view of the discussion, and seeing that I was guilty of having made the motion in the committee, I felt it my duty to say what I have just said.

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to understand the reasoning of hon. gentlemen who oppose the visit to examine this plant on a Saturday when the house is not in session, and under circumstances which will enable them to return to their parliamentary duties on Monday or even to return on the Sabbath for such observances as they wish to carry out in this city.

The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) is running true to form in the attitude he takes with regard to this proposal.

Let me give what is to my mind the most important reason why the members of the public accounts committee should visit this plant in operation as it now is. They will walk through it, talk with the workmen, see the fine precision tools that are set up there, study the methods that are being carried out, and ascertain from Mr. Gillespie, the Lee-Enfield expert who is there in charge, as I had the privilege of doing a couple of weeks ago, whether or not this plant is efficient and up to the minute and able to carry out every obligation the company undertook; whether in view of its contract to supply 5,000 guns to the British war office and 7,000 guns to us, it is a plant which according to the doctrine and policy of George Drew and the leader of the opposition and his followers ought, according to Drew, to be closed down, and ought, according to the leader of the opposition, to have its contract cancelled. That is the important reason why the members of this committee ought to visit the plant. At this stage of the empire's need, when only yesterday in Great Britain we find it put in this way, referring to Hitler's recent march—and may I digress to deal with an expression—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SLAGHT: —of the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail)—and surely she was not serious—that there is no need to manufacture guns, because all that an aggressor has to do is to march into another country and take peaceful possession of it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member will stick to the motion and the amendment before the house.

Mr. SLAGHT: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker. But if the hon. member thinks that Hitler's march was made without the rattle of guns and other artillery and machinery, she is very much mistaken.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is that how the hon. member bows to a ruling?

Mr. SLAGHT: In Great Britain within twenty-four hours the issue was put in this way: henceforth the world and nazi Germany—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SLAGHT: This is applicable because of the desire on the other side to close—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that the amendment before the house is to refer back the report of the standing committee. I must ask the hon. member not to wander about but to direct his remarks to the motion or the amendment.

Mr. MANION: Will the hon. gentleman permit me? I do not suppose he wishes to misquote me. I did not propose the closing down of the plant. What I proposed was the cancellation of the contract and the taking over of the plant, the expropriation of it by the government, the government to carry on the work.

Mr. SLAGHT: Well, we must take the picture that we got from George Drew, who from the day he published his slanderous article demanding the closing of the plant, has continued to demand it. The leader of the opposition now desires to cancel the contract and to have us wend our way through expropriation proceedings which will last the next few months, although, when we read what happened in England yesterday, we find that the armament race is being speeded up throughout the British empire with all possible rapidity. It is really a simple matter. Why put bandages over the eyes of the committee and refuse to spend a Saturday looking at the plant? When there is a bad case afoot, nobody wants you to see what it is all about. When there is an endeavour to cancel the contract, nobody wants, as one hon. gentleman says, to have the jury see whether the contract is being efficiently carried out in an up-to-date plant, or whether the slanderous imputations which have been circulated have any truth in them. No worse deception was ever practised than the photograph which my hon. friends are still trying to perpetuate, as a misleading idea in the public prints as to what this plant consists of. That impossible photograph taken from the railroad tracks at the rear of one of the buildings, giving as disreputable an appearance as possible to that plant, is in itself a reason why it should be demonstrated to be one of the greatest political frauds practised upon the people of the Dominion of Canada. If the computation of which we read is correct, the time occupied by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house has probably eaten up more than the $400 which is suggested as an outside figure it would have cost this committee to go and view this plant.

Mr. MASSEY: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SLAGHT: Certainly.

Mr. MASSEY: If the hon. member's argument is sound, why did not Mr. Justice Davis go to Toronto?

Mr. EULER: Ask him.

Mr. SLAGHT: As I read his report, Mr. Justice Davis did not indicate why he did not go to Toronto. Without any disrespect to him, since we are having in this house innuendoes supported by pictures on the wall which do not exist—

An hon. MEMBER: Pictures in magazines.

Mr. SLAGHT: —I think he would have had an even better insight into the situation if he had gone to Toronto. It does not appeal to me and it will not appeal to the people of Canada, that this committee should bandage its eyes and refuse to make one overnight journey to the city of Toronto to look at the plant before deciding whether they are going to recommend cancellation of the contract. That is the suggestion of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) who has just asked the question, and of his friend George Drew, whom he so lustily supported for leadership, and who has been going up and down the country in the past few weeks preaching the closing of the Inglis plant. Does the hon. member approve of that? Let us go and look at the plant. Let us go down there and get a notion of what the evidence is about. I appeal to this house to support the report of the committee.

Hon. J. EARL LAWSON (York South): Mr. Speaker, I happen to be one member of this house who up to this time has not spoken in connection with the Bren gun matter. I rise at this time, not because I desire to participate in a debate upon the merits or demerits of the Bren gun contract, but because as one who did not actively participate in the debate when it was at its height, I might say to the members of this committee, without giving offence, that it seems to me they have drifted a long way from what I have always understood to be the points at issue in this house in connection with the whole Bren gun matter. To my mind, if one will keep in mind what was the issue when the matter left this house, it will be found to have a very great bearing on the question of the wisdom or lack of wisdom of the procedure now proposed.

Let us go back for a moment or two. As I understood the situation, in 1936 the government declared in this house as a policy that they favoured the national manufacture of defence materials. I understood at the time that that was a declaration being made by the responsible minister of the crown, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). Then an article appeared in a magazine, and it was alleged that munitions were being made by private enterprise. As a result of that a royal commission was appointed and a royal commissioner made a report. The royal commissioner in his report made findings of the fact with respect to all but two matters. One of those matters, he said, was a question of policy for the government; the other was as to whether the contract was provident or improvident. Those two things, he said, were matters for the parliament of Canada. Hence it came back here; hence we had a reference to the public accounts committee. I submit that the reference was not made to that committee for the purpose of determining whether Inglis had or had not a plant. I submit the reference was not made to the public accounts committee for the purpose of reviewing the very things in respect of which a royal commissioner had made a finding. It was submitted to the committee for the two purposes which I have pointed out. Therefore I say that the issue, as I have always understood it, speaking from an absolutely non-partisan political standpoint, is this: What is to be the policy of Canada with respect to the manufacture of defence material? Will anyone tell me what earthly purpose is to be served by going to inspect a plant from the point of view of determining what should be the policy of this country? It is true that in the course of debate in this house critics questioned whether the contract made by the government was provident or improvident, but not because of the condition of the plant; that is beside the point. The criticism that was made in this house, as I understood it, was that gentlemen in private enterprise were permitted to take a plant which cost $100,000, plus some balance of $110,000 in bonds, and by a process of valuation convert that into $1,500,000 and then extract $1,250,000 of the stock of that company—

Mr. DUNNING: Order.

Mr. LAWSON: I think I am perfectly in order. I submit that was a feature of the allegation of providence or improvidence. I submit that is a question with which this committee should concern itself. But will anyone suggest to me how you are going to be assisted in determining that question by going and looking at a plant, leaving aside its efficacy or otherwise?

Mr. MUTCH: What possible harm could it do for the committee to see it?

Mr. LAWSON: If by harm is meant harm to the gentlemen who may go and see the plant, I do not see how it can possibly do them any harm. On the other hand would anyone think I was in my right senses—

An hon. MEMBER: You are not.

Mr. LAWSON: Thank you for the compliment. Would anyone think I was in my right senses if I advocated, for example, that the civil service committee should go out as a body and view all the public buildings across Canada because this country has millions of dollars invested in them? An hon. member to-day was arguing with great vigour that we should go and visit this plant because the government has advanced $800,000 odd for the purchase of machinery in it. That I submit is entirely beside the point.

Let me give my hon. friend the second phase of the answer to his question—and his question permits me to say something that I had no thought of when I got up in the first place. I will tell you the harm that will be done. You are avoiding—and when I say "you" I am using it in an impersonal sense—the issue in this case, which should be kept clearly before the public, namely, what is to be the policy of Canada with respect to the manufacture of defence material—

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That is not the issue at all.

Mr. LAWSON: —and not whether the Inglis plant is a good plant or a bad plant, an efficient or inefficient plant. I have been long enough associated with my friend the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) in the practice of our common profession to recognize the tactics of setting up a straw man to knock him down. That is a favourite practice of lawyers.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Is that what the Bren gun charges were?

Mr. LAWSON: In my opinion that is what is being attempted now, to set up a straw man, to introduce an issue which is not the real issue before this country.

I propose to vote against the house instructing this committee as an official act to go and visit this plant. I do not care if every individual member of the committee or every individual member of this house goes and inspects the plant personally. I wish to make clear to the house and the country my reason for the stand I take in this matter. It simply avoids the real issue which is before the public accounts committee, that issue being: What shall be the policy of this government and this country with respect to the manufacture of munitions, and was the Bren gun contract a prudent or imprudent contract in the circumstances?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Lawson) says he objects to this house directing a committee to go to Toronto to view a particular plant. That is not a true statement of the position.

Mr. LAWSON: May I change the word to "authorize"?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, that makes a very great difference, because what we are considering at the moment is whether we shall meet or refuse the request of a committee which was appointed for a specific purpose and which committee now has asked, in order to enable it to make its investigation as thorough and complete as possible, that it may have permission to go and view the premises that are a subject of discussion. The general rule in parliament where committees have been appointed for specific purposes is for the government to follow as closely as it can the recommendations of the committee.

In the event of opposing the recommendation of a committee the government should have very strong reasons for so doing. I would say therefore first of all that it is the duty of the House of Commons, where it has appointed a committee for a specific purpose and the committee asks for certain opportunities to pursue its work more intelligently, to support the committee's request. That would be my reason first of all for supporting the request of the committee and opposing the amendment which seeks to refuse what seems to be and is a very reasonable request.

Might I ask this question? Assume that no such motion had been proposed in the committee, that no such recommendation had been made to this house, and that after the committee had concluded its proceedings its report came back to this house, what, in all probability, would be the first thing said in criticism of the committee if they had not taken an opportunity to view the premises which were the subject of discussion in connection with the contract they had to consider? We would be told, as a very first argument we would hear from hon. members opposite, that the committee appointed to look into a contract which involved this old, broken-down boiler plant never even took the trouble to go near the plant, that in fact they had been very careful to keep away from the plant altogether. Why did they keep away from the plant, would be the next question to be asked, and the answer given would be that they knew very well that if they went to the plant a condition would be exposed there such as they did not desire to place before the house and the country. I leave it to hon. members if that is not exactly the kind of criticism that would be made.

Mr. LAWSON: Would the right hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, there have been so many questions this afternoon I would prefer not to have further questioning, as my argument is going to be about the amount of wasted time in this house to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: The same old story.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, the same old story.

Mr. MANION: There would not have been any waste time if you had not given the Bren gun contract.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am very glad the leader of the opposition has said "the same old story," because it is perfectly clear that there is a reason why it is the same old story. The time of this parliament is being taken up too largely in discussions which are absolutely unnecessary and a pure waste of time. The discussion this afternoon, from beginning to end, has been of that character so far as enabling this house to pass intelligently upon the motion which is before it is concerned. The question is simply that this house shall say whether or not, when a committee appointed by itself asks permission to go to Toronto to view certain premises, it should be permitted so to do. One hon. member could have made a statement of the arguments against, and one hon. member could have replied, and upon hearing the two statements every hon. member would have been able completely to satisfy his mind.

But what do we find? One hon. member after another in the benches opposite got up and repeated the same statements as were made by previous speakers. Here and there others, going wide of the resolution altogether, had to be repeatedly called to order by Mr. Speaker; all this time has been taken up discussing this small matter—because I think if necessary I can show in a moment how small it is—until, in order that it might not be said that the government had not even sought to reply, or could not reply, one or two members on this side have made the replies that were necessary.

Mr. MacNICOL: Five.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If hon. members will read the list of those who have spoken during this debate they will see how many on the opposite side took part and repeated the arguments previously advanced before anyone from this side of the house said a word. I am sure I should not have been speaking at this moment if the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) had not joined in the debate; and if others, including ex-cabinet ministers, had not continued the discussion, talking at such length about this little question of whether or not a committee should go to Toronto to view certain premises, I am certain other hon. members on this side would not have said a word. I can vouch for this fact; for I was asked by the whip of our party whether or not it was advisable for our people to take part in the debate, and I said, "For goodness' sake do not waste further time over this matter, unless it is necessary because of what other speakers have said."

Mr. LAWSON: My right hon. friend is giving away confidences.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no objection to doing that. My objection is that my hon. friend is afraid to let anything be known or anything be seen. He does not want the committee to have the opportunity of doing something which will serve to satisfy its own mind. I ask this question, with regard to people who are seeking in their own minds to understand a problem. Is it not a wise procedure, where there is a great question which involves matters of plant, industrial processes and the like, to familiarize oneself as quickly as possible with all essential features? I would say that the people of this country will think the committee have taken a very wise step when they have sought at the very beginning of their inquiry to get into their minds as clearly as possible the whole system of industrial processes essential to the production of this particular arm.

May I say to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson), who spoke just a moment ago, that if the issue were—as it is not—whether it is better to have public or private ownership in respect of the manufacture of Bren guns and other armaments and military equipment, one of the first things which ought to be done by those who wanted to speak intelligently on the question would be to find out what the industrial processes were and what they involved in the way of expenditure on plant, equipment and the like. They would then be in a position to determine whether or not a government would be wise in undertaking a particular work itself or whether it would be better advised to leave it to private industry which has to equip itself for other purposes as well. So I think the recommendation of the committee is very wise and sensible, and I believe it will be so regarded by the people of the country.

If the government were seeking to oppose a committee of this house going to investigate a plant which was the subject of discussion and which had been talked about in the manner in which this plant has been referred to, I could quite understand why there would be very considerable debate and why the government in any such attitude would be strongly opposed. I must confess that I have not heard of many other cases, with the exception of those that have arisen this session, in which, when the government was seeking to let in more light, it was deliberately obstructed in so doing. That has been the nature of the tactics of hon. gentlemen opposite this afternoon, to prevent hon. members on this side of the house—even if others do not wish to go—from obtaining the additional information and additional light they wish to have in regard to the consideration of one of the great public questions of the day.

Mr. MANION: They could all go on their own, as individuals.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is to be gained by raising a point such as that, that they could all go as individuals? They are a committee appointed for a particular purpose. The most satisfactory way for a committee to deal with any question is to deal with it collectively, not to be going here and there as individuals. I do submit that what my hon. friend from Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) said a moment ago is wholly pertinent. He asked: Who is going to suffer, anyway, as a result of the committee going to Toronto? What harm is going to be done? If it was going to injure anyone; if it was going to destroy the reputation of the city of Toronto because a committee of this house were going up to investigate an industrial plant there, there might be some argument. But when there is nothing to be said against anyone and everyone in this parliament viewing a plant of this kind, for the life of me I cannot understand why a recommendation of this sort should be opposed. It seems to me the committee will have everything to gain and nothing to lose by the extra information and knowledge its members will gain.

Here, however, is the real question, the one the public is going to ask: In a matter of dollars and cents how much has this afternoon's discussion come to, as compared with the cost of having the committee go to Toronto? That is the kind of question in which the public of Canada are interested to-day. I do not wish to go into mathematical calculations at the moment, but I have not the slightest doubt that in the little space in the Globe and Mail devoted to what parliament has been doing we shall find a mathematical calculation giving the cost of this afternoon's discussion. How much of the people's money has it cost to have the discussion we have had in this house this afternoon?

Miss MACPHAIL: May I ask the Prime Minister if he agrees with the Globe and Mail, that every hour parliament meets costs so much money, that it can be reckoned in dollars and cents?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I do not; I am far from agreeing.

Miss MACPHAIL: Then why seem to agree with it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was not. I was simply asking: why give the Globe and Mail any reason to quote one instance which they may cite, which is obvious, as against the very reasonable, right, proper and necessary deliberation of public questions by parliament by means of reasoned discussion and debate? I do say, however, that we shall have weighed by the people of this country how much time and money has been wasted in this parliament this afternoon over the trivial question of whether a number of members constituting a committee of this house should have the right to go to Toronto and come back, particularly when it is known, as has been said, that they all have railway passes of their own and that in addition most of them are themselves meeting what else there may be in the way of other incidental expenses. We have been almost—and if we were to have a recorded vote in connection with this motion I think we would be actually —half a day discussing this question.

May I add one further word. We have been told by some hon. gentlemen opposite that it is within the power of the government to control the proceedings of this house. That is so up to a certain point; but if hon. gentlemen in any part of the house seek deliberately to obstruct and unduly prolong its proceedings they can avail themselves of many facilities by means of which that may be done. What we have had this afternoon has shown how easy it is if hon. members wish to make a mountain out of a molehill; they can take up the time of parliament to that end, at great expense to the country.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was paired with the hon. member for Victoria, Ont., (Mr. McNevin). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I think I was on my feet just as fast as you were. Now that hon. members have decided to come to Toronto, may I on behalf of the city of Toronto issue a royal welcome? I do not know of any other place in Canada where you can spend two or three weeks on a Sunday afternoon any better than you can in the city of Toronto.

To get back to the main motion: Among other things, hon. members will have to consider a plant and the production of machine guns. It has been my pleasure to have known this Inglis organization for some thirty years. Many thousands of dollars' worth of machinery have come from that plant, but perhaps I am not in order in discussing it now that that portion of the resolution has been disposed of. I want to leave this one thought with hon. members of this house. If they will look around this chamber and take away all the frills we have here, they will have before them a room of about the size of the plant they are to visit. There will be a large crane in operation lifting up pieces of machinery; but they must realize that such a plant is not at all suitable for the particular job of work covered by this contract. Hence the necessity of building another plant with low ceilings to accommodate shafting, pulleys and what-not to operate the lathes, and so on, for the production of the precision machine covered by the contract.

It is only my purpose to speak for another thirty seconds or so, but before I take my seat let me say: Come up and see us some time. I have three little booklets which tell a whole lot about the city of Toronto, and I hope that you all have a pleasant time when you do come up to see us.

Motion (Mr. Fraser) agreed to on division.

Mr. LECLERC: Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to prohibit the use of the word "butter," to the detriment of our producers, in the sale of products which are not butter—for example, peanut "butter."

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED REQUEST OF ADVISORY AIR COUNCIL FOR RESIGNATION OF MINISTER—STATEMENT OF THE PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) asked me this question:

Has the Air Defence Council of Canada communicated with the Prime Minister requesting the resignation of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) because of unsatisfactory conditions with regard to air defence, as reported in the Winnipeg Free Press of March 10, in a news dispatch over the signature of Major Moore?

I replied at the time that I did not think the question was one to be asked on the orders of the day, but I said that I was not aware of any communication of the kind having been received, which was correct at the time. I have since sought to find out if any communication at all had come to my office, and I find that none has come.

I have also had opportunity for the first time since the question was asked to see the article itself. It invades to such an extent the privileges of this house that I think I should say a word with respect to it.

I also have received, wholly unsolicited, telegrams from members of the advisory air council, who are the parties referred to in the article. I think it is right that they should be put on record in answering the question of the hon. member for Vancouver North.

Let me first of all correct his designation of the particular council. He called it the Air Defence Council of Canada. It is the Advisory Air Council, and is so referred to in the article of which he made mention. The article appears in the Winnipeg Free Press of March 11 last, and is headed thus: "Stultified?" Then there is a subhead reading:

Advisory Air Council Reported Dissatisfied with Administration.

By Harold Moore.

The article is as follows:

Montreal, March 10 (Special).—It has long been common knowledge that the air defence council of Canada has been gravely concerned over conditions in the department of defence, and the council is now understood to have communicated to the prime minister its recommendation that the Hon. Ian Mackenzie be requested to resign as minister of defence.

The air defence council was appointed more than a year ago by the minister as an advisory body to see that Canada was being provided with adequate air defence. Its well known members have had outstanding experience in military aviation. By their steady application to a difficult task, they inspired in the public some confidence that proper measures are being adopted to give Canada air defence, and raised the hope that a lamentable situation would be corrected. The creation of the council and the selection of its members were offered by the minister himself as an assurance that progress in air defence would be made and that dubious practices in awarded contracts would not be tolerated.

These assurances were felt to be justified by the personnel of a council which includes: Hon. Air Marshal W. A. Bishop, Montreal; Hon. Air Commodore Redford H. Mulock, Montreal; Squadron-Leader A. D. Bell-Irving, Vancouver; Capt. H. J. Burden, Toronto; Squadron-Leader F. C. McGill, Westmount, P.Q.

The air defence council has not concealed that it met with many obstacles put in its way, and it is claimed to have despaired some time ago of being able to do anything effective so long as the present minister of defence insisted on sustaining elements blocking progress and seeming to countenance practices that have aroused disturbing convictions and suspicions.

Some members of the air defence council have candidly admitted that the situation confronting the council is baffling and unendurable, and they have not concealed their personal disgust and have at times individually threatened to resign.

The views held by the air defence council are no longer any secret, and must be the basis of any communication the council is said to have addressed confidentially to the prime minister. The only inference that can be drawn from that action is that, either the minister of defence and what he stands for must go, or else the air defence council should resign. The council has striven sincerely to do a good job of work, but its members cannot afford to submit to being thwarted by obstacles raised officially and sometimes unofficially.

Then there are some other paragraphs of lesser importance, and the article concludes with the following paragraph:

The air defence council makes no attempt to conceal its condemnation of the hopeless muddle it has discovered.

The house will observe that this is a direct statement; it is not an assumption or allegation, but a direct statement. The article continues:

It is freely known to be dissatisfied with an administration at the top that is steadily ruining the fine quality found in most of the junior members of the R.C.A.F. It disparages without having the power to correct favouritism. It is said to demand a clean sweep to permit a thorough reorganization. Its disapproval of very much that has come under its purview is frank and unrestrained. Whether this has been conveyed confidentially to the prime minister may never be revealed, but the council's disapprobation of the present whole administration of the air branch of the department of defence is no secret.

I need not repeat that nothing of any kind such as is suggested in that article has ever reached me from any source whatever. I wish, however, to answer the article by telegrams which have come to me yesterday and to-day from the members of the advisory air council. Let me repeat the reference in the article to the personnel of the council:

Its well known members have had outstanding experience in military aviation. . . . These assurances were felt to be justified by the personnel of a council which includes:

Then the names are mentioned.

Wholly unsolicited, I received late in the day yesterday the following telegram from Air Vice-Marshal W. A. Bishop, V.C., a name than which there is none more honoured in this country:

Montreal, Que.,
15 March, 1939.

Rt. Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King,
Prime Minister, Ottawa, Ont.

With reference to the questions asked you in the House of Commons this afternoon quoting the Winnipeg Free Press of March tenth last about alleged recommendations of the honorary air advisory committee as to the resignation of the Minister of National Defence or any other person in his department, they are not only absolutely false but entirely ridiculous. As a member of the committee I state with assurance that we are unanimously and strongly in support of the minister's actions and policy and are confident that everything possible that can be done with the means at his disposal is being most efficiently done.

W. A. Bishop,
Vice Air-Marshal.

Then from Vancouver, British Columbia, I received another telegram, dated March 15, it was from Wing-Commander A. D. Bell-Irving:

Rt. Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King,
Prime Minister, Ottawa, Ont.

Having read article in Winnipeg Free Press of tenth instant relating to air advisory committee and Honourable Minister of National Defence I wish to assure you that as far as I know the minister has the unqualified support of air advisory committee. Naturally committee hopes that further urgently necessary progress may soon be made in developing this service but report that committee has requested minister's resignation or even contemplated doing so is false and entirely without foundation in fact.

A. D. Bell-Irving,
Wing Commander.

Then from Montreal, also dated March 15, I received the following telegram from Wing Commander F. S. McGill:

Rt. Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King,
Prime Minister, Ottawa, Ont.

The article which appears in the Winnipeg Free Press under date March tenth 1939 stating that the members of the honorary advisory committee for airports matters were dissatisfied with the Minister of National Defence and demanding his resignation has just been brought to my attention. It is hard to understand how a paper of this standing would publish such a false statement without verifying its authenticity and I feel in all fairness to the members of our committee they should at least be forced to retract. We have always found the Minister of National Defence anxious and willing to cooperate and we feel he is the right man in the right place. There is no truth in the report that we asked for the resignation of the said honourable minister.

F. S. McGill,
Wing Commander.

This morning I received the following wire from Air Commodore R. H. Mulock. It is from Montreal:

Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King,
Prime Minister, Ottawa, Ont.

I understand questions were asked in the House of Commons re an article appearing in the Winnipeg Free Press on March tenth. This article insinuates or states that I have criticized the Minister of National Defence and his policies to you. This is absolutely false and contemptible.

R. H. Mulock,
Air Commodore.

There is one other telegram. It is dated Toronto, Ontario, March 16, and was received to-day:

Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King,
Prime Minister, Ottawa.

Sir: The article in Winnipeg Free Press March tenth stating honorary air advisory committee is dissatisfied with Minister of National Defence is a falsehood and a reflection on our committee. The author and publisher should be severely dealt with for making statements without confirming them beforehand. Our committee is in complete accord with the Minister of National Defence both as to his policy and action. He has kept us informed of all matters pertaining to our service and rendered us every assistance. I speak for myself and the members of the committee when I say that we have nothing but the highest regard for the Honourable Ian Mackenzie.

H. J. Burden.

Mr. Burden is a captain in the air force. The five persons from whom these telegrams have been received comprise the complete membership of the Air Advisory Committee. This record speaks for itself.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

REVIEW OF GOVERNMENT FILM ACTIVITIES—INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE TO CENTRALIZE DISTRIBUTION

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the third reading of Bill No. 35, to create a national film board.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CREATION OF DEFENCE PURCHASING BOARD TO ENTER INTO CONTRACTS FOR MUNITIONS, EQUIPMENT, MATERIALS AND SUPPLIES

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 14, consideration in committee of Bill No. 38, to establish a defence purchasing board—Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver)—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 3, subsection 5—Salary of chairman.

Mr. STIRLING: I want to ask the minister once more whether he would be good enough to give us some general idea of what the government has in mind in regard to the composition of this board. There has been a remarkable degree of unanimity with regard to the earlier stages and the general principle of this bill. No doubt as the discussion is carried along hon. members will express divergent opinions on the details. But the government could hardly have got to the point of setting up a measure to bring into being a board so remarkable as this from various points of view without at least reaching the point of discussion of the type of persons they propose should occupy the four positions on the board. Various opinions have already been expressed as to what sort of men they should be. The Hon. Mr. Justice Davis, the royal commissioner, expressed his view, and many opinions have been voiced as to how this unusual board should be composed. Could the minister not give us some idea as to the direction in which the government's mind has been moving as to the personnel of the board?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I appreciate the suggestion of cooperation in the remarks of my hon. friend. I did the other evening intimate that the government's opinion is that the value of the board will depend almost entirely upon the personality of the chairman. It is, if I may say so, a tribute to the government that they have not too rigidly considered the essential nature of that appointment. As I said in my few remarks on the resolution, I shall be most happy to receive suggestions from hon. members, either in this committee or otherwise because I think the board should have the approval, in essence and principle and if possible as to personnel, of all hon. members of the house. As I said the other day, my own opinion would be—I am speaking entirely for myself—that we should have as chairman a qualified industrialist with business experience in purchasing, one who has been accustomed to dealing with business affairs in a business way, because this is really a tremendously large business concern. I can assure my hon. friend that in regard to any individual the government has a completely open mind.

With respect to the three assistants, as I said before there are no definitive reservations with reference to their occupation. We have before us the suggestions of the eminent jurist the commissioner, but we are not bound by them. I should sincerely welcome suggestions from this committee; the government will as far as possible meet the conjoint wishes of the house with reference to the type of person to be appointed.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister says that the government have not given very much consideration to what type of people the other three members shall be. I do not think the minister has said whether it is the desire of the government that they should be chosen geographically, whether they will be handy to Ottawa where their meetings will usually be, presumably—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think the bill says that.

Mr. STIRLING: Of course that point has some bearing on the matter of expense. Can the minister assure the committee that the choice of the three other members will have no connection with the political persuasion of the government? It is a common thing, we all know, that members of boards such as this are selected in accordance with the views of the government of the day. If the minister is in a position to give some statement on that point I think it would be appreciated by the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be very glad to have the advice of any hon. member with reference to the other three members of the board, just as in regard to the chairman. It is emphatically my own opinion that they should not necessarily be appointed because of their political persuasion, but I do not think sympathy with the government should be a bar to appointment. I think that is a fair qualification.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister does not mean that no Liberals need apply!

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It seems to me that there is not going to be close enough cooperation between the board and the Department of National Defence in connection with the letting of contracts. The department will requisition certain things from the board, then the board will look around and choose some contractor by tender or otherwise. The board is going to look at it altogether from a purchasing point of view. Where is the best place to manufacture these arms and munitions in case we ever get into trouble? Has it ever occurred to us, for instance, that in time of trouble we are likely to have sabotage? In any crowded city, what chance have we to guard against sabotage? We have foreign elements all over the country, and we know we are going to have a good deal of difficulty in connection with sabotage, in regard to power for example. When the board has to make its contracts without close cooperation with the Department of National Defence I do not see how it is going to be capable of choosing contractors and giving the proper recommendation to the finance department without having one member of the board sitting on the national defence council. I urge the minister to take that into consideration. For instance we have a contract under way in Toronto, which is probably going to be extended, and in time of war there would be danger of sabotage. We all know what subversive influences there are in the country.

Mr. YOUNG: In Toronto?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): One of the members of this board should sit in with the Department of National Defence so that there shall be close cooperation. In that connection I was wondering whether this board is to have anything to do, for instance, with altering the policy of the chief of general staff. Perhaps the minister would answer that.

[Mr. Stirling.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think the first part of my hon. friend's suggestions was developed the other evening and we had a vote upon it. I stated then, and I repeat now, that personally I do not see any difficulty in having the head of this purchasing board attached to the defence council if in future that should be considered advisable, but that need not form part of this legislation. With regard to the second point, naturally the recommendations of the chief of staff and of the defence council will have the same weight they have always had. In regard to essential purchases those will remain, as will be seen from the legislation, very largely a matter of consultation between the head of the purchasing board and the expert advisers of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. CHURCH: With regard to section 4, to which the minister referred, which provides—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We are on subsection 5 of section 3.

Mr. CHURCH: If you read sections 4 and 5 together the procedure becomes rather complicated. The tender may be accepted where practicable, if it is the lowest. I have had a great deal of experience—

The CHAIRMAN: I do not like to interrupt the hon. member, but we are now on subsection 5 of section 3.

Mr. CHURCH: It is hard to know what section we are on, because the sections are not read.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We are on section 3. Subsection 4 was allowed to stand, and we are now dealing with subsection 5. We will come to my hon. friend's point a little later.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall subsection 5 carry?

Mr. POULIOT: No. Just before this carries I should like to ask the minister if he has made sufficient progress since the other day to be able to state whether Hon. Wesley Gordon, former minister of labour, or Mr. Tom Moore, will be chairman of this board?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have stated two or three times during the discussion of this bill in committee that as yet no individuals have been even considered by the government or by the minister with reference to this position. That is as definite and emphatic as I can make the statement.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister for his answer, but I wonder if he has received any applications or recommendations for the job.

Mr. SPENCE: He has hundreds of them, I guess.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, as a matter of fact my hon. friend would be surprised; there have been very few applications or recommendations. It is possible that as a result this position will go to someone who may not apply for it.

Mr. POULIOT: The minister may be sure that he will not receive my application for either position.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is it the intention that tenders will be called for, or will the contracts be let to picked firms?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is out of order. We are not dealing with contracts; we are still on subsection 5.

Subsection 5 agreed to.

On section 3, subsection 6—Expenses and allowances of members.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Tom Moore incurred some very heavy travelling expenses when he was on the other commission, and I warn the minister about it.

Subsection 6 agreed to.

Subsection 7 agreed to.

On section 3, subsection 8—Equal votes.

Mr. MacNICOL: This section reads:

In the event of an equality of votes at any meeting of the board the chairman shall have a casting vote.

Does he have two votes?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This subsection is inserted because the board consists of four members, and there might be an equality of votes. In that case the chairman would have a casting vote in addition to his ordinary vote.

Subsection 8 agreed to.

Subsection 9 agreed to.

On section 3, subsection 10—Meetings of board.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister anticipate that the meetings will be largely in Ottawa?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think that will be necessary, but it would not follow that the suggestion made by my hon. friend a few moments ago with reference to territorial qualifications for these other commissioners would be debarred.

Subsection 10 agreed to.

On section 3, subsection 11—Oath of office.

Mr. STIRLING: Is this not an unusual section? Is there any other instance of the kind in the public service in connection with any board?

Mr. POWER: I asked that very question and I was told there were other instances, in the Bank of Canada act and one or two pieces of legislation. I had never seen it before, like my hon. friend, but it does exist in other statutes.

Mr. POULIOT: Is it because the government are not sure of the faithfulness of those to be appointed on this board that they provide for this oath?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is because the government want to be very sure of their faithfulness. I think it is a very good thing to have a suggestion like this, having regard to the efficiency of the public service.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I did not hear the minister very clearly. Did he say the government were going to have the chairman of this board sit on the defence council, or is he just going to be consulted occasionally?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I repeated exactly what I said the other evening.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Then there will not be close cooperation between the purchasing board and the defence council. Is there any objection to having the chairman of this board sit on the defence council, or called into consultation with the defence council? It seems to me most important that we endeavour to obtain that close cooperation, for the reasons I have just pointed out. If the chairman of the board is just going to be asked to go there occasionally, how will you get that cooperation? It is not a matter of having cooperation once a month or once every two weeks, or something like that. It seems to me that as matters go along and policies are developed it would be of the utmost importance to have this prominent man, who will understand contracts and who will be an industrialist as well, on hand to advise this council, and that they should take his advice, more especially in connection with ordnance matters. I urge that something like this be done.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I can only repeat what I have said already, that when matters develop and progress, if it is considered necessary to carry out the suggestion of my hon. friend that can easily be done; but it is not necessary to make that part of this legislation.

Subsection 11 agreed to.

On section 3, subsection 4—Chairman to devote whole time.

Mr. POWER: An amendment to this subsection was suggested by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas). I now move that subsection 4 of section 3 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

(4) The chairman, who shall be the chief executive officer of the board, shall devote his whole time to the business of the board, and shall not, after his appointment as chairman, be an officer, or a director of any industrial corporation or company, or a shareholder of any corporation or company manufacturing guns, cannon, small arms, munitions, naval ships, military aircraft or other equipment or supplies used exclusively or primarily for war purposes.

I think that covers every kind of armament the draftsman could think of.

Mr. MacNICOL: It does not cover what I asked; it applies only, as I see it, to an industrialist who might be chosen as chairman.

Mr. POWER: No. Anybody can be a shareholder in an industrial corporation. I imagine my hon. friend, like probably dozens of members of this house, is a shareholder in several industrial corporations.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): This is an excellent amendment; it considerably strengthens the position of the board and of the government. The point raised by the hon. member for Davenport reminds me that during the investigation by the parliamentary committee in Great Britain it was found that during the war, for instance, military advisers on the defence council were also directors of some of the armament firms. While there may have been nothing wrong with the relationship, the attitude in the public mind especially—

Mr. POWER: So was the chairman of the British royal commission.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The feeling after the war, particularly when the peace settlement was so strong, caused a revulsion of feeling in Great Britain which has not gone yet. I think that on this amendment the government is to be commended.

Mr. PELLETIER: I agree with the observations of the hon. member for Weyburn with respect to the amendment to the section proposed by the minister. I too feel it is very important that no possible criticism should be attached to the chairman of the board. Criticism has been levelled against other persons occupying positions of prominence elsewhere, on the ground of their connection with the armament industry. For instance, we would not want the chairman of this board to be subjected to the criticism which has been made against one who is highly placed in the British empire. Referring to Mr. Chamberlain, one periodical has this to say:

Among his extensive financial holdings is a considerable block of Imperial Chemical Industries shares, 833 preferential and 5,414 ordinary ones. His son, Francis Chamberlain, is on the staff of Imperial Chemical Industries' sales organization at the main office in Birmingham.

I am glad to note the proposed amendment. When it is passed it will not be possible to level that type of criticism at anyone in a similar position on this board.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not yet clear on the point. The section distinctly states "or a director of any industrial corporation." I shall confine my remarks to the industrial corporation part of it, and will forget all the rest that has been said. Could the chairman belong to a corporation in any way associated with the financing of companies manufacturing goods, or could he belong to a legal corporation or legal firm, and as a partner of that firm—

Mr. POWER: He could not very well belong to the legal firm and at the same time devote his whole time to the business of the board.

Mr. MacNICOL: He might not have very much legal business. If that were so he would not be the right type of man to have at the head of the board.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not like to go back at this again, but I shall have to. The duties and regulations respecting these people are set out. First of all I should like to know to whom the chief of general staff is responsible. Is he responsible to the minister or to the Prime Minister?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): To the minister—at least he is now.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The chief of general staff as a member of the defence council is responsible for contracts. His responsibility is to the minister and to the Prime Minister. The chief of general staff may say, "We have to have such and such and so and so." We do not want to have any come-back in this matter. It would not seem proper to have the purchasing board coming back and saying, "We do not know anything about this; we will have to change it." If the chairman of the purchasing board, who is to be a full time man, sits in with the defence council, there will be cooperation which there could never be in any other way, and he would be fully conversant with everything that is going on. I see the Minister of Pensions and National Health laughing at me, but I do not mind.

Mr. POWER: I was not laughing at the hon. member.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The more coordination and cooperation we can get, without having too many people monkeying with it, the better off we shall be. I suggest the chairman of the board should sit in at the meetings of the defence council. I cannot see any reason why he should not be there, because he would be a full time man.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The hon. member has suggested that of their own accord the board could vary the requisitions or suggestions made by members of the defence council. If he will read the last part of subsection 3 of section 4 he will find that they are subject to revision by the board only upon approval of the minister. So that that suggestion falls to the ground.

Amendment agreed to.

Subsection 4 as amended agreed to.

Section 3 as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Powers of board.

Mr. STIRLING: There is a point here I should like to have cleared up. The minister may receive information from his technical advisers that such and such a thing is required. When he is satisfied, the requisition goes to the board. When the board is satisfied, does it prepare the tenders, make all ready for letting and then submit the matter to the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Finance in turn submitting it to the council and the council in turn coming back with the permission to let?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, that is about right.

Mr. STIRLING: Then is the requisition sent back to the board and put through the procedure of letting?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: And then the tenders are submitted to the Minister of Finance, and again go to council?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; once the authority of council is obtained the board has complete authority to negotiate the contract.

Mr. STIRLING: The board finishes everything up?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: And then all that is required is the order in council?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: I suppose a majority of the four members of the board might pass a contract, and the majority recommendation would go to the government for final approval. According to the terms of the bill the board comprises four men, one of whom is permanent and the rest temporary or part time employees who may come and go as the requirements of the board necessitate. I am not altogether enamoured of that kind of employee in a task of this type. If my own views were asked I should say I preferred three permanent men to a number of part time board members.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is the intention, except that the chairman of the board is the only permanently or full-time employed official. The rest of the members may be permanent for one, two or more years, but they are not fully employed. They are called in to advise with reference to various aspects or angles of a contract, and to assist the chairman in determining with regard to certain matters.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think any one could regard them as full-time or permanent members of the board when they are to be paid a per diem allowance plus travelling expenses. One of them may live in Vancouver, and he may be called in to a meeting in exactly the same way as directors of the Canadian National Railways may be called in. The minister shakes his head, but if those persons are to be full-time permanent employees, let us say so in the bill; let us not put them on a per diem allowance, as is attempted here. Contracts amounting to $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 may be let by this board, and I do not think we ought to allow such important positions to be held by men who would come and go as required. When we have men on a temporary basis—and I still maintain they are only temporary—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are all appointed for five years.

Mr. HEAPS: That is true; I understand they are appointed for five years. But they are only on a day to day basis, so far as the board itself is concerned. According to the bill only the chairman of the board is to be permanent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Fully employed.

Mr. HEAPS: I believe I am correct when I say that the other men are only part time employees. It may be said that those men may be in the city every day of the year, although I would doubt that. I think they would be called in from time to time and would give whatever knowledge they may possess when the letting of various contracts is under consideration. What I am suggesting to the minister and to the committee is that I would rather see three full time employees on this board. If these men were here all the time they could become familiar with the work. Previously the minister stated that we might have an accountant as a member.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is a possibility.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not know whether an accountant would be a proper person to sit upon a board of this kind. I doubt whether such a man would have the necessary qualifications. Men of experience in this type of business should be appointed; this would be preferable to appointments on a purely geographical basis, as is sometimes done in cases of the kind. If you have members who are only to come and go at the whim of the chairman or the government—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. HEAPS: Who is going to ask these men to come to Ottawa? How are they to know when they are wanted?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A quorum of the board must pass upon any contract.

Mr. HEAPS: That is quite true, but when are these men to come to Ottawa? Are they to come here only when a contract is to be let?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not necessarily.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to find that out. Personally I would prefer to have this board something like the civil service commission, with its members here all the time and fully responsible to the government or to the house.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): This board is to be set up to give financial advice to the department. It is expected that its members will have experience with respect to manufacturing. It is to pass finally upon how these things are to be done. Subsection 2 provides:

> No action shall be taken by the board leading to the negotiation of a contract except upon requisition made upon the board by the minister.

[Mr. Heaps.]

The bill then sets out the various objects of the board. If the chairman of this board is not fully conversant with all these things, let us see what might happen. The council may decide that something is needed. The chief of the general staff may decide on something. He goes to the minister and the minister issues a requisition on the board. The board may decide that they want more information. That is what may happen when the chairman is not fully conversant with these matters and is not able to give all the necessary information. A matter might be referred back to the defence council, and then the council might refer it back to the purchasing board. It may be referred then to the minister, and keep on going back and forth in that way. It seems to me logical that the chairman of the board should be a member of the defence council, and for the life of me I cannot see why he should not sit on that council. That is the only way you can have close cooperation between the board and the department.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): For the fourth or fifth time I shall answer the same question. There is no objection whatsoever, in the light of the experience which may be gained, to carrying out the suggestion of my hon. friend, but this is not the place to do it, nor is this the legislation by which it can be done. It can easily be done afterwards if it is found necessary to do so.

Mr. CHURCH: In my opinion we have a lack of responsibility in connection with these contracts under section 4, subsection 1. In preparing this particular portion of the bill the minister seems to have overlooked the lessons which were learned from the experience of the British munitions board in Canada during the great war. This new board can deal only with contracts of over $5,000. This board must report to the Minister of Finance, who in turn submits the report to the governor in council with his recommendations. I submit that there will be a lack of finality and responsibility under the restrictions of section 4, subsection 1. In any case it will be hard to fix responsibility should anything go wrong. The board may say that they have been requisitioned, but as it was altered by the Minister of Finance or by the governor in council they are not responsible. Such a lack of finality will be fatal to a contract. The government should have been guided by what occurred in connection with the British munitions board. The final report of that board referred to the patriotism and the devotion of the tenderers and munition workers of Canada. It referred to the courage and sacrifices which had been revealed and which were worthy of every admiration. This board is not given a free hand. It is true they are to exercise some control in the public interest over specifications, but they do not have full power over the awarding of tenders, which is more important. It seems to me that the whole procedure is cumbersome. It shows such a lack of responsibility that it is bound to lead to a number of innovations in the awarding of contracts.

Mr. SPENCE: I rather share the views of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps), that it would be better to have three full time men on this board rather than a chairman and one or two other members to be called in now and then. You cannot expect real efficiency from any member of this board unless he is familiar with every detail of the work. I understood we were to have a real purchasing board. My view is that this board should be composed of men who understand purchasing and who have a knowledge of business. I am sure that is the type of man the minister wants to have. You would get better service if you had three full time men rather than a full time chairman and four or five other members who are to be called at intervals. No doubt the chairman of this board will be a man who has substantial knowledge of the making of purchases. He should be qualified to purchase any article required by the department after a requisition is received from the council or the chief officials in the department. Once these men have decided what they want, they should make out an order to be sent to the purchasing board. It should then be up to the board to see that the article needed is obtained at the best possible price. The members of this purchasing board should be capable of carrying out that job. I think the board will be a failure if you have just a permanent chairman and two or three other men who are to be consulted at intervals. They may not know anything about the details of the work.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the subsection carry?

Mr. SPENCE: Carry everything, whether it is right or wrong. That is the only job you have.

Mr. STIRLING: Is there not an analogy between this board and the work carried out by the directorates of some companies, or, if not by the directorates of these companies, by their executive councils? They are definitely appointed. They meet perhaps once a week or once a fortnight or once a month or at the call of the chair, and the chairman cannot take the necessary action with regard to contracts without the acquiescence of a majority of his board.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Exactly the same.

Mr. STIRLING: Is not the analogy to that of a board of directors?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Absolutely. Exactly the same.

Mr. POULIOT: Will the board be directly under the Minister of Finance, or under the deputy minister of finance?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The language of the statute is plain, that all the recommendations and requisitions come in from the Department of National Defence. The board is responsible to the Minister of Finance, who carries the recommendations for decisions to council, and after the decision of the council is rendered the board has complete jurisdiction with reference to carrying out the terms of the contract.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. That is not exactly an answer to my question. What I want to know is whether the board will be directly under the Minister of Finance, or under the deputy minister?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Minister of Finance.

Mr. POULIOT: The deputy minister of finance has nothing to do with it? And will the chairman be a deputy minister or rank as a deputy minister?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is not provided for in the legislation.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) asked the other day a question which, I believe, has not been answered. He asked if the interdepartmental committee had gone out of business.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The answer is in the negative.

Mr. POULIOT: In the negative? It has not gone out of business?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. POULIOT: And will it continue?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Whenever this legislation is proclaimed the functions carried out by the interdepartmental committee will have been concluded.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, speaking to that, I have just a word to say. It is to remind the minister what he himself has said with regard to the work of that committee. At page 1763 of Hansard he said:

> The Skelton committee reported that profit control was essentially an administrative problem and advised that they were unable to recommend legislation which would cover all contingencies. They did make one important and valuable step forward—they recommended a court of review to advise the department directly concerned on the form of its contracts.

That is what they did. I assume that the minister was too generous in his praise of the interdepartmental committee when he continued thus:

> I want to say here that the interdepartmental committee, whatever criticism may have been offered concerning them, rendered magnificent and devoted service to the government and the country in the work they have done in the last two years.

They have just suggested a court of review; that is all; and that was "magnificent service." Any child can render a service like that. I do not see why that committee is still in office, or what use it has been.

Subsection 1 agreed to.

Subsection 2 agreed to.

On section 4, subsection 3—Details of requisition.

Mr. STIRLING: As to the last few words of this subsection a little explanation is, I think, necessary:

> . . . and any such requisition shall be subject to revision by the board upon approval by the minister.

Which comes first, the revision by the board or the approval by the minister; and what happens if the board and the minister very decidedly disagree?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is no question in my mind that what would happen is this. The officials of the department will make suggestions with reference to a requisition to the board; if that is to be revised by the board it must have the approval of the minister, and if the approval of the minister is not forthcoming then, I take it, the original recommendation from the officials of the department would be validated.

Mr. MARSHALL: What minister is referred to in this section? Is it the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Defence?

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Minister of National Defence. It means, wherever "the minister" is mentioned, the Minister of National Defence. The Minister of Finance is particularly so specified.

Mr. STIRLING: I do not know that I am quite clear with regard to that point. It seems to mean that the technical officers advising the committee could override the board.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If they are sustained by the minister. If the requisition were considered by the board to be unreasonable, the board would refer the amendment of that requisition to the minister; if the minister then approved of the amendment of the board it would automatically go ahead to the controlling authority. If not, I take it, it could not go ahead at all; it would be amended or modified or altered as found necessary, doubtless after consultation between the defence council, the purchasing board, and perhaps the minister.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If the minister would carry that a step further: what machinery would be provided in the event of a deadlock? Would the Minister of Finance then take the requisition direct to the governor in council? That is, assuming the board did not agree to the requisition but thought there ought to be some modification of it, say for cheaper equipment, and the minister was not prepared to approve the alteration.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Of course, under the terms of the proposed legislation, if the minister did not approve it would not proceed to the Minister of Finance or the governor in council, but I imagine the proper procedure would be a conference in regard to any varying viewpoints which might develop as between officials of the department and the head of the purchasing board. I do not anticipate any great difficulty. If any requisitions were made which could not be fully and amply justified, they would not automatically go through; the board has authority to alter or modify them. The approval of the minister must be obtained before they go ahead.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Of course the minister will have the working of it out, so I will not elaborate it, but it seems that there ought to be a court of appeal.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think we can rely upon its working out fairly satisfactorily.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): This is not by way of interference with the defence council. But, for instance, if the defence council say "We must have this equipment," the purchasing board cannot come back and say, "You have this, and you have more than we think you require to have." There is not going to be any decision of the purchasing board as to how much the defence council should have: I do not know whether I have made myself clear. The minister makes a recommendation. So much has to be bought. Can the purchasing board, say, "We do not think you should have so much."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, not necessarily.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What I mean is this: there is no interference with the recommendation?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is only for purposes of information that they can go back and find this out?

Mr. STEVENS: That is scarcely correct, I think, because in the requisition it must declare the quantity of such defence equipment already in the possession of the government. So there is a measure of review.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My hon. friend will find, if he looks at the section, that there is quite a lot of review.

Mr. CHURCH: With regard to the details of the requisition is the minister going to assist the manufacturers by giving them advice? Will the details of these requisitions contain information for the manufacturer? Suppose there is a shortage of labour or a shortage of materials, or suppose he is not able to get power—three matters which the British munitions board found it very necessary to deal with in the specifications and the requisitions. In addition to this phase of it, there is another requisition difficulty referred to in the report. Take materials. Some manufacturers may have certain materials and other manufacturers may have other kinds, with the result that they cannot get the finished article provided for in the board's specifications; what is to be done about that to help tenderers out? What coordination will there be regarding plants? I understand the minister looked over 1,800. There will be a great shortage of power if an emergency should arise. Will the board help out the tenderers and by requisitions help to regulate matters?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Under section 8 of the bill the board has complete power to survey not only the requirements of the department but also the various industrial plants in Canada, so that the various points he has raised have been fully met, I think, in the terms of the proposed legislation.

Mr. MacNEIL: Where does the responsibility lie with regard to the supervision of a contract?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Entirely with the purchasing board. It is provided by section 6:

> It shall be the duty of the board to supervise the performance of all contracts which may have been entered into pursuant to the provisions of this part with a view to assuring that such contracts are performed in accordance with their respective terms.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Was not that the duty of the master general of ordnance before, or whose duty was it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The duty of the minister, I would say.

Subsection 3 agreed to.

On section 4, subsection 4—Tenders.

Mr. BROOKS: This subsection provides for advertising. It says:

> In respect of all contracts, the board shall, wherever practicable, invite tenders either by means of advertisements in the public press or otherwise.

I assume that the intention is, of course, that there will be no patronage. That is the idea of this board, but I would ask the minister what is meant by "or otherwise." Does it mean there will be certain specified firms who will be invited to tender?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is a possibility under the interpretation of the section, but I rather anticipate that what will happen will be this. Tenders will be invited in the public press, or all available firms will be got in touch with through the Canadian Manufacturers Association or an organization of that kind, through lists supplied by them. There are two methods of tendering now: first, inviting tenders by advertisement in the public press; secondly, for many years, there has been the practice of inviting tenders from selected lists containing perhaps five or seven or up to twenty-five or thirty names.

Mr. CHURCH: Subsection 4 provides:

> In respect of all contracts, the board shall, wherever practicable, invite tenders by means of advertisements in the public press or otherwise.

Then it goes on to clothe the board with powers:

> The board shall recommend the acceptance of the lowest tender. . . .

But that does not mean that the lowest tender will always be accepted. I think, Mr. Chairman, that there is so much distribution of authority that it is going to lead to untold innovations in the awarding of contracts, and I think it might be helpful to the minister to review what was done by the munitions board in the awarding of contracts. They went very carefully into the different methods of tendering and the awarding of contracts. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I should like to quote from The History of Munition Supply in Canada, 1914-1918, by D. Carnegie, because it has an important bearing upon tendering and the awarding of contracts; and it is, of course, very important that the board should have the support of public opinion in their work, which is more or less a patriotic work. At page 296 Mr. Carnegie says:

With the exception of this fuse plant and a few others which will be referred to later, the board did not attempt to establish its own factories. The work to be done was parcelled out among Canadian manufacturers. In many cases it was carried on in factories previously existing, which were adapted to the purpose of munitions manufacture by more or less extensive changes.

There is a difficulty the minister may run into, and I think will run into. It goes on:

In other cases, manufacturers constructed new plants for munitions making, but were able to draw on their existing staff for labour, for supervision, and for skilled mechanics. The work of the board was to place orders for materials, or contracts for the execution of the various processes by which the materials were turned into finished shell; to assist the manufacturers with technical advice and to arrange for the interchange of information;—

That should be very valuable for the minister:

—and above all to see that they were kept supplied with material or with work in process up to the limit of their capacity, and not beyond it. One of the most important departments of the board, the distribution department, was entirely concerned with this latter work. The value of it was apparent from the experience of the United States, after that country came into the war and commenced the manufacture of munitions on its own account. There, also, the work was parcelled out among manufacturers. But no adequate organization was set up at the commencement to arrange for the distribution of materials and of partly finished work.

Then here is where a mistake was made:

Consequently it was found that many manufacturers had plenty of material before they had capacity to use it, while others were left with plant and workmen idle because they had not a sufficient supply of material to be worked up. Another function undertaken by the board was that of advising and assisting the body of manufacturers with regard to their problems of production—both those of machinery and those of labour.

[Mr. Church.]

And this concluding sentence:

The knowledge gained from study of the problems of one manufacturer was thus placed at the disposal of others, and the comparison of many cases was used for the general improvement.

Then it goes on to refer to the board's powers. After contracts had been awarded sometimes a manufacturer, through no fault of his own, found that his power had been shut off and some tenderers got behind, and so Sir Henry Drayton was appointed to assist the government and the manufacturers, and he had the supply of power shut off from municipalities in many cases in order that the contractors might accelerate their work. Emergencies of this kind are bound to occur, and I should like the minister to explain what provision is being made for them. It is no good just going around in a circle with several different bodies having a measure of control over tenders. In practice the government will find that it will only be inviting trouble, and that unless proper measures are taken this board will not get the results that the munitions board got.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The answer is this, that this is a measure for peace time, and I trust that it will long be used for that purpose. If an emergency arises, doubtless other measures will be enacted immediately to deal with the emergency.
